PROLOGUE

I did not start the journal that follows—more properly, the “common-place book”—until I entered Harvard as a freshman at the age of 18 years and 4 months. A great deal happened in the previous 18 years for which I have only the most meager records; thus there is no sense in trying to trace those years in any definitive manner. All I can do here is to elicit haphazardly from memory whatever has survived there and can now be evoked.

From the time of my parents’ first residence in Woodside, where my father established his medical practice in 1927, we do have some old 16-mm. movies. My only personal memory of those years (ages zero to about six) was of being horribly frightened by the stump of a man’s amputated arm (or maybe leg) when I glimpsed it across the street. We then moved to Sunnyside, on the other side of Queens Boulevard, occupying a sixth-floor apartment on the corner of 43rd Avenue and 46th Street, the same building in which my father now established his pediatric office, sharing the space with the obstetrical office of Dr. Bernard Davidoff. I began my elementary school education at P.S. 150, a short walk down 43rd Avenue to 41st Street. Luckily, this was one of the New York City elementary schools that included, then as still now, a “gifted and talented program” for students who qualified, which I did. I don’t remember any details, except that my sixth-grade teacher, Mrs. (or Miss) Musnik (if I remember her name correctly) was exceptional.

What followed sixth grade was a problem. Normally, students from P.S. 150 would go to P.S. 125 in Woodside, apparently not a good place at all, and certainly one that lacked a gifted and talented program. My parents, teaming up with four or five other sets of parents, applied to the school superintendent, and amazingly the entire group received permission to send their children to a very special school (no. 69, I believe) in Jackson Heights for grades 7 and 8. So I traveled there by “subway” (actually elevated) every day. This school was marvelous, at least for those in the gifted and talented program. The “project method” was used.

I still have the results: several books I completed owing to on-site research, one on the horrors of tenement housing on the Lower East Side, another on the excesses of people who apparently cared more for their pet dogs than for human beings. In addition, the school prepared me to do well enough on entrance exams to the Bronx High School of Science to be offered admission there. Others in the Sunnyside group who were privileged to go to P.S. 69 were Eugene Girden, Arthur Kaledin, Buzzy Oppenheim. Allen Schleifstein, Freddy Mann, and Daniel Wilkes, if I remember correctly.

Those years in what was then called “junior high school,” and later in high school, were enlivened by Friday evening square dancing in Manhattan at the headquarters of the Society for Ethical Culture on Central Park West, lots of old-time movies at the Museum of Modern Art, newscasts with parents at the Trans-Lux Theater on Madison and 60th, horseback riding with my father, New York Philharmonic Children’s Concerts in Carnegie Hall with my mother, followed by a Broadway soda in Schrafft’s, introduction to the Metropolitan Opera thanks to Uncle Bill dressed in top hat and tails, bicycle rides to LaGuardia airport to watch the PanAm clippers land on water, second row seats at Lewishon Stadium with father whenever Artur Rubinstein played Tchaikovsky, summers at Atlantic Beach until age ten, then Brant Lake Camp beginning at age eleven, and lots of tennis in the club in Sunnyside near our home—we had moved from the apartment on 46th Street to a three-storey house, 3902 47th Street, on the corner at 39th Avenue, and my father had established his own office in another house on the corner of 43rd Avenue and 47th Street, both in the famous planned community called Sunnyside Gardens, built between 1924 and 1929 and now listed in the National Register of Historic Places. Our house was very special, designed by Viktor Harasty: playroom in the cellar with a ping pong table on which Paul Davidoff and I enjoyed 100-game matches; living room, kitchen, and dining room on the first floor, with an open porch extending into our small private garden in back, which was massively extended by the block-long and block-wide communal garden behind it; three bedrooms and bath on the 2nd floor; and, best of all, my huge room with Harasty-designed furniture on the 3rd floor, a large writing-table in front of the double windows that faced toward the Long Island Railroad tracks and beyond them the huge boxing ring where Joe Lewis and others fought in those days. One very negative incident came when I went to Allen Schleifstein's birthday party and was maliciously fed whiskey after whiskey by Allen's father. I became hopelessly inebriated but was able somehow to walk at least part of the way home, vomiting constantly in the street, and also on the nice gray carpet of our house. Two friends, maybe Buzzy and Arthur, got me upstairs to bed, where I was discovered in the morning by my parents. That very good lesson has kept me ever since then from overdrinking.

Starting, I think, at about age 13, I went every Easter vacation with some of these same friends on an extended bicycle trip, sometimes ten days in duration, staying overnight in youth hostels. One itinerary took us from New Bedford up Cape Cod to Provincetown, to Boston by boat, and then back to New Bedford. Another took us to Harrisburg and Gettysburg, still another from Danbury (I think) to Brant Lake Camp. An aborted one was with Mickey Heyman and Max Steuer, starting at Buffalo, but the gears broke on their bikes and we had to come back by train. Finally, probably in my junior year in high school, Buzzy and I cycled to Oberlin to look over the college and, deciding that we could never exist for four years on terrain that was so completely flat, turned around and cycled back without going for any of the interviews we had arranged.

I have no memories of classes at the Bronx High School of Science, one of New York City's select schools then, as now. The principal was Morris Meister, who founded the school in 1938 and headed it until 1958. I remember no other names. My father lectured there once in the evening, probably on a pediatric subject. I do remember the swimming pool, climbing the stairs to go to class, the long subway ride every morning and afternoon, and especially the tennis—I was on the school team. There was a major problem: I had no interest in science. This was remedied, thank goodness, when for some reason that eludes me, my father managed to get me accepted to Deerfield Academy for my senior year. There I found a wonderful teacher of English literature, Richard Warren Hatch, and discovered my true interest—not in numbers, rocks, fauna, flora, and certainly not in chemistry, but in words. Deerfield for me was too good to be true, perhaps because I was there only for one exciting year, and never suffered the ennui of boys enrolled there for all four years. I debated in a tuxedo, played soccer and especially tennis (again on the team), skied a bit, wrote fanciful pieces for the school newspaper such as one on the music of steam radiators, made good friends, and graduated academically number 1 in my class. And of course that's what led to Harvard. Mr. Frank Boyden, the legendary headmaster, simply informed me that I would be going to Harvard. I never applied in any formal way; in those days headmasters decided who would go where. I think I remember receiving four A's in my first term at Harvard, which speaks well for Deerfield's training. Surely the love of reading and writing that manifests itself in the journal that follows was nurtured at Deerfield by the general atmosphere and especially by Mr. Hatch.

Harvard College, Cambridge, Massachusetts

So much of real significance has been happening since I went to Deerfield in September 1947 that I feel I will be doing myself an injustice if some of it at least is not written down. Perhaps it is not that the things that have happened to me at and after Deerfield are so much more extraordinary than those that happened in the seventeen years before Deerfield. But whether they are or not, I think it is true that only since last year have I seriously begun to think about life and about myself and my future. No doubt this awakening has come with maturity.

To evaluate my year at Deerfield would require extended thought and analysis. All I can say now is that I think it completely changed me down to the core—brought me out of my shell, so to speak. This is not surprising, for Deerfield was the first time I had been away from home—that is, in an environment different in origin, makeup, and attitude from that in which I was placed at home, at school previous to going away, and at Brant Lake Camp. I have little doubt at this writing that what is typified by Deerfield is superior to all that was typified by my childhood associations.

Harvard is still another world. Perhaps it mixes a little of the two environments of which I have spoken. I have been here a little more than nine weeks, not a very long time. Although I feel very much at home here I still have been unable to evaluate the school and my position in it: Harvard is still an enigma to me. I think, however, that I have taken the first step toward approaching a solution, which is one of the reasons that have caused me to begin this log.

It is Sunday night and I have just finished quite a week. Last Saturday was the Yale football game, which we won handily. I took Carolyn Taylor to the game and then to a party in the room, supper, and the Freshman Dance. It was good to see the boys from Yale: John Randau, Rick Verrill, Steve Warack, Bruce Geller, Steve Stulman, Jonathan Rinehart, and Jerry Davidoff. We all, John Harvey and Steve Baran included, had a rip-roaring weekend, although only Steve got drunk. Alan Fischel's roommate, a former Exeter squash player, John Koenig, came up, but Alan neglected to drop in on either Artie Kaladin or myself, which wasn't a very nice thing for him to do.

Coming fast upon the Yale game was Thanksgiving, Thursday the 25th. I took the train home Wednesday night and got talking to an upper-classman whose father is a Pittsburg pediatrician. This doctor had just been at the Atlantic City convention. I knew Dad hadn't gone. He is still too disturbed to let himself go into the rah-rah of a convention. Too bad he couldn't have gone to Deerfield! I hope he will be convinced to make the trip to Zurich in 1950, but right now I doubt it. Anyhow, I got home about midnight. New York was quite nice at that hour. The next morning Laird Barber called, inviting me to the Philharmonic Friday afternoon, and it was with regret that I informed him I would be going back to Cambridge early Friday morning. Our conversation was cut short because he had to go to church. How much our family has missed by not observing, at least in act if not in conviction, the religious ritual. But that is a gigantic topic. I hurried over to the Davidoffs' new apartment at 880 Fifth Avenue, to see Paul. Their place is very nice, with a splendid view, but I still do not like apartments. A man has got to have some ground at least. Paul apparently doesn't fit in too well at Allegheny. He expressed a desire to transfer for his junior and senior years. It's too bad. If he can get a little serious study into him he can really go places. The whole Davidoff family is very interesting. Despite Dad, I like them all very much, especially Jerry, who, incidentally, has been spending a good deal of time in Cambridge.

The purpose of my returning for Thanksgiving was, of course, to be with the family for the big banquet. This was the first time in many years that everyone was there: Abe & Irene with Emmy; Irv, Clarice & Amy; Grandma; Will, Gertrude & Peter; Joan & Jimmy, and all of us Biens. It is really a fine family, a credit to America and to Grandma's seed. I cannot say as much for the other side, except, of course, for Dad and perhaps (although I wonder) Saul & Eddy. The dinner was superb, mother and Grandma being up to their usual proficiency as chefs. Gertrude told me she plans to send young Peter to Deerfield. I hope—I hope—that her wish may be consummated. After all, it will give me a wonderful excuse to visit the school. Abe and Irene gave me a fine edition of Thoreau's Walden, about which I'll have more to say presently. I stayed up quite late playing the piano—I must find some way not to let all my musical training go to waste.

As I rode back on the plane—the best way to travel—I seemed to feel a little more secure in my position at Harvard. The desire struck me to do some study of my own. If it is within or relative to the scope of my courses, all the better. If it is completely afield, no matter. First I must finish Thoreau, then read The Education of Henry Adams and Albert Schweitzer's work on Bach. A fine project for an extended period is to drive out my sublime ignorance in the field of religion. I'll never be at peace with myself until my religious problems are solved one way or the other. As it stands now, I plan to keep my eyes and ears open in that respect (and others too, I hope) while I am in college, exposing myself to all doctrines and denominations (this I have not carried out as the Park Street Congregational Church is my constant Sunday night habitat, along with the companionship of Johnny Taylor). Philosophy, too, I must explore: right now everything that deals with the soul, not the flesh, and therefore is more important, more profound, more satisfying, more worthwhile. I am floating further and further away from the safe landing of medicine, law, etc., etc., and am now in a sea of question marks and blindness—a precarious position—but if I float long enough and in the right direction I believe I will arrive at the unfamiliar and far-off destination: happiness and satisfaction. No, at least judging from my opinion of my biology course, I shall never become a doctor, and I think it is best that I do not.

Now that I'm back in Cambridge I think I had better get to work, at least until Christmastime.

I decided to write my theme on "Was Henry Adams a Failure?" in the form of a Town Meeting Forum. Yesterday I had the whole argument clear in my mind before playing squash, but when I attempted to write I was barren. The only thing left to do was what I always do when my mind ceases to operate: study biology. I had hoped to get to bed early and get up in time for breakfast today (Thoreau's influence) but got involved in a discussion over the merits of classical music and jazz with John Harvey.

Up at 10:00 this morning. Thank God this wasn't another wasted day. I listened to the Philharmonic this afternoon while reading Thoreau (at least the radio was on), and attended an evangelistic service at Park Street. The fervor of this church and congregation, the vitality of the ministers and the spontaneous response of the worshippers, is food for one's heart. Somehow I hope that some day soon I will share their enthusiasm (I have been enthusiastic over so few things), but right now I can only look at religion with a coldly intellectual eye. I've got to learn more about it, anyway, before accepting or rejecting it.

I'm sure that Thoreau will influence my thinking, at least temporarily. Already (and I've only read a hundred pages so far) his ideas about the value of money as opposed to freedom and study have taken hold. I think I would like to go to Deerfield upon graduation, perhaps after taking a year's postgraduate work for a Master's degree. There, although the salary would be meager, at least I could put most of it away, for expenses could be brought down to a minimum. A few years of this would give me enough money to travel about for several years, working in various places, meeting new people, amassing ideas. Only then would I think of settling down, but I do not think I shall ever settle so far down that I cannot get up again.

The study of Thomas Aquinas has proved to be quite fascinating. Professor Beer gave one of his most satisfying lectures today in trying to explain and summarize the parts of Aquinas we are reading, but much of it is still incomprehensible to me. One very nice thing, however, is the correlation between this and Professor Demos's philosophy lectures, for Aquinas constantly refers to, and uses, the terminology of Aristotle. Things like form and matter, particulars and universals, efficient, formal, and final causes would be utterly meaningless to me if I were not getting this smattering of Aristotle. The point of Professor Beer's that most struck me was his plea for tolerance. "When you read Aquinas," he said, "you must abandon your prejudices." He said this, of course, because most of the class are Protestants. Now this is important—it is reasonable and not unusual for an intelligent and sincere person, not a superstitious or fearful person, honestly to believe in Christianity as the Catholics see it. How different is this from what I was taught at home. Now St. Thomas makes an excellent case, on a strictly intellectual level, for the existence of God (Question 2, article 3). He also shows insight into everyday problems: “. . . from the remembrance of the past, and understanding of the present, we gather how to provide for the future” (Q. 22, a. 1). This pleases me, for I can honestly say I realized its truth several months before reading Aquinas. When I first came to Harvard I was quite confused, and even now still am. There’s nothing wrong with my being in this state, provided that it does not last too long. Over the years, I have had pushed into me various facts, figures, philosophies, and other assorted ideas. There is no unity, no coherence among these ideas. My task at Harvard is not primarily to gain new and additional facts but to catalogue those that I already have, and to clean house.

A second point from Aquinas interests me. It is, strangely enough, a point of theology (Q. 23, a. 6): “God does not permit some to fall without raising others” (cf. Job xxxiv. 24: “He shall break in pieces many and innumerable, and make others to stand in their stead. Thus men have been substituted in the place of the fallen angels; and the Gentiles in that of the Jews”). No comment needed.

A third point (Q. 48, a. 1): “Evil makes better known the greatness of the good,” and similarly (Q. 48, a. 2), “God and nature . . . make what is better in the whole, but not what is better in every single part, except in relation to the whole.” I question, therefore, the utopians, the Communists, the World Federalists. The desire to eliminate evil is unnatural and therefore is evil itself. But you can carry this too far also.

A fourth point (Q. 48, a. 6): “Good consists in act, not in potentiality.” By this I am led to believe that Henry Adams was a failure, Henry Thoreau a success.

A fine day, except for squash. Professor Demos was provocative as usual: The end is not living, but thinking. Living is a means to the end of thought. Therefore, the biological necessities of life are inferior to and less important than the continuance of thought. We are led to believe that a life of contemplation is the highest pinnacle that man can reach.

Harry Osmer and I went to a fine performance of Handel’s “Messiah.” This was by the Harvard-Radcliffe Chorus and Orchestra, and was a truly professional performance. I liked several of the choruses better than the renowned Hallelujah Chorus.

If I had to choose whether to lose my sight or my hearing, what would my decision be? Blindness deprives you of things; deafness deprives you of human relations. It would indeed be a difficult choice.

There are three ways of preparing a term paper. The first way is Rural Free Delivery: We deliver in rain, sleet, or hail, but no material. The second way is A & P: We have the goods but we don't deliver. The third (and best) way is Special Delivery.

I need a good night's sleep; otherwise I'd catch up on my letter writing, which is now way behind schedule.

Cambridge

Last night John told me about how Mr. Boyden came to be a religious man. There were two incidents. (1) When he was an undergraduate at Amherst, Mr. Boyden found, one Sunday, that he was unprepared for a Latin test the following day. But the Lord would not have him study on Sunday! If he did not study, then surely the Lord would take care of him. Monday morning, Mr. Boyden memorized one passage from the long text for which he was responsible and, sure enough, the exam was on that very same passage. (2) Soon after his arrival at Deerfield, things looked terribly bleak for the school. Mr. Boyden received the invitation from another academy to be its headmaster, at any salary he should name. What was to be his decision? He flipped open the Bible and let his finger come down at random on the page that happened to be exposed. Just above his finger he read: "Stay in the land of adversity," and so he did. And look at Deerfield now!

Dad seems to feel that the trouble he has been having in his eye may lead to blindness. I never realized it was that serious. It would really be a terrible thing. I think in Dad's case it would be better that he lost his hearing than his sight, for contact with people has not played an overly important role in his life. Anyhow, let's hope and pray that his fears are unrealized.

Aquinas's treatise on law points up some differences between the old and new testaments, or what he calls the Old Law and the New Law. (1) It belongs to law to be directed to the common good. The Old Law is concerned with sensible and earthly good; the New Law with intelligible and heavenly good. Promises of temporal goods are contained in the Old Testament, but the promise of eternal life belongs to the New Testament. (2) It belongs to law to direct human acts according to the order of justice. The New Law directs our internal acts (Matt. 5:20), controls the soul, whereas the Old Law restrains the hand. (3) Most important, it belongs to law to induce men to observe its commandments. The Old Law does this by fear of punishment, the New Law by love. This last point is one that I surmised at Deerfield after reading selections from the Old Testament and then expounded in a book review for Mr. Hatch. There is no doubt of the differences between the two testaments, even though traces of the New Law may be found in the Old Testament. Religion is taking on more meaning for me since I have studied the Catholic doctrine of medieval times, Plato, Aquinas, etc. It is really not too different from philosophy; at least Protestantism (which is of questionable “religious” makeup) is not. The outstanding difference of both Catholicism and Judaism is that they ask you to accept the explanation of man’s existence on faith; philosophy depends on reason. That is why I do not think I can ever accept Catholicism. As for Judaism, besides the argument already mentioned, there is another that makes it not for me. That is, that it demands that I have some conception of a God—an invisible, immortal, omnipotent, omniscient being who “patterned man after His own image.” Can I do this? The Christian means of bringing God into the flesh through Jesus, making Him part of recognizable experience and making Him credulous, is more acceptable. I have now arrived at the point where I definitely think religion is of importance, but only religion of the Protestant variety—that is, philosophy combined with ceremony and tradition—and as such I think I was fortunate to have received my religion from Protestant sources. Perhaps the greatest argument for the importance of religion is that Dad, always the ardent atheist, is now coming to believe in an organized ethical code—i.e., religion. I’m overjoyed that he never insisted on my receiving Sunday School training or the like. Religion is too fundamental a thing to have pushed into one at childhood when no resistance is forthcoming. Just as infant baptism is ridiculous, so is the installation of religion itself. A man must accept or reject it on his own, when he has reached the mature, rational state.

I have two big themes coming up, one in English, the other in Social Sciences. The latter of course will be on Aquinas. I’m afraid the English theme will have to be also, although if I had time I would like to write on Thoreau or Bach or on some of the other things that have been running through my mind lately. My trouble is that I do not have even a small grasp of real, genuine interest(s). I get approximately the same grades in all subjects, like or dislike them primarily because of the professor, and have not followed up one field anywhere beyond the most elementary stage. When will the “click” of which Dad speaks decide to click?

Bill King and a Washington friend came up from Yale for the weekend.

Reinhold Niebuhr was guest preacher at chapel this morning. For some inexplicable reason, everyone in Harvard became religious, Memorial Church being literally filled to the rafters with standees three deep and the aisles full of eager students who spent the hour on the floor. I do not think that many came out disappointed. The sermon sounded more like one of Professor Demos's lectures than like a sermon. Niebuhr is evidently a follower of Toynbee, for his entire expostulation echoed A Study of History. Two problems were posed: Why do the righteous continue to suffer, and how potent does the creative minority of a society have to be to keep that society from disintegrating? We have come a long way in rewarding the righteous and condemning the wicked, largely because of our systems of justice. When every jury and every judge is honest, no man has to be a coward. He can state his case and if he is righteous he will not suffer punishment. Moreover, righteousness and historical success do not always mean the same thing. The righteous man may be “punished” in the narrow sense of the word by not being a success historically, but in a larger sense he is being rewarded with the serenity and opportunity for consideration of the finer and higher questions of life that he so craves. Man must never have righteousness as an envisioned end. Many spend their lives trying to convince others how righteous they are. They see moral ambiguities in their own society and, instead of courageously and humbly fighting same, they latch on to what to them seems to solve these ambiguities—namely, Communism—but what in reality poses much greater problems of discrimination and tyranny. The same can hold true for World Federalists, although we agree that many may be sincere. A society, in the last analysis, always breaks from within, not from without. It happened to France, which has no internal proletariat willing to carry the burden of her past sins and mistakes as regards Vichy, etc. but is instead worrying about the outside. It can happen to us if we get too excited about Russia.

The Union Committee held a big evening. First a jazz concert, then a movie, then speeches by the candidates for the Smoker Committee. I stayed for the jazz concert. It was really nice—all the boys getting “into the swing.”

Finished the first draft of a story about the owl, which is a complete plagiarism from beginning to end, but I’m sure that Mr. Leacock will excuse me. This owl affair is really one of the bright spots here. Whenever you pass by the tree it has taken for its home, people are staring up and exclaiming “There he is!” This owl apparently left his country habitat and took up residence in the Yard, where he slaughters pigeons merrily every night. The Cambridge police offered to shoot it, or remove it back to the country, but the ASPCA put up a protest. Interfering would be “against God’s law”! So the owl stayed. Students’ owl and pigeon associations have been formed. The pigeon association announced that it would appear in tuxedos yesterday at noon and shoot the owl with bows and arrows, so as not to violate any firearms law, but an emergency squad of policemen placed around the tree thwarted this attempt. The owl so far is still marauding.

Got the first letter from Bobby Gerston today. I think I’d like to go back to Camp, provided I don’t have a bunk, so I will be able to do some serious and enjoyable reading. Brant Lake’s too wonderful a place to lose.

Christmas vacation is almost over. This is New Year’s Eve and I am upstairs in my study, the family, Uncle Abe, etc., downstairs, from the sound of things, square-dancing. I have before me André Malraux’s biography of Benjamin Disraeli. I’ve never seen or read anything that so closely approximates myself. Disraeli as a youth, and I, have a great deal in common, except that he was a good deal more precocious.

“He was sent to school very young . . . to the charge of the Rev. John Potticany . . . There, a surprising fact was revealed to him: he was not of the same religion or the same race as his companions. This was difficult to understand. Yet Ben’s house . . . was certainly an English house. His father, with . . . his correct and pleasing speech, was an English writer.

Ben had learned to read in English books, the songs that had cradled his sleep were English songs, but here, in this school, he was made to feel that he was not like the others. He was Jew, and his companions, with one exception, were not Jews. How mysterious this was! The Jews, they are the people the Bible speaks of, who crossed the Red Sea, lived in captivity in Babylon, and built the Temple of Jerusalem. Whatever had he to do with them? . . . Once a week a rabbi came to teach them to read Hebrew, an incomprehensible tongue which was written backwards, with characters like the heads of nails. The young Disraeli knew that these practices held him apart from a mysterious communion. . . . This pained him. He was proud. He would have liked to be admired in everything. . . . But the pain came especially from the fact that he did not like Sergius (the other Jew). It was hateful to be thus linked to an inferior being. The boys to whom Ben attached himself had flaxen hair and blue eyes.

“In the evening, in their study, Sarah (his sister) and Ben used often to talk of this strange problem of the Jews and the Christians. Why were they seemingly reproached with an origin that had been none of their choosing, and over which they were powerless? When they asked their father for explanation, Isaac Disraeli, the Voltairean philosopher, shrugged his shoulders. It was all meaningless. Superstitious. He, for his part, felt no shame in being a Jew. On the contrary, he spoke with pride of the history of his race. But he held it utterly ridiculous to maintain, in an age of reason, practices and beliefs that had been adapted to the needs of a tribe of Arab nomads several thousands of years earlier. Like his own father, and to give him pleasure, he remained inscribed at the synagogue and paid his dues. . . . But he believed in no dogma and practiced no rite.”

Here the narrator relates how Isaac engages in a quarrel with the synagogue that led to his request “that henceforward his name should be deleted from the list of the faithful . . .” “Although he had ceased to be a Jew, he had not become a Christian, and in this intermediate state he was quite at ease. One of his friends, however, Sharon Turner the historian, pointed out to him that it would be advantageous to the children if they conformed with the religion of the English majority. . . . Isaac Disraeli let himself be persuaded. Catechisms and prayer books made their appearance in the house, and one after another the children were led off to St. Andrews Church and there baptized. Benjamin was then thirteen.”

And further, along secular lines: "But first of all, what did he want? [This at the age of fifteen.] With the turmoil of the little schoolboy world . . . had come glimpses . . . of clear and vivid landscapes. . . . Life, it seemed to him, would be intolerable if he were not the greatest among men. . . . But who would explain life to him? Along which road should he turn his steps? Writing? . . . But so many great poets . . . only achieved fame after their death. For posthumous triumph Ben had no taste. . . .

"From the pitiless self-examination to which he gave himself over during the weeks that followed his return [from school], he first conclusion was that he was completely ignorant. It seemed necessary to reconstruct his genius, starting with the foundations. He mapped out a vast plan of work and allowed himself a year of retirement to rebuild his studies. . . . He liked the precept 'Develop yourself: not for enjoyment but for action.' . . . He was filled with admiration for the organization of the Catholic Church.

"[Mr. Disraeli] judged it necessary to intervene. He was anxious to direct his son to simpler and more practical ends. A friend . . . , a solicitor, offered to take Benjamin with him as his secretary. . . . But Benjamin shied at the prospect of being buried in lawyers' chambers. 'The Bar: pooh! Law and bad tricks till we are forty and then, with the most brilliant success, the prospect of gout and a coronet. Besides, to succeed as an advocate, I must be a great lawyer, and to be a great lawyer I must give up my chance of being a great man.'

"[Benjamin's] reading had taught him that many great minds have failed because they have wanted to think alone and disdained the study of the mass of men. It was essential . . . to mix with the herd, to enter into its feelings, and humour its weaknesses."

The following is part of a letter composed and supposed to go to Mr. Hatch. Whether or not I will send it I do not quite know. I hope I have enough courage to send it.

“One world was unmistakably opened to me at Deerfield, not only opened but introduced. That, strangely enough, was the world of religion. This new world presented a problem—I like to call it a problem—about which I have been thinking continually day and, I sometimes believe, at night too, in my sleep.

“I realized that I was different from the other boys insofar as I had not been raised in a Christian communion. That was all. It was entirely negative. It was not that as Jew I opposed, positively, the concept of Jesus as the Messiah or attended synagogue on Saturday instead of church on Sunday. I do neither. When you hesitated to serve me bacon when we lunched at your house, inquiring whether or not I was Orthodox, I was reminded of the ridiculousness of the situation. I am no more Jew than you are, except that I am born of Jewish parents or, to be truthful, I should say descended from Jewish grandparents. My father told you one morning that he was not religious but ir-religious. That was putting it mildly. He came from a fanatic home where religion could only be associated with unpleasantness. Every rule was observed. The head of the house was a tyrant. No playing cards, back from dates at ten, a beating for every transgression of ritual or rule—all in the name of God or, better, in the name of the utterly ignorant asses who run His affairs. As soon as Dad grew old enough to escape the family he unconditionally renounced and rejected his ancestral faith. He has remained convinced to date that theology is unnecessary and is more likely to harm than help. Yet, like yourself, he subscribes to the ethics that religion teaches.

“As a result of this, I had received no rites, no training, no indoctrination in any religion whatsoever—until Deerfield. True, I had played and lived with many Protestants and Catholics, although most of our family friends were and are Jewish, at least in birth or race or whatever you wish to call it. Again, these people differ from myself in their intense fear of the Gentile, so they are Jewish negatively, not positively, whereas I am non-Christian negatively, not positively. But before Deerfield I never regarded anyone as being Protestant, Catholic, or Jewish. Those terms meant nothing to me, and in this secularized society religion was never discussed, at least not among children of grammar school age. At Deerfield, of course, I could not help feeling the difference. There I was in church singing hymns and hearing the world Christian twenty times a day and fifty times on Sundays. I must say I enjoyed every minute of my baptism, as it were. The things spoken about at the sings sounded good, the sermons, although sometimes infantile, echoed what I believed were noble thoughts and ideals that I rarely heard from any secular source. This should not be in the past tense, for my listening, my enjoying, and my being stimulated by preachers did not stop with Deerfield. For the most part (there have been exceptions) my religious experience has been through the mind rather than the heart. I am partial to religion because it does the most talking about issues that I consider vital today; because I agree in large part with Toynbee in his condemnation of over-secularization; because I think religion deserves the attention, at least the exposure, of intelligent minds; because in all fairness to myself, I must know and practice it before (and if) I wish to reject it. John Harvey’s father was a devout man. John examined the beliefs to which he was expected to subscribe, and rejected them. My father is an atheist. I am examining what was never in our household and I like it, for it is new and different and, I think, more good than bad. If I had to choose tomorrow I would accept it.

“Well now, that doesn’t sound like much of a problem. One might say ‘If you want to be religious, be religious. It’s your own affair.’ True enough, but the religion I know and like is New England Puritanical Congregational Calvinistic Protestantism. Yet I was most definitely down on Mr. Boyden's list of Jews. There is nothing wrong with the Jewish religion, and I am sure, although I know nothing about it, that Judaism is every bit as good for its communicants as is Christianity for Christians. There are several reasons, however, why I do not believe I should join a Jewish congregation. There is my father's boyhood misery; the fact that Christianity includes the misery; the fact that Christianity includes the whole of Judaism except as concerns the Messiah, and adds the New Testament teachings as well. The efficacy of Christianity lies in Jesus himself, whom I am willing to look up to as an example. I prefer love to retribution. I feel no allegiance or connection whatsoever with the Jewish people, although I am happy for them in the founding of Israel and respect and admire their intellectual and artistic achievements. I am living in a Christian country and a Christian civilization. Christianity is much more important than Judaism for the simple reason that it concerns ten times as many people.

"Naturally, there is a tremendous emotional conflict involved, for if and when I join a Christian denomination it will be quite a blow to my family and friends. I have more or less resolved to study and observe until I am well enough informed and convinced to make a decision. In any case, I am glad circumstances are what they are, for the decision will be all my own as it should be. What do you think?" (Never sent.)

Tawney's conclusion is momentous: "Such a philosophy . . . that the attainment of material riches is the supreme object of human endeavor and the final criterion of human success . . . may triumph or decline. What is certain is that it is the negation of any system of thought or morals which can, except by a metaphor, be described as Christian. Compromise is as impossible between the Church of Christ and the idolatry of wealth, which is the practical religion of capitalist societies, as it was between the Church and the State idolatry of the Roman Empire." I thought it was communism and Christianity that were irreconcilable.

Listened to Don Giovanni excerpts today and want to see it.

I am now of the opinion that I must throw off everything I got at home as being far from truth. Security was presented as the greatest goal. I see how security defeats its end by stultifying. Frost says your life must be a wager—not your bottom dollar—but for moral stakes. Money was presented as synonymous with security. It became an end; it is an end at home. Not so. Plato knew it; Tawney after him. I'd like to make a lot of money but I want it to be incidental to whatever else I am doing. It seems now that I was often discouraged in my desires to do what I so wanted to: read, play music, think in my room. No, go out and play with the boys. Be normal. Who the hell wants to be normal? I see that spiritualization was missing, too. No man can build a life around medicine alone. Everything interpreted in psychiatric terms does naught but make a neurotic out of the listener, although I suppose science would call such a one normal. Bosh! Let psychiatry treat the mentally ill and give the rest of the world freedom to speculate. It's trying to take over everything that biology, physics, and chemistry were kind enough to leave to the poet, philosopher, and minister. I am a reactionary and want little of it.

I must live on a farm. God give me strength enough to resist family and American materialistic capitalism enough to enjoy life. The important thing is to do and say what I want to, as I want to, impulsively. A little less rationalization and intellectualization about the future will go a long way.

Right now I've got to get my mind functioning again. It is overloaded. Evidence is the sudden loss of vocabulary and hesitation in speech. I'm concerned with weightier matters at present.

The last two weeks—that is, since classes ended and the examination period began—have been the best of the term. I have reconfirmed my belief in that one gets more satisfaction and pleasure from good intense work followed by a Friday or Saturday night off, than from the dilly-dally, half-and-half existence that we led hitherto. I did a good job on the Social Studies Review, but I'm afraid it won't show too much on the exam. Received word of exemption from the rest of English, which pleases me very much even though I know honestly that it wasn't deserved. Here, however, it doesn't matter too much, for that course was a waste of time and I mean it. English C looks best to start in the fall and do all at once, so I think I'll take Aikin's philosophy with John. My biology, as always, is a chore, especially at review time, but I guess I owe it to myself to do well in it. One cannot really study for music. I'll do that and the bio exam more by intuition and faith than anything else.

Deerfield has figured prominently in the last week. First, I finally, after about four months of procrastination, got a letter off to Mr. Hatch—3000 words dealing mostly with my bewilderment here at Harvard and touching briefly and superficially on the religious question. His answer was superb; it lifted me up to hope, optimism, happiness; it reconfirmed my desire to cease, at least temporarily, heading toward medicine. "And I do not think that the reaction should be to feel an urgency to specialize: that also will be a later capability, specialization, and the inevitable process of growing and maturing is something you cannot stop; it is bound to happen, and with it the sight clears, the various ways seem more distinct, and you find yourself able to make the choice. . . . The reaction should be to try to throw off the urgency of haste and pressure that is a part, an unfortunate part: that we must hurry, ever hurry, for time is short and we must grow up, must get to work, must do. It is the modern disease. . . . There will never be time enough for the active mind—never. No life is long enough to do all we want to do. No one who is athirst for knowledge ever slakes that thirst. Accept that, draw a deep breath, stow the awareness of human limitation deep, and calmly look around. Browse the field. And when and if you find reason and urge for specialization, for mastering a small corner of the field of human knowledge, then always also keep a section of the mind and a portion of the energy free for endless experimentation and forays into totally different and endlessly varied fields as a relief, as interim exploits, while you are specializing. . . . Above all, do the thing joyously and live while you do it."

Mr. Hatch indeed has a sane and wholesome religious attitude. ". . . religion is not a church or denomination even if you chose to join one for the sake of companionship in worship or some concrete definition of creed; . . . religion is not a conversion. Because it is an inner alliance of mind and spirit, it is in its essence one's own core and self, and so no one can create it for you. . . . The happiest people have a faith, and the feeling of a need for a faith seems to be instinctive in us. Christ's philosophy sums up my beliefs, and the key word is LOVE . . ." Ditto!

Secondly, there was the Boston Alumni Dinner, with Lewis Perry, Mr. & Mrs. Boyden as speakers. Mrs. Boyden, in her charming simplicity and sincerity, spoke of her dogs, from Canute the Great Dane to Peter, my contemporary. The Head mourned the loss of Ed Bundy, who always called him “Frank” and left his estate, meager as it was at $1 a day, “to the boys.” Mr. Boyden described the new buildings, especially the electric-eye doors in the dining hall, which are there solely because of the headmaster’s insistence. He also sketchily recounted plans for the 150th anniversary—plans that were severely jolted by the defeat of Tom Dewey in the recent elections. Lewis Perry appreciates Deerfield and Mr. Boyden. I do too, I think. I wonder how many other alumni, teachers, and students know the privilege given them in being able to be associated with the School. “The Sons of Deerfield rally / in thoughts of boyhood days, / when in Pocumtuck’s valley / they sing thy songs of praise. / Deerfield, Deerfield, Deerfield—Hail . . .” I certainly am a sentimentalist.

The Brant Lake “Mirror” came today and was quite welcome. Goat [Bobby Gerston] will be Head Counselor. A new era has begun. I think I will go back again and see if I can’t do a lot of constructive reading. The summer of ’50 looks a good deal like Europe if we can get Dad to the Zürich conference. Perhaps that will whet my appetite for voyage and discourage me from ever returning to the beautiful serene security of BLC. I’d better get this one more year down in the Camp payroll. It may be the last for quite a while.

The coming weekend will be a humdinger. 1000 miles—N.Y., Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington—in four days: parents, Tom Wilson, Jeanne Dinsmore, Eudgby [Eugene Girden], then back to Boston possibly in time to catch Jerry and Paul Davidoff before they end their Wellesley weekend.

Went to the Old Howard theater last night. Saw Rose la Rose do her stuff. She went about as far as she could go—absolutely nude. I enjoyed every minute of it and must go back. We sheltered college boys have been missing something methinks! Touché!

Cambridge

Vacation is over. The second semester has begun and I have just returned from an amazing weekend: rested, eager to begin correctly, happy, and determined to do things the way they should be done. Wow! Jeanne was wonderful. I like her immensely; she is vivacious, pleasant, intelligent, uninhibited, emotional, a good little girl. I arrived at Goucher Friday afternoon, coming from Haverford where I had spent the preceding eighteen hours with Tom Wilson, and Eugene and I had dinner with the girls. The college's facilities, at least the interiors of the dormitories, are super deluxe; the atmosphere is like that of a prep school with the faculty making their stately entrance to the dining room before the school body, the saying of grace, the student waitresses, the perfect decorum at the meal. An informal dance Friday night was a "warm-up" for the Cotillion. Eudgby and I drove back to Chevy Chase, where we spent the night and were feasted the next day by Fritzzy. We saw the Schiffs and the University of Maryland at College Park, which strikes me as being a glorified factory more on the order of Miami U. than of the great New England educational institutions. I certainly would not want to be either there or at Haverford, the wee tiny Quaker college, malgré its marvelous reputation and the enthusiasm that Tom shows for it. Harvard is more of a challenge. You have to fight to accomplish anything here, but if you win then your accomplishments are magnified accordingly, and if you lose then success at a place like Haverford is shallow.

I still—and I hope will continue to—enjoy dressing in a tux and literally bringing myself to a shine. The Cotillion was indeed fabulous, held in Baltimore's swank hotel. But the important thing was that I was with Jeanne, for she, if I guess right, likes me very much, and what more could one ask?

Perhaps the sole blot was my hurried departure at 2 a.m. This got me in bed at Sunnyside by 6:30 a.m. Grandma and Irv were home. Grandma told us how fine she considered the Melishes of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Holy Trinity, Brooklyn Heights, whom she has heard preach. There is no doubt that what the vestry did was wholly unwarranted.

It was an amazingly full weekend, for aside from 1000 miles of travel, the reunions with Tom, Jeanne, and the Girdens, and a goodly visit home, I read, and read well: Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam (3 times), The Prophet by Kahlil Gibran, The Adventures of the Black Girl in Search for God by Bernard Shaw (all from John Harvey's library), a lengthy condensation of John Gunther's Death Be Not Proud, and a short story by Ben Ames Williams called "Steerageway."

Perhaps the most memorable was Gunther's. This was the story of the illness of his son Johnny, who was forced to leave Deerfield in '46 but graduated, owing to home study, shortly before a brain tumor killed him. The boy was magnificent: courageous, hopeful, cheerful to the end; determined to satisfy at least part of his tremendous intellectual curiosity before the inexorable finale. His "Unbeliever's Prayer": "Almighty God / forgive me for my agnosticism, / for I shall try to keep it gentle, not cynical, / nor a bad influence. / And O! / if Thou art truly in the heavens, / accept my gratitude / for all Thy gifts / and I shall try / to fight the good fight. Amen." He did. How ironical, though, that such a one as Johnny Gunther should die while the millions of worthless vulgar individuals survive. Gunther's story makes one begin to appreciate the blessing of being alive, and to try to make oneself worthy of that blessing.

Says the author of the Rubaiyat:

Ah, fill the Cup: what boots it to repeat
 How Time is slipping underneath our Feet;
 Unborn to-morrow and dead YESTERDAY,
 Why fret about them if TODAY be sweet!
 One moment in annihilation's waste,
 One moment, of the well of life to taste—
 The stars are setting and the Caravan
 Starts for the Dawn of Nothing—oh, make haste!
 How long, how long in infinite pursuit
 Of this and that endeavor and dispute?
 Better be merry with the fruitful Grape
 Than sadden after none, or bitter, Fruit.

Further are interesting hedonistic expressions:

You know, my Friends, with what a brave Carouse
 I made a Second Marriage in my house;
 Divorced old barren Reason from my Bed,
 And took the Daughter of the Vine to Spouse.
 For 'Is' and 'Is-Not' though with Rule and Line,
 And 'UP-AND-DOWN' by Logic I define,
 Of all that one should care to fathom, I
 Was never deep in anything but—Wine.

Shaw's Black Girl is a sane and realistic view of religion by one who questions not the teachings of Christ, but doubts that they have ever been practiced. He vehemently objects to the modern view of the Bible as sacred, as divine revelation. “. . . the Bible, scientifically obsolete in all other respects, remains interesting as a record of how the idea of God . . . develops from a childish idolatry of a thundering, earth-quaking, famine striking, pestilence launching, blinding, deafening, killing, destructively omnipotent Bogey Man, maker of night and day and sun and moon, of the four seasons and their miracles of seed and harvest, to a braver idealization of a benevolent sage, a just judge, an affectionate father, evolving finally into the incorporeal word that never becomes flesh, at which modern science and philosophy takes up the problem with its Vis Naturae, its Élan Vital, its Life Force, its Evolutionary Appetite, its still more abstract Categorical Imperative . . .” viz. The God of Noah, the God of Job, The God of Micah, lastly Jesus, “who dares a further flight. He suggests that godhead is something which incorporates itself in him: in himself, for instance. . . . the unadulterated (e.g. Swedenborg’s—that Jesus merely attempted to impersonate Jehovah) suggestion of Jesus is an advance on the theology of Micah; for Man walking humbly before an eternal God is an ineffective creature compared to Man exploring as the instrument and embodiment of God with no other guide than the spark of divinity within him. It is certainly the greatest break in the Bible between the Old and the New Testament.” Shaw proceeds to chronicle the subsequent corruption of the man Jesus: “. . . we find Paul holding up Christ to the Ephesians as ‘an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet smelling savour’, thereby dragging Christianity back and down to the level of Noah. . . . The death of Jesus helped to vulgarize his reputation and obscure his doctrine. [Jesus] was tortured and killed . . . by crucifixion . . . with the infinitely . . . hideous result that the cross, and the other instruments of his torture were made the symbols of the faith legally established in his name three hundred years later. . . . The case was further complicated by the pitiable fact that Jesus himself . . . had allowed Peter to persuade him that he was the Messiah . . . ‘Crosstianity’ became established on the authority of Jesus himself.”

The conclusion indeed confirms Toynbee’s: “The whole business is an amazing muddle, which has held out not only because the views of Jesus were above the heads of all but the best minds, but because his appearance was followed by the relapse in civilization which we call the Dark Ages, from which we are only just emerging sufficiently to begin to pick up the thread of Christ’s most advanced thought and rescue it from the mess the apostles and their successors made of it.” It is not Christ’s teachings which are at fault, but their interpretation.

I must read The Prophet again and take notes on it before trying to extract its many theses.

“Steerageway” is a story based on Mr. Boyden and Deerfield that won a $1000 prize. If this is the quality of money-writing, then the field looks good.

Saw “Symphony Pastorale” with John last night—an excellent French adaptation of André Gide’s story. Next week I shall take a vocational aptitude text given for experimental purposes by the College.

Let’s see what I can do this term! A resumption of vocabulary study would be a good sign. How about that, Pedro? Professor Demos had a heart attack and will not be able to continue with Philosophy 1. I hope Aiken’s course will suffice to replace the amazing Demos. I’ll continue, of course, with Bio, Music, and Social Science. Perhaps I’ll audit History 1—at least it will get me up in the morning.

Cory [Freshman tennis coach] didn’t send us to Linden Street after all, but merely officially declared us ineligible for the fall match, which I could not have possibly made anyway. We’ll continue at Hemenway, playing before 8:30 and receiving group instruction. This is more than satisfactory, and I only hope that I can bring my game back to the high level (for me) at which it was a month ago.

Read Plato’s Apology, Crito, and Phaedo at practically one sitting, and was damn glad when Socrates finally died.

Books are inordinately expensive: $5 for zoology alone, $20 in all this semester.

I’d like very much to finish the 450-page Voltaire “Age of Louis XIV,” though Professor Beer says we should read it selectively. I read every word: 215 pages of battles, and still more to come.

My picture in the “Register” is disgusting. Now for a hot shower and shampoo.

February 11, 1949

Dad sent me a copy of Death Be Not Proud, which I cannot refrain from poring over, notwithstanding the lengthy condensation that I devoured last week.

Got my marks today, and do not know what to think. I just cannot help thinking, however (sic), that something is wrong somewhere, either with me or with the pace of the instruction or the method thereof, when, with the absolute minimum of work that I did last term, the scads of hours utterly wasted, I should emerge from the chaos of examinations with four A's: Biology A-, Social Studies A-, Music A, English A-. Sometimes I wonder if it wouldn't be a wonderful thing, just as a bit of diversity, if I'd pull off a C or some such in a course instead of A's and B's. Yet it is so easy to get these "honor" grades. Sometimes I consider myself so utterly stupid. Now, how does this happen? What am I to believe, anyway?

Finally attended a History 1 lecture, this one being conveniently on Louis XIV. John, Don Blackmer and I walked in ten minutes late, were as conspicuous as possible while traversing the hall and ascending the balcony, and, also, upon sitting down the silverware that John had unknowingly carried away in his jacket pocket from the Union tumbled to the floor with an appropriate crash! Karpovitch was good.

Lester tells us that Professor Demos is due back shortly. Das ist gut.

I seem to be regaining my ability to speak fluently, without searching so much for the proper word. I still, however, am in a spelling relapse.

Two beautifully split infinitives in my last SS essay. Conway caught them, too.

Won an easy squash match today, defeating Menso Boissevain, whose voice is exactly that of Bill Knox's. I'll have to be on my toes to vanquish Humphrey next week.

Varsity squash against Army (Charlie Oliver) tomorrow, and Frosh vs. DEERFIELD!

Saturday, February 12, 1949

Cambridge

We beat Army 7-2, Charlie Oliver, their #1 man, living up to all expectations. Saw Messrs. Poor & Read plus Bob Dewey, Soapy Symington, Charlie Ufford, Dave Workman, Mike Riesner, Charlie Elliott. Only Ufford won, but what a match! Jim Bacon really wanted to take it, too, as Ufford beat him in the Interscholastics, and as he was undefeated to date. With two games all, Jim spurred to a 14-10 lead, one point to victory. But Charlie made three absolutely phenomenal recoveries and drew up to 14 all; then took three out of the next four to win. He fought beautifully. All through it Mr. Poor remained perfectly poker-faced. He would.

Read Euthyphro; part of Voltaire's "Le Siècle de Louis XIV" in French since I couldn't get an English edition. (Read it in a 1780 edition yesterday, where the s's look like f's and are terribly confusing. The old editions, however, on the good side, had the first word of the next page placed at the bottom of each page, so in reading (aloud) one did not need to hesitate while turning pages.)

Zoölogy will be worse than Botany.

I pronounced r-a-d-i-a-to-r with the a as in act or bat instead of correctly with a as in fate. John was critical. The dictionary has only the latter pronunciation.

Should write Steve Stulman about Johnny Gunther. They were the best of friends. Gil Doan, I understand, too.

Alfred North Whitehead seems to believe that modern science is less rational than religion. Aiken touched on this last Friday (yesterday). Must read Whitehead; also D. K. Chesterton's "Father Brown" and Shaw's preface to "Androcles and the Lion" (religious critique). I never even finished Thoreau. That's bad.

I regretted today that I was not more than one year at Deerfield. Seeing the contingent today made me wish I could be one of them still. Don't want to grow up, I guess. I wonder if I'd be accepted there as a teacher?

Played squash and had a long talk with Dick Becker. Johnny Taylor and I went to church. Dr. Ockenga preached on Micah 4:1-10, "Power to see the King and the Kingdom." The organist played a "Festival Prelude" on Eine Feste Burg by Faulkes, which struck me as being far inferior in ingenuity and subtlety to the chorale prelude of Buxtehude on the same hymn of Luther's. Next week Ockenga will preach on Christianity and Communism, which should be worthwhile.

John Taylor and I both have been thinking of spending the Easter holidays at Brant Lake. A car, however, would be indispensable.

My squash is inspired. Beat Don Blackmer easily today. But the match that counts is against Humphrey tomorrow. I'll play it with a racket split down the handle and with 2 broken strings!

The concept of Culture Configuration appears to me to be more and more important.

It is very important that we look for the creditable aspects of the age in which we live, as well as the disagreeable ones.

The Deerfield Scroll has discovered an excellent writer in Alan A. Burns, who did a history of the Deerfield church in the last issue.

Rhineland is no Demos. But Aiken is good, and intellectually stimulating for the most intelligent student. He throws out ideas quite fast, and it is necessary to concentrate constantly during his lectures in order to benefit from them.

I can't keep a secret. My four A's are well known already.

Miriam Bien was very nice to bake a cake and cookies and send them to me. Grandma also sent cookies. We won't have to go to breakfast for a week.

I see that my religious inquiries are beginning to incite a little alarm in "les parents."

Usual bull session tonight. It is impossible to study between 9:30 and midnight, which is bad. The library should by all rights stay open another hour.

Visited the Poetry Room for the first time and listened to recitations by Lindsey (Congo) and Frost, as well as a good Scotsman reading Bobby Burns. The man in charge of the room is a character to behold.

Amazing! Beat Humphrey 15-7, 15-12, 15-7. I never expected it to be that easy.

Am caught up now on my work.

While I read, unless I make a specific point of concentrating, the number and diversity of extraneous thoughts that enter my mind are astounding. It is doubtlessly the subconscious awakened, and yet each impression is so fleeting, so momentary, that there is great difficulty in remembering it, more still in discovering a pattern or a purpose to the thought. This evening, for instance, I happened to think back to the Senior Banquet last year. John had promised to save me a seat. He did, but I entered through waiting-room #2 and had trouble finding him. Consequently, most everyone was seated while I still searched. And I remembered tonight, for no apparent reason, that, having at last located

John, I proceeded toward him, passing by Tom Wilson and Bob MacDougall, who requested me to sit with them. But I did not. That was all.

There have been perhaps half a dozen biology lectures to date that have interested me. One of these was today's and, sure enough, it seemed to confirm an observation that I had already made: that those lectures that found my interest were less concerned with biology than with chemistry, were explorations into the territory of biochemistry. This is significant.

I am developing, alas, another cold.

Sam Pascal now has an upright piano in his room. Why couldn't I next year?

Chased frogs around bio lab today. Section man tells dirty jokes. Zoology promises to be much more interesting than Botany, which is encouraging. Wyman is a good lecturer.

Dr. Davison is really amazing. He practically reads his lectures, has been giving the same ones for 25 years. Yet, with subtleties of voice he can put you into any mood he wishes. He lectured on Beethoven today, and made the entire hall feel the despair which that genius felt upon learning that he would be hopelessly deaf—then had us rejoicing at Beethoven's unbeatable spirit and gusto.

Took "Preference Test" tonight. Was quite inconsistent, except on seeing, which got a flat rejection every time. I think I have a secret ambition to be a farmer. We'll get the official results next month.

This was a magnificent "summer" day. I couldn't work. Walked along the River Charles with Dick Becker; finished 5000-word letter home; went square dancing with Tom Wilson's friend Ann Pennington, a nice Radcliffe girl, and a minister's daughter to boot. Steve's brother spent the night with us. They are completely different. Howie is an excellent athlete, talkative, not overly intelligent. Steve is just the opposite. Variety, anyway.

If I only had a car, a convertible! Oh, I'd be in God's country on a day like this, to see rolling fields and running brooks again. I must talk to Dad about withdrawing from the bank to buy one—something for $200–400 dollars to begin with. Dreams! The only advantage of living in the city is that it makes you appreciate the country all the more. I should settle in Vermont or New Hampshire—on ten or more acres.

I heard a flock of ducks outside this morning, a sound completely incongruous with these surroundings but wonderfully redolent of Atlantic Beach.

Caught up on my correspondence while listening to the Philharmonic.

Ockenga was truly inspired tonight. He was immensely sincere, coldly intellectual, emotionally honest, and his discussion of the difficult topic "Communism & Christianity" was done with I think a remarkably sensible approach. Instead of lambasting communism, Ockenga showed that in all outward respects it is a "religion," with the same organization and methods and goals as Christianity—e.g., prosperity, good-will, plenty for all, peace. I think the place where his argument was not at all convincing, however, was the attempt to differentiate between the two C's on the grounds of means, citing the communists' willingness to kill people for their cause. I cannot overlook the history of the Christian Church, not only the Inquisition (which, as being Catholic, Ockenga would recognize only as a perversion of the Church of Christ) but also the persecutions that Calvin condoned, even ordered, and the intolerance of the early Presbyterians. Communism, Ockenga continued, is trying to do what Christianity has failed to do. It is a challenge to Christians, a call for those of them who are in reality just naturalists—the Liberals—to join ranks with the Fundamentalists and against Romanism, and work with God for the betterment of mankind. Now, I question one point here. Ockenga deplored the fact that the Liberal Christians, as they hold out the same ultimate objects as do the Communists, play directly into their hands. Granted this is an ugly situation, is it not better to stick by your ideals if you think them justifiable, no matter what names you may be called? Should we reject social improvement simply because it is something that Communists desire? Another point that is corollary: I would like to get Ockenga's opinion of Tawney's conclusion to Religion and the Rise of Capitalism, viz.: that capitalism and Christianity are incompatible. I enjoy church very much, and think I get a good deal from it. The singing at Park Street is the most resounding and uplifting that I have heard. I only wish that I had a decent voice.

Dick Becker and I went to hear Professors Aiken and La Corbeiller discuss "The Limits of Science." (John at the last minute found himself at a John Reed Society meeting whose guest was Gerhard Eisler, and he and Laci were photographed with the #1 American Communist—accidentally—, which bodes no good.) Aiken and La Corbeiller are both exceptional men: warm, personable, intellectually honest, sincere, and humble; excellent and provocative speakers. Aiken initiated the discussion by reaffirming the view that he presented to us in class, viz.: that science is limited by its first principles, like everything else. He affirmed, however, that he is a believer in the scientific method and an ardent empiricist. La Corbeiller agreed with everything Aiken said, and the discussion resolved itself not to whether or not science is valid but to what are its limits. Can the Social Sciences, for instance, properly be termed science? Is it not true that true science deals with repeatable phenomena whereas history, sociology, etc. are concerned with non-repeatable events? Is there a point of differentiation here? No, says Aiken, for although experience has taught us so far that  $H_2SO_4 + Zn \rightarrow ZnSO_4 + H_2$ , we cannot be sure that it will always be true in the future; and also, that every time James Conant places  $H_2SO_4 + Zn$  together, a distinct and non-repeatable operation is performed. Perhaps a better point of differentiation, or marker of the limits of science, is the concept of quality vs. quantity. Science is concerned with the latter, and interprets everything it can in terms of quantity. As far as we now know, art, music, etc. are by their nature essentially qualitative, and cannot possibly come into the sphere of the quantitative. But La Corbeiller points out that, before Lavoisier, chemistry was considered qualitative (noble metal, strong and weak acids), that the mathematics of chemistry were at first laughed away. It is therefore very conceivable for him that sociology, psychiatry, even music and art may eventually become incorporated into science. Aiken denies this, and as a philosopher I do not see how he can, for when he says that music is essentially qualitative, is he not assuming that as a premise—i.e., defining music? I would say definitely that music and art can evolve (or regress) into science. We see signs of it already with the modern composers' preoccupation with 12-tone scales and the cubist painters' emphasis on geometric design. Considering this, plus Mr. Aiken's professed view that perhaps Plato's conception of knowledge being man's only end is all wet, and the very possibility of there being limits on science, I submit that although poetry, music, and art may be reduced to sciences, do we want this? Is it not better to subsist under a delusion concerning art if turning it into science will cheapen it? Although it's possible for atoms to be so arranged and manipulated so that they explode in an atomic bomb, would it not be better for man, subjectively, if he subsisted under the illusion that they could not be so arranged? I would ask Aiken if there should not be some branch of philosophy that would attempt to determine a point beyond which the further search for knowledge should be not suppressed but, better, re-directed? I know he could rip me apart on this, but I believe, considering the atomic bomb, that it is something to be discussed.

I got a flashing insight into the efficacy of home training during the debate. I anticipated a qualification in Aiken's analysis, and immediately thereupon Aiken resolved that objection. Now, should I lean over to my neighbor and inform him that I had anticipated Aiken or, as Dad has tried to impress on my personality, be satisfied myself that this had occurred? Is this a key to introversion?

It is often contended that our present-day society is the cause of egregious social ills—psychological maladjustments and the like—and that the simple rural agricultural existence of our ancestors was more conducive to a stable personality. I wonder if this is true or if it is merely a reflection on the fact that the science of psychiatry is new and just beginning to grow. Is it not possible that the ancient Hebrews, the great Greeks and Romans, the early Continental Christians, the medieval nobles and villeins, the thinkers of the renaissance and Reformation, those of the Age of Reason, as well as individuals who have lived under the Commercial, Agricultural, and Industrials Revolutions, were disturbed, unbalanced emotionally, and neurotic to the same extent, and that the fact that there was no psychiatry does not mean that there were no psychotics?

What a horrible thing it would be if a person became convinced that every time he or she went to sleep a frightening nightmare would be the reward. Thus the person would be mortally afraid of falling asleep.

Talked with Leo, Tom, Pete E., John until 2:30 a.m. last night (this morning). A water pipe broke in the basement, too. This is a dreary, slushy Washington's birthday.

I coined a new word: "incomperated," an elision of "incorporated" and "& Co."

This hiatus is a good indication of my laziness. I remember in the dim past of the preceding weeks a Freshman Smoker, which wasn't very satisfactory at all; an ill-fated attempt to return to Deerfield last weekend, ill-fated because of Laci's argument with his guardian over the purchase of a new suit—stubbornness carried beyond all extremes; a wonderfully enjoyable evening at the cinema under the influences of Bernard Shaw's genius: Pygmalion with Leslie Howard and Wendy Hiller; a March of Time, and to top it all, an excellent Technicolor documentary about Admiral Byrd's last Antarctic expedition.

My four A-minuses entitled me to meet and chat with Dean Leighton and scholarship director Von Stade, both wonderfully pleasant and friendly individuals. We solved no great problems, but at last I have begun to have some contact with the faculty. Carried this further yesterday by skipping philosophy and spending two hours talking with Professor Beer. John and I must tackle Aiken soon, but we'll have to "know whereof we speak" (Rose-la-Rose).

Muzzey's talk about Lincoln adds to my profound respect for the Great Emancipator. He, Whitman, Twain, T. Roosevelt, Frost, Sandburg, Thoreau represent the best that is in America, that which is not an imperfect imitation of European culture but rooted in the pioneer soil of a new continent.

Random verses:

My object in living is to unite
 My avocation and my vocation
 As my two eyes make one in sight.
 Only where love and need are one,
 And the work is play for mortal stakes,

Is the deed ever really done
 For Heaven and the future's sakes. . . .
 The sun was warm but the wind was chill.
 You know how it is with an April day
 When the sun is out and the wind is still,
 You're one month on in the middle of May.
 But if you so much as dare to speak
 A cloud comes over a sunlit arch,
 A wind comes off a frozen peak,
 And you're two months back in the middle of March.
 ("Two Tramps in Mud Time," Frost)

ZOOLOGY

The elephant's a ghastly beast
 That haunts the countries of the East;
 The hippopotamus I think
 Never gets enough to drink;
 At any rate, I hear the dub
 Never leaves his muddy tub;
 The eagle dwells upon the steep
 And feeds on savages and sheep.
 What's the good of having that Awful rot beneath your hat?

John, Dick Becker, and I went to the Harvard-Yale basketball game in the Boston Arena last night. The Freshman tussle was a thriller, being won by a miraculous goal in the last 5 seconds of overtime. Jerry Murphy played the whole time we were there, until taken out on fouls. The varsity game, however, was a farce. We lost 80-something to 40-something. But Toni Lavelli was good to see: he's a perfected Hooks Dillon. Levi Jackson got in the game near the end. He lowers his head and charges as though he were on a football field Stepped in on Don Blackmer and Co. on the way back, and talked until three in the morning. As a consequence missed Niebuhr this morning and would probably still be sleeping now if Laci hadn't come in and awakened us at 1:00 in the afternoon.

Wrote to Bob G. asking for $200 this summer.

Johnny Taylor and I heard Reinhold Niebuhr in Jordan Hall on world government. It was very worthwhile because Niebuhr, who is versed in Western philosophy, theology, history, politics, and current events, has come to the conclusion that world government is impossible and even undesirable. I think he upholds this view because by nature he looks for the depths not the superfluities, the universals not the particulars, the eternal not the evanescent. Government, he says, does not create community, but presupposes it. Moreover, government cannot maintain community except by tyrannical force. A world government, even if it were possible, would have to be so ambiguous in order to beguile the nations of the world into partially or wholly transferring their sovereign power to it, that in the end it would be ineffective. And to unite without Russia would be disastrous, for then the world would be divided into two opposing forces, each endeavoring to become the "one."

I was glad that Niebuhr selected this topic, not so much because he told me something I did not already know—I tried to convince Bobby Johnston to leave United World Federalists for the same reasons—but because it pointed up the fact that theologians are not isolated dreamers or mystics, are not oblivious to what surrounds them, are not wholly un-secular. Moreover, I see in Niebuhr's case at least that he is a religionist not out of ignorance of all the secular forces in the world today, and the many contradictions in theological belief, but because of them. In the last analysis, he says, the insecurity in government is merely a reflection of a mass insecurity in individuals, an insecurity largely brought about by the very technological progress that was supposed to have removed it. He has his feet on the ground, even if he sometimes has his head in the sky. He is one of the best arguments for a religious attitude.

I am getting a little more insight into my difficulties. I have never really attacked a subject or hobby or study for all it is worth. All my endeavors have been superficial and as a result there is no one thing or group of things about which I can feel competent to discuss or perform or what have you. I must begin to specialize—to take my chances and throw away those things that I do not consider good for me. Certainly I may make mistakes. But not to do this is a complete impossibility to achieve the goal of expertness and competence. I must find something that I can really be interested in and that I can follow up. It does not have to be an academic subject: amateur radio operation like Uncle Will's is the kind of thing I mean. It would be so important in relations with other people. Specialties like that are what draw others to you. There are too many ordinary people, too many students who do their required work and nothing else. I am one of them. Why do I become disillusioned with this academic life every so often? It is because for me it is 100% academic life, and nothing else. The addition of a great outside interest would help me appreciate my academic work, however paradoxical that may appear.

I will never be a student. I'm too restless. I like to work with things so much more than with ideas. And yet what kind of an adult life will I lead if I continue to hesitate to do what I want to do, or at least speed up my operations? In high school it took me three years to wake up to real extra-curricular activity. Perhaps that was too long. Perhaps, though, it is best that way. Impulsiveness, blind attack, is almost as bad as no attack at all, but not as bad. Enough.

Dined with Dr. & Mrs. Sidney Licht this noon. She is Will Schweitzer's sister, and very much unlike her brother; he is a remarkably successful doctor and knows it. He teaches, writes, lectures. But I don't think he is a very happy man; nor is he, in my eyes, a particularly attractive father. His two little girls, potentially the sweetest tots, are hounded and regimented, "adulterated" until they are submissive. That's the worst part. These kids don't even rebel against their father's directives. They obey him implacably. He is not giving them a very good childhood. Children, all children, deserve by natural right to spend their glorious youth (ah, but it is so short) in the country, on a farm, a ranch, near meadows, hills, lakes or an ocean, and near animals. On a beautiful Sunday afternoon, what does Dr. Licht do but take his littlest to the movies. He doesn't want to see the picture, she doesn't want to see it, but to the movies they go. Passivity!

My tennis so far is extremely disappointing. Perhaps it is too early in the season to expect anything better, but if I do not pick up miraculously fast, I shall undoubtedly be cut from the squad. There is always the manager's job, of course, but that would be a comedown.

John, Laci, and I have decided to room together next year and have applied to Lowell House. We're counting on Mr. Pratt of Deerfield to get us in. This means that Steve is dropped. It was difficult but perhaps the best thing for all concerned. I never really did like Steve although I never disliked him. It was/is more or less a passive relationship. Steve is too much within himself to be really good company. And the irony is that I sometimes fear that I am basically like him. Slowly, however, ever slowly, I am emerging from introspection and inferiority, at least superficially. Lester Ward, Tom Rogers, and Pete Flemming applied with us for Lowell. We're aiming for two three-man suites but may have to be satisfied with three two-man ones. Then, of course, there is a 60% possibility that we'll miss the target altogether and hit Wigglesworth, Dudley, or Claverly.

My work is miserably behind schedule, and with a Social Science essay due next Friday will not be caught up. Moreover, I've got two more nights of aptitude tests.

The Bermuda trip next week should be quite an event: tennis, swimming, bicycling, social life, sun, and exercise. Hallelujah!

April 2, 1949

St. George's, Bermuda

We is here! Two hours and 35 minutes on Pan American for 660 miles. Saw Sunnyside and Atlantic Beach from the air. Well planted in St. George Hotel and raring to get a little sun, air, and exercise. Bermuda is part of the green and pleasant land, except that most of the people are American tourists. Flowers are everywhere, their delicate red and yellow petals extending over and above green stone walls as if to be sure of American approval. The cobblestone alleyways between the houses of St. George's are crooked, clean, and cleverly named. And everywhere, in the foreground of a lime-white set, are the black natives, clean, delightfully dressed, polite, happy, and speaking English that would put many an American to perfecting his own. The Negroes here are so different from those in the Great Democracy: their brows show their freedom, they carry themselves in a manner complementing their dignity as human beings. They lead the Good Life.

So do tourists: dancing, sightseeing, deep-sea fishing, deep-sea diving; aquariums, art exhibits, argyle socks, tennis and rugby matches; secluded beaches and mobbed night spots; bicycling and buggy riding. Music, laughter, and song! God's gift to man is Bermuda.

Why do we live for ten months of the year in the filthy city, trying to compensate for the accumulated soot by two months of assorted vacationing. A man should live under the sky and on the earth, not under plaster ceilings and apartments twenty stories above, and on top of concrete—live this way for his ten months, and spend the remaining two in a metropolis. Bien will deserve no better if he makes the mistake of so many millions of his fellows. We are conditioned largely into wrong attitudes: but conditioning, thank God, can be unconditioned. A good way to do that is to sojourn for a time in Bermuda. To bed, and a week on the corals.

St. George's, Bermuda

We explored in the vicinity of the hotel early this morning, visiting the beach and St. Catharine's Fort, and witnessing the British fleet returning from a cruise. A very friendly colored waiter met us on our way and acted as guide, pointing out the various trees and flowers: life plant, banana tree, palms, cactus, etc.

Returned in time to attend the morning service at St. Peter's, the oldest church in the Western hemisphere (Anglican). The rector delivered an exceptionally fine sermon, tracing the history of sacrifice from the human sacrifice made by the early Anglo-Saxons to secure their blood-kindred, to the substitution of animals (Abraham), to the final symbol in the bread or wine of Communion. Perhaps the nicest thing was that white and colored folks worshipped together, although even in Bermuda schools are segregated. "God Save the King" concluded (sic!).

A twelve-mile jaunt to the tower of Hamilton followed, with the Harvard-Barbarians rugby game as incentive. Harvard won, or better the Barbarians lost. They'd been out to sea for too long and were still a bit wobbly. Rugby is really rough-and-tumble, and lots of fun. Judging from what we saw in Hamilton, I am just in the wrong place. All of Harvard, Yale, Princeton, Vassar, Smith, and Wellesley seem to be in and around Hamilton; all the old people are in St. George's. Worse still, all the tennis players are there; none are here.

The colored folk are amazing. They prove to me at least that race is no final determiner of character, and that environment is. The Negroes at home are largely repulsive to me: even somehow those at Harvard. Here they are the most charming people, well adjusted, happy, polite but not at all obsequious, and as friendly and goodnatured as one could wish. Besides, they speak with delightful, cultured English accents, and a darn sight better than most Americans. I imagine that the Palestinian Jews would be somewhat analogous to these Bermudian Negroes.

St. George's, Bermuda

A long talk Monday night with Dad led into an extremely pleasant Tuesday. Alice and I tried our skills on bicycles the day before, cycling to St. David's lighthouse while les parents followed in a horse and carriage. Tuesday we switched to tennis, and although Alice does extraordinarily well considering her age and lack of practice, the session only served to drive home what I was missing by way of tennis. I would like to travel to Bermuda again in a few years, but with a group of tennis-conscious boys and girls of my own age and interests.

We cooled off with a swim in the ocean this time, in an ocean that is green liquid air, veil-like, transparent—in a word, delightful.

A lazy afternoon culminated in the cinema: Anna Karenina done by Leigh and Richardson, rather morbid and over-sensational. The second feature, which we walked out on, was in reality the interesting one. It was done by an all-colored cast. What we could not understand was that this Negro production, probably made in a Harlem backyard, placed the characters in the same stupid exaggerated “you is hep, chick” roles that the NAACP complains so bitterly about when found in Hollywood offerings. Here was an insipid plot, laid in a Jamaica banana plantation and opening with a “tribal dance,” capitalizing on superstition and ignorance, and not even hinting at the social and economic problems with which the Negro should be concerned. Perhaps, however, it is just as well to forget those problems. We say so when so-called “social significance” art is the topic of conversation. But at least the Negro characters should have been represented in all their dignity as human beings and not as the half-animal ignoramuses of this film. It was a grave disappointment after the fine impression that we received from the real-to-life colored folk of this island.

Family solidarity was established yesterday as it seldom has been. We really began to enjoy each other's company, perhaps the best indication of this being Alice's carefreeness, after two days of silent, stiff inhibition.

Dad told me Monday night that she only clammed up when I came home, and that otherwise she is the most uninhibited creature alive. That doesn't sound very good. However, Dad assured me that it was the fault of nothing conscious on my part, but more akin to the normal sister-brother jealousy over parental attention. Yesterday, of course, was wonderful for me, as it saw Alice come out of herself into naturalness. She really is going to be a delightful person when she grows up.

St. George's, Bermuda

As departure time looms near and ugly, we begin to realize that this vacation has been a perfect success.

Today was a rather lazy one, especially after lunch, but the sun was out full force and was well appreciated. This morning I played a little tennis with Dad, working particularly on my overhead, which is now satisfactory providing I do not have to run back to intercept the lob.

Yesterday the four of us started out early, via cab, for Hamilton, where we rented bikes. Four miles of cycling in nasty weather brought us to the Government Aquarium and Zoo. There we viewed myriad tropical fish and other creatures, including squids, octopi, parrots, emus, anemones, brain coral, morays, rockfish. The sun peeked out long enough to add to the pleasure of eating a box lunch on a rolling green lawn. But it did not stay out for long, and by the time we had proceeded two miles further on to Devil's Hole, a near-hurricane was in the wind. This Devil's Hole was nothing much: a natural hole with some fish dumped in it. The weather was merciful enough to permit us to enjoy the return trip to Hamilton, about 6 miles, along the South Shore, which is less developed and consequently prettier than that part of the island that we had hitherto seen. Our journey was completed with an inspection visit aboard the Queen of Bermuda, a virtual floating palace.

On Wednesday, Dad and I went through the White School, here in St. George's. The headmaster is a young chap, just ascended, after having replaced his predecessor, who retired at the age of 32. As is true with the English schools, this one emphasizes history and English, probably to the detriment of science, but that isn't too much of a loss at that level of education. A mixture of the old and the new, the classrooms are arranged like those at Little Red, with the chairs and tables movable and in general disorder, while on the other hand caning is still practiced. Of significance was the headmaster's remark that his brightest students are the Americans. Not many of these schoolchildren go on to college, and those that do go, of course, go to England or the USA.

The return to the academic life was surely difficult after so fine, stimulating, and revealing a vacation. Perhaps its most memorable factor was the closeness and camaraderie among the family. We are not, nevertheless, a compact whole, and perhaps it is just as well. I don't think that Dad will ever change, or if he does it will be so slowly that by the time he has reached a desired goal of personal and social development his stay on earth will be of such a short order that the achievement will seem in vain (in this world, anyhow). He is a very complex person, and consequently a very difficult one to understand. Primarily, he is a paradox: his motivations are almost entirely emotional; straight objective intellectual considerations play so small a part in his decisions; yet on the other hand his emotions are stifled. In terms of a cliché he is largely an introvert and must suffer the pangs of self-analysis and self-driving to which that class of humans is relegated. Above all, he is not a man of action; nor is he a man of impulse. Spontaneity is sadly missing in his life. He is more concerned with avoiding evil than he is with achieving truth: and life isn't long enough for persons with that philosophy. Again, he is a realist, a materialist, a humanist. Not that these are appellations of derision—but realism without dreams, materialism without idealism, and humanism without a little supernaturalism are empty concepts. The best way to understand and appreciate a philosophy or a doctrine is to understand and appreciate its opposite; otherwise one's view is mere dogmatism and cannot be intelligently supported by argumentation. For father, New Deal liberalism is conservatism at its best; he can be nothing but a conservative. Nothing for him can be a fighting, alive, revolutionary doctrine because he is not alive to it; nor can he judge it in any means other than the emotional. And for him especially, emotional decisions can hardly be most often the correct decisions, since he is emotionally weighted at one end and cannot therefore achieve balance.

It is extremely sad in one respect, but in another—and perhaps the more intelligent one—he is extremely commendable. Subjectively, Dad is a failure, a fact the impact of which is strengthened when one considers that this failure has come not from inability or environmental obstacles but from an internal inhibition that has prevented him from achieving the heights that intellectually and morally are his. Objectively, however, although seemingly paradoxical, Dad has been a pioneer, the courageous soldier who scouted the front lines, made attack possible, but never returned to see the results of his handiwork. Of course, the results have not yet been effected, and will not be until it can be determined whether or not Alice and/or I are successful. And by successful, I do not necessarily mean wealth, fame, or power—although these should come in the course of events as hangers-on—but essential happiness, whatever that means.

We returned a week ago yesterday to find our house amateurishly ransacked by a couple of youngsters who took two Racines(!), Alice's radio, and about $15 in cash.

Sunday was a fine day. Dad and I heard John Haynes Holmes at the Community Church. Dr. Holmes attempted to prove immortality of the soul in an address entitled "Life's Eternal Challenge," a sermon on John Gunther's Death Be Not Proud. And a masterful job it was! More important than the particular sermon, however, is the fact that it seems to me that this church has the correct religious attitude, if by "correct" I mean one that I can accept. I suppose that fundamentally its views are similar to those of the Ethical Culture people, but unlike the latter the Community Church retains the old forms of the Christian service and retains the notion of a God, even a personal God. I think that this is a prerequisite for a religion, as the value of religion can only lie in its reminding us that we are merely finite beings in an infinite universe, in extending our horizons a little beyond humanity, which Ethical Culture does not do.

This is a religion that has benefited from the lessons humanity has learned since the birth of Christ, one that realizes the futility of clinging to dogmas that arose, and were proper for, an ancient tribe of nomads whose lives were in few ways comparable to our own. The Doxology goes: "From all that dwell below the skies / Let words of Love and Peace arise; / Let joyful songs of Praise be sung, / Through every land by every tongue." It is followed by the Invocation, which concludes as follows: "Unto the Church Universal, which is the depository of all ancient wisdom and the school of all modern thought; which recognizes in all prophets a harmony, in all scriptures a unity, and through all dispensations a continuity; which abjures all that separates and divides, and always magnifies brotherhood and peace; which seeks truth in freedom, justice in love and individual discipline in social duty; and which shall make of all sects, classes, nations and races one fellowship of men—unto this Church and unto all its members, known and unknown, throughout the world, we pledge the allegiance of our hands and hearts.”

I went to church twice on this rainy, cold Easter Sunday. Both preachers were stimulating, but in different ways. This morning Dean Bosley of the Duke Divinity School spoke in chapel. After stating in his first sentence a sentiment that I was delighted to hear—viz., that we were not celebrating a miraculous occurrence in Christ’s resurrection, but a symbolic one even with meaning in our lives—he somehow arrived at the conclusion that capitalism and Christianity are incompatible, of which Tawney had already convinced me. A tremendous problem faces our society. We must cease to be hypocrites if we are to survive. That is the first thing. But the dilemma seems insoluble. First, we have capitalism and the regulation of production in the open market, an immensely competent mode of production that seems a shame to discard. Second, as over against capitalism there is Christianity, our spiritual hope, the means of keeping a balance between the materialistic and all other aspects of life. Third, perfectly consistent with the best of Christianity, socialism stands as the coming thing. But socialism is a false hope, and one whose fruition will most certainly result in the destruction of mankind in continued global warfare. (Cf. my “Positive Stand.”) I am confident that some progress will be made toward either reconciling these three or inventing a suitable substitute for one or more of them. But it will require some fancy thinking, and must be done soon.

Ockenga’s Easter message was stimulating in a negative way. True to his profession of fundamentalism, he attempted to convince this congregation of the historical validity of the Resurrection, using as the Old Testament counterpart Jonah’s sojourn in the stomach of the great fish. He even went as far as to describe certain sharks that are large enough to swallow a man. Naturally, I thought this was ridiculous, and, taking up a reference to myriad historical proofs of Jesus’ resurrection on the third day, wrote the following letter to Dr. Ockenga: “Dear Sir: In your evening sermon on Easter Sunday you referred to a collection of proofs of the Resurrection of Christ. Although I have been a fairly consistent attender at Park Street Church, I have not heard you enumerate these proofs and would therefore appreciate it greatly if you could send me a bibliography that will lead me to them. Naturally, it is extremely difficult for persons like myself, products of a secular society, to reconcile such supernatural occurrences as Jonah's deliverance from the great fish and Christ's rising from the dead with what we know about science. Somehow I feel that if religion intends to battle science on science's battlefield—on empirical evidence—it will inevitably lose the fight. That is why I desire to examine these proofs. How can it be possible to prove a supernatural event empirically? And is it not actually repugnant to the concept of the supernatural that finite humans should be able to comprehend it well enough to presume to prove it in light of their limited experience? I am willing to accept these miracles on faith if their consequences are momentous, even though that faith is contrary to my experience. For I know that scientific truth is only probable truth and that the Resurrection, for instance, cannot be disproved. But I submit that it cannot be proved, and I venture to say that the arguments that you are able to advance, if examined not only from the view of logical consistency but from that of the premises on which they are based, cannot possibly stand against their refutations. Nevertheless, I would like to see them. I would like to be convinced. Thank you for your trouble, and for the many excellent sermons that have kept my religious train of thought continually rolling along at a rapid pace. Respectfully yours . . .” I hope that Dr. Ockenga does not commend me to the wrath of God for this heresy, but provides an intelligent and stimulating answer to the questions that I have asked.

Instead of the usual service at Park Street Church this evening, Johnny and I attended that of the Mother Church of Christ, Scientist. It was quite an experience. One enters the huge, palatial “edifice,” to be escorted to one of the thousands of seats by a stiff usher with a manufactured smile and who, when he is not ushering, stands at perfect attention like a bell-hop or usher in Radio City Music Hall. In fact, the essential atmosphere is that of a sumptuous movie palace. Once seated and reconciled to the stiffness and artificiality of the physical surroundings, one turns his attention to a service of worship that is equally stiff and artificial. It is infinitely worse than the High Church liturgy, for at least in the latter, especially in the small parishes, some feeling of spontaneity remains because of the simplicity of the worshippers. And again, the Christian Science service is strictly intellectual, even the hymns being done with such formality and coldness to veil their aesthetic qualities. The very nature of the service is impossible. I cannot see how it has kept so many devotees, for it is terribly difficult to take. Indeed, one needs to be extremely healthy to be a Christian Scientist.

Of course, these outward manifestations, while important, are only so insofar as they are manifestations: indications of an inner, essential significance. Thus, it is in the basic premises that I believe Christian Science has gone astray. First of all, it is a cult of idolization: the name of Mary Baker Eddy is pronounced with infinitely more reverence and feeling than is that of Christ Jesus Himself. Doubtlessly, and especially so in the light of modern philosophy and psychology, Mary Baker Eddy did have some basic insights into human nature and perhaps even into the nature of the Eternal. But to worship her is just as insane as to worship Shakespeare, who also had basic insights, and probably more of them at that. Yet although her conclusions may in some cases be true, her premises are, I believe, false; and although it is sometimes pragmatically justifiable to entertain "true" conclusions even though their premises are false, here it is not, for the damage done by the premises outweighs the possibility of benefit from the conclusions. Christian Scientists assume that disease is an illusion and, to prove this, uses the old argument that matter is meaningless. They might go as far as to state that matter does not exist, as did Berkeley; if so they are amply refuted in Hume. Again, if they admit the existence of matter, condemning all the while its essential sinfulness, they are dualists, and certainly would have been considered outside the Christian fold in the days of the Manichean inquisition.

The difficulty with Christian Science is typical: it only has part of the truth, yet believes that it has all of the truth. Certainly disease is in some cases an illusion, but in those cases the disease is mental, or psychosomatic, and although at least in the forms of the two the physical symptoms are unreal, the illusion itself is very real, and is specifically what constitutes the malady. Of course, in diseases caused by foreign organisms and/or constitutional malfunctioning, Mrs. Eddy's analysis applies only in the case of the mental disease that may result from such organic malfunctioning.

I must not, however, be doctrinaire about this. I must admit the possibility of Christian Science's validity. Nevertheless, it seems to me that embracing this belief is a great mistake. This is because the choice is a genuine option—luring, forced, and momentous. It is impractical to await conclusive evidence one way or the other. One must choose on what evidence there is, and on the satisfaction that is gotten. According to these criteria, then, Christian Science would be, for me at least, an impossible choice because for every testimony of faith healing there are ten of medical healing, and for every person who has derived satisfaction from the doctrines of Christian Science there have been ten who have died for lack of proper treatment.

When we examine and criticize so-called irrational, barbarian, uncivilized societies, we ought to remember the Christian Scientists, especially since they are typically among the well educated and moderately intelligent.

Genuine and harmless satisfaction can be obtained by revisiting your old school, playing tennis against it, and winning. All this I did last Friday at Deerfield as the tennis team won its third match of the year, 5-3. I went officially as manager, but at the last moment Cory decided to have me play second doubles with Dave Aldrich. We faced Charlie Neave and Soapy Symington, and I honestly thought, when play began, that we were in for a decisive defeat. But just the opposite happened. Dave played his usual steady game, making a good number of the winners, and I performed just about as well as I ever have, setting the play up for Dave to make the kill. My serve, especially, was working well, and I only double-faulted three times, once on the very first play of the match, and then twice in succession at the beginning of the second set, when fatigue was eating on me heavily. I got my second wind, however, in order to help take the match in straight sets, 6-4, 6-4.

I was received magnificently, almost as the conquering hero come home. Apparently, Mr. Poor had recited my scholastic and athletic "achievements" with due exaggeration, so that many of the small Freshmen were oohing and aahing.

Mr. Pratt was extremely optimistic about acceptance into Lowell House, and told me that if I was thinking of teaching, especially if at Deerfield, I had better stay clear of history, as that field is overcrowded. He plans to make a career of prep-school teaching.

Mr. and Mrs. Poor were very nice, but it was Mr. Hatch that I especially wanted to see, if only for five minutes. Five minutes it was. I gave him a T. S. Eliot recording in lieu of the Sandburg Musicraft Album which, by virtue of the company's bankruptcy, is no longer available. I did not see Mr. & Mrs. Boyden, and regretted it. I also regretted not being able to say hello to Mr. McKenny, whom I noticed was watching my tennis match. He strikes me as being a lonely figure and somewhat of an unappreciated martyr. For his sake, I hope my observations are unfounded. I also saw, and chatted with, Don Dwight and others of last year's junior class.

Friday night we slept at Amherst. I saw Dick Aldridge, Ed Brunning, Howie Burnett, Bill Burleigh, and Win Hindle, all of Deerfield, of course; and Manuel Mayer, his wife and children, Andy Heine; and, of all people, Stephen Clug, in with the Colgate track team. Steve, unfortunately, was immediately repulsive to me. As I look back on our acquaintanceship, I don't think I ever did care very much for him. It was nice to see Mr. Mayer, however. He has much goodness in him, although never the sincerity and vitality of a Fritz Krause. He recited his admiration and respect for Bob G., his lack of use for John Long, and his dislike of Eddy Hayes. To a certain degree, he is right in all three cases, especially that of Long John.

Howie is a great guy. Everything he touches turns to gold, yet spiritually he is as poor and as wholesome as is possible. Rather, he is rich spiritually, but spends so much that to the uninitiated he appears in the character of a beggar. Oh, I also saw Marc Epstein, a fine fellow.

Amherst is a glorified prep school and too much like Deerfield. Yet it has many advantages over Harvard superficially, such as good food and good views. But, intrinsically, I think that Harvard is the sounder institution.

Our match with the Amherst Freshman was unfortunately rained out, so we returned to a steak dinner, charged up to the H.A.A., and a rotten double-feature.

As I think through the catalogue, I find thirty courses that I would like to take next year! Of these, 3 are in section 1, 3 in section 2, 8 in section 3, 3 in section 4, 3 in section 5, 5 in section 6, none in section 7, and 3 in section 8. According to this I suppose I should choose a field of concentration from among anthropology, economics, geography, government, and social relations. This concentration business does not really present a genuine option and should be postponed until it does. But one must conform somewhat to the will of his fellows, and the superior wisdom of his elders!

Must come up to date with philosophy this week, and start thinking about the next S.S. essay. Also must see Professor Beer, some departmental representatives, and Dr. Le Corbeiller.

I am now signed and delivered into the exalted concentration of History and Science of America, and am therefore contemplating a course of study next term that will be comprised of: English 123, Shakespeare; English 7, American literature (against my wishes); History 61, American History, dull but necessary; Chemistry 2, pure asceticism; Music 150, pure pleasure.

These Social Science essays come around with a rapidity that attests to the pace here. If I only had three weeks with no obligations other than an examination of romanticism, particularly Rousseau and Nietzsche, I should feel qualified to write on that subject. But I shall have to do the best I can in five days. Durant, Bertrand Russell, Mein Kampf, and Peter Viereck have been of assistance.

Immanuel Kant's categorical imperative is an excellent example of the verbosity of philosophy. He takes the old concept of Natural Law, divorces it from the concept of God, where it belongs, and attributes its objective, universal, consistent tenets to human reason. His mistake is that in order to do this he is obliged to credit reason with the attributes of Infinite Reason, an assumed principle that is hardly plausible. Moreover, he also assumes that being rational is the highest form of existence for mankind. This is more of a prejudice than a self-evident principle.

I think, however, that Kant had a fundamental insight when he stated that moral validity resides in the will to act, e.g. the motive, rather than in the act itself or in any utilitarian aspect of the act. Yet, this cannot be the only answer to morality, for utility, ultimately, is the determining factor in action. Studies in social anthropology, psychology, and the conditioned reflex confirm this over and over again.

I lost to Johnny (Skills) Davis in a raging wind, 6-4, 6-8, 6-4, a very disappointing performance. Aldrich and I trounced a doubles team from Brown 6-1, 6-4. Tomorrow we play Exeter. I am also managing—singles in the JV match, doubles for the Freshmen. My tennis, as usual, is miserable. I was inspired at Deerfield but I'm afraid that a similar inspiration will not be soon forthcoming.

Dr. John Haynes Holmes spoke under the auspices of the Harvard Square Interfaith Council tonight. He is a brilliant orator, delivering an extemporaneous talk of exquisite consistency, clarity, forcefulness, and sincerity. He is also one of the few speakers I have heard who answer questions without attempting to escape from a predicament by slyly changing the subject or other such devices.

If I had been born in a house nominally Christian, I don't think that there would be any question but that I would go into the liberal Protestant ministry. Can I still do it? Will I be able to accomplish my aims under the circumstances, or will it be merely a useless personal struggle, one continued solely by pride?

Once again, the difference between Holmes and the Ethical Culturists is manifest. He is entirely an emotionalist. He respects the three "proofs" of God's existence for their worth—whatever that may be—and, while admitting that none is very convincing, even the teleological, still maintains that the sentiment that inspires them is sufficient to justify a faith in Deity.

Holmes finds much that is commendable in scientific humanism. But he takes the broad view: scientific humanism is analogous to a train that never reaches its destination. It leaves one at a dead end, hopelessly lost in the darkness of narrowness. To reject a priori the mystic experience is as dogmatic an act as those to which science so vehemently objects. Holmes told us of an interview he had with Gandhi during which that magnificent spiritual leader declared that he could have accomplished nothing in India if it weren't for prayer. Can we throw away something the truth of which is attested to by such an outstanding authority? (I suppose "truth" must be in the pragmatic sense.)

Holmes, replying to the question "What should the Church do in the way of social action?" felt that the prevention of war must be the first and primary task. He is and always has been a pacifist of the Quaker school, and cannot but be convinced of the validity of his position by the fact that history has proved that no war has ever accomplished anything permanent, certainly not permanent good. I liked especially the (Toynbee) argument that one's country isn't worth dying for anyway, assuming that in the last century war has chiefly been an outgrowth of nationalism. Indeed, war as a means is never justified, no matter how fine the end. Of course, Holmes is ultimately right.

Another important stand he took was against creeds, whether they be an Apostles' Creed or any other, as a divisive rather than unifying device. The Church, if anything, must take the lead in race relations. Why aren't there black and yellow people abundant in every congregation where such individuals are potential members? Holmes is a fighter to this day, forty-seven years after his graduation from Harvard. He will be remembered as one of the great individuals of a decadent (alas) age.

Benjamin Franklin on immortality: "I . . . trust in God . . . He has provided for the continual peopling his world with Plants and Animals, without being at the trouble of repeated new creations, . . . or the Necessity of creating new matter. . . . I say, that when I see nothing annihilated, and not even a drop of water wasted, I cannot suspect the Annihilation of Souls, or believe that he will suffer the daily waste of Millions of Minds ready made that now exist, and put himself to the continual trouble of making new ones. Thus finding myself to exist in the World, I believe I shall, in some Shape or other, always exist; and with all the inconveniences of human life is liable to, I shall not object to a new Edition of mine; hoping, however, that the Errata of the last may be corrected."

On religion: "Here is my creed. I believe in one God, Creator of the Universe. That he governs it by his Providence. That he ought to be worshipped. That the most acceptable Service we render to him is doing good to his other Children. That the soul of man is immortal, and will be treated with Justice in another life respecting its Conduct in this. . . . As to Jesus of Nazareth . . . I think the System of Morals and his Religion, as he left them to us, the best the World ever saw or is likely to see; but I apprehend it has received various corrupting changes, and I have . . . some Doubts as to his Divinity, though it is a question I do not dogmatize upon, having never studied it. . . . I see no harm, however, in its being believed, if that Belief has the good Consequence, as probably it has, of making his Doctrine more respected and better observed.”

Frederick May Eliot spoke on Albert Schweitzer at the Wesley Foundation. In Schweitzer’s “Reverence for Life” we have a positive ethic, as opposed to the negativism of a Schopenhauer. This is good. It must be understood, moreover, that it transcends human needs—has nothing to owe to utility—which the humanist ethic does not, as it is based on utilitarianism, on human needs. A student brought up an interesting question, to wit: If reverence for life is a positive ethic, and if it starts, as Mr. Eliot stated, with a reverence for one’s own life, extending to the lives of others and thence to all life, is it not irreconcilable with the goal of “selflessness”? Eliot solved the paradox expertly, and in a manner that gave me a stimulus for further thought. By having reverence for all life, you gain more than you lose in selflessness. Reverence for Life implies a form of selflessness, for as Emerson states in “Each and All,” “Beauty through my senses stole; / I yielded myself to the perfect whole.” This yielding to the whole is then both an ethical principle of the utmost importance, and a means of finding God or, as I like to say, of bringing out the Godhead in oneself.

This Godhead idea needs development. Just as, by having a cosmic outlook, by “yielding . . . to the perfect whole,” one comes nearer to God, because one begins to exhibit in himself, however imperfectly, one of God’s attributes; thus being a father is a way to God. God is looked to as the Father: before you know God, the Father is your natural father, then perhaps a teacher, friend, but ultimately (for those who find Him), God. But, being a father yourself is bringing out the Godhead, for you are exhibiting one of God’s attributes in a finite manner. Thus fatherhood is a happy, righteous, and goodly situation when it is a duality of son (to the true God) and father (to natural children). Here we have two persons in one person, father and son, viz.: 2/3 of the Trinity. The Holy Ghost we must leave for some other time!

“First Day Thoughts”

In calm and cool and silence, once again
 I find my old accustomed place among
 My brethren, where, perchance, no human tongue
 Shall utter words; where never hymn is sung,
 Nor deep-toned organ blown, nor censor swung,
 Nor dim light falling through the pictured pain!
 There, syllabled by silence, let me hear
 The still small voice which reached the prophet's ear.
 Read in my heart a still diviner law
 Than Israel's leader on his tables saw!
 There let me strive with each besetting sin
 Recall my wandering fancies, and restore
 The sore disquiet of a restless brain;
 And, as the path of duty is made plain,
 May grace be given that I may walk therein,
 Nor like the hireling, for his selfish gain,
 With backward glances and reluctant tread,
 Making a merit of his coward dread
 But, cheerful, in the light around me thrown,
 Walking as one to pleasant service led;
 Doing God's will as if it were my own,
 Yet trusting not in mine, but in his strength alone!

—Whittier

From: “The Meeting”: “I regard Christianity as a life, rather than a creed; and in judging of my fellow-men I can use no other standard than that which our Lord and Master has given us. ‘By their fruits ye shall know them.’”

That love of God is love of good,
 And, chiefly, its divinest trace
 In Him of Nazareth's holy face;
 That to be saved is only this,— Salvation from our Selfishness,
 From more than elemental fire,
 The soul's unsanctified desire,

From sin itself, and not the pain
 That warns us of its chafing chain;
 That worship's deeper meaning lies
 In mercy, and not sacrifice
 Not proud humilities of sense
 And posturing of penitence,
 But love's unforced obedience.

Saw yesterday an amateurish production of Sartre's No Exit and finished the evening (which lasted until 3 a.m.) in deep and philosophical discussion with John, Rudy Atcon, and Steve. Very exhilarating.

Dad tells me that there is no immediately danger of serious injury to his eyes. Yet the specter of blindness looms constantly—with his mother's malady, his, and the sharply decreasing efficiency of my own eyes year to year.

Tomorrow: Robert Frost and Deerfield dinner!!

Poet, enflame my soul
 That I may scarce control
 The life-illum'ning fire,
 (The trusty guiding fire,)
 That takes a poor dull wit
 And shows him where to sit:—
 Next all the worldly Graces;
 Next all their beaut'ous faces.

Heard John Haynes Holmes in his valedictory a week ago. A disappointing morning, after my expectations; yet a confirmation of my belief that the Community Church has a sane and commendable attitude. I'll join it if ever I reside for a time in New York.

Frost yesterday was humorous, captivating, etc., etc., but most of his side remarks were made last year, esp. those concerned with science. I liked his stand against the New Critics, and his perennial cry against modern methods of teaching poetry. ("You don't memorize a poem; it memorizes itself. You don't stick to a poem; it sticks to you. You must have a weakness for poetry.")

Deerfield dinner was excellent. Mr. Boyden is very much like Frost: both are completely genuine. Mrs. Boyden is perhaps the most remarkable of the lot. Pictures of the pageant. Messrs. Sullivan, Suito, Baldwin, Miller, Avirett, Lewis Perry, etc. the Deerfield alumni are a very plain-looking bunch, with a few notable exceptions.

Finished day with Rose-La-Rose, who was better than ever.

Finally completed An American Tragedy today and couldn't eat my supper because of it. Dreiser lacks the sense of humor so important to Frost, Boyden, and Dick Hatch.

I liked James Russell Lowell's sneer against advanced education: "Three-story larnin's pop'lar now; I guess / We thrivez wal on jes' two stories less . . ."

Emerson's Credo (and mine?) "O father, O mother, O wife, O brother, O friend, I have lived with you after appearances hitherto. Henceforward I am the truth's. Be it known unto you that henceforward I obey no law less than the eternal law. I will have no covenants but proximities. I shall endeavor to nourish my parents, to support my family, to be the chaste husband of one wife, — but these relations I must fill after a new and unprecedented way. I appeal from your customs. I must be myself. I cannot break myself any longer for you, or you. If you can love me for what I am, we shall be the happier. If you cannot, I will seek to deserve that you should. I must be myself. I will not hide my tastes or aversions. I will so trust that what is deep is holy, that I will do strongly before the sun and moon whatever . . . rejoices me, and the heart appoints."

Last night I had a feeling that true friends are those with whom you are as if alone—those who preserve and heighten your solitude—those who are one with thyself. Who was it who recalled that he who announces "It is I" is refused entrance, whilst he who announces "It is thyself" is gladly received unto the hearth?

Laci and I left at 9 p.m. for Hartford and New Haven, got my car, left it at Monarch, returned to Cambridge 7 a.m. A good night's work!

Olivier's Hamlet did not wear as well this evening as it did for me last year. His cuts are unmerciful—they confuse me more than they clarify the plot for me (the last purpose undoubtedly being their major explanation and excuse). Near the end, I was particularly struck with Hamlet's dying words to Horatio: "Absent thee from felicity awhile / And in this harsh world draw thy breath in pain / To tell my story.” How ironic is the message in this first line. What a biting commentary it is on man’s unawareness, his carousing and petty wasted attentions to the temptations of civilization!

I, like Rousseau, long to be a savage. Yet I am held captive by society with and among my family especially and my friends when I would prefer to be off to Brant Lake to chop wood and freeze. But most of all I am chained to my own indelible “mores”—my blasted culture pattern, which, alas, is immune to all eradicators. Can I say as Huck Finn does to his friend Tom Sawyer: “I’ve tried it, and it don’t work; it don’t work. It ain’t for me; I ain’t used to it. The widder . . . makes me git up just at the same time every morning; she makes me wash, they comb me all to thunder; she won’t let me sleep in the woodshed; I got to wear them blamed clothes that just smothers me, Tom; they don’t seem to let any air git through ‘em, somehow; and they’re so rotten nice that I can’t set down, nor lay down, nor roll around anywhers. . . . The wider eats by a bell; she goes t’ bed by a bell; she gits up by a bell—everything’s so awful reg’lar a body can’t stand it. . . . And grub comes too easy—I don’t take no interest in vittles, that way. . . . No, Tom, I won’t be rich and I won’t live in them cussed smothery houses. I like the woods, and the river, and hogsheads, and I’ll stick to ‘em, too. Blame it all!” —not when I lapse into a rationalization, an acquiescence in even a positive (but fleeting) pleasure in shallow things. And yet, I would want to be a noble savage, one with a natural inclination for music, art, poetry, literature, and some degree of original inspiration in one or more of these. But they are natural to a savage. Man, in a way, comes a full circle around: from the primitive, unpleasant savagery of our remote ancestors to the achievement of the same freedom and joys they possessed, but for us this is through the vehicle of wealth and the medium of art. Only millionaires and artists are immune to the civilization of the mediocrity. But such a long way—such an unnecessary detour through ages of stagnation and morals—to reach what and only what the same journey commenced from.

Mom and Pop are having a party. Eugby, Fred, Arthie, Buzz, Dan are dateless and so am I. Alice and the Little Redders are in the cellar, suspiciously quiet. It is not quite clear to me just what everyone is so happy about with the closing of 1950. Things don't look too good to me. Harvard is unintellectual or sports crazy; America is war-mad; religion is gaining more and more hypocrites as votaries (better they had stayed out); same with universities: mass education is ruining education for those few who should naturally have access to it. The one thing I would rejoice over this night is the prospect of the Catholic holy year in 1950. Catholics really have something that, I sometimes believe, adequately balances those stinking Catholic beliefs and practices that Dad continually harps upon. I have a great appreciation of individual sincere Catholics.

My prospects for 1950 are the worst of any previous year. This is assuming that the conditions of the past five months will not alter (and, alas, there is little hope that they will). Stagnation, indecision, waste! Meaningless and disinterested labor! Physical fatigue and emotional tension! Accomplishments lost; vices acquired. All good opinion of myself made questionable. Disgust, utter and complete (the more so because outwardly and even at times inwardly I am enjoying this unnatural state). Worst of all, and this is clear to me only recently: strained relations with family, Alice especially, partly their fault, and much harder on them than on me (so far).

I hope the Alaska job materializes. It may change things, add a little reality, strengthen my miserable body, perhaps even leave a clue to the whereabouts of the key to unlock my natural and predestined path.

Tonight I read for the first time some of the speeches of Mr. Justice Holmes. They are gems—rare emeralds and rubies, sparkling diamonds of metaphor and phrase, pearly clarity and consistency of wit. Out-of-context quotations must lose greatly, but these few will not bear omission here:

“Every calling is great when greatly pursued.” —(the main question of a speaker) “What have you said to show that I can reach my own spiritual possibilities through such a door as this?” “If a man has the soul of Sancho Panza, the world to him will be Sancho Panza’s world; but if he has the soul of an idealist he will make—I do not say find—his world ideal.” “I say—and I say no longer with any doubt—that a man may live greatly in the law as well as elsewhere; that there as well as elsewhere his thought may find its unity in an infinite perspective; that there as well as elsewhere he may wreak himself upon life, may drink the bitter cup of heroism, may wear his heart out after the unobtainable.” “To be master of any branch of knowledge, you must master those which lie next to it; and thus to know anything you must know all.” “No result is easy which is worth having. Your education begins when what is called your education is over.” “No man has earned the right to intellectual ambition until he has learned to lay his course by a star which he has never seen—to dig by the divining rod for springs which he may never reach.” “Most men of the college-bred type in some form or other have to go through that experience of sailing for the ice and letting themselves be frozen in.” “In plain words he must face the loneliness of original work. No one can cut out new paths in company. He does that alone.” “It is one thing to utter a happy phrase from a protected cloister; another to think under fire—to think for action upon which great interests depend.” “The joy of life is to put out one’s power in some natural and useful or harmless way. There is no other. And the real misery is not to do this.” “Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might.” “. . . the chief worth of civilization is just that it makes the means of living more complex; that it calls for great and combined intellectual efforts, instead of simple, uncoordinated ones . . .” “Life is an end in itself, and the only question as to whether it is worth living is whether you have enough of it.”

Holmes to William James: “I think the demands made of the universe are too nearly the Christian demands without the scheme of salvation. I long ago made up my mind that all one needed was a belief in the significance of the universe. And more lately it has come to seem to me that even that might be ambiguous. For all I know ‘significance’ is an expression of finiteness and incompleteness, and the total, if there is one, is too great a swell to condescend to have a meaning.” “I have been in the habit of saying that all I mean by truth is what I can’t help thinking.” “It seems to me that the only promising activity is to make my universe coherent and livable, not to babble about the universe.”

Holmes’s opinion in Herbert v. Shanley Co. (1917) displays his admirable sense of humor. I thought that his dissent in Northern Securities Co. v. U.S. (1904) completely atypical. Sounded much like Sutherland or Field.

I noticed, last year, while reading some of William James’s letters, the ease and apparent unaffectedness with which he wrote passages of extreme intimacy to college, professional, or intellectual friends. Holmes does the same thing in his letters to James—e.g., “Oh! Bill, my beloved, how have I yearned after thee all this long time. How I have admired those brave, generous and magnanimous traits of which I will not shame thee by speaking. I am the better that I have seen thee and known thee—let that suffice.” Whether or not this type of attitude contributed to the gradual cooling of their hot friendship is an open question and most likely one incapable of being satisfactorily answered.

Finished Cooper's Deerslayer and Lerner's Mind and Faith of Justice Holmes yesterday. Read parts of Charnwood's Lincoln today, also a poor book on Shakespeare, by G. B. Harrison, unfortunately worthless to me. Tomorrow and a day or so afterward must be devoted to Beveridge's Life of John Marshall, and Bliss Perry's Heart of Emerson's Journals.

Wrote first decent letter this semester to Bobby Johnston: an indication that things are improving here, only natural at the end of the term when a course assumes its full character in retrospect. I mentioned Velikovsky's book, for (if true) it does jimmy many stout locks to mysterious doors.

Mischa's contention that Jesus' contemporaries hardly noticed him is apparently challenged in Fosdick's new book, which I have purchased and hope to read. I wonder how the supposed earthquake at the Resurrection fits in with Velikovsky's biblical analysis.

I have become more and more impatient to come to some sort of an end on this question of the universe! And particularly my relation to it. Holmes gave up the search for the meaning of the universe, becoming content to follow the call of his universe. But I am at no position to fathom either. Einstein's new theory may be of tremendous significance. If thought is eventually prostituted to electrical impulses (though truthfully) and the universe is essentially electrical, gravitation now being linked close to electromagnetism, then the spirit and all of nature and matter are identical and subject to identical laws and regulations. In this regard, more of Velikovsky's speculation, namely concerning the similarity of the atom (the smallest matter) to the systems of the universe (infinity)—[from Larrabee's article]: "A charged body which rotates creates a magnetic field. The sun is a charged body, and it rotates, and charged particles arrive from it in a continuous stream; the earth is a charged body, and it rotates, and it possesses a magnetic field. If the magnetic field of the sun were to govern the earth's motion, then after an encounter with a comet the earth could resume its rotation, though on a changed orbit. If it is true that the comet and the earth exchanged electrical discharges, as Dr. Velikovsky maintains that they did, then there may even be reason to suppose that the earth's inertia is electrical in character. How do we know that the earth and the planets are so different from the electrons inside the atom? . . . Dr. Velikovsky willingly concedes that the behavior of the earth and the comet in his description is not in accord with the celestial mechanics of Newton. Indeed, it invites skepticism as to the infallibility of the Law of Gravitation, a law heretofore so firmly established that it has never been successfully combined into one system with the laws of electromagnetics. It is Dr. Velikovsky's contention that over three thousand years ago Nature performed a great experiment in which it was demonstrated that the electromagnetic laws are as supreme in the heavens as they are inside the atom."

Thus speaketh Emerson: "Religion in the mind is not credulity, and in the practice is not form. It is a life. It is the order and soundness of a man. It is not something else to be got, to be added, but is a new life of those faculties you have. It is to do right. It is to love, it is to serve, it is to think, it is to be humble." "The highest revelation is that God is in every man." "It is very easy in the world to live by the opinion of the world. It is very easy in solitude to be self-centered. But the finished man is he who in the midst of the crowd keeps with perfect sweetness the independence of solitude." "You can never come to any peace or power until you put your whole reliance in the moral constitution of man, and not at all in a historical Christianity. The Belief in Christianity that now prevails is the unbelief of men. They will have Christ for a Lord and not for a Brother. Christ preaches the greatness of man, but we hear only the greatness of Christ." "It is greatest to believe and to hope well of the world, because he who does so quits the world of experience and makes the world he lives in." [Interesting when compared with Holmes's "my universe, not the universe." Both, because they put on the blinkers, because inveterate optimists.]

Emerson selects the following as being representative of Wordsworth's output: Fidelity, Tintern Abbey, Cumberland Beggar, Ode to Duty, September, The Force of Prayer, Lycoris, Lines on the Death of Fox, Dion, Happy Warrior, Laodamia, Ode.

The Sabbath, sun clear and bright, throwing long shadows on the floor of the Lowell House courtyard. Am sending mother a bible for her birthday, since she has begun the task of reading that remarkable book. On the flyleaf I inscribed: "There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio / Than are dreamt of in your philosophy." Hamlet, I,v.167-8. Also Emerson's passage beginning "Religion in the mind is not credulity . . ."

John and I conjured up extra sense organs and other characteristics that would befit the Superman. We also wondered why space is arbitrarily measured by length, width, depth. Would not circular units, etc. be better? Physics is so important these days.

Yesterday I sent the following letter to Mr. Hatch:

There is a strange fog settled over the courtyard this night at Lowell House, much like the mists that hover above the sea on a sultry summer's day. But my mind is clear and sparkling contrary to the weather. The past four months, however, have been a haze: complete disillusionment with Harvard and myself, complete lack of accomplishment.

I think the human machine must be unlike my new three-speed Webster record changer. We seem—or I seem—to operate only at high or low, 78 or  $33\frac{1}{3}$ , without the intermediary 45. Before Christmas vacation, when the academic schedule here was routine, the daily obligations at a minimum, and when time was plentiful—time to play the piano, to read sages, to write to almost forgotten friends, to examine the new symphony conductor or the most recent movie—nothing was done. Energy, health, interest, enthusiasm disappeared in this irksome college. And now—now when we are madly reviewing textbooks and class notes, scrambling to find the date of the incorporation of the second United States Bank, the significance of Holmes's dissent in the Lochner case, or diligently searching for those parts of Hamlet omitted from the current movie of the same name—now do we miraculously operate at full speed. Now I play, I write, I even think a little; now I hear Myra Hess; see the Ballet de Paris and the Brattle production of Troilus; and best of all, madly converse with my fellows, as we conjure up myriad consequences for the newest gene from Einstein's incredible story of genius, and for Velikovsky's amazing theories.

In short, the depression doubtlessly evident when John and I last visited you, and many times magnified since then, has left me. I am much the wiser for it, for I think I have learned the lesson that American-style mass production education must claim as its sole worthy precept: that to become learned in the wisdom and ways of the world one must cease depending on classes or reading lists and teach himself.

Whenever I pass off Harvard in this way, I receive a raised eyebrow, saying in effect, "But is it not our greatest university?" Yet I am not by any means alone in my feelings. John is in much the same situation and Steve Baran has arranged to spend next year at the Sorbonne. Rudy Atcom (A Greek who lived with the Houghtons the year before you returned and is now a postgraduate student of philosophy here) joins with us all in saying that the university provides no direct stimuli to interest or effort, that the unwieldiness of the large plant has rendered personal tutoring, section meetings or what-have-you a sham. This is, of course, most disheartening; yet the real damage is done only to those who continue vainly to seek encouragement and incitement. We who "know" are safe, but are staggered by the realization that now we are really out of prep school and will have to make our way alone. It is a challenge to be answered in full armor.

This awakening reveals anew that monster ignorance that still haunts me. "Where have I been these nineteen years?" I ask. "How many hours of self-improvement can stand against the pile of time given to indolence and waste?" But the major concern I have had (things must be pretty bad by the sound of all this, eh?) is the sense of a loss of acuteness and a deterioration of what I used to think was a fine memory. These last puzzle me. I do not know what they mean. I have read of similar lapses in men who later became significant enough for me to have read of their lapses. But as we must live in the present, I cannot but be worried.

It is interesting how courses seem meaningless all through the term and then at review time suddenly register in one's mind. I have found this many many times. It is like the momentary crystalline symmetry that I sometimes see after concentrating long hours on a problem that thitherto was an amorphous muddle. These cosmic visitations (that is what I call them—but no matter) are so penetrating, yet so fleeing, that if you asked me to describe just how I felt or just what I saw during one, I could not. (I suppose that request could be fulfilled only by a great poet or a great musician.) They do not come gratis—that is certain. In religious terminology (alas, but it is the best), God rewards only those with abiding and deep faith. So I find that, whether in the contemplation of the Divine Essence, Nietzsche's Anti-Christ, or anything else, only deep and concentrated thought will fulfill the conditions apparently prerequisite to the cry of Eureka.

But enough of this prattle.

You may remember that I mentioned my dislike for Harry Levin, who teaches Shakespeare here. My judgment was premature and based on superficial considerations such as his lack of spontaneity and his affected way of speaking. I now realize full well that Levin is brilliant. He displayed this best in the Hamlet lectures. It is interesting that he said nothing to the effect that Polonius's "To thine own self . . ." speech is a copy and therefore somewhat ridiculous, as you intimated. (I keep the Deerfield Crofts Classics edition next to my brand new Harvard Crofts Classics edition.) It is evident that Olivier considers it so; and Kittredge cites Euphues by Lyly as containing the original.

The rapid survey of constitutional law that I have nearly completed has, if nothing else, added the bar—better still, the bench—to my endless list of possible pursuits. I've read biographies of Holmes, Marshall, and Darrow. Perhaps this is setting the sights too high.

American history is still pretty much worthless the way they teach it here; but American literature has led me to Emerson, which is something. The trouble is that once there they do not give you time to stop. Imagine: two lectures on Emerson, both horrible.

Next term I hope to resume my study of philosophy. And first thing in September: music.

The Freemans visited me both here and at home. I gave John what little advice I could about small vs. large colleges. They seemed impressed with Harvard's physical plant, which is fine, but I hope I cured Mrs. Freeman's false impression that all its students are extra-intelligent and extra-eager to improve their minds.

My best to Mrs. Hatch and Deerfield, etc.

Heard Myra Hess this afternoon in Symphony Hall. She played the little Mozart Fantasia in D minor that I have been dabbling with. How convenient, as I never knew quite how it should be played. Now I know. She plays with the grace, wit, and touch of a sublime angel.

I am inflexible. Last night I could not enjoy the very fine entertainment offered by Les Ballets de Paris because I had expected classical ballet and found something entirely different, but perhaps equally as beautiful. This afternoon Dad & Mother called, but I could not talk with them joyously or sincerely because the ring of the phone had drawn my mind and soul as it had my body from Evans Cases of Constitutional Law.

When I visited Mr. Hatch last year the thought occurred to me that it was paradoxical that this man—who professed disdain for his fellows at Deerfield, who is in all things the supreme individualist—should be so dear to all. Tonight I came across the following in Emerson: “Welcome evermore to gods and men is the self-helping man. For him all doors are flung wide. Him all tongues greet, all honors crown, all eyes follow with desire. Our love goes out to him and embraces him, because he did not need it. We solicitously and apologetically caress and celebrate him, because he held his way and scorned our disapprobation. The gods love him because men hated him. ‘To the persevering mortal,’ said Zoroaster, ‘the blessed Immortals are swift.’”

I would like to work for a few years in this Hindman Settlement School. Wonder if they would accept me.

Two thought-provoking passages from T. S. Eliot, speaking of Hamlet and his relationship with Horatio: “Such morbidly introspective characters are neither truest to themselves in solitude nor very likely to be happy in the intimacy of love—when their egoism may be either overfed, if they are the more loved, or if they are the more loving, starved. But they may find relief from the obscure and warping tyranny of self in the generousities of friendship. With their friends they can be confidently and forgetfully and transparently themselves.” “The only way of expressing emotion in the form of art is by finding an ‘objective correlative’; in other words, a set of objects, a situation, a chain of events which shall be the formula of that particular emotion, such that when the external facts, which must terminate in sensory experience, are given, the emotion is immediately evoked.”

I must convince my parents to adopt one or two orphaned boys—a lad who started life in the Hitler Youth Movement, or an Italian waif roaming the streets of Rome, or a sharp-faced Greek boy with no home. To this effect I wrote a letter home just now. I hope something comes of it.

Skiing at Bridgton was tip-top; living in, on, and “off of” the snow was a new experience. Friday night our eggs froze, for I foolishly left them outside. We peeled the shells off and beheld the raw egg, frozen as it was, with yolk and transparent white surrounding it. It looked very much alive this way, and I felt a sickening feeling when I thawed, cooked, and ate that potential chick.

Steve was mopey—made things difficult most of the time. I imagine it was because of his total unpreparedness (if that is a word). We were right on a lake frozen one foot through, in a little shack with plenty of blankets, and an indispensable pot-bellied stove that we kept well-fueled with wood. The country is in many ways even more enticing in winter-time than in the heat of August. I cannot wait until I own my first acreage! But now it is 2 a.m. and I must sleep, against the rigors of another academic day. Bishop Neill awakened my slumbering sensibilities. He made religion so real, so gripping, so sublimely beautiful, so important. I emerged from Memorial Church wallowing in my thoughts, solely engaged with the realization that I must soon choose the way of God and regulate my life in the perspective of eternity. I emerged in a brooding mood, and, not waiting for those who had accompanied me, set out almost in a trance for Lowell House, hoping that when I got there John would be gone. But he was not, and to my astonishment, upon seeing him I felt a great joy, not only for John but for all things; and as I walked out again into the courtyard I held my face high into the misty air, thrust my hands deep into my pockets, and walked confidently on into the world. Everything seemed fine and beautiful, especially the statue of Christ on the cross that I had passed so many times before without having had any particular reaction to it. I proceeded to Putnam Square, got into my car, and just drove—to Concord and back—thinking and turning this matter over and over again in my thoughts.

The psychiatrist shies from that word, "sin." He has done wonders toward the discovery and remedy of imaginary sin in human beings; yet this does not mean that there is no such thing as real sin. —Lady Macbeth's sleepwalking scene.

Immortality is viewed by many as a convenient escape from the fardels of the present world; or as an excuse for indulgence and lasciviousness. But just as one works his hardest in college—and therefore "lives" during those four years at a constantly high intensity when he regards it as a preparation for fifty-odd years to come—so it must be with mortal life. Compared to eternity, our sojourn here is infinitesimal, and therefore we must endeavor to use every minute of it profitably and constructively; and direct our actions with a glimpse of the everlasting future always in the corner of our eye.

Truth, justice, and mercy are the three pillars of the state. When one of these disintegrates, the superstructure begins to fail.

Our complex society breeds "the little man"—the Charlie Chaplins of all races and nationalities. This little man is an extremely active compound; so, when combined with a dash of nationalism or hero-worship, he combines with it explosively to form a Nazi or Fascist compound. These days, men must be respected for their humanness, so that the little-man complex disappears, for no man is little in the eyes of God.

Society in 1950 is a travesty of what society should be.

Thoreau, speaking of his stay at Walden Pond: "I learned this, at least, by my experiment; that if one advances confidently in the direction of his dreams, and endeavors to live the life which he has imagined, he will meet with a success unexpected in common hours. He will put some things behind, will pass an invisible boundary; new, universal, and more liberal laws will begin to establish themselves around and within him; or the old laws be expanded, and interpreted in his favor in a more liberal sense, and he will live with the license of a higher order of beings. In proportion as he simplifies his life, the laws of the universe will appear less complex, and solitude will not be solitude, nor poverty poverty, nor weakness weakness. If you have built castles in the air, your work need not be lost; that is where they should be. Now put the foundations under them.”

Both Allston and I found ourselves in the back seat, leaving John alone up front, as though he were a hired chauffeur. They say that the physico-chemical components of the body after death are worth $3.00, which at the present level of inflation would most likely swell to $5.00 or even $6.00. I suppose if you could take a dead leg, for instance, and sell it to a poor legless living man, the value of corpses would rise considerably. Doubtless, the interchangeability of dead for living parts in the machine world accounts for the grand sum of $13.50 which I received today for the body of my dear Ford, deceased yesterday; for I am sure that otherwise it would not and should not bring twice the sum now quoted for dead man-machines.

Our little mountain climbing group got within 100 feet of the summit of Marcy, and turned back. Levitt being seized with panic upon losing his snowshoe, and several others complaining of real or imagined frostbite; plus the lack of visibility and our unfamiliarity with the proper trail up the summit—all these made this turning back probably the wisest thing, although certainly not the most heroic.

"And all things change them to the contrary" says the elder Capulet. Artie Levitt, the organizer, leader (?) and most energetic of the group going up, was the first to give way before the real test, the least stable in the face of unpleasant conditions, and the most troublesome during the descent. I remember that he acted the same way this summer when we overturned the sailboat. When the situation required real calmness and rapid action, he became a burden to all enterprise. He tipped the boat. Buddy and I pulled it (and Artie) to shore.

Two interesting observations in Bradley's lectures on King Lear: (1) "Good, in the widest sense, seems thus to be the principle of life and health in the world; evil, at least in these worst forms, to be a poison. The world reacts against it violently, and, in the struggle to expel it, is driven to devastate itself." (2) "And here adversity, to the blessed in spirit, is blessed. It wins fragrance from the crushed flower. It melts in aged hearts sympathies which prosperity had frozen. It purifies the soul's sight by blinding that of the eyes. ["I stumbled when I saw," says Gloucester.] . . . The judgment of this world is a lie; its goods, which we covet, corrupt us, its ills, which break our bodies, set our souls free; 'Our means secure us, and our mere defects / Prove our commodities.' Let us renounce the world, hate it, and lose it gladly. The only real thing in it is the soul, with its courage, patience, devotion. And nothing outward can touch that." [The pessimistic theme of King Lear.]

Williams invited Swami Akhilananda to lecture to us. A suave, pleasant Indian whose delightful accent no doubt added to the “numinousness” (sic) of what he had to say. He pictured the true Hindu religion as believing in an intensely personal religious experience for each individual; and sanctioning the communal phase—churchtianity—only insofar as it makes possible to communicate the joy of this experience from one who has experienced such joy personally to the many who have not. Religion and philosophy in India, says the Swami, are nearly identical, for religion is the search for truth. The test of a religious experience is its expression in life. Thus theology is secondary to psychology in Hinduism. If a man’s life is not changed, although he may be the profoundest theologian and believe in an intellectual God, this is not true religion. As to the nature of the Hindu God—Reality-Truth—its attributes are familiar to us Westerners. The infinite nature of God forever prohibits finite man from approaching Him in any way; but we evade this by personalizing God. Thus God loves, God is powerful, God does this, God does that. Jesus, Buddha, Moses are God personalized. Thus they are walking metaphors. This is perhaps the most succinct argument for worshipping Jesus (or Buddha, or Moses) that I have heard. Indeed, it is almost blasphemous to speak and think of God directly and not in the form of this metaphorical Person or Son of God. Different people worship Jesus, Buddha, etc. because one or another is in a more familiar tradition and means more as a person, and therefore as a personification of God.

Now I am a nothing. “Nothing will come of nothing.” No personality, no direction, no purpose, no reason. Yet perhaps throughout my first ten to fifteen years this was not the case. I literally must be born again and become as a little child!

Melville illustrates Hazlitt's remark that any author worthy of the name must have an apprenticeship in Shakespeare and the Bible. Moby Dick is the apocrypha of those two works. And Ahab's soliloquies during the three-day chase approach Lear's in their ferocity, and this hard captain's treatment of Little Pip smacks only of Lear's of the Fool. The figure, entangled and mangled, of the Parsee's corpse against Moby's thick blubber skin is the most hideous in all literature. It makes blind Gloucester a red-painted child, ringing his eyes in jest and tomfoolery.

We can never know anything about persons or ideas until we have come close to them. Gentiles hate Jews because they have never established a bond of sympathy between Jews and what is Jewish in themselves. Dad despises Christianity as humbug because he has never tried for a year or two to be a Christian. I think we must always act out a part nowadays. Anyone can be a sturdy lad from Vermont or New Hampshire, and all should give it a try. This business of "be thyself" is the real humbug, for this is what sets one man up in opposition to his brother. Every great man has been a play-actor—"All the world's a stage"—and has started out in life by fooling those around him to a degree; but each has learned that other men fool, and end up by playing the fool generally. Thus by indirections do we find directions out.

Every time I hear John Haynes Holmes I am re-convicted that sublime beauty controls his soul. Tonight he spoke of Rabbi Stephen S. Wise—spoke of him as a Jew and as a humanitarian, as the greatest humanitarian of the century and as a great Prophet of Israel. Our age has had great souls: Gandhi was probably the most outstanding according to amount accomplished, but I would place Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., Wise, Rufus Jones, the Quaker, Norman Thomas, and especially Dr. Holmes by his side. Holmes began by stating and extolling Wise's Jewishness: his rabbinical status, his enthusiasm for Zionism, and his championship of the threatened Jewry of Europe. And Holmes declared that he loved Wise because he was a Jew and because he adhered to the Jewish tradition (which he didn't), adding that Jew & Christian can exist side by side as Wise and Holmes did, exchanging pulpits or marching arm-in-arm down Eighth Avenue afore 30,000 protestors against the Nazi threat. Wise never forgot he was a Jew and he would never let anyone else forget it, or that his father was a rabbi, his grandfather a rabbi, his great-grandfather a rabbi, etc. And Holmes declared that he could see no virtue in the attempt of Jews to appear indistinguishable from other people. How unexpected from Holmes, and yet how characteristic of him! Later on in the question period I was about to ask him to reconcile this statement with what—at least as I understand them—are the principles of the Community Church, but someone beat me to it. The answer was more Holmsian than what provoked the question, for its essence was that the process of unification is going on, that at best it is an extremely slow process, and that it should be encouraged. There Holmes said something that I think offers the whole solution for the future: that we must endeavor to extract from the various religious traditions those portions that are mutually agreeable and that tend to enhance one another, at the same time discarding and abrogating those portions that stand as a wall or stumbling block between man and man. This is what must be done. Distance, time, etc., no longer being a factor separating peoples, and America being the conglomeration that it is, with this tendency becoming increasingly evident in other nations as well, the old traditions must go: parochialism is no longer a reality, it is a fantasy, and universalism is being thrust on us whether we like it or not. It is incumbent on all people nowadays to know, and to form a bond of sympathy with, all other people. And the best way for this to come about is for people to worship as a community, since most communities, at least urban ones, are microcosms in that they contain a fair sampling of the races and religions of this earth.

Dimmy feels that men today are dead because they are imprisoned each in a specific frame of reference—daily routine, maze, rut—where all their actions are conditioned and habitual. Thus responses are no longer fitting and proper, considering the objective stimulus. The way out of the maze is to develop a psychologically mature personality, for which nothing is ever static, which experiences something new and unique each day. A person with such a personality would have nothing to do with absolutes; he would not even be absolute in his aversion to absolutes; and if he were forced to act in an absolutist way in order to accomplish a specific task he would leave one corner of his being open nevertheless to the reality outside of his particular niche.

I recalled Toynbee's idea of stimulus and response, withdrawal and return. The reason why a place like Harvard is so stale and static, and why Deerfield is becoming so, and why the Community Church will become so also, is that these institutions, although developing originally from a flush of freshness and enthusiasm, and having represented an attempt to establish something extraordinary in their fields in order to meet a certain situation "a", have, after they succeeded in this endeavor and established themselves, forgotten that the original situation "a" is no longer a factor. When an institution persists under such delusion or ignorance, it is doomed to rigidity and eventual death. The best example is the Puritan movement in Massachusetts.

The psychologically mature person would realize, first that situation "a" need no longer be considered and that the institution no longer has any virtue in relation to its remedying this situation; secondly, that the institution itself, let us call it “a<sup>1</sup>”, now becomes a “situation” “b”, necessitating a new institution “b<sup>1</sup>” or at any rate a modification of the old one if the life of the movement is to continue with undiminished vigor.

Toynbee has shown that this realization is prerequisite to the progress of civilizations. His reasoning applies, I think, to all institutions, big or small, or at least to all that at one time succeed in establishing themselves or becoming dominant in any way.

Fine evening of talk with Johnny Taylor. Spouted more idealism: he has a very sober mind and isn't fooled. We two could manage a splendid camp or school. I must end my yearly epistle to Bobby Gersten: that fool place Brant Lake has such possibilities and so little to show. One little nature counselor! A genuine nature counselor! So little and yet so much.

John has written some poetry. I thought some of the individual stanzas and lines really excellent, although he often sacrifices all to rhyme. College doesn't give him time to continue writing!!! College doesn't give us time to think!

Now what could be more wonderful writing than this from Huck Finn:

Soon as it was night, out we shoved; when we got her out to about the middle we let her alone, and let her float wherever the current wanted her to; then we lit the pipes, and dangled our legs in the water, and talked about all kinds of things—we was always naked, day and night, whenever the mosquitoes would let us—the new clothes Buck's folks made for us was too good to be comfortable, and besides I didn't go much on clothes, nohow.

Sometimes we'd have that whole river to ourselves for the longest time. Yonder was the banks and the islands, across the water; and maybe a spark—which was a candle in a cabin window; and sometimes on the water you could see a spark or two—or a raft or a scow, you know; and maybe you could hear a fiddle or a song coming over from one of them crafts. It's lovely to live on a raft. We had the sky up there, all speckled with stars, and we used to lay on our backs and look up at them, and discuss, about whether they was made or only just happened. Jim he allowed they was made, but I allowed they happened; I judged it would have took too long to make so many. Jim said the moon could 'a' laid them; well, that looked kind of reasonable, so I didn't say nothing against it, because I've seen a frog lay most as many, so of course it could be done. We used to watch the stars that fell, too, and see them streak down. Jim allowed they'd got spoiled and was hove out of the nest.

Henry Adams writes about America and Americans: "The American character showed singular limitations which sometimes drove the student of civilized man to despair. Crushed by his own ignorance—lost in the darkness of his own groping—the scholar finds himself jostled of a sudden by a crowd of men who seem to him ignorant that there is a thing called ignorance; who have forgotten how to amuse themselves; who cannot even understand that they are bored. . . . The American was ashamed to be amused; his mind no longer answered to the stimulus of variety; he could not face a new thought. All his immense strength, his intense nervous energy, his keen analytic perceptions, were oriented in one direction, and he could not change it."

Dad is really in a predicament, for the drug apparently does not have a permanent effect, nor will his constitution stand up to a continued application of it. Thus if he is treated, his sight returns but his body becomes useless, it is so weak; and if treatment is abandoned, the eyes become opaque as before. I shudder to think what the outcome of this will be. Pray God that Dad does not lose his spirit: that is most important, infinitely more so than sight.

"All the steam in the world could not, like the Virgin, build Chartres." —Henry Adams.

The other day during rush hour in the Boston subway, two middle-aged dames were talking incessantly to one another of the current gossip and similar trash; whereupon an adorable blonde little girl, of about five years old, I should say, who was standing in the aisle next to their seats and whose towhead therefore was level with their faces, stepped in front of the woman nearest the aisle and simply stared—fascinated—at the latter’s mobile face, with the distance of perhaps three or four inches separating the two. The two women feigned a sickening smile each, the “isn’t she cute!” smile, and continued their gab, literally giving their admirer the cold shoulder. The little girl, deeply hurt at such a rejection, appeared extremely bewildered for a time, as if desperately trying to decide what to do next. Evidently, she concluded, in her little way, that since they would not play with her she would play with herself, whereupon she commenced the most perfect and hilarious pantomime of these two gabbers, imitating their mouth movements, shoulder shrugs, and ridiculously exaggerated motions of hands, all of which could have proceeded only from such childish innocence.

Henry James: “Humanity is immense, and reality has a myriad forms . . . Experience is never limited, and it is never complete; it is an immense sensibility, a kind of huge spider web of the finest silken threads suspended in the chamber of consciousness, and catching every air-borne particle in its tissue. It is the very atmosphere of the mind; and when the mind is imaginative—much more when it happens to be that of a man of genius—it takes to itself the faintest hints of life, it converts the very pulses of the air into revelations.”

What I like about John Haynes Holmes, Stephen Wise, Justice Holmes, and perhaps FDR is that they have been living contradictions to Nietzsche: not so much because they deny in their lives and beliefs that power is the chief motivating force, but rather because they take power and use it in constructive ways. Especially power in religion. Wise and Holmes cannot be termed weaklings; yet they preach brotherhood and humility. If I were to select an inscription to place over the edifice of my aspirations, I might very well chose the following by Justice Holmes: THE JOY OF LIFE IS TO PUT OUT ONE'S POWER IN SOME NATURAL AND USEFUL OR HARMLESS WAY. THERE IS NO OTHER. AND THE REAL MISERY IS NOT TO DO THIS.

I should like some day to write a book showing how the essential truth of Nietzsche and Dreiser need not be the cause for pessimism. For they can be fulfilled in the person of a Holmes just as well in that of a Hitler. I should also like some day to do a philosophical approach to the history of religion, Toynbee style.

This afternoon I went up to see John Haynes Holmes at his home. He is a very simple person, and thus has very simple physical needs: his apartment is sparsely furnished indeed. But Holmes's mind and personality are cluttered with thoughts and ideas, thoughts and ideas that he knows how to express. One of the things that delighted me most during this visit was his statement that it is difficult for one to realize with what ease people become attuned to the Community Church's program. I know that Holmes's personal magnetism is perhaps largely responsible for this; still I feel that underneath people really desire to establish connections with all mankind and with all the universe, and that they are simply waiting for someone to unlock the lock that keeps them enclosed in a particular tradition or a particular set of beliefs.

I told Holmes all, beginning with Dad's early experiences in the synagogue and ending with the ideas of (1) the withdrawal and return necessary for progress, i.e., the escape from rigidity, (2) Justice Holmes's power doctrine, (3) the true view of tradition—i.e., the insight that the pre-Maccabean times throws on the nature of the Jewish tradition, (4) the necessity for personifying God's characteristics in the great religious leaders; how the Hindus expand this into a world view. In between, of course, came the story of my constantly increasing awareness of the religious truth, and of the religious experience.

Holmes seemed impressed, and said as much. He was particularly interested in the swing of the pendulum, as he put it, from grandfather to father, to son; and also from the home atmosphere to Johnny Taylor's and Ockenga's stark fundamentalism. His father, said Holmes, although a Unitarian and connected with the Unitarian Church in Malden, Massachusetts, used to take little John into Boston on Sunday mornings to hear the great preachers of the day: and those were the days of great preachers. The elder Holmes evinced not the slightest concern if one was an Episcopalian, or another a Methodist. Thus John received a great desire to preach, and at the same time a universal view of religion instead of a sectarian one, at least insofar as the Boston area was his universe.

I think, after all this, that the Community Church is a truly unique institution in its attitudes; moreover, that I belong there—and Holmes thinks so too.

I found the following paragraph in the preface, by Rufus Jones, to Kagawa's book on Jesus and Love: "Kagawa is one of the striking phenomena of the Christian world of today. He is not a man behind a pulpit; he is a demonstrator in a laboratory. He is showing, once more, that Christianity is not talk, it is action; it is not words, it is power. He exhibits it as soul-force, creative energy, redemptive might. We see at once how little is expressed by a census of Church membership or by an array of numbers. What counts is unquenchable personal conviction, invincible faith, an unconquerable spirit of adventure and demonstration. And here they are revealed in this man.”

Dowden, speaking of Brutus: “It is idealists who create a political terror; they are free from all desire for blood-shedding; but to them the lives of men and women are accidents; the lives of ideas are the true realities; and, armed with an abstract principle and a suspicion, they perform deeds which are at once beautiful and hideous:

’Tis a common proof
That lowliness is young Ambition’s ladder,
Whereto the climber upwards turns his face;
But when he once attains the utmost round,
He then unto the ladder turns his back,
Looks in the clouds, scorning the base degrees
By which he did ascend: so Caesar may;
Then, lest he may, prevent!

Hussah! Shakespeare knows the Arthur Levitt type:

There are no tricks in plain and simple faith;
But hollow men, like horses hot at hand,
Make gallant show and promise of their mettle;
But when they should endure the bloody spur;
They fall their crests, and, like deceitful jades,
Sink in the trial.

Billy Graham found a critical and unresponsive hearer in me this evening. He made Christianity a securer of everlasting bliss, and that is all. Accept Christ or, sure as he was standing on his two feet, you will roast in hell. Though this is too doctrinal for me, it is true that I have not yet thought about religion from the viewpoint of what happens to the individual after death. To me so far, the important thing has been the possession of the Spirit of God and Truth in one while he is living this life. Knowledge of such a possession remakes a man; he becomes as a little child, and he automatically radiates love toward all of nature. The Gospel of John catches these feelings better than anything else I have read. It is truly a divinely inspired document.

I suppose that on the level of the masses Billy Graham performed an identical function to that of Bishop Neill on the level of the intelligentsia. But the ugly daemon power looms before Billy Graham. There is a man who has the talents of a demagogue, yet who puts them to better use. Working up the emotions of the mob, however, is not only something that can—and has—led to Nazism or Huey Longism; but seems to me to be a relatively poor way of leading to Christism as well. I do not see how a conversion under Graham's influence can be a secure, lasting, and fruitful one unless it is based on a serious inquiry and a rational faith (no, this need not be an inconsistency: rational faith is grander and infinitely more efficacious than irrational faith). Perhaps Billy's great justification is that he gives the final nudge to people who have long considered their relation to God but who have never reached the point of openly testifying to this relationship—which is the sublimest and noblest in all of life.

Billy Graham, interestingly enough, seems to have the same ideas about Christianity as Kagawa; yet I hardly think that Billy is furthering the cause of religion. I suppose this leads to the conclusion that the only stable reality is the individual—and not the system or philosophy. The identical thoughts may produce progress in a Kagawa and retrogression in a Graham. Perhaps when people begin to realize this they will not only cease turning to authoritarianism or other isms, but will also, however paradoxical it may seem, accept the fact that individuals die, and instead of using this as an argument for futility, will begin to see the grandeur, miraculousness, continuity, and divinity of Life.

On this line of thought I have come to believe that the one lasting (sic) reality of religion is the mystic adventure—perhaps the most fleeting experience of any; and that churches, ritual, dogmas, and creeds are justified (1) only insofar as they induce this experience or provide the proper conditions for it, and (2) only insofar as they translate into social action the logical manifestation or result of the mystic experience—namely, love. The big question seems to be whether anything can “induce” a union with the infinite, or whether, like a mutation, it just happens. Ah, but what of mutations brought about by x-rays? Perhaps the great preacher is one whose mind is constructed like a cathode tube.

Confucius said: . . . The true man has no worries; the wise man has no perplexities; the brave man has no fear.

Confucius said: . . . The things that trouble or concern me are the following: lest I should neglect to improve my character, lest I should neglect my studies, and lest I should fail to move forward when I see the right course, or fail to correct myself when I see my mistake.

Confucius said: . . . I won’t teach a man who is not anxious to learn, and will not explain to one who is not trying to make things clear to himself.

Confucius taught four things: Literature, personal conduct, being one’s true self, and honesty in social relationships.

Confucius denounced or tried to avoid completely four things: arbitrariness of opinion, dogmatism, narrow-mindedness, and egotism.

Confucius cannot be belittled. Other great men are like mounds or hillocks which you can climb up, but Confucius is like the moon and the sun, which you can never reach. A man can shut his eyes to the sun and the moon, but what harm can it do to the sun and the moon?

Confucius said: To know what you know and know what you don’t know is the characteristic of one who knows.

Confucius said: Do not worry about people not knowing your ability, but worry that you have not got it.

Confucius said: A gentleman blames himself, while a common man blames others.

Someone said, What do you think of repaying evil with kindness? Confucius replied, Then what are you going to repay kindness with? Repay kindness with kindness, but repay evil with justice.

Confucius said: . . . Learning prevents one from being narrow-minded.

Tselu asked about the worship of the celestial and earthly spirits. Confucius said, We don't know yet how to serve men, how can we know about serving the spirits? What about death? was the next question, and Confucius said, We don't know yet about life, how can we know about death?

Tsekung asked, Is there one single word that can serve as a principle of conduct for life? Confucius replied, Perhaps the word "reciprocity" will do. Do not do unto others what you do not want others to do unto you.

Confucius said: To find the central clue to our moral being which unites us to the universal order (or to attain central harmony), that indeed is the highest human attainment.

Confucius said: If a man is not a true man, what is the use of rituals? If a man is not a true man, what is the use of music?

Confucius said: The gentleman broadens himself by scholarship or learning, and then regulates himself by li (proper conduct or moral discipline).

Confucius said: Reading without thinking gives one a disorderly mind, and thinking without reading makes one flighty (or unbalanced).

Confucius said: A man who goes over what he has already learned and gains some new understanding from it is worthy to be a teacher.

Confucius said: That type of scholarship which is bent to remembering things in order to answer people's questions does not qualify one to be a teacher.

Taoist scraps, from Waley's book ("Chuang Tzu"):

The crowd cares for gain,
The honest man for fame,
The good man values success,
But the wise man, his soul.

Therefore we talk of his simplicity, meaning that he keeps his soul free from all admixture, and of his wholeness, meaning that he keeps it intact and entire. He that can achieve such wholeness, such integrity, we call a True Man.

There are those who 'betake themselves to thickets and swamps, see their dwelling in desert spaces, fish with a hook or sit all day doing nothing at all'; but the Taoist knows how to live in the world without being of the world, how to be at leisure without the solitude of 'hills and seas'. If he 'buries himself away' it is as a commoner among the common people. . . . The Taoist knows how to follow others without losing his Self.

To someone who knew how to make his mind travel into the illimitable, the 'lands that are in communication' would seem a mere insignificant speck.

The objection of the Taoist to war is not based on moral or humanitarian grounds. 'To love the people is to harm them; to side with those who are in the right in order to end war is the way to start fresh wars.' It is based on the absolute insignificance and futility of the utmost that conquest can gain or that defense can secure, when compared with the limitless inward resources of the individual.

We must 'bind the fingers' of the technicians, 'smash their arcs and plumb-lines, throw away their compasses and squares.' Only then will men learn to rely on their inborn skill, on the 'Great Skill that looks like clumsiness.' But the culture heroes were not the only inventors who 'tampered with men's hearts.' Equally pernicious were on the one hand the Sages, inventors of goodness and duty, and of the laws that enforce an artificial morality, and on the other the tyrants, inventors of tortures and inquisitions, 'embitterers of man's nature.'

In the Golden Age (utopia), the two vital principles of Yin and Yang worked together instead of in opposition.

From William James, Varieties of Religious Experience:

. . . Not its origin, but the way in which it works on the whole, is the final test of belief. By their fruits ye shall know them, not by their roots. [Cf. Jonathan Edwards's Treatise on Religious Affections.] The roots of a man's virtue are inaccessible to us. No appearances whatever are infallible proofs of grace. Our practice is the only sure evidence even to ourselves that we are genuinely Christians. [I wonder. I would place the motive behind the act as paramount—after Kant. Utilitarian ethics are not sufficient; thus the deficiencies of humanism.]

The nature of genius has been illuminated by the attempts to class it with psychopathical phenomena. When a superior intellect and a psychopathic temperament coalesce in the same individual, we have the best possible condition for the kind of effective genius that gets into the biographical dictionaries. Such men do not remain mere critics and understanders with their intellect. [Too many of these at Harvard.] Their ideas possess them; they inflict them upon the companions of their age.

In the psychopathic temperament we have the emotionality which is the sine qua non of moral perception; we have the intensity and tendency to emphasis which are the essence of practical moral vigor; and we have the love of metaphysics and mysticism which carry one's interests beyond the surface of the sensible world. What, then, is more natural than that this temperament should introduce to regions of religious truth?

Religious awe is the same organic thrill which we feel in a forest at twilight, or in a mountain gorge; only this time it comes over us at the thought of our supernatural relations.

Religion . . . is the feelings, acts, and experiences of individual men in their solitude, so far as they apprehend themselves to stand in relation to whatever they may consider the divine. . . . Religion is a man's total reaction upon life. Total reactions are different from casual reactions; to get at them you must go behind the foreground of existence and reach down to that curious sense of the whole residual cosmos as an everlasting presence, intimate or alien, terrible or amusing, lovable or odious, which in some degree every one possesses.

At bottom the whole concern of both morality and religion is with the manner of our acceptance of the universe. . . . Morality pure and simple accepts the law of the whole which it finds reigning, so far as to acknowledge and obey it, but it may obey it with the heaviest and coldest heart, and never cease to feel it as a yoke. But for religion, in its strong and fully developed manifestations, the service of the highest never is felt as a yoke. . . . It makes a tremendous emotional and practical difference to one whether one accept the universe in the drab discolored way of stoic resignation to necessity [cf. Marxism], or with the passionate happiness of Christian saints. . . . Compare Marcus Aurelius's fine sentence, "If gods care not for me or my children, here is a reason for it," with Job's cry: "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him!" and you immediately see the difference I mean. The anima mundi, to whose disposal of his own personal destiny the Stoic consents, is there to be respected and submitted to, but the Christian God is there to be loved; i.e., "Where men are enlightened with the true light, they renounce all desire and choice, and commit and commend themselves and all things to the eternal Goodness. . . . Such men are in a state of freedom, because they have lost the fear of pain or hell, and the hope of reward or heaven, and are living in pure submission to the eternal Goodness, in the perfect freedom of fervent love." (Theologia Germanica) [This answers the question as to the utilitarian motive in Christ's ethic of the Mount.]

A story which revivalist preachers often tell is that of a man who found himself at night slipping down the side of a precipice; at last he caught a branch which stopped his fall, and remained clinging to it in misery for hours. But finally his fingers had to loose their hold, and with a despairing farewell to life, he let himself drop. He fell just six inches. If he had given up the struggle earlier his agony would have been spared. As the mother earth received him, so, the preachers tell us, will the everlasting arms receive us if we confide absolutely in them, and give up the heredity habit of relying on our personal strength, with its precautions that cannot shelter and safeguards that cannot save.

The results of the combined optimism and expectancy—the regenerative phenomena which ensue on the abandonment of effort—remain firm facts of human nature, no matter whether we adopt a theistic, a pantheistic-idealistic, or a medical-materialistic view of their ultimate causal explanation. The theistic explanation is by divine grace, which creates a new nature within one the moment the old nature is sincerely given up. (Lutheran justification by faith; Wesleyan acceptance of free grace.) The pantheistic explanation [cf. Christian Science?] is by the merging of the narrower private self into the wider or greater self, the spirit of the universe (which is your own 'subconscious' self), the moment the isolating barriers of mistrust and anxiety are removed. The medico-materialistic explanation is that simpler cerebral processes act more freely where they are left to act automatically by the shunting-out of physiologically (though in this instance not spiritual) 'higher' ones which, seeking to regulate, only succeed in inhibiting results.

An idea, to be suggestive, must come to the individual with the force of a revelation. It lets loose the springs of higher life. The force of personal faith, enthusiasm, and example, and above all the force of novelty, are always the prime suggestive agency in this kind of success. If mind-cure should ever become official, respectable, and entrenched, those elements of suggestive efficacy will be lost. In its acuter stages every religion must be a homeless Arab of the desert.

What are we to think of all this? [mind-cure] Has science made too wide a claim?

I believe that the claims of the sectarian scientist are, to say the least, premature. The universe is a more many-sided affair than any sect, even the scientific sect, allows for. Why in the name of common sense need we assume that only one system of ideas can be true? The obvious outcome of our total experience is that the world can be handled according to many systems of ideas. Science and religion are both of them genuine keys for unlocking the world's treasure-house to him who can use either of them practically. Just as evidently neither is exhaustive or exclusive of the other's simultaneous use. And why after all may not the world be so complex as to consist of many interpenetrating spheres of reality, which we can thus approach in alternation by using different conceptions and assuming different attitudes, just as mathematicians handle the same numerical and spatial facts by geometry, by analytical geometry, by algebra, by the calculus, or by quaternions, and each time come out right?

"There is indeed one element in human destiny," Robert Louis Stevenson writes, "that not blindness itself can controvert. Whatever else we are intended to do, we are not intended to succeed; failure is the fate allotted." He adds with characteristic healthy-mindedness: "Our business is to continue to fail in good spirits." [cf. Hatch's sense of humor.]

Sadness lies at the heart of every merely positivistic, agnostic, or naturalistic scheme of philosophy. For naturalism, fed on recent cosmological speculations, mankind is in a position similar to that of a set of people living on a frozen lake, surrounded by cliffs over which there is no escape, yet knowing that little by little the ice is melting, and the inevitable day drawing near when the last film of it will disappear, and to be drowned ignominiously will be the human creature's portion.

Stoicism and Epicureanism mark the conclusion of what we call the once-born period, and represent the highest flights of what twice-born religion would call the purely natural man—Epicureanism showing his refinement, and Stoicism exhibiting his moral will. They leave the world in the shape of an unreconciled contradiction, and seek no higher unity. Compared with the complex ecstasies which the supernaturally regenerated Christian may enjoy, or the oriental pantheist indulge in, their receipts for equanimity are expedients which seem almost crude in their simplicity. The securest way to the rapturous sorts of happiness of which the twice-born make report has as an historic matter of fact been through a more radical pessimism.

One can live only so long as one is intoxicated, drunk with life; but when one grows sober one cannot fail to see that it is all a stupid cheat. What is truest about it is that there is nothing even funny or silly in it; it is cruel and stupid, purely and simply.

“ . . . I sought like a man who is lost and seeks to save himself, —and I found nothing. I became convinced, moreover, that all those who before me had sought for an answer in the sciences have also found nothing. And not only this, but that they have recognized that the very thing which was leading me to despair—the meaningless absurdity of life—is the only incontestable knowledge accessible to man.” —Tolstoy. [He was revived by a thirst for God.]

When disillusionment has gone as far as this, there is seldom a restitutio ad integrum. One has tasted of the fruit of the tree and the happiness of Eden never comes again. The happiness that comes when any does come is not the simple ignorance of ill but something vastly more complex, including natural evil as one of its elements, but finding natural evil no such stumbling block and terror because it now sees it swallowed up in supernatural good. The process is one of redemption, not of mere reversion to natural health, and the sufferer, when saved, is saved by what seems to him a second birth, a deeper kind of conscious being than he could enjoy before.

Here is the real core of the religious problem: Help! Help! No prophet can claim to bring a final message unless he says things that will have a sound of reality in the ears of victims such as these. But the deliverance must come in as strong a form as the complaint, if it is to take effect; and that seems a reason why the coarser religions, revivalistic, orgiastic, with blood and miracles and supernatural operations, may possibly never be displaced. Some constitutions need them too much.

The completest religions would seem to be those in which the pessimistic elements are best developed. Buddhism, of course, and Christianity are the best known of these. They are essentially religions of deliverance: the man must die to an unreal life before he can be born into the real life.

The psychological basis of the twice-born character seems to be a certain discordancy and heterogeneity in the native temperament of the subject, an incompletely unified moral and intellectual constitution. Now in all of us the normal evolution of character chiefly consists in the straightening out and unifying of the inner self. Unhappiness is apt to characterize the period of order-making and struggle.

The process of unification may come gradually, or it may occur abruptly; it may come through altered feelings, or through altered powers of action; or it may come through new intellectual insights, or through mystical experiences. But to find religion is only one out of many ways of reaching unity. For example, the new birth may be away from religion into incredulity; or it may be from moral scrupulosity into freedom and license; or it may be produced by the irruption into the individual's life of some new stimulus or passion, such as love, ambition, cupidity, revenge, or patriotic devotion.

Little by little, Tolstoy came to the settled conviction—he says it took him two years to arrive there—that his trouble had not been with life in general, not with the common life of common men, but with the life of the upper, intellectual, artistic classes, the life which he had personally always led, the cerebral life, the life of conventionality, artificiality, and personal ambition. He had been living wrongly and must change. To work for animal needs, to abjure lies and vanities, to relieve common wants, to be simple, to believe in God, herein lay happiness again. “I gave up the life of the conventional world, recognizing it to be no life, but a parody on life, which its superfluties simply keep us from comprehending”—and Tolstoy thereupon embraced the life of the peasants, and has felt right and happy, or at least relatively so, ever since.

To say that a man is ‘converted’ means that religious ideas, previously peripheral in his consciousness, now take a central place, and that religious aims form the habitual center of his energy.

The crisis in conversion is the throwing of our conscious selves upon the mercy of powers which, whatever they may be, are more ideal than we are actually, and make for our redemption. [Thus] self-surrender has been and always must be regarded as the vital turning-point of the religious life, as far as the religious life is spiritual and no affair of outer works and ritual and sacraments. One may say that the whole development of Christianity in inwardness has consisted in little more than the greater and greater emphasis attached to this crisis of self-surrender.

There are only two ways in which it is possible to get rid of anger, worry, fear, despair, or other undesirable affections. One is that an opposite affection should over-poweringly break over us, and the other is by getting so exhausted with the struggle that we have to stop—so we drop down, give up, and don't care any longer. Our emotional brain-centers strike work, and we lapse into a temporary apathy. This state of temporary exhaustion not infrequently forms part of the conversion crisis. So long as the egoistic worry of the sick soul guards the door, the expansive confidence of the soul of faith gains no presence.

But beyond all question there are persons in whom, quite independently of any exhaustion in the subject's capacity for feeling, or even in the absence of any acute previous feeling, the higher condition, having reached the due degree of energy, bursts through all barriers and sweeps in like a sudden flood.

“The ultimate test of religious values is nothing psychological, nothing definable in terms of how it happens, but something ethical, definable only in terms of what is attained.” What is attained is often an altogether new level of spiritual vitality, a relatively heroic level, in which impossible things have become possible, and new energies and endurances are shown. The personality is changed, the man is born anew, whether or not his psychological idiosyncrasies are what give the particular shape to his metamorphosis. ‘Sanctification’ is the technical name of this result.

Personal religious experience has its roots and center in mystical states of consciousness.

Characteristics of the mystical experience:

1. Ineffability: A mystical state of mind cannot be expressed in words; thus it must be directly experienced.
2. Noetic quality: They are states of insight into depths of truth unplumbed by the discursive intellect.
3. Transiency: A half hour's duration is rare.
4. Passivity: The mystic feels as if his own will were in abeyance, and indeed sometimes as if he were grasped and held by a superior power.

The simplest rudiment of mystical experience would seem to be that deepened sense of the significance of a maxim or formula which occasionally sweeps over one. "I've heard that said all my life," we exclaim, "but I never realized its full meaning until now."

For those who believe in the anaesthetic revelation, it is a monistic insight, in which the other in its various forms appears, absorbed into the One. —i.e., "The subject has known the oldest truth, and he has done with human theories as to the origin, meaning or destiny of the race. He is beyond instruction in 'spiritual things.' The lesson is one of central safety: the Kingdom is within. We reduce the distracting multiplicity of things to the unity for which each of us stands."

Certain aspects of nature seem to have a peculiar power of awakening such mystical moods. Most of the striking cases which I have collected have occurred out of doors; e.g., "I was alone upon the seashore as all these thoughts flowed over me; I was impelled to kneel down, this time before the illimitable ocean, symbol of the Infinite. I felt that I prayed as I had never prayed before, and knew now what prayer really is: to return from the solitude of individualism into the consciousness of unity with all that is, to kneel down as one that passes away, and to rise up as one imperishable."

Whitman: "There is, apart from mere intellect, in the make-up of every superior human identity, a wondrous something that realizes without arguments, frequently without what is called education (though I think it the goal and apex of all education deserving the name), an intuition of the absolute balance, in time and space, of the whole of this multifariousness, the revel of fools, and incredible make-believe and general unsettledness, we call the world; a soul-sight of that divine clue and unseen thread which holds the whole congeries of things, all history and time, and all events, however trivial, however momentous, like a leashed dog in the hands of the hunter."

In India, training in mystical insight has been known from time immemorial under the name of yoga. Yoga means the experimental union of the individual with the divine. The yogi who has overcome the obscurations of his lower nature sufficiently, enters into the condition termed samâdhi, "and comes face to face with facts which no instinct or reason can ever know. Just as unconscious work is beneath consciousness, so there is another work which is above consciousness. There is no feeling of I, and yet the mind works, desireless, free from restlessness, objectless, bodiless. Then the Truth shines in its full effulgence, and we know ourselves for what we truly are, free, immortal, omnipotent, and identical with the Atman or Universal Soul.” —Vivekananda

When a man comes out of samâdhi, the Vedantists assure us that he remains “enlightened, a Sage, a prophet, a saint, his whole character changed, his life changed, illuminated.

Incommunicableness of the transport is the keynote of all mysticism. Mystical truth exists for the individual who has the transport, but for no one else.

Mystical states in general assert a pretty distinct theoretic drift. It is possible to give the outcome of the majority of them in terms that point in definite philosophical directions. One of these directions is optimism, and the other is monism.

Denial of the finite self and its wants, asceticism of some sort, is found in religious experience to be the only doorway to the larger and more blessed life.

In mystic states we both become one with the Absolute and we become aware of our oneness. This is the everlasting and triumphant mystical tradition. The mystic range of consciousness is on the whole pantheistic and optimistic, or at least the opposite of pessimistic. It is anti-naturalistic, and harmonizes best with twice-bornness and so-called other-worldly states of mind.

Mystical states break down the authority of the non-mystical or rationalistic consciousness, based upon the understanding and the senses alone. They show it to be only one kind of consciousness. They open out the possibility of other orders of truth, in which, so far as anything in us vitally responds to them, we may freely continue to have faith.

If the mystical truth that comes to a man proves to be a force that he can live by, what mandate have we of the majority to order him to live in another way? Faith, says Tolstoy, is that by which men live. And faith-state and mystic-state are practically convertible terms.

[Re: theology] I believe that the logical reason of man operates in this field of divinity exactly as it has always operated in love, or in patriotism, or in politics, or in any other of the wider affairs of life, in which our passions or our mystical intuitions fix our beliefs beforehand. It finds arguments for our conviction, for indeed it has to find them. It amplifies and defines our faith, and dignifies it and lends it words and plausibility. It hardly ever engenders it; it cannot now secure it.

(Cardinal Newman gives us scholastic philosophy ‘touched with emotion,’ and every philosophy should be touched with emotion to be rightly understood.)

(What is the particular truth in question known as? In what facts does it result? What is its cash-value in terms of particular experience? This is the characteristic English way of taking up a question. When all is said and done, it was English and Scotch writers, and not Kant, who introduced the ‘critical method’ into philosophy, the one method fitted to make philosophy a study worthy of serious men. For what seriousness can possibly remain in debating philosophic propositions that will never make an appreciable difference to us in action?) [Wow! Pragmatism.]

Pierce on pragmatism: “Only when our thought about a subject has found its rest in belief can our action on the subject firmly and safely begin. Beliefs, in short, are rules for action; and the whole function of thinking is but one step in the production of active habits.”

If we apply the principle of pragmatism to God’s metaphysical attributes I think that, even were we forced by a coercive logic to believe them, we still should have to confess them to be destitute of all intelligible significance. How do such qualities (i.e. God’s aseity, immateriality, indivisibility) make any definite connection with our life? And if they severally call for no distinctive adaptations of our conduct, what vital difference can it possibly make to a man’s religion whether they be true or false?

What is the theologian’s deduction of metaphysical attributes but a shuffling and matching of pedantic dictionary-adjectives, aloof from morals, aloof from human needs, something that might be worked out from the mere word ‘God’ by one of those logical machines of wood and brass which recent ingenuity has contributed as well as by a man of flesh and blood. They have the trail of the serpent over them. One feels that in the theologians’ hands they are only a set of titles obtained by a mechanical manipulation of synonyms; verbality has stepped into the place of vision, professionalism into that of life. Instead of bread we have a stone; instead of a fish, a serpent. Did such a conglomeration of abstract terms give really the gist of our knowledge of the deity, schools of theology might indeed continue to flourish, but religion, vital religion, would have taken its flight from this world. What keeps religion going is something else than abstract definitions and systems of concatenated adjectives, and something different from faculties of theology and their professors. All these things are after-effects, secondary accretions upon those phenomena of vital conversation with the unseen divine, of which I have shown you so many instances, renewing themselves in soecula soeculorum in the lives of humble private men.

“Is there, then,” Principal Caird continues, “no solution of the contradiction between the ideal and the actual? We answer, There is such a solution, but in order to reach it we are carried beyond the sphere of morality into that of religion. It may be said to be the essential characteristic of religion as contrasted with morality, that it changes aspiration into fruition, anticipation into realization; that instead of leaving man in the interminable pursuit of a vanishing ideal, it makes him the actual partaker of a divine or infinite life.”

In all sad sincerity I think we must conclude that the attempt to demonstrate by purely intellectual processes the truth of the deliverances of direct religious experience is absolutely hopeless.

Prayer in the wider sense as meaning every kind of inward communion or conversation with the power recognized as divine is the very soul and essence of religion.

“Religion is nothing if it be not the vital act by which the entire mind seeks to save itself by clinging to the principle from which it draws its life. This act is prayer, by which term I understand no vain exercise of words, no mere repetition of certain sacred formulae, but the very movement of the soul, putting itself in a personal relation of contact with the mysterious power of which it feels the presence. Wherever this interior prayer is lacking, there is no religion; wherever, on the other hand, this prayer rises and stirs the soul, even in the absence of forms and doctrines, we have living religion. One sees from this why ‘natural religion’ so-called, is not properly a religion. It cuts man off from prayer. It leaves him and God in mutual remoteness, with no intimate commerce, no interior dialogue, no interchange, no action of God in man, no return of man to God. At bottom this pretended religion is only a philosophy.” —Auguste Sabatier.

“The devout feel that wherever God’s hand is, there is miracle: and it is simply an indevoutness which imagines that only where miracle is, can there be the real hand of God. The customs of Heaven ought surely to be more sacred in our eyes than its anomalies; the dear old ways, of which the most high is never tired, than the strange things which he does not love well enough to repeat.” —James Martineau.

Knowledge about a thing is not the thing itself. You remember what Al-Ghazzali told us in the Lecture on Mysticism, —that to understand the causes of drunkenness as a physician understands them, is not to be drunk. A science might come to understand everything about the causes and elements of religion, and might even decide which elements were qualified, by their general harmony with other branches of knowledge, to be considered true, and yet the best man at this science might be the man who found it hardest to be personally devout. Tout savoir c’est tout pardonner. The name of Renan would doubtlessly occur to many persons as an example of the way in which breadth of knowledge may make one only a dilettante in possibilities, and blunt the acuteness of one’s living faith. If religion be a function by which either God’s cause or man’s cause is to be really advanced, then he who lives the life of it, however narrowly, is a better servant than he who merely knows about it, however much. Knowledge about life is one thing; effective occupation of a place in life, with its dynamic currents passing through your being, is another.

The faith-state is a biological as well as a psychological condition, and Tolstoy is absolutely accurate in classing faith among the forces by which men live. The total absence of it, anhedonia, means collapse.

The faith-state may hold a very minimum of intellectual content. It may be a mere vague enthusiasm, half spiritual, half vital, a courage, and a feeling that great and wondrous things are in the air. When, however, a positive intellectual content is associated with a faith-state, it gets invincibly stamped in upon belief.

Not God, but life, more life, a larger, richer, more satisfying life, is, in the last analysis, the end of religion. The love of life, at any and every level of development, is the religious impulse. [Cf. Albert Schweitzer.]

Is there, under all the discrepancies of the creeds, a common nucleus to which they bear their testimony unanimously? Yes. It consists of two parts: 1. An uneasiness, and 2. Its solution. 1. The uneasiness, reduced to its simplest terms, is a sense that there is something wrong about us as we naturally stand. 2. The solution is a sense that we are saved from the wrongness by making proper connection with the higher powers.

In those more developed minds which alone we are studying, the wrongness takes a moral character, and the salvation takes a mystical tinge. I think we shall keep well within the limits of what is common to all such minds if we formulate the essence of their religious experience in terms like these: The individual, so far as he suffers from his wrongness and criticizes it, is to that extent consciously beyond it, and in at least possible touch with something higher, if anything higher exist. Along with the wrong past there is thus a better part of him, even though it may be but a most helpless germ. With which part he should identify his real being is by no means obvious at this stage; but when stage 2 (the stage of solution or salvation) arrives [Remember that for some men it arrives suddenly, for others gradually, whilst others again practically enjoy it all their life.] the man identifies his real being with the germinal higher part of himself; and does so in the following way. He becomes conscious that this higher part is conterminous and continuous with a MORE of the same quality, which is operative in the universe outside of him, and which he can keep in working touch with, and in a fashion get on board of and save himself when all his lower being has gone to pieces in the wreck. The practical difficulties are 1. to 'realize the reality' of one's higher part; 2. to identify one's self with it exclusively; and 3. to identify it with all the rest of ideal being. Does that 'MORE of the same quality' really exist, or is it merely our own notion? If so, in what shape does it exist? Does it act, as well as exist? And in what form should we conceive of that 'union' with it of which religious geniuses are so convinced? All the theologies agree that the 'more' really exists, and that it acts. It is when they treat of the experiences of 'union' with it that their speculative differences appear most clearly. Over this point pantheism and theism, nature and second birth, works and grace and karma, immortality and reincarnation, rationalism and mysticism, carry on inveterate disputes. [In Christianity, the 'more' is Jehovah, and the 'union' is his imputation to us of the righteousness of Christ.] Let me then propose, as an hypothesis, that whatever it may be on its father side, the 'more' with which in religious experience we feel ourselves connected is on its hither side the subconscious continuation of our conscious life. This explanation, however, is only a doorway into the subject, and difficulties present themselves as soon as we step through it, and ask how far out transmarginal consciousness carries us if we follow it on its remoter side. Here the over-beliefs begin: here mysticism and the conversion, rapture and Vedantism and transcendental idealism bring in their monistic interpretations and tell us that the finite self rejoins the absolute self, for it was always one with God identical with the soul of the world.

Although the religious question is primarily a question of life, of living or not living in the higher union which opens itself to us as a gift, yet the spiritual excitement in which the gift appears a real one will often fail to be aroused in an individual until certain particular intellectual beliefs or ideas which, as we say, come home to him, are touched. These ideas will thus be essential to that individual's religion; which is as much as to say that over-beliefs in various directions are absolutely indispensable, and that we should treat them with tenderness and tolerance so long as they are not intolerant themselves. As I have elsewhere written, the most interesting and valuable things about a man are usually his over-beliefs.

The further limits of our being plunge, it seems to me, into an altogether other dimension of existence from the sensible and merely 'understandable' world. Name it the mystical region, or the supernatural region whichever you choose. So far as our ideal impulses originate in this region (and most of them do originate in it, for we find them possessing us in a way for which we cannot articulately account), we belong to it in a more intimate sense than that in which we belong to the visible world. When we commune with it, work is actually done upon our finite personality, for we are turned into new men, and consequences in the way of conduct follow in the natural world upon our regenerative change. But that which produces effects within another reality must be termed a reality itself, so I feel as if we had no philosophic excuse for calling the unseen or mystical world un-real.

Claud.: I humbly thank you.

 And seeking death, find life. Let it come on.

Shakespeare moralizing:

He who the sword of heaven will bear
 Should be as holy as severe;
 Pattern in himself to know,
 Grace to stand, and virtue go;
 More nor less to others paying
 Than by self-offenses weighing.
 Shame to him whose cruel striking
 Kills for faults of his own liking!
 Twice treble shame on Angels
 To weed my vice and let his grow!
 Oh, what may man within him hide,
 Though angel on the outward side!

More on death (M for M V,I,398–404):

Duke:                    O most kind maid,
 It was the swift celerity of his death,
 Which I did think with slower foot came on,
 That brain'd my purpose. But peace be with him!
 That life is better life, past fearing death,
 Than that which lives to fear. Make it your comfort,
 So happy is your brother.

Isab. I do, my lord.

From Edith Sitwell:

“Are not all things generated out of their opposites?” (Socrates)

It is certain that from Lear (the element of fire, the will, the pride, the passion, which are the essence of fire), generated the endless cold of Goneril and Regan. To become greater, Lear became less. Out of his madness was born his wisdom. . . . The great King who has known all splendours, all the richness of life, and their true worth, comforts the destitute—him from whom even the sight of the world has been taken:

Thou must be patient: we came crying hither:
 Thou know'st the first time that we smell the ayre
 We wail and cry. I will preache to thee: Mark . . .
 When we are borne we crie that we are come
 To this great stage of fools.

“Are not all things generated out of their opposites?” Patience from madness, the richness of the spirit from the destitution of the body.

Further, re: The Tempest (Milton Luce): He [Shakespeare] condemns the doctrine which would make knowledge an end rather than a means. . . . Whatever tends to sunder us from our human relationships and responsibilities must be wrong . . . Therefore he tells us that knowledge may be power, but a power that calls for a most careful discretion: “It is excellent / to have a giant’s strength; but it is tyrannous / To use it like a giant. (M for M II,ii,108) Accordingly at the close of the play Prospero’s knowledge has become the wiser power that seeks ever to disclaim itself, is exercised only for the general good, and will even be laid aside if it can subserve that good no longer.

Hazlitt, speaking of Caliban: Vulgarity is not natural coarseness, but conventional coarseness, learnt from others, contrary to, or without an entire conformity of natural power and disposition; as fashion is the common-place affectation of what is elegant and refined without any feeling of the essence of it.

Received from R.W.H.: “I not only received the essays but have read them all and found them very well done. But my ignorance of Plato and Aquinas and lack of enthusiasm for dialogs for the purpose of exposition leave me a poor judge. I put Henry II and the Meditations at the top; and I would like to see you try some unfootnoted, unstudded-with-quotations exposition in a warmer manner, that is, addressed less to the professor and lecturer and more to the thinking layman. More anon . . . I heartily approve your decision. I go right along with your father. Your analysis of Amherst is shrewd and accurate. The percentage of serious students in most of our colleges is lamentably small. Everything I have heard in recent years about Haverford, near which I once lived, leads me to believe that you will find there the scholastic atmosphere you seek. I am very happy about it, and you know how strongly I hope you will find what you want. I am sure you will. I’ll see you in June.”

FIRE AND ICE

Some say the world will end in fire,
 Some say in ice.

From what I’ve tasted of desire
 I hold with those who favor fire.

But if it had to perish twice
 I think I know enough of hate
 To say that for destruction ice
 Is also great
 And would suffice.

—R. F. (from memory)

The end of “Birches” is a fresh statement of the mystical experience, coupled with a hearty avowal that this world isn’t at all bad, and need not be abandoned completely in the mystical flight:

I’d like to get away from earth awhile
 And then come back to it and begin over.
 May no fate willfully misunderstand me
 And half grant what I wish and snatch me away
 Not to return. Earth’s the right place for love:
 I don’t know where it’s likely to go better.
 I’d like to go by climbing a birch tree,
 And climb black branches up a snow-white trunk
 Toward heaven, till the tree could bear no more,
 But dipped its top and set me down again.
 That would be good both going and coming back.
 One could do worse than be a swinger of birches.

Youth and Age—a—euthanasia. — I must stop it!

Whitman's mystical elegy:

Swiftly arose and spread around me the peace and knowledge that pass all the argument of the earth,
 And I know that the hand of God is the promise of my own,
 And I know that the spirit of God is the brother of my own,
 And that all the men ever born are also my brothers, and the women my sisters and lovers,
 And that a kelson of the creation is love . . .

Stanza 16 of "Song of Myself" reveals Whitman the true Artist—i.e., a man with the catholic tastes of a Shakespeare, a man without antipathies, and therefore no moralist.

"I am of old and young, of the foolish as much as the wise,
 Regardless of others, ever regardful of others,
 Maternal as well as paternal, a child as well as a man, Stuff'd with the stuff that is course and stuff'd with the stuff that is fine,
 One of the Nation of many nations, the smallest the same and the largest the same,
 A Southerner soon as a Northerner, a planter nonchalant and hospitable down by the Oconee I live,
 A Yankee bound my own way ready for trade, my joints the limberest joints on earth and the sternest joints on earth,
 A Kentuckian walking the value of the Elkhorn in my deer-skin leggings, a Louisianaian or Georgian,
 A boatman over lakes or bays or along coasts, a Hoosier, Badger, Buckeye;
 At home on Kanadian snow-shoes or up in the bush, or with fishermen off Newfoundland,
 At home in the fleet of ice-boats, sailing with the rest and talking,
 At home on the hills of Vermont or in the woods of Maine, or the Texan ranch,
 Comrade of Californians, comrade of free North-Westerners (loving their big proportions),
 Comrade of raftsmen and coalmen, comrade of all who shake hands and welcome to drink and meat,
 A learner with the simplest, a teacher of the thoughtfullest,

A novice beginning yet experient of myriads of seasons,
 Of every hue and caste am I, of every rank and religion,
 A farmer, mechanic, artist, gentleman, sailor, quaker,
 Prisoner, fancy-man, rowdy, lawyer, physician, priest.

More Whitman:

31

I believe a leaf of grass is no less than the journey-work of the stars,
 And the pismire is equally perfect, and a grain of sand, and the egg of the wren,
 And the tree-toad is a chief-d'oeuvre for the highest,
 And the running blackberry would adorn the parlors of heaven,
 And the narrowest hinge in my hand puts to scorn all machinery,
 And the cow crunching with depress'd head surpasses any statue,
 And a mouse is miracle enough to stagger sextillions of infidels . . .

I think I could turn and live with animals, they're so placid and self-contained,
 I stand and look at them long and long.
 They do not sweat and whine about their condition,
 They do not lie awake in the dark and weep for their sins,
 They do not make me sick discussing their duty to God,
 Not one dissatisfied, not one is demented with the mania of owning things,
 Not one kneels to another, nor to his kind that lived thousands of years ago,
 Not one is respectable or unhappy over the whole earth.

Thoreau: "To be a philosopher is not merely to have subtle thoughts, not even to found a school, but so to love wisdom as to live according to its dictates, a life of simplicity, independence, magnanimity and trust. It is to solve some of the problems of life, not only theoretically, but practically. . . . When he has obtained those things that are necessary to life, there is another alternative than to obtain the superfluities; and that is, to adventure on life now, his vacation from humbler toil having commenced.”

Stopped at Deerfield. Mr. Boyden wants MacLeish, himself, and me to talk over the decision next month. I am to spend two or three days with him and at MacLeish's place.

Hatch wasn't in, but from what Mrs. Hatch reports, he was delighted at the thought of my going to Haverford.

Ah . . . Brant Lake. . . As I look out through the window, white needles with green umbrella tops sway with the eternal motion of the immovable. These stately birches rival the accomplished dancer as he pirouettes; and they nod their heads in a manner that I imagine only Socrates, among humans, could equal for philosophic calm and assurance.

Doris Bibby married Jack Cronin—the event of the year. But there's more to it: a veritable Romeo and Juliet story; the Bibbys and the Cronins have been like the Capulets and Montagues, only sans violence. But the proposal angered Tom Bibby and he refused to give the bride away, turning, not to the sword in order to externalize, but to the bottle, with which modern society has largely supplanted the barbarous practices of old. Relations pleaded that for the sake of the girl he relent, and he did. But at the ceremony, just as father and daughter were to walk the aisle, father walked out the door instead. But Jack got Jill anyway.

Trapper John Norton

Spent Friday night with Kitty Barton and a neighbor, Bernard McCarthy, who lives on Route 8 out of Riverside toward Utica. We talked farm life and country vs. city until midnight. Kitty's got no electricity, no running water—and loves it. Their six colts have kept them busy. She lives better now on $25 a week than years ago in a small town when Red made $125. Farmer McCarthy tries to be as self-sufficient as possible without making a fetish out of it. He sells no farm produce except lumber, his sole means of cash income. He has been in all the States, in Europe, and Asia, but retains his primary allegiance to the Adirondacks and to the non-commercialized life. His father is 87 and in perfect health and spirits—no gall bladder or ulcers in the mountains.

Kitty says the local people are extremely reluctant to accept outsiders at first, because they suspect that the newcomers will be out to cheat them. But Kitty found that after she allowed herself to be cheated, and did not complain but instead told farmer so-and-so that he had taught her a valuable lesson that she would not forget, she and Red were accepted as brothers. And up here brotherly love is really practical and is the basis of the economy, for when one man has special or pressing work to be done, all the neighbors come to help and he is expected to reciprocate. Mac walks ½ hour through the woods to milk Kitty's cow when Red is gone.

Mr. Hatch on my Social Sciences 2 essay, and on ME: "My objections to the papers you have done are that they seem to be without style, written sort of in vacuo, so to speak, by the light of the late burning student lamp. I would like to see evidence of Bien. And I would like him to retain and develop his sense of humor and be easy and agreeable, even if knowing, and not quite so serious and well-read. . . . In due time report to me on the Haverford business. Let fancy and imagination have some play in your mind; be not of all seriousness made."

This work is as yet too much for me. For about five hours of actual working, John and I find it necessary to sleep ten hours each night; and then, like just now, after meals we find it no trouble sleeping again for another hour.

Mr. Boyden wants me to come down as soon as possible. This is going to be difficult. MacLeish is willing to partake, according to the Head.

The little wild flowers here are superb. I followed a fly in his pollen-collecting chores. His coloring in the sun blended with the flowers perfectly. We filled in a hole in the tennis court, a chipmunk's hole. He, rightfully indignant at this trespass, dug out his home once more as soon as we had turned our backs; but we, forgetful of the Frostian maxim "need before play," filled it up again.

This robin I encountered the other day was very interesting. It persisted in flying full force against the opened, but screened, windows, denting the screen with its beak, but suffering a terrible shake-up each time. I thought, as I stood in the doorway, that these birds just don't see very well, or that the poor thing had flown into the bunk and, considering itself trapped, was hysterically attempting to free itself. But as I stepped into the bunk to get a better view, the bird unhesitatingly flew right out the open doorway. It knew its way right well, for, as I now discovered, it had been building its nest on one of the shelves (not knowing of course that this shelf would soon be the nesting place of some toothbrush and comic book) until I appeared in the doorway, at which time it began to try to hack away at an exit for fear of being captured. And they say that the will to live and to give suck is not the primary instinct!

Saw Bobby Hayes mowing his lawn. Have not seen Bobby Hill yet. Freddy and Jerry Parker are two little birds, as Fred says. He might send them to camp. All four Parkers combine to make a delightful family. The Hayes boy is just like his father: a little queer. Perhaps these two are simply too smart for their surroundings, and can compensate only by a pitiful kind of unsociability. But I wonder. Ed says, "You meet the nicest people around here!" in his sarcastic way. I believe he sees through most everybody's exterior (What a field day he'd have at Harvard) and, seeing most often very little within, does not waste his time even being civil to these people. His is he opposite extreme to the tea-party philosophy, and of the two I'd take his without hesitation.

Perhaps I could start a New England type academy here, taking both day students and boarders. That would be great fun. Or even teach in the Horicon school. Must see Mr. Doyle—about the future of course. Two more years of book-larnin' and activity will have to be endured, or will they?

I hiked along the trail marked out years ago by Ed Hayes, starting just below Scripture's and going, supposedly, to Lily Pond. It is not actually a trail at all, but merely a series of white circles painted on the forest trees. I'm sure no one has been over it in years. After walking for about two hours I came to a tree with a "T" instead of a circle, and could find no markers beyond. So I was forced to return. I encountered two brooks and three clearings, but otherwise the trip was rather drab, the predominant sight being decayed or decaying trees.

Ed Hayes has been stopping each night before going home to pick the red rambling roses that are just below "our" house. This man is certainly not insensitive to beauty.

This morning I laid some sod, and helped unload a shipment of 350 cases of groceries. Then I hiked after lunch, taking a penknife and a compass, both of which I used.

Watched some swallows while moving trunks this morning. They are blue above and brownish-orange-yellow below, very pretty, with a forked tail. They build their nests of mud and twigs usually in eaves or on rafters. These were on the lighting fixtures of the clubhouse. The male and female chase each other and alternate in bringing food to the young. I understand that in the winter these birds fly to South America.

The last of my term marks arrived. Record them for this term: Full courses: English 123 (Shakespeare) A minus; English 7 (American literature) B. Half courses: History 61a (American history) B+; History 61b B minus; Government 124 (Constitutional Law) B; History of Religions 101b B. How utterly ridiculous that I should get such good marks this year. Dean's List and no lectures—pretty incongruous!

John and I went to church this Sabbath morning—Wesleyan Methodist in Horicon. The building is so small and the congregation so intimate that one could not help but feel a sense of fellowship; yet the service inspired me little. It was rigorous to a Puritanical degree: a hymn or two, some announcements, a prayer, collection, sermon, and benediction. And no organ, just a piano. Rev. Jock explained that he worked in a creamery until he was converted, after which time the love of God constrained him to preach the Word. (Converted in a Salvation Army encampment.) The sermon was strict exegesis throughout, skillfully done, but of course suffering from what I would term self-imposed limitations. The pastor has no pretensions: he is not a learned man, but a humble one before his God. His grammar and diction are often broken or incorrect, but his heart is sound and firm in the faith. Bobby Hill and I exchanged greetings. He looked very uncomfortable in his Sunday School best.

Looked at Heer's development this afternoon, but it is not worth further consideration: strictly tourist, summer resident.

Also visited Schonberg's new home. This too was disappointing to me. Although it is solid enough, as far as taste is concerned I found it somewhat hideous. I think this whole venture is a lesson in how not to go about building a country home.

Hans and Amand came today and lost no time setting down to work. 38 people for dinner. Somehow the atmosphere is stifling. I am about ready to go home, and wish I could. John feels the same way. Hilton and Rudd drive one luney. Only the Point of Pines chef and his family seem to be fine people.

Hans tells me some very interesting things, especially if they be true! Viz.: that practically all mass-produced food is so treated that it is either dangerous to eat, or else loses much of its nutritive value. He traces the great incidence of sickness and feebleness to this. For instance, compare the old home-baked brown bread with the white bread of the 1950 markets. Then everything is treated to improve its appearance and lasting quality. Prunes and figs are sulfured, grapes, etc. are coated with all kinds of sprays, oranges are doctored up, apples are sprayed half a dozen times and invariably picked before they are ripe, milk loses all the good cream and butterfat during pasteurization, store meats are full of syringe-injected preservatives. This is certainly a vital argument for growing one's own foodstuffs and raising one's own cattle on a farm.

Horicon Central graduated four last night. Jim Cronin, president. Elton Ross's son was salutatorian—whatever-you-call-it. But Cronin was valedictorian and better. All were better than the guest speaker, an overblown egotistical ignoramus from Sienna College where he "teaches" (Sienna: Catholic school). This man told jokes and clowned round on the platform. Hardly J. Edgar Park! A Mr. Allen, new this year, proved what enthusiasm and talent can do, for he produced out of last year's fairly miserable band a successor that I must say deserves credit. And today he accomplished the feat of having musically ignorant ten-year-olds sing Humperdinck in harmony, with pleasing results.

Jerry Parker got his attendance award this time, and it wasn't last year's forgotten one because Jerry didn't miss a day all this year either. But he managed to get sick each vacation, which I think is cheating.

Met Arthur Hofstrader (? no, this is Charlie) Welfogel ?? something, from Pilgrim Camp. He tells me how the Pentecostals brought a family of four Yugoslav DPs, all brothers and sisters, over here and placed them with a Brant Lake family that has six children of its own. When I think of these parents (Sailor, their name) of six, taking four more, I wonder at my family's inaction. Man is born in sin.

We met and chatted with Mr. Doyle, principal of the school, who assured us that one gets maximum satisfaction from teaching in this environment. He declared an especial liking for the type of child found in these parts and remarked that all four of this graduating class—Cronin, Ross, McClure, and Miss Wilson—are of above average intelligence.

Mrs. Pohl tipped John $2 for waiting on table. He feels terrible. I suggest he give it to the Methodist collection.

Tonight I feel like a murderer. After having failed to convince our tennis court groundhog to move, we are forced to exterminate him. I: the executioner.

Albany and back this morning. Lunch drive to Kennedy's. Riverside to BLC via horse (20 miles) with Red Barden, Mac McCarthy, his niece, and Larry Ten Eyck. I am more and more decided to live up here. Red tells me of a neighbor of his who was an editor of Reader's Digest, and who gave it up for farm life. He now writes for a Warrensburg paper and loves it.

Bobby Hill tells me that the reason he didn't like camp was that he could never be alone, but always was forced to do what the group was doing. This is a most valid complaint.

Bob McDougal returned my letter. He left Princeton because of an atmosphere of New York sophistication, and the general artificiality. And he does not regret the change, for Oberlin is just right for him. This is all very nice to hear. Also, that he is still destined for the ministry.

Haverford College has accepted me, my status to be determined at a later date.

Red Barden's ancestors settled Western Canada and his relatives are wealthy cattle people there. His father was Canadian of Irish stock, and his mother half-Indian. He tells me that the McCarthys were the original settlers in this section of the Adirondacks. Mac still has the deeds to the King's land grants. According to Irish custom, Mac's father, being the oldest of several sons, worked the farm so that his brothers could go to college. One is now a lawyer and the other a real estate man, and both are miserable. At 87, Mac's father still saws his quota of wood. Mac himself is fabulous. He can do anything, including knit his own socks. He will drop his own work at an instant if someone asks him for help, and when the lumbermen are out of work they stay with Mac, who feeds them and sleeps them. And he makes less than $1000 a year. He learned how to do Indian bead-work strangely enough from an Indian. Now whenever he makes a belt for anyone he is sure to include his name in the work, for according to old Irish lore, it is bad luck for the recipient of a gift to pass that gift on to someone else, and the name makes this rather unfeasible. . . . And so it goes.

MacLeish: "Having discovered as much as you already have about Harvard, you stand a better chance staying there for the next two years than by going to Haverford, where you will have to repeat the process of orientation." No English M. MacLeish has noted the lack of articulation in the Harvard product. He could not get lively discussions going. . . . MacLeish's house atop the hill at Conway; uphill farm and down dale. Boyden's degeneracy. Growing old. Ostentation—e.g., oak and maple chairs. Getting out of the mess: Hatch. MacLeish's relaxed and magnificently intoned voice. The ease of his vocabulary. Plethora. His smooth and gracious manner. “Well, my boy . . .” His frankness: “At first I thought you were one of those people who want other people to provide the interest you lack, but I now see that this is not the case.” MacLeish’s attempt to introduce the various disciplines to one another in his essay course (now sadly lamented). Each student to use material from his particular specialty, the criterion of the essay’s excellence being the facility with which it conveys the author’s knowledge and enthusiasm in his own particular field.

Yesterday I learned that Jules Girdein, rather than declare himself bankrupt, committed suicide.

This Sabbath morning I read this in War and Peace:

“. . . A slur on my name? A misfortune for life? Oh, that’s nonsense,” he thought. “The slur on my name and honor—that’s all apart from myself.”

“Louis XVI was executed because they said he was dishonorable and a criminal” came into Pierre’s head, “and from their point of view they were right, as were those too who canonized him and died a martyr’s death for his sake. Then Robespierre was beheaded for being a despot. Who is right and who is wrong? No one! But if you are alive—live: tomorrow you'll die as I might have died an hour ago. And is it worth tormenting oneself, when one has only a moment of life in comparison with eternity?" Pierre, Book IV, chapter 6.

"During the first weeks of his stay in Petersburg, Prince Andrew felt the whole trend of thought he had formed during his life of seclusion quite overshadowed by the trifling cares that engrossed him in that city." (Book VI, chapter 2)

"We often think that by removing all the difficulties of our life we shall more quickly reach our aim, but on the contrary, my dear sir, it is only in the midst of worldly cares that we can attain our three chief aims: (1) self-knowledge, for man can only know himself by comparison, (2) self-perfecting, which can only be attained by conflict, and (3) the attainment of the chief virtue, love of death. Only the vicissitudes of life can show us its vanity and develop our innate love of death or of rebirth to a new life." Spoken by Joseph Alexeevich Bazdeev, in War and Peace, Book VI, chapter 3.

Dad and Mother, even Uncle Abe, have sent discouraging letters regarding Mac's farm. What am I to do? Jules's suicide, the insight in War and Peace, Russell West's plans—everything increases my desire (my passion?) to own this land. Grandma will see it tomorrow. If she sends a favorable report perhaps Dad will relent.

Haverford

The first sunny day here at Haverford. An Indian summer day, hazy and close (some say from the smoke of the great Canadian fire), but reassuring nevertheless, and redolent of the crisp fine infecting pinpricks of a New England or Riparius autumn morn.

I have experienced a week of classes, two Collections, one Quaker meeting, some new friends and acquaintances, but without any feeling of the meaningfulness of these things. I am in the calm after the storm, free of mind, healthy and vigorous of body, and wary of anything that would injure this state. I feel a bit proud, I surmise, and very old and worldly, for I can say that some of life's battles have already been fought, and that at the age of twenty and one-half I am experienced and learned in affairs of body and spirit. The rejection of Harvard, the great mystical revelation and knowledge through it that God is love, the acquisition of Triple Echo and the satisfaction in this acquisition of having completed a full circle of the rational process—i.e., the discovery and realization of a problem, the solution thought out abstractly and objectively, and finally the conversion of the abstract conclusion, via an exercise of the will and volition, into reality (Haverford and the farm)—leaves one optimistic and in a sense proud, proud that those strange electrical feelings in the brain can bring about such changes. And the optimism involves All, for the thinker now realizes his participation in the great Spirit of Everything, a consistent Spirit that, in allowing him to do such wonders, must surely not begrudge other men the same privilege and ability.

And so the world is transformed, as it was on that night in Cambridge, from a dim gloomy collection of conflicting self-centered atomistic Wills, into one grand comprehensive Spirit, governing all for the best, and integrating the (apparently senseless) activities of individual men.

I am first coming to realize all this, and yet I look to the future with a certain anxiety and dread. Certainly this cannot be the culmination, the be-all and end-all of life! Will not the rational circle be traveled again? Will not new experience create new doubts? Must not this glee and joy and Oneness that I feel meet trials in the courts of society?

Certainly a social program must come of it all. To glory in these events in the solitude and peace of Riparius would be to become a fiend. No, action on the social front will come as action on the individual front has come. And it will involve repetitions of this antithetical progression of doubt and reassurance, searching and knowledge, misery and happiness. The intensity and value of life must then be measured by the frequency and number of these stages; so that I am secretly already hoping for the next. Prolonged content of the spiritual sort brings upon itself spiritual lethargy; all things give way to their opposites.

This sense of dedication will come, I believe, but I am not yet ready for it. For I see the old self creeping under my own legs at times, so that (for instance) in my weaker moments I visualize an English-type country manor at Riparius, with magnificent gardens, etc., instead of the utter simplicity that I know (and yet will not fully believe) is requisite for the Better Life, that of the Spirit, of contemplation and study, and of vigorous social action resulting from this life. (Or perhaps the social action is the Life and these other things the preparation for it. This is a question of transcendent importance!)

Already I am inclined toward the latter alternative, and feel that one reason that so much action today is misdirected or self-consuming is because of a lack of preparation for such action, a lack of preparation for Life itself; and by preparation I do not intend to include formal classroom education, for the best that this can do is to act as the first guide, stimulus, or aid to one's own efforts toward self-preparation. No, this preparation involves the acquisition of knowledge of Life and of the Spirit that is the substance and energizing factor of Life; it involves Living; living basically and fully so that what primordial man experienced our twentieth-century apprentice experiences likewise and as well, and what great thinkers and teachers thought our apprentice thinks as vividly and passionately, and does not merely learn about what they thought. This is why man in his apprenticeship to Life must be a play-actor, and must ignore the moralist who screeches "Be thyself, do not imitate!" We must imitate; we must become others in order that we may incorporate the thought and being of these others, and through them all, of the Great Spirit, into ourselves. He who does this is the civilized man; he who does not is the barbarian, for he starts in Life where the most primitive head-hunter started, and he ends no more advanced (unless he stops somewhere and goes through the apprenticeship) than this his despised and readily forgotten ancestor. But one remark must be added to this, and that is: Whereas our prehistoric barbarian hunted heads, there being a limit to the number of heads he could secure, that limit set not only by his physical makeup but also by his desire, our modern barbarian does not hunt heads, but starts wars, racial purges, sweatshops, and the like. And his power is fiftyfold that of his counterpart and ancestor, nor is his desire ever satisfied, for he is now "necessitated" not only to meet his own requirements for food and shelter, but to satisfy society that he should be an esteemed and valued member of it, which esteem, as in days of yore, is still unfortunately measured according to the number of heads he can render useless to their owners.

So play the play-actor, I say; become, even for a day, Jesus on the Mount, Socrates drinking the hemlock, Moses on Sinai; and (no less important) become a Russian serf mowing his field of rye, or an American pioneer building his cabin of logs and mud. Still less fear to play the criminal in his cell and about to be hanged; or the martyr on the pyre.

And then, become thyself. And it will be a self rich in the knowledge of why and how and wherefore, a self resplendent in a complex of personalities, beliefs, thoughts, yet all harmonized and inter-activating, and expressed in You; just as the great complex of Yous, each with its great complex of experiences, personalities, and passions, is harmonized in the one sublime Him.

Had the very pleasant feeling today of knowing that I had thought out by myself last year what turned out to be practically the whole of today's lecture by Hocking—on the criticism of Marx.

Jacques Barzun in Life Magazine:

"Now the educated man as we have known him in the past has roots in an entirely different soil and breathes a different air. He is a product of leisure and independence, of established institutions and quiet maturing. His destination is a society of his own kind, in which his role is private and his superiority welcome. He does contribute to others' enjoyment of life by sharing with them the pleasures of conversation and friendship and spoken wisdom, but the enrichment of his own mind is his chief concern. He can attend to this, not only because he has the time and the means but also because he does not have to justify his existence nor to issue progress reports on his life-long 'individual project.' Whatever he does to earn fame or money, from winning battles to farming estates, he is not so bedeviled by it that he lacks time to engage in the fundamental activities of the educated, which are: to read, write, talk and listen.

"It staggers the imagination to conceive what would happen to mankind in its present state if it were left to its own resources like our forefathers, in caves without canasta and tents without television.

"For some few mavericks, however, there is no alternative to despair or boredom except the pleasure of making one's life a means to one's education. Young men and women continue to be born with an insatiable desire to know, and among those, not all are bent on knowing the things that are negotiable. These marked souls manage somehow, in spite of all they see around them, to make themselves into educated persons. They show a remarkable power to survive unfavorable environments, such as advertising agencies, movie studios, and teachers' colleges. But the oddest thing about them is that without any clear guidance from society at large, and in the teeth of all the disturbing forces of the day, they all develop very much the same interests and rediscover for themselves the original humanities. Literature, philosophy, and the arts, religion, political theory and history become the stapes on which they feed their minds. And with sleight variations in diet expressive of different temperaments, they ultimately come into possession of the common knowledge and the common tongue. . . .

"Alone though they may be much of the time, they are not so much to be pitied as the sociable creatures who must have 'people around' or a movie to go to. For the educated person has appropriated so much of other men's minds that he can live on his store like the camel on his reservoir. Everything can become grist to his mill, including his own misery, if he is miserable, for by association with what he knows everything has echoes and meanings and suggestions ad infinitum. This is in fact the test and the use of a man's education, that he finds pleasure in the exercise of his mind.

"Pascal once said that all the trouble in the world was due to the fact that man could not sit still in a room. He must hunt, flit, gamble, chatter. That is man's destiny and it is not to be quarreled with, but the educated man has through the ages found a way to convert passionate activity into a silent and motionless pleasure. He can sit in a room and not perish."

Hocking told of a time in Bombay when a Swami visited him, announcing that he had come to instruct the American professor in religion. After explaining the Hindu way to "salvation," the Swami was asked this question: "Have you achieved salvation?" He was silent, and would not answer. Afterwards, the Indian interpreter explained the Swami's silence. "If he had said 'Yes,' he would have been boasting, and calling attention to his own achievement, and thus to his own self, which, at salvation, ceases to exist; and if he had said 'No,' he might have been telling an untruth!"

I have been nourishing myself with Tolstoy (extra-curricular).

Haverford

Meeting today was fine: all speakers reinforced one theme, freeing oneself from material desire. Freedom from want is one thing, says Hocking, but freedom from wanting quite another. . . . He who shall lose his life shall save it. Current political trends indicate that spiritual freedom is no longer the prime consideration, but a freedom to earn money and increase one's material possessions. This, at best, is a very poor species of freedom; most often it is an instrument for enslavement.

Quakers and others are being jailed in 1950 for preaching and practicing the first kind of freedom: freedom of spiritual and intellectual development.

I thought, during this Meeting, of my own spiritual progress, and how far it has yet to go. The old desires come up every day. I miss the (useless) petty diversion that harassed me so at Harvard; I dream of the farm (in my unguarded moments) as a producer of wealth, and the future sight of an English-like manor estate, whereas it must be a protest against all these things, and provide a means whereby they may be disregarded or at least reduced to a minimum.

What hope is there for the future when immediately after this Meeting the student body's prime interest is in whether or not the Rhinies are wearing the proscribed black socks! This hurts to the point where it is nauseating.

Campus Day yesterday. I helped build a new bridge across the creek. A wonderfully successful and "constructive" tradition.

My weekend at home was a mixture of pleasure and sorrow. On the pleasurable side, the increased realization of the solidity and integrity of our family, and the joy of being part of it; on the other side, Dad's eyes. He apparently has a hemorrhage in one, which, I understand, is extremely serious. But I was heartened by the signs that seem to show that if blindness comes Dad will be prepared emotionally and psychologically, as well as economically. This is really all that matters. We have no choice as to what happens to us in life, but we most certainly do as to what attitude we shall take toward these happenings. And with the right attitude many misfortunes will cease to appear so. Gloucester: "I stumbled when I saw. . . . I see feelingly." The great paradox: that when we lose we gain, and when we gain we lose. Perhaps this truth is the essence of the Gospels.

Professor Hocking gave a particularly fine analysis of the teachings of Jesus. The great insight of Christianity is the recognition of a chain reaction of forgiveness. It is this forgiveness cycle that makes possible the impossible and anti-moral invocations of the Sermon on the Mount, such as love thine enemy, be ye therefore perfect, etc. For forgiveness creates a new spirit in the person who is forgiven. Christianity is a moral of creativity, not of justice or of purity. This new spirit enables the person who has been forgiven to love his enemies—i.e., to likewise forgive. And so the chain reaction continues; forgiveness is contagious. The reaction started, of course, because God so loved the world that He sent His only begotten Son. God suffered for our sins, and forgave those who repented and followed Him. And forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us.

In my essay I tried to express what is (to me) the essence of religion—union with the Infinite, thou shalt love the Lord,—resulting in “rebirth” and universal Love. This is contrasted to the moralistic approach, the desire for right living, conceived as a cosmic demand, which seems to me to be at best a pragmatic religion, which must suffer therefore from the well known defects of the pragmatic faith.

Read Aeschylus’s Agamemnon. Magnificent. The pathos and despair and disillusionment are reinforced by every skill the writer can muster. And such skill he has: “Why tell the woes of winter, when the birds / Lay stark and stiff, so stern was Ida’s snow?” Could any other expression send such a cold shiver throughout the body, convey the woes of winter with such completeness and vividness, and in two lines? The hymn to Zeus is justly famous:

Zeus—if to the Unknown
 That name of many names seem good—
 Zeus, upon Thee I call
 Thro’ the mind’s every road
 I passed, but vain are all,
 Save that which names Thee Zeus, the Highest One,
 Were it but mine to cast away the load
 The weary load, that weighs my spirit down.

Mal Brown, Dick Sundry, John Hitchcock dislike Haverford, and I think their complaint is well founded. Here, one floats around on his own individual cloud, blown this way and that at the whim of the breeze. And all the little clouds go in different directions. The academic work is presented to the student more than adequately, and yet the fact that it—the whole of life here—is as if surrounded by a vacuum, detracts from the advantages of having excellent professors, facilities for uninterrupted study, etc. Nothing is delectable to the student unless he needs to fight to get it, to extract it, in its clarity, out of a mass of seeming chaos. In this process, the student learns to choose, and to place first things first. My complaint about Harvard was that it offered too much, that the complexity and immensity vitiated the individual parts of which it was made, so that, even immersed in such an ocean, the student could not drink. But perhaps it was my error not to realize that this was a challenge, a challenge to select certain things and completely neglect others, however hard that may have been.

One thing is sure: there is no vitality here, no dynamic quality. People do not get intellectually excited, or even excited over football games. There is no dinner-table education; there is hardly dinner table conversation. And yet, there is still the fact that one can immerse himself in books and become oblivious to the world. I thought that this was what I wanted. But, as Toynbee so well says, I am seeing that this “method of study makes one inclined to think of life in terms of books instead of vice versa. The opposite method, which is the Greek line of approach [the first being the Rabbinical], is to study books not just for their own sake, but also because they are the key to the life of the people who wrote them.”

I have been asked to write a letter of “advice” to one Conrad Kaplowitz, whose best friend here at Haverford, Roger Euster, has explained how he (Kaplowitz) was not admitted to Harvard last September, though assured of admittance next year, and how in the interim he is attending Colgate. Now he is not quite sure that he wants to go through with his original plans, for he is facing the problem of small versus big colleges, the alternation being Harvard and Haverford. I really don’t know how I can vote for either one wholeheartedly.

Labron Shuman also has the Sophomore blues. It seems almost universal.

I can of mine own self do nothing: as I hear, I judge: and my judgment is just, because I seek not mine own will, but the will of the Father which hath sent me. —John 5.30

How can ye believe, which receive honor one of another, and seek not the honor that cometh from God only? —John 5.44

Frank Flannery and I took in the 100 masterpieces at the Philadelphia Art Museum. Beautiful Renoirs. Flannery transferred from Holy Cross. At the age of 19, he has already been through a nervous breakdown, etc. A genius-brother committed suicide. Father died. Mother a narrow-minded Catholic. A tale of woe. He is very perceptive, very serious. He lacks a sense of humor, the most necessary of all qualities, the saving remnant of an otherwise disintegrated personality.

To you, Tom Wood, I chant my hymn of praise
 For deeds of virtue and devotion, tact
 Supreme, a taste unquestioned: To the bread,
 So dry, so plain you are the mayonnaise,

And to the uninitiate, the sorry
 Tribe—vestless, tieless barbarians all—
 The gentle goddess Athene, in male disguise
 Are you, with culture, poise, propriety

Come, the finer points of etiquette,
 The part of hair, the twist of tie to teach.
 Your only mission is that they may learn
 How and where to go, for what to reach.

For femmes délicieux, the registrar
 Of that fair college, dear Bryn Mawr
 Holds not a candle to our Tom Wood
 For juicy descriptions of what is good.

Mimi Tripletoe nor Fifi Grew
 Know hardly a jot of what is true
 Until told by one who knows more than he should, Haverford's goddess, our Tom Wood.

For marriage, love, sexual perversion,
 Naught but one acceptable version:
 Whose could it be, do you suppose—
 Why Wood's, of course, the man who knows.

So is it amiss that I should sing my song
 To thee, the director of my destiny?

Sound out, oh strains of praise, and rightly honor the Goddess of form, Tom Wood, who does no wrong.

We went to Swarthmore to hear Bertrand Russell read a paper on neutral monism. Not very convincing I must say, but with further developments in physics, etc., his theory may take on better form. Russell objects, of course, to the dualism of mind and matter, and likewise to the theories that mind is really matter, or matter really mind. Both are one and the same: a series of groups of events in experience and the apparent form—whether a thing appear matter-like or mind-like—depends on the arrangement of that series. Russell prefaced these conclusions with a recitation of the problem as conceived by Descartes and others, and with a methodical breaking down of Descartes' basic contribution, cogito ergo sum.

Hocking gave my paper an A+ and an oral "well-done." We shall have a chance to talk with him this week.

An example of "telepathy" that has happened before to me, and happened tonight. At precisely the instant I thought of putting in a call home, I received a call from home! I am not past believing in spiritual communion. This has happened too often to be coincidental.

Laci and Pete Flemming came to Princeton last Saturday, where I saw them. I think I shall journey to Cambridge this weekend. Will see people and buy books.

Professor Hocking and I chatted this afternoon for an hour; no one else appeared at his long-awaited open house, which gives a fairly accurate indication of how much the latter-day student desires to be educated. At close range, I really for the first time became aware that Hocking is very very old. He sits in his armchair like a serene Buddha, never making a bodily movement, or adjusting his position in the slightest particular. Yet his mind has not lost its agility as has the body, although there is evidence in it of the same serenity and desire for peace. Mrs. Hocking on the other hand is perhaps on the verge of dotage. It is marvelous to see how this wise old philosopher humors her. The two seem to me to embody the most poetical relationship of two brave souls who have very little else but each other, and know it.

We discussed Harvard. Hocking told of how he felt the encroachments of the University upon the College, with a subsequent squelching of real liberal non-professionalized courses; and how he fought this encroachment. He commented on the volume of work required at Harvard, especially in the law school—it represents the American fetish for bigness, for quantity at the expense of quality. Schopenhauer's education was of an entirely different sort. When he attended the university, he was told to select two great thinkers and to get to know and understand them. He chose Plato and Kant. This education produced one of the clearest thinkers and most brilliant stylists that we have had.

Hocking also expressed that to entrust a student's grade, etc. to a section man was downright immoral and unjust; but something that is unavoidable in big universities. Conclusion: big universities must go.

Ideal educational system: that of Holland, where there are no courses and no exams except a final comprehensive for the degree, which the student takes whenever he feels prepared. Whether or not this would work here with the level of maturity of our college students as it is, is entirely another question.

Haverford

I came across the following in a back copy of the Haverford News: part of an address by Rufus Jones to the Freshmen of 1916, and well worth recording here:

"I hope that this year may bring out the deepest that is in us. . . . There are three concerns in the busy present-day college life which we should all keep before us: the care, development, and culture of our minds, the care and training of our bodies, and the care, development and endowment of our souls with power.

"The motto of an old Oxford Man: 'Be a whole man to the one thing you are doing now,' will be of great help in striving for these ideals. As for the first, the Haverford idea is not expressed by the sentiment that 'Tis better to have come and loafed than never to have come at all,' or by the admonition 'Don't let your studies interfere with your college education.' One of the greatest things that you will be able to look back upon is that you are a Haverfordian, and that here you have learned to deal accurately with facts, to see the other fellow's point of view, and have acquired magnanimous aims and persistence.

"In the second line we have some big jobs this year. We must beat Swarthmore, we must keep the soccer championship, we must 'lick' Pennsylvania in gym and cricket. It will take the best that is in each one of us.

"The concern for the welfare of our souls, however, is the greatest of all. If you are a whole man to the rest of your work, be one here. No man has reached complete living unless he has dedicated his soul to the highest aims. Until you are kindled, awakened, until the divine has gripped you, you are not working toward the greatest efficacy.

"There are two important aspects of religion, the cultivation of our souls through the appreciation of God, and the cultivation of the spirit of service. However your mind and body may be developed, you have not reached the fullness of manhood unless you appreciate God."

Haverford

The anonymous author {Mal Brown) of last week's "Across the Desk" has raised a controversy to which no thoughtful Haverford student can fail to respond. If Haverford is intellectually sterile, that is very serious indeed, and the causes must be rooted out with great haste; if it is not, we must refute the assertion that it is.

Several things are quite clearly present at Haverford: its "serenity," its so-called lack of spirit, its apparently ineffectual weekly Meeting. And to this list it is probably permissible to add a certain absence of serious discussion—of the give and take of ideas among students—especially at dinner table. Harvard takes great pride in what it calls "breakfast table education." Haverford's table is notoriously non-educational, perhaps because the food here is so much better, perhaps because of the absence of tutors who eat with the student body. The question that one must ask is, "Is there nothing to talk about?" Hardly anyone will dare answer this in the affirmative. Haverford does offer stimulation and inspiration. The fault is in the student for turning a deaf ear to this stimulation.

The presence of this deaf ear is proved in a sense by what happens nowadays to the persons (and they exist) who do not turn the deaf ear. These people are always a small minority because they must be not only intelligent but also brave and religious. These rare souls are driven underground, a very unpleasant place to be. This accounts for the obvious discrepancy implied in the assertion that Haverford is non-intellectual. Haverford is not non-intellectual, nor is it lacking in brave and religious spirits, but its intellectuality is imperceptible because it is underground, introverted. This is a particularly bad state of affairs. On the one hand it deprives those who are potentially alert and inquiring from that added stimulation from their fellows that might actualize their potential; on the other, aside from the impossibility of our small minority acting as a leaven for the rest, it is itself prohibited from realizing to the fullest extent its own potentialities. The introverted, socially unacceptable intellectual is all too prevalent, with his morbid pessimism and desire to retreat into the esoteric for esotericism's sake, into a world where pattern, form, and mechanical considerations overshadow the great moral, religious, artistic, and humanitarian values.

What we must realize is that the intellectual is in a very difficult position during his impressionable and formational years—i.e., while he is at school and college. And when we condemn his morbid introspection we must first consider the fact that perhaps he has been pushed in this direction by the large group of not-so-brave, not-so-religious, and perhaps (although not necessarily) not-so-intelligent people with whom he is forced to live in some sort of harmony.

Good hunting at Starr Book Company last weekend in Cambridge. Renewed acquaintance with Dick Becker, Don Blackmer, Dave Tyack, etc. Laci is unhappy, living the life of a hermit. Dick is well-adjusted and making strides into the mathematical unknown. Harvard is still big, active, and pleasant—but bewildering.

Stopped to see Hatch. He was at the vineyard. Mrs. H. says a new novel is brewing.

Haverford

This evening I overheard someone talking about me—and not at all complimentarily—as the “Harvard intellectual” who wears a jacket and tie, etc. Such things as this hurt very much but, as Aeschylus would say, through suffering comes wisdom. I have a good mind, and it is the cross that I must bear. Perhaps the social non-acceptance is the least of it. What is truly miserable for the intelligent person is his constant meeting up with the fact that his intelligence is limited, that he, of all people, is perhaps one of the stupidest. It takes a good mind to comprehend its own limitations, and the better the mind the greater these limitations seem; thus unhappiness is increased. One cannot help but think that God or whoever conceived of life and human intelligence determined to make it tragic and miserable, that the thing which we esteem the highest and expend most energy in cultivating is the very thing that is most unbearable.

I could not help thinking of Mal Brown in this connection. He has a good mind and he is just now realizing that such possession places him in a separate category in society. This realization hurts him, just as my critic's remarks hurt me, and his response to this hurt is the obvious response: he is attempting to place himself in a society where he will be in the "normal" and not the "special" category. He has not yet come to know, as I have, that this is impossible. He is deluded in his belief that people anywhere else will be more receptive to intellectuality than they are here. His cross is weighing down his chest, but he thinks he can throw it off. He cannot, because it is inside.

We can never hope to feel at home in the crowd. If we retire into ourselves—God forbid!—we are despised as introverts and supercilious rejecters of what other people consider important. "Why doesn't he do such-and-such, as we do, or does he think he's too good to do it?" And if we embody the dynamic, inquisitive, enthusiastic intellectuality that Mal (and I) so admire, then we are despised as enthusiasts, as teachers' pets, busybodies who refuse to conform to the accepted lethargy and blindness of the rest. In a word, we are different, and different we must stay.

Can I make a breastwork of my knowledge,
Roll into a ball the themes of college
And place them o'er my heart—a subtle charm
To fend away and exorcise all harm?

Do bullets have an affinity
For ignorance?    If reality
Is in a book, why can it not Meet the reality of a war?

Why are theories, logical proofs of fact,
Dismiss'd in the passionate heat of act

If theories are real? And how can the hopes,
 The visions of a war-torn age that gropes
 For peace, be forgotten with such ease
 If they be more than the fantasies
 Of unrealistic minds. I ask it!
 But if wars and murder to commit,
 If these be real or true, naught of them
 Shall I see, but with my book and pen
 Shall my own world make, shall close my eye
 To what is real, and love my fantasy.

Tonight the wistful fog settled itself
 Over and through and in-between our buildings,
 Breathing in their substance 'till forms alone—
 Square or gabled prominence of black—
 Remained to break its gray monotony.
 Forms of buildings and trees in a plane of gray:
 Sycamore and gnarled oak, the pylon
 Elm, the greenish pine whose spines defy earth's Yearly call: all on tiptoe stood as though
 To push this shroud up and off, or to rest
 It daintily on their fingertips, whilst
 With archèd back they stretch'd to fullest height.
 Phantom trees, immersed in a wistful sea;
 Black forms aloft, in gray monotony.

Pete Gardner and I have spent the last three weekends together, and all were delightful—the first with his marvelous family at their Cumberland Hill farm, the second at Riparius and climbing Marcy (blizzard made Indian Falls the point of return this time), the third at George School, where we heard a trio of finely competent Bennington College musicians.

Pete visited the Service Committee headquarters today. Two weeks from now he may be in Mexico on a rehabilitation project. I am a perfect fool not to act in the natural and not overly ruminated way Pete does: I am every bit as conscientious in my objection to war as he is—and he is entirely so—yet I seem to have too much of Hamlet in me. I fear to move and act; I think too much on the matter.

One thing is certain. I have lost Hocking and Post. What remains in sum total presents the lowest educational level possible: lectures and passivity. As at Harvard during the second half of last year, music alone lifts the spirit. (I am finally taking lessons again.) At least I do not seem to have the absolute disgust and dislike for Haverford that Harvard received from this her ungrateful son. This school is still extremely pleasant, especially in my friendships. But I am not too sure that it isn't a pleasantness because of a vacuum, a sort of busy idleness. Indeed, I have stopped writing almost entirely—as witness this journal. Life without writing is empty, so very empty; for writing gives concreteness to experience; it is like the precipitation of sulfur in our chemistry experiments—the ingredients are all present in the beaker but it takes an added pinch of something to precipitate precipitously something that you can see, feel, and contemplate. Thus the everyday round fades into meaningless robot-like action unless it is captured and held/seen/felt and contemplated—unless it is written about.

Through everything runs this ogre of the army. I have four months only before this unpleasant form of death. And Dad is no better at all. He will go to that blasted psychiatrist (at $15/hour) for a year or two, and will snap out of this no sooner for it. If anything, his illness will be prolonged. It is sad, sad, sad. When we come to this world of fools, we cry. This world of fools. But why must the fools control the rest?

Haverford

A beautiful and delightful day, a day devoted to the most glorious of the arts: King Music—composing, practicing (Beethoven’s 32 variations, C minor); listening. Climax: concert of sacred music by Haverford and Bryn Mawr glee clubs: Palestrina, Schütz, Bach, Gerald Keenan (a first-rate mass), Gabrieli.

Dad (as was to be expected) was shocked and thrown into the depths of despair by my CO avowal, but Bill Schweitzer helped to quiet and reassure him. Mother seems to be understanding and sympathetic as usual, but neither has the slightest idea about acting on principle and not on expediency. Dad’s illness of course has been a revelation of many things, among them the fact that his cultural inclinations and moral doggedness were all shams. I think that the man simply attempted to go too far in one generation, from poverty, ignorance, and boorishness to suavity, restrained dignity, culture, and intellectual pursuit, completely skipping the intermediate stages (nouveau riche, etc.). All the aristocrats of the past have been proof that it takes a heritage and long line of ancestors progressing toward cultural stability and ease before one can be the true gentleman and not merely the fake actor who seeks culture because it is the “thing to do.” Where does this leave me? Am I over-intellectualized, super-saturated with culture? Perhaps not, but I most assuredly must build the earthy foundation so necessary for flights into the higher regions, and there we have that worker of miracles, that transformer, reformer: the Farm. O Lord, grant that I may spend many happy years in peace there, and that I may be released from the desire for power, position, wealth, and above all, respectability. Strengthen me to live rationally but always subject to Thy mystical and transcendent will, that I may acquire wisdom in Thy ways and in the ways of men, and act accordingly. Strengthen me especially to see through the declaration of conscientious objection that has so lightened my heart. And, dear Ruler, heal my father, breathe unto him understanding and above all fortitude, that he may be born again into a life happy and dedicated. Do so to this good man, for he knew not what he did.

Gleanings from Carlyle, Past and Present:

¶ This successful industry of England, with its plethoric wealth, has as yet made nobody rich; it is an enchanted wealth, and belongs yet to nobody. We might ask, which of us has it enriched? We can spend thousands where we once spent hundreds; but can purchase nothing good with them. In Poor and Rich, instead of noble thrift and plenty, there is idle luxury alternating with mean scarcity and inability. We have sumptuous garnitures for our Life, but have forgotten to live in the middle of them. It is an enchanted wealth; no man of us can yet touch it.

¶ Insurrection usually 'gains' little; usually wastes how much! One of its worst kinds of waste, to say nothing of the rest, is that of irritating and exasperating men against each other, by violence done, which is always rue to be injustice done, for violence does even justice unjustly. [my italics—bravo!]

¶ What is to be done? Thou shalt descend into thy inner man, and see if there be any traces of a soul there. . . . O brother, we must if possible resuscitate some soul and conscience in us, exchange our dilettantisms for sincerities, our dead hearts of stone for living hearts of flesh. . . . [then] Quacks shall no more have dominion over us, but true Heroes and Healers.

¶ When a Nation is unhappy, the old Prophet was right and not wrong in saying to it: Ye have forgotten God, ye have quitted the ways of God, or ye would not have been unhappy. It is not according to the laws of Fact that ye have lived and guided yourselves, but according to the laws of Delusion, Imposture, and willful and unwillful Mistake of Fact; behold therefore the Unveracity is worn out; Nature's longsuffering with you is exhausted; and ye are here!

¶ Fiction, Imagination, Imaginative Poetry, etc., etc., except as the vehicle for truth, or fact of some sort—which surely a man should first try various other ways of vehiculating, and conveying safe—what is it?

¶ Alas, what mountains of dead ashes, wreck and burnt bones, does assiduous pedantry dig up from the Past Time, and name it History, and Philosophy of History; 'till as we say, the human soul sinks wearied and bewildered; 'till the Past Time seems all one infinite incredible grey void, without sun, stars, hearth-fires, or candle-light; dim offensive dust-whirlwinds filling universal nature.

¶ By the law of Nature, all manner of Ideals have their fatal limits and lot; their appointed periods, of youth of maturity or perfection of decline, degradation, and final death and disappearance. There is nothing born but has to die.

¶ Ballot-boxes, Reform Bills, winnowing-machines: all these are good, or are not so good; — alas, brethren, how can these, I say, be other than inadequate, be other than failures, melancholy to behold? Dim all souls of men to the divine, the high and awful meaning of Human Worth and Truth, we shall never, by all the machinery in Birmingham, discover the True and Worthy. It is written, 'if we are ourselves valets, there shall exist no hero for us; we shall not know the hero when we see him';— we shall take the quack for a hero; and cry, audibly through all ballot-boxes and machinery whatsoever, thou art he; be thou King over us!

¶ What boots it? Seek only deceitful Speciosity, money with gilt carriages, 'fame' with newspaper-paragraphs, whatever name it bear, you will find only deceitful speciosity; godlike Reality will be forever far from you. The Quack shall be legitimate inevitable king of you; no earthly machinery able to exclude the Quack. Ye shall be born thralls of the Quack, and suffer under him, till your hearts are near broken, and no French Revolution or Manchester Insurrection, or partial or universal volcanic combustion and explosion, never so many, can do more than 'change the figure of your Quack'; the essence of him remaining, for a time and times. — 'How long, O Prophet?' say some, with a rather melancholy sneer. Alas, ye un-prophetic, ever till this come about, till deep misery, if nothing softer will have driven you out of your Speciosities into your Sincerities; and you find that there either is a Godlike in the world, or else ye are an unintelligible madness; that there is a God, as well as a Mammon and a Devil, and a Genius of Luxuries and canting Dilettantisms and Vain Shows! How long that will be, compute for yourselves, my unhappy brothers!

¶ To learn obeying is the fundamental art of governing. How much would many a Serene Highness have learned, had he travelled through the world with water-jug and empty wallet; and, at his victorious return, sat down not to newspaper paragraphs and city-illuminations, but at the foot of St. Edmund's Shrine to shackles and bread and water! He that cannot be servant of many, will never be the master, true guide and delivered of many; — that is the meaning of true mastership.

¶ In those days [Middle Ages] a Heavenly Awe overshadowed and encompassed, as it still ought and must, all earthly Business whatsoever.

¶ Thus does the Conscience of man project itself athwart whatsoever of knowledge or surmise, or imagination, understanding, faculty, acquirement, or natural disposition he has in him; and, like light through coloured glass print strange pictures 'on the rim of the horizon' and elsewhere! Truly, this same 'sense of the Infinite nature of Duty' is the central part of all with us; a ray as of Eternity and Immortality, immured in dusky many-coloured time, and its deaths and births. Your 'coloured glass' varies so much from century to century; and, in certain money-making, game preserving centuries, it gets so terribly opaque! Not a Heaven with cherubim surrounds you then, but a kind of vacant leaden-coloured Hell. One day it will again cease to be opaque, this 'coloured glass'. Nay, may it not become at once translucent and un-coloured? Painting no Pictures more for us, but only the everlasting Azure itself? That will be a right glorious consummation!

¶ Justice and Reverence are the everlasting central Law of this Universe; and to forget them, and have all the Universe against one, God and one's own Self for enemies and only the Devil and the Dragons for friends, is not that a 'lameness' like few? . . . I say, thy soul is lamed, and the God and all Godlike in it marred: lamed, paralytic, tending towards baleful eternal death, whether thou know it or not; nay hadst thou never known it, that surely had been worst of all!

¶ The great antique heart: how like a child's in its simplicity, like a man's in its earnest solemnity and depth! Heaven lies over him where-soever he goes or stands on the Earth; making all the Earth a mystic Temple to him, the Earth's business all a kind of worship. . . .

¶ Is not this comparative silence of Abbot Samson as to his religion, precisely the healthiest sign of him and of it? 'The Unconscious is the alone Complete.'

¶ The manner of men's Hero-worship, verily it is the innermost fact of their existence, and determines all the rest. . . . Have true reverence, and what indeed is inseparable therefrom, reverence the right man, all is well; have sham reverence, and what also follows, greet it with the wrong man, then all is still, and there is nothing well. Alas, if Hero-worship become Dilettantism . . . how much, in the most Earnest Earth, has gone and is evermore going to fatal destruction, and lies wasting in quiet lazy ruin, no man regarding it!

¶ My friend, all speech and rumour is short-lived, foolish, untrue. Genuine WORK alone, what thou workest faithfully, that is eternal, as the Almighty Founder and World-Builder himself. Stand thou by that, and let 'Fame' and the rest of it go prating.

Heard are the Voices,
 Heard are the Sages,
 The Worlds and the Ages:
 'Choose well, your choice is Brief and yet endless.

Here eyes do regard you,
 In Eternity's stillness;
 Here is all fulness,
 Ye brave, to reward you;
 Work, and despair not. (Goethe)

¶ There is no longer any God for us! God's Laws are become a Greatest-Happiness Principle, a Parliamentary Expediency. . . . Man has lost the soul out of him and now, after the due period, begins to find the want of it.

¶ The Infinite is more sure than any other fact. But only men can discover it; mere building beavers, spinning arachnes, much more the predatory vulturous and vulpine species, do not discern it well!

¶ . . . the faith in an Invisible, Unnameable, Godlike, present everywhere in all that we see and work and suffer, is the essence of all faith whatsoever; and that once denied, or still worse, asserted with lips only, and out of bound prayer books only, what other thing remains believable?

¶ The only happiness a brave man ever troubled himself with asking much about was, happiness enough to get his work done. . . . It is, after all, the one unhappiness of a man, that he cannot work; that he cannot get his destiny as a man fulfilled. Behold, the day is passing swiftly over our life, is passing swiftly over; and the night cometh, wherein no man can work.

¶ The spoken Word, the written Poem, is said to be an epitome of the man; how much more the done Work.

¶ Under the sky is no uglier spectacle than two men with clenched teeth, and hellfire eyes, hacking one another's flesh; converting precious living bodies, and priceless living souls, into nameless masses of putrescence, useful only for turnip-manure.

¶ Know thy work and do it. 'Know thyself': long enough has that poor 'self' of thine tormented thee; thou wilt never get to 'know' it, I believe! Think it not thy business, this of knowing thyself; thou art an unknowable individual: know what thou canst work at; and work at it, like a Hercules!

¶ Properly thou hast no other knowledge but what thou hast got by working. The rest is yet all a hypothesis of knowledge; a thing to be argued of in schools, a thing floating in the clouds, in endless logic-vortices, till we try it and fix it. 'Doubt, of whatever kind, can be ended by Action alone.'

¶ Liberty, I am told, is a Divine thing. Liberty when it becomes the 'Liberty to die by starvation' is not so divine!

¶ . . . the one end, essence, use of all religion past, present and to come, was this only: to keep that same Moral Conscience or Inner Light of ours alive and shining.

¶ The Universe, I say, is made by Law. The great Soul of the world is just and not unjust. Look though, if thou have eyes or soul left, into this great shoreless Incomprehensible: in the heart of its tumultuous Appearances, Embroilments, and mad Time-vortexes, is there not, silent, eternal, an All-just, an All-beautiful; sole Reality and ultimate controlling Power of the whole? This is not a figure of speech; this is a fact.

¶ My brother, thou must pray for a soul; struggle, as with life-and-death energy, to get back thy soul! Know that 'religion' is no Morrison's Pill from without, but a reawakening of thy own Self from within.

¶ Despotism is essential in most enterprises; . . . And yet observe too: Freedom, this is indispensable. To reconcile Despotism with Freedom: well is that such a mystery? Do you not already know the way? It is to make your Despotism just. Rigorous as Destiny; but just too, as Destiny and its Laws. The Laws of God: all men obey these, and have no 'Freedom' at all but in obeying them.

¶ In this world there is one godlike thing, the essence of all that was or even will be godlike in this world: the veneration done to Human Worth by the hearts of men. Here—worship in the Souls of the heroic, of the clear and wise,—it is the perpetual presence of Heaven in our poor Earth.

¶ It is an endless consolation to me . . . to find that disobedience to the Heavens, when they send any messenger whatever, is and remains impossible: shew the haughtiest featherhead that a soul higher than himself is here; were his knees stiffened into brass, he must down and worship.

From Vanity Fair, re: the victory at Waterloo: "All of us have read what occurred during that interval. The tale is in every Englishman's mouth; and you and I, who were children when the great battle was won and lost, are never tired of hearing and recounting the history of that famous action. Its remembrance rankles still in the bosoms of millions of the countrymen of those brave men who lost the day. They pant for an opportunity of revenging that humiliation; and if a contest, ending in a victory on their part, should ensue, elating them in their turn and leaving its cursed legacy of hatred and rage behind to us, there is no end to the so-called glory and shame, and to the alternations of successful and unsuccessful murder, in which two high-spirited nations might engage. Centuries hence, we Frenchmen and Englishmen might be boasting and killing each other still, carrying out bravely the Devil's code of honour."

How similar is this to the teaching of Euripides: killing is a chain-reaction whether on an individual or a national level.

Professor Tillyard spoke here tonight on "Milton: Conformist and Rebel." His superbly modulated voice rang out the lines of Milton with all the solemnity, force, and inspiration of a fine organ's intonation of Bach. Here is a lecturer worthy of his audience, one who reserves the best of his thought and performance for the platform; not like Mr. Sargent, who dribbles daily, on the ten-year-old level or lower.

And Milton—lover of beauty, mystic, courageous rebel, yet basically conservative: could there be a finer idol to emulate?

Tillyard spoke of Milton as, on the one hand, the inheritor and expression of the Renaissance spirit; and, on the other, the Puritan moral sternness. But rather than a person torn between these dual positions, alternating from one to the other, and constantly fighting with his own soul, Milton was a man who fused them into a single ordered, stable personality. He was one of the few men of the race to whom no one dictated beliefs. Milton saw problems and acted accordingly, always according to his best conscientious conviction, and forever contemptuous of the consequences: in short, he was a brave and noble soul.

Another brave and noble soul (I think; I hope) is Michael Millen—priest, pacifist, mystic, evangelist—who represented the FOR peace caravan here last week. He has definitely had some contact with what he describes as the higher level of consciousness of the mystic—Paul's "third heaven." The lessons and truths perceived therein are his sole guide. Thus, he will pay no taxes, own no property, nor will he marry. Instead, he preacheth pacifism and the living Christ to the multitudes—to all and sundry—whoever will but hear. Do we have the makings of a saint in this ex-Methodist middlewestern (coin, Iowa) Harvard graduate?

I was especially interested to hear that Millen, upon leaving Harvard, started a small preparatory school in Maine, and achieved a unique spirit of fellowship there among both students and faculty. This he was forced to discontinue, first because the graduates all refused to pay taxes, register for the draft, etc., which does not win one new applications; and second because Millen felt that the present crisis was a real one and demanded his undivided efforts to help alleviate it. Let us hope that he and his kind will succeed. They are the Light of the world.

Mr. Swan thought the beginnings of my sonata to be good! He analyzed the thematic material and found that each unitary idea lasted about 8 measures, and that in several instances the first 4 were a statement and the second an answer or afterthought. All this of course is to the good, and conforms to the rules. But it was all done subconsciously, it never having occurred to me to limit phrases to a specified number of bars.

I had the identical experience with the little fog sonnet. I wrote it as it came, quickly for the most part, and making the verses conform to little more than what the ear and instinct demanded. And when all was done, I found each line to be ten syllables exactly, with but two exceptions, where an eleventh syllable was appended. These experiences give added meaning to the rules and dogmas of form, and in a way they prove the rules to be just and natural.

I wrote to AFSC in this wise, applying for a position in their Mexican project:

¶ I believe that love has power to redeem and regenerate; and moreover, that the process by which it acts is one of chain reaction, precipitated by God and logically ending in the City of God on Earth. The chain reaction is opposed and often stopped by ignorance, Mammonism, dilettantism, prejudice, poverty, and hatred. Thus these must be diminished to a point where the language of love can be heard. Education is the greatest potential force for accomplishing this. Love operates constantly, if we would only see it. Educators must open myriad eyes.

¶ I have had no direct experience in the type of work you are doing. Since I have been able to think for myself I have spent most of my time and energy in strictly academic pursuits and in music. In recent years I have “discovered” art and beauty and religion and have had an overwhelming conviction that because of these things this life is not a veil of tears—that it can be beautiful and happy and peaceful, and that we must work to make it so.

if it keeps its boys well fed, healthy, and saturated with baseball, that it has done its duty by them. As director of trips, I have tried to counteract this tendency, to take the boys away from electricity, toilets, and chef-prepared meals to introduce them to the woods and mountains, to force them to utilize their ingenuity, and to undergo certain physical hardships—above all, to open their eyes to the beauty and fascination everywhere about them, to open these eyes shut by nursemaids, passive amusements, Mammon-worshipping parents. And I have found that once the natural resistance and inertia is overcome, the boys have clamored for more.

¶ This job was two-fold. One aspect was administrative. Two hundred boys left camp each week for a day-trip, divided into groups of about twenty, each group going to a new place each week. All this had to be arranged: transportation provided, destinations and personnel selected, menus chosen, food ordered and packed, etc. For the older boys, the trips were made progressively more difficult each week, and culminated in several overnight journeys ranging in length from three to ten days. This again was all my responsibility. The second aspect, of course, was personal leadership. I took the mountain-climbing trip each week. We stayed out an average of three days each week during the summer, climbing different mountains in the high peak region of the Adirondacks.

¶ Although I have felt for the most part that this work has been constructive and worthwhile, I think I now realize the greater need of the underprivileged (though in many ways the rich lads of NYC are far poorer than the most abject Mexican peon). Also, I have come to think that the community, united in a non-sectarian community church, is the answer to the evils of nationalism: the self-sufficient self-respecting community cooperating with others like it—and not world federalism. Thus I am particularly interested in Mexico, where you are working with a community as a whole, and with one that has not known what we call “the good things of life.” These of course are not the really good things of life, but I think they are often a necessary prerequisite to the latter. Certainly in a scientific and material-minded age, the very least we must do is to insure material security for all. Perhaps spiritual will follow.

The draft board has classified me 1A again. I am beginning to realize what I am in for here, and I am apprehensive. But I think I see the directions that I must take. My stand seems more and more sensible, more and more imperative, and right. Yet it is so hard to convey these feelings and to know positively that you are doing what is best. I know that I have a long long road ahead before I reach the City of Bliss. It seems to me at times that I have just started—nay, that I have not even started, that I merely have a desire, sometimes stronger than the strongest, sometimes dilute and nebulous, to start on this road, to take this pilgrimage and to loosen the bundle from my back.

I have certainly been a most undutiful son, for I am as yet incapable of real self-sacrifice, or even of compassion, for my family. It seems as though there is little or no bond between us. I have never known them. Our bond has been a “cash nexus” but it wants to be more.

Death is life, and Life is death.

I have been reading “The Imitation of Christ” with great satisfaction, especially in some of the following:

¶ For no worldly good whatsoever, and for the love of no man, must anything be done which is evil. . . . Without charity no work profiteth, but whatsoever is done in charity, however small and of no reputation it be, bringeth forth good fruit; for God verily considered what a man is able to do, more than the greatness of what he doth.

¶ He doth much who loveth much He doth much who doth well. He doth well who ministereth to the public good rather than to his own. . . . He who hath true and perfect charity, in no wise seeketh his own good, but desireth that God alone be altogether glorified. He envieth none, because he longeth for no selfish joy; nor doth he desire to rejoice in himself, but longeth to be blessed in God as the highest good. Oh, he who hath but a spark of true charity, hath verily learned that all worldly things are full of vanity. (I, XV)

¶ The clothing and outward appearance are of small account; it is change of character and entire mortification of the affections which make a truly religious man.

¶ Thou art called to endure and to labour, not life of ease and trifling talk. Here therefore are men tried as gold in the furnace. No man can stand, unless with all his heart he will humble himself for God's sake. (I, XVII, 2, 3)

¶ Be mindful of the duties which thou hast undertaken, and set always before thee the remembrance of the Crucified. Truly oughtest thou to be ashamed as thou lookest upon the life of Jesus Christ, because thou hast not yet endeavored to conform thyself more unto him, though thou has been a long time in the way of God. A religious man who exercises himself seriously and devoutly in the most holy life and passion of our Lord shall find there abundantly all things that are profitable and necessary for him, neither is there need that he seek anything better beyond Jesus. Oh! if Jesus crucified would come into our hearts, how quickly, and completely, should we have learned all that we need to know!

I wrote to Judge Hill, who sentenced a Quaker pacifist to ten years in jail for failing to report for induction:

"I write in behalf of Robert Michener, whose unhappy fate is beginning to stir so many liberal-minded people, here and elsewhere.

"Having studied some U.S. Constitutional Law, I think I can appreciate your feeling that the draft law—qua law—must be properly administered and obeyed. But in cases like this, we must be doubly sure that the whole purpose and function of the Law be not overshadowed by the zealous defense of one of its statutes. That purpose can be none other than this: to codify and express in terms of society the noblest aspirations and ideals of individual men. To these aspirations and ideals the law itself must be forever subservient; otherwise it will degenerate into the type of inflexible legalism so easily appropriated by tyrants or dictators, who then maintain that their rule is one of "law," that they have been "legally" elected, chosen by the people!

"I entreat you to reconsider the case of Michener, for after all he is a man who respects the Law on which all just statutes must ultimately be based. A ten-year prison term might very well deprive society of a man who no one can deny will be a constructive influence therein, even if his views be entirely wrong. For Michener, if nothing else, is honest.

"It is indeed tragic when the Law respects not honesty."

More from à Kempis:

¶ He who loveth Jesus, and is inwardly true and free from inordinate affections, is able to turn himself readily unto God, and to rise above himself in spirit, and to enjoy fruitful peace.

¶ He who knoweth things as they are and not as they are said or seem to be, he truly is wise, and is taught of God more than of men. He who knoweth how to walk from within, and to set little value upon outward things, requireth not places nor waiteth for seasons, for holding his intercourse with God. The inward man quickly recollecteth himself, because he is never entirely given to outward things. No outward labour and no necessary occupations stand in his way, but as events fall out, so doth he fit himself to them. He who is rightly disposed and ordered within careth not for the strange and perverse conduct of men. A man is hindered and distracted in so far as he is moved by outward things. (II, I, 6.7)

¶ Make no great account who is for thee or against thee, but mind only the present duty and take care that God be with thee in whatever thou doest. (II, II, 1.)

¶ First keep thyself in peace, and then shalt thou be able to be a peacemaker towards others. . . . Be zealous first over thyself, and then mayest thou righteously be zealous concerning thy neighbor. (II, III, 1)

¶ If thou wert good and pure within, then wouldst thou look upon all things without hurt and understand them aright. A pure heart seeth the very depths of heaven and hell. (II, IV, 1)

¶ The testimony of a good conscience is the glory of a good man. . . . If thou considerest well what thou art inwardly, thou wilt not care what men will say to thee. "Man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart" (Isaiah lvii, 21); men looketh on the deed, but God considereth the intent. (II, VI, 1, 3)

¶ When spiritual comfort is given by God, receive it with giving of thanks, and know that it is the gift of God, not thy desert. Be not lifted up, rejoice not overmuch nor foolishly presume, but rather be more humble for the gift, more wary and more careful in all thy doings; for that hour will pass away, and temptation will follow. When comfort is taken from thee, do not straightway despair, but wait for the heavenly visitation with humility and patience, for God is able to give thee back greater favor and consolation. This is not new or strange to those who have made trial of the way of God, for with the great saints and the ancient prophets there was often this manner of change. (II, IX, 4)

¶ The more a man dieth to himself, the more he beginneth to live towards God. (II, XII, 14)

I read Romain Rolland's biography of Gandhi. Here was brought out Gandhi's conception of nonviolence as a powerful positive instrument, not an unrealistic refusal to participate in the army or other governmental activities. Rolland puts it well: "Faith is a battle. And our nonviolence is the most desperate battle. The way to peace is not through weakness. We do not fight violence as much as weakness. Nothing is worthwhile unless it is strong, neither good nor evil. Absolute evil is better than emasculated goodness. Moaning pacifism is the death-knell of peace; it is cowardice and lack of faith. Let those who do not believe, who fear, withdraw! The way to peace leads through self-sacrifice."

From the preface to Culture and Anarchy: "In the following essay we have discussed . . . the tendency in us to Hebraise, as we call it; that is, to sacrifice all other sides of our being to the religious side. This tendency has its cause in the divine beauty and grandeur of religion, and bears affecting testimony to them. But we have seen that it leads to a narrow and twisted growth of our religious side itself, and to a failure in perfection." Arnold goes on to state that culture is the harmonious perfection of the whole man, of all the tendencies we reveal, of which religion is but one. He applies this in defense of the Established Church, which, he says, keeps religion always in the main stream of events, and thus helps to bring about the adaptation of religion's moral teaching to politics and government, etc.

In this vein are the following observations:

"Mr. Albert Réville . . . says that the conception which cultivated and philosophical Jews now entertain of Christianity and its Founder, is probably destined to become the conception which Christians themselves will entertain. Socinians are fond of saying the same thing about the Socinian conception of Christianity. Now, even if this were true, it would still have been better for a man, during the last 1800 years, to have been a Christian and a member of one of the great Christian communions, than to have been a Jew or a Sociniani because the being in contact with the main stream of human life is of more moment for a man's total spiritual growth, and for his bringing to perfection the gifts committed to him, which is his business on earth, than any speculative opinion which he may hold or think he holds. . . . The worth of what a man thinks about God and the objects of religion depends on what the man is; and what the man is depends upon his having more or less reached the measure of a perfect and total man.

"Culture, disinterestedly seeking in its aim at perfection to see things as they really are, shows us how worthy and divine a thing is the religious side in man, though it is not the whole of man. But while recognizing the grandeur of the religious side in man, culture yet makes us also eschew an inadequate conception of man's totality. Therefore, to the worth and grandeur of the religious side in man, culture is rejoiced and willing to pay any tribute, except the tribute of man's totality."

I wonder if Arnold has not substituted the term "Culture" for the term "religion." Religion demands the harmonious expansion and development of all of man's powers, and is forever against restrictive specialization. At the same time, it recognizes the psychological and social need for each man to "find his niche"; but if this is the proper niche, it will, paradoxically, be the means through which its occupant can develop and express all his powers to the fullest. (Expand this sometime.)

"... for culture is the eternal opponent of the two things which are the signal marks of Jacobinism—its fierceness, and its addiction to an abstract system. Culture is always assigning to system-makers and systems a smaller share in the bent of human destiny than their friends like."

"... the true grace and serenity is that of which Greece and Greek art suggest the admirable ideals of perfection, —a serenity which comes from having made order among ideas and harmonized them."

Haverford

Truth is "that which is." When we say that something "exists," we merely say that that something is true. Truth can have no meaning apart from reality. One cannot say, "Truth exists" without implying the tautology, "What exists exists." The tendency to talk of Truth as a separate something that has the characteristic of existing along with various other portions of the universe, such as cows or stones, the tendency that will produce the two statements, "Truth exists," and "cows exist" and allow them to stand together unquestioned, arises, strangely enough, from what was once a legitimate use of the term Truth—that is, where it equaled "that which is."

The transition from the legitimate to the illegitimate use of Truth takes place when the object whose existence we wish to affirm is such that our senses cannot comprehend it. When the vast limitations of our senses are appreciated, it becomes evident that perhaps the greater number of objects fall into this category of the unperceivable. A rock occupies space and has solidity. It can be felt and seen; therefore we conclude that it exists. So likewise with a cow. Both are portions of the Truth by virtue of their existence. The Life that is in the cow, however, cannot be felt or smelt or seen. Yet, we are quite sure that it is there and that it is something different from that part of the cow that can be seen and felt: for when the cow dies, it is still a cow albeit a dead cow, and its existence as a cow cannot be questioned. The life, however, that was manifest in the cow is most definitely there no longer. To say, "That cow lives" is to depart from Truth, whereas the statement, "That is a cow" is undeniably true.

Thus we are faced with Life as a something that exists or does not exist in a particular medium. Yet when we attempt to describe Life as an object, we fail hopelessly. We can only talk around it, speak of it in terms of a beating heart or responsive brain, but we can never actually contemplate Life itself. Thus when we try to speak of Life in terms of truth or untruth, we falter. We can say, "Life exists," yet this tells us little indeed about the nature of this something, Life, which exists. Again, we can speak of "living principles"; but here the term "living" is so vague that it becomes virtually meaningless.

Yet the expressions "full life," "shallow life," "good life," "bad life" do have some meaning for us, however vague. Through these expressions, and countless others, we begin to give qualities to the unknowable object and, inevitably, to begin to think we know it, when all that we know are the qualities. And even these we know but imperfectly—for we define qualities such as these in terms of the object they are supposed to describe: thus goodness is the quality that fosters life, badness the quality that takes life away. All in all, then, when we say “life is good” we say little more than “life is life,” and we are no more edified than before.

Continue: each person searches for truth, perceives it in a state of wholeness absolute for him, relative to him. Sum: absolute—norms—alternation: faith—skepticism—renewed faith—knowledge that the term truth describes real objects.

Matthew Arnold:

“The final aim of both Hellenism and Hebraism, as of all great spiritual disciplines, is no doubt the same: man’s perfection or salvation. . . . Still, they pursue this aim by very different courses. The uppermost idea with Hellenism is to see things as they really are; the uppermost idea with Hebraism is conduct and obedience. . . . The governing idea of Hellenism is spontaneity of consciousness; that of Hebraism, strictness of conscience.

“Christianity changed nothing in this essential bent of Hebraism to set doing above knowing. Self-conquest, self-devotion, the following not our own individual will, but the will of God, obedience, is the fundamental idea of this form, also, of the discipline to which we have attached the general name of Hebraism. Only, as the old law and the network of prescriptions with which it enveloped human life were evidently a motive-power not driving and searching enough to produce the result aimed at,—patient continuance in well-doing, self-conquest,—Christianity substituted for them boundless devotion to that inspiring and affecting pattern of self-conquest offered by Jesus Christ.

“ . . . in nine cases out of ten where St. Paul thinks and speaks of resurrection, he thinks and speaks of it in the sense of a rising to a new life before the physical death of the body, and not after it. . . . The profound idea of being baptized into the death of the great exemplar of self-devotion and self-annulment, of repeating in our own person, by virtue of identification with our exemplar, his course of self-devotion and self-annulment, and of thus coming, within the limits of our present life, to a new life, in which, as in the death going before it, we are identified with our exemplar,—this is the fruitful and original conception of being risen with Christ which possesses the mind of St. Paul, and this is the central point round which, with such incomparable emotion and eloquence, all his teaching moves.”

Bravo! I had already been convinced that Jesus thought in this way—evidence John’s gospel—but never looked sufficiently into Paul, whom most people consider a dogmatist rather than a poet.

A speaker here today touched on the insufficiency of all our normal opinions, their being limited by our relative perspectives—and offered the knowledge of Godhead as emancipation from this relativism. The general impression seemed to be that this sort of talk would be acceptable in church, but here not so. To rise and talk of God or spiritual things is tantamount to antagonizing your audience. What we need is a new poetical expression of religion, which will supersede the vocabulary so excellent, yet so tedious through overuse, now in vogue. Prophet, where art thou?

Today's Collection program consisted of student music. My little Sonata in B-flat for 3 strings was performed—rather poorly—by 3 professional musicians: nevertheless, a great and marvelous event, one's creation made manifest.

The great joy in life is to create—to apply the power, which God breathes into us, in the devising of new life in terms of music, art, poetry, literature.

Our Wednesday morning silent meetings are now in the Skating House, and appropriately so. Starting the day in this way of consecration is indeed fine. We realize how thankful we must be each and every morn, that death has given way to renewed life, replenished vigor, and we vow that the short span of life afore the setting sun shall not be spent in vain, but rather in the service and interest of truth, beauty, courage, wisdom: of God.

I have started examining "Hero and Leander" and find it delightful indeed. Read Volpone also tonight, with identical reaction.

Pete G. and I attacked the De Soto, removing the head, etc., in preparation for a complete motor job. These excursions into mechanical mysteries, though belated, are delightful and edifying—also, they serve the sovereign interest of economy.

Reading Return of the Native. Hardy's prose is flowing, and his thought reacheth unto the depths. Viz:

¶ Was Yeobright's mind well-proportioned? No. A well-proportioned mind is one which shows no particular bias; one of which we may safely say that it will never cause its owner to be confined as a madman, tortured as a heretic, or crucified as a blasphemer. Also, on the other hand, that it will never cause him to be applauded as a prophet, revered as a priest, or exalted as a king. Its usual blessings are happiness and mediocrity.

¶ We can hardly imagine bucolic placidity quickening to intellectual aims without imagining social aims as the transitional phase. Yeobright's peculiarity was that in striving at high thinking he still cleaved to plain living.

¶ In Clym Yeobright's face could be dimly seen the typical countenance of the future. Should there be a classic period to art hereafter, its Pheidias may produce such faces. The view of life as a thing to be put up with, replacing that zest for existence which was so intense in early civilizations, must ultimately enter so thoroughly into the constitution of the advanced races that its facial expression will become accepted as a new artistic departure. . . . Physically beautiful men—the glory of the race when it was young—are almost an anachronism now. The truth seems to be that a long line of disillusionive centuries has permanently displaced the Hellenic idea of life.

¶ . . . the more I see of life the more do I perceive that there is nothing particularly great in its greatest walks, and therefore nothing particularly small in mine of furze-cutting. If I feel that the greatest blessings vouchsafed to us are not very valuable, how can I feel it to be any great hardship when they are taken away? So I sing to pass the time.

Shaw: ". . . where there is danger, there is hope. Our present security is nothing, and can be nothing, but evil made irresistible.

"Thus, you see, a man may not be a gentleman nowadays, even if he wishes to. As to being a Christian, he is allowed some latitude in that matter, because, I repeat, Christianity has two faces. Popular Christianity has for its emblem a gibbet, for its chief sensation a sanguinary execution after torture, for its central mystery an insane vengeance brought off by a trumpety expiation. But there is a nobler and profounder Christianity which affirms the sacred mystery of Equality, and forbids the glaring futility and folly of vengeance, often politely called punishment or justice. The gibbet part of Christianity is tolerated. The other is criminal felony. Connoisseurs in irony are well aware of the fact that the only editor in England who denounces punishment as radically wrong, also repudiates Christianity; calls his paper the Freethinker; and has been imprisoned for two years for blasphemy." —Preface to Major Barbara, after seeing the movie last night.

The great artist achieves unity of conception because he can conceive in terms of blocks, not individual notes, phrases, words or sentences. I cannot do this, and both my music and my writing thus show an incoherence. I am good only for a spurt at a time; if that spurt is insignificant to complete the work, then my subsequent completing will be inevitably faulty and below the standard of the original.

Trevelyan, commenting on the Scottish uprising of 1635–40: "the Covenant with God was renewed in 1638 and embraced all ranks from highest to lowest. In every parish men signed it, weeping and lifting their right hand to heaven. When the Scots display emotion, something real is astir within them."

Again Trevelyan: "Was it . . . impossible for Parliamentary power to take root in England at a less cost than this national schism and appeal to force, which, in spite of many magnificent incidents, left England humanly so much the poorer and less noble in twenty years time? It is a question which no depth of research or speculation can resolve. Men were what they were, uninfluenced by the belated wisdom of posterity, and thus they acted."

Adams on the Puritan Revolution in 1640: "In the reaction which naturally followed, the work of the revolution was undone. Constitutional development linked itself back to the results of its more natural processes in the stage which it had reached at the end of the first session of the Long Parliament in 1641. Nearly everything for which the revolution strove is now a part of the English constitution, but not as a result of its endeavor. Rather as a result of the slower and more normal process of growth, out of which in a sense the revolution indeed came but which it for a moment interrupted. In the puritan and quaker colonies of America the ideas of the revolution created the natural political atmosphere. There they were not revolutionary but became the material from which the normal constitutional life of these little states drew its strength."

Samuel Butler: "He [Ernest] did not yet know that the very worst way of getting hold of ideas is to go hunting expressly after them. The way to get them is to study something of which one is fond, and to note down whatever crosses one's mind in reference to it, either during study or relaxation, in a little notebook kept always in the waistcoat pocket. Ernest has come to know all about this now, but it took him a long time to find it out, for this is not the kind of thing that is taught at schools and universities.”

Samuel Butler: “I mean that he was trying to give up father and mother for Christ’s sake. He would have said he was giving them up because he thought they hindered him in the pursuit of his truest and most lasting happiness. Granted, but what is this if it is not Christ? What is Christ if He is not this? He who takes the highest and most self-respecting view of his own welfare which it is in his power to conceive, and adheres to it in spite of conventionality, is a Christian whether he knows it and calls himself one, or whether he does not. Non-pacifists tell us that we are neglecting our obligations to society. But when the Marxists say that society is greater than the individual, these same non-pacifists are the first to reach for their guns.

Reading such arguments from Mr. Hatch—who is in truth infinitely above them—makes me realize how really weak they are. It is impossible to make a good argument for wrong. Even when strong men so argue, their arguments are weak, and the discrepancy between the level of the argument and that of the speaker indicates that the speaker does not in any full measure believe in the position that he advocates. It is his duty, then, publically to renounce this erroneous position—and the performance of this duty is the real indication of his inner strength.

Non-pacifists also say that it is wrong—or at least unrealistic—to take a position that is clearly ahead of one’s time. Together with this, they extol our American independent democracy, and the liberties it bestows. Yet they forget that the leaders of the revolt against Britain were also clearly ahead of their time. Had these non-pacifists existed then, they would have counseled: Do not rush things, freedom will come in time, when the world's ready for it—just as they say today—do not rush things, peace will come when the world's ready for it. No doubt it will, but the world's "readiness" in such a way will be a euphemism for its exhaustion. What I say is not meant to be a justification of the American Revolution, for no violence can be justified. But it is meant to be in praise of the "anachronistic" ideals of some of its leaders—ideals of individual self-respect and dignity—even if those ideas were implemented wrongly, and through a continuation of this wrong war-mindedness stand the chance of being obliterated forever.

From Rudolf Otto's The Idea of the Holy, a first-rate work, which I have finally gotten around to reading, in connection with a Marlowe paper. Otto prefaces his chapter "The Elements of the Numinous" with: "The reader is invited to direct his mind to a moment of deeply-felt religious experience, as little as possible qualified by other forms of consciousness. Whoever cannot do this, whoever knows no such moments in his experience, is requested to read no further; for it is not easy to discuss questions of religious psychology with one who can recollect the emotions of his adolescence, the discomforts of indigestion, or, say, social feelings, but cannot recall any intrinsically religious feelings. We do not blame such an one, when he tries for himself to advance as far as he can with the help of such principles of explanation as he knows, interpreting 'Aesthetics' in terms of sensuous pleasure, and 'Religion' as a function of the gregarious instinct and social standards, or as something more primitive still. But the artist, who for his part has an intimate personal knowledge of the distinctive element in the aesthetic experience, will decline his theories with thanks, and the religious man will reject them even more uncompromisingly."

Bravo! If the English teacher does not evoke the artistic experience—the distinctive artistic experience, viz. the numinous in art—he fulfills not his function. Teachers concentrate on the socio-historical aspects of their subject because they themselves have never had the artistic experience.

Otto remarks later that the Quaker silent meeting is the most spiritual form of worship, its character being threefold: the numinous silence of Sacrament, the silence of waiting, and the silence of Union or Fellowship. On the last, Otto says: "The silent worship of the Quakers is in fact a realization of Communion in both senses of the word—inward oneness and fellowship of the individual with invisible present Reality and the mystical union of many individuals with one another.” And, of extreme interest: “In this regard there is the plainest inward kinship between the two forms of worship which, viewed externally, seem to stand at the opposite poles of religious development, viz. the Quaker meeting and the Roman Catholic Mass. Both are solemn religious observances of a numinous and sacramental character, both are communion, both exhibit alike an inner straining not only ‘to realize the presence’ of God, but to attain to a degree of oneness with Him.”

I admire and like the Quakers more and more, and especially the silent Meeting. Today at Radnor I again felt the inner strength that comes of calm meditation and thought—the withdrawal from action, whose subsequent return is marked with renewed vigor and dedication. I wonder if joining the Society of Friends would be inconsistent with the ideals of the Community Church. Clearly a good case could be made either way, but as I recall my comments on Hocking’s Absolute Relativity, they would clearly sanction joining another group, and using its doctrines, beliefs, and traditions as the expression of the true universality that underlies all true religious belief.

¶ Otto: “. . . Above and beyond our rational being lies hidden the ultimate and highest part of our nature, which can find no satisfaction in the mere allaying of the needs of our sensuous, psychical, or intellectual impulses and cravings. The mystics called it the basis or ground of the soul.”

From “Song of the Flower,” Gibran:

. . . I look up high to see only the light,
And never look down to see my shadow.
This is wisdom which man must learn.

From “Song of the Rain”:

The heat in the air gives birth to me,
But in turn I kill it,
As woman overcomes man with
The strength she takes from him.

From "Vision":

¶ I am the human heart, prisoner of substance and victim of earthly laws.

In God's field of Beauty, at the edge of the stream of life, I was imprisoned in the cage of laws made by man.

In the center of beautiful Creation I died neglected because I was kept from enjoying the freedom of God's bounty.

Everything of beauty that awakens my love and desire is a disgrace, according to man's conceptions; everything of goodness that I crave is but naught, according to his judgment.

I am the lost human heart, imprisoned in the foul dungeon of man's dictates, tied with chains of early authority, dead and forgotten by laughing humanity whose tongue is tied and whose eyes are empty of visible tears.

¶ I am a poet, and if I cannot give, I shall refuse to receive.

¶ Humans are divided into different clans and tribes, and belong to countries and towns. But I find myself a stranger to all communities and belong to no settlement. The universe is my country and the human family is my tribe.

Human kinds unite themselves only to destroy the temples of the soul, and they join hands to build edifices for earthly bodies. I stand alone listening to the voice of hope in my deep self saying, "As love enlivens a man's heart with pain, so ignorance teaches him the way to knowledge. Pain and ignorance lead to great joy and knowledge because the Supreme Being has created nothing vain under the sun."

I have a yearning for my beautiful country, and I love its people because of their misery. But if my people rose, stimulated by plunder and motivated by what they call "patriotic spirit" to murder, and invaded my neighbor's country, then upon the committing of any human atrocity I would hate my people and my country.

I love my native village with some of my love for my country; and I love my country with part of my love for the earth, all of which is my country; and I love the earth with all of myself because it is the haven of humanity, the manifest spirit of God.

Humanity is the spirit of the Supreme Being on earth, and that humanity is standing amidst ruins, hiding its nakedness behind tattered rags, shedding tears upon hollow cheeks, and calling for its children with pitiful voice. But the children are busy singing their clan's anthem; they are busy sharpening the swords and cannot hear the cry of their mothers.

Humanity is the spirit of the Supreme Being on earth, and that Supreme Being preaches love and good-will. But the people ridicule such teachings. The Nazarene Jesus listened, and crucifixion was his lot; Socrates heard the voice and followed it, and he too fell victim in body. The followers of the Nazarene and Socrates are the followers of Deity, and since people will not kill them, they deride them, saying, "Ridicule is more bitter than killing."

Jerusalem could not kill the Nazarene, nor Athens Socrates; they are living yet and shall live eternally. Ridicule cannot triumph over the followers of Deity. They live and grow forever.

From New Wars for Old by John Haynes Holmes:

¶ The supreme example of the antagonism of militarism and civilization is in the case of Germany. For centuries, the German people were peaceful traders, hard-working peasants, and raptured dreamers. Political power was unknown to them, and military greatness undesired. And these were the days when her life was purest, and her spirit at its zenith of achievement. It was feeble and divided Germany which gave us the long line of noble mystics from Tauler and Meister Eckhart to Herder and Schleiermacher, Martin Luther and the Reformation, the literature of Lessing, Schiller, Goethe, and Heine, the music of Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, and Schubert, the scholarship of Wolf, Strauss, Bauer, Niebuhr, and Ranke. Then, in the 18th century, came the Great Elector and Frederick, and the beginnings of Prussian militarism. Then came the Napoleonic wars, with their poisonous progeny in the persons of Stein, Scharuhorst, and Gneisenau. The days of '48 were a brief awakening from the creeping hypnotism of the times. But Bismarck and Moltke, the veritable incarnation of blood and iron, soon came upon the scene, and Germany was lost. From that day to this Germany has been obsessed with the ideal of force, greediness, power; and from that day to this her true life has atrophied and slowly died. If 1870 marks the beginning of German imperialism, it marks as well the close of German culture.

¶ Nothing is more impressive in evolution than the gradual supplanting of the struggle for self-preservation by the struggle for the life of others. Mutual aid is the determining factor of survival. Not the claw of the tiger but the love of the tiger for her cubs is the thing that really makes for the preservation of the species. "The strength of the wolf is the pack," says Kipling. The weaker animals, which, because of their inadequate strength, have learned the lesson of co-operation are the ones which are winning out the battle for life, and the savage animals, on the other hand, like the lion and the bear, which rove the jungle alone in the proud glory of unconquerable power, are the very ones which are losing and thus gradually disappearing. Physical force, in other words, is for some reason or other showing itself to be a failure in the struggle for survival.

¶ The struggle [of life] is not for physical survival but for spiritual fulfillment. Jesus urged, therefore, upon all those who would truly live, the great end of love.

¶ President Monroe, re: Canadian-US border disarmament: "The increase of naval armaments on one side upon the Lakes, during peace, will necessitate the like increase on the other, and besides causing an aggravation of useless expense to both parties, must operate as a continual stimulus of suspicion and ill-will upon the inhabitants and local authorities of the borders against those of their neighbors. The moral and political tendency of such a system must be to war and not to peace."

¶ The non-resistant, in the highest and best sense of the word, is not the man who endures passively, nor yet fights rationally, but the man who loves profoundly. [Cf. Bishop Myriel in Les Misérables, when Jean Valjean has stolen his silver.]

¶ Non-resistance means one thing, — the lifting of resistance to evil from the physical to the moral plane.

¶ "With mercy and forbearance shalt thou disarm every foe. For want of fuel the fire expires: mercy and forbearance bring violence to naught." —Buddha.

¶ "To those who are good, I am good; and to those who are not good, I am also good—and thus all get to be good. . . . To recompense injury with kindness, this is the law of life." —Lao-tse.

¶ "The man who foolishly does me wrong, I will return to him the protection of my ungrudging love; the more evil comes from him, the more good shall go from me. . . . Let a man overcome anger by love, let a man overcome evil by good, let him overcome the greedy by liberality and the liar by truth.” —Buddha.

¶ “Bless them that persecute you. . . . Recompense to no man evil for evil.” —Paul (Romans 12)

¶ “Men say that Christ bade his disciples sell their coats and buy them swords. But Christ taught not his apostles to fight with the word of iron, but with the sword of God’s word, which standeth in meekness of heart and in the prudence of man’s tongue.” —Wycliffe.

¶ “The religious man is guided in his activity not by the presumed consequences of his action, but by the consciousness of the destination of his life. . . . For him there is no question as to whether many or few men act as he does, or of what may happen if he does that which he should do. He knows that besides life and death nothing can happen, and that life and death are in the hands of God whom he obeys. The religious man acts thus and not otherwise not because he desires to act thus, nor because it is advantageous to himself or to other men, but because, believing that his life is in the hands of God, he cannot act otherwise.” —Tolstoy (“Bethink Yourselves”).

¶ The Quakers exemplify everything that is beautiful in the moral and spiritual life; in many ways they must be regarded as the very flower and fruitage of our Christian civilization.

¶ Successful instances of non-resistance exemplify the workings of two absolute spiritual laws. The first of these laws is this: that like always produces like. Reason conduces to reason, hate stirs up hate, love generates love. ‘Cast your bread upon the waters,’ said Jesus, ‘and it will come back to you again.’ ‘As ye sow,’ said Paul, ‘so shall ye also reap.’ ‘Love your enemies, and you will have none.’ And the second spiritual law is that the spirit is always superior to the flesh.

¶ “I come that they might have life, and have it more abundantly,” said Jesus, defining the standard by which he wanted his career to be measured.

’Tis life of which our nerves are scant;
O life, not death, for which we pant;
More life and fuller that we want. —Tennyson.

¶ War is never justifiable at any time or under any circumstance. No man is wise enough, no nation is important enough, no human interest is precious enough, to justify the wholesale destruction and murder which constitute the essence of war. Human life is alone sacred. . . . In the name of life and for the sake of life, do I declare that war must be condemned universally and unconditionally.

It is with war today exactly as with similar abominations yesterday. Plato thought that human slavery was justifiable, since it enabled the free citizens of his ideal republic to live the good life. Torquemada thought persecution justifiable, since it gave protection to the true faith. . . . In the same way we deceive ourselves today into believing that war is justifiable, when it is fought on behalf of political liberty, or in defense of the integrity of a nation. But some day men will awaken from this illusion to see that war is never justifiable.

¶ “Let not a man glory in this, that he loves his country,” says Bahá’u’lláh, “let him rather glory in this, that he loves his kind.”

From Aldous Huxley’s Ends and Means:

¶ People prepare for war . . . because they live in a society where success, however achieved, is worshipped and where competition seems more “natural” (because under the present dispensation it is more habitual) than co-operation.

¶ Because of indolence, the disinherited are hardly less conservative than the possessors; they cling to their familiar miseries almost as tenaciously as the others cling to their privileges.

¶ Non-attachment in the midst of activity is the distinguishing mark of the ideally excellent human being.

¶ The political road to a better society is decentralization . . . [But] no society which is preparing for war can afford to be anything but highly centralized. . . . A democracy which makes or even effectively prepares for modern, scientific war, must necessarily cease to be democratic.

¶ Self-transcendence, escape from the prison of the ego into union with what is above personality, is generally accomplished in solitude. That is why the tyrants like to herd their subjects into those vast crowds, in which the individual is reduced to a state of intoxicated sub-humanity.

¶ The line of least resistance: living unconnected, atomistic lives, passively obeying during working hours and passively being entertained by machinery during hours of leisure.

¶ Soldiers must not think or have wills. ‘Theirs not to reason why; theirs but to do and die.’

¶ In our societies men are paranoiacally ambitious, because para-noiac ambition is admired as a virtue and successful climbers are adored as though they were gods. More books have been written about Napoleon than about any other human being. So long as men worship the Caesars and Napoleons, Caesars and Napoleons will duly rise and make them miserable.

¶ Certain biologists consider that war ensures the survival of the fittest. This is obviously nonsensical. War tends to eliminate the young and strong and spare the unhealthy.

¶ It is one of the tragedies of history that the Westernization of China should have meant the progressive militarization of a culture which, for nearly 3000 years, has consistently preached the pacifist ideal.

¶ For Buddhists, anger is always and unconditionally disgraceful. For Christians, there is such a thing as righteous indignation (which, unfortunately, justifies war, so they think).

¶ War is not a law of nature, nor even of human nature. It exists because men wish it to exist.

¶ The state is loved because it panders to the lowest elements in human nature and because men like to have excuses to feel pride and hatred, etc.

¶ The new moralities (Communism, Fascism, etc.) inculcate the minor virtues, such as temperance, prudence, courage, and the like; but all disparage the higher virtues, charity and intelligence, without which the minor virtues are merely instruments for doing evil with increased efficiency.

¶ Desire is the source of illusion. Only the disinterested mind can transcend common sense and pass beyond the boundaries of animal or average-sensual human life. The mystic exhibits disinterestedness in the highest degree possible to human beings and is therefore able to transcend ordinary limitations more completely than the man of science, the artist or the philosopher. . . . The ultimate reality discoverable by the mystics is not personality. Since it is not personal, it is illegitimate to attribute to it ethical qualities. 'God is not Good', said Eckhart. 'I am good.' Goodness is the means by which men can overcome the illusion of being completely independent existents and can raise themselves to a level of being upon which it becomes possible to realize the fact of their oneness with ultimate reality. The ultimate reality is 'the peace of God which passeth all understanding'; goodness is the way by which it can be approached.

¶ Good is that which makes for unity; evil is that which makes for separateness.

¶ European and American children are brought up to admire the social climber and worship his success, to envy the rich and eminent and at the same time to respect and obey them. In other words, the two correlated vices of ambition and sloth are held up as virtues. There can be no improvement in our world until people come to be convinced that the ambitious power-seeker is as disgusting as the glutton or the miser.

Tolstoy uses an unusual figure in Anna Karenina: "He [Serioja] was only nine years old, only a child, but he knew his own soul and guarded it as the eyelid guards the eye." (Part V, Chapter XXVII)

I played the Eine Kleine Nachmusik duet with Merrill Brockway at Brant Lake Camp assembly.

Possible story-subject: Mrs. McCarthy's part in informing on activities of the previous postmistress (who illegally solicited business from neighboring hotels, etc.). Also Mrs. McCarthy and her rapist husband, Francis, whom she apparently drove to frustration. Post-office conversations, dilemma over new money-order forms; the children; talking too freely, etc. Closing up to drive the children home.

They tell me that it is now fashionable to be a Kierkegaardian. This is all very well, but in the end it will be not so well for Kierkegaard. For now that he is “popular” and “accepted,” S.K.’s doctrine and message face the probability of being distorted, just as every other noble system of thought has been mangled by popular acceptance. This is because although the majority of men are willing, let us say, to “adopt” the Kierkegaardian point of view, still very few of them indeed are willing to take the leap that S.K. requires. Thus the core of S.K.’s message is ignored while its periphery is discussed, edited, translated, tea-tabled, and sermonized until the core disappears right out altogether, and the force of superior numbers triumphs.

So, we must guard against the fashion and against accepting S.K. as a prophet whose every word is scripture. Still, on the other hand, we must not be so overly critical as to insure ourselves as it were against being edified by the preacher, whether he offers little or much. S.K. requires this much of his reader—that he become one with the talk, at least at first, and that he lay down the categories of critical judgment. I say bravo for S.K. and for play-acting. From Allen’s Life of Phillips Brooks, referring to the religious skepticism of the 1870s (cf. Arnold’s “Dover Beach”) that resulted from the shattering by Biblical scholarship of the infallibility of the Bible, and by science of other commonly accepted religious standbys: “Under these circumstances, the pressing question was, Where lay the authority? . . . Some fell back upon the authority of tradition expressed by General Councils and long-established usage. The Roman Church was alive to the situation, and the year 1870 was considered opportune for declaring the infallibility of the Pope, in the expectation that a distracted world would be moved by the announcement. Others asserted the inward authority of the soul as divinely endowed to speak with finality upon religious truth—the attitude which was then known as Transcendentalism.”—I have read and loved Emerson, and Murdock lectured galore, but never before this did I have the slightest appreciation of the force that gave rise to Transcendentalism. Now it means so much more.

Lunch with Robert Penn Warren. He said that American's agrarian civilization, not her metropolitan, is the key to her greatness, but that it is hardly so simple a question as the nice little farm vs. the big mean city. Ralph Sergent asked him what lectures he listened to at Oxford, whereupon the "great man" replied that in the course of his two years he went to one lecture, and regretted that. I had immense difficulty repressing what would have been the most undignified of guffaws.

Knowing that all considerations of logic and expediency direct one to take a certain action, and then taking the opposite action is much better than taking said opposite action and being ignorant of the considerations of logic and expediency that speak against it. Lord Boyd-Orr spoke here. He said that the challenge that our civilization must meet is the challenge of becoming One World: "Let's join the Human Race." This is the challenge in the sense that Toynbee speaks of challenges and responses. If this challenge does not bring a creative response, then the civilization of the West is doomed. The challenge can be met, said Boyd-Orr in his Scottish brogue, by an effort on the part of the technologically advanced West to help provide know-how and implementation for starving Asia, to keep production at a high level this way rather than by the stimulus of war and the destructive method of re-arming.

Chatted with Charles Malik, Lebanese UN delegate, and "philosopher statesman." He is a student of Greek through and through, especially Aristotle. I asked him about the old problem pointed up in the slaying of Caesar by the philosopher Brutus: metaphysics may act as a justification for what otherwise would be considered a moral wrong. But Malik insisted that every statesman must model his actions on a metaphysics—and, despite my objection, naturally Malik was basically right.

Paul Henry Láng: "Like Carlyle, Renan, and Taine: Wagner felt that modern life is opposed to the creative mission of man; that it is passive, lacking in will, and therefore inhuman. He felt that man was gradually becoming a servant of life, whereas his destiny was to be life's master. He felt that the divergence between action and thought was swinging man to his doom, and he resolved to lead mankind back to the unity of action and thought, of body and soul, to creative action which does not know problems separate from life."

S.S. Waterman, mid-Atlantic

Halfway to Europe. Looking back over the past two months, I see many important events, many busy days. In preparation for Comprehensives I read Láng through and through, also Prunières, Nef, etc., learning just about the whole gamut in the six weeks allowed me. Naturally, I could hope to know little more than names, trends, and dates. But apparently this was enough for the peculiar Haverford standards, and I graduated with High Honors and  $\pi\beta\kappa$  along with Townsend. Loblenz got simple Honors only, which grieved me immensely, since his knowledge and musical talents are far superior to mine. Dr. Swan thought my exam fugue very good, and this helped—also, of course, the quartet movement, the issue of my study of the first of the Rasumovsky quartets. I have recently also listened more carefully to Opus 59, no. 3, opus 18, #s 4 & 5, and op. 135, the 16th. All superb works, although the 16th so far leaves me mystified. I must study the score in a more detailed way.

It is impossible for me to know just how good or bad my compositions are, especially since I have no way of hearing them over and over in good performance. While writing the variations, the other trio movements, etc., I thought them very good; but after I had progressed to the quartet, I thought them very bad. Now, when and if I progress further, I shall probably feel the quartet very bad. But despite it all, Swan's enthusiasm has been very encouraging. I owe it to myself to begin to regulate my life with a little more direction and forethought, instead of grasping things as they turn up, as I did with this European trip and with next year's program at Harvard. I must discipline myself to study music intensively for a year at least, as a test, practicing well and regularly, and undergoing some basic training in ear, sight singing and reading, etc. If I could only have some surer idea of what will be best for me in life—whether my present idea of withdrawal and my present opposition to all the current values of success, is the best way. I feel on the one hand that I must simplify and simplify, that I am so poorly constituted emotionally, so poorly endowed in the basic values of the non-intellectual, that to pursue the typical intellectual life as a college professor or the like would merely intensify the gap between my mind's attainments and my heart and soul, and would pass on the same immense difficulties to my children as my father passed on to me and his father to him. When I read a passage such as the following—in Sons and Lovers—it immediately strikes home: "The difference between people isn't in their class, but in themselves. Only from the middle classes one gets ideas, and from the common people—life itself, warmth. You feel their hates and loves" (p. 316 Modern Library edition).

So, I graduated; but the event was hardly a consummation in my mind—rather a mystery: a mystery that ended one mystery and began another.

I had been at Riparius, and immediately returned—my parents perturbed as usual with my short stays at Sunnyside. A few days later I returned to Park Avenue for Paul Davidoff's wedding, on June 12th, to Rusty Miller, who impresses me not very much. Then to Cumberland Hill, where I felt very guilty in merely eating supper at the Gardners' and then taking Peter with me to the farm. The few days with him were delightful. We finished the sheathing on the overhang, then put the roofing paper over it. Next we completed the outside nailing for chinking, and Pete helped me with most of the oakum. Two nights, after having worked steadily from 8 a.m. until 8 p.m., we went horseback riding, once as far as the Black Hole, with Clare Carman. Before Pete came, I had put on most of the roofing paper, filled in the two gables with boards from the barn, and laid the two floors. After he left, I completed the chinking, including the outside cementing, all but a few logs directly under the overhang, where rain cannot enter; put in all the windows, planeing them to size and securing each with a sash lock; made and hung two doors, only temporary ones, however; and creosoted the outside up to the level of the windowsills. It was a grand month at Riparius. I worked very well, largely I think because of the relaxation and companionship in taking meals with the Carmans instead of preparing them myself, as I did the summer before. I enjoyed their conversation, simple as it was, much more than that at the Gerstenzangs, where Arthur Levitt and Karen invited me one evening for a steak dinner. The desolate, meaningless, parasitic life of those people, with their constant round of tennis, swimming, golf or boredom stands in sharp contrast with the constructive activity and deep human contact I knew over at Riparius. Even a slight incident binds people and destroys all the sophisticated superficiality that characterizes so many of the people I grew up among. Alvin Millington cut his leg with an axe, and the blood gushed out so fast that he had to apply a tourniquet (lucky thing he thought to do it). I drove him down to Carmans', where he had left his car, and offered to drive him to Chestertown, but he thought he could make it by himself. As I expected, he began getting faint down the hill, and stopped in home so that his wife could accompany him. An hour or so later he was back at Carmans', and his childish smile when I happened to drive by was something to warm the coldest heart. “Ten stitches,” he said, with pride; and he looked like a great honor had been given him instead of a near-great misfortune. He thanked me profusely, although all I did was drive him half a mile (at the end of which drive he had presence of mind enough to apologize for the pool of blood on the floor of my truck).

What real part the farm will play in my life yet remains to be seen. I think truly that it will always remain a place that I love and to which I will always long to return. Whether or not I shall actually live there for any extended time of course depends on many things—the most important of these being marriage. At any rate I shall have a home, for you cannot call Sunnyside or New York City a “home” and really mean anything.

The creosoting took me to 3 p.m. and it was 1 a.m. before I finally got back to Sunnyside. Dad and mother had expected me earlier and apparently had gotten perturbed when I did not show up. Mother actually came down when I arrived. I for some reason was angry because she had stayed awake. I don’t know why I felt that way. So our meeting came off very poorly. And in the morning, Dad wouldn’t even speak to me, which was a very nice send-off indeed. True, I should have come home earlier; but he instead of pouting and acting like an infant, should have tried to make the best of whatever time I was at home. Luckily the AFSC slipped up on boat tickets, I had an unexpected five days that I spent at home very pleasantly—except for Dad’s idiotic taking us to Chambord restaurant, because it was the most expensive in NYC. The food was mediocre, the waiters hovered over you constantly and made everyone uncomfortable, and the bill for three of us was $30, which really made me cringe. We went to a pleasant show afterward, however, and returned home quite satisfied—that is, with the only kind of satisfaction or love or unity our family knows: external satisfaction, which wears off in an hour or two.

The week at Pendle Hill was exciting. It is a community in the fullest sense, and a school in the fullest sense, too. It gives no degrees because it does not want students who come for degrees; it encourages independence and individual work; it brings together people of nations and thoughts diverse; and everyone washes dishes, hoes the corn.

Henry Cadbury of Harvard was there—one of those irresistible salty New Englanders, twang and all; and Chakavarty from India. Dorothy Day was to come later; I would have liked meeting her since she advocates subsistence farming. Our group heard lectures from these people, from workers in the AFSC office, and from some recently returned from Europe. We also had all the diversions—a party, square dancing, singing, walks, etc.

I am never satisfied with knowing people superficially, and therefore get to know no one, superficially or otherwise. It is the same here on the boat. I seem to remember a passage in Lawrence's book concerning this—very appropriate: "There was always this feeling of jangle and discord in the Leivers family. Although the boys resented so bitterly this external appeal to their deeper feelings of resignation and proud humility, yet it had its effect on them. They could not establish between themselves and an outsider just the ordinary human feeling and unexaggerated friendship; they were always restless for the something deeper. Ordinary folk seemed shallow to them, trivial and inconsiderable. And so they were unaccustomed, painfully uncouth in the simplest social intercourse, suffering, and yet insolent in their superiority. Then beneath was the yearning for the soul-intimacy to which they could not attain because they were too dumb, and every approach to close connection was blocked by their clumsy contempt of other people. They wanted genuine intimacy, but they could not get even normally near to anyone, because they scorned to take the first steps, they scorned the triviality which forms common human intercourse" (pp. 183–184, Modern Library edition).

Conversations with all sorts of people at Pendle Hill, including a self-styled reformer who had everything "worked out." What we need (!) he said, is "mutual freeing"; then he gave lengthy and involved definitions of "mutual" and of "freeing," reading of course from his notebook. It was ridiculous.

S.S. Waterman off the southern tip of England

Final day of a ten-day trip that seems to have passed very quickly. Our passage was "uneventful," as they say—no storms, no fog, no emergency at all. I met and chatted with many people—boys and girls—but never passed beyond the chatting stage. Read Lawrence's Sons and Lovers, and Turgenev's Fathers and Sons; heard lectures on existentialism, French theater, Camus, French music, neo-Fascism in Italy, Spain, and Germany; on student life in England, Holland, Germany; attended language classes in French and Dutch; heard Mme. Oosthous do dramatic presentations: Shaw's Saint Joan and a Chinese melodrama called The Chalk Circle—both very fine, especially since she played all the parts herself.

I did not get any real feeling for the power or even the immensity of the ocean. The ship is big enough so that on calm seas such as we have had, you hardly know that you are sailing—there is no excitement to it. I do hope that on the return voyage there will be at least one severe storm, so we rock a bit and a little water comes on deck. Also, the weather the past ten days has been almost continually overcast, so we have not been able to admire the beautiful sunsets that one is supposed to be able to view at sea. The whole idea, once again, is full and complete comfort; they fill you full of food, served à la Chambord by delightful Malayan boys; then you do nothing in a physical way; then you eat again. I would like very much sometime to travel the seas in a small boat, not as a guest, a boat where one can work and fish and feel a little salty and where the sight of land will mean more after ten days or so than it does now.

The passengers on this boat, aside from the handful of lecturers and group leaders, are almost all students, mostly going on tours or programs like NSA, Experiment in International Living, Travel and Study, etc., etc. They are a good lot, these students, serious for the most part, I think, and generally concerned about the world situation. Only I think that few would pass beyond the concern stage. Above all—and this must certainly impress the Europeans—they are all remarkably healthy-looking, fresh, pert, and well-dressed. And a remarkable number of both girls and boys are quite beautiful in face and body. I am anxious to see how the Europeans compare in all this. Also one notices the unabashed, natural sexiness of both sexes, the girls in their shorts, with beautiful (shaven) legs; the boys in tight-fitting pants. A wonderful thing all this, so like the Elizabethans in their freedom, and so much better than the prudishness and Victorian neurotic fear that sadly characterize the unconscious attitudes that my father has left with me. If I can only break the chain in this respect, and rear children whose thoughts and emotions agree naturally, I will have done a great deal.

Paris

Cette ville est vraiment remarquable. Je suis ice depuis Mardi et il faut que je partirai demain matin pour Michaelshoeve. Lundi, tous les QIVS sont allés à Delft, où nous avons mangés, puis à Amsterdam. Delft est petit et très joli; Amsterdam et grand, pleins des bruits, comme des autres grandes villes. Nous avons fait un voyage par bateau parmi les canaux, qui sont très intéressants. Le prochain matin, Andy a parti à Finland, Clif à l'Allemande, etc. Cinq jours étaient libres pour moi; donc, j'ai monté le train à Paris.

Là, je suis allé au bureau des Amis, et puis ici à Camp Volent, un grand ville des tentes, 7 rue Barbet-Jouy, près d' Invalides. On paye 380 francs pour se coucher et manger deux repas, mais le nutriment est très mauvais. Donc, je mange le petit déjeuner ici, achete le déjeuner dans un restaurant, et a 18 heures, j'achete un petit bagette pour 30 fr., à peu près 100 g. du fromage Suisse, un or deux bananes, et un demi-litre du lait—tout coute à peu près 150 francs, très bon marché et très délicieux.

J'ai recontré deux Belges, étudiants de la mathematic à l'Université de Ghent. Nous avons habités la meme tente. Mardi soir nous sommes allés à la Place Pigale; et le prochain soir au Quatier Latin, où sont les existentialists. Pendant la journée, nous nous avons promenés, sur les Champs Elysées, etc., et nous avons vus Notre Dame, le Louvre, l'Arc de Triomphe, les Tuilleries, etc. Hier, j'ai monté le train à Versailles, et j'ai passé presque toute la journée là. Il ne faut pas le dire, mais Versailles est formidable. J'ai aimé tous les deux, le chateau et les jardins. Hier soir, j'ai acheté un billet pour le théâtre—une comédie musicale: le mettre-en-scene était le "star" véritable. Il y a aussi beaucoup de nus, très très belles. Elles sont remarquables, les nus: on pense de la beauté, et pas de le sexe. Ce soir, tôt, j'irai voir Maurice Chevalier et Collette Marchande, la très belle danseur que j'ai vu en 1949 à Boston, dans le ballet de Roland Petit.

Mais le chose que j'aime le mieux de tout, c'est de parler le français. J'essaye le faire tous les temps, et souvent les français rient à mon accent. Quand je comprends quelqu'un, je suis très heureux, mai je ne comprends pas beaucoup. Je ne porte pas des appareils photographique, et je m' habille très simple—donc, c'est vrai.

Michaelshoeve, Brummen (G1), Holland

Work camp at Michaelshoeve, a home for mentally retarded children: Mongolian idiots, encephalitics, etc. The directors believe in anthroposophy, a theory of metempsychosis, and they minister to the souls of these children with loving care because they believe the souls will survive these useless bodies, and in the next incarnation will inhabit normal homes. Here is an application of the pragmatic dictum: "What works is true." Metempsychosis works at Michaelshoeve. It gives the staff the necessary devotion and patience in very trying work. Therefore I do not begrudge the belief. Here they combine Hindu metaphysic with Christian ethics: the sense of duty toward the unfortunate.

The camp has gone very well this past week. We are living in that routinized sort of life that is very acceptable every so often and that certainly tends toward bodily health and regularity.

Michaelshoeve

Piet Tuinman left today, to enter two years of military service in the Dutch army medical corps. He is one of those very articulate chaps whose keen mind can always find something to say. A typical Dutchman in appearance—thin, not too tall, with a prominent nose and a sort of scavenger look softened by a kind smile. He says he is a sort of humanist, and that his religion is very inexpensive, since he always avoids collection boxes (in the Dutch Reformed service I attended yesterday, they collected money four times from each person). We struck up a quick friendship that softened a bit as the week drew on. He likes Nietzsche and I could go along with him there, for he thinks that the usual interpretation of Nietzsche (Nazi, etc.) is wrong, and I agree of course. Piet is studying to be a sociologist, especially from the angle of economic planning. He will work in a sociological institute somewhere and will always be very clever and very likable. He and Brad Foulds, an American girl from West Hartford, became tied with hoops of steel. She has the same Connecticut twang as Frank Pyle, only with him it was delightful, with her disgusting. It is hard to know how much there is in her, but my first impression says to me: not much, aside from all the social graces.

Riek Kleefstra plays the violin—well for a girl of 18. She is as sweet as can be, and I'm only sorry we cannot speak to each other very much because of language difficulty. White hair, typical of Friesland, where she lives.

Reinoud Oort, age 19, is extraordinary. When he first came he hardly said a word, and did not even look too intelligent. But now I have gotten to know him a bit (as well as language barriers permit). He seems to be of a noble species of humans: first in appearance—that haunting type of beauty, so different from the brazen handsomeness of the actors and movie stars: a strong, expressive face topped with curly dark hair, a face that suffers not from the first outgrowths of beard (which should be shaved) or from an occasional pimple, a face that seems constructed for every situation—for love, for concentration, for joy and laughter, for hard work—, a face of absolute individuality, once you come to know it. And a body to match: small and muscular, perfectly proportioned, brown, and always alive; a body that carries all types of clothes as any manufacturer could picture in his dreams. But behind this physical frame is a soul of utmost delicacy, a sensitive soul, a musical soul. And a soul with its element of mysteriousness, of secretness, a soul that says it likes to be alone, to think, to philosophize, to think while working, to philosophize while playing piano—with delicacy, always with delicacy. He plays very well, very well indeed; sight reads with perfect assuredness, and with real musicianship; sings the same way; and plays organ and violin as well. A lover of Bach. A lover who must play Bach. An original thinker perhaps not, a rebel neither—I do not know. More likely a faller into tradition who is not hurt thereby. A prospective minister whose father is a minister and whose grandfather was minister and professor both. Men are curious: they think too much, they go into the metaphysic; they seek beauty and are lost without it. But this makes them—I see that now, for I see here at Michaelshoeve—men without minds, and they are pets, like Pinky and Maggie—pets, no better than dogs—and really worse, for dogs can take care of themselves.

Reinoud and Riek and I cycled toward Deventer to visit his uncle and aunt, who weren't home. The uncle is a retired doctor who writes books on Chinese poetry and keeps bees. We left rather late and were caught in a rainstorm, so had to beg for sleeping quarters in a farmer's barn. On Sunday we went to a big church in Zutphen; then played piano.

Gibran's chapter on work in "The Prophet": extraordinarily important and appropriate for work camp. Read at silent meeting.

Ambleside, Lake Region, England

Today Donella and I visited Wordsworth's cottage at Grasmere, and I translated several of the MS's for her into French. I was more impressed with Grasmere than with Shakespeare's home at Stratford-on-Avon, which we saw two days ago. Of course, the Lake Country is beautiful—physically like the Adirondacks, perhaps inferior—but the man-made factors are far superior to the tourist cabins and billboards of America.

All is nicely uncommercial and genuine, and it is still clearly evident that this country here is ample inspiration for the poetic muse.

Donella Gandolfi of Rome, and I left Michaelshoeve Thursday after lunch, and reached Rotterdam by hitch-hiking, that night. Next day through Brussels, to Lille. Saturday to Dunkerque, by boat to Dover, and by a lift to a town near Oxford, where we slept in a field for want of a youth hostel. The next morning, Sunday, unshaved and unwashed, we went to an inn for breakfast and overheard two very proper Britishers agree that we were the “two most savage-looking people” they had ever seen. Thenceforth we referred to ourselves as “les deux sauvages.” Then to Birmingham on Sunday to visit Woodbooke College, where I have made application. (Exchanged Waterman ticket at Rotterdam for an open one, good until June.) Then to Stratford and a pleasant Monday writing letters. Saw a performance of Macbeth that night with Ralph Richardson, a good but not extraordinary job. Yesterday to Kendal. Today here in the lakes. Tomorrow to London, I hope, to visit Lionel. Then soon back to Rotterdam, where I hope Reinoud and Riek will meet us. I wrote to Dad to send money, etc., and told him of my plans to stay here in Europe to study organ and perhaps German, to travel a bit, and then to spend either three or six months at Woodbooke. Now my greatest fear is the draft board. Hope to convince them that my studying is legitimate. I think that parents will be a bit angry perhaps—but now this is my life—and while I have control of it, I must do what is most important for me.

Arrived late last night chez Lionel, 39 Longfield Ave., Mill Hill, to find him not yet returned from the continent. His mother wailed a bit—the “only son” business, etc.—but was generous and hospitable. This morning met Brad and an American and an Australian in Piccadilly for lunch. Went to the National Gallery, where Donella m’a fait une explication—they have an extraordinary Michelangelo. The others were mostly interested in finding the next bench to sit down. Donella and I later found this horrible temporary hostel and walked a bit along the Thames, where we saw the Parliament buildings, Westminster Abbey, and the idiot guards in front of Buckingham Palace. London in all is a horrible place, clean and pretty in places, but entirely too big and unwieldy. It is very much like New York, only worse, I think.

Donella and I have talked much and with mutual pleasure. Her parents were, and still are, fascists. But she, of course, is definitely the opposite. She is a free-thinking gal! But I miss Riek.

The English are truly insular. Everyone thought we were French, despite my accent. And one bank clerk, after seeing Donella's passport and mine, and then hearing us converse in French, said to me, "You speak Italian very well."

Canterbury

Donella and I visited the extraordinary cathedral here this afternoon. It far surpasses Westminster and all the others I have seen, perhaps because the history of Thomas à Becket is very real for me. The antiquity of buildings such as this is unbelievable for Americans; parts still standing were built during Norman times. We left to reach the hostel, which required a 2½ mile walk through lovely countryside. All in all, Canterbury, both center and environs, is exquisite. No time for supper, for we just managed to get back at 6:30 for Evensong. Dean Hewlett Johnson preached the sermon. He had just returned from China, which he had also visited twenty years ago. His text was from the gospels, describing how Jesus' first service to mankind was the healing of the sick. Then he gave a very vivid description of the unbelievably bad conditions of health and sanitation in China twenty years ago, and after that described how the new [Communist!] government has succeeded in improving these conditions remarkably. For instance, he spoke of the five-mile-long open sewer in Peking, immediately behind a magnificent temple, a sewer full of dead animals, rotting flesh and human excretion, a breeding place for flies, mosquitoes, for diseases of all descriptions. And how, recently, many thousands of volunteers dug out that ditch, laid sewer pipes, and covered the whole over with dirt.

He also described the rat-killing campaigns, the fly-catching, and the great mass vaccinations that have recently taken place, with of course untold effect on cleanliness and health.

Johnson spoke with remarkable sincerity and fervor. He was concise above all; effective. The whole service for me was a memorable one. It recalled the simple peasant folk who sat in the same places to hear Thomas preach also the brotherhood of man and the virtues of healing the sick. In all, this was a grateful relief from the bustle of London and from the atmosphere of Westminster Abbey, the grand showplace and cemetery. Thank goodness that there are not such monstrosities in America.

One of the people who gave me a lift described how, during the war, the barriers of class were forgotten, how wealthy manufacturers took humble laborers to work in limousines, and how toute de suite après la guerre all this amitié was forgotten, how the class differences suddenly returned, and how of course they have remained.

Also talked last week with many truck drivers, a coal miner, a gentlemanly army instructor, petty manufacturer, gentleman farmer, real farmer, etc., etc. Spent one day with a German, another with an Australian.

Inquired about nursing opportunities for Riek. Looks good. A girl can start when she's 18, and she is paid £200 per year. It will really be funny if Riek actually lands in London to study. Her whole life will be changed because of going to what seemed to be a quite innocent work camp. Our kisses, and our night locked together naked in my sleeping bag in the rain, but protected a bit by the trees near Brummen, is still to me a sort of fantasy. I cannot really comprehend that I was a "participant," so to speak. Was it wrong? No, it was beautiful. But I'm glad that we decided not to have intercourse, because if the relationship does not develop further we would both regret the incident terribly. She says she loves me. Perhaps she does. Yes, I think she does. But I think it is the first love of a child. She is really still a child. I know that I don't love her—yet. But it is really too soon to know. Actually, we only began our "friendship" with the first kiss, a short week before I left. How I wish she were with me on this trip! But I shall see more of her in Holland, and then we shall see what happens.

I must write more about Riek and me because I understand nothing really. We worked together quite a bit starting about the second week of the camp, cutting branches, with Reinoud also. One weekend Reinoud, Riek and I cycled toward Deventer: talked much, and all felt very free and natural because we were among free and natural surroundings. All this time I had no inkling that Riek liked me in any special way, and I don't think she did either. Most of the conversation was between Reinoud and me, about music, or between Reinoud and Riek because then they could speak Nederlands. And even when we three made music in the evenings, the coupling was precisely the same: Reinoud and I with the Mozart 4-hands, and Reinoud and Riek with the violin and piano works. I liked Reinoud immensely. We had talked much, and frankly, about the individual's search for faith and inner meaning, about war refusal, inner philosophy, and I liked his manner, his individualism, his spontaneity and inner strength. But of Riek I thought nothing in particular. Of course I liked her very much, her white hair and clear face, her innocence and youthfulness.

Then, the following Saturday, Reinoud left. The next day Riek and I biked, alone to the Van Gogh Museum, all the others going by bus because of the threatening weather. We talked freely and well. We arrived too early and lay down close to one another on the grass, but I never even thought of kissing her. In the museum she showed an amazingly acute appreciation of the paintings, and I enjoyed seeing them with her. On the way back she suddenly started talking about her relationship with boys, how she liked them to be "friends," not "boy-friends," and how when one tried to kiss her she became angry. How she didn't believe in kissing—only when the husband-to-be was found, etc., etc. All extremely school-girlish. That was all. Soon she became a little self-conscious and we changed the subject.

A few days later we worked with Lionel. Gloria had spoken to Riek about her troubles, how she loved Lionel, etc., and Riek told Lionel. It came out that Lionel had kissed Gloria and this led Riek to again speak of kissing. She said, rather cryptically, that she had changed her mind. I said, jokingly to Lionel, that this must have implications!

The following Saturday we took a long walk, finally landing in a pretty park and forest. We lay down and slept a bit. I wanted very much to kiss her all the time but was afraid that she would be angry. We returned and played music.

The next day, Sunday, we decided to go to Arnhem by auto-stop. But luck was bad and we then decided to take bikes. Riek drew me aside and said that she wanted to tell me something, and that she hoped it would not be the end of our friendship. Of course she said that she wanted to kiss me. I said that I wanted the same. We went back to the same bit of forest outside Brummen, lay down, and kissed and embraced, long and passionately. She said that she never knew it was so delicious to kiss a boy. I don't know what I felt. I felt the warmth of another body close-by; I felt the attractiveness of sex, of the opposite sex. But I felt no lust. Lust would be impossible with Riek. She is too pure. We talked much, and deliciously, about ourselves.

The next day, Monday, a work-day, we wanted very much to embrace again, and I told her: after supper. When the time came she thought I had forgotten; she put the frontlet on, and pretended she was going alone to Brummen. I said she was silly, and we went to the gardens and kissed again, but it was unpleasant because we feared that people would come. I told her that we must wait until Wednesday, the free night. All Tuesday I could not help but think of the next night. And she too. I thought how innocent and beautiful our relationship was, how wonderfully youthful and spontaneous. I thought of Longus's Daphnis and Chloe, of Hero and Leander, and the other tales of pure, unabashed love. I wanted to experience this myself. I especially wanted to be naked, but I did not want, or at least did not think it wise, to have intercourse. So I made a G-string so that Riek should not be afraid. Meanwhile, Donella and I had decided that we must leave on Thursday, so my desire increased, as Wednesday should be perhaps our last night together.

All day Wednesday it rained, but toward evening it cleared a bit. We left after dark. I brought my sleeping bag as protection against rain and cold. When we arrived in the forest I said that it would be more beautiful to kiss naked. She drew back a bit but I assured her that she had nothing to fear. She agreed, and we both squeezed into the sack. It began to rain, but we noticed it not, locked in embrace and kisses. We talked, we kissed more; it was delicious. A dream, unbelievable, that two people should be so! It came time to return, but we noticed it not. We tried to sleep, but could not. We preferred kissing. But finally the rain came too hard; we had to return. Everything a mess and wet. We dried off, and I changed into pajamas so that she could see me naked. Mr. Hoek then came in (it was 1:30 a.m.) and chided us a bit for worrying everybody. We didn't mind too much; it didn't matter what other people thought!

But she is just a child. Perhaps I am, too.

On the boat, chatted with a group of English school children going to Belgium. They thought us French of course, and then one of them saw my USA address on the rucksack. "You're not an American," he said. "Yes, I am." "But you can't be." "Why not?" "Well, you're not chewing gum."

Chez Reinoud. I can stay here until I receive letters from England, and then perhaps afterwards, too. Will seek an organ teacher tomorrow. Talked with Max Kleefstra, Riek's brother, a chemistry student at Groningen. He is very voluble on politics and other subjects. Last night at Riek's in Leeuwarden. I don't like the family. The father is very Babbittish; one brother is a moron; the mother is plain, but I cannot really judge her, for she speaks only Dutch, and we cannot talk. Reinoud's family is quite the opposite. The mother, one of those solid women who keep a household together; the father a pastor and delightful person, very unclerical; sisters and brothers all very smart, pert, and pleasant. I do not know what I must do about Riek. I do not love her, and to encourage her would be wrong. And yet when she kisses me I enjoy it so! It is wonderful simply to know that there is someone in the world who wants to kiss you!

I want very much now to begin really studying again: the organ, more Greek and French, and a beginning of German. Can I do it without outside pressure?

September 6 1952

lunchroom in Leeuwarden

Arranged to take organ lessons with Mr. Batenburg, organist of Matinikerk, St. Janstraat, Groningen, at the Stedelijke Muziekschool. A one-hour lessons each week, for one year, costs f. 150, or about $0.75 for each lesson. This compares rather favorably with the $7.00 I paid last year.

Returned to Leeuwarden. Last night walked with Riek. I absolutely do not know what to do about this relationship. Reinoud says to break it off immediately, and he is undoubtedly right. But I do not seem to have the desire, or the courage. Last night, Riek and I talked quite frankly. I told her that it is too soon for me to know if I love her, but when she suggested that probably the least painful way to continue would be to stop seeing each other, I said no: that we must continue. I am so afraid of really hurting her, and yet I know that the day will come when I shall have to do so, and the longer I wait the more it will hurt. Damn it, why can't I love her? Then we would be married tout de suite, and it would be over. But when I think of the family, I draw back in horror. It is so small and (I don't like to say it) so très petit bourgeois! And not overly intelligent, I think.

And the difficulties mount. Since the camp, of course, she has changed, and now she does not like her parents, especially because she has to go to the office. I shudder to think that I could be the cause not only of personal misery for her, but of a permanent rift between her and the parents. If this happens, Michaelshoeve will be for Riek the most damaging remembrance of her life.

I have no doubt that she loves, but I think now that unconsciously mingled with her love is the feeling that I am a kind of deliverer, that I will rescue her from the office, from her parents; that I am the means to England, to America. This is all childish, I think. But it is so difficult to know what is this and what is that; and what must a body do!

I think I have too much of a feeling that we can talk, do things together, sleep naked, etc., for a certain length of time, and then stop and forget. She said last night that perhaps the boy can forget but never the girl. I do not rightly know, but I think she is right. She is righteous, and the thought of doing these things with another boy after I am gone would be impossible for her, at least for a long time.

From Eliot's Murder in the Cathedral

Thomas:

We do not know very much of the future
 Except that from generation to generation
 The same things happen again and again.
 Men learn little from others' experience.
 But in the life of one man, never
 The same time returns. Sever
 The cord, shed the scale. Only
 The fool, fixed in his folly, may think
 He can turn the wheel on which he turns.

First tempter, after Thomas refuses to be tempted to return to his youthful indulgences:

Then I leave you to your fate.
 I leave you to the pleasures of your higher vices,
 Which will have to be paid for at higher prices.
 If you will remember me, my Lord, at your prayers,
 I'll remember you at kissing-time below the stairs.

Thomas:

Temporal power, to build a good world,
 To keep order, as the world knows order.
 Those who put their faith in worldly order
 Not controlled by the order of God,
 In confident ignorance, but arrest disorder,
 Make it fast, breed fatal disease,
 Degrade what they exalt.

Now is my way clear, now is the meaning plain:
 Temptation shall not come in this kind again.
 The last temptation is the greatest treason:
 To do the right deed for the wrong reason.

Thomas (to the priests, who would save him from the assassins):

You think me reckless, desperate and mad.
 You argue by results, as this world does,
 To settle if an act be good or bad.
 You defer to the fact. For every life and every act
 Consequences of good and evil can be shown.
 And as in time results of many deeds are blended
 So good and evil in the end become confounded.
 It is not in time that my death shall be known;
 It is out of time that my decision is taken
 If you call that decision
 To which my whole being gives entire consent.
 I give my life
 To the Law of God above the Law of Man.
 Unbar the door! unbar the door!
 We are not here to triumph by fighting, by stratagem, or by resistance,
 Not to fight with beasts as men. We have fought the beasts
 And have conquered. We have only to conquer
 Now, by suffering. This is the easier victory.
 Now is the triumph of the Cross, now
 Open the door! I command it. OPEN THE DOOR!

Chorus:

. . . those who deny Thee could not deny, if Thou didst not exist; and their denial is never complete, for if it were so, they would not exist.

They affirm Thee in living; all things affirm Thee in living; the bird in the air, both the hawk and the finch; the beast on the earth, both the wolf and the lamb; the worm in the soil and the worm in the belly.

Therefore man, who Thou hast made to be conscious of Thee, must consciously praise Thee, in thought and in word and in deed.

Even with the hand to the broom, the back bent in laying the fire, the knee bent in cleaning the hearth, we, the scrubbers and sweepers of Canterbury,

The back bent under toil, the knee bent under sin, the hands to the face under fear, the head bent under grief,

Even in us the voices of seasons, the snuffle of winter, the song of spring the drone of summer, the voices of beasts and of birds, praise Thee.

. . . . .

Forgive us, O Lord, we acknowledge ourselves as type of the common man,

Of the men and women who shut the door and sit by the fire;

Who fear the blessing of God, the loneliness of the night of God, the surrender required, the deprivation inflicted;

Who fear the injustice of men less than the justice of God;

Who fear the hand at the window, the fire in the thatch, the fist in the tavern, the push into the canal,

Less than we fear for the love of God.

We acknowledge our trespass, our weakness, our fault; we acknowledge

That the sin of the world is upon our heads; that the blood of the martyrs and the agony of the saints

Is upon our heads.

Lord, have mercy upon us.

Christ, have mercy upon us.

Lord, have mercy upon us.

Blessed Thomas, pray for us.

Today, first organ lesson with Mr. Batenburg. The organ I play on was built in 1500 (!) and is the oldest organ in Holland. Just manual work thus far: Pachelbel, Cabezón, Kerll, etc. I must practice long and hard this week, for he has given me much to prepare.

Donella left this morning for Italy. Reinoud, Riek, and I have standing invitations to visit her in Rome.

I definitely must do something about Riek. This mustn't go any further. I really think I am playing the game very foul—taking advantage of a splendid opportunity for sex, but without (yes, I am sure of it) really loving the girl.

I am anxious to hear from home. My family means more to me here than it ever did when I was in the United States.

I want to write music for the Oort family to play, for two violins, cello, voice, piano.

I am studying Nederlands a bit. It is not too difficult at the beginning.

September 10, 1952

Things move too rapidly now. Today I received an acceptance from Woodbrooke College for the term beginning September 26th and ending December 13th. This gives me a safer position as regards the draft board, but I am sorry to have to leave Mr. Batenburg so soon. Perhaps I shall return here to study in January. This latest turn of events throws yet another light on the already multiform picture of Riek. I must make good my "escape" to England without her feeling that I am in any way obliged to her. Perhaps I am a fool—when a girl loves you like that it is a rare thing. But to marry her without loving would be disastrous to us both. It is a tragic situation: one-way love. Better no love at all.

It is a bit difficult to begin study again, but truthfully I enjoy it.

My thoughts now turn to the ministry as a profession. I wish I or someone could objectively balance pros and cons (with the Jewish question a heavy weight indeed) and render me a verdict. One thing is sure:

my family will be horrified, and perhaps it will mean a break, though I don't think a permanent one. I must write to Donald Harrington and to Meadville Theological Seminary again. Now!

From: "The Peace Testimony of the Society of Friends" by Howard Brinton:

"Fox and his fellow preachers were not peace propagandists. They were wary about teaching what they called 'notional religion,' that is a religion based on ideas rather than on experience. They felt that a notional religion resided in that part of the mind which was, to use another Quaker phrase, 'afloat on the surface.' Robert Barclay writes of this insight in his treatise called Universal Love: 'Friends were not gathered together by unity of opinion or by a tedious and particular disquisition of notions and opinions, requiring an assent to them, and binding themselves by Leagues and Covenants thereto; but the manner of gather was by a secret want, which many truly tender and serious souls in sundry sects found in themselves which put each sect in search of something beyond all opinion which might satisfy their weary souls, even the revelation of God's righteous judgments in their hearts.'

". . . The Quaker objection to war was based primarily on feeling and intuition rather than on rational arguments or Scriptural authority. This intuition was dynamic; it was an enhancement of life rather than a part of doctrine. The Light Within gives more than knowledge of moral values. It gives also power to act on knowledge. . . . Such direct insight into the nature of goodness combined with a sense of obligation to behave in accordance with it, is usually called conscience, but for the Quakers the Light Within is not conscience but rather that which shines into conscience. Conscience is influenced by training and environment as well as by the Light. For this reason it may reveal one way of behaving to one person and another way to another person. The individual must therefore educate and enlighten his conscience by sensitizing himself to the Light of Truth in his soul. This process of sensitizing conscience takes place most thoroughly in a meeting for worship. Yet, though conscience is an imperfect instrument for transmitting the Light, its claims are absolute and must always be obeyed, for conscience gives us the highest knowledge of the Light that we have at any one time. Because clearer and clearer knowledge may be progressively attained as the virtue of obedience grows, Friends have never declared any doctrine to be a final and unalterable creed.

“Whensoever such a thing shall be brought forth in the world it must have a beginning before it can grow and be perfected. And where should it begin but in some particulars [individuals] in a nation, and so spread by degrees. Therefore whoever desires to see this lovely state brought forth in the general, must cherish it in the particular.’ (Isaac Penington) Such a statement expresses the willingness of a minority to take an advanced position not only for the principle involved but also to point the way to others.”

Yesterday I wrote Riek about my having to leave for England, and proposed that we meet next weekend. This morning she phoned, that we must meet this weekend also. And I had wanted to have some time with Reinoud. Now what shall we do, and how can we sleep together without arousing all the world’s suspicions?

Letter from mother: how all things seem to conspire into the instant! As if she knew my thoughts. Viz.: “I have felt very badly about your staying away, but am trying very hard to understand what you are feeling about yourself. I do hope that in pursuing the studies you have mentioned that you will gradually have a clear goal in mind as to your future vocation. I must mention here and now that I hope and trust that you do not have the ministry in mind, for that would hurt me to the core. You remarked in your letter that if you make mistakes they will only hurt you, and not us. Peter, you’ll probably not be fully aware of the fact that parents feel the impact of everything concerning their children—until you are a parent yourself!”

How much can one person take? And how am I really ever to know whether my absolute rebellion from everything in my background will be my emancipation or my destruction? It is best to cling to roots—yes, I know—but I have no roots, and in all that I do I try to find new ones, to create a life, outlook, personality and way of living absolutely different from that of my parents; to be continually alive as they are not; to thrill in life’s instincts, without shame; and yet to cultivate and adore all the nobility which man can attain, also without shame (and without pride). Above all, to raise children into the kind of human beings that human beings can be: beautiful in body, mind, and spirit; fearless of tradition or of radicalism; with strong consciences; and yet healthy consciences; with the will, power, and talent to accomplish whatever the Spirit within demands. But above all, I would see in them a constant seeking and questioning, a constant endeavor to beautify and ennoble their lives and the lives of others. Can such people exist?

Practiced on the organ last night and 3½ hours this morning. Finished Turnbull's novel "The Bishop's Mantle"—surprisingly good considering the plot is sort of a patch-up affair with no real ending, merely a succession of events, with Hilary Laurens, Episcopal priest, as the common focus. All the usual human problems enter: love, death, morals, so the book is tear-pulling. But it adds little to the world's store of literature. The one really interesting idea is that all action, including that called spiritual, is really determined by fleshly beauty—by woman's allure. I am still unsophisticated enough a reader to have been able to fall in completely with the little that the book did have to offer, so on the whole it was not a waste of time.

Walked around Assen a bit. The Dutch towns are all extremely prosperous-looking, extremely clean, and they have their own sort of beauty. I watched the children going to and from school, all on their bikes, a very pleasing sight. Yes, everything here is pleasing, everything is just right. Yet behind it all I think there is an over-powering sense of conservatism, of tradition. Life is really quite standardized. With only minor variation all Dutchmen of each economic stratum eat the same, dress the same, and live in the same kind of houses. But more important, I think they cherish more or less identical goals, the most important of which is a good family life. For everything is the family and the family is everything. Children return home after school; parents and children live together in the fullest sense, and to keep such a life going the Dutchman must have his culture: not a passive "listener" culture but an active one, especially musically. The family plays and sings together. Father the violin, son the piano, daughter studies voice, youngest son begins the cello. Also, the father helps the young son with his studies; the mother busies herself most of the day with housework and cooking. I don't think there are very many hired servants here.

At the edge of Assen is a wood, with lovely paths, ponds, lanes, everything done with precision, symmetry, and exactness, as befits the Dutch character.

September 15, 1952

Slept again with Riek. I told her that I do not love her. Her response was to ask me to sleep with her. We agreed that when I go away we will both come to know if we need the other—so in this way I will break off with the least pain.

Catastrophe! From the draft board. I most likely will have to return now as soon as possible. I listed farm work 1st choice, office 2nd, and AFSC 3rd because AFSC is not on the list of accepted work.

From Pearl Buck's Dragon Seed:

“This youngest son did not often come home, either, but when he came it was always to tell of some success he had had, and he told of it, laughing and proud, and he grew vain of his success and luck, and he came to believe that luck was his because he had some favor of Heaven. He would boast, ‘Heaven chose me to that work,’ or he said, ‘To that place Heaven led me’ or he said ‘Heaven put power in my hand,’ until one day Ling Tau burst out, ‘Do not say Heaven this and Heaven that! I tell you what happens on earth now is not the will of Heaven. It is not Heaven’s will that men kill each other, for Heaven created us. If we must kill, then let us not say it is Heaven who bids it.’ This he said as a father may speak to a son, and he was not pleased when he saw his handsome son lift his lip at him and sneer at him and say, ‘This is old doctrine and by such doctrine we are come to the place where we now are. We have lain dead with our ancestors instead of living in the world and while we slept others prepared weapons and came to attack us. We who are young know better!’

“Now this was such impudence as Ling Tau could not bear and he let fly his right hand and slapped his son full on his red mouth. ‘Talk to me like that!’ he roared at him. ‘By the doctrines of our ancestors we have lived for thousands of years and longer than any people on this earth! By peace men live, but by war they die, and when men live the nation lives and when men die the nation dies.’

“But Ling Tau did not know this son of his now. For the son stepped forward and raised his hand against his father, and he said in a bitter voice 'These are other times! You may not strike me! I can kill you as well as another!'

"This Ling Tau heard with his own ears, and his hands fell limp at his side. He stared at that handsome angry face which he himself had begotten and at last he turned away and sat down and hid his own face with his hand.

"I think you can kill me,' he whispered. 'I think you can kill anyone now.'

"The young man did not answer, but he did not change his proud and sullen look. He left the house and went away and Ling Tau did not see him for many days.

"They were not good days for Ling Tau and the nights were sleepless and he thought to himself, 'Is this not the end of our people when we become like other war-like people in the world?' And he wished that this younger son of his would die rather than live beyond this war.

"A man who kills because he loves to kill ought to die for the good of the people, though he is my own son,' Ling Tau thought heavily. 'Such men are always tyrants and we who are the people are ever at their mercy.'

"I do feel our youngest son is dead,' he told Ling Sao one night. 'He is so changed that I feel that tender boy we had is now no more—he who retched with horror when he saw the dead, even!' . . .

"Are we not all changed?' she asked.

"Are you changed?' he asked in his surprise.

"Am I not?' she replied. 'Can I ever go back to the old ways? Even when I hold the child on my knee I do not forget what he has done and must do.'

"Can we do differently?' he asked.

"No,' she said.

"He pondered a while and then said, 'And yet in these days we must remember that peace is good. The young cannot remember, and it is we who must remember and teach them again that peace is man's great food.'

"If they can be taught anything except what they have now heard,' she said sadly. 'I wish it were not so easy to kill people! Our sons grow used to this swift and easy way of ending all. I sometimes think that if you and I oppose them, old man, they will kill us as easily, if they have no other enemy, or they will fall upon each other.'

“He could not answer this, but he lay sleepless long after that and so did she, for he did not hear her steady snore that always told him when she slept. And he made up his mind then that though he would oppress the enemy as bitterly as ever, he would not let it be his life. Each day, whatever he did, he would take a little time to remember what peace was, and what the life here in this house once had been.

“And the more he remembered the more he knew that for him to kill a man was evil.

“‘Let others kill,’ he thought. ‘I will kill no more.’

“Thereafter he reasoned to himself that in his own way he served, because he kept alive in himself the knowledge that peace was right. Without excuse he gave no more the sign of death in his own village, and if any wondered, he let them wonder, and he made amends by putting poisons in his pond and killing all the fish so that the enemy gained nothing from it, and when the rice was ready for harvest, he threshed by night inside the court and hid more than half of what he had, and when that crop was reaped, what the enemy took was scarcely worth their fetching and to their anger he gave only silence and made silence his weapon.”

September 16, 1952

Assen

I was stupid to send the draft notice directly to the board, for now they will see that I am in Europe. But I don't like being “under cover” anyhow.

Letter from Carl Sibler. We can get electricity at the farm: $230 for installation with $100 refunded if I or Sibler become annual residents within five years; minimum $54 per year for the first five years; after that $12. I wrote to go ahead. The more I think of that farm, the more I love it.

Letter from Riek, which must be recorded here because it is so extraordinary, viz.:

“You shall be very surprised to receive so soon a letter but I must write you a letter now. I never felt me so lonely and so sad as I do now. I miss you terribly and I don't know what to do when you return to America. Then I'd have nobody to whom I can speak as I did with you. This is one reason I wrote this letter, the other is, that my friend Annie talked with my father and my father told her that he had not objections that I become a nurse in January or in March. That's good news for me. I think my parents were a bit angry because I returned so late, and I dare not ask them if I can come to Assen. But one thing is better when you come here. Here we always can go together and when I stay in Assen it's not comme il faut never to be at home. So we only are here at the meals. This afternoon at 1:00 I went to my violin-teacher and he was very content even when he heard I didn't study hard this weekend. I didn't really weep for weeks, but now I did. But still there is a little hope in me that perhaps you can stay 'till January in Europe. This is again a very bad written and sad letter, but I hope I can write you later on more letters.

"My parents are very kind towards me now and that consoles me a bit. I think when you come this weekend they will be it also towards you.

"You always think I'm only 18 and that I can soon forget what is between us, but that's not true, it's the opposite.

"I've never been like I am now. I feel me terrible hopeless.

"I hope you will write me very soon and I hope you will explain your feelings too.

"Again the word hope. Now it is that I hope you had a good organ-lesson and that you study hard.

"I look very . . . very forward to this weekend and I hope you come as soon as possible.

"Yours most affectionately,

Riek"

What am I to do!

It is much easier and less complicated to have a friendship with me, for then sex does not enter. I would like now just to be friends with Riek, but when you have slept with a girl and kissed her and felt her all over naked and she you, a certain obligation exists, and one cannot simply return to how it was before physical contact. But as I wrote to Pete, marriages can no better be based on obligation than on "assurance" (see his letter below), so the best thing is to break off completely and never see the girl again. This will be the second time for me. I hope the time comes when I don't want to break off (perhaps then the girl will—such is love and life).

But friendship with men can wax and wane freely and always be renewed and strengthened without the knowledge of bodily intimacy hanging over your heads. What I feel with Riek is that in our nights together we were animals: not that I am ashamed to be so, because we are animals and cannot deny it. But if you've once been an animal with someone and then stop it and try only to have an intellectual or spiritual friendship, the remembrance of the animal time spoils it all. Now I understand why the Church requires celibacy.

The beauty of a friendship with a man is that it's more spiritual than that with a woman; that it's untainted. Even if you admire his body you do so for its beauty and so this, too, is a spiritual admiration. A woman's body you admire for its beauty, yes, but you think it is beautiful because it stimulates the animal in you.

Pete's letter made me feel the warmth of real friendship. It follows:

"You never cease to amaze me. Every time I turn around your [sic] doing something entirely different from what was expected. However, it's just that element in you which explains yourself and makes you what you are. I'm tickled pink that you're so happy—that you've met someone whom you think you're in love with [alas! editor's note] and that you are at last getting a chance to study in the type of environment that you've longed for. I'm envious as all hell, but still I'm glad that it's your chance. I had a feeling when you left that I probably wouldn't see you for quite a while. It seems that I was right. I'm sort of selfish in that respect because I would have liked to have you here. The closer I get to another college year, the more I wish you were around because I've sort of depended on you. However, it will do me good to manage on my own resources.

"Your gal sounds like quite a wonderful person. I hope that you can make it work and bring her back to the Bien Plantation to set in motion a few of our dreams. Or maybe one day soon I'll come over there and see for myself the girl and the places you've raved so much about. It is so queer to read in your letters that you are heading for Calais, Rome, Paris, Rotterdam, etc. It sounds like a beautiful dream. Maybe that's only an illusion on my part, but from here it sounds wonderful.

"I'm at home now, for how long I don't know. I'm due back at school the 22nd but for a number of reasons which I'll explain, I might leave much earlier. Work this summer was just wonderful. I got $400 for being there and I had a great time. . . . However, having returned from there, I now have a great discomfort at staying home. One reason for that is because I've got a bit of wanderlust and want to get away. This part was caused by our letters, but not wholly. Another reason is—you guessed it—a woman. Yes, Pierre, I've sort of half done it again. I don't know what the reason is either. For three years I've been completely satisfied and in love with Bobbie. Yet for the past 4 months I've noticed and denied within myself any sort of dissatisfaction at our relationship. My denying it to myself was a grave error for it just prolonged any sort of mix-up. However, as things stand now, I'm trying first to reestablish in my own mind and heart some sort of stability which will help me to determine what it is I'm after. For all I know at this point, there may be nothing at all wrong in Bobbie's and my relationship. However, it was progressing toward a point "assumption" so that I assumed all sorts of things, I never really wondered or doubted my position. This bothered me because love and marriage must never run on assumption but rather on consideration. In that standpoint I missed the boat, for even in consideration I had "assumed" it. At any rate, Bobbie and I are not finished, but are biding our time. One reason is Rasa. She was a waitress at the Inn, up until six years ago a native of Lithuania and now a resident in Michigan and a student at Oberlin. From the very beginning of the summer we discovered all sorts of mutual interests and concerns which resulted in a good deal of hiking, constant playing of tennis, a very great amount of square and folk dancing, and last but certainly not least a love of music. All these activities we did together and with all the other kids up there, never realizing any special significance or emotion until the last two weeks. We then discovered that what we thought was a marvelous platonic relationship had elements of more than that. Consequently, at this point she is in Michigan and I am in R.I.—a situation which I don't enjoy. However, you can now see why I'm doubtful as to how long I'll be here.

"As you can see, everything is a bit confused but I have high hopes for everything turning out in one amalgamated piece. Qui le sait?

"Yes, Pete, I did receive your book and I do appreciate the thought behind it and the book more than this paper can convey. I haven't read it all yet, but when I do, and when I've finished my Mass, you can rest assured that it will be done for you. . . .

"I must close now, friend, and I hope to see you either here or there sometime soon. Regards are sent to you by Bobbie, family, Rasa, and me.

Pete—le premier ou deuxième, l'un ou l'autre"

Finished Aldous Huxley's Brave New World. I think Orwell's 1984 is better. Huxley always seems to say the most obvious things—though, granted, about strange subjects. I felt the same about Ends and Means, and remember distinctly that the writing, qua writing, left much to be desired. I wonder if Huxley would have ever been read if he hadn't borne such a famous name. Nevertheless his is a good voice to have, but I don't think that many people take him seriously. He is a sort of minor (very minor) Carlyle.

Letter from Holland-Amerika Lijn. I can sail on October 29th, not before. Still no word from home. Perhaps I will forget England and travel until the 29th. But I must get information soon, for I don't wish to go all the way to Birmingham unless I can stay there until January.

When I left America I thought it would be to see all the advantages of Europe and of European culture over the crudeness of the New World. But the longer I stay in Europe the more I realize how really better it is to live in America. For everything here is fixed. Patterns of life, standards of success or failure, motifs of behavior, even diet—and fixed ten times as strongly as in America where, too (granted), there are the “normal” ways of behaving. Even the education here has its drawbacks (and no wonder, for it is the education that creates and preserves the fixedness). Whereas I once unreservedly admired the European's grasp of language, the Classics, literature, etc., his real cultural training, I now see that although all this is duly admirable, the education does little to instill a desire for new things, for new ideas, and certainly directly does nothing to help students equate all the literature, etc. they study to their own lives in 1952. In Holland at the gymnasium there are six years of language, geography, mathematics, history, gymnastics, little else. After this, if the student is qualified for the university, he applies to a specific faculty—say, chemistry, theology—and then for 7 years does all his work under that faculty. Thus there is no general education at all, not in the American sense (which has its great faults) or in any other sense. Macaulay or somebody tells how Schopenhauer's education consisted of knowing but two philosophers, Plato and Kant, but really knowing them. This was certainly better for Schopenhauer than Mr. Aikin's Phil. 3 because the secret is that such specific work is really general. You cannot study Plato without a knowledge of Aristotle, or Kant without Hegel, etc. At the same time, you absorb all the teachings of the two principal men, instead of just glossing over names as in Phil. 3.

But the catch is that the non-philosophy-in-Europe-student studies no philosophy unless he reads on his own. And the non-literature student studies no literature besides the few books he had to struggle with, dictionary in hand, in conjunction with language classes. At least the American education system gives a taste and an acquaintance with what is available. Unfortunately, the American way of life does not cater to the leisurely existence needed to follow up such beginnings. But in total I think the American picture superior to the European, for at least in America, once stimulated by books, a person can carve out the type of life he desires with more facility than here in Europe, if it is at all possible here. I am glad I am not a European. For at 19 years of age or thereabouts, the student must definitely select a faculty—viz. must choose a life work—and there he is, stuck, perhaps. Oh yes, it's good for the majority. But not for "that solitary individual." The American system enables the majority to fall into their slots also, but it provides as well for the others and, I think, secretly admires them.

I am really for the first time beginning to realize that the "ideal" education of a country like Holland, which so surpasses American schooling with its thoroughness and culture-giving, is perhaps a delusion and a sort of sedative against any real progress in the arts or in thinking. It may explain why Holland has been so significantly unproductive in this respect for the last few hundred years. Latin and Greek are fine, but I wonder if they are really a sufficient basis for education. It seems that if you are too busy rehearsing continually the glories of other peoples and other literatures, you will not produce too much yourself.

America, I really believe and hope, can be soon the site of great original strides in the arts, in philosophy, even in religion. The place and time are ripe. We are civilized enough to appreciate our intellectual heritage, and yet raw enough not to be slaves to it and not to be afraid to deviate and produce something peculiar to our own genius.

Francis Bacon:

"Crafty men contemn studies, simple men admire them; and wise men use them; for they teach not their own use: that is a wisdom without them, and won by observation. Read not to contradict, nor to believe, but to weigh and consider. Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested. Reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man. And therefore if a man write little, he had need have a great memory; if he confer little, have a present wit; and if he read little, have much cunning to seem to know that he doth not. Histories make men wise, poets witty, the mathematics subtle, natural philosophy deep, morals grave, logic and rhetoric ready to contend.”

Leeuwarden

Chez Riek. I dreaded having to come here, but actually once here enjoyed being with Riek, although not with the family, which is oppressive. Today it is raining and I shall probably have to pass the entire day “thus,” which I don’t relish. For these people life must be appallingly dull. I think every day is exactly the same: a constant round of eating, combing the child’s hair, perhaps a bit of petty conversation (but not much), then sleep. On Sundays there are biscuits and black bread for breakfast in addition to the usual fare. That marks Sunday. No religion, no belief or excitement about anything intellectual or non-intellectual, except perhaps for football. The house miserably cramped and over-furnished. No taste, no originality, no suggestion of something clever or cute, but somber dark drab carpets and drapes, somber furniture, somber people. A depressing semi-poverty with nothing of the nobility that some people can attach to poverty. Poverty here is a constricting factor instead of a liberating one because the man of the house always says how poor he is, and how terrible that situation is, and how he would like to be a Rockefeller. Such an ass!

Yesterday I told Riek again that she must try to forget, that I could not marry her, etc., ad infinitum. But she still holds out hope and insists that we write until January and see if we miss each other immensely. Naturally it was a sad time for her, and for me, too. But I have learned much, for after talking in this way I thought it would be best to leave, and planned to take a 10:30 p.m. train. She, when she heard this, suggested that she could come to bed with me (which she had previously thought too dangerous in her own house). So I stayed, and when she came up I, as a matter of course, being naked, asked her to take off her clothes also, as she had done on the previous nights. She did, but what startled me was what she said on doing so: “You see, Peter, I will do anything you wish.” This really disgusted me, and brought home to me just what was happening: that she was in effect offering up her body as an inducement for me. How stupid! I was thoroughly repulsed by the whole affair, and was more or less bored with the endless embracing, petting, kissing, and the like. It's better to do as the cocks do—1,2,3, jump on the female, fertilize, finish.

Shaw sums it up in the provoking preface to Androcles and the Lion: "In our sexual natures we are torn by an irresistible attraction and an overwhelming repugnance and disgust. We have two tyrannous physical passions: concupiscence and chastity. We become mad in pursuit of sex; we become equally mad in the persecution of that pursuit. Unless we gratify our desire the race is lost; unless we restrain it we destroy ourselves." After last night I no longer need Shaw to teach me this, for I was too weak to refuse the pleasure even though it was nine-tenths disgust and only one-tenth pleasure.

Today I should be in England but for the draft board. Instead, I am still here, playing the organ, and reading French and English. Thus: From Rabindranath Tagore's "Gitanjali" (Song-offerings), #4: "Life of my life, I shall ever try to keep my body pure, knowing that thy living touch is upon my limbs. I shall ever try to keep all untruths out from my thoughts, knowing that thou art that truth which has kindled the light of reason in my mind. I shall ever try to drive all evils away from my heart and keep my love in flower, knowing that thou hast thy seat in the inmost shrine of my heart. And it shall be my endeavor to reveal thee in my actions, knowing it is thy power gives me strength to act."

#14: "My desires are many and my cry is pitiful, but ever didst thou save me by hard refusals; and this strong mercy has been wrought into my life through and through. Day by day thou art making me worthy of the simple, great gifts that thou gavest to me unasked: this sky and the light, this body and the life and the mind, saving me from perils of over much desire. There are times when I languidly linger and times when I awaken and hurry in search of my goal; but cruelly thou hidest thyself from before me. Day by day thou art making me worthy of thy full acceptance by refusing me ever and anon, saving me from perils of weak, uncertain desire."

#35: "Where the mind is without fear and the head is held high; where knowledge is free; where the world has not been broken up into fragments by narrow domestic walls; where words come out from the depth of truth; where tireless striving stretches its arms towards perfection;

where the clear stream of reason has not lost its way into the dreary desert sand of dead habit; where the mind is led forward by thee into ever-widening thought and action. Into that heaven of freedom, my Father, let my country awake.”

#43: “The day was when I did not keep myself in readiness for thee; and entering my heart unbidden even as one of the common crowd, unknown to me, my king, thou didst press the signet of eternity upon many a fleeting moment of my life. And today when by chance I light upon them and see thy signature, I find they have lain scattered in the dust mixed with the memory of joys and sorrows of my trivial days forgotten. Thou didst not turn in contempt from my childish play among dust, and the steps that I heard in my playroom are the same that are echoing from star to star.”

#46: “I know not from what distant time thou art ever coming nearer to meet me. Thy sun and stars can never keep thee hidden from me for aye. In many a morning and eve thy footsteps have been heard and thy messenger has come within my heart and called me in secret. I know not why today my life is all astir, and a feeling of tremulous joy is passing through my heart. It is as if the time were come to wind up my work, and I feel in the air a faint smell of thy sweet presence.

#58: Let all the strains of joy mingle in my last song—the joy that makes the earth flow over in riotous excess of the grass, the joy that sets the twin brothers, life and death, dancing over the wide world, the joy that sweeps in with the tempest, shaking and waking all life with laughter, the joy that sits still with its tears on the open red lotus of pain, and the joy that throws everything it has upon the dust, and knows not a word.

#59: Yes, I know, this is nothing but thy love, O beloved of my heart—this golden light that dances upon the leaves, these idle clouds sailing across the sky, this passing breeze leaving its coolness upon my forehead. The morning light has flooded my eyes. This is thy message to my heart. Thy face is bent from above, thy eyes look down on my eyes, and my heart has touched thy feet.

#69: The same stream of life that runs through my veins night and day runs through the world and dances in rhythmic measures. It is the same life that shoots in joy through the dust of the earth in numberless blades of grass and breaks into tumultuous waves of leaves and flowers.

It is the same life that is rocked in the ocean-cradle of birth and of death, in ebb and in flow. I feel my limbs are made glorious by the touch of this world of life. And my pride is from the life-throb of ages dancing in my blood this moment.

#75: Thy gifts to us mortals fulfill all our needs and yet run back to thee undiminished. The river has its everyday work to do and hastens through fields and hamlets; yet its incessant stream winds towards the washing of thy feet. The flower sweetens the air with its perfume; yet its last service is to offer itself to thee. Thy worship does not impoverish the world. From the words of the poet men take what meanings please them; yet their last meaning points to thee.

#79: If it is not my portion to meet thee in this my life then let me ever feel that I have missed thy sight—let me not forget for a moment, let me carry the pangs of this sorrow in my dreams and in my wakeful hours. As my days pass in the crowded market of this world and my hands grow full with the daily profits, let me ever feel that I have gained nothing; let me not forget for a moment, let me carry the pangs of this sorrow in my dreams and in my wakeful hours. When I sit by the roadside, tired and panting, when I spread my bed low in the dust, let me ever feel that the long journey is still before me. Let me not forget for a moment, let me carry the pangs of this sorrow in my dreams and in my wakeful hours. When my rooms have been decked out and the flutes sound and the laughter there is loud, let me ever feel that I have not invited thee to my house; let me not forget for a moment, let me carry the pangs of this sorrow in my dreams and in my wakeful hours.

#84: It is the pang of separation that spreads throughout the world and gives birth to shapes innumerable in the infinite sky. It is this sorrow of separation that gages in silence all night from star to star and becomes lyric among rustling leaves in rainy darkness of July. It is this overspreading pain that deepens into loves and desires, into sufferings and joys in human homes; and this it is that ever melts and flows in songs through my poet's heart.

From "Fruit-Gathering":

#VIII: Be ready to launch forth, my heart! And let those linger who must. / For your name has been called in the morning sky. / Wait for none! / The desire of the bud is for the night and dew, but the blown flower cries for the freedom of light. / Burst your sheath, my heart, and come forth.

#L: In the lightning flash of a moment I have seen the immensity of your creation in my life, creation through many a death from world to world. I weep at my unworthiness when I see my life in the hands of the unmeaning hours, but when I see it in your hands I know it is too precious to be squandered among shadows.

#LI: I know that at the dim end of some day the sun will bid me its last farewell. Shepherds will play their pipes beneath the banyan trees, and cattle graze on the slope by the river, while my days will pass into the dark. This is my prayer, that I may know before I leave why the earth called me to her arms. Why her night's silence spoke to me of stars, and her daylight kissed my thought into flower. Before I go may I linger over my last refrain, completing its music, may the lamp be lit to see your face and the wreath woven to crown you.

#LXXIX: Let me not pray to be sheltered from dangers but to be fearless in facing them. Let me not beg for the stilling of my pain but for the heart to conquer it. Let me not look for allies in life's battle-field but to my own strength. Let me not crave in anxious fear to be saved but hope for the patience to win my freedom. Grant me that I may not be a coward, feeling your mercy in my success alone; but let me find the grasp of your hand in my failure.

Last night: to the meeting at Reinoud's school for recitations, music, etc., then criticism of each performance. Reinoud and Meika sang, and Reinoud played Grieg on an incredibly bad piano. The Dutch speakers have a great amount of poise, and they don't go to the absurdity of memorizing as in America; rather, they learn to read creditably, which is a much more useful skill.

This afternoon: bicycled with Reinoud and had pleasant conversations as always. He is a delightful combination of the haughty egotistical artistic-type, unsocial, working in starts and bounds, according to inspiration, and of the simple frank lovable searching philosopher, anxious not only to teach but to learn.

I have been thinking and making drawings of the kitchen to my house. Perhaps it will look like this:

Gleanings from Carlyle on Heroes:

¶ Re: Norwegian paganism: "I feel that these old Northmen were looking into Nature with an open eye and soul: most earnest, honest; childlike, and yet manlike; with a great-hearted simplicity and depth and freshness, in a true, loving, admiring, unfeared way. A right valiant, true old race of men. Such recognition of Nature one finds to be the chief element of Paganism: recognition of man, and of his Moral Duty, though this too is not wanting, comes to be the chief element only in purer forms of religion. Here, indeed, is a great distinction and epoch in Human Beliefs; a great landmark in the religious development of mankind. Man first puts himself in relation with Nature and her powers, wonders and worships over those; not till a later epoch does he discern that all Power is Moral, that the grand point is the distinction for him of Good and Evil, of Thou Shalt and Thou Shalt Not.

¶ “The first duty for a man is still that of subduing Fear. We must get rid of Fear; we cannot act at all till then. A man’s acts are slavish, not true but specious; his very thoughts are false, he thinks too as a slave and coward, till he have got Fear under his feet.

¶ [Re: Islam] “It has ever been held the highest wisdom for a man not merely to submit to Necessity,—Necessity will make him submit,—but to know and believe well that the stern thing which Necessity has ordered was the wisest, the best, the thing wanted there. To cease his frantic pretension of scanning this great God’s-World in his small fraction of a brain; to know that it had verily, though deep beyond his soundings, a Just Law, that the soul of it was God;—that his part in it was to conform to the Law of the Whole, and in devout silence follow that; not questioning, it, obeying it as unquestionable.”

P.S. Regarding Necessity (though not the sort having very directly to do with the “Law of the Whole”), I feel a bit good and proud now that I stop to think what my reactions have been concerning the draft board’s forcing me to come home. I naturally was excited over the prospect of spending the year in Europe, of studying at Woodbrooke, traveling to Italy and Sweden, etc. But when it became clear that I should have to return, if only for such a stupid reason as to take a second physical exam, I accepted the fact instead of rebelling against it, and immediately began think of all the exciting things I could do in the U.S. prior to starting C.O. service: viz.: get the Haverford piano and bring it to the farm; live at Riparius until the weather gets too uncomfortably cold; work on the house; really work on improving my piano playing, and writing music; then return to Sunnyside and find a good piano- and/or organ-teacher; work hard at this, and also perhaps find a good job so that I won’t be completely parasitic. I hope that throughout my life, as with this small incident, I shall be able to take things as they come, to really live from day to day instead of always worrying about the future; and to make something exciting, productive, and noble out of any outward situation that may thrust itself upon me.

September 21, 1952

More from Carlyle:

¶ “The . . . Prophet has seized that sacred mystery rather on the moral side, as Good and Evil, Duty and Prohibition; the . . . Poet on what the Germans call the aesthetic side, as Beautiful and the like. The one we may call a revealer of what we are to do, the other of what we are to love. But indeed these two provinces run into one another, and cannot be disjoined. The Prophet too has his eye on what we are to love: how else shall he know what it is we are to do? The highest Voice ever heard on this earth said withal, ‘Consider the lilies of the field; they toil not, neither do they spin: yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.’ A glance, that, into the deepest deep of Beauty. ‘The lilies of the field’—dressed finer than earthly princes, springing-up there in the humble furrow-field; a beautiful eye looking-out on you, from the great inner Sea of Beauty! How could the rude earth make these, if her Essence, rugged as she looks and is, were not inward Beauty? In this point of view, too, a saying of Goethe’s, which has staggered several, may have meaning: ‘The Beautiful,’ he intimates, ‘is higher than the Good; the Beautiful includes in it the Good.’ The true Beautiful; which however I have said somewhere, ‘differs from the false as Heaven does from Vauxhall!’ So much for the distinction and identity of Poet and Prophet.

¶ “A vein of Poetry exists in the hearts of all men; no man is made altogether of poetry. We are all poets when we read a poem well, the ‘imagination that shudders at the Hell of Dante,’ is not that the same faculty, weaker in degree, as Dante’s own?

¶ “Sceptical Dilettantism, the curse of these ages, a curse which will not last forever, does indeed in this the highest province of human things, as in all provinces, make sad work; and our reverence for great men, all crippled, blinded, paralytic as it is, comes out in poor plight, hardly recognizable. Men worship the shows of great men; the most disbelieve that there is any reality of great men to worship. The dreariest, fatalest faith; believing which, one would literally despair of human things. Nevertheless high Duchesses, and ostlers of inns, gather round the Scottish rustic, Burns;—a strange feeling dwelling in each that they never heard a man like this; that, on the whole, this is the man! In the secret heart of these people it still dimly reveals itself, though there is no accredited way of uttering it at present, that this rustic, with his black brows and flashing sun-eyes, and strange words moving laughter and tears, is of a dignity far beyond all others, incommensurable with all others. Do not we feel it so? But now, were Dilettantism, Scepticism, Triviality, and all that sorrowful brood, cast-out of us,—as, by God’s blessing, they shall one day be; were faith in the shows of things entirely swept-out, replaced by clear faith in the things, so that a man acted on the impulse of that only, and counted the other non-extant; what a new livelier feeling towards this Burns were it!”

Cf. also Carlyle’s emphasis on the unconscious nature of Shakespeare’s genius, and of that of other great poets, etc.

¶ “. . . Scepticism, as I said, is not intellectual only; it is moral also; a chronic atrophy and disease of the whole soul. A man lives by believing something; not by debating and arguing about many things. A sad case for him when all that he can manage to believe is something he can button in his pocket, and with one or the other organ eat and digest! Lower than that he will not get.

¶ “Men speak too much about the world. Each one of us here, let the world go how it will, and be victorious or not victorious, has he not a life of his own to lead? One Life; a little gleam of Time between two Eternities; no second chance to us forevermore! It were well for us to live not as fools and simulacra, but as wise and realities. The world’s being saved will not save us; nor the world’s being lost destroy us. We should look to ourselves: there is great merit here in the ‘duty of staying at home’! And, on the whole, to say truth, I never heard of ‘worlds’ being ‘saved’ in any other way. That mania of saving worlds is itself a piece of the Eighteenth Century with its windy sentimentalism. Let us not follow it too far. For the saving of the world I will trust confidently to the Maker of the world; and look a little to my own saving, which I am more competent to!

¶ “The Life of Burns is what we may call a great tragic sincerity. A sort of savage sincerity,—not cruel, far from that; but wild, wrestling naked with the truth of things. In that sense, there is something of the savage in all great men.”

Tuesday, September 30, 1952

Riek will not leave me in peace. Yesterday she called here and insists that I come again to Leeuwarden before I return to the U.S. My whole soul rebels against going there again, yet I do not know if perhaps it is not better to save her the utter dejection that my refusal would occasion. I want this thing to be over and done with. The way I left Jeanne was the best. No questions asked, but a perfect tacit understanding on both sides.

More from Carlyle:

¶ “All substances clothe themselves in forms: but there are suitable true forms, and then there are untrue unsuitable. As the briefest definition, one might say, Forms which grow round a substance, if we rightly understand that, will correspond to the real nature and purpose of it, will be true, good; forms which are consciously put round a substance, bad. I invite you to reflect on this. It distinguishes true from false in Ceremonial Form, earnest solemnity from empty pageant, in all human things.

¶ “The nakedest, savagest reality, I say, is preferable to any semblance, however dignified.

¶ “Looking round on the noisy inanity of the world, words with little meaning, actions with little worth, one loves to reflect on the great Empire of Silence. The noble silent men, scattered here and there, each in his department; silently thinking, silently working; whom no Morning Newspaper makes mention of! They are the salt of the earth.”

Thoughts of Beethoven (from Rolland’s Vie de Beethoven):

¶ “Mon coeur bat tout entire pour le haut et grand art de Sébasien Bach, ce patriarche de l’harmonie.

¶ “La musique est une révélation plus haute que toute sagesse et toute philosophie. . . . Qui pénètre le sens de ma musique doit s’affranchir de tout la misère que traînent après eux les autres hommes.

¶ [sur la critique]: “Je pense comme Voltaire ‘que quelques piquères de mouches ne peuvent retenir un cheval dans sa course ardente.’”

I congratulate myself. I have called Riek and have told her that I will not come tonight as planned, and I have told her that our relationship will be finished, although I agree to continue to write, and to remain friends. But unfortunately the motivation for this did not come entirely from inner strength; it came rather from the horrible news just received from Dave Tyack, that young Christopher died suddenly and unexpectedly of pneumonia, at the age of 11 weeks. To play the hypocrite in a lascivious bed after this would have been too much even for my weak moral fortitude.

Dave's letter (written June 25, not seen by me until today): "I'm sorry that this long overdue letter brings heavy news. Two weeks ago Christopher died of virus pneumonia, very suddenly. Christopher was a monster of health, weighing over 15 pounds at 11 weeks when he died, and his death was completely unexpected and unavoidable. Of course, this made it harder to understand, but in a way easier to accept since he has given us, in life and death, a far greater love and respect for life.

"One real bright spot in next year's picture is that we will be studying together, you and I. Dee has been very brave, even jolly, and now is keeping busy at Mass. General Hospital doing language therapy work. The three of us—and in the spring the four of us, we hope—will have to see a good deal of you.

"This summer I have been working on construction again, taking the old delight in the sun and exercise and new friends. I'm outnumbered by Italians and am making a stumbling beginning in their tongue, corrected in grammar with delight by those who find they can tell a Harvardman something.

"We enjoyed hearing from you a great deal. Write again when the spirit moves. We'd like to plan to visit you in upstate N.Y. in late August if you'd be there.

Affectionately,
D & D"

Follows: schedules for Dutch and Danish gymnasia. The Dutch gymnasium has two divisions and emphasizes classics, & B has more science and math. But in general the gymnasium is where you study classics. The ABS school has no classics; it too has two divisions: A emphasizes modern languages and math, B includes these but has more science. The hours of study in the gym: Mon, Tues, Thus, & Sat, 8:30 a.m. to 1:05 p.m., Tues. & Fri: 8:30 a.m.—12:05 p.m., and 1:30 p.m. to 4:00 p.m. Normally, children start the gym or ABS when they are 12 or 13, and therefore graduate when 18 or 19. However, if, as a result of periodic quizzes, their marks are not good enough, they must repeat the entire year. There is no large exam until the end of the 6th year. Also, there is the lyceum, which is a combination of ABS and gym. After 2nd year you choose. Schedule in pencil on reverse is if you choose gym part. Note that Latin and Greek are postponed to 3rd yr.

Riparius

Warmed by a pot-bellied tin stove, illumined by a kerosene mantle lamp, and enjoying the fruits of much labor, here in my cabin.

Soon after returning from Europe, I drove to Philadelphia. to see AFSC about alternative service. They had opportunities in Mexico, Flanner House self-help housing program, Internesin Community Service in Chicago, and a mental hospital in Iowa. Actually, I don't think I could stand the communal living for two years. This summer's experience showed that for me two months is enough; then I must again have opportunity to be alone. But the problem of AFSC work is easily solved, for the government has not accepted them. I returned, after seeing Pete, who has a real sinecure with an elderly heiress in a 26-room Victorian monstrosity. He pays nothing, has delightful living quarters, with Bob Hinshaw, and earns $15 upwards per week by puttering around house and garden. We have made a tentative date to tour Europe together by bicycle. When and if! I also saw and chatted with Douglas Steere, President White, etc. Haverford now has a certain enchantment for me. I actually was a bit jealous of the others for their secure academic life as students. But I collected my remaining possessions, chiefly the old Cunningham piano, and returned. The piano came to a bad end. At first I thought to have it in my room at Sunnyside, but the movers refused to take it up. So it sat on the truck for a week or so. Then I decided to take it to Riparius. But it got only as far as 48th Street. I turned a corner too sharply, and off it went—ruined. I had to pay $20 to have it carted away.

Dad sent me to a Dr. Sverna, pathologist, who in turn offered me a job as medical stenographer in the morgue at $2300 per year. But the government (Major Matthew Dwyer) refused on grounds that COs must work away from the home area. Now I have written to various places and await replies: World Health Organization, Brethren and Mennonite Committees, hospitals at Glens Falls and Ticonderoga, State Directors in Connecticut and Maine, and to the Hinman Settlement School, Leslie County, Kentucky. In choosing a job, I must weigh many factors: first, the nature of the work itself (and the pay), 2nd whether the location and living arrangements will allow me to pursue independent studies of reading and music; whether the job can perhaps be the gateway to some further career (e.g. the W.H.O)—or work on a farm, which would give the necessary practical experience for entrance into Cornell Agriculture School. I do hope these two years will be fruitful ones. But it is up to me to make them so, despite all external unpleasantnesses.

But now I am at Riparius and feasting on the fall colors, the ever-bright stars at night, the bend of trees to the wind. Since Saturday, I have been laying the finish floor downstairs, of 5" Canadian spruce. Only five rows left. I have also filled up a few more holes, around windows, etc., in an effort to get the place reasonably ready for winter living. But the fireplace will have to wait now, for it is too cold for cement work; the mortar most likely will freeze at night and crumble to bits.

I have new neighbors, Curly Massey and wife. He is a lumberjack by trade and by all accounts one of the best there is. He works so fast and well that his typical weekly pay is $150–$200. Then comes the weekend; he goes to the bars in North Creek and buys drinks for everyone, all weekend long. He calls a taxi to bring him to the Creek and, once there, if he feels like a drink in Ti he orders a taxi to bring him there, at a cost of $25. In short, by Monday morning he has nothing, literally nothing, so that his wife often has to borrow $5 or $10 for food, from the Carmans, who employ Massey. He lives in the old Waddell blacksmith shop across the way, which Hal fixed up for the Greens. Curly has made all kinds of offers to help me—help me with the fireplace (he was a mason), help me with plowing, with this, with that. But I asked him to screw on the pipe to the pump, so he can use the pump (his well is dry), and this he has not done as yet. But he is very nice withal; showed me pictures of his son, keeps a Bible well-thumbed, and probably has lots of stories in his head that I would enjoy hearing.

Bardens are away in Darien, where he is riding master at a school. Mac is having a hard time socially, as everyone is angry at him, and he with everyone. He changed his mind at the last minute about the electricity petition and refused to sign, because by signing he would have been helping Sibling, with whom he is at odds because Sibling doesn't want any pulp cut; Dr. Barnard, with whom he is angry, and Carman, with whom he is angry. He is not yet angry with me, but I should be with him, because according to eye witnesses, he stole a whole load of barn lumber from me, even taking the boards I had carefully piled up. I told him that the lumber was missing, and he feigned amazement that anyone would do such a thing! But I didn't carry it further. Actually, he is more than entitled to what he took, because he helped me so willingly and well when I asked. It is only the way in which he took his due that is questionable. Also, however, it appears that someone entered the house (though I see no signs of a break-in), for a saw and hammer are missing. This perhaps is not to be laid at Mac's door. I still think he is basically honest.

I finally met Carl Sibling, who talks and talks fast. His mother is very interesting, and a pacifist to boot.

Curly Massey is quite a preacher—believes every word of the bible is Law, and that scientists and their atom smashing will possibly mean the end of the world because they are meddling in God's business.

"Why, Pete, just think if one of them bombs landed in Turner Valley. When I worked there, 900 oil wells, must be 1500 by now, and underground natural gas that develops 700 pounds rock pressure, why if all that blew up there wouldn't be nothin' left." He told me a bit of his life: "Three years I lived in Boston and made $40,000 and that's just as true as that I'm standin' on your land." "What happened?" I asked. "Well, Pete, I got sick. My wife, she wanted my money. That's all she wanted: money and money. She figured I'd die and she'd get the business. Well, I lost most all to the fellows I got to run the business. All they wanted was that Saturday check. And when I got better I just walked out. 'Take what's left,' I said; 'you can have it all.' My wife and I separated, and then got divorced. I raised an orphan boy, Bob, since he was 14. He was the one who really taught me to be a Christian. He was a good boy, never swore, never drank, went to a dance once and when he came home he said he felt like going back and shooting 'em all dead. And he prayed, Pete, sometimes an hour at a time, and when he was in the house you really felt God's presence, in the heart. Well, when he was about 20 he came home and said, 'Curly, there's a girl I like very much. Would it be all right if I married her?' I said, 'Bob, you know well enough if you like her enough to get married.' Well, they got married, and two weeks later he got called to the army. He said to me, 'I ain't goin' in there t' kill anybody.' And when he got to the camp they drilled him and drilled him, but he kept tellin' 'em that he wasn't goin' to kill. They laughed, of course, but after a while they saw that he really believed the Bible, and they apologized to him. And he talked and preached and told how killin' was wrong and how prayer would end that war, if everyone would pray from the heart; and I've seen two officers walk away after hearin' him, with tears in their eyes. So, they put him in the medical corps and I heard from him from England. But after he got back, Pete, he was a gamin', cussin' woman-chaser. That ole army knocked religion right out of 'em. I'd thought he'd stand up, but he fell. And he left his wife and kid, and went back to Arkansas where he came from. But my son hears from him still, and I think that Bob's coming back to the Lord. God, I hope he does. He was the nicest, finest, best-looking boy that ever lived."

I went up to the high field today to cut some trees for firewood and to bring to Abe on Saturday. I wanted yellow birch, and seeing a clump of what I thought was this type, cut away. Later on I asked Curly for a horse to skid the logs down with. He came after work and went up with me and the horse. One look at the trees and he asked, "What you want these for, Pete?" "Firewood." "Well, you'll never burn that!" "What do you mean?" "Why, them's popple. Just don't burn. You could leave 'em out here to dry all winter and they still wouldn't burn." "I guess, then, that all my work's for nothing." "Pete, you're young. You'll learn. Give me the axe, I'll cut you down some white birch. That burns good, and looks purty in the fireplace." So he proceeded to fell some birch. In the process I learned that he had been raised on a 2000-acre farm in Vermont, run by his brother now. "Why that land was so flat, you could stand right in the middle of a 90-acre field and see every rock on it. . . . I didn't get along very good with my brother. He threw me out, like I was a dog, to make my living. Well, I guess I've always made it." I also learned that he cared for a little girl from a broken home, and loved her so that she always called him Papa, and when the courts demanded that her real father take care of her she cried and cried because she wanted to stay with Curly.

Called home. Several things have come in. A friend of Saul's offers me lab work for a blood bank in Indiana; Joe Bien has given me an introduction to the head of the Episcopalian charities, etc. I have also written to the Glens Falls and Ticonderoga hospitals, with the thought of living here at Riparius and driving, which would have lots of advantages: good set-up for uninterrupted piano practice; a chance to keep the farm in order; no rent to pay; and a saving on food after next summer, when I will plant a garden. The biggest disadvantage: 90–100 miles of driving each day, which means at least two hours and much expense, plus terrific wear on the truck.

Dad wanted me to come home Friday. He seems always terrifically resentful of the farm and is firmly convinced that the time that I spend here should be marked down as wasted time. Half the time I speak with him he makes me angry, which is a percentage a bit too high for good parent-son relationship. What I must really do now is establish financial independence. Then he will have no recourse on me at all, as he does now. For instance, he feels that it is his money that I throw away on the farm, and of course he is right, except for the throwing-away part. I think that basically the farm represents to him all my claims of independence, especially as I have been in the habit of giving it as my permanent address.

Yesterday I finally finished the floor and what a difference it makes! Now I really feel protected in this house, and even confident that it will see me through a hard Adirondack winter.

Reading (all at once) Anthropology by Sir E. B. Tylor; Gilbert Murray's Five Stages of Greek Religion, Thoreau's Walden, Kafka's The Trial, André Gide's Le Procès, Molière's Les Fourberies de Scapin and Amphitryon, Dorothy Day's On Pilgrimage.

Visited the Catholic Worker today, to meet Mike Harrington, ex law schoolmate of Jerry Davidoff's, and a C.O. He gave me the Dorothy Day book, which is splendid: heroic, down-to-earth radicalism rooted in the soil instead of in ideologies. She is at her best when advocating subsistence farming and that, of course, is what interests me the most.

I have been severely temped during these weeks in New York by the money economy, so that I have thoughts of myself as becoming wealthy and thus being able to indulge in the privileges of wealth that this city offers, as do all other cities. But this temptation wears off, I am happy to say, quickly. It has taught me to be more on my guard and to think and act more on those principles and ways of life that I know to be far superior. I again feel the yearning for divinity school, for simplicity on my farm, for the cultivation of spirit, mind, and body as a full-time occupation, at the sacrifice of respectability. It is hard to think this way here at home. My father thinks of everything in terms of money, and likewise with all the other people with whom we associate. Worst of all, Dad pays lip-service to the other way, but his lips do not reveal his heart. I am very anxious to leave here and finally to break the bonds of childhood. Still, no job.

These past weeks I have been thinking almost twenty-four hours a day. It is good to have an interim period like this, if only because it is a glowing proof to the law that says that man must work. Well, I am educated enough to keep myself busy and “gainfully occupied” even when I do not work. And without the aid of radio, movies, or television. Quite a feat these days. Barzun says somewhere that the mark of an educated man is that he can sit still in a room. I have been doing much of this. I am expert at sitting still.

Riek finally wrote that she now realizes that she doesn't love me after all! I was a little surprised that even under the circumstances of our affaire, which should have rendered such a letter a welcome relief to me, nevertheless my pride suffered. It is always easier to think that you have done the rejecting and have not been the one done to.

I have had some correspondence with Piet Tuinman, mainly about the mechanics of studying here. He regrets that he did not declare his C.O. position. I see that the weight of a moral obligation unfilled is heavier than that of prisons or unfavorable public opinion.

Also received a nice letter from Bobby Johnston. He is like John Taylor in that he basically wants to direct his life spiritually but has fallen prey to our money society. It is pathetic to see and hear at every turn the unconscious evidence of their dissatisfaction with their weakness in this respect, and yet to see nothing done about it except perhaps some vain or deluding self-promise that “in the future,” after security is won, they will chuck overboard the insurance company or U.S. Rubber and begin to “do the things they’ve always wanted to do.” Life is too short for this sort of a plan. Really, the life of a protestor, of a radical—call it what you will—is really so much fun that it is quite surprising that so few people indulge in it.

Music: continuing with Bach two-part inventions. Very discouraging progress. I have started a composition for piano, in modern idiom, and really don’t know what kind of a monstrosity it will turn out to be. I may buy the Kaledins’ piano and take it to Riparius. Of course my parents think this is insane and the first thing my father says (thinking as always in terms of you-know-what) is, “Well you can be sure I’m not going to pay for it.”

Today I saw 250 men wait three hours for the daily bowl of pea soup that the Catholic Worker gives them free, and then had to come home and hear a person complain that the chicken was too dry.

Went to the UN last week and heard the Trusteeship Council blow hot air for three hours while the British were whipping Mau-Maus in Kenya and Malin enforcing white supremacy in Cape Town. If the Negroes throw down white civilization it will serve us right.

Started The Brothers Karamazov. Finished the exposition of my piano sonata and yesterday worked from 3:00 p.m. until 10:30 on the development, in the form of a fugue. After all that time, I wrote about 8 measures only, and today even scrapped 2 more. But what was done was good, and now I can proceed at a faster clip. On the whole, musical ideas now come to me faster than I can write them down. It is the technical aspects of a strict form like the fugue that seem to require endless manipulation of melodies, and revisions. What is readily apparent is the great growth in originality, continuity, and musicality since I wrote the other sonata two years ago. I hope to finish this before Christmas and send it to Dr. Swan and perhaps also to Reinoud.

Another letter from Riek establishes the fact that we are now on workable terms—no illusions about marriage and yet no regrets regarding nights between the sheets. Her letters are cute.

I finally received a reply from the World Council of Churches in Geneva: “no places.” This leaves the Fort Wayne job, and the possibility of something with a radiologist in San Francisco. I will most probably choose the latter if it is available and acceptable. Going to California is almost like going to Europe.

I think constantly about my future, subject as I continuously am here, either by word or implication, to repeated reminders about the need for making money and in adequate amounts. I am glad that I am using this period to try to think out how a life should be led; and that I am not going more or less unthinkingly into an “accepted” profession. One thing that seems important is that in order to taste life you should not be tied to the same work for all your working years. Looking forward to retirement is a great fallacy in planning; it is better to die with your boots on. A better way of doing “all the things you’ve always wanted to do” (that horrible saying) is to make enough early in life to give financial independence to the rest of it. But here the difficult question is where to stop. You subject yourself, of course, to the temptations that show their victorious mark everywhere in our society. The opposite extreme is safer: comparative poverty, living for the day only, working when needed, taking chances. This, I think, is the Christian way. And more fun!

Aldous Huxley (newspaper clipping discovered after I wrote the above): This I Believe: “In every one of the higher religions there is a strain of infinite optimism on the one hand and, on the other, a profound pessimism. In the depths of our being, they all teach there is an Inner Light—but an Inner Light which our egotism keeps, for most of the time, in a state of more or less complete eclipse. If, however, it so desires, the ego can get out of the way, so to speak, can dis-eclipse the Light and become identified with its divine source. Hence the unlimited optimism of the traditional religions. Their pessimism springs from the observed fact that though all are called, few are chosen, for the sufficient reason that few choose to be chosen.

“To me, this older conception of man’s nature and destiny seems more realistic, more nearly in accord with the given facts, than any form of modern utopianism.

“In the Lord’s Prayer we are taught to ask for the blessing which consists in not being led into temptation. The reason is only too obvious. When temptations are very great or unduly prolonged, most persons succumb to them. To devise a perfect social order is probably beyond our powers; but I believe that it is perfectly possible for us to reduce the number of dangerous temptations to a level far below that which is tolerated at the present time.

“A society so arranged that there shall be a minimum of dangerous temptations, this is the end towards which, as a citizen, I have to strive. In my efforts to achieve that end, I can make use of a great variety of means. Do good ends justify the use of intrinsically bad means? On the level of theory, the point can be argued indefinitely. In practice, meanwhile, I find that the means employed invariably determine the nature of the end achieved. Indeed, as Mahatma Gandhi was never tired of insisting, the means are the end in its preliminary stages.

“Men have put forth enormous efforts to make their world a better place to live in; but except in regards to gadgets, plumbing and hygiene, their success has been pathetically small. ‘Hell,’ as the proverb has it, ‘is paved with good intentions.’ And so long as we go on trying to realize our ideals by bad or merely inappropriate means, our good intentions will come to bad ends. In this consists the tragedy and irony of history.

“Can I, as an individual, do anything to make future history less tragic and less ironic than history past and present? I believe I can. As a citizen, I can use all my intelligence and all my good will to develop political means that shall be of the same kind and quality as the ideal ends which I am trying to achieve. And as a person, as a psycho-physical organism, I can learn how to get out of the way, so that the divine source of my life and consciousness can come out of eclipse and shine through me.”

Frost: “Full half of our lives can’t be made a science of; the better half of our lives can’t be made a science of. . . . I have learned that the upper classes in a ‘democracy’ must take care of the lower. I have to withhold a certain amount from each paycheck, so the worker can be insured.”

Headlines, all in one day: Continued race tension in South Africa; British shoot 15 Kenya rioters; U.S. Information Service and British Embassy in Bagdad stoned and burned; Egypt to give franchise to women; Tunisian and Indo-Chinese struggles continue. The East seethes!

In his “Reminiscences,” Gorky reports the following conversation with Tolstoy:

“And suddenly he asked me, exactly as if he were dealing me a blow: ‘Why don’t you believe in God?’ ‘I have no faith, Lev Nikolaevich.’ ‘It is not true. By nature you are a believer and you cannot get on without God. You will realize it one day. Your disbelief comes from obstinacy, because you have been hurt: the world is not what you would like it to be. There are also some people who do not believe, out of shyness; it happens with young people; they adore some woman, but don't want to show it for fear she won't understand, and also from lack of courage. Faith, like love, requires courage and daring. One has to say to oneself, "I believe"—and everything will come right, everything will appear as you want it, it will explain itself to you and attract you. Now, you love much, and faith is only a greater love; you must love still more and then your love will turn to faith. When one loves a woman, she is unfailingly the best woman on earth, and each loves the best woman; and that is faith. A non-believer cannot love: today he falls in love with one woman, and next year with another. The souls of such men are tramps living barren lives—that is not good. But you were born a believer and it is no use thwarting yourself. Well, you may say, 'Beauty—and what is beauty? The highest and most perfect is God.' He hardly ever spoke to me on this subject, and its seriousness and the suddenness of it rather overwhelmed me. I was silent. He was sitting on the couch with his legs drawn up under him, and, breaking into a triumphant little smile and shaking his finger at me, he said: 'You won't get out of this by silence, no.' And I, who do not believe in God, looked at him for some reason very cautiously and a little timidly. I looked and I thought: "This man is godlike."

Tolstoy: "Take care of yourself first, and you will have plenty of care left for other people."

From The Brothers Karamazov, the Elder, Zossima:

¶ "If I seem to be happy to you, you could never say anything that would please me so much. For men are made for happiness, and any one who is completely happy has a right to say to himself, 'I am doing God's will on earth.' All the righteous, all the saints, all the holy martyrs were happy."

¶ [How can I prove immortality?] "There's no proving it, though you can be convinced of it. . . . How? . . . By the experience of active love. Strive to love your neighbor actively and indefatigably. In as far as you advance in love you will grow surer of the reality of God and of the immortality of your soul. If you attain to perfect self-forgetfulness in the love of your neighbor, then you will believe without doubt, and no doubt can possibly enter your soul. This has been tried. This is certain.”

¶ “Love in dreams is greedy for immediate action, rapidly performed and in the sight of all. Men will even give their lives if only the ordeal does not last long but is soon over, with all looking on and applauding as though on the stage. But active love is labor and fortitude, and for some people too, perhaps, a complete science.”

November 26, 1952

Three things that I must do: (1) Develop musically and intellectually. This means practice, study, reading and writing, and talking. (2) Develop my body. I think that this will mean a series of exercises, prescribed by someone with knowledge in the field, and diligently followed by me. (3) Develop my voice: its timbre, resonance, pitch, etc., and its interpretative qualities in the reading of poetry and prose. Perhaps this will also involve further language study. A fourth and all-inclusive aim: Develop my soul. Cultivate the desire and capacity for loving, heighten spiritual perceptions, follow the example of great religious and religious-philosophical leaders of the past. Above all, guard against the pitfall of letting “making a living” become the chief striving of adult life, as it is with so many. If necessary, live from hand to mouth; this is by far the better alternative. Avoid being placed in a niche, whether it be the academic world, the lawyer’s or doctor’s office, or that slavery that comes from owning too much. Keep the farm as a refuge and hostel, but from it travel far intellectually. Live like and associate with the common man, but cultivate and preserve at the same time the manners, morals, and spiritual grace of the aristocrat. Be ὁ ἄριστος. Make ἡ ἀρετή the time-consuming factor, not the simple needs of the body. Cultivate these things and the body will be healthy despite (or perhaps because of) plain food.

Do not do anything simply because it is acceptable. Rather, spend the early years building. People will say that you are wasting your life, but heed them not. Build, build. Do not jump immediately to “setting the world right”; rather build, and when your life forces are so vibrant and full and tingling that you can contain them no longer, then spill them out and teach, and preach, and act.

You have made a very poor beginning in all this. You are ruled by sex and by anger; you have a great deal of inner peace, but don’t quite know how to show it to others. You waste too much time; and, alas, you are a bit lazy. Life is too short and can be too sweet to waste on the Chambord. “As a full and virtuous day gives rise to a contented sleep, so a full and virtuous life will lead one to lay it down without fear or regret” (Da Vinci, perhaps a bit sententious here).

Tagore: The civilization of the West will not succeed because it “has lost faith in the personality of man and it trusts in a mechanism of power.”

Twelfth Rock-Edict of Emperor Asoka, reigning in India from 273 B.C. to 232 B.C. (condensed): “There should be a promotion of the essential elements of Religion in all religions. This promotion of the essentials of Religion is possible in many ways. But its root is restraint of speech; that is to say, there ought to be no exaltation of one’s religion and finding fault with another’s on improper occasion, and there ought to be no depreciation of another’s religion on this and that occasion. On the contrary, others’ religions should be honored in every way. By so doing one exalts one’s own religion and does service to another’s religion. By doing otherwise one injures one’s own religion and harms another’s as well. For whosoever does honor to his own religion and condemns another’s—all through attachment to his own religion—in order to glorify his own religion, is in very truth severely injuring his own religion. Concourse, fellowship with members of other faiths, is therefore commendable, to the end that they may hear and desire to hear further one another’s Dharma [religion]. . . . Emperor Asoka values neither gifts nor honors so highly as that there should be a promotion of the essential elements of Religion in all religions and mutual appreciation as well.”

I am beginning to think with regard to my attitudes in this job-hunting that I have been too much simply on the lookout for the desirable place, located well, befitting my education, with adequate pay, vacations, etc., etc. I wonder now if it wouldn’t be more consistent with my professed belief and philosophy to be an attendant, for instance, rather than a laboratory technician, since the attendant can bring cheer and comfort to the spirit, whereas the technician is merely another cog in the mechanical or scientific processes of helping the sick. Now the question of teaching comes up. Is it not too easy a way, involving no sacrifice, and certainly not teaching me humility, as a menial task would? And yet the teacher can make his impression too, especially with the young and with parents, so that perhaps it does not really matter what you do so long as it is done in the spirit of love and service. I hope that this isn't mere rationalization.

From Hindemith's "A Composer's World":

¶ This [i.e., the composer's] approach to a problem is magnanimously comprehensive; it is at the same time stubbornly one-track. In short, it is the typical artistic way of understanding the world. It is entirely opposed to the approach of a scientific mind. To the scientist our method—or, in his eyes, non-method—of looking at everything without ever fundamentally comprehending it must seem utterly amateurish, its distinction from the amateur's point of view being merely a considerably wider panorama. We must be grateful that with our art we have been placed halfway between science and religion, enjoying equally the advantages of exactitude in thinking—so far as the technical aspects in music are concerned—and of the unlimited world of faith.

¶ Music has to be converted into moral power. We receive its sounds and forms, but they remain meaningless unless we include them in our own mental activity and use their fermenting quality to turn our soul towards everything noble, superhuman, and ideal. It is our own mind that brings about this conversion; music is but a catalytic agent to this end. The betterment of our soul must be our own achievement, although music is one of those factors which, like religious belief, creates in us most easily a state of willingness towards this betterment. In short, we have to be active; music, like humus in a garden soil, must be dug under in order to become fertile. Composers, performers, teachers, listeners—they all must outgrow the mere registration of musical impressions, the superficial and sentimental attachment to sound.

¶ [We must begin to] understand our world as a tiny spot in the universe, its life of a moment's duration, its matter a particle of dust. . . . [Musicians] must not become the victims of such tyrants as technique, success, pleasure. If they recognize in their greatest achievements the vanity of all earthly efforts, only then are they worthy to contribute with the full weight of their conviction to the eternal values of music. This is their genuine intellectual approach.

¶ What are the emotional reactions music releases? The composer faces the problem of musico-emotional relations with utter directness; he is always forced to solve it technically in some way or other, consciously or instinctively. The performers' and listeners' experiences are not essentially different from the composer's. They repeat what he anticipated, in a weakened, diluted, less concentrated manner.

Fine concert last night. Cantelli did Two Choric Dances by Paul Creston, high point of the program. "Processional" by Frank Miller, first cello, was also done. Insignificant music, but it was good to see Miller's joy after it was over. Schoenberg's violin concerto day on Philharmonic: horrible music. Much better were the recorded bird calls presented during intermission and slowed down to  $\frac{1}{2}$  and  $\frac{1}{4}$  speeds for more detailed hearing. This is something I could do at the farm.

Met Margo Geiger, Sarah Lawrence senior, a thinker with an artistic personality. We were much in agreement over the basics in life.

Hindemith:

¶ In all the other arts it is our power of reasoning that has to be satisfied first, before an aesthetic enjoyment of an artist's creation can be had: the words of a poem must be understood in their verbal meaning before its structural beauty or spiritual loftiness can be appreciated; the subject of a painting or its abstract lineations must enter our consciousness before any emotional reaction can take place. With music it is different. It touches our emotions first and we are the helpless victims of its attacks. Only after the emotional reaction has been released by the sounds of music can our power of reasoning take possession of the artistic impression and transform it into aesthetic satisfaction—by way of mental co-construction, as we know. This reverse mode of action in the impressional stimulation of a musical composition is the reason for the comparatively low level on which music makes its initial appeal, as has just been mentioned.

¶ What is musical vision? We all know the impression of a very heavy flash of lightning in the night. Within a second's time we see a broad landscape, not only its general outlines, but with every detail. Although we could never describe each single component of the picture, we feel that not even the smallest leaf of grass escapes our attention. We experience a view, immensely comprehensive and at the same time immensely detailed, that we never could have under normal daylight conditions, and perhaps not during the night either, if our senses and nerves were not strained by the extraordinary suddenness of the event. Compositions must be conceived the same way. If we cannot, in the flash of a single moment, see a composition in its absolute entirety, with every pertinent detail in its proper place, we are not genuine creators.

¶ You may manage the few basic rules of construction with all their combinative possibilities pretty well, and yet the highest degree of subtlety, in which each technical item is in congruence with the respective part of the vision, again may be obtained by no one but the genius. There are relatively few masterworks in which this ultimate congruence can be felt. Even in our stockpile of classical music, which by common agreement consists of works written by superior composers, not many pieces fulfill those highest requirements. True, there are many other great and excellent works which in their artistic value are by no means less important. They may in their ability to speak as human creations to human beings be closest to our hearts, but it is in those few uncontested masterpieces that we feel the breath of universality and eternity, because their particular kind of perfection, the absolute coincidence of intention and realization, is almost superhuman. . . .

¶ The more the composer feels impelled by his moral determination to drive the technical part of his work as close as possible to the goal of congruence, the higher seems to us the work's convincing quality. Other works, in which the composer's moral effort cannot be perceived, need not be bad music. They may have a pleasant, entertaining, touching effect. As mere technical mechanisms they may be without flaw. They may evoke wonderful emotional images in our mind, they may readily lead us to mentally reconstruct their forms, yet they may not impress us as works of art.

¶ Routine and fashion—these are the worst snarls that can entangle the creative mind.

¶ The extra-musical reason for the somewhat disproportionate regard [given to conductors] seems to be based on the following fact. In an era that leaves little opportunity in the individual's life for the application and the display of overt despotism, the demonstration of some refined and stylized form of oppression seems to be imperative. The listener in the audience who in his normal behavior has to suppress, thousands of times, his most natural human desire of governing, ordering, dictating to, and even torturing his fellow men, projects himself into the conductor's personality. Here he sees a man who with the consent of human society exercises a power which we would look upon as cruelty if we saw it applied to dogs or horses. Identifying himself with these activities the listener enjoys the perfect reaction of his own suppressed feelings: he now swings the teacher's cane, the king's scepter, and quite contrary to the effects such dictatorial manners have in real life, the result seems to be pleasant to all concerned.

¶ A world-famous instrumentalist, talking with a colleague who played chamber music as a means of musical recreation, expressed envy. Asked why he could not do the same, he said, "I cannot afford it." Either he would have lost money while devoting his time to nonprofit music, or his hopelessly professionalized mind could not be distracted without his losing his direction. It is the most depressing statement a musician ever made: it expresses the horrible emptiness of fame; it is the perfect illustration of the utter senselessness of a musical specialism that has lost all ground and reason.

¶ It is extremely dishonest to give every student the education that is meant to turn out a Beethoven, while we know that he will never be more than a medium-sized commonplace composer. Would it not be better, more honest, and even more economical, to provide him with an all-round technique of general validity, on which his talents may thrive?

¶ Of course, we know the difference between good and bad triangle-gulists and nobody wants the triangle's violent trill of the last tutti to appear in the following pianissimo subito. But one refuses to see in a sporadic triangle tinkling the ultimate purpose of a human being's earthly existence.

¶ Something must be wrong with our teaching system. What is it? We are teaching each pianist or violinist as if he had the chance to become a Horowitz or Heifetz, although we know that the entire concert life of the civilized world can hardly absorb more than ten or twelve great soloists in each field. . . . Among those taught by our endless phalanx of pedagogues the non-professional, the man who wants instruction for his own amateurish fondness of playing with musical forms, hardly counts at all. He who normally ought to be the music teacher's best customer has as a numerical factor dwindled to almost nothing, and as a musical factor he usually wilts away after several years of a training that, instead of flattering and fostering his layman instincts, has administered an indigestible virtuoso treatment. Thus the clan of music teachers is now living in a state of ever growing artistic isolation and infertile self-sufficiency—their teaching of teachers who in turn teach teachers. A profession based on the resentments of the frustrated concert virtuoso and not aiming at any improvement of human society's civilization, by its very activity removed from the actual demands and duties of a real musical culture, must inevitably lead to the sad goal reached by every other kind of indiscriminate and large-scale inbreeding: after a short period of apparent refinement a gradual degeneration and slow extinction.

[Note the applicability of this analysis to other fields of teaching: English, for instance. I expressed the idea of inbreeding of teachers in my Review article last year.]

¶ Summer music clinics are a continuation of our school system's tendency to release everyone from personal responsibility for failures. Your school teachers were entrenched behind a wall of marks and grades. They never developed a fairly accurate system of correspondences between grade numbers and the artistic and technical quality of musical exercises, yet they believe in their own arbitrary numerical decisions as they do in celestial manifestations. It is never thought to be the fault of a teacher or a teaching system if you leave school insufficiently instructed, nor is it your lack of talent or your laziness or your aversion to the way in which the material is presented that makes you an unsuccessful student; you just "didn't make the grades." In this purified paradise of numerical evaluation nobody will ever be responsible for his decisions. Individualities vanish behind numbers, and your college record as the inevitable forerunner of your applications for jobs gives as clear an indication of your intellectual and artistic capacities as your portrait drawn by a baby would give of your physical constitution.

¶ There is one germ that has infected our musical life and has weakened it to an alarming degree. I am speaking of the inclination towards entertainment—a trend similar to the demand for sensation, but less violent and therefore more ruinous in the long run. By entertainment we mean not only the cheapest and most easily accessible satisfaction of a desire for sensual pleasure; we include in this term our entire complex system of distributing and receiving any kind of music up to superior compositions, if it is used for the sole aim of gratifying the listeners with the amenities of sound. Music as a science has been dead for centuries. Music as an agent of moral elevation seems to have lost its position; the ethic power of music is left unused. Music as a part of religious devotion has become an empty shell. Sound and its effect on our auditory nerves apparently is the only factor considered essential.

¶ A further loss of competent listeners must be prevented. The composer's most efficient means of accomplishing this will be to write music for the singing and playing amateur.

¶ Piano playing, keyboard playing in general, is of no use for the amateur. Amateurs' music is essentially community music. Not only does a piano forbid any community of players—except in the professional's or semiprofessional's playing of quartets and quintets; it isolates the amateur pianist psychologically. Whatever your ability as an amateur pianist is, you will never enjoy it fully. You will be dissatisfied, because you know how the pieces you are playing are supposed to sound and you never have enough technique to play them with perfection. If you have, you are as good as a professional and cannot be counted among the amateurs with their peculiar desires and enjoyments. On the other hand, though you may be the worst fiddle player in the world, there will always be a seat for you in the second violin section, where you can play your few scratching tones with full enthusiasm, can improve from session to session, and will not be looked at with scorn and contempt. On the contrary, once you join an amateur group, you are a member of a great fraternity, whose purpose is the most dignified one you can imagine: to inspire one another and united in building up a creation that is greater than one individual's deeds. Amateurs of this kind, when listening to music, will not be the stupid receivers, the targets of virtuosity, the idle gourmards of which our audiences predominantly consist. They cannot merely be fed with music of a conductor's or a concert agent's choice. They know what they want, and they intend to get it.

¶ The life in and with music, being essentially a victory over external forces and a final allegiance to spiritual sovereignty, can only be a life of humility, of giving one's best to one's fellow men. This gift will not be like the alms passed on to the beggar; it will be the sharing of a man's every possession with his friend.

I now sent this brilliant book very appropriately on to Reinoud, as a Christmas present. I hope that the language difficulty will not cancel out his understanding of Hindemith's lofty ideals.

Socrates says that an idler is not only a person who does nothing, but a person who does nothing worthwhile.

I wrote to Austin Hood concerning my idea about a page-turner for musicians, specifically asking about adhesives that might serve the contradictory functions of both holding on and letting go. He offered some suggestions, but the most interesting part of the letter related that he had given up chemistry altogether and was working for a stamp dealer, a job he liked very much and hoped to make permanent. Strange after so many years of chemical training, but for him, I think, a very wise move. It would have been a very disagreeable situation for him to have gone struggling along in chemistry, always with the knowledge that his natural endowments would forever limit him to the role of a lackey. Now in the business world he can bring into play other factors besides abstract intellectualization, and perhaps will make a success of it.

Spent an evening with Tom Forsythe (since Margo was busy). He is a farm-bred intellectual who thinks my farm plans entirely practical. Whew! One, at least. It is gratifying that with some people, like Tom, Reinoud, Margo, Pete G., it is possible to come to a level of deep mutual knowledge almost immediately. These are people who have their souls exposed as it were. How Carlyle would love them! Sartor Resartus. With them I can talk of deepest desires, hopes, and frustrations, talk freely and joyfully. Yet with others I wouldn't dare talk above tea-party level. The factor is not how long you have known a person. Some of my oldest friends remain in the tea-party category whereas with these others communication is instantaneous and spontaneous. More of them!

“Les Hathaway died the other day. He was an old guide, one of a breed that was unique in the Adirondacks. Almost all are gone. ‘Guides like me, he would say, ‘the real genuine authentic hundred percent wood-ticks, there aren’t many left. We was the kind that used to take a city feller into the woods, shoot his deer for him, drag it out and cut it up, then knock down any one who dared say he hadn’t shot it.’

“Like many old guides, Les had a stock of stories, good stories. Whether or not the truth was in them wasn’t so important. In his time Les had been an ‘outlaw,’ as he admitted. ‘I grew up before there was any conservation laws and when a man was hungry he went and shot a deer. And I’ve been hungry many times.’ Les used to pride himself on outwitting the game wardens. ‘They never had me once!’ he liked to say.

“He often told one story about the way some young warden kept after him, as Les knew, and finally caught him ten miles back in the woods, sitting besides a pack-basket full of fresh meat. ‘This time I got you with the evidence,’ the warden said. ‘Off we go to the judge.’ ‘Yep,’ Les agreed, ‘but you got to carry the evidence. The law can hang a man but it don’t say he has to tote his own gallows.’ The warden picked up the pack-basket, which weighed about seventy pounds, and lugged it out of the woods. Les followed behind like an obedient beagle. They got to the judge. The warden was about to present his case when Les said: ‘Judge, is there any law about not letting a man buy a calf, skin it out, and take the meat into the wood just to have handy in case a nosey warden comes along?’ At that Les opened up his basket and took out the meat. ‘You can see for yourself, judge,’ Les said, ‘that’s veal, not venison. Sorry it was so heavy, warden.’”

Socrates’ wording was better than mine. “He is not only idle who does nothing, but he is idle who might be better employed.” (Clipped from that great dispenser of wise sayings and worthwhile reading—the Ladies’ Home Journal.)

Margo has agreed to spend a weekend with me at the farm. I am in ecstasy: I have wanted to show the place off for a long time now, and am glad that she will be the first one to whom I shall do so. I suppose my going away with a woman in this fashion isn’t exactly moral in the Victorian sense, but I'm not sure I have those kinds of morals, at least I hope not. I have ideals, not morals. And I have desires!

Received a Christmas card from Laird Barber, who is studying English at Cambridge University, England. Jack Piotrow of Haverford was awarded a Rhodes Scholarship this year. He seems hardly of that caliber. How subtly fate determines our ways! Had I been class of '53 perhaps I would have received the scholarship over Piotrow, and then would have been off to Oxford. What glory! But perhaps I am better off this way, for Oxford may have placed me in a "safe" teaching job and left me there for life.

I finally completed the movement for piano—130 measures—and sent it off to Professor Swan. It is a very poor piece of work, even vulgar, at least the first subject. But the introduction and second subjects are good, and the whole thing, I think, is quite original. The fugal exposition that begins the development section is nicely worked out, but I could not continue it, and had to fall back on passage work over suggestions of the second theme. And like everything I have written, it probably ends too soon, as I am always in a hurry simply to put three measures of coda in practically anywhere, and have it done with. I found, as usual, that it is difficult for me to write for piano, à cause de lack of technique; and quite impossible to think in large units, an inability that, of course, spells my doom as a composer of real worth. Nevertheless, I enjoy composition and hope some day to be able to turn out a continuing stream of quartets, piano trios, etc., for a small group that shall love to play them with me.

From Les Lettres du voyant, of Rimbaud, preface to Les Illuminations:

"The first study for a man who wants to be a poet is the knowledge of himself, entire. He looks for his soul, inspects it, learns it. As soon as he knows it, he cultivates it: it seems simple: in every brain a natural development is accomplished: so many egoists proclaim themselves authors; others attribute their intellectual progress to themselves. But the soul has to be made monstrous, that's the point:—like comprachicos, if you like! Imagine a man planting and cultivating warts on his face.

"One must, I say, be a seer, make oneself a seer.

"The poet makes himself a seer through a long, a prodigious and rational disordering of all the senses. Every form of love, of suffering, of madness; he searches himself, he consumes all the poisons in him, keeping only their quintessences. Ineffable torture in which he will need all his faith and superhuman strength, the great criminal, the great sick man, the utterly damned, and the supreme Savant! For he arrives at the unknown! Since he has cultivated his soul—richer to begin with than any other! He arrives at the unknown: and even if, half crazed, in the end, he loses the understanding of his visions, he has seen them! Let him croak in his leap into those unutterable and innumerable things: there will come other horrible workers: they will begin at the horizons where he has succumbed.”

Today, if all had gone well, I should have been on my way to the farm, with Margo. She had promised to go with me, and we had made all arrangements earlier in the week. I thought of little else for several days. I gathered together everything worthwhile that I have written over the past years, plus a lot of music, and looked forward to a receptive ear, and to the quiet and remoteness necessary. She, in turn, promised to bring her stories, which I haven't seen yet. I wanted her to see the house, and the life that I have carved out up there; and I thought that she would be interested in meeting my neighbors. Somehow, I thought that we were due to leave yesterday. So I got up at 5 a.m., as planned, packed, loaded the truck, and was to Greenwich Village at 6:45. But no Margo. I gave her  $\frac{3}{4}$  hour grace and then rang. She appeared in pajamas, quite surprised, and said, “But, Peter, you're a day too soon!” Oh heavens! I asked her if she couldn't just up and go on the spot, but no, she was needed in school and then had an appointment at the doctor's. Tomorrow, same time. But last night she called to say that the doctor forbade her to go because of a virus infection she had during the week. So that dream, after a series of anticlimaxes, was shattered. Today I am meeting her for lunch, and we shall go ice skating.

Well, the day wasn't wasted. I spent most of it writing a 10,000 word letter to Bobby Johnston, something I have been meaning to do for some time. I put in my say against insurance companies and against business in general, excepting perhaps a Woolman-like business, strictly limited in size, and very undemanding in time required. Then I spoke a bit about Europe, and about my draft status and plans for the future—viz.: There still remains the question of what I am going to do in life. In my enforced "idleness" here I have been thinking of this constantly. I am getting a little more realistic and know that one must have a way to earn money, not only in spurts, but more or less regularly. I get about $250 a year interest on some invested funds, but this could hardly be termed an independent income! Besides this I have the farm, which is worth about $2000, and several hundred in cash. But I find that I have a completely irrational urge to spend money when I have it in my pocket, and so it goes very very quickly. Right now my plans are something like this: You will see that they are very vague, very dangerous, and perhaps very stupid. When I work these two years I'll probably make another $3000 or so, a little more, a little less. If I can save most of it (I think room and board will be provided) and invest it, it will bring the annual return close to $500. At this rate it really won't take too long to bring it up to, let's say, $1000, because after the settlement work I can get a job that pays much better. I know very well that I can live extremely well on the farm, eating like a king, having exercise, being with my library (now about 1000 volumes), maintaining a car to get to the city with, etc., all this quite easily on $1000 cash income, and probably on less. And in any case it is very easy to supplement the cash income by cutting wood, which now brings $23 a cord (an inexperienced man can cut about a cord and a half in a day). On this I can also support a wife and family, which I sincerely hope to do to the best of my ability. With this as a sort of stop-gap against inflation, I think I can be entirely free to do what I want to do, which is—to write. I will fall into that non-descript category of the free-lance writer. I hope to try my hand at fiction, but am fairly certain that my forte will lie in the familiar essay, which can cover practically anything. I would like to do biographies, accounts of movements like the work-camp one; perhaps something on subsistence farming, on education, etc. The subjects will take shape in time. As I say, I have my own library and hope to add to it. There is really no worthwhile book in the English language that cannot be obtained in good condition second-hand for under a dollar, if you know where to look. But besides this, the farm is exactly equidistant from Boston and New York, neither a very great trip; and so in reality I can add the collections of the New York Public Library and of Widener Library at Harvard to my own. By this reasoning I should have about 15 million volumes. As for traveling, I know from this summer's experience that it is possible to get a nice room, with meals, in Europe for about $25 a month, or $300 a year. Add $300 round-trip boat fare to this, and you still have $400 to spend. And if you stay two years in a row, the second year it will be $700, since there will be no fare additional. $700 in Europe has the buying power of about $2000 here, so you see, you are quite well off! All this, of course, is figuring at absolute minimum; in actuality I hope and expect that there will be additional sources of income from the writing, from the farm, or perhaps from a small Woolman-like business that will consume only two or three months' time in a year. If success comes, then, of course, it will be clear sailing: lecture offers, newspaper columns, perhaps even an invitation to a university. But now my sights are too high. All I really want is intellectual and physical stimulation, variety, periods of exertion and wandering balanced by periods of rest and staying at home; the necessities of life and not the superfluities. If I'm a failure, and don't have enough brains or guts or will-power or stamina to write what I want to, well then, I tried; I'll manage somehow and probably be happy into the bargain. Of course, I could enter medical or law school tomorrow and insure a nice cozy future of unquestioned success and upwards of $50,000 a year, but this is too easy. You may think that this is all loony. No, I don't think you will. But it is a bit loony, after all—and who cares? I don't know if I have any religion. But I like to project myself outside of my society and look in on it, seeing in one glance a whole life span: and already death does not seem so far off, even if it is incomprehensible to us young 'uns. When I see a life-span as a unit, where real living ceases at the age of twenty, where from twenty to sixty-five is mere bread-winning, complicated with a lot of sham culture, superfluous animalistic gratifications such as gourmet meals, nude-women night clubs (yes, I like them, too); where the ideal of a good vacation is . . . sleep: then this seems to me a mockery of life, truly a tale told by an idiot, signifying nothing—point blank zero. "Science was in error," someone has said, "when it allocated man to a separate species. Rather it should have categorized us in the cat family, for we are tigers who stalk our prey with an almost erotic pleasure, and small kittens who fruitlessly toy with a ball of twine or lounge languidly on our backs, hoping that some benign hand will feed us or tickle our stomachs." This is too horrible to contemplate; but not half as horrible as those countless thousands of newly arrived fashionables who have convinced themselves and their fellow travelers that they have risen above all this into the realm of gentility and culture. They are ten times worse than my country neighbors, rude drunken, barbarians, but without pretense, always honest with themselves (and often strangely and warmly human on a plane much higher than that of the neurotic upside-down-valued middle class).

So, what is there to do? Just this: I know, from my own experience and from the similar experiences that I can read about in literature, that man can live in some sort of mystic fashion on a plane entirely and beautifully human: the full man, not denying his instincts, not presuming anything either. It isn't so much the life of intellect as we tend to think of that life—its horrible degeneracy into compartmentalized investigations, and the abominable application of the scientific method to every field of endeavor, including literature and the arts—but rather I think a life of devotion to something outside of oneself, and preferably something bigger and more important than oneself. It is disinterestedness, detachment, serenity: all antithetical to 99% of the lives and jobs in America today. It is perhaps something as commonplace as the raising of a family, for this is a form of immortality; but not raising one the way it is done now, with the father gone at 8:00 a.m. and back for supper, then out to a meeting; with the big “family” day on Sunday when all entomb themselves in an automobile and stand for hours bumper to bumper on the parkway, escaping the carbon monoxide atmosphere of the Bronx only to enjoy that of Westchester. No, I mean where a father can be with his sons, can teach them, build their bodies, have them work alongside, get to know them and they him. I don't think many fathers do this nowadays, least of all the successful and respectable ones.

I think that if we try to regard our lives objectively and plan realistically and courageously to insure and cultivate our spiritual wellbeing and the exercise of our intellects (if we are fortunate enough to have intelligence), then the purely physical necessities will take care of themselves. Who, after all, need starve in America today? It is stupid to be concerned about this and never to give the other a thought, as is so often the case. Through science and prosperity we have the best tools in history for reducing the time spent for necessities to the absolute minimum, leaving the rest free for work for others and for the full life. I don't think this need be naught but words; it can be practiced. There are those who have done so. You can do it; I can do it, and I intend to.

With this crash-bang ending, it is time for the concert to come to a close, but not for the conductor to take his last bow: he will be back for more later. . . .

I have passed through a series of anticlimaxes, but have learned a lot. Yesterday I went ice skating with Margo, whom I had pictured as a receptive and enthusiastic listener to all my writings, and for whom I had brought along the recent letter to Weasel. I said jokingly that she was lucky she couldn't have gone to Riparius because once there I was going to make her listen to reams of my writing. Her comment was: "Oh, you write too," as though to say: "Another one. There are too many already." I never brought up the subject again, and wouldn't dare give her the letter. I don't know whether I am simply living in a dream world, spending half a week picturing to myself gratifying scenes of other people's interest in and appreciation of what I have done; then only to find that they show not the slightest interest; or, perhaps I am not in the wrong, for I know—turn the situation around—that I am very anxious to see something that she has written, and consider that when a person has gone to the trouble of putting down his or her thoughts, those thoughts deserve perusal and at least a fair appraisal on my part.

So, we went to the zoo, where the chimps behave, sound, and act like our Michaëlshoeve boys; then we ice-skated very pleasantly, and then—simply—parted. We ate lunch in the Automat, where she paid her own way owing to my lack of gallantry. If women have to be emancipated, they will need to suffer some of the consequences.

Somerset Maugham in “The Summing Up”: “I do not believe that genius is an entirely different thing than talent. I am not even sure that it depends on any great difference in the artist’s natural gifts. For example, I do not think that Cervantes had an exceptional gift for writing; few people would deny him genius. Nor would it be easy in English literature to find a poet with a happier gift than Herrick and yet no one would claim that he had more than a delightful talent. It seems to me that what makes genius is the combination of natural gifts with an idiosyncrasy that enables its possessor to see the world personally in the highest degree and yet with such catholicity that his appeal is not to this type of man or that type, but to all men.”

Mason Morrell was here last night—the old school friend of Dad’s. He is a long-time socialist, and has a home in the cooperative colony at Shrub Oak. He was born with the name Johnson but changed it in order not to appear to be hiding the fact that he is Jewish. Quite the opposite from most name-changing that goes on nowadays.

Jacques Maritain in “the Range of Reason”: “The only authentic civilization is one where man has released the idea of knowledge in its objective purity and developed in himself the sense of truth. If civilization, which is profoundly shaken today, is to be reborn, one of the basic conditions for this rebirth must be that . . . knowledge must cease being ordained to power or being confused with power—the intellect must recognize in the whole expanse and diversity of its domain the sacred nature of truth.”

From Canby’s introduction to the short stories of Erskine Caldwell: “Erskine Caldwell is one of those rare men in human experience who have done both what they wanted and what they have thought that they wanted. He thought that he wanted most of all to ‘go places,’ to see people in a living experience of the sociology he picked up at the University of Virginia. However, he began his travelling—more accurately described as vagabondage—long before he ever heard of sociology. Then, when his reputation was made, he travelled in a big way as a correspondent, notably in Russia. But something in him wanted all this time to write. . . . The inexplicable urge which forces the born writer to symbolize life in words and create the significance which actual experience hides in a confusion of events, has done the rest. . . . Caldwell left the University of Virginia . . . after two years . . . to become a cub reporter on The Atlanta Journal, which had been his ambition, married, and began a family. But he discovered, as so many journalists have done, that newspaper work is not creative writing, and that if to write in a creative way is what you want, journalism is the wrong profession. The only way to write creatively is to write creatively. . . . So, with admirable audacity, Caldwell got as far away from his old environment as possible, perhaps subconsciously feeling the need to get it into perspective. For years he ‘holed it in Maine,’ raised potatoes and chopped wood to feed his family, ‘vowing not to come out until I had got myself published.’ But in three years he had sold a story for $350, though he would have willingly taken $50 for it if necessary, and his public career had begun.”

It seems that this volume of my journals is closing out coincident with the calendar year. A very good year for it to do so, for starting with 1953 I must reckon by the calendar and no longer by the academic season.

Read the Grand Inquisitor chapter in Dostoevsky, a brilliant and cogent piece of sustained invective, much lifting my opinion of Dostoevsky.

I practiced the recorder for a few hours, and it has become a contagion. Alice, Mother, even Dad are now blowing tunes on this very simple but lovely instrument.

Resolution for 1953: read, read, read; write, write, write.

It would be nice to build a studio at Riparius something like the one at Reinoud’s uncle’s house in Holland: round, and fanning out from a central pole or perhaps a central chimney; with but one window and one door, and with the entire circumference lined (and insulated) by books; with a desk, lamp, stove for heat, perhaps a hotplate for coffee; a couch for relaxation; and maybe a harmonium. Now that I have the barn wood, I really should continue building as much and as soon as possible, if only over weekends while I am fulfilling my two-years' service.

In the past year I think my interests have settled down a bit, mostly in music, but not as a separated phenomenon as much as a particular way to express a general urge for creative and artistic activity. How can I know if I've grown at all in wisdom? In five years perhaps I shall look back on this period and be able to tell, just as now I look back on my freshman year at Harvard. At least, I have, I think, learned to value strictly academic pursuits at their true worth, and to place above them: living—in the most full and varied way possible. Now I sit here and long to start!

On the debit side: the whole sexual problem, which, I think, will solve itself very quickly and simply as soon as I find someone to marry. But the situation as it is now is not at all good. I refuse to employ prostitutes; I am not a homosexual; and I have no one with whom to have intercourse. Yet my body burns, feels all slippery inside, and wants to come apart at the seams. How futile it is to try to make our minds forget what our bodies never stop remembering. The only answer is self-gratification, a moral, physical, and mental dead end. I waste too many hours with this, and all the energy goes for naught. Sex should procreate, or at least bind a couple together. This does nothing but give temporary relief—for a day, perhaps.

The Brothers Karamazov now has me completely entranced. In reading certain sections I feel as though I were undergoing a sacrament, especially the deathbed sayings of Father Zossima. Some sections must be recorded here:

¶ . . . even those who have renounced Christianity and attack it, in their inmost being still follow the Christian ideal, for hitherto neither their subtlety nor the ardour of their hearts has been able to create a higher ideal of man and of virtue than the ideal given by Christ of old. When it has been attempted, the result has been only grotesque. (Father Païssy)

¶ Till I'm thirty I know that my youth will triumph over everything. . . . I've asked myself many times whether there is in the world any despair that would overcome this frantic and perhaps unseemly thirst for life in me, and I've come to the conclusion that there isn't, that is till I am thirty, and then I shall lose it of myself I fancy. Some driveling consumptive moralists . . . often call that thirst for life base. But why is it base? The centripetal force on our planet is still fearfully strong, Alyosha. I have a longing for life, and I go on living in spite of logic. . . . It's not a matter of intellect or logic, it's loving with one's inside, with one's stomach. One loves the first strength of one's youth. (Ivan)

¶ I cannot expect to understand about God. . . . All such questions are inappropriate for a mind created with an idea of only three dimensions. And so I accept God and am glad to, and what's more I accept His wisdom, His purpose—which are utterly beyond our ken; I believe in the underlying order and the meaning of life; I believe in the eternal harmony in which they say we shall one day be blended. (Ivan)

¶ The stupider one is, the closer one is to reality. The stupider one is, the clearer one is. Stupidity is brief and artless, while intelligence wriggles and hides itself. Intelligence is a knave, but stupidity is honest and straightforward. (Ivan)

¶ Chapter IV, "Rebellion."

¶ Chapter V, "The Grand Inquisitor": Dost thou know that the ages will pass, and humanity will proclaim by the lips of their sages that there is no crime, and therefore no sin; there is only hunger? 'Feed men, and then ask of them virtue!' ¶ When man rejects miracle he rejects God too. ¶ There have been many great nations with great histories, but the more highly they were developed the more unhappy they were. ¶ Freedom, free thought and science will lead [the people] into such straits and will bring them face to face with such marvels and insoluble mysteries, that some of them, the fierce and rebellious, will destroy themselves, others, rebellious but weak, will destroy one another, while the rest, weak and unhappy, will crawl fawning to our [the Church's] feet, and whine to us: 'Yes, you were right, you alone possess His mystery, and we come back to you, save us from ourselves.' . . . And they will be glad to believe our answer, for it will save them from the great anxiety and terrible agony they endure at present in making a free decision for themselves.

Dostoevsky, continued:

¶ The first birds of spring were flitting in the branches, chirruping and singing at the windows. And looking at them and admiring them he began suddenly begging their forgiveness too, “Birds of heaven, happy birds, forgive me, for I have sinned against you too.” None of us could understand that at the time, but he shed tears of joy. “Yes,” he said, “there was such a glory of God all about me; birds, trees, meadows, sky, only I lived in shame and dishonored it all and did not notice the beauty and glory.” (Father Zossima about his brother)

¶ From the house of my childhood I have brought nothing but precious memories, for there are no memories more precious than those of early childhood in one’s first home. And that is almost always so if there is any love and harmony in the family at all. Indeed, precious memories may remain even of a bad home, if only the heart knows how to find what is precious. (Zossima)

¶ We are each responsible to all for all, it’s only that men don’t know this. If they knew it, the world would be a paradise at once. (Markel, Zossima’s brother)

¶ “To transform the world, to recreate it afresh, men must turn into another path psychologically. Until you have become really, in actual fact, a brother to every one, brotherhood will not come to pass. No sort of scientific teaching, no kind of common interest, will ever teach men to share property and privileges with equal consideration for all. Every one will think his share too small and they will be always envying, complaining and attacking one another. You ask when it will come to pass; it will come to pass, but first we have to go through the period of isolation.”

“What do you mean by isolation?” I asked him. “Why, the isolation that prevails everywhere, above all in our age—it has not fully developed, it has not reached its limit yet. For everyone strives to keep his individuality as apart as possible, wishes to secure the greatest possible fullness of life for himself; but meantime all his efforts result not in attaining fullness of life, but self-destruction, for instead of self-realization he ends by arriving at complete solitude. All mankind in our age have split up into units, they all keep apart, each in his own groove; each one holds aloof, hides himself and hides what he has from the rest, and he ends by being repelled by others and being repelled by them. He heaps up riches by himself and thinks, ‘How strong I am now, and how secure,’ and in his madness he does not understand that the more he heaps up, the more he sinks into self-destructive impotence. For he is accustomed to rely upon himself alone and to cut himself off from the whole; he has trained himself not to believe in the help of others, in men and in humanity, and only trembles for fear he shall lose his money and the privileges that he has won for himself. Everywhere in these days men have, in their mockery, ceased to understand that the true security is to be found in social solidarity rather than in isolated individual effort. But this terrible individualism will inevitably have an end, and all will understand how unnaturally they are separated from one another. . . . But until then, . . . even if he has to do it alone, and his conduct seems to be crazy, a man must set an example, and so draw men’s souls out of their solitude, and spur them to some act of brotherly love, that the great idea may not die.” (The mysterious visitor to Zossima)

¶ The world has proclaimed the reign of freedom, especially of late, but what do we see in this freedom of theirs? Nothing but slavery and self-destruction! For the world says: “You have desires and so satisfy them, for you have the same rights as the most rich and powerful. Don’t be afraid of satisfying them, and even multiply your desires.” . . . And what follows from this right of multiplication of desires? In the rich, isolation and spiritual suicide; in the poor, envy and murder; for they have been given rights, but have not been shown the means of satisfying their wants. . . . To have dinners, visits, carriages, rank and slaves to wait on one is looked upon as a necessity, for which life, honor, and human feeling are sacrificed, and men even commit suicide if they are unable to satisfy it. We see the same thing among those who are not rich, while the poor drown their unsatisfied need and their envy in drunkenness. (Zossima)

¶ How can a man shake off his habits, what can become of him if he is in such bondage to the habit of satisfying the innumerable desires he has created for himself? He is isolated, and what concern has he with the rest of humanity? They have succeeded in accumulating a greater mass of objects, but the joy in the world has grown less. The monastic way is very different. Obedience, fasting, and prayer are laughed at, yet only through them lies the way to real, true freedom. I cut off my superfluous and unnecessary desires, I subdue my proud and wanton will and chastise it with obedience, and with God's help I attain freedom of spirit and with it spiritual joy. Which is most capable of conceiving a great idea and serving it—the rich man in his isolation or the man who has freed himself from the tyranny of material things and habits?

¶ If you have no God, what is the meaning of crime? (Zossima)

¶ And how many ideas there have been on earth in the history of man which were unthinkable ten years before they appeared? (Zossima)

¶ If you love everything, you will perceive the divine mystery in things. . . . Love children especially, . . . they live to soften and purify our hearts and as it were to guide us. (Zossima)

¶ It may be senseless to beg forgiveness of the birds, but birds would be happier at your side and children and all animals, if you yourself were nobler than you are now. It's like an ocean, I tell you. . . . Do not say, "Sin is mighty, wickedness is mighty, evil environment is mighty, and we are lonely and helpless, and evil environment is wearing us away and hindering our good work from being done." Fly from that dejection. There is only one means of salvation; then take yourself and make yourself responsible for all men's sins. (Zossima)

¶ What grows lives and is alive only through the feeling of its contact with other mysterious worlds? If that feeling grows weak or is destroyed in you, the heavenly growth will die away in you. Then you will be indifferent to life and even grow to hate it. (Zossima)

¶ You are working for the whole, and you are acting for the future. (Zossima)

¶ What is hell? . . . It is the suffering of being unable to love. (Zossima)

¶ In some cases it is really more creditable to be carried away by an emotion, however unreasonable, which springs from a great love, than to be unmoved. And this is even truer in youth, for a young man who is always sensible is to be suspected and is of little worth—that's my opinion. (concerning Alyosha, Book VII, Chapter II)

¶ He did not stop on the steps either, but went quickly down; his soul, overflowing with rapture, yearned for freedom, space, openness. The vault of heaven, full of soft, shining stars, stretched vast and fathomless above him. The Milky Way ran in two pale streams from the zenith to the horizon. The fresh, motionless, still night unfolded the earth. The white towers and golden domes of the cathedral gleamed out against the sapphire sky. The gorgeous autumn flowers, in the beds round the house, were slumbering till morning. The silence of earth seemed to melt into the silence of the heavens. The mystery of earth was one with the mystery of the stars. Someone visited my soul in that hour, he [Alyosha] used to say afterwards, with implicit faith in his words.

AFSC conference. Bayard Rustin spoke tonight with an effectiveness that few speakers can match. Having just returned from Africa, he described the nationalist upsurgings there, and the use of nonviolent techniques by Manilal Gandhi in South Africa. He offered nonviolence as the goal of the future, and the only chance left for averting war. Negotiation, he said, is fine; but every practical negotiator, including Stalin, knows that it is meaningless unless backed up with power. The amount of power represented by each side automatically determines the outcome of the negotiation. This means the continuing increase of military resources, in order to be ahead of the enemy, and because we are convinced that the only thing Stalin can understand is force. It is true that the only thing Stalin can understand is force, but this can be nonviolent power as well as violent. What the world must do, then, is to train itself slowly and systematically in the techniques of nonviolent resistance: for there are only three ways out of conflict situations: (1) by force, which destroys the destroyer as well as the destroyed; (2) by nonviolent power; (3) by cowardice, which is the worst of the three.

One of the things that the conference seemed to bring out was the difficulty of helping out in backward areas, for instance, unless one is really technically trained as well as rightly motivated. I am going to have to think this whole problem out very carefully, and soon, while it is still feasible for me to go back to some sort of graduate school, if I so choose.

Bobby Johnston came with me to the conference and spoke up very admirably. I think that his thinking has changed quite a bit, so that now he is beginning to feel a sense of motivation to devote his talents to a vital public good. I suggested that an acquaintance with world problems as they really exist and not as the newspapers report them, plus a knowledge of the efforts of Quakers, FOR, etc., to act positively against the evil forces, might be a valuable thing for Dave Johnston, Bob's brother. Dave seemed to have a sincere and deep-rooted desire and need for some kind of positive orientation, for something as a goal worth striving for. Bob tells me that now his brother does very poorly at school because "he can't seem to get interested in any of his courses." A moral and philosophical sense of direction could give these courses their raison d'être, now lacking.

"It is not upon thee to finish the work; neither art thou free to abstain from it." (Talmud)

January 7, 1953

Mother and Dad left for Miami. They have realized now that the era of child raising is over and that they must face old age together. I think they will do very well.

I bought Dick Hatch's Leave the Salt Earth, republished as a pocket-book with a new title, Go Down to Glory. Hatch used to tell us that after the relative failure of several novels in which he sincerely tried to speak his mind, he vowed to write something that would contain every sure-fire formula for popular success: thus, this book. There is passionate love, rape, incest, naked couples all over the place, and even an attempt of mob castration. Well, Hatch was right in his judgments—witness the reprinting.

The Alsops reported today a new slant to the H-bomb and the problem of scientific war. Apparently, each H-bomb explosion releases an amount of C-14, a heavy carbon isotope with a half-life of 5600 years. The amount of C-14 naturally present on the earth is harmless, but in increased quantities the isotope has been found to affect human genes, causing sterility, or the birth of "monsters." Scientists do not agree, say the Alsops, on just how many bombs need be exploded in order to reach the radiation threshold for C-14, above which it will have these disastrous effects. But the conservative estimate is several hundred. Let us hope that discoveries of this nature will make us a bit more wary of our macabre play.

I think I am beginning to feel more my kinship with the Jews, and to have the desire, long absent, to read more fully in the tradition. Rustin brought out the fact that on every jury for a case condemning communists, the prosecution was careful to include a number of Jews and Negroes because these minority groups are almost sure to vote against the defendants. Since they already have one strike against them, they do not wish to have two. Thus in Germany the Jews were the first to help Hitler purge the communists, little realizing that they would be next, regardless. Now in turn, the Communists abroad are everywhere purging the Jews—witness the Prague trials and now the dismissal of Gerhard Eiser. Of course, the unfortunate thing is that these people really deserve their fate, for in their time of power they murdered and purged as well. Those who live by the sword shall die by the sword. André Weill mentioned that Eiser deserves no sympathy merely because of his rejection of the liberty and fair play that America offered. Thus, he jumped into the lion's mouth of his own free will, to coin a phrase.

I have been reading, simultaneously, the following along with The Brothers Karamazov: The Folks at Home by Margaret Halsey, a rather elementary outburst against our business environment; Wittle's biography of Freud; Male & Female, by Margaret Mead; and Dick Hatch's sex novel, "Leave the Salt Earth," in pocket book republication under the new title, Go Down to Glory.

I am getting a taste of what it means to be responsible for a household, since mother and dad are away, and Alice is at school most of the day. It is not a very pleasant occupation.

Also read in Byron: "Don Juan."

January 9, 1953

I can build a novel out of McCarthy, father and son: their relationship, the prosperous farm neglected, Francis McCarthy's raping of a local girl, desertion of his wife, and successful evasion of detection; the superciliousness of the "successful" brothers—lawyers and businessmen; Marie's scheming to secure the post office job; the animosity between her children and Uncle Bernard; Bernard's relations with the Bardens; with Charlie—poaching, the lame excuse of tool retrieving, the car-smashing; with Curly over the horse; Curly's character; the Carmans; tensions between city and country folk; the episode with Rusty; Mac's helping with the logs, then stealing wood; the Millingtons vs. McCarthy; Bucky, who smashed in old Sam's jaw, and was protected by the priest; Sibley's nervousness; the electricity question; Bernard and English—the daughter; Abe—a month's free vacation, his attempt to secure a double bed in the hotel for himself and his girlfriend; Pop's life: log running, 16-hours a day mowing with a scythe; the episodes with Cornell men: Mac and the White Horse ranch; Carman and the sheep; Joe Green, the Rabbi and his wife. Problem: how to make a coherent and dramatically evocative whole out of this mass. I must think everything out clearly before writing a word: each scene, each development of plot, each strategic event, each climax; then, when this is done, think out the chapters and write them one by one, only after every detail is in its place beforehand. Work slowly, and have patience. Perhaps something will come of it.

Today has been a day that has been fully used. I have been so weak of will in the past, sleeping 12 hours, getting up at 10 or 11 in the morning, wasting the afternoon, and then feeling so fatigued in the early evening so as to waste that too. Dan Wilkes writes from Cambridge that "the more active I become the less time work takes, the more work I get done." I guess some people just stagnate when there are no eddies or cataracts. Or perhaps it can be explained on Bernoulli's principle: the faster one goes, the less pressure from backlogs, conscience, conflicts of desires, etc., and the net result (like on top of an airfoil) is a lift. Just this I have experienced today (and other days and periods in the past). On less sleep I have done more: played piano all morning, traveled to Manhattan after lunch to get tickets for the Toscanini concert tomorrow, had a haircut, finished The Brothers Karamazov, sight-read with unusual alertness, cooked supper with Alice, again sight-read, read 125 pages of Hatch's novel. Oh, also: exercised and showered in the afternoon, and snoozed for ½ hour, which was all I needed to make we now, at 1 a.m., still feel wide awake. Hatch's book is very strong, and the sex episodes are done with a wonder at the beauty of young love, not just for exhibitionism. It would be hard to find two different techniques more opposed than those of Dostoevsky and Hatch. I would like to take Dostoevsky's expansiveness and relaxation and combine it with Hatch's terseness and constant tension.

Margo comes for dinner tomorrow night.

I am reading Maria Chapdelaine, this time in the original French. Hémon's explanations of life in French Canada coincide very nicely with what I have seen of life as it still exists in the Adirondacks.

January 17, 1953

From Hémon:

¶ Pour les enfants, Jésus de Nazareth était toujours “le petit Jésus”, l'enfantelet bouclé des images pieuses; et en vérité pour les parents aussi, c'était cela que son nom représentait le plus souvent. Non pas le Christ douloureux et profond du protestantisme, mais quelqu'un de plus familier et de moins grand: un nouveau-né dans les bras de sa mère, ou tout au plus un très petit enfant qu'on pouvait aimer sans grand effort d'esprit et même sans songer à son sacrifice futur.

¶ Maria regardait par la fenêtre les champs blancs que arçait le bois solennel; la ferveur religieuse, la montée de son amour adolescent, le son remuant des voix familières se fondaient dans son Coeur en une seule émotion. En vérité, le monde était tout plein d'amour ce soir-là, d'amour profane et d'amour sacré également simples et forts, envisages tous deux comme des choses naturelles et nécessaires; ils étaient tout mêlés l'un à l'autre, de sorte que les prières qui appelaient la bienveillance de la divinité sur les êtres chers n'étaient guère que des moyens de manifester l'amour humain, et que les naïves plaintes amoureuses étaient chantées avec la voix grave et solennelle et l'air d'extase des invocations surhumaines.

. . . Je voudrais que la rose
Fût encore au rosier,
Et que le rosier même
À la mer fût jeté.

Il y a longtemps que je t'aime,
Jamais je ne t'oublierai . . .

Margo came last night at 6 and stayed until 2 a.m. We are two spirits united with ease, through that mysterious feeling that makes you know another person almost automatically and immediately, though in point of view of time or external experience you hardly know him or her at all. It is a union of souls and an affirmation of the occult belief that underlying each individual is a basic ingredient that is universal in character and composition.

When two such persons come together conversation turns unashamedly to innermost hopes and fears, achievements and frustrations. You talk—fast—and without faltering as though holding a conversation with yourself. She in particular spoke out, and mentioned that there were few people to whom she could speak as she spoke to me last night.

She is a little wisp of a girl, almost frail; her arms especially look deficient in flesh and thickness. Yet her face bears that unique expressiveness that comes from intelligence and that is accented by thinness and perhaps even gauntness. Withal, she is pretty, not in the sexy way of Hollywood, but hers is a face that you must look at twice, and you might expect to find it in Michelangelo; indeed, it is a trifle Italianate. She is not Italian, however; her father came from Austria when he was 14, never was able to continue very much educationally after the European gymnasium, and ended up as a salesman for Dunhill Company. The mother was a dancer, and this interest carries over to Margo's sister.

She surprised me by saying that she is undergoing intensive analysis. I admire her for it because she was really in trouble and was intelligent and brave enough to try to cure it early. She arranged for the analyst entirely on her own, through a clinic, and did not inform her parents until it was a fait-accompli. Her troubles certainly sounded familiar to my ear: primarily sexual, the conflict between an upbringing that taught that “there are certain things that nice girls don’t do,” and on the other hand the display of sex all over the place today in books, movies, ads, etc., plus of course natural desires that could not be repressed. She had an affair that terminated unhappily, and then in her sophomore year at Skidmore (how familiar the following!) withdrew into herself, shut herself off from the opposite sex, and even began to go in the direction of homosexuality. It was this last that probably made her realize that the situation was getting out of her conscious control. Somehow tied into this emotional picture was also the intellectual one of dissatisfaction with Skidmore, where practically none of the girls were at all interested in learning. So, at the end of the sophomore year, Margo transferred to Sarah Lawrence and began the analysis soon thereafter.

She has a delightful mind and is assuredly past that definite threshold of intelligence that divides the original and abstract thinkers and the people really capable of conceiving life forces and problems in an intellectual way, from the run-of-the-mill academic types, pedants, tea-partiers, theater-goers, and second-rate professional men. Here she and I share something, and also in our mutual realization that we are not geniuses, although we have the necessary intelligence to have a “clear and present” idea of how genius functions—and yet we both also have faith in our capabilities, feel the need, desire, and ability to contribute creatively, and know that we are much better qualified to do so than a great many people active in artistic pursuits, now and in the past.

Rochester, New York

I may be able to get a job in the General Hospital here, probably as an attendant. Will know more definitely tomorrow morning. I practically burst into uncontrollable laughter in the Employment Office here this morning. A very cute girl (she looked just like the ward in The Importance of Being Earnest movie) did the preliminary interviewing. In a tone betraying the fact that she had asked the same questions in the same way several hundred times before, she proceeded: What type of work do you wish? What is your previous employment service? What is your educational background? And then in exactly the same manner, as though the next question was of a nature exactly similar to the ones preceding: How tall are you? This just hit my funny bone, and she is probably still wondering why.

So far, in all my dealings both with employment service personnel and hospital officials (and I have seen quite a few of both varieties in the past four months) I have found that when they learn that I am a C.O., instead of becoming antagonistic, as one is led to expect will happen, they seem, on the contrary, to become more friendly, or at least not to become less friendly. This almost universal reaction in my experience has been most heartening.

As a rebuke to those who conclude that the lower classes don't think, or think differently from the intelligentsia, I overheard one waitress saying to another that she was glad that Eisenhower was finally in office (today was inauguration day) but felt, after all the shouting was over that Truman hadn't done so badly. But her one fervent wish, and this is the point I noticed especially, was that Eisenhower should continue in good health to prevent the catastrophe of having Richard Nixon as president.

Peter Gardner showed up last Sunday afternoon and spent the night. We had a delightful reunion, talking until 3 a.m., hearing and playing each other's music, etc. Our friendship, instead of diluting or slipping away because of separation, seems to have strengthened from the sure knowledge, born of retrospect, of how mutually meaningful and beneficial our common living had been. With Pete now, I feel no hesitancy whatsoever of opening my heart, nor do I doubt that he does either.

Well, I feel very much alone here in this room in an unknown city, and I only hope that if I do finally work here the feeling will not continue. I imagine that between the hospital itself, and whatever work I may do on the outside, in the university and or the Eastman School of Music, I will be able to gather together some friends. Life without love is not life. Perhaps in this room I will write a novel, perhaps I will share myself with others in talk, or perhaps I will dissipate all my energies and waste my precious life. Two years hence I must look back and see which alternative was taken.

Sunnyside

The job as operating room orderly in Rochester General Hospital was OK'd on the spot, and I have received official notice to report for work on February 2nd. I view that date with dread.

I enjoyed the drive from Rochester to Riparius Wednesday night, since it had just snowed and I felt very pioneerish as I moved continuously onward along the unpopulated roads. Even a flat tire outside of Bakers Mills was not too much of a calamity. At Riparius, I met "Frenchy" and old fellow-worker of Curly's, who had come up, slightly drunk, for a visit. He looked 50-ish, but told me he was 68 and still a healthy lumberjack. Curly also turns out to be French. His father emigrated to Canada and married a French-Canadian. Curly seemed rather more solemn and contemplative than usual, perhaps because both Sam and Tennyson had left several weeks ago, leaving Curly to carry on alone in the woods. Even his "woman" walked out on him one day, but soon returned.

Carman told me the amusing story of how McCarthy, dead drunk, let his car slide over the road bank so that all four wheels were completely off the ground. He walked back to Carman's for help, reporting that all he needed was a slight push, since he could rock the car, but just couldn't seem to get any traction! When Carman returned to the bank, Mac actually got in, started shifting and rocking himself vigorously in the driver's seat, the car of course staying perfectly still. It took a team of horses to pull him out.

Pete Gardner came here again yesterday, and we went to the Toscanini concert. A fine reading of the Ravel orchestration of Pictures at an Exhibition, a very imaginative work. Mrs. Gardner wants to buy a place in the Adirondacks, so I am hoping to have the Gardner clan as near neighbors.

When in Rochester I must establish a very definite schedule and make the best use of my time. If I can only convince Margo to come some weekends, or better still, to take her summer job there!

Margo is thinking not to go to Europe next year. I concur.

From the "summation" of Maria Chapdelaine:

"Maria se demandait encore: pourquoi rester là, et tant peiner, et tant souffrir? Pourquoi? . . . Et comme elle ne trouvait pas de réponse voici que du silence de la nuit, à la longue, des voix s'élevèrent.

"Elles n'avaient rien de miraculeux, ces voix; chacun de nous en entend de semblables lorsqu'il s'isole et se recueille assez pour laisser loin derrière lui le tumulte mesquin de la vie journalière. Seulement elles parlent plus haut et plus clair aux coeurs simples, au milieu des grands bois du Nord et des campagnes désolées. Comme Maria songeait aux merveilles lointaines des cités, la première voix vint lui rappeler en chuchotant les cents douceurs méconnues du pays qu'elle voulait fuir.

I arrived to find that on Tuesday night at 9:30, old Charlie McCarthy had died, aged 88. Bernard, sobbing uncontrollably, ran immediately to the Carmans; Harold returned with him and stayed until Walt Lee came and took Bernard down to sleep at his house. Earlier in the evening, Pop had gone to the kitchen, then returned and sat in the rocker by the fire. Bernard had asked, "Do you feel any better, Dad?", to which Pop answered, "Yes." Then Bernard went back to his reading. A few minutes later Pop said: "Boy!" Then his head fell back against the top of the rocker, his eyes rolled up, and he was dead. There had been no signs beforehand, except perhaps that the day before Pop was seen lying on the sofa, his face completely covered by his hands. When asked if he felt all right he said Yes, but still wouldn't show his face.

Bernard was really very bereaved. I thought the two didn't get along well, judging from their remarks to one another, but Clare assures me that they were actually very closely bound. On Thursday we went to the wake—in the store-front funeral parlor in North Creek. Pop lay in a plain coffin, specially chosen by Bernard. It was at the head of an oblong room, and Pop looked extremely unnatural as a result of the embalming. There were perhaps 40 people present, one or two of whom looked much deader than the deceased, and none of whom seemed to be talking about anything concerning the death or the departed. Bernard had been given $30 by the McCarthy estate to buy a dark suit with, but he didn't like the idea, since he'd never wear it again and since it would continuously remind him of his father. Harold had come to the rescue by lending Mac a suit which had originally been a "preaching suit" of Green's, but which had been passed on by that rather obese reverend when his tummy outgrew it. Dressed in this suit, Bernard stood near the coffin while we waited in the anteroom. Harold was frightened, and had almost backed out completely as we were driving in the truck from Riparius. I noticed that he did what I had once done when driving for that first time to Deerfield—he went slower and slower as we approached, as though that would ease the ordeal, and even finally parked at the furthest end of town from the funeral parlor. Clare, as a Catholic, had long ago learned to accept death and even find something beautiful in it. She had been to the wake of her girlfriend's mother, and commented afterwards that the Boston embalmers seem to be more skillful than those in North Creek. As for me, I wasn't afraid of seeing Pop, though I had no idea how he was going to look; but I was anxious about what I should say to Bernard.

The doing proved much simpler than the contemplating. We didn't have to wait in the anteroom more than a minute before Bernard saw us and came out smiling. He greeted Hal knowingly (Hal had been the first to whom Bernard had come after the death), and asked me when I arrived. Clare commented that he looked much better than he had (which had been quite bad indeed) and he said that he had managed to sleep three hours the night before. Tuesday night he had stayed up right through. We followed him to the coffin, and stood for a moment in silence. Hal and I were fidgety, passing our gloves and cap from one hand to the next. But Clare, again the Catholic, knew how to give outward form to her inner feeling; she knelt on the little stool provided, crossed herself, and said the proper prayer, whatever it is. We were hoping that Mac wouldn't break down. He had said outside that he had been able to control himself mostly, just choking up every so often. Now he said, "He looks good, don't he?" pointing to the painted face. We all answered an obedient Yes. "Only his hair," Mac continued, "it used t' kinda fall over his forehead, but the undertaker brushed it all back straight." As he said this he passed his hand over the forehead and hair, but just missed touching them. At this point he did choke up, but soon recovered. Then he accompanied us back to the anteroom. "The burying's tomorrow morning," he told us, "'cause Earl Waddell's in the afternoon." None of us went to the funeral.

On my last visit, just a week ago, I had stopped in to see Charlie McCarthy, exchanged a few words, and left. As I was driving to the post office I remember thinking that it was too bad I hadn't asked him to tell me about the old log drives. Oh well, I thought, next time. A few days later he was dead. On that same visit I went to see Earl Waddell about the George Davis place. He, too, was dead when I returned yesterday. He had gone to the grain store to get some feed. As he picked up the first bag he simply fell over on his back, the life in him completely flown.

The bitter and the sweet were mixed. Hal told me that the electricity will probably come free, since the whole Millington clan has decided to hook on to the line. Also, Curly, the Carmans, and I spent a nice evening of talk, even though the burden of the conversation was on the hardships of the Adirondack life. The interesting point was Hal's, that you don't ever own anything. Even when your farm is all paid up, you pay "rent" each year in the form of taxes, and if you can't meet just one year's payment your home is sold out from under you. Curly said that it was all because of socialism, and I agreed, but probably gave myself a subversive label by adding that socialism is inevitable, and that the real cause is that our country is too big and too complex. You don't have to preach distributionism to these fellows, for they're distributed all right (!), but you do have to convince them that their woes are not caused simply by a group of "foreigners" who are giving our country over to the Russians.

Alone again in this room, and now here for good (2 years and not a day more). I forget to take my galoshes off downstairs, and I got too much water on the bathroom floor—this is what I must learn to put up with from Mrs. Simon and boarding house life. On the very first day I made a discovery that will be disastrous to my finances: a well-stocked bookstore selling out everything at 20% off! Today I limited myself to Craxin's book on modern art and to a little distributionist tract by Aldous Huxley. But I shall go back!

Sunday, February 8, 1953

Took Seashore test yesterday: a physiological exam in intensity, pitch, time, rhythm, consonance, and memory. But I am still having difficulties finding practice facilities. I can play at the Unitarian church until 5:00, but I must work until 4:30. I went to the Unitarian service this morning and found it lifeless. The choir was magnificent, however, since most of it comes from Eastman.

Nice letter from Dave Tyack.

I think often of Margo and wish she could sleep with me here in this big double bed. Meeting on blind date, the farm fiasco, lunch in automat when I made her pay, talk of Rimbaud and art, with a stranger at the table; ice skating; Toscanini; Howard Johnson's; the strange people; Zero Mostel; the TV script; carriage ride in Central Park for $6.00. I didn't kiss her till the very end. She posed for nude photographs.

The hospital nurses are uncommonly beautiful and very sexy in their tight form-fitting uniforms. But they are also very businesslike; more interested in doctors than orderlies. One of the regulars is, I think, a Lesbian, judging how she pinches the other girls; her exaggerated friendliness; her fatness.

I haven't practiced since Tuesday, but I've done 13 pages so far on a short story—or better: a chapter from an unwritten novel—about Rusty and the mud. Writing is great fun. If I attempt a novel here, it would perhaps be better to try to fashion something from the summer experiences instead of Riparius scandals, which I know only second-hand.

Finished Hemingway's Across the River and Into the Trees. His craftsmanship is obvious; yet the novel doesn't attempt enough to really come off.

I mentioned to Miss Newell my desire for technical training, perhaps as a surgical technician. She says in 2 or 3 months they will consider it. The orderly job is tolerable; at least it doesn't revolve around bedpans. But I explained to her how much more worthwhile the two years would be for all concerned if I could be given some definite skill usable in the future and needed in war relief.

In inquiring about other rooming houses I have met up with several old ladies. One forced me to listen to her life history, her musical "compositions," and ended by giving me evangelical leaflets. Another told me to keep my mind clean and I'd live to ninety! She also said (not knowing that I was one) that she didn't like Jews because they always act superior. A third was a nice Catholic woman who out of a Christian spirit would have listened to my banging on her living-room piano every day. Out of Christian spirit, I refused, but may take the piano if I can find another place. In these houses there are many lonely men who lead lives of quiet desperation—unsuccessful this-and-thats now existing as post office workers, theater ushers, etc., with liquor and perhaps prostitutes as their only companionship.

More widows and sundry boarding house keepers. On Joseph Avenue, in a shack, I met up with a 300-pound woman, so heavy she could hardly move, her daughter, practically an imbecile, and husband, as thin as a beanpole, and almost totally deaf. For $6.00 per week they offered me an upstairs room—a shambles, rather—and use of the piano. If the piano got too annoying, Mrs. Big told me, she would simply turn up the television. No sale!

Television has made unbelievable inroads judging from the homes

I visited. Every laborer has a set and turns it on as soon as he returns from work. Then the family sits silently in front of the screen, night after night, until they go to bed. There was a prize fight the other night for which probably fifty million people had ringside seats. Fortunately, I abstained.

Then there was Mrs. Keys at 106 Meigs. She greeted me dressed, or rather wrapped in, a coarse burlap covering, full of patches and holes. For shoes she had some leather flaps, held together by adhesive tape. In this costume she was about to go out into the snow in search of a large smelly cat, her only companion. We talked for several hours. She was a musician, teacher at Eastman, painter, interior decorator, aviator, pottery maker, etc., the widow of a wealthy lawyer, very pretty in her day, I should judge; a liberal in religion; objects to literalness and hypocrisy; won't let anyone in the house who smokes or drinks. A Presbyterian, but presently studying Hebrew at Jewish Sunday School, at age of 73. She had just finished painting most of the house, but complained that she couldn't move the large pieces of furniture. Used to have three servants. Now lives in a dingy mess, completely alone. Has a grand piano given to her by George Eastman. A sweet old woman, living a rich life of study and work.

Attended Quaker Meeting and was invited to dine with a young married social worker who had been in C.P.S. The reception given me again points up what extraordinary people the Quakers are. The Meeting is held in the home of Mrs. Fish, which she gave to the society. During the week she provides open house for neighborhood children. I got a room on Plymouth Avenue South and had the piano moved over, but it wouldn't go up the stairs. Now it sits in the hall. If I can find one or two others with whom to share Mrs. Keys's flat, I'll go there. It's $69 per month and very attractive.

Bayard Rustin told at Holiday Hills how once in the south a Negro, pursued by a lynch mob, sought refuge in a home. The mob knocked angrily and demanded that the culprit be given up to them, or they would come in forcibly. The owner of the home opened the door calmly and said, "I'm ready. Take me." The mob, taken completely by surprise by this act of sacrificial love, turned sheepishly and departed.

At the hospital, entirely on company time, I finished a collection of magnificently written short stories by Caldwell. They have terseness, while what I write is all over-padded and full of superfluities.

No word from Margo.

February 16, 1953

Dad and Mother telephoned. It was the familiar story: righteous indignation that I hadn't written in over a week. (Actually, I sent a card off yesterday, and had only held off because I thought I'd be able to include a new address.) This situation is really intolerable. I told them that I refused to be tied to a schedule of writing, and would write when I had something to report or when the spirit moved me. Of course this was entirely unacceptable at the other end and merely indicated a lack of interest or love. The one thing I know for certain is that I must be on my own entirely. It is one reason I came this far from New York. At my new address, if I ever find one, I shall not have a phone, and will then no longer be subject to these calls that were perhaps justified when I was at summer camp or even at college, but now are entirely out of place. I am very much tempted now to refuse all assistance and to pay for my own lessons, even though Dad said I should send the Eastman bills to him.

February 17, 1953

A long, thoughtful letter from Margo. She is always full of surprises. Now she wants to give up writing—not entirely, but as a “commercial” or professional career.

March 10, 1953

Fourth finger of right hand still in a splint, result of falling asleep at the wheel while returning from Syracuse AFSC conference several weeks ago. I left Syracuse at 11 p.m., found the right road but went in the wrong direction as far as Rome. Returning to Syracuse, with just ten miles to go, I bounced off a stump and landed in a ditch. The whole front end was ripped off, but I suffered no injury other than the sprained finger. A farmer and family woke up and made up a bed for me, then gave me a hearty breakfast. The younger son sat dreamily at the table, little interested in his food, but raptly intent on the birdhouse he had built outside. As soon as a bird alighted, the boy rapidly identified the species. The man and wife seemed not the least bit disturbed at being wakened at 3:30 a.m. They got up as usual at 5:00, although it was Sunday morning, and had great fun trying to pull my truck out with their tractor. A winch had to be secured, and I sold the corpse to the tow-man for $75, including chains, tools, rope, etc. The next day I bought a bicycle, and am healthier and richer for it.

Another letter from Margo, unexpected. Now she had regained confidence in her writing and feels that she can enter objectively into the lives of other people, thus being able to find subject matter outside of her own personal experience. She described beautifully the New York Philharmonic Stravinsky concert, which I had heard on the radio. I hope she listened to Cantelli last Sunday. He played Beethoven's 7th more electrifyingly than I have ever heard it.

Finished Gregg's powerful Power of Nonviolence. He quotes some interesting lines from Whitman (from "Over the Carnage Rose Prophetic a Voice"):

Be not dishearten'd—affection shall solve the problems of Freedom
yet;

Those who love each other shall become invincible—

. . . . .

Were you looking to be held together by lawyers?

Or by an agreement on a paper? Or by arms?

Nay, nor the world, nor any living thing, will so cohere.

March 15, 1953

Last night I introduced "A Time for Greatness" to an FOR audience and a group of exchange high-school students, then was invited out to West Webster by Rev. Horton to introduce it to his church group (pitifully small). My entire sympathy with this film and especially with Brinton's book, 300 Years of Quakerism, tell me that I am unwise staying outside of Friends' membership. The Friends have all the elements that I would want in religion: mysticism, rationality (as regards the Bible, etc., and the historical Jesus), social conscience. Unitarianism leans too much toward the rational and is thereby sterilized of ardor.

An acquaintance from the Young Friends, Dirk Spruyt, talks like Dave Bevington and even has Dave's big head. He joined the Swarthmore Meeting several years ago and is now at the University of Rochester's Medical School. (Connaissance de Paris?)

I am reading Coghill's "translation" of the Canterbury Tales.

I must work, work, work, work. Enough drifting. I must learn to do something: concentrate, eliminate, narrow down!

“Aspiring Ape” by Sir Osbert Sitwell, in England Reclaimed and Other Poems:

I love in man the ape, and not the angel,
 The transience that clothes abiding bones!
 Kin to the sun and earth, to green things growing,
 He's not content—oh, torment of time flowing!—
 With dusty chanting before timeless thrones.
 To man, the ape has given love and courage,
 Dexterity and patience, wit and fire,
 A nameless aching of the heart with wonder,
 That humble, idiot longing to aspire
 Which blossoms in the arts' vast world of thunder.
 Where did the angel lurk in Helen of Troy!
 (The monkey's skull was structure for her beauty.)
 What does the angel bring for our fulfilling,
 Except a sense of righteousness in killing,
 And brag of abnegation and of duty?
 To man, the monkey brings an animal warmth,
 The lovely gift of life not everlasting,
 And talk and laughter and the seeing eyes;
 So let no man this ancestor despise,
 Who brings the arts, the customs and the trades,
 And when he kills, talks never of crusades!

Aldous Huxley makes this comment in his The Perennial Philosophy:

“Choosing Luther and Calvin instead of the spiritual reformers who were their contemporaries, Protestant Europe got the kind of theology it liked. But it also got, along with other unanticipated by-products, the Thirty Years' War, capitalism, and the first rudiments of modern Germany. ‘If we wish,’ Dean Inge has recently written, ‘to find a scapegoat on whose shoulders we may lay the miseries which Germany has brought upon the world . . . I am more and more convinced that the moral evil genius of that country is not Hitler or Bismarck or Frederick the Great but Martin Luther. . . . It [Lutheranism] worships a God who is neither just nor merciful. . . . The Law of Nature, which ought to be the court of appeal against unjust authority, is identified [by Luther] with the existing order of society, to which absolute obedience is due.”

This observation is particularly interesting in light of Tawney’s work, and of Northrop’s belief that every action of a society can be traced ultimately to the society’s metaphysic. I think that a good case could be made for the connection not only of capitalism (Tawney) with the rise of Protestantism, but also of materialism in other spheres, mass war and brutality, state-worship, etc. The all-importance of Faith in Lutheranism, of Predestination in Calvinism, of literal adherence to the Bible or even to a single verse, by the small fundamentalist schism groups, and, at the other extreme, the overly rational humanistic religion of the liberals, seem to provide ample sub-strata for the ugly weight of present-day “secular” practices and beliefs.

1199 Park Avenue, Rochester

“At certain periods of our life we long to stop the inexorable ticking hand of time and mediate upon our whole destiny. But alas, in the turmoil of today it is well nigh impossible to drop out of the line and halt awhile. Our sense of honor and duty forbids us to be laggard in the fierce race. . . . Today our duty to the state forbids us to renounce the burden of life in the world, and everywhere youth is being educated in the idea that it is selfish and unpatriotic to relinquish obligations and retire from the struggle. The tyranny of the state and society will soon deprive us of all the individual’s greatest rights. We must live amid the noise and shouts of the world, and our houses must be open for all the world to see. Soon it will no longer be allowed to possess a secret room closed by a hidden key, for then the guardians of law and order would cry out that it was Bluebeard’s closet. ‘He is like a cat that walks alone,’ they will cry, ‘and we are sure that he is a suspicious character.’ And yet never was there a time when humanity more needed its moments of silent meditation. The greatest reformer of today will be the man who founds the League of Silence.” —Walter Starkie, in “Spanish Raggle Taggle.”

Toynbee (The World and the West): “The truth is that, in offering [Asians] a secularized version of our Western civilization we have been offering them a stone instead of a bread, while the Russians, in offering them communism as well as technology, have been offering them bread of a sort—gritty black bread . . . but still an edible substance that contains in it some grain of nutriment for the spiritual life without which Man cannot live." This is exactly what the Michaëlshoeve director told me this summer: that European youth look first to America for a way out of devastation, but finding there only technology, materialism, and money, reject these things for that which is always more appealing to youth, ideological and idealistic plans, offered up in abundance by the communists.

I prepared and conducted a discussion at Young Friends on "The relation between instinct, reason, conscience, and the Inner Light." I worked these topics up as parts of a gradual conversion process on different levels.

On Wednesday night Bob Horton drove us down to Olean, where he gave his excellent work camp lecture for a Methodist Center church supper. Good food, but such Fraternal Order nonsense: singing Down By the Old Mill Stream and similar items; the "election" of new trustees, which, as one girl commented, was just like in Russia. A bloated politician arose with a prepared speech, jokes and all, saying that two of the previous trustees would be glad to succeed themselves, and Cyrus Hill would be just the man to replace the third. Other nominations were called for, of course, but were not offered. The congregation responded by electing the slate unanimously.

Muriel Lester of the International FOR, speaking at Batavia:

In case of great catastrophe because of war, the white race will die out while the orientals, accustomed to starvation, will survive. In India, at certain times, the water in which rice is boiled, taken once every three days, is the only nourishment. Even if we "win" World War III, Europe, Japan, etc. will be so impoverished that the surviving communists will have ripe ground for sowing their seeds of discontent all over again. Why do idealistic students become stodgy, reactionary adults? Because they have not been disciplined to believe that God is stronger than Mammon. Read objective news reports, what the people think, and not just what prime ministers think. Cf. World Interpreter (De Vere Allen), Wilton, Conn.; Between the Lines, Demerest, NJ; Peace News, 3 Blackstock Road, N4 London. We are so sensitized that when a person does a Christian act (e.g., peace pilgrims, Cos) we either laugh or put him in prison. Need for understanding of non-Western peoples. We often boast of “our Western religion” but Jesus was an oriental and many oriental non-Christians follow Jesus better than we do. Need for training in nonviolence—body, mind, and spirit. Conquering of bitterness, resentment, self-pity. Four Indian teenagers decided to unfurl the national flag, which was forbidden. They informed the authorities and were met on the day by a battalion of British soldiers, young boys taken by conscription away from their homes, boys who would hesitate to show cruelty towards their pet cats or dogs but who might be commanded to kill these Indian patriots. The British officers, seeing that the presence of the soldiers was not going to stop the boys, begged them to have pity on the British soldiers, who would have to shoot them. The four said they would have to go ahead but would hold no resentment against the soldiers. Two were killed. And our people place respectability, good business, conformity above Truth. This is utter cowardice. Read the gospels as a way of life. The price we have to pay for peace is economic and social. There will be no peace while there are such terrible contrasts in living standards, social classes. While we make atom bombs, can we say “our” Father? He was also the father of the slain people of Hiroshima. Can we ask “give us our daily bread” without also asking for bread for India? We must remind ourselves every hour that God is and that He is greater than all the evils. The Communists have a large army of volunteer workers, much larger than that of the Christian Church. With all the money and nice churches in the world, we will not bring Heaven on Earth until we identify ourselves with the poor, the sinners, even with communists and atheists. Christians have to have faith that Christianity will work better than communism. 50% of Russians go to church, despite strong government pressure against religion. When Christians are persecuted, they grow in strength. American foreign policy often plays right into the hands of the communists. “Help Asians fight Asians.” Think what the effect of this must be in Asia, compounded with our throwing Chiang Kai-shek back into the laps of the multitudes who hate him, just as if some power had set up George III to rule the Colonies immediately after the Revolution. Asians think naturally: “They want us to kill each other, and yet they say they’re Christians. If that’s what Christianity is, we will be better off with Communism.” In India, 10 cents can keep a man alive for 10 days.

One Nature, perfect and pervading, circulates in all natures,
 One Reality, all comprehensive, contains itself within all realities,
 The One moon reflects itself wherever there is a sheet of water,
 And all moons in the waters are embraced within the One Moon.
 The Dharma-body [the Absolute] of all the Buddhas enters into my own being.

And my own being is found in union with theirs. . . .

The Inner Light is beyond praise and blame;

Like space it knows no boundaries

Yet it is even here, within us, ever retaining its serenity and fullness.

It is only when you hunt for it that you lose it;

You cannot take hold of it, but equally you cannot get rid of it;

And while you can do neither, it goes on its own way.

You remain silent and it speaks; you speak and it is dumb;

The great gate of charity is wide open, with no obstacles before it.

(from Huxley's The Perennial Philosophy: Yung-chia Ta-shih.)

Tom Forsythe writes a letter of distress: that he is losing faith in the Quaker testimonies, that he does not think he will be able to stand the sterility, pedantry, and jealous competition of the academic world; that he is interested in living "the intellectual life on a farm." Tom seems to be completely in a dither, and in need of some reassurance and help. I replied right away.

David Lurie seems to call up and want to go to a movie every time I look forward to sitting still and writing or reading. Then he is always planning great escapades with women, climaxing of course in "a piece of ass" as he puts it. Of course they never take place. I find that he has great difficulty even getting a date. He thinks that everyone from a small town is stupid, that all "Papists" are—well—why say more: "Papists" is sufficient. And he lives under the illusion that rationality can solve and understand everything. I have tried very gently to dispel these illusions, but this is rather difficult to do solely through conversation and rational argument.

I was elected vice-chairman of the House of Peace.

Reading: Laubach's "Wake Up or Blow Up," which I just lent to Dotty Mills, plus "Aideen MacLennon," a poorly (very poorly) written novel about Cos in CPS and mental institutions. I could certainly do much better. Why don't I!!!! As I explained to Pete in a long letter, I am getting so mixed up in committee meetings, social activities, etc., that I haven't had a chance to write anything since I left Mrs. Simon's furnished room almost two months ago.

Steve Baran wrote from B.U. He is doing pre-medical work. John Harvey is in the army at Fort Dix, Tom Rogers does sports reporting for the NY Times, Pete Flemming is in the Navy, Les Ward, Carrington, Dick Button are at Harvard Law, Niel Hastie is at Episcopal Seminary, Laci at B.U. Medical School.

Nancy Hosenpflug played for me last night. I am so angry that I dropped piano and wasted all those college years with so much dribble and compartmentalized literature that I could read for myself later on. But the piano—now I can do nothing on it. Well, I have started lessons again. Who knows what will come of them?

"Our civilization is not only a leisure-seeking, but a masturbative society. Pleasure is relentlessly exploited for itself, without regard for the purpose, the original intent of our varied appetites." (Wilson in Aideen MacLennon, a horribly written novel about CO experience in CPS.)

Spent yesterday with Norman Wilson, Byron Fox, and others at Syracuse, planning next year's activities at New York State Peace Council.

Finished short story about Mac's axe murder of Charlie Gagnon's car.
Long intellectual letter from Margo.

One of the nurses at the hospital possesses a madonna-like face: the most spiritual type of beauty. I have admired her from a distance many times, but never got to speak to her until last Friday. I came for a patient and she started preparing the chart. Then she discovered that I was after another patient from the one she had thought. The first words I heard issue from this madonna were not exactly madonna-like: "Judas Priest," she said, "what a hell of a mix-up!"

Rufus Jones: Spirit in Man:

¶ There is a stage in this upward climb of our strange Jacob's ladder of spirit when we can see and can enjoy realities which to a certain degree are spiritual in their own sovereign right. I mean of course the intrinsic values of Beauty, Truth, Goodness, and Love. A mind which can see and appreciate those realities has already transcended the realm of time and space and matter and sense and the biological order, and belongs already to an intrinsic, that is, an eternal order. These ideal values are the unmoved movers which shape our destiny; and in the realm of spirit they are eternal, i.e., they are time-transcending realities.

¶ Experienced time involves a comprehensive system of experience with a backward-looking aspect and a forward-looking aspect in the pulse of a living present. . . . In felt duration-time, past, present, and future blend into a momentous duration which we feel going forward, not on a measured dial, but with inward significance. . . . Significance is what counts here rather than length. The mind in great moments of decision seems to be operating as a whole rather than as a thing of parts—seriatim. The conclusion, the decision, often seems to roll out ready made, as though in this vital duration-time our accumulated wisdom suddenly functioned as a unit, without intermediate steps. . . . This comprehensive system of time-experience in us is utterly unique and cannot be explained in terms of geological or biological or physiological processes. It is known and can be known only in terms of the inner experience of persons of the spirit type.

¶ There is no use thinking of the possibility of immortal life unless we can discover something in man that is unique—viz. this comprehensive system of time-experience.

¶ If we are to have values of the intrinsic and eternal type, we must take by faith as real the kind of world in which they can be, and that is an Over-World of higher order than the one we see and touch and describe. If we are to have an immortal destiny there must be some such over-world to which we may belong and in which we may find our fulfillment of life.

¶ If our problems are ever to be solved, we must begin with a universe which includes mind—mind and nature in mutual and reciprocal correspondence. It is not a spectator mind I am talking about here—a mind observing an outside show that goes on unaffected by the peep-hold observer. It is mind that has emerged out of the process of Nature and is kindred throughout with the world of deepest reality and is in give-and-take relations to it.

¶ We are already participating in this Over-World when we are immersed in the experience of the intrinsic values of Beauty, or of moral Goodness which ought to be, or of Truth which is eternally, inevitably true, or of Love for Love's sake. These are all typical realities which come into view only when there is a co-operating mind of what I have called the spirit-type. Only an interpretative mind, endowed with imagination and supplied with creative forms of judgment and appreciation, can create and enjoy Beauty, or have the conviction of Ought, or experience the necessary character of Truth, or love with a Love that suffers long, never lets go, is not provoked, endures and abides when everything else is "done away." Not only do these supreme realities involve a peculiar type of mind of the subjective side; they equally involve a peculiar kind of world on the objective side. The Nature that presents the occasions for Beauty, Goodness, Truth, and Love is a Nature no longer exactly describable and explainable as a congeries of atoms and molecules and vibrations. It is a Nature deeply interfused with Spirit—Coherence, Order, Significance, and Meaning. It is a sacramental universe through which Deep calleth unto Deep and significant realities of the impalpable and intangible sort "break in" on us and answer to our deepest being. We reach through the veil of what we call matter and are in a higher World which is kin to our minds and to which, as great amphibians, we really belong. In fact we lie open-windowed to it and partake of it. This Over-World of Beauty, Goodness, Truth, and Love is as truly and obviously beyond the welter and storms of the processes of matter and the basic stuff of the universe as our minds are above and beyond the swirl of the brain paths which somehow correlate with minds and appear to be the occasion for thought.

¶ We need first of all to begin with the Intelligence that does the observing rather than with atoms or molecules or genes or vibrations which are too often taken as ultimate. We must come back to the native land of our own observing and organized mind, and start with the supremacy of the Person. The grandeur of the Jungfrau or of the Matterhorn is not to be mistaken for the sublimity of the mind of the person who feels and appreciates the grandeur of these Alpine mountains. If we could properly enlarge the empire of our spiritual estate, we should recover a new installment of faith in an eternal destiny.

¶ If consciousness were nothing but a function, a secretion, of the physical brain, the hope of immortality would receive a heavy body blow. But the evidence for a theory of brain secretion is meager and slender. Certain mind processes undoubtedly correlate with certain specific brain processes, but we are completely in the dark about the ultimate nature of matter—it may be much more spiritual at its core than we now suspect—and we are completely in the dark as to the real origin of consciousness, mind, spirit, as we know it from within, and its relation to matter.

¶ On the contrary, there are high intimations of immortality. Every stage of the life of a person carries a Beyond within it. Life itself of our kind has a principle of advance in the onward flow of it. The World that has given us our convictions of eternal values, the World that has impressed us with its Beauty and its Ends of Good, its Truth, and its Love, gives us ground to expect that there is more where that comes from. And our ineradicable belief in the final intelligibility of that World sends our minds “on loft,” as Chaucer would say, with a profound conviction that the gates of the future are open.

¶ The Universe is essentially, as Keats in one of his letters said it was—“a realm of soul-making,” a sacramental system for the nurture of persons, rightly fashioned persons, with creative and responsive spirits, co-operative with the Spirit of the Whole.

¶ A sacrament means a spiritual reality breaking through a material medium.

¶ Our famous word “individual” means something that resists “division.”

¶ “With all your science, can you tell one how, and whence it is, that light comes into the soil?” —Thoreau (Journals).

¶ “When the mind returns into itself from the confusions of sense, as it does when it reflects, it passes into another region than the sensuous one, the region of that which is pure and everlasting, immortal and unchanging; and feeling itself kindred thereto, it dwells there under its own control and has rest from its wanderings, and being in communion with the unchanging is itself unchanging.” (Plato, Phaedo 79c)

Margo: “One can feel oneself part of something bigger—working in phase with the things that Be, as you said, without losing oneself in them. I think the ability to lose oneself is something that belongs to certain moments, not to be embraced as a way of life. When contemplating beauty, as in the poem [Emerson's "Each and All"], one forgets one's small self and is only aware of this tremendous force around one. In ecstasy, in passion, in religion the same is true. But one has to be something other than a part of a whole, something more than an engulfed microcosm. One can be oneself, a distinct entity, and live in relation to something bigger. Relationship means being a part of, but also a whole within this something. (I'm having an awful time with terms!) I don't think a person can be happy or feel at all significant without a sense of self and a certain appreciation of what he is."

John Rutherford wants to marry Nancy Hosenpflug and take her back to West Virginia, where he will work for the Carbide Company. He wants her, in short, to give up her career. She, on the other hand, expects to take a Masters at Juilliard, and then go on a Fulbright to study in Europe. John, I'm afraid, would make her a poor husband, as he is quite indifferent to music. After they get tired of their rub-fests and tickling, etc., there will be very little left.

From Aldous Huxley's marvelously written novel Point Counter-Point:

¶ Had he ever really been happy with Marjorie—as happy, at any rate, as he had imagined he was going to be, as he ought to have been in the circumstances? It should have been like "Epipsychidion"; but it wasn't—perhaps because he had too consciously wanted it to be, because he had deliberately tried to model his feelings and their life together on Shelley's poetry.

"One shouldn't take art too literally." He remembered what his brother-in-law, Philip Quarles, had said one evening, when they were talking about poetry. "Particularly where love is concerned."

"Not even if it's true?" Walter had asked.

"It's apt to be too true. Unadulterated, like distilled water. When truth is nothing but the truth, it's unnatural, it's an abstraction that resembles nothing in the real world. In nature there are always so many other irrelevant things mixed up with the essential truth. That's why art moves you—precisely because it's unadulterated with all the irrelevancies of real life. Real orgies are never so exciting as pornographic books. In a volume by Pierre Louys all the girls are young and their figures perfect; there's no hiccupping or bad breath, no fatigue or boredom, no sudden recollections of unpaid bills or business letters unanswered, to interrupt the raptures. Art gives you the sensation, the thought, the feeling quite pure—chemically pure, I mean,” he had added with a laugh,—“not morally.”

I must re-write the ending to the car-smashing story. Have McDonald return to Farrell's several weeks later, say, after black eye has disappeared, and there he finds another would-be helper, whom he accosts with the same line as before: “Barton and Gagnon both just up'd and left because I figures a man deserves one or two days' rest a year!”

More Huxley:

¶ Love, he had then believed (for he was twenty-two at the time, ardently pure, with the adolescent purity of sexual desires turned inside out, just down from Oxford and stuffed with poetry and lucubrations of philosophers and mystics), love was talk, love was spiritual communion and companionship. That was real love. The sexual business was only an irrelevancy—unavoidable, because unfortunately human beings had bodies, but to be kept as far as possible in the background. Ardently pure with the ardour of young desires taught artificially to burn on the side of the angels, he had admired that refined and quiet purity which, in Marjorie, was the product of a natural coldness, a congenitally low vitality.

¶ “One should be loyal to one's tastes and instincts,” Philip Quarles used to say. “What's the good of a philosophy with a major premise that isn't the rationalization of your feelings? If you've never had a religious experience, it's folly to believe in God. You might as well believe in the excellence of oysters, when you can't eat them without being sick.”

¶ “People talk of the tribute vice pays to virtue,” John Bidkeke went on incorrigibly. “But everything's permitted nowadays—there's no more need of moral hypocrisy. There's only intellectual curiosity now. The tribute philistinism pays to art, what? Just look at them all paying it—in pious grimaces and religious silence!”

¶ Lord Edward preferred to sit at home and read, vaguely, desultorily, a little of everything. But even reading seemed to him unsatisfactory. The best that could be said of it was that it kept his mind from brooding and killed time. But what was the good of that? Killing time with a book was not intrinsically much better than killing pheasants and time with a gun.

¶ Illidge knew that he was ugly and looked undistinguished. And knowing, he liked to remind himself of the unpleasant fact, like a man with an aching tooth who is forever fingering the source of his pain just to make sure it is still painful.

¶ “A great artist,” [Burlap] went on aloud, “is a man who synthesizes all experience. The cynic sets out by denying half the facts—the fact of the soul, the fact of ideals, the fact of God. And yet we’re aware of spiritual facts just as directly and indubitably as we’re aware of physical facts.”

¶ She took it for granted that he should be bolder with the pen than face to face. All his love—all of it, at any rate, that was articulate and all of it that, in the days of his courtship, was in the least ardent—was in his letters. The arrangement suited Marjorie perfectly. . . . She liked the idea of love; what she did not like was lovers, except at a distance and in imagination.

¶ All the same, it would be good to know what it’s like to believe in something to the point of being prepared to kill people or get yourself killed. It would be an experience . . .

¶ She took a perverse pleasure in the retrospective disparagement of her felicity.

¶ [Philip’s] intelligence—that quick, comprehensive, ubiquitous intelligence that could understand everything including the emotions it could not feel and the instincts it took care not to be moved by. Once, when he had been telling her about Koebler’s book on the apes, “You’re like a monkey on the superhuman side of humanity,” she said. “Almost human, like those poor chimpanzees. The only difference is that they’re trying to think up with their feelings and instincts, and you’re trying to feel down with your intellect. . . .”

¶ But of course,” Molly went on, “intelligence ought never to marry intelligence. That’s why Jean is always threatening to divorce me. He says I’m too stimulating. ‘Tu ne m’ennuies pas assez,’ he says; and that what he needs is une femme sedative. And I believe he’s really right.”

¶ “Blake was civilized,” Rampion insisted, “civilized. Civilization is harmony and completeness. Reason, feeling, instinct, the life of the body—Blake managed to include and harmonize everything. Barbarism is being lop-sided. You can be a barbarian of the intellect as well as of the body. A barbarian of the soul and the feelings as well as of sensuality. Christianity made us barbarians of the soul and now science is making us barbarians of the intellect. Blake was the last civilized man.”

¶ He knew, of course, that she liked and admired him; but to know and to be told are different things.

¶ He remembered those lines of Walt Whitman about the animals: “They do not sweat and whine about their condition. They do not lie awake in the dark and weep for their sins.” To be a perfect animal and a perfect human—that was the ideal.

¶ “She had no right to bring me up like that,” he said. “Like a Japanese gardener deliberately stunting a tree. No right.”

¶ “Your only alternatives are promiscuity or asceticism. Two forms of death. Why, the Christians themselves understood phallism a great deal better than this godless generation. What’s that phrase in the marriage service? ‘With my body I thee worship.’ Worshipping with the body—that’s the genuine phallism. And if you imagine it has anything to do with the unimpassioned civilized promiscuity of our advanced young people, you’re very much mistaken indeed.”

¶ “But there is an insight that sees deeper than the mere facts.” “Deeper insight” was Burlap’s pet name for his own opinion.

¶ “Well, as a matter of fact,” said Philip, “all these camisoles en flanelle and pickled onions and bishops of cannibal islands are really quite to the point. Because the essence of the new way of looking is multiplicity. Multiplicity of eyes and multiplicity of aspects seen. . . . Each sees a different aspect of the event, a different layer of reality. What I want to do is look with all those eyes at once.”

¶ The amoeba, when it finds a prey, flows around it, incorporates it, and oozes on. There was something amoeboid about Philip Quarles’s mind. It was like a sea of spiritual protoplasm, capable of flowing in all directions, of engulfing every object in its path, of trickling into every crevice, of filling every mould, and having engulfed, having filled, or flowing on toward other obstacles, other receptacles, leaving the first empty and dry. At different times in his life and even at the same moment he had filled the most various moulds. He had been a cynic and also a mystic, a humanitarian and also a contemptuous misanthrope; he had tried to live the life of detached and stoical reason and another time he had aspired to the unreasonableness of natural and uncivilized existence. The choice of moulds depended at any given moment on the books he was reading, the people he was associated with. . . . The moulds were emptied as easily as they had been filled, the obstacles were passed by. But the essential liquidness that flowed where it would, the cool indifferent flux of intellectual curiosity—that persisted and to that his loyalty was due.

¶ Love produced a desire to be loved. Desire to be loved begot a strained precarious belief that he was loved. The belief that he was loved strengthened his love. And so, self-intensified, the circular process began again.

¶ “I must resent being condemned to extinction because these imbeciles and scientists and moralists and spiritualists and technicians and literary and political uplifters and all the rest of them haven’t the sense to see that man must live as a man, not as a monster of conscious braininess and soulfulness.”

¶ Spandrell: “Work’s no more respectable than alcohol, and it serves exactly the same purpose: it just distracts the mind, makes a man forget himself. . . . No wonder the Samuel Smileses and the big businessmen are such enthusiasts for work. Work gives them the comforting illusion of existing, even of being important. If they stopped working, they’d realize that they simply weren’t there at all, most of them. Just holes in the air, that’s all. . . . No wonder they daren’t stop working. They might find out what they really are, or rather aren’t. It’s a risk they haven’t the courage to take.

¶ “I like to think of the bureaucrats . . . Scribbling away, scribbling from morning till night in order that we may live in freedom and comfort. Scribble, scribble—the result is the British Empire. What a comfort to live in a world where one can delegate everything tiresome, from governing to making sausages, to somebody else.”

¶ She re-opened the book in the middle. “Every English liberty has been paid for by a new slavery. The destruction of feudalism strengthened the crown. At the Reformation we disposed of Papal infallibility, but we saddled ourselves with the divine right of kings. Cromwell smashed the divine right of kings, but imposed the tyranny of the landowners and the middle classes. The tyranny of the landowners and middle classes is rapidly being destroyed, in order that we may have the dictatorship of the proletariat. A new infallibility, not of the Pope, but of the majority, has been propounded—an infallibility which we are compelled by law to believe in.”

¶ Everything’s incredible, if you can skin off the crust of obviousness our habits put on it.

¶ A novelist modulates by reduplicating situations and characters. He shows several people falling in love, or dying, or praying in different ways—dissimilars solving the same problems. Or, vice versa, similar people confronted with dissimilar problems. In this way you can modulate through all the aspects of your theme, you can write variations on any number of different moods. Another way: the novelist can assume the god-like creative privilege and simply elect to consider the events of the story in their various aspects—emotional, scientific, economic, religious, metaphysical . . .

¶ “If you want to get rid of industrialism, you’ve got to get back to where you started. That’s to say, you’ve got to slaughter half the existing number of men and women.” . . . “But the next war and the next revolution will make [that] only too practical.” “Possibly. But one shouldn’t count on wars and revolutions. Because, if you count of them happening, they certainly will happen.” “They’ll happen,” said Rampion, “whether you count on them or not. Industrial progress means over-production, means the need for getting new markets, means international rivalry, means war. And mechanical progress means more specialization and standardization of work, means more ready-made and unindividual amusements, means diminution of initiative and creativeness, means more intellectualism and the progressive atrophy of all the vital and fundamental things in human nature, means increased boredom and restlessness, means finally a kind of individual madness that can only result in social revolution. Count on them or not, wars and revolutions are inevitable, if things are allowed to go on as they are at present.” . . . “The root of the evil’s in the individual psychology; so it’s there, in the individual psychology, that you’d have to begin. The first step would be to make people live dualistically, in two compartments. In one compartment as industrialized worker, in the other as human beings. As idiots and machines for eight hours of every twenty-four and real human beings for the rest.” “Don’t they do that already?” “Of course they don’t. They live as idiots and machines all the time, at work and in their leisure. Like idiots and machines, but imagining they’re living like civilized humans, even like gods. The first thing to do is to make them admit that they are idiots and machines during working hours. ‘Our civilization being what it is’—this is what you’ll have to say to them—‘you’ve got to spend eight hours out of every twenty-four as a mixture between an imbecile and a sewing machine. It’s very disagreeable, I know. It’s humiliating and disgusting. But there you are. You’ve got to do it; otherwise the whole fabric of our world will fall to bits and we’ll all starve. . . . Don’t be deceived by the canting rogues who talk of the sanctity of labour and the Christian service that businessmen do their fellows. It’s all lies. . . . Don’t try to cheer yourself up by pretending the nasty mechanical job is a noble one. It isn’t; and the only result of saying and believing that it is will be to lower your humanity to the level of the dirty work. . . . Admit it’s dirty, hold your nose, and do it for eight hours, and then concentrate on being a real human being in your leisure. A real complete human being. Not a newspaper reader, not a jazzer, not a radio fan. The industrialists who purvey standardized ready-made amusements to the masses are doing their best to make you as much of a mechanical imbecile in your leisure as in your hours of work. But don’t let them. Make the effort of being human.’

¶ “The only thing they’re all agreed on—Tories, Liberals, Socialists, Bolsheviks—is the intrinsic excellence of the industrial stink and the necessity of standardizing and specializing every trace of genuine manhood and womanhood out of the human race.”

¶ “It isn’t a question of myah personalities,” he pronounced. “It’s a question of general principles.” “I can’t see any difference,” retorted Gladys, abolishing at one stroke all the solemn pretensions of all the philosophers and moralists, all the religious leaders and reformers and Utopia makers from the beginning of human time.

¶ “The chief difference between us, alas, is that his opinions are lived and mine, in the main, only thought. Like him, I mistrust intellectualism, but intellectually, I disbelieve in the adequacy of any scientific or philosophical theory, any abstract moral principle, but on scientific, philosophical, and abstract-moral grounds. The problem for me is to transform a detached intellectual skepticism into a way of harmonious all-round living.”

¶ “The whole of modern civilization is based on the idea that the specialized function which gives a man his place in society is more important than the whole man, or rather is the whole man, all the rest being irrelevant or even (since the physical, intuitive, instinctive, and emotional part of a man doesn't contribute appreciably to making money or getting on in an industrialized world) positively harmful and detestable. The low-brow of our modern industrialized society has all the defects of the intellectual and none of his redeeming qualities. The non-intellectuals I'm think of are very different beings."

¶ "I perceive now that the real charm of the intellectual life—the life devoted to erudition, to scientific research, to philosophy, to aesthetics, to criticism—is its easiness. It's the substitution of simple intellectual schemata for the complexities of reality; of still and formal death for the bewildering movements of life. It's incomparably easier to know a lot, say, about the history of art and to have profound ideas about metaphysics and sociology than to know personally and intuitively a lot about one's fellows and to have satisfactory relations with one's friends and lovers, one's wife and children. . . . The intellectual life is child's play; which is why intellectuals tend to become children—and then imbeciles and finally, as the political and industrial history of the last few centuries clearly demonstrates, homicidal lunatics and wild beasts. The repressed functions don't die; they deteriorate, they fester, they revert to primitiveness. But meanwhile it's much easier to be an intellectual child or lunatic or beast than a harmonious adult man.

¶ In two hours the muscles of the heart contract and relax, contract again and relax only eight thousand times. The earth travels less than an eighth of a million miles along its orbit. And the prickly pear has had time to invade only another hundred acres of Australian territory. Two hours are as nothing. The time to listen to the Ninth Symphony and a couple of the posthumous quartets, to fly from London to Paris, to transfer a luncheon from the stomach to the small intestine, to read Macbeth, to die of snake bite or earn one and eight pence as a charwoman. No more. But to Illidge, as he sat waiting, with the dead body lying there behind the screen, waiting for the darkness, they seemed unending.

¶ "... Very brief and neat and complete. And, my God, what a horror. No body, no contact with the material world, no contact with human beings except through the intellect, no love . . ." "We've changed that a little since 1901,” said Philip, smiling. “Not really. You’ve admitted promiscuous fornication, that’s all. But not love, not the natural contact and flow, not the renunciation of mental self-consciousness, not the abandonment to instinct. No, no. You stick to your conscious will. Everything must be expressément voulue all the time. And the connections must be purely mental. And life must be lived, not as though it were life in the world of living people, but as though it were solitary recollection and fancy and meditation. An endless masturbation, like Proust’s horrible great book. That’s the higher life. Which is the euphemistic name of incipient death.”

¶ “If men went about satisfying their instinctive desires only when they genuinely felt them, like the animals you’re so contemptuous of, they’d behave a damned sight better than the majority of civilized human beings behave today. It isn’t natural appetite and spontaneous instinctive desire that makes men so beastly—no ‘beastly’ is the wrong word; it implies an insult to the animals—so all-too-humanly bad and vicious, then. It’s the imagination, it’s the intellect, it’s principles, it’s tradition and education. Leave the instincts to themselves and they’ll do very little mischief. If men made love only when they were carried away by passion, if they fought only when they were angry or terrified, if they grabbed at property only when they had need or were swept off their feet by an uncontrollable desire for possession—why, I assure you, this would be a great deal more like the Kingdom of Heaven than it is under our present Christian-intellectual-scientific dispensation. It’s not instinct that makes Casanovas and Byrons and Lady Castlemaines; it’s a prurient imagination artificially tickling up the appetite, tickling up desires that have no natural existence. If Don Juans and Don Juanesses only obeyed their desires, they’d have very few affairs. They have to tickle themselves up imaginatively before they can start being casually promiscuous. And it’s the same with the other instincts. It’s not the possessive instinct that’s made modern civilization insane about money. The possessive instinct has to be kept artificially tickled by education and tradition and moral principles. They money-grubbers have to be told that money-grubbing’s natural and noble, that thrift and industry are virtues, that persuading people to buy things they don’t want is Christian service. Their possessive instinct would never be strong enough to keep them grubbing away from morning till night all through a lifetime. It has to be kept chronically gingered up by the imagination and the intellect. And then, think of civilized war. It's got nothing to do with spontaneous combativeness. Men have to be compelled by law and tickled up by propaganda before they'll fight. You'd do more for peace by telling men to obey the spontaneous dictates of their fighting instincts than by founding any number of Leagues of Nations."

¶ "And all perverted in the same way—by trying to be non-human. Non-humanly religious, non-humanly moral, non-humanly intellectual and scientific, non-humanly specialized and efficient, non-humanly the businessman, non-humanly avaricious and property-loving, non-humanly lascivious and Don Juanesque, non-humanly the conscious individual even in love. All perverts. Perverted towards goodness or badness, towards spirit or flesh; but always away from the central norm, always away from humanity."

¶ "Don't allow your theoretical knowledge to influence your practical life. In the abstract you know that music exists and is beautiful. But don't therefore pretend, when you hear Mozart, to go into raptures which you don't feel. If you do, you become one of those idiotic music snobs one meets at Lady Edward Tantomount's. Unable to distinguish Bach from Wagner, but mooing with ecstasy as soon as the fiddles strike up. It's exactly the same with God. The world's full of ridiculous God-snobs. People who aren't really alive, who've never done any vital act, who aren't in any living relation with anything; people who haven't the slightest personal or practical knowledge of what God is. But they moo away in churches, they coo over their prayers, they pervert and destroy their whole dismal existences by acting in accordance with the will of an arbitrarily imagined abstraction which they choose to call God. Just a pack of God-snobs. . . ."

The following incident, reported by Sir Oliver Lodge in Why I Believe in Immortality (Doubleday Doran, 1929) might be good for a story-subject: [Abstracted from documents received by the British Society of Psychical Research]:

¶ James L. Chaffin, the Testator, was a farmer in Davie County, N.C.

He was married and had four sons, in order of age John A. Chaffin, James Pinkney Chaffin, Marshall A. Chaffin, and Abner Columbus Chaffin.

¶ On the 16th Nov., 1905, the Testator made a will, duly attested by two witnesses, whereby he gave his farm to his third son, Marshall, whom he appointed sole executor. The widow and the other three sons were left unprovided for. Sixteen years afterwards, on the 7th Sept., 1921, the Testator died as the result of a fall. His third son, Marshall, obtained probate of the 1905 will on the 24 Sept. of that year. The mother and the other 3 brothers did not contest this will as they knew no valid reason for doing so. But afterwards, in 1925, some odd events happened, which are thus narrated:

¶ Extract from Statement of James Pinkney Chaffin, Testator's second son: "In all my life I never heard my father mention having made a later will than the one dated 1905. I think it was in June of 1925 that I began to have very vivid dreams that my father appeared to me at my bedside but made no verbal communication. Some time later, I think it was the latter part of June, 1925, he appeared at my bedside again, dressed as I had often seen him dressed in life, wearing a black overcoat which I knew to be his own coat. This time my father's spirit spoke to me. He took hold of his overcoat this way and pulled it back and said, "You will find my will in my overcoat pocket," and then disappeared.

¶ Next morning I arose fully convinced that father's spirit had visited me for the purpose of explaining some mistake. I went to mother's and sought for the overcoat but found that it was gone. Mother stated that she had given the overcoat to my brother John who lives in Yadkin Country about 20 miles northwest of my home. I think it was on the 6th of July, which was on Monday following the events stated in the last paragraph, I went to my brother's home in Yadkin County and found the coat. On examination of the inside pocket I found that the lining had been sewed together. I immediately cut the stitches and found a little roll of paper tied with a string which was in my father's handwriting and contained only the following words: "Read the 27th chapter of Genesis in my daddie's old Bible."

¶ At this point I was so convinced that the mystery was to be cleared up I was unwilling to go to mother's home to examine the old Bible without the presence of a witness, and I induced a neighbour, Mr. Thos. Blackwelder, to accompany me, also my daughter and Mr. Blackwelder's daughter were present. Arriving at mother's home we had a considerable search before we found the old Bible. At last we did find it in the top bureau drawer in an upstairs room. The book was so dilapidated that when we took it out it fell into three pieces. Mr. Blackwelder picked up the portion containing the Book of Genesis and turned the leaves until he came to the 27th chapter of Genesis, and there found two leaves folded together, the left hand page folded to the right and the right hand page folded to the left, forming a pocket, and in this pocket Mr. Blackwelder found the will"—an informally worded document dated 16th Jan., 1919—which ran as follows: "After reading the 27th chapter of Genesis, I, James L. Chaffin, do make my last will and testament, and here it is. I want, after giving my body a decent burial, my little property to be equally divided between my four children, if they are living at my death, both personal and real estate divided equal, if not living, give share to their children. And if she is living, you all must take care of your mammy. Now this is my last will and testament. Witness my hand and seal. James L. Chaffin, this January 16, 1919." This second will, though unattested, would, according to the law of North Carolina, be valid as being written throughout by the Testator's own hand on sufficient evidence being adduced that it was in fact in his handwriting. [The 27th chapter of Genesis tells how the younger brother Jacob supplanted the elder brother Esau, who won his birthright and his father's blessing. The sole beneficiary under the first will was, it will be remembered, a younger brother.] The Testator never before his death, so far as can be ascertained, mentioned the existence of this second will to anyone. . . . Soon after its discovery this document was tendered for Probate as the Testator's real will. The case came for hearing in Dec., 1925. A jury was sworn, the hearing began, and the court then adjourned for lunch. When the hearing was continued, one of the lawyers announced that during the interval an amicable adjustment of the issues had been arrived at and that the new will would be admitted to probate without opposition. The following is taken from an official copy of the minute of the Judge presiding: "Judgement by consent. In Re Will of J. L. Chaffin Decd. North Carolina, Davie County. In Superior Court, Dec. term 1925. Judgement Decree: This cause coming on to be heard, and being heard, and the following issues having been submitted to the Jury "Is the paper writing dated Jan. 16th, 1919, and every part thereof the last Will and Testament of the deceased, Jas. L. Chaffin? Answer: Yes. And the Jury having answered said issue Yes, it is now (on motion of E. H. Morris, A. H. Price, & J. C. Busby, attorneys for the plaintiffs) ordered, Decreed, and Adjusted that the said last Will and Testament of James L. Chaffin deceased be recorded in the office of the clerk of the Superior Court of Davie County in the Book of Wills, and that the will dated Nov. 16, 1905, and probated on Sept. the 24th 1921 Will Book no. 2, page 579, purporting to be the last Will and Testament of the decd. James L. Chaffin is hereby cancelled, rescinded, annulled, and made void.”

¶ When the trial commenced Marshall the original heir had died, but Marshall’s widow and son were prepared to contest the 2nd will. However, during the luncheon interval they were shown the second will. Ten witnesses were prepared to give evidence that the second will was in the Testator’s handwriting, and the widow and son themselves seem to have admitted this as soon as they saw it. At any rate they at once withdrew their opposition.

¶ Mr. James Pinkney Chaffin’s statement concludes as follows: “During the month of Dec. 1925 my father again appeared to me, about a week before the trial of the case of Chaffin vs. Chaffin, and said, ‘Where is my old will?’ and showed considerable temper. I believed from this that I would win the lawsuit, as I did. I told my lawyer about this visitation the next morning. Many of my friends do not believe it is possible for the living to hold communication with the dead, but I am convinced that my father actually appeared to me on these several occasions and I shall believe it to the day of my death.”

One of the operations today was to remove a tattoo. I had to get the patient, and was surprised to find that the tattooed creature was a woman. The tattoo was on her shoulder, and spelled out her name. She told me that her brother had inflicted it on her when she was 8 years old, using a penknife and ink. She had a most pleasant manner, assuring me that it was I who brought her up for an appendectomy the week before, although really I couldn’t remember her at all. She had the most magnificently clear blue eyes, and was obviously of a rather low mentality. Altogether a most charming creature.

A colored man came visiting the orderlies' room, as a relief in the vigil he had been keeping for the prospective birth of a grandson, as yet, at that hour, undelivered. He had worked as an orderly at General for some time, also spending 8 hours at Sears. Now he continues the two-job program, but he is better paid as a bus mechanic, and thus can get away with 4 hours orderly work in addition, at the Genesee Hospital. He looked incredibly young to be a grandfather, but I remembered that it is often quite impossible to guess a colored person's age from his appearance. Their skin doesn't seem to wrinkle up like ours. But Richard told me afterwards that he was 36. His pregnant daughter was 18, and she was born when her father was 18. He, by the way, has had 6 other children, and for all I know, may still be going strong. If each of the six promises to marry and proliferate as early as their seventh sibling, pretty soon this proud parent shall have gathered around him a brood of perhaps 36 grandchildren—all on $1.05 an hour at Genesee! More power to orderlies!

Kafka's story "In the Penal Colony" practically turned my stomach as I read it. And yet I wanted very much for the "apparatus" to be used. An article in the Times book review last Sunday, commenting on the fact that Benj. Britten is a pacifist, goes on to comment that pacifist tendencies often hide deeply hidden and repressed sadomasochistic desires. No doubt! But everyone has them. This article also spoke of "the resexualization of music." Incredible!

Off to Niagara Falls with mom and dad. Dad characterized the good surgeon as unreflective: he must have absolute confidence in the accuracy of his diagnosis and in his skill and general infallibility. He must believe himself a prima donna, and never neglect his role. A hesitating, questioning, self-searching person will not make a very good surgeon.

From Rufus Jones, in Fosdick's anthology, "Rufus Jones speaks to our time":

¶ There is one approach to an infinite realm where God might be. There is one door that opens into a holy of holies. The true path is through personality. The search must begin in our own bosom: Who am I? What do I live by? What does personality involve? How am I related to my fellows and to nature? What does my sense of worth imply? What do I mean by goodness? Can I draw any finite circle about "myself"? Do I have any dealing with "a Beyond"? These are questions that take us into regions where microscope and telescope do not avail, but the full answer to them would bring us to that which is.

¶ We need to learn how to think of God as a resident presence cooperating vitally with us and in us here and now as an Emmanuel God, and at the same time we need just as urgently to see how our human lives can and do open out into a Beyond within ourselves. Almost every person who has attained to a mature spiritual life has had experiences that convinced him, at least in high moments, that he was more than himself. Help comes from somewhere and enables us to do what we had always thought could not be done. We find somewhere power to stand the universe when its waterspouts are let loose and even when they have gone over us. We discover strength from beyond our own stock of resources in the midst of our crises.

¶ Correspondence with environment is life's main miracle. There is a fit of inner and outer, like that of hand and glove.

¶ I am not interested in any of the ways of building Babel-towers in the hope of reaching up to God, whether the towers are of brick and mortar, or whether they are of logic or of layers of Scripture texts, or of blocks from ancient creeds, or of sequences from causal proofs. All those man-built towers presuppose a remote and hidden God. The seeker, the tower-builder, on that supposition, must painfully rear his structure from below up by sheer human effort, with no sign of help, no evidence of cooperation from above. That kind of God could never be found, and such a quest would always end in confusion both of heart and of tongues.

¶ "Grace" is no hollow word of the theologians. It is not something manifested solely in a rare sacrament, or grudgingly dispensed by ordained men. It is a cosmic largess. We have been recipients all the way up from the cradle. Presentations have poured in on us from all the lovers and sufferers of the ages back to the beginning of smiles and tears. We have had the most priceless gifts bestowed for nothing at all. Love was here ahead of us with outstretched arms when we arrived and we came by birth into the richest of dowries. Every region we range over with our eyes is crammed with beauty unpaid for. Heroes and martyrs have been brave and faithful for our sake. The blood-red line of sacrifice, which has colored all the centuries behind us, comes with its redemptive power straight to our doors.

¶ Man is from the start a finite-infinite being and not a “mere” finite one. Partaking, as he does, of Reason he cannot stop his quest and pursuit of truth at any finite point, for finite truth is a contradiction of terms. If a thing is true at all it is infinitely true, though these terms “finite” and “infinite” have genuine application only in the realm of space and mathematics. They do not correspond to spiritual realities nor do they tally with the dominant issues that attach to the realm of Spirit. A wiser term for what is meant by “finite-infinite” is transcendence in immanence. “Transcendence in immanence” appears wherever self-consciousness appears. Every aspect of our deeper life is embedded in more life than we are aware of. Every thought we think is a fragmentary aspect of a personal life and purpose that sweeps beyond it. It is what it is because of its place in the total life-system that over-spans it with wider scope. Descartes was right when he insisted that we are conscious of finiteness only because we forever contrast it with an infinite that underlies all our thinking.

¶ One can as easily catch up with the horse he is driving from the buggy-seat as one can overtake the flying goal of his moral passion. To be a moral person at all is to be self-transcendent, which means “finite-infinite.” No one can appreciate music who does not rise above the seriatim notes and enjoy them together in a time-transcending now, which is a gentle breaking in of eternity into our time-world.

¶ His life, his spirit, his personality, is incomparably greater than anything he said, or did, or taught. One is always aware that there is more where his words “come from.” He is there all the time above and beyond his utterances. It was a remarkable stroke of insight that led St. John to declare that he was the truth. Truth as it is used here is not a logical judgment, or a spoken message, or a transmitted idea; it is something that a person can be. It is a life that corresponds with an ideal, a pattern, an architectural plan. A person has come at last who can be the way, the truth, and the life.

More from Rufus Jones:

¶ The Greeks always held that sin was “missing the mark”—that is what the Greek word for sin means: failure to arrive at, to reach, the real end toward which life aims. Sin is defeat. It is loss of the trail. It is undoing. The sinner has not found himself, he has not come to himself. He has missed the real me. He cannot say, “I am.”

¶ Our rule of life would be something like the following: to act everywhere and always as though we knew that we are members of a spiritual community, each one possessed of infinite worth, of irreducible uniqueness, and indispensable to the spiritual unity of the whole—a community that is being continually enlarged by the faith and action of those who now compose it, and so in some measure being formed by our human effort to achieve a divine ideal.

¶ One of Phillips Brooks’ favorite texts was: “The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord.” . . . It means that there is something in man’s inmost being that can be kindled and struck into flame by God and as we feed the flame with our lives we can become revealing places for God, a flame of God’s life. . . . This puts the basis of religion at the center of man’s life where it belongs. Religion . . . is not an addendum to life, not something added on by a remedial scheme to a spiritually barren and bankrupt being. . . . The task of religion is not like that of laboriously endeavoring to teach an elephant to fly; it is rather the discovery of the potential capacities for flight in a being that was framed for the upper air.

¶ Aristotle said that the true nature of any being is what it can become. The true humanism must, on the same count, be real not in terms of origins or beginnings, but rather in terms of possibility and goal.

¶ If we saw Christ vividly and truly we should all believe in God. You cannot get love revealed in the abstract.

¶ Christ is as truly a revelation of man as he is of God.

Gem of the week: Jack Murray, complaining about the noise in the downstairs apartment: It's so distracting when I want to watch television."

I stayed late at the hospital to watch a craniotomy. Young girl, age 26, five months pregnant, suddenly taken with severe headache and paralysis of left side of face. The surgeon first cuts a circular flap of skin, leaving it attached like a flap at one point. Then he drills holes through the skull and saws from hole to hole. Then cuts the dura and exposes the brain. This girl had a tremendous blood clot, which he found and removed. He said she would not recover.

Marie: shrewish, wants job and plots to expose Jean. Jean: solicits outside P.O. for stamp sales. On her own or because of frame-up by Marie? Jean loses job, finds out why. She should expose Marie but, after all, the soliciting was illegal. Marie sneaky, yet she does need the job more because being a widow.

When Jean Barton suddenly found herself out of a job as town postmistress, naturally she wondered why. The postal inspector had come to Ironville unexpectedly that morning. He told Jean that dishonesty and government employ don't mix. "You can finish out the week," he said, "and draw your check. Your resignation will then take effect." "My resignation?" Jean asked in amazement. The postal inspector had already opened the door to leave. He hated scenes and had hoped to escape, but now he turned and repeated, "Yes, that's right, your resignation.

Effective at the end of this week.” Scene between the official and Jean is interrupted by people coming in for their mail. Flashback: Jean soliciting at hotel. Sees Marie’s daughter there (acting as nursemaid). Inspector leaves and Jean knows the offense but not who snitched. How to find out? Marie comes in, obviously gloating that she’s got the job. Jean connects up the encounter with Marie’s daughter. She debates whether or not to flare up against Marie, begins to, but changes her mind because the soliciting was illegal. Possibly: show the same situation from two points of view, Jean’s and Marie’s, then have them meet. Let the reader do the moralizing. Create a dialectic and then slyly withdraw. Show Marie’s daughter returning home and telling her mother. Then trace Marie’s thoughts and rationalization for snitching. Another flashback. Create dramatic contrast of Jean’s agitated state with the pout she must put on when people come in for mail. A kind of comic relief.

I—Jean and inspector. Learns that soliciting was discovered. Flashback at hotel. Meets young Marie. Inspector leaves.

II—Young Marie tells her mother. Second flashback: Marie’s thoughts and plot. Informs inspector and gets the job herself.

III—Jean and Marie in post office. How does Jean act?

Of all the ills that human hearts endure
How few that kings or laws can cause or cure.

—Dr. Johnson

From D. W. Brogan, The Price of Revolution:

¶ It is easy to forget now what an astonishing and outrageous innovation conscription was in Britain (in 1914), how it shocked people who were not at all pacifist in doctrine and who were angered that anybody, whether he had conscientious objections or not, should be forced to fight. [Now conscription is taken for granted and accepted as though it always existed.]

¶ And it was found, too, . . . that after a time the average man gets bored with politics, with disorder, with the claims on his time and energy that a revolutionary situation makes. The party zealots do not realize this, for they are men for whom the programme or their own accession to power is the main business of life; but revolutionary rulers do realize it and, whether they are Hitler or Stalin, must keep up an artificial pressure to justify their demands on obedience and sacrifice, or provide diversions, strength through joy, rest, and culture, or do both at the same time.

¶ The revolutionary land reforms in Mexico were not necessarily the best way of providing for the management of the land or the increase of production, but they were a condition of anything like the making of a Mexican nation and the independence of that nation from its near and very formidable neighbour. The same dilemma has faced governments all over the world since then and, more and more, the work of revolution has been to create not independent self-sufficient, politically unmanageable present proprietors, but impotent servants of the new hacendado, the state.

¶ The methods of all revolutions leave a debit entry that must be paid. The Mexicans, in their zeal to get rid of foreign control, also got rid of a great deal of technical help that they needed. The Turks, by expelling the Greeks from Ionia as earlier by massacring the Armenians, lost the services of more modern-minded people than themselves. The Japanese who made their Revolution copied the West only too well. The new bourgeoisie in Japan, like the new bourgeoisie in Germany, had to do a deal with the military classes and the Choshu and Satsuma clans, with their control of the army and navy, were able to secure that the possibly more efficacious though less brilliant way of solving Japan's problems, by becoming a nation of shopkeepers, was not given a fair trial. . . . Japan, alone among the 'backward' countries on whom the western revolutionary impact fell, preserved her full autonomous power of action, made her own adjustments to the necessities of the case and became, in turn, the bearer of western ideas and techniques, mostly but not all military, to her Asiatic neighbours. The final result in our age has not been a matter of rejoicing for either Japan or her neighbours, but few countries in this racked world have had much to boast of in the way of political wisdom in the past and present generation and Japan merely adapted in her own way the fashions of the modern world of technology and war. . . . All political remedies have their price; violent remedies a necessarily high price. We have seen it paid by Russia, China, Japan, Germany, Mexico, Turkey.

A lovely birthday. But Dad called from New York. Work at the hospital was particularly hard.

Jeanne becomes increasingly obsessed with guilt feelings. Scene with husband. Decides to visit Marie, “the poor widow in need of work.” Marie expects Jeanne to scorn her. When Jeanne does not, the surprise brings out Marie’s guilt feelings. She balks and begins to feel sorry for Jeanne. How to end all this? Jeanne gets false notion of who exposed her (change hotel scene). Miserable herself, she feels assuagement by knowing that Marie will benefit: makes offer to Marie. Marie callous at first, proud and disdainful of help. But softens. It comes out that Marie was the informer. Jeanne is furious at having been duped. Jeanne’s anger brings back Marie’s. And the two end in a furor. Marie never does inform; her conscience stops her. Someone else does, but Jeanne is sure it was Marie. Marie seeks the job, and this increases Jeanne’s suspicions. Too complicated! Jeanne suspects Marie, but her husband is so mortified at Jeanne’s dismissal that he convinces her that she has done a terrible thing, and that she must go to Marie and “offer” Marie the job.

More from Brogan:

¶ That the depressing results of ‘progress’ are not simply the results of political imperialism, the case of China makes evident—for there, before the late war, absentee landlordism was on the increase; . . . and the independent Nationalist government did less to protect the peasants, . . . less to deal with the problems of rural credit, than was being done, belatedly, by imperialist governments in Burma, Java, and Indo-China. “This development naturally proceeds most rapidly in the neighbourhood of great cities, in districts where the static conditions of rural life are broken up by the expansion of commerce and industry, and in regions like part of Manchuria, which have recently been settled by an immigrant population. The symptoms accompanying it are land speculation, and the intrusion between landlord and tenant of a class of middlemen. In Kwanrtung, it is stated, it is increasingly the practice for large blocks of land to be rented by the well-to-do merchants . . . and then to be sub-let piecemeal at a rack rent to peasant farmers. . . . Nor must it be forgotten that the landlord often has a double hold on the tenant, since the former is frequently the money-lender to whom the latter is in debt. . . . No reference to Communist propaganda is required to explain the no-rent campaigns and peasants’ revolts which have taken place in parts of the country. It is surprising, indeed, that they have not been more frequent.” (R. H. Tawney, Land and Labour in China, pp. 68–9, published in 1932.)

¶ One reason is common to all ancient institutions or professions with long traditions. Change is unpleasant and the people who want change can be charged, sometimes with justice, of undervaluing important parts of the traditions of the institution. Modernists are as unpopular in Communist circles as in Catholic and both groups of the formally conservative faithful can point to horrible examples of what happens to such tampers with sacred texts. . . . Sometimes they are right; sometimes the situation to which the innovators wish the institution to adjust itself is temporary and sometimes the adjustment means an abandonment of the essential spirit of the institution and of its basic principles.

¶ See also pp. 220–241, for critique of American policy.

Jeanne decides to ease her conscience by doing everything she can to insure that Marie gets the job. Marie plays along and seems grateful, until she is formally invested in the office in Jeanne’s presence. Then she tells Jeanne who snitched.

From Sean O’Casey’s autobiography, vol. 5, Rose and Crown:

¶ . . . streams of men, women, and children, dropping from the train that had just stopped, pouring along under the grimy roof like an underground river towards an open sluice-gate, to divide into rivulets and trickles, spreading fanwise to different parts of the mammoth city.

¶ . . . age was but crossing the crest of the hill to go down the other side of life, where new flowers grew, and charm abounded as rich and delightful as those loved and handled on the younger slope left behind.

¶ Then the young man departed, carrying himself nicely, within a top-coat cleverly caught in at the waist, and flowing from the waist around the slender legs; walking along the rumbling, rancorous street as if he were sauntering down a gilt-edged garden path. Then Sean said, Jasus! And thought, what a world without there is for this lad, but he stays at home!

¶ And no folk-art is there but is born in the gay disregard of gain, and in the desire to add a newer beauty and a steadier charm to God’s well-turned-out gifts to man; and so, out of the big love in his heart for all things comely and of good shape, the great poet Yeats explains: “Folk-art is indeed the oldest of the aristocracies of thought, and because it refuses what is passing and trivial, and merely clever and pretty, as certainly as the vulgar and insincere, and because it has gathered into itself the simplest and most unforgettable thoughts of the generations, it is the soil where all art is rooted. Wherever it is spoken by the first side, or sung by the roadside, or carved upon the lintel, appreciation of the arts that a single mind gives unity and design to, spreads quickly when its hour is come.” Yeats, a vic, you never spoke a truer word.

¶ “All exploitation of the life of the wealthy, for the eye and ear of the poor and half poor, in plays, in musical comedy, at the cinema, in Daily Mirror photographs, is a travesty of the life of the rich; and if it were not would all but justify some red terror; and it impoverishes and vulgarizes the imagination, showing a life that is all display and hurry, passion without emotion, emotion without intellect, and where there is nothing stern and solitary.” (Yeats)

¶ . . . a prentice understanding of events.

¶ “As down the life the wretched gyant tumbled;
His battred ballaunces in peeces lay,
His timbered bones all broken rudely rumbled,
So was the high aspiring with huge ruine humbled.”

¶ London was Carson’s damasked mistress, jeweled delightedly; full of wealth, portly with good fare, and free with gifts to those who kissed her cunningly; Belfast his wife, a puritan maid, trim; jading prayer trickling from her lips rather than the ripple of a song; afraid of charm; idealizing those who go grim for God; offering fine linen indeed, but bearing no purple to go with it; and dealing even the linen out with wary eye and sparing hand. And for London’s lure, Carson, instead of putting fight into Ulstermen, took all the fight out of them. In mass formation, bunched together, they could be hilariously brave, but not so confident or sure when scanty numbers were calmly coerced into melodious deportment by a contagious roman catholic crowd.

¶ Jesus, how these Christians love one another! Jesus said Love one another. We heard you. We do our best. Here, lads, bring them up to him so’s he can have a good look; bring up the head split open, the bleeding eye, the bruised arm, the broken jaw, the limping leg, and let Jesus have a good look. All in the day's work, sirree, and we'll do better one day. All in fair fight and no favour. Knock them out and do them in's the slogan of apostolic love. Line them up so's they can be seen proper. Papist bastards on your left, sir; protestant gents on your right. Their own mothers wouldn't know them well. A sight to be seen. We offer the work done, sir, as a token of our esteem. Whoever did it to the fellow with half his face gone deserves a noble prize. Altogether, lads, now in harmony:

Faith of our fathers, we will love
 Both friends and foe in all our strife;
 And preach thee, too, as love knows how,
 In kindly words and virtuous life!

And so do we. The hymn shows it. Father Faber's mouldering fable. Speak your mind. Jesus did, and was crucified. He speaks it still, and still is crucified.

¶ It is hard to believe that either Churchill or Atlee would bend away from their business even long enough to listen to a Northumbrian playing "the Bonny Tyneside," or listen to one singing for the ferryman to come and bring him to his sweetheart over the rough waters of the river. They're too big for that diversion. With them it is always over the sea to Paris, over the sea to Amsterdam, but never over the sea to Skye. And yet it is these singers and pipers, allied with the dockers of the quay-sides, the men and women of the farms, the workers in the big and lesser cities, who made England in the past, and will remake England in the future. The General Strike showed this, for it struck England like lightnings from the hands of Zeus. England within a few hours became a waste land.

¶ Churchill, too, was lavishly concerned with himself. He, too, had his own tormenting vanity, a belief in a Cassandrian power of prophecy that no-one paused to listen to. He carried it about with him like a hump on a camel's back.

¶ "We are afraid of sadness, [Yeats] murmured; we have it in life, but we fear it in the theatre. You mustn't be afraid of it, O'Casey." "I'm not, if it tinges, or even startles, life, like a discordant note in a lovely symphony. I'm not when it has nobility. But when it comes brazen through hunger, disease, or wretchedness, then I hate it; then I fight against it, for through that suffering there can be no purification. It is villainous, and must be destroyed."

¶ Man is busy now with a new exorcism: the expulsion of disease from man and animal and plant, defending the holy tissue of the flesh from pollution of virus and of bug; the exorcism of fear from man's way of life that he may stand up and speak out and laugh loud. Exorcism that calls for no candle, no bell, book, cassock or stole; a church where the altar is a table, the god a microscope; the ritual a bold imagination, a peering eye, a ceaseless searching mind; so that health may be sanctity, energy prayer, and the achievements of men and the play of children most acceptable praises to God. To get rid of all that weakened or brought rot to the body; to sanction pain no more; to coffin nothing but what had lived a life to the full, a life that had no disappointed breath for a sigh at the leaving; a life that sank down, pleasantly tired, into the rest-rewarding earth. To give to the commonwealth of man the strong heart, the clear mind, the keen ear, the enduring lung, the bright eye, the stout limb, and the cunning hand—oh, Jesus, wouldn't these things be grand for man to have! Oh, Jesus, wouldn't there be achievements measuring as holy with, and higher than, Salisbury's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey!

¶ Here they were out to bring the boy up in the way he should go. Which way was that, now? The catholic way, Genevan way, Mahomedan way, or the Buddhist way? These were but a few of the hundred ways carved out under the feet of every stepper-in to life. Eileen chose the catholic way; a way as good or as bad as any of the others. Sean hoped that when the boy grew up he'd take and make his own way. The right way to Sean was the desire to see life, to hear life, to feel life, and to use life; to engender in oneself the insistent and unbreakable patience to remove any obstacle life chanced to place in its own way. The way of the world; the way of all flesh: no one could show Breon the way through these ways; he would have to find a way for himself. Life's way of yesterday wasn't life's way today; and life's way today couldn't be life's way tomorrow; no neither Sean's way nor Eileen's way, or Swann's way could ever be Breon's.

the one key, on the same note, throughout time, in the hope that they might hum the same tune, in the same key, on the same note, throughout eternity.

¶ That night, when Breon lay in a cozy corner of sleep, Eileen told him all that had happened: the nuns had encircled them smiling, beguiling, giving a welcome to mother and child; welcome as the flowers in May; come into the parlour, dears; stormy weather. Oh, sacred charms of childhood, unto Christ so dear; and if you bring a proper fee, there's nothing left to fear. Not a thing. One and twenty welcomes to the little lad. A sturdy little fellow. He would be a charming addition to their school, a nun said. And an interesting one, too, considering his father to be a writer, said another nun. Under God, children are the one surety of God's church continuing, said a third nun, laying a partly-blessing hand on Breon's head. You both must stay for tea, murmured the reverend mother, both stay for tea, murmured a nun behind the nun. Polly put the kettle on, we'll all have tea. Thank God for tea! What could the world do without it? How did it exist without it? Nobody knows.

¶ He had peered at the friar, looking past the habit to the man within, a man to whom all life and history must be explained by a collection of dogmatic decrees, "which," according to Leo the XIII, "impose themselves upon all catholics, and which no man is permitted to call in doubt." Embedded in a decree, like a caterpillar in his cocoon. And the bishops drum their way about, denouncing doom on all who disagree, or venture a doubt.

Fat bucks of bishops in a barrel-roofed room,
 Yell'd out, roar'd out threats of doom—
 Bell, book, and candlelight standing on a table—
 Pounded with their crosiers in a frenzy of fume, Hard as they were able,
 Boom, boom, boom.
 Excommunicamus, if you dare presume,
 Bell, book, and candlelight will bring you what is due,
 Bring you what is due and hoodoo you,
 If you dare presume,
 Doomday doomday doomday doom!

After two thousand years of thought, discussion, supernatural grace, and pious practice, all they can do to save man is to bind him tightly into one chair, and to bind God rigidly into one throne. Here by the fire, in a rust-red habit, with its blue girdle, sat a laddo who believed that he carried authority of life and death wherever his body happened to go; an ordinary mortal, who, because of what was called the laying on of hands, pointed out the way of thought and action to everyone else, as if born to it as he was bred to it; with little knowledge of the way of thought himself, timidly obedient to every convention, every custom, honoured by common brethren, within and without his own community of faith. Sean had met many men in various walks of life who had assumed authority while in actual service—the doctor at the bedside, the scientist in laboratory or lecture hall, the foreman watching the rise or fall of a crane's jib: all these become common men in the give and take, the ebb and flow, of social life; but not the priest: he alone had a crystallized sense of authority that he carried with him everywhere, from the altar into all the odds and ends of social life. Pretend as he would, in casual talk, in quip, in serious conversation, the sense of rigorous, ritualistic authority over all life and all things clung to the priest, so that he could never be at one with the common man.

¶ What is the great crowd seeking, the young, mostly courting couples, prowling so aimlessly, yet so steadily, along the Great White Way? They seek the Muses, though they know it not, for these restive lights are to them a bank whereon the wild thyme blows,

Where oxlips and the nodding violet grows.

They straggle along seeking beauty which is yet a shrinking seed within them. They seek for what they know not, though they feel their need of it, and sometimes sense a twinge of near arrival within this blaze of bastard culture. Roman catholic and protestant mingle and mate with the uncomplaining, muted midgets caught in the glare of the Great White Way, unaware that outside its dazzling destitution, away in the darkness ahead, shine faint, enkindling rays from the stars of art, literature, and science. They have been told and yet they do not know; for the tale came too late, or it was told too low for them to catch the whisper. They have had no help to get away from the fairy tales of infancy, lovely in their day, but turning slyly silly when men reach the age of misunderstanding. But many of the common people are now making for something more than the savage contentment with coloured bead and strip of coloured calico. They ask for something better than these things no higher than flimsy rhyme and fainting fairy tale, without the shrewd jingle of the one or the longing beauty of the other. Even this gaudiness, blaspheming, light, wherein they wander webbed, is an outward sign of inner seeking all they feel they need. The people are beginning to realize the longing for good shaping of things; in the streets they pass through; in the buildings banking the streets they pass through; in table-cloth and crockery ware; in the homes they have to have; in pictures they see, music they hear, the single vessels they handle; in all things whatsoever which mingle man with life: a share in all the greatest the community can imagine, in all the greatest the community can do.

Many are getting rid of the dismal daydream that the good in life is something similar to Christmas in Killarney with all the folks at home. First, they are seeking and fighting to keep taut and even that umbilical cord stringing all men together—the bread line. They have long prayed for their bread, now they fight for it. May Jesus Christ be praised! They are organizing to alter the mad method of life among them and bring it into order as Lycurgus did in Sparta in the old times before them: “Where the State was overloaded with a multitude of indigent and necessitous persons, while the whole wealth of the land had centered upon a few. To the end, therefore, that he might expel from the State luxury and crime, and those yet more inveterate diseases of want and superfluity, he got them to consent to a new division of land, so that they should all live together on an equal footing; merit to be the only road to eminence, and the disgrace of evil, and credit of worthy acts, their one measure of difference between man and man.” There’s a lot in this, my people, a lot in it.

It is the taxi which commands the streets of New York; fleets of them, like gay-plumaged swallow flocks, red, yellow, green, brown, white, and black, ground-birds skimming along the road’s surface as if swiftness were all; a thrust forward tension in each of them, even when they come to rest; a sway upward and forward as the lights suddenly call a halt to the swift going, an agitated purr of an engine delayed; and, as the shadow of green appears in the lights, a slim, sliding spring ahead, and the eager bird is on the swift wing again. It seemed to Sean that the American taxi, in its indolently slim form, is a daughter of the gondola transfigured into the muse of energy while the English taxi, in its stiff box-like stand, is the son of the sedan chair.

¶ It was odd; the father knowing what his son was not, but tolerating the idea of a special worthiness, though in fear that strangers saw through the contradiction, puffed out his own importance, as if to assure himself that his own impressiveness was more than equal to his own importance and his son's defects. The mother seeing the sham in her heart, silvered it over, as the oyster iridescently naces an irritation, with a sham of her own, accepting the myth, and decorating it with gravity and praise. The spearman complacently assuring himself that he had lifted the limited lad into an eminence, deeply despising the lad with a ridiculous glory, and afforded to the parents a chance to take a tormenting interest in a son never to be so clever as his father.

¶ Bring me a grain of mustard seed, said Buddha to an agonized mother who had brought her dead child to him, beseeching him to restore it to life; bring me a grain of mustard seed from any house anywhere in which those who live in it have never suffered sorrow through the death of a loved one; and I shall restore your little one to health and strength. And the woman had searched and searched for many months, but could not get a grain of mustard seed from a house that hadn't suffered through the death of a loved one.

Jesus, Buddha, Mahommed, great as each may be, their highest comfort given to the sorrowful is a cordial introduction to another's woe.

¶ He wasn't one who contented himself with the Salvation Army's method of saying any kind of nonsense that floated into their minds; their building up of a beautiful life, here and hereafter, with a phrase "Out of self into Christ, into Glory. Simple, isn't it?" as he heard a Salvation Army officer say once. Damned simple, right enough. Turning everyone into a quick-change artist. Becoming in the twinkling of an eye guided missiles shooting into heaven. He came across a group of them on a street in Philadelphia. There they were, large as death, ensconced under a huge umbrella, coloured red, yellow, and blue; there they were spouting out their spick and spam way of eternal life. Their glory was vanishing now. Like all the bursts-out of evangelical heat, this one, too, was beginning to cool quick. Just like the energy and enthusiasm of the first friars, black, white, and grey, launching themselves among the poor to save them from the Reformation; whose love of poverty soon lay buried under a gigantic and splendidly built rubble of riches. So, too, the Wesleyan outbursts of all-embracing piety to set aside the lukewarm decline of the Anglicans, fell, itself, into the same dead state; so badly that we can read in “Americana” the wail of a Wesleyan faithful few, keening:

The Church that God through Wesley launched
Two hundred years ago,
Is going now beneath the waves,
Down to eternal woe.

Piety has become a possessing pose. In one of the “Capuchin Annuals” (1942) there’s a grand picture of His Excellency the Most Rev. Paschal Robinson, O.F.M., Apostolic Nuncio to Eirinn, showing him in all his gallant costume of richly made undress cassock, piped and braided, with his lovely chain holding on to his jeweled pectoral cross; a gorgeously dressed cavalier of the Roman Church, and very nice, too. This gent didn’t live in a slum or shack, ate things higher than pulse and beans, refused to sit and work in fireless rooms, and never roamed about in the cold with bare feet blue. None of them do. Not till they are dead. This one, this Excellency, the Papal Nuncio in Eirinn, died a year or so ago, and in his last gasps ordered that when he was dead, he was to be dressed in a coarse garb, his feet bare, and set so as to stick out from under the shroud to show there was no deception. Tramp tramp tramp, the boy is triumphantly marching up to heaven in his bare feet. A grand example to the workers to embrace poverty for the good of their souls. Workers of all lands, don’t bother about wages, don’t bother about thin clothing, broken boots, scanty meals; remember the dead Nuncio in his bare feet. Christ, how many saints would the Ireland Sean knew have given to God, if saintship rested in pinched faces, empty bellies, and bare feet!

From O’Casey’s “I Knock At the Door”:

¶ . . . and locked away in a drawer, forbidden to be touched by anyone save the head of the house, lay a mysterious book which the father said confined the dangerous teaching of a Bishop Berkeley, and, mother added, was all about nothing being real, and that all things we saw were only images of our own ideas, and that such books were only to be read and thought of by minds big enough to understand that they were rubbish.

¶ Locke's "Essay on the Human Understanding" was all balls, said Mick, for the very look of the thing was enough to start you praying to God that the human mind would never become anything like what it was represented to be in the book.

—Note use of refrain, such as in "The Tired Cow."

—Note the magnificent objective passages, especially about the Jewish window-fixer, and Johnny's thrashing at school. Superb writing!

White woman has baby obviously fathered by Negro. Her husband furious and vows to lynch the father. Evidence points to an old Negro servant, who, actually, is innocent. The offender's secret is known by town minister. Husband incites mob against the servant, whom the wife has named rather than admitting her own weakness by naming the real father, a handsome and desirable Negro. The servant gets word of his danger and flees, but the mob gains on him and he ducks into the first house he sees, that of the minister. But the real culprit is also there. The husband angrily demands that the minister release the old servant. The minister, of course, knows the servant is innocent and the other is guilty, and hardly knows what to do under the circumstances. Both Negroes are terrified and plead with him to help them, the servant because he is innocent, the other because he at least deserves a fair trial, especially since the new mother really seduced him rather than vice versa. [Perhaps show this in first part: her dissatisfaction with husband, and use of the handsome Negro in his place.] The minister makes up his mind: he offers himself! This completely upsets the husband's equilibrium. The surprise move has the strange effect of making husband and mob sheepishly withdraw. Must show the motive for the wife's action, as above:—circumstances that cast erroneous suspicion on the servant; some relation between husband and minister wherein husband knows that minister is aware of husband's infidelities; the faith and character of the minister, which bear fruit in his decision.

Dave Lurie drove Alec, Sandy and me to Riparius. Sandy brought along a girlfriend so she wouldn't be the only girl. We picked up the fallen barn siding and stowed it in Carman's barn; swam in the brook; went horseback riding. All fine, except I had hoped to be with Sandy most of the time, and I found that she and Alec are very close, and when he was near to her nothing else seemed to matter. Hard! We had silent meeting on Sunday. I read Gibran's passage on work: "work is love made visible!" Even Lurie was impressed—even skeptical, sarcastic Lurie. I'm writing a story about Sandy, Alec, and me. To write puts things in perspective, objectifies them, and eases the pain. If we can see ourselves as ridiculous puppets in life, then why get too sad over disappointments?

Fine intellectual letter from Burt Pike. He assumes I know German. I'd better go ahead and learn it! Are you making a mess of your life? Or are you saving yourself from dullness and mediocrity? Come back in sixty years and I'll give the answer. . . . Read "How to Achieve Sex Happiness in Marriage." God! A consummation devoutly to be wished. How ignorant I was of the simplest things! How my ignorance and prudishness destroyed the happiness I might have had with Jeanne Dinsmore! I want a son, to right in him all these wrongs.

You've set up the situation, in Part I, of the attraction between Bill Skidmore and Dotty Crain. You've also set up the beginnings of something that could develop from the friendship & loyalty of Dotty and Leila Hendrickson. But forget about Geoffrey and use what you've already got. Keep up the refrain technique, especially toward the end, à la O'Casey. Perhaps an ironical situation can be worked out. Why not map out the rest of the plot in detail before writing further? It's a chore and you hate chores, but if you're going to be a writer you'll have to work instead of wasting your time daydreaming. Aim to do as well as Hardy in "Life's Little Ironies." Remember: style, plot, characterization, rhythm, insight, suspense. Brother!

"LIGHT IN AUGUST, 1945" BY THOMAS COLE

Women look for signs. They would have An outward show of an inward passion: the head

Of John for Salome, the blood of Duncan for Lady Macbeth, Agamemnon dead.

But love,

Which is private when it comes, comes in the light
Of the heart, the stillness of mind. A man may suffer

A woman quietly for fifty years and she Would call it fortitude.

A sign.
As in the year

Of the locust, like a locust it came: thin
As a thistle, bare as a stone: Civilization's mushroom, Having gathered so much loveliness against
The dark. We see only the light, not
The danger in that show of splendor, after
The first gaudy tumult. Blind as Saul
And without his gift for sight, we suffer the loss
And the heat of all that fire.

Broken, an atom's

Light will not last fifty years, will not
Outlast its few brief moments,
It is an outward sign of an inward passion.
Everywhere bright, but bitter as a toad's stool.

Saturday night to Canandaigua—swimming with Sandy, another couple, and John, who had no date. Sandy and John left the group to talk together alone, leaving me to listen to Jim Tyson's idiotic jabber. After a half hour or so I went up to them, rather perturbed, and they walked away together when I got to them. Then when we returned to the house it was the same—Sandy and John—and I out of the picture. I went upstairs, wondering perhaps if she would miss me and at least inquire what had happened. I lay in bed from 2 a.m. until 4:30, and no word from downstairs, I all the while burning up inside and not knowing what to do, whether to forget about them and stay up, or to go down, and then what? I went down, suggested rather gruffly to Sandy that it was time she went home, and sat silent next to her while John drove us. As we were saying good night I told her how despicably I thought she had acted. This took her by surprise as, really, she hadn't done anything intentionally or maliciously. She just hadn't thought. Well, I was in a rather ludicrous position myself, being "infantile," as she put it. And I soon found myself on the defensive. All in all, Sandy is not the best one for catering to other people's wishes. She lives for herself, and there is some truth in Marion White's comment that Sandy "uses" other people. . . . We're all on good terms again, I think. The really infantile behavior would have been had I continued the grudge after the first eruption. But I am really not that infantile emotionally.

Marion White called Sunday, said she was bored, and wouldn't I come over. We bought some eggs and cooked up a nice meal in her apartment, a one-room affair on the third floor of a rooming house. The first thing that strikes you upon entering is a very amateurish pencil sketch on lined notebook paper, of a nude man with a great big penis, presumably Marion's husband, one Helmut. Helmut, it seems, is underage, and is under the impregnable custody of his father in Buffalo while annulment is being arranged. So he is out of the picture. Marion is nice, pretty, fair-skinned, and somewhat intelligent. But she obviously has her troubles, and drowns them in drink. We talk very well together—no effort, no silences. She filled us both with two double-strength Tom Collinses, then gulped a little straight whiskey herself. I was expecting great things. Then she lay down on the soft double bed and held the electric fan near her face so that it blew her long red hair. I lay beside her, getting closer and closer and finally putting my arm around her. At this she gave me a peculiar look but then said nothing and apparently didn't mind. But it didn't go any further. She suddenly decided that she had to fetch her bicycle at Strong and then visit someone. "I'm a funny woman," she said. "I like one man at a time." I asked her if she was angry with me, and she said No, not at all, but that she hadn't developed a "passionate interest" in me, "yet." Encouraging! We left on the best of terms and she said she'd contact me again soon. I can't call her because the boarding house phone is usually answered by the old Victorian couple who own the place and who think it scandalous that Marian, a married woman, should entertain any men at all. In fact, as I went down the stairs I was chastised by the venerable lady of the house. "You ought to be ashamed of yourself," she said. "Don't you know she's married!" Delicious. We shall see what comes of this little affair.

Work camp progressing. Next Friday is it.

Margot now working for Look Magazine, answering letters to the editor.

I have been doing the chest and shoulder exercises more or less regularly, and many people have commented on my muscles. This is something I should have done long ago, but it's not too late now. Muscles develop with practically no effort—15 or 20 minutes a day.

Advised a C.O. faced with hearings, etc. Matt Herron, graduate of Princeton, Prospect Club, and friend of Weasel's. Nice fellow. Very solid.

I am speaking a little German now with Mrs. Sartz. It is an extremely easy language—so far—(the 15th lesson in Hugo).

Harriet Crain liked my postmistress story but said the other two (the horse in the mud-hole, and McDonald & Tennyson) didn't come off. This is encouraging since the postmistress was done last and thus should be the best.

September 1, 1953

My affair with Marion seems to be ended now, suddenly; and it is just as well. After having spent the weekend with her and her family at Chautauqua, and then helping her move to her new apartment, I returned home for supper. All day she had been most affectionate, and she was distressed at my having to leave at 6:00. I promised to try to have Vic take us all swimming later, in the night. Vic agreed, and we drove over at about 10:00. Marion's face was pale and she showed distress and shame acutely. She announced to me that Helmut had paid her a furtive visit earlier (I'm glad I left early enough to miss him). She had to tell him that she had been unfaithful; and he, playing the role of the jealous husband (in absentia), commanded her to have no communications whatsoever with any man. So there remains a state of double communication-less-ness. She and Helmut are forbidden to see each other or even correspond, until Helmut turns 21; and she, by Helmut, is forbidden to entertain other men, as she has been doing flourishingly in the past. This manlessness will no doubt break her completely; already last night she was fairly unstable and melodramatic, refusing to talk to me (although, she said, she was terribly sorry it had to be that way, but she had to do what she was doing) then, when she discovered me trying to sleep on the couch downstairs, since Vic had driven off with sister Beth, walking outside and pacing the sidewalk for an hour or so, until they came back. For all I knew, she had gone to jump in the river, placed conveniently on the next block, but it hasn't come to that, yet. When she first announced the new state of things, and retired upstairs, I didn't know quite how to act. Fortunately, I had never developed the slightest attachment to her (except physical), so the news had no emotional effect on me at all; except perhaps that it meant the cancellation of an evening's plans that included swimming in the nude at Mendon Pond, and then spending an hour or two on the beach. She went upstairs and I read for a while and then decided that I might just as well try to sleep. Besides the fact that I wanted to do this very much, it meant that I would have to go upstairs to ask for a sheet, as it was about 90 degrees Fahrenheit and I had no intention of sleeping with my clothes on. This gave me an excuse to see if she would communicate further; but she wouldn't, except for a few tear-muffled implorations to the general effect, once more, that she "couldn't," she "couldn't" see me or talk to me. I was a bit tempted to create a scene, to grab her, force her down on the bed, and make her talk it all out, or worse; but, my better half instructed that although her troubles were entirely of her own making and were doomed to come on more or less irrevocably, still there was no need to complicate matters, especially since any scene on my part would have been pure acting and would not have proceeded from a hurt or disappointment. So I merely took the sheet and made myself comfortable on the living-room daybed. Marion pattered around upstairs a while longer and then came down and, without saying anything to me, went outside, where she remained for at least two hours, simply pacing up and down along the sidewalk. When Vic came back with Beth, Marion came back in, and Vic and I left.

The two White sisters, Beth and Marion, present a beautiful picture of frustration, dissipated energy, failure, and in general disabling neuroticism. Vic, the psychologist, confirms this unreservedly. Marion doesn't know what she wants, and drowns her sorrow in liquor, self-pity, and sex. Even the prospect of marital bliss with Helmut does not seem completely to please her. She thought, when I first met her, that Helmut's father was having the marriage annulled. During this past weekend, however, she informed me that Helmut's father had written her that all communication must cease between les mariés until Helmut becomes of age. This implies, of course, that once Helmut reaches 21, his father will allow him to make up his own mind; and that, as things now stand, the marriage will be resumed. (Actually, Beth doubts very much that there was any legal marriage at all—at most, a common-law marriage [and a still-born baby].) I said to Marion, when she told me, "This must make you very happy.” She didn’t look the least bit happy herself, and told me, with a frown across her brow, “I’m not too sure it does.”

Beth’s situation is much the same—if anything, worse, because she is much more intelligent and thus her lack of achievement must be measured up against much higher potentialities than those of her sister. Quite aside from a broken marriage, and a son for whom she obviously cares very little, she has pursued her marked musical talents only sporadically, taking singing lessons now and then, and merely sight-reading in a most superficial manner at the piano, instead of really working to improve her technique and interpretation. Marion says that she cannot maintain interest in any type of work long enough to stay steadily on a job, or, apparently, to select one of her talents and attempt to make a career out of it. She also tried nursing school, but was asked to leave after 14 months, presumably because she was “too straitlaced” (which is ironic, because if anything she’s a libertine)—which meant, I think, that although she got brilliant grades in her nursing studies, she didn’t know how to approach people on a spontaneous, unsophisticated level, and was thus quite unsuited for nursing. Bravo to the Buffalo Nursing School for its perspicacity!

So, she is now 32 and rather lost. She spent last year at Chautauqua, knitting sweaters, and sight-reading at the piano. She didn’t even take advantage of the many music courses at Chautauqua during the summer months. Davie, her son, she ignores completely and ruthlessly. Luckily for all, the grandmother, old Mrs. White, seems to enjoy caring for the boy. Beth is very quick to display her talents or to list her A’s and A+’s at nursing school; and she is very quick to leap into a man’s arms with an almost maniacal ferocity. The man is Vic, not I, of course, since I was occupied with her sister. But even so, when I was sleeping at their apartment, she embraced and kissed me as a means of waking me up. Unfortunately, she is extremely plain, querulous, and has a stridently loud voice. If she looked better, she could surely make a grand success as a night-club singer or even as a strip-tease artist. Better this than her present state.

I had a glorious two-week vacation at Riparius, made complete in every way by good weather, lots of work accomplished, and much socializing—the last not ordinarily a part of my Riparius stays. Dad finally got to the farm, as he and mother met me at Albany, drove up, visited for a while, and then went to the Point of Pines to spend the week, leaving me the car. The only unpleasant incident occurred when I went there for a $4.00 dinner one evening and, according to Dad, acted very high and mighty towards the people to whom I was introduced, refusing even to look at them. Dad wasn't acute enough to realize that this "coldness" proceeded not from a disdain for the people I was meeting, but rather from the very simple fact that my face was all irritated and red and sore from shaving and showering, so that I simply looked like hell and acted ostrich-like in hiding my head in the sand. On the more pleasant side, I built a good deal of my fireplace, and did, I think, a good job. On the outside I built up the footing, then laid the hearth of firebrick, which I put on so unevenly that it looks like a genuine seventeenth-century antique hearth, and thus is very becoming; on the inside I got as far as the arch, which I didn't complete for lack of the proper-sized arch support.

As always, I enjoyed the Carmans; but this visit I also saw a good deal more of Carl Sibley, and I met Dr. Barnard and her daughter Ann, and Jerry English, and had dinner at their house. Also met Bruce McGerry, Mrs. Brown's boy. A Haverford freshman, John Hawkins, was Sibley's chargé d'affaires, and we soon became friends, since he is mostly interested in music, is an organist, and a friend of Peter Gardner's. He helped me lay rock one afternoon. Then I went over to George Davis's place and bought the beautiful pump organ there for $20.00. That evening and one other, John and I played it far into the night. Then there was Johnny Kendal, a cute tow-haired, countrified lad from Trenton whose father knew Dr. Barnard and who was spending the summer as a "dude" at the Carmans' ranch. He seemed to enjoy nuzzling up against me like a little kitten, though I don't think this was evidence of homosexuality, just plain affection. He was developing at the same time a wholesome and very open interest in girls. We went horseback riding together up past Dr. Barnard's, where we enjoyed her magnificent panoramic view, and then through the woods to Mr. Kennedy and one of his mistresses. It was always a delightful sight to see Johnny's trim little figure, complete with ten-gallon Texas hat, sitting like an expert to a canter or trot, acting as though he'd been born in the wild West and raised on a horse.

Besides these people, I had the pleasure of seeing Mickey Heyman and wife Terry for an afternoon. He's to begin law school in the fall. Matt Heron also stopped on his way to New England, but I missed him by about five minutes. When he came, volumes of Bach were very conspicuously evident on the organ. Matt left a note saying, "All this and Bach, too! I'm jealous."

"Ode to Jack" (hospital orderly from Tennessee, upon his leaving General Hospital for the Genesee Hospital, where he will begin training as a scrub technician), read at the hospital farewell party:

To err is human,
 But to cast away the paragon of orderlies,
 The moppper supreme, the Immaculate of immaculates;
 To cast away pure gold,
 Is a fault that should not be told.

(Chorus) For he's gone to Genesee,
 Gone to Genesee,
 Oh, he's gone and left us here to slave,
 Gone to Genesee.

Thy mopping, thy technique
 With brush, is unique.
 Thy grip, the best of all, Thy swing a delight to see:
 Its delicate arc and inclusive path;
 Its pressure,
 Regulated to each floor's
 Distinctive need—all combining Oh! Our dear lost chief, to Make thy rooms the Cleanest; thy floors
 To shine as did the face of Venus
 When Paris picked her queen.

(Chorus)
 Oh, who should we now follow,
 Who can our inspiration be?
 For thou art gone, dear Chief,
 Gone to Genesee.

Our hearts, they are grievous,
 The future we cannot see
 Without our dear lost Chief—Who's gone to Genesee.

(Chorus)

But there thou wilt scrub,
 Ay, there's the rub—
 The Genesee will prosper,
 The General pine away, right bub?

(Chorus)

And now back to Cysto, Room Five,
 Or other orderly quarters—
 Back to a future bleak with work,
 Bereft of guidance or example
 In the finer points of mopping
 Of which your knowledge is certainly ample.

(Chorus)

Back to a future of not knowing Where, Why, or How—
 Where we'll exist, not LIVE,
 As we did when our knowledge was growing.

(Chorus)

General, we need not call upon the heavens
 For her curses on your folly;
 Our poor dear chief's absence alone
 Will show that life's no longer jolly.

(Chorus)

Last night Marion was back, affectionate as ever. Didn't take very long. Liz also came over, and spewed forth to me her anger toward Vic for his misunderstanding her, his use, as she said, of "a load of psychological clichés to describe her condition. She complained that she wasn't at all unstable, that circumstances had forced her to give up various pursuits in the past, and that environment permitting she really had the sticking power to see something through to its completion. This I doubt. The very way she forcibly unburdened herself on me (and later in the same way on Cliff) showed her instability. Her voice cracked, tears gathered in her eyes as she justified her actions and reminded us over and over again about her brilliant grades, her brilliant will power, the inevitability of her success, if the world would only permit her to stay at one thing for any length of time. Baloney! Here is one case where the difficulty is nine-tenths internal. Vic is right; she should concentrate now on seeing a psychiatrist.

I remember that when I went to Jean-Louis Barrault's French theater last fall I was impressed with its great emotional effect, on me at least, despite its complete lack of realism. I had seen any number of plays on Broadway, done in the prevalent realistic mode, where plot, scene, and characters were as familiar as everyday life; yet here was Molière with archaic settings, costumes, and characters who were exaggerations of certain types—such as Geronte, whose very name indicates his function. The relief from abject realism was welcome; and the fantastic nature of the French production did not produce the effect that some might have predicted—namely, “Psish, this is just a fairytale, a nonsense anthology, unreal, exaggerated, and has therefore no emotional message for me.”

Now in Susanne Langer's Philosophy In a New Key I find the matter beautifully analyzed and expressed. From the chapter on music:

¶ The actual opposition between the two emotive theories of musical meaning—that of self-expression and that of logical expression—is best summed up by contrasting the passage from C. Ph. E. Bach with Busoni's statement. [Bach]: “Since a musician cannot otherwise move people, but he be moved himself, so he must necessarily be able to induce in himself all those affects which he would arouse in his auditors; he conveys his feelings to them, and thus most readily moves them to sympathetic emotions” (Versuch über die wahre Art, das Klavier zu spielen). Busoni: “just as an artist, if he is to move his audience, must never be moved himself—lest he lose, at that moment, his mastery over the material—so the auditor who wants to get the full operative effect must never regard it as real, if his artistic appreciation is not to be degraded to mere human sympathy” (Entwurf einer neuen Aesthetik der Tonkunst.)

¶ This degradation is what Bullough would call a loss of “psychical distance." It is, in fact, a confusion between a symbol, which lets us conceive its object, and a sign, which causes us to deal with what it means.

¶ Distance . . . is obtained by separating the object and its appeal from one's own self, by putting it out of gear with practical needs and ends. But . . . distance does not imply an impersonal, purely intellectually interested relation. . . . On the contrary, it describes a personal relation, often highly emotionally colored, but of a peculiar character. Its peculiarity lies in that the personal character of the relation has been, so to speak, filtered. It has been cleared of the practical, concrete nature of its appeal. (Bullough, "Psychical Distance," p. 91.)

¶ The content has been "symbolized" for us, and what it invites is not emotional response, but insight. "Psychical Distance" is simply the experience of apprehending through a symbol what was not articulated before. The content of art is always real; the mode of its presentation, whereby it is at once revealed and "distanced," may be a fiction. It may also be music, or, as in the dance, motion. But if the content be the life of feeling, impulse, passion, then the symbols which reveal it will not be the sounds or actions that normally would express this life; not associated signs, but symbolic forms must convey it to our understanding.

Re: Beth—She agrees to play with elderly couple in square-dance band, she on piano, Mr. X on clarinet, Mrs. X on drums, to raise money for some charity. Other women in church groups spread word that she is leading everyone straight to Hell. This is reinforced when a visiting evangelist gives fire and brimstone sermon against evils of dancing (also mixed swimming, playing basketball in shorts, smoking, drinking, etc.). The gossip worries Noel, her husband, and he turns increasingly to drink.

You cannot let an alcoholic know that you think he's an alcoholic, because he already is secretly terribly ashamed of his behavior, and that would make him worse. You have to build up his pride in himself.

Interns come to nurses' graduate ball drunk, and act miserably. Beth tells one of them later that the hospital is like the arm, where you respect the position and not necessarily the man. This, she thinks, insured her dismissal.

Marion wasn't cleared for the Naval Ordinance, and she drowned her sorrows in sex, with me as the willing partner. No intercourse, but everything but. Helmut returns to Rochester next week. What then? He won't live with her.

I played parts of the Bach's B-flat Partita and Mozart's C-minor Fantasia at Eastman and was assigned to Mrs. McKown. I scored "very high" on the Seashore, which surprised me. I had hoped to start night shift and practice in the morning; but all the orderlies are leaving, making me indispensable for the present.

From a letter by Bartók, quoted in Halsey Stevens's biography: "Such anxious searching seems to be incompatible with calm resignation. Yet it is resignation I am striving for, and I have almost become accustomed to the thought that it cannot be otherwise. . . . We must attain to a level from which everything can be viewed with sober calmness, with complete indifference. It is difficult to acquire this faculty but, once attained, it becomes the greatest triumph we can have over circumstances and ourselves. . . . Sometimes I almost feel myself at that height, and then I suddenly fall, to start upward again. This happens over and over. But some day I shall succeed in remaining up there."

From Thomas Mann's Dr. Faustus:

¶ I go with Schleiermacher, who defined religion as "feeling and taste for the infinite" and called it "a pertinent fact," present in the human being. In other words, the science of religion has to do not with philosophical theses, but with an inward and given psychological fact. . . . Surely a religious sense is something other than formally professed religion. Would it not have been better to hand over that "fact" of human feeling for the infinite to the sense of piety, the fine arts, free contemplation, yes, even to exact research, which as cosmology, astronomy, theoretical physics, can serve this feeling with entirely religious devotion to the mystery of creation—instead of singling it out as the science of the spirit and developing on it structures of dogma, whose orthodox believers will then shed blood for a copula.

¶ The scientific superiority of liberal theology is indeed incontestable, but its theological position is weak, for its moralism and humanism lack insight into the daemonic character of human existence. The conservative tradition . . . has a profounder, more significant relation to culture than has progressive bourgeois ideology.

¶ We dealt with the matter of our present mode of existence; and Deutschlin protested that it was poor taste for youth to explain youth: a form of life that discusses and examines itself thereby dissolves as form, and only direct and unconscious being has true existence.

¶ German deeds were always done out of a certain mighty immaturity, and not for nothing are we the people of the Reformation. That too was a work of immaturity. Mature, that was the Florentine citizen of the Renaissance, who before he went to church said to his wife: "Well, let us now make our bow to popular error!" But Luther was unripe enough, enough of the people, of the German people, to bring in the new, the purified faith. Where would the world be if maturity were the last word? We shall in our unripeness vouchsafe it still some renewal, some revolution.

¶ To be young means to be original, to have remained nearer to the sources of life; it means to be able to stand up and shake off the fetters of an outlived civilization, to dare—where others lack the courage—to plunge again into the elemental. Youthful courage, that is the spirit of dying and becoming, the knowledge of death and rebirth.

¶ . . . an intellectual achievement which deserves the name of heroic, something just barely possible, behaving like arrogant travesty. . . . a tense, sustained, neck-breaking game played by art at the edge of impossibility.

¶ Admiration and sadness, admiration and doubt, is that not almost the definition of love?

¶ He lived as a roué of the potentialities. Actuality robs from the potential.

¶ The artist is the brother of the criminal and the madman.

¶ Who knows today, who even knew in classical times, what inspiration is, what genuine, old, primeval enthusiasm, insickled critique, unparalyzed by thought or by the mortal domination of reason—who knows the divine raptus?

¶ Technique in all its aspects demands of him every moment that he do justice to it, and give the only right answer which it at any moment permits. It comes down to this, that his compositions are nothing more than solutions of that kind, nothing but the solving of technical puzzles. Art becomes critique.

¶ What uplifts you, what increases your feeling of power and might and domination, that is the truth—and whether ten times a lie when looked at from the moral angle. And I mean too that creative, genius-giving disease, disease that rides on high horse over all hindrances, and springs with drunken daring from peak to peak, is a thousand times dearer to life than plodding healthiness.

¶ Believe me, barbarism even has more grasp of theology than has a culture fallen away from cult, which even in the religious has seen only culture, only the human, never excess, paradox, the mystic passion, the utterly unbourgeois ideal.

¶ . . . what Plato had said of comedy and tragedy: how they grow on the same tree and a change of lighting suffices to make one into the other.

¶ Very strongly felt and objectively confirmed was the enormous loss of value which the individual had sustained, the ruthlessness which made life today stride away over the single person and precipitate itself as a general indifference to the sufferings and destruction of human beings.

¶ By the bourgeois tradition I mean the values of culture, enlightenment, humanity, in short of such dreams as the uplifting of the people through scientific civilization.

¶ de Tocqueville: out of revolution . . . two streams issued, the one leading men to free arrangements, the other to absolute power. [But] the very concept of free arrangements was self-contradictory: freedom by the act of assertion being driven to limit the freedom of its antagonist and thus to stultify itself and its own principles.

¶ Precisely because from the very first medieval man had received a closed intellectual frame from the Church as something absolute and taken for granted, he had been far more imaginative than the burgher of the individualistic age; he had been able to surrender himself far more freely and sure-footedly to his personal fancy.

¶ . . . a state of mind, which, no longer interested in the psychological, pressed for the objective, for a language that expressed the absolute, the binding and compulsory, and in consequence by choice laid on itself the pious fetters of pre-classically strict form.

¶ . . . how near aestheticism and barbarism are to each other: aestheticism as the herald of barbarism.

¶ . . . a man who knew the best, the highest and austerest; but for him music was music—if it just was music. He objected to Goethe's saying that art is concerned with the good and difficult; he held that "light" music is difficult too, if it is good.

¶ It was impossible for him to think about things he had already done while in a state of incapacity to do better. The past was only tolerable if one felt above it, instead of having to stare stupidly at it aware of one's present impotence.

Elizabeth White called up and asked that I come over, because of something she had to tell me. I arrived to find the sisters packing, and their mother with them. Beth and I took a walk and she told me how their father had discovered that Marian was pregnant and that Helmut had been giving her various medicines. Helmut was dragged into the police station where he admitted that he had been forcing the drugs on her, which of course is most illegal. Marian's father said that Helmut must either marry Marian or face the music. Then Helmut's father said that if Helmut married, he would disinherit him and take him out of school. Naturally, Helmut hedged, and did not come through with the ring. This, of course, was a blow to Marian, as in her dream world she had considered herself already married, and she never allowed herself to consider the very real possibility that Helmut had only been using her sexually all that time. So, if the medicines have not already killed the baby, Marian will be taken quietly to a home in Buffalo, where she can give birth and then put the child out for adoption. Verdict and moral: it would have been so easy to have used contraceptives!

Spent the long Christmas weekend visiting Tyacks in Cambridge and then going down to Providence to spend Christmas eve and the rest of the weekend with Pete, climaxed with our going to Meeting together on Sunday morning just before I had to catch the bus back. I continue to feel marvelously at home with Pete and with the Gardners. We have a remarkable friendship that, I hope, will continue. He seems to be interested now in a Jewish girl, or at least he says that she is in love with him: a Bryn Mawr student who comes from Boston. Her family is adamant about her marrying out of the faith, and especially to what they call an "idealist" without any recognized source of income, at least at present.

Pete doesn't love her—yet—so that is the temporary solution. It somehow is something that I never considered: Pete's marrying a Jewess. But when I first heard of that possibility now (provided he falls in love with her), I was quite pleased. Of course, I do not know her. She may be one of those wonderfully earnest and artistic Jews who will complement Pete very nicely—or, she may be neurotic and be using him as a means of breaking away from her family and the past. This is not the first major squabble, apparently, that she has had with the family. I would literally sit down and wail if I knew Pete married into such a situation. He is much safer with a plain ordinary gentile, though there are some beauts there too!

I am writing my religious autobiography for Riek, and also today made the beginnings of what I hope will be a violin sonata for her. Not being able to see her is just about the hardest thing to bear in this service. I long so much to be near her warmth once more, and to have her with me at meals and at bedtime, when a man should not be alone. Fie on this celibate life! Well, there is a real possibility that Riek and I will make excellent mates. I have come to love her through her letters, and if this love is flamed by her person when I return to Europe in a year's time, then she will certainly be my wife. Oh happy thought!

March 23, 1954

Overheard in a Greyhound bus at 4:30 a.m. as a drunk sat down next to a half-asleep passenger and tried to get him to wake up and converse: Passenger: “Do you want me to die from lack of sleep?” Drunk: “You'll never die from lack of sleep. But you might from not knowing how to live!”

April 3, 1954

From Huxley's After Many a Summer Dies the Swan:

¶ “What is man?” he whispered to himself. “C'est un néant environné de Dieu, indigent de Dieu, capable de Dieu et rempli de Dieu, s'il veut.” And what is this God of which men are capable? Mr. Propter answered with the definition given by John Tauler in the first paragraph of his “Following of Christ”: “God is a being withdrawn from creatures, a free power, a pure working.” Man, then, is as nothingness surrounded by and indigent of a being withdrawn from creatures, a nothingness capable of free power, filled with a pure working, if he so desires. If he so desires. But how few men ever do desire or, desiring, ever know what to wish for or how to get it! Right knowledge is hardly less rare than the sustained good will to act on it. Of those few who look for God, most find, through ignorance, only such reflections of their own self-will as the God of battles, the God of the chosen people, the Prayer-Answerer, the Savior.

¶ This time the anger had exploded in violent abuse. It was the anger . . . of the well meaning but stupid man who is compelled against his will to ask himself indiscreet questions about what he had been doing as a matter of course. He doesn't want to ask these questions because he knows that if he does he will be forced either to go on with what he is doing, but with the cynic's awareness that he is doing wrong, or else, if he doesn't want to be a cynic, to change the entire pattern of his life so as to bring his desires to do right into harmony with the real facts as revealed in the course of self-interrogation. To most people radical change is even more odious than cynicism. The only way between the horns of the dilemma is to persist at all costs in the ignorance which permits one to go on doing wrong in the comforting belief that by doing so one is accomplishing one's duty—one's duty to the company, to the shareholders, to the family, the city, the state, the fatherland, the Church. For, of course, poor Hansen's case wasn't in any way unique; on a smaller scale and therefore with less power to do evil, he was acting like all those civil servants and statesmen and prelates who go through life spreading misery and destruction in the name of their ideals and under orders from their categorical imperatives.

¶ Only a saint . . . could be a peon and a pariah with impunity, because only a saint would accept the position gladly and as though he had chosen it for his own free will. Poverty and suffering ennoble only when they are voluntary. By involuntary poverty and suffering men are made worse. It is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for an involuntary poor man to enter the kingdom of heaven.

¶ "Do you know which is the stupidest text in the Bible?" "It's this: 'They hated me without a cause.'"

¶ The poor fellow from Kansas [was] self-righteous, no doubt disagreeable to the neighbors, an incompetent farmer; but that wasn't the whole story. His gravest offence had been to accept the world in which he found himself as normal, rational, and right. Like all the others he had allowed the advertisers to multiply his wants, he had learnt to equate happiness with possession, and prosperity with money to spend in a shop. Like all the others, he had abandoned any idea of subsistence farming to think exclusively in terms of a cash crop; and he had gone on thinking in those terms even when the crop no longer gave him any cash. Then, like all the others, he had got into debt with the banks. And finally, like all the others, he had learnt that what the experts had been saying for a generation was perfectly true; in a semi-arid country, it is grass that holds down the soil; tear up the grass, the soil will go. In due course, it had gone.

¶ If individuality is not absolute, if personalities are illusory figments of a self-will disastrously blind to the reality of a more-than-personal consciousness, of which it is the limitation and denial, then all of every human being's efforts must be directed, in the last resort, to the actualization of that more-than-personal consciousness. So that even intelligence is not sufficient as an adjunct to good will; there must also be the recollection which seeks to transform and transcend intelligence.

¶ . . . a significance new not in respect to the entities connoted by the words, but rather in the mode of their comprehension, which from being intellectual in character, had become intuitive and direct so that the nature of man in his potentiality and of God in actuality was realized by an analogue of sensuous experience, by a kind of unmediated participation. The busy nothingness of his being experienced itself as transcended in the felt capacity for peace and purity, for the withdrawal from revulsions and desires, for the blissful freedom from personality.

¶ If he serves any ideal except the highest, which is the ideal of liberation from personality, from time and craving—whether it's the artist's ideal of beauty, or the scientist's ideal of truth, or the humanitarian's ideal of what currently passes for goodness—he's not serving God; he's serving a magnified aspect of himself.

¶ Better planes, better explosives—every improvement increases the sum of fear and hatred, widens the incidence of nationalistic hysteria—makes it more difficult for people to forget those horrible projections of themselves they call their ideals of patriotism, heroism, glory and the rest. And even the less destructive applications of science aren't really much more satisfactory. For what do such applications result in? The multiplication of possessable objects, the invention of new instruments of stimulation; the disseminations of new wants through propaganda aimed at equating possession with well-being and incessant stimulation with happiness. But incessant stimulation from without is a source of bondage; and so the preoccupation with possessions.

¶ Napoleon came out of the French Revolution. German nationalism came out of Napoleon. The war of 1870 came out of German nationalism. The war of 1914 came out of the war of 1870. Hitler came out of the war of 1914. Those are the bad results of the French Revolution. The good results were the enfranchisement of the French peasants and the spread of political democracy. Put the good results in one scale of your balance and the bad ones in the other, and try which set is heavier. Then perform the same operation with Russia. . . . or take the fight for democracy in Spain. There was a fight for democracy all over Europe not so long ago. Rational prognosis can only be based on past experience. Look at the results of 1914 and then ask yourself what chance the Loyalists ever had of establishing a liberal regime at the end of a long war.

¶ What is commonly called self-sacrifice is the sacrifice of one part of the ego to another part—as when the feelings connected with money or sex are sacrificed in order that the ego may have the feelings of superiority, solidarity and hatred which are associated with patriotism, or any kind of political or religious fanaticism.

¶ Publicans and sinners merely fornicate and over-eat, and get drunk. The people who make wars, the people who reduce their fellows to slavery, the people who kill and torture and tell lies in the name of their sacred causes, the really evil people in a word—these are never the publicans and sinners. No, they're the virtuous, respectable men, who have the finest feelings, the best brains, the noblest ideals.

¶ Good is on the level below the human and on the level above. On the animal level and on the level of eternity, of God, spirit. On the lower level, good exists as the proper functioning of the organism in accordance with the laws of its own being. On the higher level, it exists in the form of a knowledge of the world without desire or aversion; it exists as the experience of eternity, as the transcendence of personality, the extension of consciousness beyond the limits imposed by the ego. Strictly human activities are activities that prevent the manifestations of good on the other two levels. For, insofar as we're human, we're obsessed with time, we're passionately concerned with our personalities and with those magnified projections of our personalities which we call our policies, our ideals, our religions. And what are the results? Being obsessed with time and our egos, we are forever craving and worrying. But nothing impairs the normal functioning of the organism like craving and revulsion, like greed and fear and worry. And, the same thing is true in regard to the sphere above. We worry and crave ourselves out of the very possibility of transcending personality and knowing, intellectually at first and then by direct experience, the true nature of the world.

¶ The more bosses, the less democracy. So the less self-support, the less democracy. In Jefferson's day, a great many Americans did support themselves. They were economically independent. Independent of government and independent of big business. Hence the Constitution.

¶ Socialism seems to be fatally committed to centralization and standardized urban mass production. I see too many occasions for bullying there—too many opportunities for bossy people to display their bossiness, for sluggish people to sit back and be slaves.

¶ You can't preserve people from the horrors of war if they won't give up the pleasures of nationalism. You can't save them from slumps and depressions so long as they go on thinking exclusively in terms of money and regarding money as the supreme good. You can't avert revolution and enslavement if they will identify progress with the increase of centralization and prosperity with the intensifying of mass production.

¶ His elbow on the desk, in an attitude of prayer, he meditatively scratched his head; scratched it with both hands where two little spots had formed dry scabs at the roots of the hair that still remained to him, scabs which it was an exquisite pleasure to prize up with the finger-nails and carefully detach there! The scab under the right hand had come loose. He pulled it out through the thick tufted hair above his ears and, as he looked at the tiny desiccated shred of tissue, was suddenly reminded of the baboons. But after all, why not? The most certain and abiding pleasures are the tiniest, the simplest, the rudimentarily animal—the pleasure of lying in a hot bath, for example, or under the bed-clothes, between waking and sleeping, in the morning; the pleasure of answering the calls of nature, the pleasure of being rubbed by a good masseur, the pleasure finally of scratching when one itched. Why be ashamed? He dropped the scab into the waste basket and continued to scratch with the left hand.

¶ As the salary rose and the morality of what he was called upon to do correspondingly sank, the poor fellow's uneasiness had increased, until, on the brink of reservation or a nervous breakdown, he had managed, in the nick of time, to get himself converted to Catholicism. Thence forward, he had been able to pack up the moral responsibility for his share in the general iniquity, take it to Farm Street and leave it there, in camphor, so to speak, with the Jesuit Fathers. Admirable arrangement!

¶ The valley of the shadow of death; of the greater deaths and all the little deaths. Through deaths come transfigurations. He who would save his life must lose it. Men and women are continually trying to lose their lives, the stale, unprofitable, senseless lives of their ordinary personalities. Forever trying to get rid of them, and in a thousand different ways. In the frenzies of gambling and revivalism; in the monomanias of avarice and perversion, of research and sectarianism and ambition; in the compensatory lunacies of alcohol, of reading, of day-dreaming, of morphia; in the hallucinations of opium and the cinema and ritual; in the wild epilepsies of political enthusiasm and erotic pleasure; in the stupors of veronal and exhaustion. To escape; to forget one's own, old, wearisome identity; to become someone else or, better, some other thing—a mere body, strangely numbed or more than ordinarily sentient; or else just a state of impersonal mind, a mode of unindividualized consciousness. What happiness, what a blissful alleviation! Even for such as were not previously aware that there was anything in their condition that needed to be alleviated.

¶ But like all other addictions, whether to drugs or books, to power or applause, the addiction to pleasure tends to aggravate the condition it temporarily alleviates. The addict goes down into the valley of the shadow of his own particular little death—down indefatigably, desperately, down in search of something else, something not himself, something other and better than the life he miserably lives as a human person in the hideous world of human persons. He goes down and, either violently or in delicious inertia, he dies and is transfigured; but dies only for a little while, is transfigured only momentarily. After the little death is a little resurrection, a resurrection out of unconsciousness, out of self-annihilating excitement, back into the misery of knowing oneself alone and weak and worthless, back into a completer separateness, an acuter sense of personality. And the acuter the sense of separate personality, the more urgent the demand for yet another experience of assuaging death and transfiguration. The addiction alleviates, but in doing so increases the pains demanding alleviation.

¶ This day fifty years ago I was born. From solitude in the womb, we emerge into solitude among our fellows, and return again to solitude within the grave. We pass our lives in the attempt to mitigate that solitude. But propinquity is never fusion. The most populous city is but an agglomeration of wildernesses. We exchange words, but exchange them from prison to prison, and without hope that they will signify to others what they mean to ourselves. We marry, and there are two solitudes in the house instead of one; we beget children, and there are many solitudes. We reiterate the act of love; but again propinquity is never fusion. The most intimate contact is only of surfaces and we couple, as I have seen the condemned prisoners at Newgate coupling with their trulls, between the bars of our cages. Pleasure cannot be shared; like pain, it can only be experienced or inflicted, and when we give pleasure to our lovers or bestow charity upon the needy, we do so, not to gratify the object of our benevolence, but only ourselves. For the truth is that we are kind for the same reason as we are cruel, in order that we may enhance the sense of our own power; and this we are for ever trying to do, despite the fact that by doing it we cause ourselves to feel more solitary than ever. The reality of solitude is the same in all men, there being no mitigation of it, except in forgetfulness, stupidity, or illusion; but a man's sense of solitude is proportionate to the sense and fact of his power. In any set of circumstances, the more power we have, the more intensely do we feel our solitude.

¶ Misplaced seriousness—the source of some of our most fatal errors. One should be serious only about what deserves to be taken seriously. And, on the strictly human level, there was nothing that deserved to be taken seriously except the sufferings men inflicted upon themselves by their crimes and follies. But, in the last analysis, most of these crimes and follies arose from taking too seriously things which did not deserve it.

¶ The spectacle of brute creation provides me with almost my sole remaining pleasures. The stupidity of the brutes is without pretensions and their malignity depends on appetite and is therefore only intermittent. Men are systematically and continuously cruel, while their follies are justified in the names of religion and politics, and their ignorance is muffled up in the pompous garments of philosophy.

¶ What poetry, what statues, but on the brink of the Peloponnesian War! And now the Vatican is painted—just in time for the sack of Rome. And the Eroica is composed, but for a hero who turns out to be just another bandit. And the nature of the atom is elucidated, by the same physicists as volunteer in war-time to improve the arts of murder. On the plane of the absence of God, men can do nothing else except destroy what they have built—destroy even while they build—build with the elements of destruction. Madness consists in not recognizing the facts; in making wishes the fathers of thoughts; in conceiving things to be other than they really are; in trying to realize desired ends by means which countless previous experiments have shown to be inappropriate. Madness consists, for example, in thinking of oneself as a soul, a coherent and enduring human entity. But, between the animal below and the spirit above, there is nothing on the human level except a swarm of constellated impulses and sentiments and notions; a swarm brought together by the accidents of heredity and language; a swarm of incongruous and often contradictory thoughts and desires. Memory and the slowly changing body constitute a kind of spatio-temporal cage, within which the swarm is enclosed. To talk of it as though it were a coherent and enduring “soul” is madness. On the strictly human level there is no such thing as a soul.

¶ God is completely present only in the complete absence of what we call our humanity.

¶ Even the swarm of our passions and opinions is susceptible to the beauty of eternity; and being susceptible becomes dissatisfied with its own ugliness; and being dissatisfied undertakes to change itself. Chaos gives place to order—not the arbitrary, purely human order that comes from the subordination of the swarm to some lunatic “ideal,” but an order that reflects the real order of the world. Bondage gives place to liberty—for choices are no longer dictated by the chance occurrences of earlier history, but are made teleologically and in the light of a direct insight into the nature of things.

May 5, 1954

Dear Wils [Tom Wilson],

To hear from you (and other people similarly) that you are 2/3 through with medical school, makes me stop and ask myself "Where am I?" Sometimes I must honestly answer, "Nowhere"; but this is in the opinion of the world. On a deeper level, I hope, I am progressing, for my situation here is one ripe for character building for the simple reason that it is unpleasant at best and execrable at worst. I will be nearly 25 when I finish next February, and what then shall I know or be? Nothing or everything, I suppose, depending on criteria. I still have my dreams of small farming, writing, complete independence in a Jeffersonian or Thoreauian sense, and antipathy toward the specialization that society seems to compel nowadays. Dreams? Well, we shall see—at any rate this kind of life leaves room for surprise and variation and change. But perhaps I will take another degree, a hopelessly inefficacious one monetarily in all prospect, but one nevertheless on the very frontiers of contemporary thought and perplexities: the Philosophy and Psychology combination at Oxford for which I unsuccessfully applied under the Rhodes fund. Returning to Europe will be exciting.

The question you raise as to your dedication to medicine makes me laugh. I have known doctors at home, and I see doctors here now constantly, and I should say that your dedication is assuredly up there with the best. Real dedication is not a verbal thing, or even a conscious one: if a person goes around saying to himself before each house-call, "I am dedicated to curing humanity in general, to alleviating the pain and suffering of mankind, and of my present patient in particular, whose five dollars I shall accept with great reluctance and only because society demands that I maintain a good social standing," then I should say that this man, however sincere, is not honestly dedicated. I prefer the person who simply carries on his work through all conditions, because it is his work and because he can do no other but help—rather than mouthing the dedication-formula as a magic incantation to heighten his ego surreptitiously by pretending that he is debasing it. There is even something to be said for the man who goes into his work with fear and perhaps distaste, but who continues in it because the need continues. There is nothing worse than the professional lover of humanity, and I say this with the full realization that some of my own tendencies have been leading in that direction.

Being an orderly has been quite an education for me, being transplanted as I am out of my element. I have fallen too much, I'm afraid, into the weakness of mentioning when I can tactfully that I am a college graduate, my father a physician, my status involuntary, etc., etc. It really would be much stronger of me if I could play the part and accept the disabilities. "Take physic, pomp. / Expose thyself to feel what wretches feel." To feel, not just to act for eight hours and then return to the throne room! I really don't think it is snobbery that keeps me aloof (living in a student house, dating university girls, etc.); rather probably an inner insecurity; but most apparently the inability to converse on trivial things. I always think back to that penetrating passage in D. H. Lawrence where the author explains that Paul, his hero, is so anxious to make deep and lasting friendships and thus to avoid trivial ones, that he cannot converse on the very level of trivia that is always the prelude to things deeper and more lasting. He wants to plunge in without breaking the surface—and that, in anyone's language, is impossible.

I think if there were one bit of advice that I were asked to give to prospective parents, it would be this: "Don't over-intellectualize your children." As Huxley says, the moral and intellectual and spiritual set-up of this the best-of-all-possible worlds is akin to the physical set-up: you can't gain anything without sustaining a compensatory loss. The lesson for parents and politicians, philosophers and pedants, historians and militarists, is to stop seeing only what is, in their eyes, the gain, but as a matter of fact to calculate fearlessly the loss and then to place the two in balance to see which tips the scales. You gain by a centralized mass-production economy but you also lose. You gain by elucidating the inwards of the atom, but you also lose. You gain by being a conscientious objector, but you (and society) also lose; and so forth. You gain by intellectualizing, but, oh, how much you also lose!

I am tremendously glad of one thing that this hospital experience has proved to me: that I am not interested in medicine! That is, besides a general intellectual curiosity that, I should hope, would extend to all fields, my mind does not reach out inquiringly toward further investigation in this type of science. We had pre-meds working as orderlies during the summer and they were all excited about such and such a part of a cat's or dog's anatomy. As for me, my greatest excitement seems to come from discovering the Greek components of medical terminology. Just an old pedant at heart! But it is really good to know that my reluctance to go into medicine has not been a mistake. It is rare that a person ever does get into a situation in which he can get the "feel" of a profession that he contemplates to make his own. When I think of the accidents of circumstance and whim that steer people into their vocations, I shudder. Perhaps all would-be doctors should mop operating room floors!

From Maugham's The Razor's Edge:

¶ "D' you remember how Jesus was led into the wilderness and fasted forty days? Then, when he was a-hungered, the devil came to him and said: If thou be the son of God, command that these stones be made bread. But Jesus resisted the temptation. (Thrice more the devil tempted him, but Jesus resisted, and said: Get thee hence, Satan.) That's the end of the story according to the good simple Matthew. But it wasn't. The devil was sly and he came to Jesus once more and said: If thou wilt accept shame and disgrace, scourging, a crown of thorns, and death on the cross, thou shalt save the human race, for greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends. Jesus fell. The devil laughed till his sides ached, for he knew the evil men would commit in the name of their redeemer." Isabel looked at me indignantly. . . . "I think that's idiotic and blasphemous." "I only wanted to suggest to you that self-sacrifice is a passion so overwhelming that beside it even lust and hunger are trifling. It whirls its victim to destruction in the highest affirmation of his personality. The object doesn't matter; it may be worthwhile or it may be worthless. No wine is so intoxicating, no love so shattering, no vice so compelling. When he sacrifices himself, man for a moment is greater than God, for how can God, infinite and omnipotent, sacrifice himself? At best he can only sacrifice his only begotten Son."

Riparius

Fred tells me that Harold Smith, whom I used to visit about Pharaoh Lake rowboats, is living with his (Fred's) niece, up North River way. Harold was a nice guy, but I remember calling for him one day and finding his wife (a big fat woman) alone with three of the sickest looking kids I've ever seen. Now Fred tells me that Harold's wife tried to shoot him one night, but Harold grabbed the hammer in time and squeezed it against her hand, where the scar can still be seen. So Harold left her, because he knew that if he stayed, sometime during one of their many arguments he was bound to kill her.

I asked Fred how Harold met Fred's niece, Caroline. He said that Sherman Frazer used to bring Caroline home (age 17) and sometimes Harold went to visit Sherman. Well, Caroline got to liking Harold better than Sherman, and so the result.

Fred also told of his own girl in Vermont. She met him for a date once dead drunk. He pulled out the next morning for New York State and now hates women.

Poor Fred. He's so alone and hopeless. Today he pulled the radiator off his truck, going over a rock. Complains that Hal never helps him. When in this depressed mood he takes his gun and goes alone to the woods to sit in a tree half the night waiting for a deer.

Margie Rusk was here Monday and Tuesday. She knows all the birds, pets moths, which I abhor, and otherwise seems the professional nature-lover. But she's nice enough withal and now that she's just left I feel altogether lonely. I really work well when someone's around, badly when alone.

Saturday night I took out Aggie again in New York. Are we falling in love? When I kiss her she melts in my arms and pulls me tighter to her, but it is not the pull of a slut like Marian or Betty MacLean, who you know immediately just want a good penis-rub, regardless of whom the penis is attached to. When Aggie muzzles up to me I feel that it is for me as a person, as a personality. And I am the same with her. With MacLean, after the first thrill of contact I am mostly repulsed. The sex play seems so meaningless and leads nowhere. It certainly doesn't lead to knowing her more closely. Rather, it is an excuse for not knowing her, for not making any effort at all toward human outreach and knowledge and understanding. With Aggie it is altogether different. The embrace is one of tenderness, of complete affection and security, rather than just sex, penis-play. It is what a child undoubtedly feels when he snuggles up to his mother.

I wish so much that Aggie could come up here, and I have asked her, but it does look lecherous, I suppose, and she is afraid her mother will disagree entirely. My whole soul and body yearn day and night for a spiritual and bodily mate. When will I ever find one and consummate the union?

August 4, 1954

Fred finally shot a deer, expecting all to share his joy. But Hal ordered the meat out of his house, for fear of the game warden. Poor Fred was devastated, went out sulking and took the meat to his sister's. Hal expected him to quit, but he was back to work the next day, though non-communicative. Then meal by meal he opened up again and a few days later was back to his own pleasant self.

Fred seems to have shot thousands of deer, if one would believe his stories. It's almost a passion with him—certainly a way out in his otherwise dismal lonely womanless, liquorless life. And a good way out too. At least he is only destroying a deer now and then (he usually misses, fortunately) instead of destroying himself by drinking or his possessions by gambling, as other men do. Yes, a good solution for Fred, though certainly not a be-all and end-all. Each person seems to find his release from frustration in his own way, corresponding, I suppose, to the nature of his frustration. And who is to say, therefore, which means is moral, which immoral, which useful, which destructive?

My own frustration seems still lack of women. I think I could do everything so much better if I had a companion in life—my writing, and even the work here. Perhaps this is looking for a foolish panacea.

The chimney is growing, slowly. I really do not work very many hours, all told, and seem to start very slowly in the mornings. And snags develop, invariably. So it is almost two weeks now, and I don't think I shall be able to finish it completely. Otherwise I have shingled about  $\frac{3}{4}$  of the north gable; asbestos, so as to have a fireproof layer behind the chimney, and have built a door, which I haven't hung yet. I love it up here as much as always. I would like so much just to settle here and try to make a living from the farm and writing. But where is the woman to do this with me? Riek writes today that she wishes she were here and that at night we could sleep together naked squeezed into one sleeping sack. But even she, with all her desire to "hook" me, insists on continuing her career—and who can blame her? How long would she be content up here, out of reach of any decent orchestra?

But this is the way to mental health for me. Man can battle with other people, with himself, and with nature and the environment. The last is the most conducive to health, and is the least formidable today. The farm gives me the opportunity to live in the way necessary for me. Perhaps this way of life will break the chain of neuroticism bequeathed to me. Otherwise I see little hope. Then, with the self-confidence and general well-being born of this competition with wind and snow and soil, one can better face the more difficult conflicts with other men and with oneself.

Of course, if I were to settle here, every one in my past would tell me I was wasting my life and my talents. In a way they will be right. It is just too bad that my talents, such as they be, cannot seem to exercise themselves freely and at highest efficiency. But the “talents” themselves are but compensations highly indulged because of the very neuroticism that keeps them at bay. Propellant and repellant are the same force. Tricky but true!

I wish to hell Aggie would write to me!

From Huxley, Eyeless in Gaza:

¶ Returned depressed from an evening with Helen and half a dozen of her young political friends. Such a passion for “liquidating” the people who don’t agree with them! And such a sincere conviction that liquidation is necessary! Revolting—but only to be expected. Regard the problem of reform exclusively as a matter of politics and economics, and you must approve and practice liquidation.

Consider recent history. Industrialism has grown pari passu with population. Now, where markets are expanding, the two besetting problems of all industrial societies solve themselves. New inventions may create technological unemployment, but expanding markets cure it as it’s made. Each individual may possess inadequate purchasing power; but the total number of individuals is steadily rising. Many small purchasing powers do as much as fewer big ones.

Our population is now stationary, will soon decline. Shrinkage instead of expansion of markets. Therefore no more automatic solution of economic problems. Birth control necessitates the use of coordinating political intelligence. There must be a large-scale plan. Otherwise the machine won’t work. In other words, politicians will have to be about twenty times as intelligent as heretofore. Will the supply of intelligence be equal to the demand?

And of course intelligence isn't isolated. The act of intelligently planning modifies the emotions of the planners. Consider English politics. We've made plenty of reforms—without ever accepting the principles underlying them. (Compare the king's titles with his present position. Compare our protestations that we'll never have anything to do with socialism with the realities of state control.) There are no large-scale plans in English politics, with hardly any thinking in terms of first principles. With what results? Among others, that English politics have been on the whole very good-natured. The reason is simple. Deal with practical problems as they arise and without reference to first principles; politics are a matter of haggling. Now hagglers lose tempers, but don't normally regard one another as fiends in human form. But this is precisely what men of principle and systematic planners can't help doing. A principle is, by definition, right; a plan for the good of the people. Axioms from which it logically follows that those who disagree with you and won't help you to realize your plan are enemies of goodness and humanity. No longer men and women, but personifications of evil, fiends incarnate. Killing men and women is wrong, but killing fiends is a duty. Hence the Holy Office, hence Robespierre and the OGPU. Men with strong religious and revolutionary faith, men with well-thought-out plans for improving the lot of their fellows, either in this world or the next, have been more systematically and cold-bloodedly cruel than any others. Thinking in terms of first principles entails acting with machine-guns. A government with a comprehensive plan for the betterment of society is a government that uses torture. Per contra, if you never consider principles and have no plan, but deal with situations as they arise, piecemeal, you can afford to have unarmed policemen, liberty of speech and habeas corpus. Admirable, but what happens when an industrial society learns (a) how to make technological advances at a constantly accelerating speed and (b) to prevent conception? Answer: it must either plan itself in accordance with general political and economic principles, or else break down. But governments with principles and plans have generally been tyrannies making use of police spies and terrorism. Must we resign ourselves to slavery and torture for the sake of coordination?

Breakdown on the one hand, Inquisition and OGPU rule on the other. A real dilemma, if the plan is mainly economic and political. But think in terms of individual men, women, and children, not of States, Religion, Economic Systems and such-like abstractions: There is then a hope of passing between the horns. For if you begin by considering concrete people, you see at once that freedom from coercion is a necessary condition of their developing into full-grown human beings; that the form of economic prosperity which consists in possessing unnecessary objects doesn't make for individual well-being; that a leisure filled with passive amusement is not a blessing; that the conveniences of urban life are bought at a high physiological and mental price; that an education which allows you to use yourself wrongly is almost valueless; that a social organization resulting in individuals being forced, every few years, to go out and murder one another must be wrong. And so on. Whereas if you start from the State, the Faith, the Economic System, there is a complete transvaluation of values. Individuals must murder one another, because the interests of the Nation demand it, must be educated to think of ends and disregard means, because the schoolmasters are there and don't know of any other method; must live in towns, must have leisure to read the newspapers and go to the movies, must be encouraged to buy things they don't need because the industrial system exists and has to be kept going; must be coerced and enslaved, because otherwise they might think for themselves and give trouble to their rulers.

The Sabbath was made for man. But man now behaves like the Pharisees and insists that he is made for all the things—science, industry, nation, money, religion, schools—which were really made for him. Why? Because he is so little aware of his own interests as a human being that he feels irresistibly tempted to sacrifice himself to these idols. There is no remedy except to become aware of one's interests as a human being, and having become aware, to learn to act on that awareness. Which means learning to use the self and learning to direct the mind. It's almost wearisome, the way one always comes back to the same point. Wouldn't it be nice, for a change, of there were another way out of our difficulties! A shortcut. A method requiring no greater personal effort than recording a vote or ordering some "enemy of society" to be shot. A salvation from outside, like a dose of calomel.

¶ Query: how to combine belief that the world is to a great extent illusory with belief that it is none the less essential to improve the illusion?

How to be simultaneously dispassionate and not indifferent, serene like an old man and active like a young one?

¶ Mark, at dinner, said he'd been re-reading Anna Karenina. Found it good, as novels go. But complained of the profound untruthfulness of even the best imaginative literature. And he began to catalogue its omissions. Almost total neglect of those small physiological events that decide whether day-to-day living shall have a pleasant or unpleasant tone. Excretion, for example, with its power to make or mar the day. Digestion. And, for the heroines of novel and drama, menstruation. Then the small illnesses—catarrh, rheumatism, headache, eye-strain. The chronic physical disabilities—ramifying out (as in the case of deformity or impotence) into luxuriant insanities. And conversely the sudden accessions, from unknown visceral and muscular sources, of more than ordinary health. No mention, next, of the part played by mere sensations in producing happiness. Hot bath, for example, taste of bacon, feel of fur, smell of freesias. In life, an empty cigarette-case may cause more distress than the absence of a lover; never in books. Almost equally complete omission of the small distractions that fill the greater part of human lives. Reading the papers; looking into shops; exchanging gossip; with all the varieties of day-dreaming, from lying in bed, imagining what one would do if one had the right lover, income, face, social position, to sitting at the picture palace passively accepting ready-made day-dreams from Hollywood.

Lying by omission turns inevitably into positive lying. The implications of literature are that human beings are controlled, if not by reason, at least by comprehensible, well-organized, allowable sentiments. Whereas the facts are quite different. Sometimes the sentiments come in, sometimes they don't. All for love, or the world well lost; but love may be the title of nobility given to an inordinate liking for a particular person's smell or texture, a lunatic desire for the repetition of a sensation produced by some particular dexterity. Or consider those cases (seldom published, but how numerous, as anyone in a position to know can tell!), those cases of the eminent statesmen, churchmen, lawyers, captains of industry—seemingly so sane, demonstrably so intelligent, publicly so high-principles; but in private, under irresistible compulsion towards brandy, towards young men, towards little girls in trains, towards exhibitionism, towards gambling or hoarding, towards bullying, towards being whipped, towards all the innumerable, crazy perversions of the lusts for money and power and position on the one hand, for sexual pleasure on the other. Mere tics and tropisms, lunatic and unavowable cravings—these play as much part in human life as the organized and recognized sentiments. And imaginative literature suppresses the fact. Propagates an enormous lie about the nature of men and women.

Rightly, no doubt. Because, if human beings were shown what they're really like, they'd either kill one another as vermin, or hang themselves. But meanwhile, I really can't be bothered to read any more imaginative literature.

From Maugham, The Summing Up:

¶ To my mind, the drama took a wrong turning when the demand for realism led it to abandon the ornament of verse. Verse has a specific dramatic value as anyone can see by observing in himself the thrilling effect of a tirade in one of Racine's plays or any of Shakespeare's great set pieces; and this is independent of the sense; it is due to the emotional power of rhythmical speech. But more than that, verse forces on the matter a conventional form that heightens the aesthetic effect. It enables the drama to achieve a beauty that is out of the question in a prose play. However much you may admire The Wild Duck, The Importance of Being Earnest, or Man and Superman, you cannot without abuse of the word claim that they are beautiful. But the chief value of verse is that it delivers a play from sober reality. It puts it on another level, at one remove from life, and so makes it easier for the audience to attune themselves to that state of feeling in which they are most susceptible to the drama's specific appeal. In that artificial medium life is not presented in a world-for-word translation, but in a free rendering, and thus the dramatist has ample scope for the effects of which his art is capable. For the drama is make-believe. It does not deal with truth but with effect. That willing suspension of disbelief of which Coleridge wrote is essential to it. The importance of truth to the dramatist is that it adds to interest, but to the dramatist truth is only verisimilitude. It is what he can persuade his audience to accept. If they will believe that a man can doubt his wife's fidelity because someone tells him he has found her handkerchief in somebody else's possession, well and good, that is sufficient motive for his jealousy; if they will believe that a six-course dinner can be eaten in ten minutes, well and good again, the dramatist can get on with his play. But when a greater and greater realism, both in motive and action, is demanded of him and he is asked not to embroider gaily or romantically upon life but to copy it, he is robbed of great part of his resources. He is forced to forgo asides because people do not naturally talk to themselves out loud; he may not telescope events by which he was able to accelerate his action, but must cause them to occur as deliberately as in real life; he must eschew accident and chance, for we know (in the theatre) that things do not happen like that. The result has shown that realism too often can only produce plays that are drab and dull.

From Look Homeward, Angel:

¶ “If I had known. If I had known,” said Eliza. And then: “I’m sorry.” But he knew that her sorrow at that moment was not for him or for herself, or even for the boy whom idiot chance had thrust in the way of pestilence, but that, with a sudden inner flaming of her clairvoyant Scotch soul, she had looked cleanly, without pretense for the first time, upon the inexorable tides of necessity, and that she was sorry for all who had lived, were living, or would live, fanning with their prayers the useless altar flames, suppliant with their hopes to an unwitting spirit, casting the tiny rockets of their belief against remote eternity, and hoping for grace, guidance, and delivery upon the spinning and forgotten cinder of this earth. O lost.

Bhagavad-Gita:

¶ II 47–53. Let your privilege be in actions themselves; never let it be in their fruits. So be not moved by the fruits of actions; nor let inaction dwell in you. / Abiding under the Rule [Yoga] and casting off attachment, O Earth-Winner, do your actions, indifferent alike to gain or loss. Even-mindedness is called the Rule. / For actions which seek returns are far lower than the Rule of the Understanding, O Wealth-Winner. Seek refuge in the Understanding; base are they who are moved by the fruit of actions. / Under this Rule of the Understanding a man frees himself even in this life from good deeds and ill. Therefore set yourself to the Rule; skill in actions is the Rule. / For under the Rule of the understanding wise men abandon the fruits of actions, loose themselves from the fetters of birth, and reach that state which is beyond all ill. / When your understanding shall have passed through the turmoil of confusion, then alone will you come to indifference as to the things you hear and have heard. / When your understanding, that formerly swayed unbalanced by reason of what you heard, shall stand firm and moveless in awareness of the eternal Soul, then you will attain the Rule.

56–58. He whose mind is undismayed in pain, who is freed from longings for pleasure; from whom passions, fear, and wrath have fled, is called a man of steady wisdom, a saintly man. / He who is free from all attachments and who, whatever fair or foul fortune may come to him, neither rejoices in nor loathes it, has wisdom set in permanence. / When such a man draws in, his senses altogether form the objects of sense, as a tortoise draws in its limbs, he has wisdom set in permanence.

III 27. All actions are done by the forces of Nature, but he whose Self is deluded by the thought of an “I” thinks: I am the doer.

September 16, 1954

Chapter 14 in Wolfe’s Look Homeward, Angel is very impressive. He catalogues the actions and feelings of numerous people in Altamont at 5 a.m., juxtaposing their varied lots and conditions with great drama.

Gita:

¶ VI 1–4, 29. He who does his appointed actions without heed to their fruit is both a renouncer of action and a man of the Rule; not he who withdraws, forgoes the sacrificial fire, and performs no rites. / Know, O Son of Pandu, that what men call renunciation is Yoga, the Rule of disciplined action; for no one becomes a man of the Rule without casting off selfish purposes. / Action is said to be the means for the saintly man who seeks to attain Yoga; after he has attained Yoga, serene inactivity is said to be the means. / For when one clings not to the objects of the senses and to words, and has cast off all purpose, then is he said to have attained Yoga.

With spirit following the rule, with equal vision towards all things, he beholds the Greater Self in all beings and all beings in the Greater Self.

VII 21–24. If any worshipper whatsoever seeks with faith to reverence any Divine Form whatsoever, that same faith in him I make unwavering. / Rule by that faith, he seeks to do reverence to that deity and thence wins his desires, dispensed by Me. / But there is an end to this fruit that comes to these men of little wit. They who make offerings to godlings come to godlings; worshippers of Me come to Me. / Men of no understanding think I have come from the unshown to the shown state, knowing not that my higher being is changeless,, supreme.

XII 8–12. In Me then set your mind, in Me let your understanding dwell; assuredly so shall you abide afterwards in Me. / If you cannot set your mind on Me in steadfastness, then with the practice of concentration seek to win to Me, O Wealth-Winner. / If you have not strength even for concentration, then give yourself over to works for Me; even by performance of actions for My sake you can win to perfection. / If you have not strength to do even this, then come under My Rule as in refuge, and with controlled spirit surrender the fruit of all acts. / For knowledge has more happiness than constant labor; meditation is more excellent than knowledge, surrender of the fruits of action is better than meditation. After such surrender, peace comes straightway.

XVII 14–22. Reverence to gods; twice-born Brahmin elders, and sages; purity, uprightness, chastity, and non-violence: these are called the Mortification of the Body. / Speech that gives no pain, that is true, pleasant and wholesome; likewise the regular study of the Scriptures: these are called the Mortification of Speech. / Serenity of the mind, pleasantness, silence, self-control, and cleanness of spirit; these are called the Mortification of the Mind. / This triple mortification, fulfilled in supreme faith by steadfast men of serene mind, who desire no reward for their conduct: this is called Good. / Mortification for the sake of gaining entertainment, honor, and reverence, and in hypocrisy, is said to be of the Mood of Fieriness; this is unstable and unsure. / Mortification done from a crazed conviction with self-torment, or in order to injure another, is said to be of the Darkness Mood. / That gift which is given as a duty, to one who cannot make returns, and with fitness of place, time, and persons, is a gift of the Goodness Mood. / But that which is given for the sake of a gift in return, or in hope of reward hereafter, or is grudged in the giving, is a gift of the Fiery Mood. / That which is given in an unfit place or time, or to unfit persons, or is given without proper ceremony, or with disdain, is a gift of the Darkness Mood.

“... Men do not escape from life because life is dull, ... life escapes from men because men are little.” —Thomas Wolfe.

¶ He [Eugene] would go to Exeter or Sydney; sometimes he would go to little towns he had never before visited. He would register at hotels as “Robert Herrick,” “John Donne,” “George Peele,” “William Blake,” and “John Milton.” No one ever said anything to him about it. The people in those towns had such names. Once he registered at a hotel, in a small Piedmont town, as “Ben Jonson.”

The clerk spun the book critically.

“Isn’t there an h in that name?” he said.

“No,” said Eugene. “That’s another branch of the family. I have an uncle, Samuel, who spells his name that way.”

Sometimes, at hotels of ill-repute, he would register, with dark buried glee, as “Robert Browning,” “Alfred Tennyson,” and “William Wordsworth.”

Once he registered as “Henry W. Longfellow.”

“You can’t fool me,” said the clerk, with a hard grin of disbelief. “That’s the name of a writer.”

and losses,

Showing the might of your name unto God in the gay-coloured

Storing the best of your life in a drawer of your desk at the office:

Clarence ~, aged 12, was found locked in an incinerator at Hanover Houses, reportedly placed there by four hoodlums who molested him while he was delivering newspapers, stole his money, and stripped him naked. He was found by a janitor coming to light the incinerator, and was presently revived and able to attend school the next day. Though Clarence suffered no major damage from his incarceration, the residents of Hanover homes and the Neighborhood Council at Baden Street Settlement considered the incident extremely serious. As reported in the newspapers, they asserted that Clarence was the victim of people from outside the Baden Street area, and that in general that area was open to all kinds of disturbances because of inadequate police protection. Quite a storm was raised about this. Now it appears, however, that Clarence, upon closer questioning by the police, admits to having started these fires in the neighborhood, one in the Settlement itself. He also now admits to having put himself in the incinerator, ostensibly to attract attention, or perhaps out of some form of masochistic exhibitionism—note his nudity. A further factor is that his father has just been arrested also, on a morals charge. It seems that for some time he and Clarence have had homosexual relations. This whole situation now puts the Neighborhood Council in a very ridiculous position. They complained about lack of protection from outsiders, when it appears that what they need, rather, is protection against themselves. Poor naked wretches; take physic, pomp; expose thyself to feel what wretches feel.

Warming my feet in front of a truly blazing fire in my fireplace—the first fire of its career. And a foot-warming one it is, too, cackling away, spurt-ing, blistering, now and then throwing out a dangerous spark onto the carpet, making me wish that I had not forgotten the fire screen that still lies useless in fireplace-less 3902. One log is already shriveled red from the heat; the others are encased by semi-circular leaping flames. Now the wood begins to settle a bit—dangerously. I see ashes on my clean white firebrick; soon the hearth will be black with use.

Jeanne Ludmann and I drove up last night in my “new” 1940 Studebaker. She had telegraphed her brother, a student at Middlebury College, to meet her here at midnight, spend the night, and then take her on to her New Hampshire home. He came with a friend at the appointed hour and, since the friend had to return immediately, all took off almost as soon as they came.

A log has just fallen to the edge of my too-narrow hearth. The fire is very hot now. It sears my forehead as I replace the log. Too bad Jeanne could not have stayed. She, too, was disappointed and vowed she would return. All is well.

But all is not well. I found that my cabin had been broken into, or so it appeared. The lock and lock-fixture on the back door had been sheared off. I saw immediately that someone had removed the stovepipe that projected through the south attic window. I went upstairs with trepidation, expecting everything else to be taken, but nothing was. I told Carmans and they immediately said that the culprits were four hunters living across the road, for they had needed stovepipe. The hunters came to see me. The spokesman introduced himself as Kelly, private investigator, and flashed an official-looking card indicating same. He said that he picked up the stovepipe on the road and that he never would think of entering the house. Then he asked how the “culprits” had gotten in. I showed him the broken lock-fixture. “Was that door secured from the inside, when you arrived,” he asked, professionally. “That’s the funny thing,” I said. “It was. And I can’t figure how they got out, because the front door was locked and so were all the windows.” “Doesn’t look like a case of illegal entry, then,” he said, using the correct jargon. I had to agree. We postulated that the burglars had manipulated the pipe from the outside and had drawn it through the window, using Mac’s ladder, which lay conveniently outside. I told the Carmans about Kelly’s statement and they laughed. They told me that he was a supernumerary Post Office official, the kind that delivers parcel posts and the like and that he was a private “eye” of the “send-in-25-cents-and-a-box-top” variety. Most likely he was lying. I still wondered, however, how he got out of the house, for clearly it was impossible to take the pipe off from the outside. Stovepipe sections don’t come apart that easily. I think now that he must have climbed out through the upstairs window have locked it by sticking his arm through the space in the window where the pipe had previously gone through. . . . Another log has just fallen.

Tomorrow I hope to pour a concrete slab for my chimney cap and to complete the struts that will hold it up. Also I must hang the new front door and figure a way to make the back one more secure. After this I want to make window coverings from the old barn wood. It is so wonderful here!

I sent my latest story, “We Too Are Chosen” on to Margot for “merciless criticism.” I await her letter anxiously. I was surprised to find that she still seemed happy to hear from me, and apologized profusely for not having written for so long. When I didn’t hear from her after I saw her last spring, I felt it was because she wanted to break off contact. Apparently I was wrong. Good!

Still no word from Washington regarding my early release. George Willoughby is going to inquire this week.

Sherman, Ken, Fred, and Hal found a bee tree yesterday. Sherman braved the bees’ wrath and stole the cone, escaping with only one sting. Clare placed the cone in a large pan and heated it until the honey separated down from the wax. She then strained the liquor until it became clear: a delicious finished product. . . . I told them that I had a bee tree on my place, too, so today we all went back to the edge of the swamp to look at it. It turned out to be the same one they had found. The top had fallen off and lay open on the ground, exposing both honey and bees. The latter droned industriously over part of the cone, eating the honey that they had manufactured and stored over the past years. Actually most of the honey was already consumed. Sherman said that if we had found the tree a year or two ago we would have captured two or three hundred pounds of honey. As it was, we only got a few jars full.

I went to borrow some butter from the diet kitchen on East III and found there a pretty blonde little thing in a green uniform who looked at me in my blue pajama-like scrub suit and opened up the following conversation by saying, "You look like a teddy-bear." "Why thank you," I said. "How nice of you to think so." "I had a teddy bear when I was a girl in Germany and he had pants on just like that." "Really?" "You've got a face like a teddy-bear, too." "Yeah, but I don't have the bark." "Who knows; maybe you have that, too." "Where were you from in Germany," I asked, in order to leave the teddy-bear world. "The North, near Hamburg." "Oh. I've never been in Germany but I was close, in Arnhem, Holland, just across the Rhine." "When did you come over here?" "I'm an American." "Listen, so am I. I got my papers last week. But where did you come from?" "I was born here. I just went over one summer to work for the Quakers." "Where did your folks come from, then?" "My father from Austria, my mother's family, a long time ago, from Germany, Prussia, and Holland." "See, you look more European than American." "That may be so." "The Quakers are very strict, aren't they?" "No, not so much any more." "Well, I saw some at Niagara Falls and my father told me all about them." "How did you know they were Quakers?" "Buy the simple black dress, buckled shoes, plain hats." "Quakers used to dress like that but very few do now. You probably saw Amish folk or Mennonites, from Pennsylvania." "I always thought Quakers were like that, too. What's Quakerism like? Tell me. I'm interested in things like that. I'm a Lutheran but whenever I can fool my father I go to the Unitarian Church. My father never went to church in Germany but here he's gotten to be a fanatic. Hypocritical, I think. . . . Don't go away. Here, sit down." I sat on the edge of the work-table while she pulled up a chair next to the counter and began folding napkins for the next day. "It's a difficult sect to understand," I said, "because we're neither Protestant nor Catholic. George Fox thought the Catholics worshipped the pope and the Protestants the Bible. He wanted to return to a direct awareness by individual men of God, or what we call the Inner Light. So, you see, we have no creeds, no sermons, no specified churches, no prescribed belief. "Nothing to hold on to at all? Not even something like the Golden Rule?" "No, nothing 'official.' Naturally we follow people and rules and traditions that we think give true insight into the Inner Light, but in the end everything is left up to our own consciences." "It sounds strange. Sometimes I wonder about the Unitarians. They talk too much." "I agree." "It's good to be able to meditate sometimes."

Pete, John Kenyon, Jeanne Ludmann, and I spent the weekend in Toronto, staying overnight at the Friends Center there on Lowther Avenue. Met Reg Smith and wife, and the Brinks. Reg was six years in China with the Friends Service Council during the war. Andrew Brink is a fine Canadian studying English at the University of Toronto, and a staunch C.O. Toronto has a flavor entirely different from Montreal or Quebec, because it is English rather than French: a sort of amalgamation of London and New York, without the class of either. We had very little time there; actually we raced around on the subway and drank beer in a nice jazz place, after eating a Macedonian meal in a little upstairs restaurant served by one tight-dressed waitress. John Kenyan is almost a character out of Huxley: clean-cut, immaculate, "innocent," terribly aesthetic. Probably he has his Maida Vale on Thursday afternoons or if not wished he did (as I do). He is tall and slender, and accentuates this by wearing free-falling English slacks, tightly belted. His face is long and a face of contrasts. It should be a fair face but this initial impression is contradicted by dark hair and a beard that shows even when clean-shaven. Altogether a pleasant contrast: he is good-looking in a non-robust sort of way. He has beautiful long-fingered hands and one feels sometimes that the drafting board is a great compromise for them. They should rather sketch nude women in some garret, sketch them in filmy light carefree strokes, and then caress them in altogether another way. Rather, though, these hands design houses, which is always a compromise, first with the raw materials of construction, which always seem to limit fancy; second with the prospective dweller, who not only limits fancy but directs it and kills it, at least in John's short experience. He is now doing a super-super-duper-duper ice cream parlor, or something similar, all chrome and hideousness. One night he brought a record of Dylan Thomas and we all were hypnotized by the poet's mellifluous voice; another time John read with devotion from Eliot: on still another Jeanne and I lay on pillows on the floor listening twice to Beethoven's 15th quartet, the one in A minor I think, which is truly magnificent, and John sketched us. This was very pleasant. He had to view me from the chin up, as I was on my back with my hands under my head, and this difficult angle hampered the result. But Jeanne lay curled up on her side, cuddling herself almost, her hands between her legs in some kind of fetal security, and this sketch came out very well. Then another time John really surprised us by playing blues on the piano—thin, but blues, very moody. A versatile man! He discusses jazz as an Oxford don would philology. But so do I.

Jeanne is very nice.; She left me a Thanksgiving card with a turkey pasted on, inscribed "To a real human Bien." We drove to Albany with P. G. and I rode to NYC via Greyhound. Talked steadily with the man in the next seat, a writer for Macfadden Publications (True Detective, etc.) who was returning from Lake Placid on an assignment to cover the trooper murderer there. Very interesting, since this fellow was an army major, cultivated, intelligent. He lived in the woods after the murder, had a "spiritual awakening" according to Jay Ettman (the writer), outwitted all the road block people, went to Nevada in a Jaguar, was arrested there on a burglary charge and linked with the Lake Placid crime because he carried a copy of his own "Wanted" notice! A perfect story for the pulps. Ettman quit Arkansas Medical School after two years, had another false start as a doctoral candidate at Columbia, interested in the influence of the Elizabethans on Russian literature, and finally found himself in writing. Though doing pulp stuff, he loves his career and the freedom it gives. Also wrote fiction and hopes to do more.

Arrived NYC at 4:30 a.m., for Thanksgiving reunion. Alice back from college. Our family certainly nicely cosmopolitan and civilized; everyone talks of European cities with knowledge. Eddy Bien has a cute blond daughter, which proves that heredity can be capricious. Bron is more friendly, even freely so. More than Rhoda now. The hell with them all! But the family is good, really. Honigsbergs especially. Irv and Clarise had an argument over Amy. Dad says that Clarise was mainly disturbed because she allowed herself to show emotion. She is the great stone-face kind. Abe and Irene invited Amy to come to Harrison and spend the weekend with Emmy. Knowing, I suppose, that Clarise was the perfect “over-protective mother,” they dressed Amy up secretly and had her practically out of the house before Clarise was told. She immediately objected, her voice a bit broken. Irv and everyone else said she was silly: what reason could there possibly be for keeping Amy home. “She isn’t prepared,” Clarise replied. “She doesn’t have the right clothes.” The others said that this was no reason. Abe had extra rough clothes of Emmy’s that Amy could wear. “I don’t care,” was all Clarise could answer. “I simply don’t want her to go. Please, Irv, go out and bring her back.” Irv tried to argue, and did nothing. Then Grandma, as always, took matters in her hands. She went out and came back with Amy, who seemed happy enough. I later discovered that Grandma told Amy that her mother only wanted to speak to her for a minute. When she returned, of course, Clarise told her she would have to stay home and Amy cried bitterly. Clarise then promised she could go next week, “properly prepared,” Most likely she will spend $50 this week on the most fashionable children’s rustic togs. It must have been very embarrassing for Clarise, and Irv also, to have this family squabble and show of emotion in the midst of a family reunion with all the in-laws watching.

Opening paragraph from Hemingway’s Farewell to Arms:

¶ In the late summer of that year we lived in a house in a village that looked across the river and the plain to the mountains. In the bed of the river there were pebbles and boulders, dry and white in the sun, and the water was clear and swiftly moving and blue in the channels. Troops went by the house and down the road and the dust they raised powdered the leaves of the trees. The trunks of the trees too were dusty and the leaves fell early that year and we saw troops marching along the road and the dust rising and leaves, stirred by the breeze, falling and the soldiers marching and afterward the road bare and white except for the leaves.

Magnificent writing!

I dated the “Teddy Bear” girl, whose name is Ronnie. “My father is very strict,” she told me. “He will not let me go out with anyone he has not met.” So I first had to go to meet the father and mother. The father seemed friendly enough, but Ronnie told me he always was that way to strangers, but quite the opposite at home. He reminded me a little of Mr. Kleefstra, but only because he was so self-conscious about the threadbare furniture. He seemed a man mainly intent on keeping up appearances, but who hadn't kept them up at all and who therefore ruled tyrannically and grumblingly over a frightened family, as his last means of maintaining self-respect. We discussed the "finishing" school Ronnie is to go to in Sweden next year; and when I mentioned my interest in reaching Groningen via Bremenhaven, he sent Ronnie upstairs for a huge atlas and proceeded to give a detailed description of North German geography. All this time Ronnie sat next to me on the couch, her knee pressed surreptitiously against mine, her face betraying the most despairing look. I began wondering when the time would come when the father would announce his verdict, whether or not I could take Ronnie out. Gradually it occurred to me that the parents assumed I had merely come to spend the evening at their home. Ronnie brought out her sewing, as if to clinch the matter. She too had given up hope. We went into the kitchen to prepare some tea and I asked when we could leave. The mother overheard and, being pretty much in sympathy with Ronnie, said it looked pretty hopeless, but we could at least ask the father. This I did. "She must be in bed at 10:00 on school nights," he said. It was then 9:00. "We'll be back at 10:30," I offered, and then gave all kinds of excuses about having to work the rest of the week, and leaving Rochester so soon. There was a clandestine conference in the kitchen and Ronnie emerged radiantly triumphant. We dashed off in my car to Atkinson Street and found that Al Yuriat and John Kenyon had dropped in. We all laughed at Ronnie's plight—the Victorian father. She, I think, was rather overawed by such erudite, "aged" company. She looked very sad and lost there for a while. I suggested we leave and once outside she announced that her main distress was because she wanted to go to the bathroom. Once divulged, this was a need easily remedied. We drove home and indulged awhile in the most deliciously passionate French kisses. For a meek over-protected lassie she certainly can be passionate! I saw her again at the hospital. Tomorrow, since her father goes to night school, we shall be able to go out again, provided she gets back before he does. Two dates on school nights would be unthinkable!

I received my notice of discharge on November 26th. I shall leave Rochester this Saturday and sail to Rotterdam on the Rijndam, December 13th. I act and feel free, now that I am free! I wonder in how many operations I have scrubbed. After Friday I shall probably never do it again. I went to the record book. I've scrubbed in 181 operations to date. Tomorrow, Thursday, and Friday should bring the grand total close to 200.

I dreamt last night about a man, whom let's call Frank, who deposits his attractive wife each day on a pier by the sea, while he goes away to work. Tim, a young man who is in charge of the pier, arranges tackle and bait for the young wife, Jane, fishes beside her, and falls in love. One day Jane is wading in deep water while Tim stands on the pier holding his line. Suddenly a giant swordfish of some kind bites the hook and is caught. It struggles furiously as Tim begins to wind in the reel. By doing so, however, Tim brings the fish too close to Jane, who screams at him, "Reel it out, reel it out!" Too late. The fish pierces Jane's arm with his sword. Tim rescues Jane and is frantic for fear that the fish also injected some poison. The husband, Frank, is called. He does not show much concern. Tim, however, who really loves Jane, is beside himself. Eventually Jane recovers and, realizing which man is really devoted to her, marries Tim.

Bill caught by Joe in adultery with Joe's wife. In Gypsy custom an adulterer is required to wear the black shirt for one day. While he wears it he can be killed by anyone. If he survives the day he is free. But people who wear the black shirt never survive. . . . The elders, acting as a tribunal, sentence Bill to wear the black shirt. But Steve, the Gypsy chief, feels the offense is so serious that Bill must also pay $200, his entire fortune, to Joe. Bill does so and Joe leaves. Then Steve decides he acted too harshly. He tells Bill to go and get the money back from Joel. Bill leaves. Eventually both Bill and Joe return. They are bloody and battered, but Joe still has the money. Steve tells Joe that since he was so successful in holding on to and protecting his money, he obviously could have done as much for his wife. Since he was negligent in this respect his rival, Bill, was not entirely to blame for what happened. Consequently Steve relieves Bill from having to wear the black shirt, but since he did do wrong, makes him pay the $200 after all. —An example of Gypsy justice.

A woman comes to visit a doctor, socially. She tells, in passing, that she has had mysterious flashes in her eyes. "That's probably from the cortisone we've been giving you," the doctor explains. Nothing more is said about it. The company are in good spirits and the woman begins telling funny stories. She is very good at this. When she describes the episode of her husband and their dog, she has everyone doubled over with laughter. It seems her husband hates dogs passionately, but has succumbed to his wife's desire to keep one. They buy a mutt, who the husband keeps at a good distance. But the wife is devoted to her dog and heartbroken one day when it disappears. She calls the ASPCA frantically, describing the animal, quoting the license number, etc. The next morning, sure enough, an ASPCA man knocks at the door and informs the wife that her dog was picked up and brought to the pound. She will have until 5 p.m. that evening to claim it; otherwise it will be gassed. The woman works in the afternoon, far from the pound. But her husband's office is right in the same neighborhood. She will call her husband. Surely he won't refuse. She calls. He is worn down by her entreaties and consents to rescue the detested animal. "How will I get it home in the subway?" he asks. "Make a box and put it in," the wife suggests. "That way you'll get in." The husband gets the dog and puts it in the box and starts for the subway. But the dog won't stay in the box. The husband pushes it back in. Its leg hangs out. The husband practically breaks it in two, but stuffs it in. When this is done the dog breaks out again, this time in the subway. The husband is desperate. Quickly, he shortens upon the leash considerably, faces himself in the direction of the turnstile, closes his eyes, and goes in as a blind man with a limping seeing-eye dog. When the wife comes home and sees the dog there she is overjoyed. "But why is it limping?" The husband explains, reciting the whole adventure. The woman is finished and everyone is howling, even her husband, who still hates the dog. After a few more drinks and some pleasant farewells, the woman leaves with her husband. I then go to the doctor and ask, "What was this business about flashing in her eyes. Does cortisone do that?" "Not really," the doctor said. "Then why did you tell her what you did?" "Well, you, see," the doctor replied, "we're giving her cortisone and then telling her most of her symptoms are side-effects of the drug. The drug itself can't do any good anymore." "What symptoms? What does she have, anyway?" "We haven't told her yet: she has leukemia."

Margot should be in Washington State now, waiting for her army fiancé. They'll marry and he'll ship out soon. If he goes to Japan, she'll follow. I spent an evening with her last week—very pleasant and free-flowing—though I was a bit jealous of the lucky fellow. Actually she doesn't know him very well; it's mainly a correspondence wedding. I wish them luck.

Wednesday, just before leaving Rochester, I took Ronnie out to the barge canal outside of town and we talked and necked and mooched and kissed passionately and appreciated the moon and the serenity of the waters. She was very sweet indeed. I wonder, had I met her earlier, how long this passion would have lasted.

Friday night, dressed in a tux, I called on Elizabeth Clark. She had invited me to the formal prom at University School. I felt like playing along, and accepted. I found her dressed in sweater and dungarees. She said the prom was Saturday and that I had misunderstood. I stayed anyway at her invitation and lay down on the bed to rest, for the night before Jeanne Ludmann, John Kenyon, Nancy and Peter had given a party for me and there had been very little sleep. Elizabeth Clark soon joined me on the bed and one thing led to another until she became absolutely madly passionate and I responded as best I could. She stripped and asked me if I thought she had a nice figure. I lied, "Yes." She didn't have a climax during intercourse, but I hardly think it was my fault, but rather the result of entertaining too many men. The next day I packed and left Rochester for good.

From Rainer Maria Rilke, Letters to Benvenuta:

¶ Just as some dogs eat only when someone makes a gesture as though to take the food from their dish, we reached for each other only because there was disease in the world and incalculable danger, because someone was always dying, and because there were so many strange ways of drifting apart over all this. What joined us in this fashion must have been, above all, a kind of fear. . . . It was clear, moreover, . . . that the future was altogether unknown, and one sought to get that future into one's power, while it was still quite small, that it might grow up under restraint, as it were, never coming to know its own untamed character.

¶ I must take my own good time in writing you, the words coming like the first heavy drops from the charged wine-press of my past.

¶ How do we spend the centuries? Where is he among us who dare speak of love? Verily, nature speaks not of love; nature bears it in her heart and no one knows the heart of nature. Verily, God bears love in the world, yet the world overwhelms us. Verily, the mother speaks not of love, for it is borne for her within the child, and the child destroys it. Verily, the spirit speaks not of love, for the spirit thrusts it into the future, and the future is remote. Verily, the lover speaks not of love, for to the lover it comes in sorrow, and sorrow sheds tears. Hush, hush—oh, it is music, then, that would speak! But when music speaks, she speaks not to us. The perfect work of art touches upon us only in that it survives us. A poem enters into language from within, in an aspect forever averted from us. It fills the language wondrously, rising to its very brim—but it never again thrusts toward us. Colors are congealed in a picture, but they are broidered into it like rain into the countryside; and all that the sculptor shows his stone is how it may most splendidly hold itself aloof. Music, indeed, is closer to our heart . . . but how much of her is beyond our reach, pushes just past us, carries right through us—and we comprehend it not!

¶ Last night I lay awake for some time, pondering the sorrows of your childhood. My heart circled them at a distance, as a lion prowls about a fire in the desert by night.

¶ The questioning and buffeting and experimenting [of children] assumes that grown-ups shall be possessed of the most wonderful equanimity, the most perfect serenity, indeed, some kind of finality.

¶ Dear girl, I shall keep on addressing to your heart this incomprehensible journal of the life I would live . . . seek to tell you about myself truthfully, make myself brutally true to you, true do you hear? — rather than worthy of being loved — as though, within your heart, I might for the first time make myself plain to God, that he know me. Lord, Lord, I would say, behold the naked metal of my being—how it has rung against the pavement like a coin tossed to a beggar.

¶ . . . remember, you are dealing with a convalescent, taking his first faltering steps into joy, gently leaning on your shoulder.

¶ . . . a powerful concentration of the mind sometimes sweeps away the sense of one's own body, leaving only the inexhaustible effort issuing from some innermost point of existence. . . .

I was riding in the subway when a beggar woman with a tin cup walked down the aisle playing the accordion. I did not contribute, moreover felt ashamed to do so (also ashamed afterward that I did not). I wonder wherefore comes this hardening of the heart. It has happened before.

A really beautiful girl sat next to me in the subway, the kind that is usually called “dumb blonde.” She was reading the editorials in the New York Times and got off at Chambers Street. Not so dumb!

The man on the other side was reading over a Blue Cross form. He had just left the hospital. People’s pasts and hopes are thus revealed, as when I read over the Fellowship Applications.

Read and re-read Carson McCullers’ “The Sojourner.” This is really fine writing. Exceptional. The reader is really allowed to anatomize Ferris.

“Although it is often claimed that reading novels is a form of escape, this is not necessarily so. Novels provide the basis for growth, experiences that can be full and rich. For serious novels challenge us with the realities of life that are smoothed over, simplified, falsified, and ignored by the platitudes and frozen conventions of everyday life. The good and, more so even, the great novel is, then, a challenge to the reader. It truthfully forces upon his attention a segment of living experience. It does this by depicting peoples with whom we can identify. And at the same time the novel humanizes the world. It brings us back to a refreshed sense of the source of all significant artistic and intellectual effort—the struggles, aspirations, joys, and sorrows of human beings. If we are to live with quickened sympathies and with live interest in the world, we constantly need to be reminded that all of this with which we are dealing relates, in the last analysis, to men and women, to human beings. We need to restore, to deepen, and the keep clear our sense of this all-important truism.” —James T. Farrell in Reflections at Fifty.

Had some new ideas for mechanical music-turner. Instead of relying on some adhesive to stick to pages, provide small metal clips that would be attached beforehand to pages. These to respond to magnetic pull of turner arm. The magnetism, in turn, could be started or stopped at will by breaking or making an electric current. The arm itself could be controlled by a cable similar to the cable releases on cameras or, better still, some simple hydraulic device. The foot pedal to push in the cable would also control the various circuits. When the arm turned the page its magnetism would have to cease, and it would probably have to lift up to clear the page and return to the original position. At this time a stationary magnet on the left hand side could be activated to keep the turned page from falling back. The arm would have to be adjustable for width of music, and the pivot bar for height. A spring would bring back the arm and thus the cable also. An oil cable would probably work better than sheathed wire, since the whole cable would be bent at several places getting from the music rack to the floor.

From Thomas Mann, “Death in Venice”:

¶ A solitary, unused to speaking of what he sees and feels, has mental experiences which are at once more intense and less articulate than those of a gregarious man. They are sluggish, yet more wayward, and never without a melancholy tinge. Sights and impressions which others brush aside with a glance, a light comment, a smile, occupy him more than their due; they sink silently in, they take on meaning, they become experience, emotion, adventure. Solitude gives birth to the original in us, to beauty unfamiliar and perilous—to poetry. But also, it gives birth to the opposite: to the perverse, the illicit, the absurd.

¶ [He pondered] the mysterious harmony that must come to subsist between the individual human being and the universal law, in order that human beauty may result.

¶ His love for the ocean had profound sources: the hard-worked artist's longing for rest, his yearning to seek refuge from the thronging manifold shapes of his fancy in the bosom of the simple and vast; and another yearning, opposed to his art and perhaps for that very reason a lure, for the unorganized, the immeasurable, the eternal—in short, for nothingness. He whose preoccupation is with excellence longs fervently to find rest in perfection; and is not nothingness a form of perfection?

¶ Soon the observer knew every line and pose of this form that limned itself so freely against sea and sky; its every loveliness, though conned by heart, yet thrilled him each day afresh; his admiration knew no bounds, the delight of his eye was unending. Once the lad was summoned to speak to a guest who was waiting for his mother at their cabin. He ran up, ran dripping wet out of the sea, tossing his curls, and put out his hand, standing with his weight on one leg, resting the other foot on the toes; as he stood there in a posture of suspense the turn of his body was enchanting, while his features wore a look half shamefaced, half conscious of the duty breeding laid upon him to please. Or he would lie at full length, with his bath-robe around him, one slender young arm resting on the sand, his chin in the hollow of his hand; the lad they called Jaschiu squatting beside him, paying him court. There could be nothing lovelier on earth than the smile and look with which the playmate thus singled out rewarded his humble friend and vassal. Again, he might be at the water's edge, alone, removed from his family, quite close to Aschenbach; standing erect, his hands clasped at the back of his neck, rocking slowly on the balls of his feet, day-dreaming away with blue space, while little waves ran up and bathed his toes. The ringlets of honey-coloured hair clung to his temples and neck, the fine down along the upper vertebrae was yellow in the sunlight; the thin envelope of flesh covering the torso betrayed the delicate outlines of the ribs and the symmetry of the breast-structure. His armpits were still as smooth as a statue's, smooth the glistening hollows behind the knees, where the blue network of veins suggested that the body was formed of some stuff more transparent than mere flesh. What discipline, what precision of thought were expressed by the tense youthful perfection of this form! And yet the pure, strong will which had laboured in darkness and succeeded in bringing this godlike work of art to the light of day—was it not known and familiar to him, the artist? Was not the same force at work in himself when he strove in cold fury to liberate from the marble mass of language the slender forms of his art which he saw with the eye of his mind and would body forth to men as the mirror and image of spiritual beauty?

R.M.S. Queen Elizabeth, mid-Atlantic

From Mann's "Tonio Kröger," poorly written, I think, but valuable for certain things, among which the following:

¶ To feel stirring within you the wonderful and melancholy play of strange forces and to be aware that those others you yearn for are blithely inaccessible to all that moves you—what a pain is this!

¶ Happiness . . . is not in being loved—which is satisfaction of the vanity and mingled with disgust. Happiness is in loving, and perhaps in snatching fugitive little approaches to the beloved object.

¶ He surrendered utterly to the power that to him seemed the highest on earth, top whose service he felt called, which promised him elevation and honours: the power of intellect, the power of the word, that lords it with a smile over the unconscious and inarticulate. To this power he surrendered with the passion of youth, and it rewarded him with all it had to give, taking from him inexorably, in return, all that it is wont to take. It sharpened his eyes and made him see through the large words which puff out the bosoms of mankind; it opened for him men's souls and his own, made him clairvoyant, showed him the inwardness of the world and the ultimate behind men's words and deeds. And all he saw could be put in two words: the comedy and the tragedy of life. And then, with knowledge, its torment and its arrogance, came solitude, because he could not endure the blithe and innocent with their darkened understanding, while they in turn were troubled by the sign on his brow. But his love of the word kept growing, sweeter and sweeter, and his love of form; for he used to say that knowledge of the soul would unfailingly make us melancholy if the pleasures of expression did not keep us alert and of good cheer.

¶ He worked, not like a man who works that he may live; but as one who is bent on doing nothing but work; having no regard for himself as a human being but only as a creator; moving about grey and unobtrusive among his fellows like an actor without his make-up, who counts for nothing as soon as he stops representing something else. He worked withdrawn out of sight and sound of the small fry, for whom he felt nothing but contempt, because to them a talent was a social asset like another; who, whether they were poor or not, went about ostentatiously shabby or else flaunted starling cravats, all the time taking jolly good care to amuse themselves, to be artistic and charming without the smallest notion of the fact that good work comes out under pressure of a bad life; that he who lives does not work; that one must die to life in order to be utterly a creator.

¶ If you care too much about what you have to say, if your heart is too much in it, you can be pretty sure of making a mess. . . . Warm, heartfelt feeling is always banal and futile. . . . The artist must be unhuman, extra-human; he must stand in a queer aloof relationship to our humanity; only so is he in a position . . . to represent it, to portray it, to good effect.

I've been wondering about building a story on the Riek-Jeanne relationship. To wit: The relationship, one of youthful one-way infatuation, kept alive with Riek though without any return of love on my part—rather a desperate clinging that obviously could come to nothing. The coincidence that delayed the Holland visit, the letter to Jeanne, her almost begging off on the phone because of not wanting to have another boyfriend at hand, her arrival, and the instantaneous passionate deep love that sprang therewith.

I suppose even what's to come now could fit into the picture—absence from Jeanne, and how to deal with Riek in these circumstances. My character could be weaker even than I am and could go to Riek again, as to a dead end, only to be redeemed at last by the real love of Jeanne. Or else, I suppose, Jeanne could die, or by an ironic duplication of his own behavior, she could string him along for a while and finally go to someone else.

Yes, there is the whole problem here of unreciprocated love coupled with sexual need and moral weakness on the part of the loved-but-not-loving one.

Of course the danger of embarking on something like this is that it is too close to my own heart. Tonio Kröger would certainly disapprove.

The Clarise-Amy story would be good to tackle next. This will be difficult, too, but for different reasons. It's hard to delineate the character of a child, whose needs are so often un-articulate. Perhaps best to use the issue of over-protecting Amy as a source of marital difficulty between Irv and Clarise. Clarise very cold in all ways, even toward Amy. But she “devotes” herself to the child’s “welfare” as a substitute for an unhappy marriage. I don’t know where grandma should come in. Clarise resents Irv’s attentions to grandma, to whom he is very close because he was the youngest child and because he lived with her many years after his unsuccessful first marriage.

Been speaking with Wilford Wellock, who’s interested in the economic order and particularly the fact that mass production leads to a quantitative civilization whereas Gandhi’s economics—self-sufficient semi-autonomous villages—leads to qualitative civilization and to democracy. Gandhi stated that mass production makes a machine out of men, degrading their human capabilities. The machine, instead, must be the servant of the craftsman and wealth should rest on the production of creative articles and skills by people working at home and in small village industries.

The bedroom steward held forth this morning on his troubles, long hours, low pay, etc. But he told interesting stories of human character at its lowest. Once, he said, there was a beautiful girl about 20 or 22 years old in one of his cabins. The very first night she rings her buzzer and he goes to the cabin and knocks. “Who is it?” she says. “The steward, m’am.” “Come in.” He walks in and finds her stark naked on the bed, in a provocative position. She motioned to him, indicating clearly what she wanted, but he, knowing the company rule against fraternization with the passengers, refused and left. But at another time during the voyage when another steward was on duty she did the same thing. He had less willpower and he undressed and got into bed with her. As soon as he did she rang the buzzer again furiously and began screaming “Rape, rape.” Someone came and “caught” the steward. He was fired. She apparently had no other motive in doing all this than to do harm to someone, anyone—and in this case her wish was fulfilled.

Another story involved an older steward, a man of about 65, on the first class deck. A wealthy doctor was traveling with his family, which included an 8-year-old girl who had not yet reached puberty. After each trip the stewards collect things like balloons, toys, candy, etc. left in the cabins so that they can give these things to children on the following voyage. They store their collection in cupboards in the hall. Well, this elderly steward wanted to give the doctor's daughter something, so she came into the cupboard with him to select what she wanted. She found something and left. Just as she did, however, her father was walking down the corridor. He saw first his daughter and then the steward leave the cupboard. He grabbed his daughter into the stateroom, furious. In a few minutes he called the purser to report that he had examined the child and that she had been raped. The child vigorously protested that she had not been attacked in any way; that the steward had merely given her a present. The steward, however, was immediately put into the brig for the remainder of the voyage, and then fired. The ship authorities suggested that the ship surgeon also examine the child, but her father refused. The steward, meanwhile, having had some legal advice, sued Cunard for false imprisonment and collected £350. Then he flew to America and sued the doctor and collected $30,000. Cunard offered him back his job, but he refused and with the money built a cottage on the south shore of England, where he could watch the ships sail in and out and where he and his wife lived happily ever after.

I'm quite at home on the boat now, settled into its routine and sorry in a way that we shall land tomorrow and that I shall have to make new adjustments, first in London for a few days and then at Woodbrooke. My impressions of this voyage are in a long long letter to Jeanne and thus in a place where they will be shared rather than in the closed book of this Journal.

The snow came as a silent, orderly Milky Way, descending slowly outside my window and passing through the earth.

God as mother-fixation. Rest on the broad bosom of Nature.

From Alfred North Whitehead, Science and the Modern World:

¶ The middle class pessimism over the future of the world comes from a confusion between civilization and security.

¶ [The evils of the industrial revolution were] partly the result of aesthetic errors of Protestantism and partly the result of scientific materialism, and partly the result of the natural greed of mankind, and partly the result of the abstractions of political economy.

¶ The self-identity of a human being is more abstract than that of a crystal. It is the life of the spirit. It relates rather to the individualization of the creative activity; so that the changing circumstances received from the environment are differentiated from the living personality, and are thought of as forming its perceived field. In truth, the field of perception and the perceiving mind are abstractions which, in the concrete, combine into the successive bodily events. The psychological field, as restricted to sense-objects and passing emotions, is the minor permanence, barely rescued from the nonentity of mere change; and the mind is the major permanence, permeating that complete field, whose endurance is the living soul. But the soul would wither without fertilization from its transient experiences. The secret of the higher organisms lies in their two grades of permanence. By this means the freshness of the environment is absorbed into the permanence of the soul. The changing environment is no longer, by reason of its variety, an enemy to the endurance of the organism. The pattern of the higher organism has retreated into the recesses of the individualized activity. It has become a uniform way of dealing with circumstances; and this way is only strengthened by having a proper variety of circumstances to deal with.

¶ A single tree by itself is dependent upon all the adverse chances of shifting circumstances. A forest is the triumph of the organization of mutually dependent species. Each tree may lose something of its individual perfection of growth, but they mutually assist each other in preserving the conditions for survival.

¶ There is something in the ready use of force which defeats its own object. Its main defect is that it bars cooperation. Every organism requires an environment of friends, partly to shield it from violent changes, and partly to supply it with its wants. The Gospel of Force is incompatible with a social life. By force, I mean antagonism in its most general sense. . . . In the history of the world, the prize has not gone to those species which specialized in methods of violence, or even in defensive armour.

From Bertrand Russell, A Free Man's Worship:

¶ The worship of Force . . . is the result of failure to maintain our own ideals against a hostile universe; it is itself a prostrate submission to evil. . . . If Power is bad, as it seems to be, let us reject it from our hearts. In this lies man's true freedom: in determination to worship only the God created by our own love of the good. . . . In action, in desire, we must submit perpetually to the tyranny of outside forces; but in thought, in aspiration, we are free.

¶ When, without the bitterness of impotent rebellion, we have learnt both to resign ourselves to the outward rule of Fate and to recognize that the non-human world is unworthy of our worship, it becomes possible to transform and refashion the unconscious universe. . . . In all the multiform facts of the world—in the visual shapes of trees and mountains and clouds, in the events of the life of man, even in the very omnipotence of Death—the insight of creative idealism can find the reflection of a beauty which its own thoughts first made. In this way mind asserts its subtle mastery over the thoughtless forces of Nature.

¶ To take into the inmost shrine of the soul the irresistible forces whose puppets we seem to be—Death and change, the irrevocableness of the past, and the powerlessness of man before the blind hurry of the universe from vanity to vanity—to feel these things and know them is to conquer them. This is the reason why the Past has such magical power. The beauty of its motionless and silent pictures is like the enchanted purity of late autumn, when the leaves, though one breath would make them fall, still flow against the sky in golden glory. The Past does not change or strive; like Duncan, after life's fitful fever it sleeps well; what was eager and grasping, what was petty and transitory, has faded away, the things that were beautiful and eternal shine out of it like stars in the night. Its beauty, to a soul not worthy of it, is unendurable; but to a soul which has conquered fate it is the key of religion.

¶ To abandon the struggle for private happiness, to expel all eagerness of temporary desire, to burn with passion for eternal things—this is emancipation, and this is the free man's worship.

From Thomas Hardy, Far from the Madding Crowd:

¶ “Yes, I knew that,” she said, panting like a robin, her face red and moist from the exertions, like a peony petal before the sun dries off the dew.

¶ . . . his humility, and superfluous moiety of honesty.

¶ Seeing his advance take the form of an attitude threatening a possible enclosure, if not compression, of her person, she edged off round the bush.

¶ She contracted a yawn to an inoffensive smallness so that it was hardly ill-mannered at all. “I don't love you,” she said.

From Edith Wharton, The Age of Innocence (this is really good):

¶ The immense accretion of flesh which had descended on her in middle life like a flood of lava on a doomed city had changed her from a plump active little woman with a neatly-turned foot and ankle into something as vast and august as a natural phenomenon. She had accepted this submergence as philosophically as all her other trials, and now, in extreme old age, was rewarded by presenting to her mirror an almost unwrinkled expanse of firm pink and white flesh, in the centre of which the traces of a small face survived as if awaiting excavation. A flight of smooth double chins led down to the dizzy depths of a still-snowy bosom veiled in snowy muslins that were held in place by a miniature portrait of the late Mr. Mingott; and around and below, wave after wave of black silk surged away over the edges of a capacious armchair, with two tiny white hands poised like gulls on the surface of the billows.

This certainly fulfills Flaubert's injunction to de Maupassant, thus: Having laid down the truth that in the entire world there are no two grains of sand, two flies, two hands, or two noses entirely alike, he compelled me to describe a creature or an object so particularized as to distinguish it from all others of its species or class. He used to say, “When you pass a grocer seated on his doorstep, or a concierge smoking his pipe, or a cabstand, show me that grocer and that concierge in all their physical appearance and in all their moral nature so that I shall not confound that grocer and that concierge with any other, and make me see by a single word in what a hackney coach horse differs from the fifty others that go before and come after.

¶ God is the mirror which discloses to every creature its own greatness. —A. N. Whitehead.

From Rigveda, X, 126,-6.7, Hymn of Creation:

¶ Who verily knows and who can here declare it, whence it was born, and whence comes this creation?

the gods are later than this world's production, who knows, then, when it first came into being?

He, the first origin of this creation, whether he formed it all or did not form it, whose eye controls the world in highest heaven, he verily knows it, or perhaps he knows it not.

¶ As water does not cling to the lotus leaf, so no evil deed clings to one who knows it [i.e. the Atman]. —Chandogya Upanishad IV. 14. 3.

Faulkner in “Barn Burning” opens with an active dramatic scene that makes the reader want to continue on with the story; then he develops a situation (the ruining of Major de Spain’s rug) that must inevitably develop into something, given what went before. This keeps the suspense up: to see how it did develop. I’ve tended to have a straight line of development, whereas Faulkner does something more like a small rise followed by a large one that propels the story to its end. He also uses weight metaphors:

- swinging on a vine out into space and remaining there because gravity stops working; then suddenly swinging back;
- being too light to face up to the environment and change it, but too heavy to fly free and escape altogether;

In addition, Faulkner treats minor and even insignificant characters by repeating one characteristic—e.g., the bovine stupidity and obesity of the sisters; the older brother always chewing tobacco. Also of major characters, but here there is more than one peculiarity: the father’s heavy tread on his lame foot, his aspect like a piece of tin when he wore the black frock coat and hat.

From Erich Fromm, Psychoanalysis and Religion:

¶ I want to show in these pages that it is not true that we have to give up the concern for the soul if we do not accept the tenets of religion. The psychoanalyst is in a position to study the human reality behind religion as well as behind non-religious symbol systems. He finds that the question is not whether man returns to religion and believes in God but whether he lives love and thinks truth. If he does so the symbol systems he uses are of secondary importance. If he does not they are of no importance.

¶ . . . religion [is] any system of thought and action shared by a group which gives the individual a frame of orientation and an object of devotion.

¶ Self-awareness, reason, and imagination have disrupted the 'harmony' which characterizes animal existence. Their emergence has made man into an anomaly, into the freak of the universe. He is part of nature, subject to her physical laws and unable to change them, yet he transcends the rest of nature. He is set apart while being a part; he is homeless, yet chained to the home he shares with all creatures. . . . Never is he free from the dichotomy of his existence: he cannot rid himself of his mind, even if he should want to; he cannot rid himself of his body as long as he is alive—and his body makes him want to be alive.

. . . Man is the only animal that can be bored, discontented. . . . He cannot go back to the pre-human state of harmony with nature; he must proceed to develop his reason until he becomes the master of nature, and of himself.

. . . There is no innate 'drive for progress' in man; it is the contradiction in his existence that makes him proceed on the way he set out. Having lost paradise, the unity with nature, he has become the eternal wanderer (Odysseus, Oedipus, Abraham, Faust); he is impelled to go forward and with everlasting effort to make the unknown known by filling in with answers the blank spaces of his knowledge. . . . He is tormented by a craving for 'absoluteness,' for another kind of harmony which can lift the curse by which he was separated from nature, from his fellow men, and from himself. . . . Devotion to an aim, or an idea, or a power transcending man such as God, is an expression of this need for completeness in the process of living.

¶ Freud interpreted religion as a collective childhood neurosis of mankind. But the statement can also be reversed. We can interpret neurosis as a private form of religion, as a regression to primitive forms of religion conflicting with officially recognized patterns of religious thought.

¶ Authoritarian religion [is] recognition on the part of man of some higher unseen power as having control of his destiny, and as being entitled to obedience, reverence, and worship. . . . The essential element is the surrender to a power transcending man. The main virtue of this type of religion is obedience. In the act of surrender [man] loses his independence [I question this because, for instance, in marriage one surrenders individuality seemingly but actually functions better as an individual because of the love-relationship] and integrity as an individual but he gains the feeling of being protected by an awe-inspiring power of which, as it were, he becomes a part.

Humanistic religion, on the contrary, is centered around man and his strength. Man must develop his power of reason [“reason” meaning more than “intellect,” I hope] in order to understand himself, his relationship to his fellow men and his position in the universe. He must recognize the truth, both with regard to his limitations and his potentialities. He must develop his powers of love for others as well as for himself and experience the solidarity of all living beings. He must have principles and norms to guide him in this aim. . . . Religious experience in this kind of religion is the experience of oneness with the All, based on one’s relatedness to the world as it is grasped with thought and with love. Man’s aim in humanistic religion is to achieve the greatest strength, not the greatest powerlessness; virtue in self-realization, not obedience. Faith is certainty of conviction based on one’s experience of thought and feeling, not assent to propositions on credit of the proposer. The prevailing mood is that of joy, while the prevailing mood in authoritarian religion is that of sorrow and of guilt.

Inasmuch as humanistic religions are theistic, God is a symbol of man’s own powers that he tries to realize in this life. Illustrations of humanistic religions are early Buddhism, Taoism, the teachings of Isaiah, Jesus, Socrates, Spinoza, certain trends in the Jewish and Christian religions (particularly mysticism), the religion of Reason of the French Revolution. . . . What matters in all such systems is not the thought system as such but the human attitude underlying their doctrines.

¶ [For Spinoza) God is identical with the totality of the universe. Man must see his own limitations and recognize that he is dependent on the totality of forces outside himself over which he has no control. Yet his are the powers of love and of reason. He can develop them and obtain an optimum of freedom and of inner strength.

¶ God is not a symbol of power over man but of man’s own powers—his potentiality, or what he ought to become.

¶ The real fall of man is his alienation from himself, his submission to power, his turning against himself even though under the guise of a worship of God.

¶ Just as a parent’s consciously felt or expressed concern for a child can be an expression of love or can express a wish for control and domination, a religious statement can be expressive of opposite human attitudes. We do not discard that statement but look at it in perspective, the human reality behind it providing the third dimension. Particularly concerning the sincerity of the postulate of love the words hold true: "By their fruits shall ye know them." If religious teachings contribute to the growth, strength, freedom, and happiness of their believers, we see the fruits of love. If they contribute to the constriction of human potentialities, to unhappiness and lack of productivity, they cannot be born of love, regardless of what the dogma intends to convey.

¶ Both in humanistic religious thinking and in psychoanalysis man's ability to search for the truth is held to be inseparably linked to the attainment of freedom and independence.

¶ It would be a mistake to assume that only those who are 'neurotic' have failed in the task of self-emancipation, while the average well-adjusted person has succeeded in it. On the contrary, the vast majority of people in our culture are well adjusted because they have given up the battle for independence sooner and more radically than the neurotic person. They have accepted the judgment of the majority so completely that they have been spared the sharp pain of conflict which the neurotic person goes through. While they are healthy from the standpoint of adjustment, they are more sick than the neurotic person from the standpoint of the realization of their aims as human beings. Can theirs then be a perfect solution? It would be if it were possible to ignore the fundamental laws of human existence without damage. But that is not possible. The "adjusted" person who does not live by the truth and who does not love is protected only from manifest conflicts. If he is not engrossed in work he has to use the many avenues of escape which our culture offers in order to be protected from the frightening experience of being alone with himself and looking into the abyss of his own impotence and human impoverishment.

¶ All great religions have proceeded from the negative formulation of incest taboos to more positive formulations of freedom. [Fromm expounds Freud's concept of incest to cover all interpersonal relations, sexual or not, which tend to thwart a man from assuming his own intellectual and/or physical responsibilities in life, because he rather accepts the protection and authority of another father, God, state, club, etc.]

the very principles of freedom as soon as they become mass organizations governed by a religious bureaucracy. The religious organization and the men who represent it take over to some extent the place of family, tribe, and state. They keep men in bondage instead of leaving them free. It is no longer God who is worshipped but the group that claims to speak in his name.

¶ The real conflict is not between belief in God and “atheism” but between a humanistic, religious attitude and an attitude which is equivalent to idolatry regardless of how this attitude is expressed—or disguised—in conscious thought.

¶ God is like the horizon which sets the limitations of our sight. To the naïve mind it seems to be something real which can be grasped, yet to seek the horizon is to seek a mirage. When we move, the horizon moves. The idea that God cannot be defined is clearly expressed in the biblical story of God’s revelation to Moses. . . . Moses asks for a name because a name is something one can grasp and worship (see Exod. iii 13–14), “And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM” (more accurate translation: “I am being that I am being”—viz. my name is Nameless). In the development of Christian and Jewish theology we find repeated attempts to achieve a purer concept of God by avoiding even a trace of positive description or definition of God (Plotinus, Maimonides). As the great German mystic, Meister Eckhart, put it: “that which one says is God, he is not; that which one does not say of him he is more truly than that which one says he is.” No man can presume to have any knowledge of God which permits him to criticize or condemn his fellow men or to claim his own idea of God is the only right one. The religious intolerance so characteristic of Western religions, which springs from such claims and, psychologically speaking, stems from lack of faith or lack of love, has had a devastating effect on religious development. It has led to a new form of idolatry. An image of god, not in wood and stone but in words, is erected so that people worship at this shrine— . . . the deification of things, of partial aspects of the world and man’s submission to such things, in contrast to an attitude in which his life is devoted to the realization of the highest principles of life, those of love and reason, to the aim of becoming what man potentially is, a being made in the likeness of God. Words can become idols, and machines can become idols: leaders, the state, power, and political groups may also serve. Science and the opinion of one's neighbors can become idols, and God has become an idol for many.

In Intruder in the Dust Faulkner again opens in very first sentence with the whole problem: that Lucas murdered a white man. Then Chapter 1 delineates Lucas's character through an incident, and establishes the basis of the relationship between Lucas and the boy. Chapter 2 establishes the inevitability of the lynching attempt, so that the plot seems to be centered solely on this. Then in Chapter 3, with the magnificent jail description, people like Will Legate really alive, though minor, and Lucas always true to character: the added twist held off so long that Lucas's gun didn't shoot the bullet into Vincent Gowrie's back, creating the suspense not only of will Lucas be found innocent, but how can the boy dig up the body before the lynch-mob acts. Faulkner's chapter endings always are magnificent, like Chapter 3's irony: "I'll try to wait."

February 6, 1955

Passed the Bourneville boat pond on my way back from Meeting: a nice sunny February day, and men and boys gathered round or sitting on the benches and about eight large schooners puffing forward fast or slow and almost turning over sometimes, with men holding grapples easing themselves around the perimeter, watching their homemade long-hours' efforts cautiously lest a bow crush on the cement banks, pushing off again, setting rudders, adjusting the five-foot high sails, racing around when she goes apace, or praying for the help of a comrade across the pond if the boat goes directly across too fast; or one man with a black mustache not at all as nice as the other man with the red down-swept mustache whose boat sailed beautifully, the black mustached man looking at his angrily it seemed, as it wouldn't go hardly at all even after adjustments and looking a little ashamed, too.

Two boys racing around the water's edge with shovels shoveling water onto each other, dressed neatly British in coats, pullover sweaters, white shirts and tie, and short pants with knee-socks, the Sunday ones, too, pure wool—and only 5 or 6 years old—one saying after splashing, "Are they all wet" (the socks), but the other, "They'll dry!" and shoveling some more then. And other small children with small grapples and small boats that went slow like a small boat should when compared to the others, but expecting some day to have big ones too and to work all week Saturdays included like their fathers, smelling Cadbury chocolate from birth till they're laid in a chocolate-consecrated cemetery, then to come each Sunday except when the water's frozen, to test the long hours' work in basements and the design and equilibrium and strength of the sails that could easily tear at a gust of wind if they weren't made just right; but their papas will show them, doubt it not, and this happy world will pass on the through the generations.

Thought also of Frances (Sigarowitsch) McMaster's description of her wedding night in the Sheraton Hotel, Rochester, each room complete with television and another bridal couple in the next room, the woman screaming and imploring and fainting almost while her husband exacts his due in union, and Frances not exactly encouraged by this and Jack watching television most of the night instead of congressing with his mate; and the following night put up at uncle's in Washington and afraid they'll be heard, so nothing happening till the third night of marriage, but then it was nice, too, and eventually she became pregnant.

How "I say," the Cuban anaesthesiologist, angered, whispered to Amo concerning his technique, and Dr. Field soothing over for us so he went ahead and we were friends again. (Dr. Prieto-Sanchez.)

Fairly well convinced now I don't believe in God.

Faulkner:

¶ . . . out of the stale warm house again into the air, the morning, the sun in one soft high level golden wash in the highest tips of the trees, gilding the motionless obese uprush of the town watertank in spider-legged elongate against the blue . . .

¶ then at once he seemed to have been hearing for a long time the sheriff from a great distance saying ' . . . boy . . . boy . . . ' then 'Wake him up Gavin. Let him eat his breakfast before he goes to sleep;' and he jerked, it was still only daylight, Miss Habersham was still pouring coffee into the same cup and he began to eat, chewing and even swallowing, rising and falling as though to the motion of the chewing along the deep soft bottomless mire of sleep, into then out of the voices buzzing of old finished things no longer concern of his.

¶ Then his uncle opened the door and at once they smelled the coffee and the frying hog meat, walking on linoleum toward a faint light at the rear of the hall then across a linoleum-floored dining room in rented

Grand Rapids mission into the kitchen, into the hard cheerful blast of a woodstove where the sheriff stood over a sputtering skillet in his undershirt and pants and socks, his braces dangling and his hair mussed and tousled with sleep like that of a ten-year-old boy a battercake turner in one hand and a cup towel in the other. The sheriff had already turned his vast face towards the door before they entered it and he watched the little hard pale eyes flick from his uncle to Miss Habersham to himself and then to Alec Sander and even then it was not the eyes which widened so much for that second but rather the little hard black pupils which had tightened in that one flick to pinpoints. But the sheriff said nothing yet, just looking at his uncle now and now even the little hard pupils seemed to expand again as when an expulsion of breath untightens the chest and while the three of them stood quietly and steadily watching the sheriff his uncle told it, rapid and condensed and succinct, . . . and stopped and again they watched the little hard eyes go flick. flick. slick. across their three faces then back to his uncle again, staring at his uncle for almost a quarter of a minute without even blinking. Then the sheriff said: 'You wouldn't come here at four o'clock in the morning with a tale like that if it wasn't so.'

¶ 'Never nobody made me,' Alec Sander said. 'I didn't even know I was going. I had done already told Chick I didn't aim to. Only when we got to the truck everybody seemed to just take it for granted I wasn't going to do nothing else but go and before I knowed it I wasn't.'

From T. H. Robinson's History of Religions:

¶ One element in [Christian] Faith is always a belief in the spiritual world and the grasp of it through (and perhaps in spite of) the material. It is, in part, a conviction that 'the things that are seen are temporary, but the things that are not seen are eternal'. But it is more than this. It involves of necessity a surrender, a casting of the individual spirit on God, an acceptance of him as the Father, an entrusting to Him of the whole of the self. This may be expressed in even stronger terms, and some Christians can speak of 'dying with Christ', 'living no longer, except in so far as they live in Christ', 'abiding in Christ', and there are other phrases which imply that Faith means a moral unification of the human with the divine. [Note the essential agreement with Eastern thinking. Also this:]

¶ In a certain sense Christianity holds as strictly to a law of Karma as do Hinduism and Buddhism, though the doctrine is not carried to the same absolute conclusion. 'Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap' is the early statement of the truth, and whatever escape from the consequences of sin may be offered by the Christian Atonement, it does not include the freeing of the sinner himself (and others) from the natural results of his wrong-doing.

¶ There can be no love without at least the capacity for suffering, and there can be no suffering at its deepest unless it be inflicted by one who is loved. (p. 235)

¶ the social ethic of Jesus may perhaps best be summed up in the phrase 'Kingdom of God' . . . It implies the absolute, unchallenged, and unconditional dominance of the Will of God in all things human. It is a social as well as an individual ideal.

¶ It is usual to refer to the Sermon the Mount as the truest statement of Christian ethics. But this offers only a series of illustrations of the teaching of Jesus. The stress [should be] laid on essential principles: — the doctrine of self-denial. This goes deeper than asceticism; a man who denies himself is one who refuses to consider his own needs. This does not exclude the need for the recognition of his own powers and capabilities, or the demand made on him to keep himself in a state of efficiency, but he must think of and treat himself from a purely impersonal point of view—, be ready on the claim of anything in which he recognizes the voice of God, to risk and surrender everything. Through self-abnegation, true self-realization can be obtained.

¶ Such a doctrine can only be valid if there is presented some object in whose interest the surrender is made. In the teaching of Jesus this appears in a double form, the final object being God Himself, and the nearer one the Christian's fellow men. . . . From the experience of Faith the rest follows. A moral union with God, a mystical surrender to God, will mean that he who is thus consecrated and lost in God will exhibit the character of God, in so far as he understand it, in his dealings with men. . . . God is a universal Father; from this it follows that all men are brothers, and that no distinctions can be drawn between them which fail to give due weight to the claims of personality. . . . Jesus demanded a morality of expression, one which should give free course to all human instinct, though not in its crude shape but in a 'sublimated' form. The good man, in His judgment, did good because his nature had been changed, and he did it unconsciously, not knowing that it was good, but simply because it seemed to him the ‘natural’ and obvious thing to do.

Faulkner again:

Chapter V ends with a new item that makes you want to continue with the book: Miss Habersham sitting at the jail door guarding Lucas, instead of an armed man doing it.

¶ The sheriff leaned above the window breathing vast subterranean sighs, not breathing hard but just as a big man seems to have to breathe. [I like this sort of observation.]

¶ They stared at each other; watching them he thought again of his uncle and Lucas in the cell last night; . . . again except for the fact that his uncle and Miss Habersham were actually looking into each other’s physical eyes instead of bending each upon the other that absolute concentration of all the senses in the sum of which were clumsy fallible perception weighed little more than the ability to read Sanskrit would, he might have been watching the last two stayers in a poker-pot. [Takes 2 or 3 readings to understand this—but worth it.]

¶ . . . to do it to preserve not even justice and decency but innocence; and he thought of man who apparently had to kill man not for motive or reason but simply for the sake the need the compulsion of having to kill man, inventing creating his motive and reason afterward so that he could still stand up among man as a rational creature.

¶ . . . where the two Negroes sat immobile as carved wood staring straight ahead at nothing and no movement even of breathing other than an infinitesimal widening and closing of the whites around their eyeballs, then looking at the sheriff again with almost exactly the expression he had seen on the faces waiting for the spinning tapes behind a slot-machine’s glass to stop.

¶ ‘Come on boys,’ the marshal said. . . . They moved then but still without haste, the marshal herding them back across the street like a woman driving a flock of hens across a pen, she to control merely the direction not the speed and not too much of that, the fowls moving ahead of her flapping apron not recalcitrant, just unpredictable, fearless of her and not yet even alarmed, the halted car and the ones behind it moved too, slowly, dragging at creeping pace their loads of craned faces; he could hear the marshal shouting at the drivers: 'Get on. Get on. There's cars behind you.'

From Karl Heim, Christian Faith and Natural Science:

¶ Professor Dorn recently worked out an interesting calculation in order to make clear the significance which can properly be claimed for the life and history of mankind in the context of the overall history of the earth. Let us assume, he says, that the earth is 2,850 million years old. If we consider this as a day of 24 hours, from midnight to midnight, then the end of the 'stellar age', i.e. the awakening of organic life on our planet does not occur until 10.51 p.m., the appearance of man only 22 seconds before midnight, and the whole of what is called 'world history,' including all the establishments of states, the wars between nations, the ideological struggles, the conflict of the faiths and the foundation of religions, takes place in the last three-tenths of a second. . . . today man is an infinitesimal grain of sand in the midst of an immeasurable sandy waste. For this speck of dust to suppose that it is at the center of the cosmos, and that its eternal future is the main preoccupation of the Creator of the universe, is quite as ridiculous, from the purely scientific point of view, as for a colony of aphides, clustering on the leaf of a tree in the forest, to imagine in a fit of megalomania that not merely the whole leaf but the whole earth exists solely for their sake and that the destruction of the leaf on which they have settled would mean the end of the world.

¶ The genuine secularism with which we are confronted today is neither a Promethean rebellion of mankind against God nor the expression of a weary resignedness in the face of the darkness which enshrouds our existence. It is rather the necessary consequence of a conception of the universe which precisely because of its simplicity and perspicuity and its elimination of all kinds of obscure, metaphysical, cosmic substrata, presents itself with a force of evidence to the people of the machine age who have lived through two world wars. [mechanical, meaningless, where strength rules, etc.]

Faulkner:

¶ even rolling his head but about as much chance to escape that one frail narrow inevitable palm as to roll your forehead out from under a birthmark . . .

¶ 'Yes,' his mother said. 'Just let go': which was like telling a man dangling with one hand over a cliff to just hold on: who wanted nothing right now but a chance to let go and relinquish into the nothing of sleep what little of nothing he still had who last night had wanted to go to sleep and could have but didn't have time and now wanted more than ever to go to sleep and had all the time in the world for the next fifteen minutes . . . only he had forgotten how: or maybe that was it and he didn't dare relinquish into nothing what little he had left: which was nothing: no grief to be remembered nor pity nor even awareness of shame, no vindication of the deathless aspiration of man by man to man through the catharsis of pity and shame but instead only an old man for whom grief was not even a component of his own but merely a temporary phenomenon of his slain son jerking a strange corpse over onto its back not in appeasement to its one mute indicting cry not for pity not for vengeance but for justice but just to be sure he had the wrong one, crying cheery abashless and loud: 'Yep it's that damned Montgomery damned if it ain't,' . . . who (himself) had wanted of course to leave his mark too on his time in man but only that, no more than that, some mark on his part in earth but humbly, waiting wanting humbly even, not even hoping even, nothing (which of course was everything) except his own one anonymous chance too to perform something passionate and brave and austere not just in but into man's enduring chronicle worthy of a place in it (who knew? perhaps adding even one anonymous jot to the austerity of the chronicle's brave passion) . . .

—a Face, the composite Face of his native kind his native land, his people his blood his own with whom it had been his joy and pride and hope to be found worthy to present one united unbreakable front to the dark abyss the night—a Face monstrous unravering omnivorous and not even unsatiate, not frustrated nor even thwarted, not bidding nor waiting and not even needing to be patient since yesterday today and tomorrow are Is: Indivisible: One. . . . Yesterday's sunset and yesterday's tea both are inextricable from the scattered indestructible uninfusable grounds blown through the endless corridors of tomorrow, into the shoes we will have to walk in and even the sheets we will have (or try) to sleep between: because you escape nothing, you flee nothing, the pursuer is what is doing the running and tomorrow's night is nothing but one long sleepless wrestle with yesterday's omissions and regrets: who had pretermitted not even a death to Lucas but merely Lucas, Lucas in ten thousand Sambo-avatars to scurry unheeding and not even aware through that orifice like mice through the slot of a guillotine until at the One unheeding moment the unheeding unwitting uncaring chopper falls . . .

Now hearing it listening to it, not moving yet nor even opening his eyes as he lay for a moment longer listening to it, then opened them and then his uncle stood silhouetted against the light beyond the footboard in that utter that complete that absolute silence now with nothing in it now but the breathing of darkness and the tree-frogs and bugs: no fleeing nor repudiation nor for this moment more even urgency anywhere in the room or outside it either above or below or before or behind the tiny myriad beast-sounds and the vast systole and diastole of summer night.

¶ . . . already in endless motion like the treadmill's endless band less than an inch's fraction above the ultimate point of his nose and chest where the first full breath would bring him into its snatching orbit, himself lying beneath it like a hobo trapped between the rails under a speeding train, safe only so long as he did not move.

¶ Perhaps eating had something to do with it, . . . : remembering how his uncle had said that a man didn't necessarily eat his way through the world but by the act of eating and maybe only by that did he actually enter the world, get himself into the world: not through it but into it, burrowing into the world's teeming solidarity like a moth into wool by the physical act of chewing and swallowing the substance of its warp and woof and so making, translating into a part of himself and his memory, the whole history of man or maybe even relinquishing by mastication, abandoning, eating it into to be annealed, the proud vainglorious minuscule which he called his memory and his self and his I-Am into that vast teeming anonymous solidarity of the world from beneath which the ephemeral rock would cool and spin away to dust not even remarked and remembered since there was no yesterday and tomorrow didn't even exist so maybe only an ascetic living in a cave on acorns and spring water was really capable of vainglory and pride; maybe you had to live in a cave on acorns and spring water in rapt impregnable contemplation of your vainglory and righteousness and pride in order to keep up to that high intolerant pitch of its worship which brooked no compromise.

¶ 'The American really loves nothing but his automobile: not his wife his child nor his country nor even his bank-account first (in fact he doesn't really love that bank-account nearly as much as foreigners like to think because he will spend almost any or all of it for almost anything provided it is valueless enough) but his motorcar. Because the automobile has become our national sex-symbol. We cannot really enjoy anything unless we can go up an alley for it. Yet our whole background and raising and training forbids the subrosa and surreptitious. So we have to divorce our wife today in order to remove from our mistress the odium of mistress in order to divorce our wife tomorrow in order to remove from our mistress and so on. As a result of which the American woman has become cold and undersexed; she has projected her libido onto the automobile not only because its glitter and gadgets and mobility pander to her vanity and incapacity (because of the dress decreed upon her by the national retailers association) to walk but because it will not maul her and touse her, get her all sweaty and disarranged. So in order to capture and master anything at all of her anymore the American man has got to make that car his own. Which is why let him live in a rented rathole though he must he will not only own one but renew it each year in pristine virginity, lending it to no one, letting no other hand ever know the last secret forever chaste forever wanton intimacy of its pedals and levers, having nowhere to go in it himself and even if he did he would not go where scratch or blemish might deface it, spending all Sunday morning washing and polishing and waxing it because in doing that he is caressing the body of the woman who has long since now denied him her bed.' 'That's not true,' he said. 'I am fifty-plus years old,' his uncle said. 'I spent the middle fifteen of them fumbling beneath skirts.'

My experience was that few of them were interested in love or sex either. They wanted to be married.' 'I still don't believe it,' he said. 'That's right,' his uncle said. 'Don't. And even when you are fifty and plus, still refuse to believe it.'

From Sir S. Radhakrishnan, "Religion and World Unity," in Religion in the Modern World:

¶ Tolerance has two sides, a negative and a positive. Negatively it rejects the claim that any one type of religion has absolute, final, universal and exclusive validity. The surrender of this self-assertive, aggressive claim is essential for the recognition of other forms of religious belief and practice which also bring men nearer the Divine. The positive side is a sensitiveness to truth wherever it is found, an appreciation of the values found in other religions, a creative assimilation of the elements of truth and a consequent enrichment of our own beliefs. The two are interdependent.

¶ The Hindu tradition discriminates between essential spiritual experience (sruti) and the varying forms in which this experience has in course of time appeared (smṛti). While the former is universal and unifying, the latter is diverse and divisive. The kind of authority which pertains to the former does not apply to the latter.

¶ The foundation of the knowledge of God is the awareness of the mystery of God. It is a mystery in the sense that it is not susceptible of objectivation or definition. It involves the individual who attempts to grasp it and is not itself an external datum. . . . Those who have the experience express what they have found in a language of their own, a language of symbols. "Without a parable spake he not unto them."

¶ Bergson points out that organized religion is "the crystallization brought about by a scientific process of cooling, of what mysticism had poured while hot into the soul of man. Through religion all men get a little of what a few privileged souls possessed in full."

¶ Karl Jaspers says, "The claim to exclusivity is the work of man and not built on God, who provided man with many roads to himself. . . . When creeds are made absolute they become a kind of banner. They are the rallying points, the sign of membership in a group, the badge of an enthusiasm, a battle emblem."

¶ Many religions are the varied dialects of the one language of the human spirit. . . . This is the religion which Augustine mentions in his well-known statement: "That which is called the Christian Religion existed among the Ancients, and never did not exist, from the beginning of the human race until Christ came in the flesh, at which time the true religion, which already existed, began to be called Christianity." (Librum de vera religione, Chapter 10.)

If Fred murders the salesman (1) because the drunk salesman insists Fred take him home, (2) because Fred has spent most of his money on buying drinks for the salesman and needs cash, he can then take the salesman's money, hide the body (in the sawdust pile behind Murphy's mill) and drive off in his car allowing time for the body to be found, then drive the car into a lake or off a cliff or something, and hide out in the high peaks region. The only people who have seen him with the salesman are the clerk and bartender. "Description" in newspaper. Harry recognizes it, and Fred's ma. Both lie to police, say he left the day before the murder. Fred is derelict, found on bench or something by religionist who sees Fred's Bible, taken to a kind of Woodbrooke. Gets oriented in his views, etc., etc. Then? Maybe: gives himself up, or figure out a flaw in the murder picture that finally enables the police to find him out.

February 17, 1955

Will it never end! I sent Jeanne a Valentine signed by all the people here in their respective languages. That was on the 10th. Meanwhile her letters showed she had doubts about me; that the 3 days together in New York couldn't compete over 6 or 8 weeks' time with a 3000 mile separation. I wrote a whining letter even at one weak point saying I'd die if she didn't love me (and meaning it at the time). I repented of this and wrote a day or so ago, apologizing. I also wrote a sexy letter in response to something she had said about washing dishes in the nude; repented of that, too, as always. Not knowing where we stood, wondering if I should fly home to try to save the relationship. Then yesterday there was a note in my box that Jeanne was going to call from America 9 o'clock tonight. I shuddered. Was this the end? Would she say she'd decided not to come to Europe? I felt terrible all morning. Then I suddenly remembered the Valentine, of course: She'd received it on the 15th, had called to thank me, renew our vows, found that I was in B'ham and left the message she'd call again tonight. All yesterday afternoon I felt joyous, happy ever so happy in Jeanne and my love for her, sure that the call would be about the Valentine. But this morning I got the following letter, dated February 14th): “Peter, there is an awful lot to say. I shall begin from the beginning of Rochester. I originally came here to marry Doug and get out of N.H. During last summer I was at camp rather than in Rochester with Doug. Probably I knew I didn’t like him enough to give up the camp, didn’t really want to be near him. Sept., all by myself, I got this place, Doug had a girlfriend, I had Jonathan. Doug and I made an official break in November, most amicably, just for ourselves. I met Peter G., Nancy, Albert, eventually you (coming from Riparius), then John, Donald Mole, too. I was fascinated by my new friends; I remember thinking they all were very extra wonderful, all shorter than I am, but for a change they were still much nicer than any group I’d ever met. Probably because I wasn’t romantically inclined, and partly because I was being very stern with myself, I didn’t start coupling up with any of you people. It would have broken up the group, I’m sure.

Well, I was more interested in John; finally we went out. This was the first “date” from the group that any people had made, except of course Nancy and Peter G. John and I got along just fine. I began to respect him more and like him more, to find myself very interested in his pictures of home, ex girl-friends especially, sister and parents, relationships with his friends, growing up, looking ahead. This was after your party, before your invitation to N.Y. (At this time Donald was being specific enough so I knew I’d have to have out with him that I liked him and felt he was taking this seriously enough to consider marriage.)

When you left Rochester I felt how lonesome you were. That’s why I told you to come and sit near me, on the floor near the door, remember? When you took me home, it was so revealing to find all the things to talk about that we did! I knew it was hard for you to leave, you liked all of us so well. I felt this surge of understanding and wanting to console you or hug you, and I guess I did kiss you. So much warmth! So different from the many entanglements at college! You know, goodness rather than desire. Well, you left, I liked you, you made an impact on me, left a hole in the group. And John and I began going around a lot. By the time I went to see you (1. you’d asked me, 2. I wanted to go to NY, 3. I was challenged by the letter and curious to see what it was all about, 4. no commitments here). It was delightful meeting you there. Fondness was the key emotion here, real happiness that people could be so nice, for me. Then we began this talking over. Remember I said, I'm happy about it, and you said you wanted to tell your folks. Then I should have asked what you would say, because your parents heard only "engagement" and not "with reservations." So now your whole family is planning a wedding and mine still knows nothing. And I don't want to be engaged. You, in England, are calling me "fiancée" and I have felt so warmly about you that I want to hug you, but I hug Peter G., and I don't love him. I kiss you but honestly Peter I do not love you. You're a dear new person to me. Here I am, sailing to see you this summer. I'm not a fiancée. If I sail, it will be as some crazy girl who would love to visit you, like I visit George and Theron every time I'm in NYC. I love Riparius, I'd love to dabble around there, But Peter, Peter, I don't realize that I cannot do it unless I marry you, and I don't want to go that far. I like the life but I don't want to marry you. I want to be as clear as I can be. Your life of travel and writing is wonderful. I want to go, too, but now I realize it will mean another lonely summer, and back I'll want to come. I won't feel like marrying you. I don't now. I can see a hiking, biking, and sleeping-out summer in Europe as pure heaven. But to do it with you, it would be a boy-girl setup and that's all. Remember when I was on your bed with you, and I said, "This is nice," meaning the lying there and kissing. You said, "With anyone?" Well, not anyone, but with someone I like yes, it's lovely. I hadn't been lying around with anyone for a couple of months and it sure was nice to do it with you. But you didn't understand this, I'm sure. I still say it was a confirmation of deep friendship, not love in the romantic sense.

Here I am, embroiled in your family. You should have said, "We've been talking about marriage" or I should have said something to stop you. No, damn it. I should have heard you out, as I did, then said, "No." But how could I expect myself to do that? I certainly never could "laugh at" anybody's statement of love. It happens to people for me, and I fall for others, and it's wonderful to tell, or hear, of this fine regard. But something should follow. You had plans, I had not even begun to love you. Just grand feeling, not another thing. Your family is so nice. I was really happy to be there.

To get to your proposal, when I said I could marry you in a week, it would be because I would not have to face Don or think about John. As it was, Don had to be talked with, but John had not been settled at all. I never even told you that. Poor Peter, you did not hear any of this situation, it's not fair to you. Your parents are so good, they love you and admire you so, they want to accept me so much, I should have said, "Take it back, we must think more." Hell. And, I want to prove that a short-term courtship can prove to be fruitful, I want to wander overseas with you, I want to develop your beliefs and writing, but I always get interested in people this way. Always. It's the teacher-training in me. I simply cannot take care of so many people at once and I never faced it as clearly as now. I'm not ready or willing to take a job, answer to agency letters from England. I do have a ticket. I bought it to keep my promise. I should never have let you phone Elsie Bamburger. I didn't even open her first letter to me.

Another thing, I hate to give people up. I've got all kinds of ex-boy-friends who I really am jealously interested in. Casually of course, but I never really give them up. Well, to say "No" to you would have snipped off all our new relationship. But I have to say No. This is the reason. I'm in love with John, and he with me. He told me long ago, and now I've reacted or responded. No other plans, but you must know this no matter what. There are about 5 more letters full I have to tell you.

I don't like to do this but again—I have had this done to me. It's my only justification. I beg your forgiveness for not letting you know in the beginning. It's embarrassing, too, a crazy mess. I feel all kinds of responsibility, all I want to be is liked by the people I like and I go around messing things up. My dear Peter, please please please don't feel bad. I send my love, I'm sorry, Peter.

—Jeanne

How could I have been so inexperienced, so stupid, as to leave her just when I had her thinking that nothing could happen in six months, that a lover near isn't equal to ten far away. And I knew John was after her, too, yet thought (God!) he'd automatically stop when she announced she planned to take up with me. O folly! She and John together the whole time during our Toronto trip, him asking me later how he could get in touch with Jeanne, even saying he would like to get married, was looking for a wife. Stupid ass! Imbecile. What now? The telephone call tonight. What until then? Can I work, study about God's all-encompassing love, talk jokingly with people here, eat a big lunch? All her doubts I appreciate. She didn't have a chance to love me, yet I felt sure when she got here she'd learn to. It's John that hurts. What can I do? I see why jilted lovers murder people. That's no solution. Couldn't there be a solution? Why can't I cry, get drunk, scream? I didn't even cry. I cry at pictures, I cry when I hear Bach or a Beethoven quartet. Why can't I cry now? I'll go have some cocoa.

I see Jörn outside swinging a pick-axe with some workmen who are chopping through an asphalt pathway. He really misses the labour of his body, I guess. He's working like a demon out there. The workmen look a trifle embarrassed.

Sean O'Casey again. Drums Under the Windows.

¶ Tormenting himself with the fading vision of a most lovely lady whose golden hair was hanging down her back, so full of fire that a tress of it would give light to a group threshing corn in a black barn on a dark night.

¶ His highest vision is no higher than the counter in his Sinn Fein Bank. He strikes a match, and thinks it the torch of freedom. A lighter of little gas-lamps to show the Irish where to walk. The sword of light would turn him to ashes if he ever tried to hold it.

¶ Down in the deep trench, shored up with planks and cross-pieces, a long way from Ireland's four beautiful green fields, side by side with the huge glossy black cylinders, Sean watched the broad backs of the navies bending, rising, and bending again, as they worked on making way for another length of the monster black pipe, looking like a prehistoric ebony worm that men were uncovering now after a rest of a million years; while far above their heads a dim damp dawn crept slowly over the sky. Not one of these brawny boys had ever heard of Griffith or of Yeats. They lived their hard and boisterous life without a wish to hear their names. . . . Toiling, drinking, whoring, they lived everywhere and anywhere they could find a ready-made lodging or room. . . . And yet Sean felt in his heart that these men were all-important in anything to be done for Ireland. Well, there was no sound of the linnet's wings here; nothing but the thud of the pick, the tearing sound of the shovels thrust into the ground, the loud steady pulse of the pump sucking away the surface water, and the cries of the men handling the derrick from which the huge pipes swung, and the irritating squelch of the men's boots as they sunk into, and were pulled out of, the thick and sticky yellow clay. While he swung the sledge hammer down on the hardy head of the bright steel wedge imprisoned in a gad held by a comrade, to break through a harder crust the pick couldn't penetrate, he cursed himself that he couldn't afford to spend a month, a fortnight, or even a week in a summer school at peace in an Irish-speaking district. . . . If he went up to a meeting of the Coite Gnotha, the Head Executive of the Gaelic League, and, leaning over the table they sat around keeping time in their talk to the snores of Edward Martyn, asleep in an easy chair, said, Look here, boys, I love the Irish; I've learned a lot; I want to spend a holiday in an Irish district . . . but I've no money; couldn't you people fork out enough to fix me there for a week or two, so that my Irish may be as the rain falling on the earth, or the lightning splitting the black clouds What would happen? The giddy-minded, uninspirable secretary, Paddy O'Daly, would come over, trip his arm, lead him to the door, and say, Now, now, we're engaged in very important business so the like of them would hurry by Whitman, spitting out of him as he leaned by a corner of the Bowery. And doing so, they'll die, for whoever walks a furlong without sympathy walks to his own funeral dressed in his shroud. Ah, to hell with them! —Eh, there; look out, Jack! warned his mate: the sledge near missed the wedge that time!

Rilke, "Malte": Deaths are at present taking place in 559 beds. It is like a factory, of course; and naturally, with this enormous output, the individual death is not a very finished article. But that is not what we are after. What we want is mass production. Who cares nowadays about a well worked-out death? . . . It is becoming more and more unusual for anyone to want a death of his one. My God! That is all there is to it. One comes along, finds one's life ready-made and needs only to put it on. . . . And one dies the way one happens to die; one dies the death appropriate to the illness one has—for now that we know all the diseases we also know that the various forms of death belong to the complaints and not to the patients; the patient has practically no part to play. (Quoted by Heim.)

O'Casey, you're magnificent! First paragraph alone makes one want to finish the story. Sets the end in it, then goes back to Tom's history, the reader all the while aching to know how and when he came to the sorry state of the first paragraph. Thus:

¶ Sean stood silently in the room looking long at the fearful figure of his brother, Tom, crouched in the comfortable armchair before a sunnily-blazing fire, for the night was cold, and a white frost was calmly settling down on the paths and street outside. He felt a choking in his throat, and tears trickled down his cheeks, but Tom couldn't see them, for his eye strings had broken, and he was blind.

(Then right away the miserable wife is depicted):

¶ Then he married: married an ignorant catholic girl who in some way had influenced him towards a newer home, and a companionable bed. Agatha Cooley was a yellow-skinned, stout woman, badly built in body and mind-sly in a lot of ways, as so many toweringly ignorant persons are; her best knowledge lay in guessing what a newspaper was trying to say. She could struggle through a short letter with pain and anxiety, her finest phrase always being that of hoping all were in the best of health as that left her at present. A lid that drooped half way down over one eye gave one side of her face the appearance of falling into a jocular sleep, and watch as he would, Sean had never seen it lift or fall; it stood still like a fading yellow blind whose worn-out spring refused to send it more than half-way up on a dark and dusty oval window. She dressed in a very dowdy, slovenly way and spoke in a voice from which a rough life had mobbed even the dimmest tinkle of music.

[Instead of saying "Tom liked the pub, or went often to the pub, he says:]

¶ The smell of a pub was incense to Tom, and its portals had the beauty of a Persian garden, with an everlasting fountain of sweet waters in the midst of it.

[Even the moralizing is inoffensive:]

¶ Not a mother's son of a gun of us knows whence we came or whither we go. Some shout that they do, and carry banners of belief in their hands; but the banners, too, will soon be dust sprinkled on the dust of the bearers. Kindly Tom, poor kindly Tom. He rushed into the brightness of the pub, the one brightness within his reach. Well, God is as likely to be there as in the Viceroy's satin-walled residence or the Guinness's mansion of high style and tabinet. Not a son of a gun of us knew who he'd meet or what he'd see, or a ha'p'orth when the time came to go. A bird's flight from the ground to the roof-top and then the same bird's flight from the roof-top to the ground, and life was over.

¶ . . . the slender gold watch-chain shyly streaking across his waistcoat like a delicate sunbeam hurrying across a somber sky . . .

[Then his use of refrain: here a twig. Thus:]

¶ Sean went back to the silent room, sat down on the cane-bottomed chair, furtively watching the hand of death quenching the last dim light glimmering in Tom's handsome face; turning now and again to glance at the little sycamore twig moving gently up, gently down, just outside the window-pane.

[Used as the final sentence:] ¶ And he turned and left her alone with her dead husband, and with the little sycamore twig moving gently up, gently down, just outside the window-pane.

¶ . . . her bright dark eyes blinking rapidly to impede the tears that were pushing a way out of them, her brave humorous mouth aquiver like summer lightning in a violet sky.

¶ . . . the sky grew greyer over their heads and a misty rain, rather than falling, soaked the street with its chilly penetration.

¶ Now she went about everything like a near-drowned fly in a jar full of water. She entertained life under a canopy of rags and tatters; a blouse warning all of its end, a skirt slit to the thigh, shattered boots and footless stockings; and her breath of life moved faintly in the midst of it all, while her children moved round her, half perishing too, like weak and puzzled planeteens hovering uncertainly around a fast-dying sun.

¶ So behind this fair, sparkling laughing curtain that Nature let down before him many dark and evil things were lurking, or hung entangled in the bright colours and satisfying scents like decaying flies in the iridescent and lonely-patterned web of the spider.

Heim speaks of time as a Now, represented in simile by a spool of rope, reeling off the past so that a specific knot on the rope recedes further and further into the mist of forgetfulness.

¶ The will is the lightning flash and the deed is the long-dawn roll of thunder which follows it.

¶ The invisible force which we designate with the word 'will' is not comprised within the narrow confines of our tiny human existence. For since the volitional ego is non-objectivisable it transcends the whole objective world space and all its spatial dimensions; so the will cannot be localized in the human body, this limited, objective structure—neither in the brain nor in the heart. Admittedly my volitional ego is related by my destiny to this human body. My body is my most important instrument. But the will itself, the volitional I and the volitional Thou, is prior to the whole objective march of world events to which it is related, and consequently lies beyond the range of scientific observation. Whatever can be psychologically objectivised by the will is not the will itself, but belongs already to its incipient realization—and between this and the will itself Kant makes an explicit distinction. This incipient realization includes especially those pictures of the future, accompanied by a lively sense of values, which fill the imagination—those plans and aspirations, those complexes of the individual and collective subconscious. All these are not the will itself but the objective expression and product of the will, in which the conflict is revealed between the volitional I and the volitional Thou, first of all in psychological activity before it is converted into action on the physical plane. The will itself transcends three-dimensional space and uni-dimensional objective flow of time.

¶ The illustrious ancients, when they wished to make clear and to propagate the highest virtues in the world, put their states in proper order. Before putting their states in proper order, they regulated their families. Before regulating their families, they cultivated their own selves. Before cultivating their own selves, they perfected their souls. Before perfecting their souls, they tried to be sincere in their thoughts. Before trying to be sincere in their thoughts, they extended to the utmost their knowledge. Such investigation of knowledge lay in the investigation of things, and in seeing them as they really were. When things were thus investigated, knowledge became complete. When knowledge was complete, their thoughts became sincere. When their thoughts were sincere, their souls became perfect. When their souls were perfect, their own selves became cultivated. When their selves were cultivated, their families became regulated. When their families were regulated, their states came to be put into proper order. When their states were in proper order, then the whole world became peaceful and happy. —Confucius.

¶ “Luther, in his commentary on the Book of Daniel, says, ‘A God is simply that whereas the human heart rests with trust, faith, hope, and love. If the resting is right, then the God too is right; if the resting is wrong, then the God too is illusory.’ In other words, the worth of what a man thinks about God and the objects of religion depends on what the man is, and what the man is depends upon his having more or less reached the measure of a perfect total man.” —Matthew Arnold, introduction to Culture and Anarchy.

¶ If by “God” we mean that final reality of righteousness and love, from which all things, including ourselves, depend for their existence, their nature, their coherence, their unfolding history and final outcome, then the whole meaning of our existence is at stake in Him, and nothing less than the whole breadth of our experience could be the appropriate and sufficient context for thinking about Him. (page 20)

Psalm 139 (Revised Standard Version):

O Lord, thou hast searched me and known me!
 Thou knowest when I sit down and when I rise up;
 thou discernest my thoughts from afar.
 Thou searchest out my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways.
 Even before a word is on my tongue lo, O Lord, thou knowest it altogether.
 Thou dost beset me behind and before,
     and layest thy hand upon me.
 Such knowledge is too wonderful for me;
     it is high, I cannot attain it.

Whither shall I go from thy Spirit?
     Or whither shall I flee from thy presence?
 If I ascend to heaven, thou art there!
     If I make my bed in Sheol, thou art there!
 If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there thy hand shall lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me.
 If I say, "Let only darkness cover me, and the light about me be night," even the darkness is not dark to thee, the night is bright as the day; for darkness is as light with thee.

For thou didst form my inward parts, thou didst knit me together in my mother's womb.
 I praise thee, for thou art fearful and wonderful.
     Wonderful are thy works!
 Thou knowest me right well;

my frame was not hidden from thee,
 when I was being made in secret, intricately wrought in the depths of the earth.
 Thy eyes beheld my unformed substance;
 in thy book were written, every one of them,
 the days that were formed for me,
 when as yet there was none of them.
 How precious to me are thy thoughts, O God!
 How vast is the sum of them!
 If I would count them, they are more than the sand.
 When I awake, I am still with thee.

. . . . .
 Search me out, O God, and know my heart!
 Try me and know my thoughts!
 And see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting!

¶ We have seen how Christ provides the fulfillment of each of the highest aspirations and aims of Hinduism. A little reflection on the material contained in this chapter will show that every line of light which is visible in the grossest parts of the religion reappears in Him set in healthy institutions and spiritual worship. Every true motive which in Hinduism has found expression in unclean, debasing, or unworthy practices finds in Him fullest exercise in work for the downtrodden, the ignorant, the sick, and the sinful. In Him is focused every ray of light that shines in Hinduism. He is the Crown of the faith of India. —conclusion to Farquar's The Crown of Hinduism (very convincing).

 The spectacle: sensation, soul and form
 All melted into him.

 And the round ocean and the living air
 And the blue sky, and in the mind of man,
 A motion and a spirit, that impels
 All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
 And rolls through all things.

From A. Huxley, The Doors of Perception:

¶ Though but recently introduced into the northern United States, peyote-eating and the religion based upon it have become important symbols of the Red Man's right to spiritual independence. Some Indians have reacted to white supremacy by becoming Americanized, others by retreating into traditional Indianism. But some have tried to make the best of both worlds, indeed of all the worlds—the best of Indianism, the best of Christianity, and the best of those Other Worlds of transcendental experience, where the soul knows itself as unconditioned and of like nature with the divine. Hence the Native American Church. In it two great appetites of the soul—the urge to independence and self-determination and the urge to self-transcendence—were fused with, and interpreted in the light of, a third—the urge to worship, to justify the ways of God to man, to explain the universe by means of a coherent theology.

Lo, the poor Indian, whose untutored mind clothes him in front, but leaves him bare behind. But actually it is we, the rich and highly educated whites, who have left ourselves bare behind. We cover our anterior nakedness with some philosophy—Christian, Marxian, Freudo-Physicalist—but abaft we remain uncovered, at the mercy of all the winds of circumstance. The poor Indian, on the other hand, has had the wit to protect his rear by supplementing the fig-leaf of a theology with the breech-clout of transcendental experience.

From Traherne, Centuries of Meditations III 1, 2, 3.

¶ Will you see the infancy of this sublime and celestial greatness? Those pure and virgin apprehensions I had from the womb, and that divine light wherewith I was born are the best unto this day, wherein I can see the Universe. By the Gift of God they attended me into the world, and by his special favour I remember them till now. Verily they seem the greatest gifts His wisdom could bestow, for without them all other gifts had been dead and vain. They are unobtainable by book, and therefore I will teach them by experience. Pray for them earnestly: for they will make you angelical, and wholly celestial. Certainly Adam in Paradise had not more sweet and curious apprehensions of the world, than I when I was a child.

¶ All appeared new, and strange at first, inexpressibly rare and delightful and beautiful. I was a little stranger, which at my entrance into the world was saluted and surrounded with innumerable joys. My knowledge was Divine. I knew by intuition those things which since my Apostasy, I collected again by the highest reason. My very ignorance was advantageous. I seemed as one brought into the Estate of Innocence. All things were spotless and pure and glorious: yea, and infinitely mine, and joyful and precious. I knew not that there were any sins, or complaints or laws. I dreamed not of poverties, contentions or vices. All tears and quarrels were hidden from mine eyes. Everything was at rest, free and immortal. I knew nothing of sickness or death or rents or exaction, either for tribute or bread. In the absence of these I was entertained like an Angel with the works of God in their splendour and glory, I saw all in the peace of Eden; Heaven and Earth did sing my Creator's praises, and could not make more melody to Adam, than to me. All time was Eternity, and a perpetual Sabbath. Is it not strange, that an infant should be heir of the whole world, and see those mysteries which the books of he learned never unfold?

¶ The corn was orient and immortal wheat, which never should be reaped, nor was ever sown. I thought it had stood from everlasting to everlasting. The dust and stones of the street were as precious as gold: the gates were at first the end of the world. The green trees when I saw them first through one of the gates transported and ravished me, their sweetness and unusual beauty made my heart to leap, and almost mad with ecstasy, they were such strange and wonderful things. The men! O what venerable and revered creatures did the aged seem! Immortal Cherubims! And young men glittering and sparkling Angels, and maids strange seraphic pieces of life and beauty! Boys and girls tumbling in the street, and playing, were moving jewels. I knew not that they were born or should die; but all things abided eternally as they were in their proper places. Eternity was manifest in the Light of the Day, and something infinite behind everything appeared which talked with my expectation and moved my desire. The city seemed to stand in Eden, or to be built in Heaven. The streets were mine the temple was mine the people were mine, their clothes and gold and silver were mine, as much as their sparkling eyes, fair skins and ruddy faces. The skies were mine, and so were the sun and moon and stars, and all the world was mine, and I the only spectator and enjoyer of it. I knew no churlish proprieties [i.e. properties], nor bounds, nor divisions; but all properties and divisions were mine: all treasures and the possessors of them. So that with much ado I was corrupted, and made to learn the dirty devices of this world.

Which now I unlearn, and become, as it were, a little child again that I may enter into the Kingdom of God.

John Gay, "Song":

O ruddier than the cherry!
     O sweeter than the berry!
     O nymph more bright
     Than moonshine night,
 Like kidlings blithe and merry!
 Ripe as the melting cluster!
 No lily has such luster,
     Yet hard to tame
     As raging flame,
 And fierce as storms that bluster!

¶ Whoever talks about reflects upon an evil thing he has done, is thinking the vileness he has perpetrated, and what one thinks, therein is one caught—with one's whole soul one is caught utterly in what one thinks, and so he is still caught in vileness. And he will surely not be able to turn, for his spirit will coarsen and his heart rot, and besides this a sad mood may come upon him. What would you? Stir filth this way or that, and it is still filth. To have sinned or not to have sinned—what does it profit us in heaven? In the time I am brooding on this I could be stringing pearls for the joy of heaven. That is why it is written: 'Depart from evil, and do good'—turn wholly from evil, do not brood in its way, and do good. You have done wrong. Then balance it by doing right.' —Isaac Meier of Ger., quote in Fromm, Man for Himself.

¶ The supremacy of the authority is questioned by the attempt of the creature to cease being a thing and to become a creator.

¶ But man has never yet ceased striving to produce and to create because productiveness is the source of strength, freedom, and happiness. However, to the extent to which he feels dependent on powers transcending him, his very productiveness, the assertion of his will, makes him feel guilty. The men of Babel were punished for trying by the efforts of a unified human race to build a city reaching to heaven. Prometheus was chained to the rock for having given man the secret of fire, symbolizing productiveness. Pride in the power and strength of man was denounced by Luther and Calvin as sinful pride; by political dictators, as criminal individualism. Man tried to appease the gods for the crime of productiveness by sacrifices, by giving them the best of the crop or of the herd. Circumcision is another attempt at such appeasement; part of the phallus, the symbol of male creativeness, is sacrificed to God so that man may retain the right to its use. In addition . . . man curbs his own powers by feelings of guilt. —Fromm, pp. 149–150.

Alone and restless after a delightful trip up with Chrysanthi. She said she loves me today for the first time; but confided that she had had a “special feeling” about me from the first day at Woodbrooke and that when I sat next to her at meals she could neither eat nor talk. I had no idea! But what a marvelous person she is, and I love and respect her immensely. Tonight, at the station, she was snatched away by a Mrs. Macpherson, who is to entertain Chrysanthi and who of course didn’t know of my coming. Since the train was one hour late I guess she was not in the best of humour and she made it quite clear that I could go my own way and that I could see Chrysanthi again at Meeting tomorrow. That’s good Quaker hospitality!

Am I in another mess? The difficulties concerning marriage seem immense, since in Greece family ties are so important and since also they don’t seem to marry for love but for security, with the husband custom-selected by parents. But I must not give up!

Chrysanthi is so sweet! We had a railway compartment to ourselves most of the way, and talked and made love and just looked soulfully at each other instead of the rugged Scottish scenery. And sometime she would finger through the Greek-English λεξικόν and say, “If I only knew all these words, I could speak to you.” I feel her anguish in this; yet the proof of our love is how well we know each other with only her simple vocabulary for verbal communication.

Will I, in the end, make her miserable by pursuing this further? But I think she would be happy with me, and I think I could offer her a more rounded and satisfying life than she’s likely to get in Greece. Why is everything always so difficult? Damn!

I must start selling stories!

The YMCA dormitory turned out more like a flophouse, with four or five old men reeking of alcohol curled up in their BVDs in the torn blankets, coughing, wheezing, moaning; lighting cigarettes, puffing, then immediately convulsed with coughing but continuing to smoke nevertheless. One was a deaf-mute. He offered me a cigarette and I took out my pad and wrote, "No thanks. I don't smoke." "You're lucky," he wrote underneath, then puffed again and coughed. Didn't sleep much, between coughing and snoring. A ragged looking Irishman, young, with brown decayed teeth and a dirt-blackened shredded collar, spoke to me, asked me what I was, and I said, "I'm a farmer." We talked a bit. He asked if I'd be going to church in the morning. Why not I go to mass with him and he'd come to the Quaker Meeting? OK. But in the morning I met an economics student from London, and the three of us walked up to the Castle (saw courts where Burns, Boswell, David Hume & Dr. Johnson stayed) and continued until just before 11, so that I had to rush off to Meeting and the Irish lad to mass, separately. Chrysanthi was at Meeting and a good one touched off by D. Beavers' comments on Billy Graham and man's sinfulness or lack of it. Mr. Penmore, an architect, took us for lunch to his home on the Furth of Forth just outside of Edinburgh; then to see the Forth Bridge, which we viewed close-up from the ferry across the water. Moved to 8 Darmaway Street, a "Georgian residence four minutes walk to Princes Street," run as a (rather expensive) student hostel by Mrs. Sybil White, a member of Edinburgh Meeting. But more important things: Chrysanthi has been bewildered by these well meaning Friends who shuttle her from one house to the next, this tea-party to that. Poor girl, but she smiles withal. I went along yesterday also to the castle where Mary Queen of Scots was born: Linlithgow Palace, an interesting fire-gutted ruin with huge fireplaces and helping touches like a vomiting chamber outside the banqueting hall, with a flush into a moat which was then flushed by the loch which served also for drinking water! We had a philosophical guide who knew all the dates and all the relevant verses out of Sir Walter Scott, so "a good time was had by all," which meant Chrysanthi, myself, Arnold Beavers, a professor of crystallography at the university, and a Pippin somebody, woman obstetrician just back from three years in India. Also visited Culross Palace, home of a seventeenth-century merchant. After tea I finally managed to be with Chrysanthi alone for an hour, during which time we walked to the next engagement, supper at Margaret Troup's house, a nice old lady, 18 years a widow, and very sound, not domineering or over solicitous like Macpherson, the great rich lady at whose palatial house Chrysanthi sleeps amidst three hot water bottles and continual cuddling. We gossiped a little especially re: Margaret Gibbons, whom I first met in London. She's a nice-looking fortyish woman with obvious strong character, a loud hearty laugh, and a personality that doesn't hesitate to take the lead in a committee. We went the night before last to her house, where Chrysanthi spoke of the Salonica school. A nice comfortable house, and I thought at the time, what a shame such a big nice house and Margaret Gibbons not married. Mrs. Troup supplied the answer: Margaret Gibbons is married, but does everything independently, without her husband. Doesn't even introduce him to people. Apparently she even traveled to America without him, and routinely goes up to London alone also. Mrs. Troup said that Margaret was a teacher, about forty, when her present husband really fell for her, and was insane with joy when she agreed to marry him, which she did to gain freedom from teaching, and to have security, a provider. And the poor husband, a likeable and capable fellow, is now completely in the background. Half the time he has to ask other people where his wife is.

But marital difficulties of a more personal nature were also disclosed. Chrysanthi told me all of the following while we walked. And they answered another question that I had had in my mind because although she had often described the troubles with arranged marriages in Greece, it had always been in the abstract, and I wondered how such a lovely and beautiful girl as Chrysanthi could not be involved either in (1) a love-affaire or (2) an arranged affaire, or possibly both. Now it came out. For four years a boy had loved her and she him. He wanted to marry, but was young and also wanted to finish his schooling. Her parents said no. Gradually she convinced them to change their minds, quite an accomplishment in Greece, especially for a girl. Meanwhile, however, the boy had gone to the university, gotten his degree, and his parents said that Chrysanthi was beneath him, that he must marry a girl from Athens.

This verdict apparently was law, and he simply wrote to Chrysanthi that that was that. She had influenced her parents; he didn't even try.

After that she was obviously unhappy, didn't want to see men or anyone for almost two years. Her parents noticed this and said all would be well if she married. They chose a promising young man for her. He wooed, but she could not even like him and eventually tried to avoid him altogether. He wrote a letter a day to her in England; she never even answered. She told me that was why she came to England—to get away at least for a while. But when she returns he will be there and her parents will press her to agree to marry him and sooner or later it will be done. She actually hates him. He writes only how one day he buys a new stove, another a couch, that he has such-and-such money, etc., etc.

What a stinking situation! And here she loves me desperately and I her. She told me this is the first time she's been happy in five or six years. Yet she thinks our marriage impossible because I am not Greek. Well, now I must meet her, for we shall spend the day together unless Emily Macpherson butts in her rich damn old head.

Later: the same. Chrysanthi and I had just time to buy material for a tartan skirt. It was to be for Chrysanthi, and she excitedly chose the pattern she liked best. Then, at the last minute, after being so happy at the prospect of having the skirt herself, she remembered that Saturday is her sister's name-day, and she had the material shipped off to Lola in Greece, just as happy in anticipation of her sister's pleasure as she had been in the thought of the skirt being her own. What a fine girl! I'm wild about her. Yes, and then the usual: we had to go to so-and-so for mid-morning coffee. From there Chrysanthi was due at someone else's for lunch, where Macpherson would meet her, take her somewhere else for tea, then home for a grand supper with the bent 100-year-old-looking hag she lives with. An exciting day with Mrs. Macpherson for Chrysanthi, from 3:30 to bedtime! Oh lucky Macpherson! And I: I walked, walked, walked, to the castle, meeting there a Ceylonese student whom I had known from Selly Oak; then to the slums; gave money to beggars; walked, walked more. Edinburgh isn't very interesting. All grey stone, the same, and shops and trains. American magazines everywhere, including pornography like nude photos, "Eves without leaves." Walked more, walked; read lousy Gerald Kersh story on a park bench; trash. Saw Chaplin's "Modern Times," which I wanted Chrysanthi to see so much.

Damn! It was great. I wanted her to be there so much. Having the hundredth cup of tea with Mrs. Macpherson instead. Perhaps tomorrow.

A cellist is practicing in the next room. He's very good. He's stopped now. I can hear him putting the instrument away. He's whistling. The cello is beautiful—mellow, sighing, soulful, if that's possible.

How can I do a story around what's happened to C. and me here? Difficult. Must work in London. I'm spending money too fast. Ought to earn some. Hah! Maybe I can't really settle down because I'm neurotic. Probably. Talents and energies and life-stuff dripping on the floor uselessly like semen spurting with no warm waiting complementary receptacle in place. Ugly simile. How will I function when C. goes off to Greece? Alone! I think I can write well if I keep at it. It's bad to stop, even for a day; worse for a week. Should do something every day if even a description. Must think out next story, now.

32, Tavistock Square, London W.C. 1

Cybil White and her houseman at breakfast. "Ask Mr. Dean if he'll have porridge." He walks to my table (8 feet away): "Mr. Dean, will you have porridge this morning?" "Yes, please" (my answer audible to her, of course). He walks back 8 feet: "Mr. Dean will have porridge." She ladles it out. "Mrs. Dean's porridge." He serves it. Later (every morning the same: choice between fried egg or bacon, but he doesn't move anywhere until she says): "Ask Mr. Dean if he'll have fried egg or bacon" (heard of course by me, 8 feet away in the same room). "Mr. Dean, will you have friend egg or bacon?" "Egg, please" (heard by Mrs. White). He walks back and relays, "Mr. Dean will have fried egg this morning." Later: "Mr. Dean's fried egg." He serves it.

Chrysanthi is complex. A good deal of the difficulty re: her freedom (I think) is due to her convincing herself that she is not free, rather than actual restriction. It's like the character in Kafka's novel who's accused of a crime but after that becomes his own chief accuser, pushing himself further into the hands of the authorities (an imaginary crime, of course). Chrysanthi has been babied and cuddled here of course, and made to feel that she must do nothing really on her own, but now that she is relatively free she tells me that No, she cannot. However, now it is near 10 a.m. and I cannot find her anywhere in the Friends Centre, so perhaps she has gone out alone (without her coat). But why would she (without her coat)? I don't know what to make of it.

Yesterday she had to see Margaret Backhaus, chief of the European section of Friends Service Council, and she came away much disturbed. Margaret questioned, questioned. Where have you been? With whom? Who's the boy? Be careful! You're young, you know. You went to the zoo? Alone! (Chrysanthi said "alone.") Ah. Be careful, dear child. I will help you shop. Tomorrow someone will go with you to get your tickets, visa, passport. Be careful, child. You want to go to Cambridge? With whom? Be careful, child!

Chrysanthi was really hurt, because she felt Margaret considered her guilty of something and that letters would be sent to the Lindsays in Greece, etc. She told me also that certainly one of the reasons she is receiving all the varied training here is that the Lindsays will put all the burdens of the school on her because she doesn't know how to say No. Already before she left this process began. She's on duty 24 hours a day, forbidden to leave the grounds except on the one day off each week; the other staff (married) retiring to their homes and every emergency falling on her. She also told me, interestingly, that she is the instrument the Lindsays use to pacify and mediate among the other (Greek) staff-members. This is a thankless task because they are all older than she, and resent not only the collaboration with Lindsay but worse having someone younger than they be in a position of teaching them (by example) how to behave.

I felt naïvely, once, that people in "backward" countries with long-ordered social patterns did not have the problems with which Western peoples are deluged. But here's Chrysanthi, as simple and innocent as can be, and pure, beset with arranged marriages, domineering father, possessive mother, staff jealousies, inferiority feelings, etc. Perhaps, in part, anyway, the difference with the "backward" societies is that their problems are not always of their own making. The arranged marriage business, for instance. These people have rigid customs (possessive right of the mother; domineering one of the father—i.e., the parents are not neurotic, they merely conform to pattern) which they either fall in with or not; and if not, woe. If yes, woe also, but expected. For instance, C. says that no one marries the person he or she loves, which means that there is someone he or she loves. The arranged marriage breaks into this, and brings heartbreak, even if expected heartbreak. We in the "West," with our flexible patterns, have certainly more problems, or at least as many, the difference being that we seem to make them ourselves. Perhaps this is the value of freedom, not that it makes things easier, but that at least it allows you to kill yourself instead of being snuffed out by Wyrld beyond ken or control. And with the fact of self-making, of course, always remains the possibility at least of self-extricating. Hooray!

P.S. Just discovered Chrysanthi. She hadn't gone out, but had been helping the chambermaids make the beds. But this afternoon she promises to go see about her passport all alone, while I move into my new deluxe £1.00 per week palace out near Tufnell Park underground.

To Antonio's Spanish ballet last night with Chrysanthi, after a few hours in Kew Gardens. The audience was hysterical. Antonio took 5 or 10 bows after each number. A couple were sitting next to us, talking Greek, assuming of course that no one would understand them. Chrysanthi gave me a running translation. The boy was trying to fix up a date, to go dancing. The girl said she'd tell her parents she was going to the cinema, as they wouldn't approve of the dancing. Typical Greek lying and secrecy, Chrysanthi said. Then he asked how many children she'd like, and they spoke of marriage with or without love, with or without children, and the various combinations of these possibilities. It was all very funny because they spoke loud, as if talking of the weather or the performance, never thinking that their next-door neighbors were enjoying every word.

Last night to Don Giovanni with Klaus Hartman and Roland ?. Sad partings at Victoria Embankment. I cycled the long way "home" and felt very much that I'd lived in London a long while and was part of it and it of me.

Tonight to a ballet by Delibes, "Coppélia," in which the lifelike dolls of the doll-maker actually come to life, with interesting complications. These plots (i.e., Don Giovanni) are incredibly naïve. Wouldn't it be nice if authors could get away with such stuff today! Chrysanthi was very nice, as always.

Some kind of doll-maker with dolls coming alive would make a nice children's story. Must try.

Story: difficulty of seeing C. alone at Woodbrooke. Look forward to end of term, trip to Edinburgh. Same there. Look forward to London. Lady meets her at station, takes her away.

Intercourse with Chrysanthi. She has great sexual appetite. She told me of postwar developments in Greece. Not very nice. The anti-German underground, of which her younger brother was a member, tried to put in a liberal government after the war. They were infiltrated with communists and subsequently all those who were anti-German became considered communist (by identification). These people were routed by the American-financed rightists, composed of those who collaborated with the Germans. Then the so-called “communists” were slaughtered wholesale. C’s brother fled the country, but the government took her entire family into prison as reprisal and then decided to kill her older brother, who had done nothing, in the younger’s place. Then his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment; then, with a benevolent whim of the government, he was released. The man who ordered him to be killed was himself killed during the civil war when the “communists” had power for a short time. This man’s daughter is now C’s best friend—ironic. But the brother does not hold her father’s verdict against her. The present government really purged the anti-Germans. C. says they even killed 14 to 19 year old boys by changing their birth certificates to age 20 (age of legal responsibility). Lovely country!

Me (showing C. my “palace”): “How do you like my palace?”

C: “Your palace is you. I look at you, not at the room.”

To Cambridge: Very impressed with the Chapel of King’s College, especially the ceiling and choir. We sat in the back, partitioned off from the main section and the altar. After the service, while the organ was still playing some eerie music, everyone in the back tried to push through the small opening in the partition in order to see the other part of the chapel. The crowd pushing and the music somehow put me in mind of hell, as though some irresistible devilish fascination were compelling the crowd onward. But the front part of the chapel was very nice also.

Chrysanthi’s mother wrote that she understands that C. doesn’t want the boy she was arranged to marry, and that her parents will not press her too hard about it when she returns.

April 12, 1955

To Greek Orthodox service. Strange. Bearded men in black robes chanting and singing Bible texts, with the priest's intonations interspersed. The congregation small olive-skinned Greeks, few men, standing and sitting at the right time, and incessantly making the sign of the cross. Also talking during the service, admiring each other's dresses, and the like. Not a very meaningful time religious-wise, I venture. Even C. was disgusted. She wanted me to see a beautiful service but said that this one was terrible. We went shopping, walked, talked, ate kabobs in the Greek restaurant (Star Restaurant). She's marvelous!

Dorothy Irving, wardeness of Friends Centre, asked me where I was going after London. "Assisi," I said. "You're not going to York, then?" "No. Who wants to know?" "Oh, someone in Friends House was asking." I told all this to C. and she was very upset because Margaret Bachhaus had asked her if I was going to York, she had said No, but apparently Margaret was not satisfied and had to find out through this other kind of spying. C. was angry all morning over it. We walked to London Bridge, took the underground to my flat, had intercourse again, and ate supper. The contraceptive broke. Now what? C. is very sweet and I love her. Εἶναι πολὺ γλυκὴ καὶ τὴν ἀγαπῶ.

In the sun at Hampstead Heath. C. at York.

Lewis Benson and his "Four Principles of the Spiritual Reformation": Christ the Inward Teacher, Community, etc. Quaker worship the only way. His personal story: despair, search, relief in Spiritual Reformation, subsequent devotion to it. Study of Fox, 8 years off and on. Why doesn't he write his book and be done? Search for converts. Disappointment at rejection by Woodbrooke staff. Perhaps he's only satisfied while struggling. If people agreed with him perhaps it would be a disappointment. Printer by trade. No college education, but widely read, and a clear thinker within his strict limits. Never heard of Erskine Caldwell. Various jobs: librarian at Pendle Hill, warden of John Woolman's house in Mt. Holly, etc., etc. Nice wife and son, Johnny. She from original Pennsylvania farming stock, Quaker, her family land given originally by William Penn. Supports husband's views. (Does she really?)

Interesting contention that Quakerism is different in spirit as well as letter from both Catholicism and Protestantism, that Catholicism and Protestantism have inherent weaknesses that prohibit their attaining true Christianity. (Not just a case of Catholics and Protestants being weak; the very system a contradiction to worship in spirit and in truth; viz. programmed worship, putting all burdens on priest or minister, reliance on sacraments or Bible.) Lack of community in Catholicism and Protestantism. No corporate witness. Only corporate witness (i.e., peace) has been from Spiritual Reformation groups (Anabaptists, Mennonites, Quakers, Bruderhof, etc.). Christian practice must bring community, corporate witness; otherwise it is not full Christianity. Lewis's devotion, enthusiasm, but complete inability to see any point of view outside of his own system; his emotional involvement; its rationalizations.

C. and I visited a Greek girl from Salonica who married an Englishman now living in West Wycombe. The Greeks are charming. So easy-going and friendly compared to the English. I felt at home instantly; but when her husband came there was strain. And he tried to make conversation, which is more than many of them will do. We rushed back to hear Rafael Kubelik conduct Janáček's opera, Kat'a Kabanová. At first I liked the music (orchestra) but thought the vocal parts horrible and completely unrelated to anything, either the orchestral accompaniment or the plot. But later I began to see the really remarkable musical evocation of the meaning of the libretto, and the remarkable orchestral (and vocal) effects. A very moving work, if at first disconcerting. C. & I returned to the Centre, both sad at the coming parting. I went to her room and we had intercourse again, just naturally, because I hadn't planned it and was indeed a little wary of such doings in the Quaker Centre! But it just came. Sex for her is like eating, sleeping, evacuating. It should be, and should be enjoyed. Saturday we rushed around again in the morning, shopping. I was very extravagant and bought her a Parker 51 pen for Easter. What a sly one she is! She told me all along that the train left at 12 noon. At 11:30 we began rushing for the station, and I went towards a cab. "Don't," she said, "the train doesn't leave until 12:18." "But," I said, "you said 12." "I know. I figured that way perhaps we'd get there on time for 12:18." Lovely woman!

Heard from Reinoud, that marvelous man. What fortunate friends I have! Every word he writes breathes something. He's singing, playing, drawing, loving—and studying also. He wonders if he's lazy! God! And I got up at 10:30 this morning. I could kill myself whenever I do such stupid things. I'll visit him next week.

Gay Van der Meer, a tall ungainly Dutch girl from Den Haag, who was at Woodbrooke, is at Friends Centre now and constantly asking Chrysanthi where I am, why I don't come (I do, but only for C.), etc. Funny, she evidently likes me and wants to see me (no doubt about it, from what she says—her first greeting to C. was not “Hello. How are you?” but “Hello. Where's Peter?”). So many of these people I thought didn't like me, and yet C. tells me at Woodbrooke almost everyone did. It's hard to know. I still can't really accept myself. I can't even think why or how C. should love me so desperately. When I have faith in myself perhaps I'll really be able to work, instead of dilly-dallying around, as I am now doing. Enough!

This Greek friend of C.'s whom we visited at West Wycombe is also a refugee from the Greek system of arranged marriage. She didn't want to marry Κύριος X, but became resigned to it, or at least gave that impression. She had μία φίλη in England and μία άλλη φίλη in Greece advised her to visit England for a month, settle her mind, and then return prepared to marry. She left on this pretext but really planned never to come back, which plan, if she had told her family, would have prevented her from going at all. She came, met Mr. Z, Esq., and married! She reconciled with her family, too, and visits them each summer with her English husband. I suppose that Κύριος X found someone else. C. says that in Greece it's easy. Ὑπάγω νὰ γράψω τώρα.

Make use somehow of all the description of Walter's night at the 'Y'. Must not be extraneous to the plot, especially in a short story. Possible end: he decides to follow her on the train to France. “Why, Walter?”

“Well, I’m going to make myself into a Frenchman from a little village. Besides, trains seem to be the only place where we can be alone.”

The constant hovering of young unmarried men around Harold Carman’s young wife.

In the train to France, Walter and Nicolle alone in the compartment but then young newlyweds enter. The new husband and wife understand each other, the girls too, and the two couples kiss. The conductor passes their compartment but leaves it to last before disturbing them for their tickets.

Have Walter get bitter about everything, unreasonably so. Then put him in contact again with the mute, from whom he sees his own stupidity and stops self-pity. Then gaily to London, undaunted by Nicolle’s being snatched away again. And finally with her on the train to France. This will be good, if you can do it!

I resolved last night to cut the undertaker and the wake-scene from Kevin’s Emancipation. God, how it hurts to cut!

Zoersel, Belgium

Beautiful Youth Hostel here, built in rustic style with rounded logs for all supporting members, the logs secured one to another by bolts, not flush but side-by-side. The outside posts are set in the ground like this:

The dining room chairs are also noteworthy, and very comfortable. The seat is simply four slats. Four legs are inserted at 1, 2, 3, 4. They are dowels put through holes in the slats and then wedged tight like an axe handle. They each go out at an angle from the perpendicular. Two more dowels go in at 5 and 6, for the back.

Of course the slats are beveled and polished and varnished. A design could be painted on the back, too.

Well, I don't know wherefrom comes the energy for these observations, as I came in here really fatigué, with complaining calf-muscles and an aching right knee. Just couldn't go any further, though it was only about 5 p.m. Came from Gent today, about 60+ miles, so it was enough. Tomorrow to Piet Tuinman at Eindhoven.

Last Saturday C. came back from York looking a little strange, and very contradictory about her week: she didn't enjoy it, but enjoyed its usefulness, or something like that. She retired from any great social participation—dancing, talking, and the like—and thought the people there were rather frivolous. I rushed around at the last minute, as usual, but she came to “my palace,” where I packed up the rucksack; then we had intercourse and then rushed to the Festival Hall to hear Beecham do a Berlioz overture (oulalà), Dvořák cello concerto (ugh!), and the best playing of Brahms's First I have ever heard. I shouted bravo until I was hoarse, and so did everyone else. Then he played an encore and made a little speech, something about we'd all have to travel like Mr. Pickwick in a wheelbarrow because of the coming railway strike. A lovely concert.

Rushed again Sunday morning. Had much too much baggage for my bike. Shipped knapsack to Greece and then on Monday shipped laundry-case full to Paris, from Ostende. C. And I enjoyed each other's company, especially on the channel crossing; then I saw her off from Ostende on the Orient Express. It cost only £24 London to Salonica, with a sleeper. This biking business is so much foolishness.

Monday, Ostende to Ghent, and a look at some of the ancient building at the latter. Of course I'd been there before, and even remembered the Youth Hostel. Belgium is fantastically expensive. It costs 16 cents (USA) for a cup of coffee, but only $1.00 for breakfast, supper, and bed at the hostels. I am spending money recklessly, especially in London. When and how shall I earn some is the next question!

The houses in Belgium are beautiful; in England, absolutely horrible, except old Tudor or some Italian-imitation manor houses.

April 30, 1955

Contrast the plight of Piet Tuinman, whom I visited in Eindhoven, with the girl in the convertible at Utrecht. Piet was given a 1200 guilder scholarship but this was not enough to send him to university, he says, so all his bright ideas have been exchanged for a humdrum education course so he can teach 8-year-olds next year. The Utrecht girl: flitting around with too much money. Interesting, the contrasts: the Texan agriculturalist, the English uppity language student, the flitty Dutch girl, and me. We saw the famous old Dom and Tower, then rode and rode nowhere in the convertible, the Dutch girl trying to date up the Texan, dismayed by the fact that he was married.

Wednesday at Eindhoven, not a very special sort of city, size of Rochester, NY but much cleaner and pleasanter; very modern. One main industry: Phillips. Piet Tuinman's father a post office official, his sister a telegraph operator. New flat, no bathroom, only toilet and douche; wash in the kitchen.

Thursday by train to Utrecht, then that evening to Assen, which is like home. Reinoud not changed; Hans grown tall. What a lovely family life, still—as it was three years ago. I envy Reinoud his childhood and youth. Now he conducts the students choir in the high school in Assen; and studies theology at Groningen, coming home each weekend. But with the theology is mixed playing in a student orchestra, singing in the chorus (St. Matthew Passion, Judas Maccabaeus) and doing chamber music.

I am beginning to regret seriously my decision not to attend the university next year. If I had had a home and tradition like the Oorts' I would have studied medicine without thinking twice about it, and probably have been much better off, instead of flying around Europe because I happen now to have a little money that soon will be gone, and then what? Writing is good, but anti-social. I would like also to work among people. What stops me from making the decision, the commitment? And time goes. Next month I am twenty-five. My contemporaries will soon be graduated as Ph.D.'s, doctors, lawyers. And I? Is the writing another escape-latch, or can I really do it, and is it worthwhile at that? But one thing is sure: I must work; and I cannot work as I live now, going from place to place. Fool!

Withal, I've been having a happy time. Reinoud is splendid, as before. Today we biked 70 kilometers to Groningen and back, because he had to rehearse a Beethoven trio. Saw burial stones from tribes ca. 4000 B.C.; also a church, part of which dates from A.D. 600. The burial stones were arranged as at Stonehenge in England. Reinoud says there are several such remains in the vicinity.

Finished first draft of Walter-Nicolle story, so it won't ramble on forever, only almost forever. I'll try to do something short and compact now.

Drive to the very isolated cabin for skiing. Plan to meet Joan's brother from Vermont. Describe road to him, the sign at junction. Arrive, but sign gone. What to do? No paints to make another. He'll take care of himself until morning. We'll sleep here. Sex. But car comes. Joan ashamed for her brother to see her as she is; runs wildly out into snow, naked. But it's not her brother—a fugitive seeking warmth. Jimmy pleads to call Joan back. Fugitive thinks it's a ruse. Argue. Time passes. Fugitive wants to rape her, takes a chance with Jimmy. Jimmy calls and calls. No answer. Fugitive tells him to build up fire, it's freezing. Perhaps instead of all this fugitive nonsense, Jimmy is simply presented (when the brother does not come) with the opportunity of seducing her. What he does or does not do with the opportunity.

Chez Pot. 26 Verlang de Grachtstraat, where Reinoud rents a lovely room @ 27,50 guilder a month. I look out the window. A lady brushes the sidewalk, sponges her windows which already are immaculate. Man comes and ladles out milk into a pot. Cart comes with vegetables, canned goods, but beautiful and clean, not like our peddlers. Lady goes from door to door asking something. Everyone says No. Perhaps she's a washerwoman. Bread man comes; now a cart to sharpen knives. Beautiful little blond-haired boys now, coming home from school, jumping up to try to touch the fringe of the awning in front of the pastry-shop across the street.

"The Jockey," by Carson McCullers, w.c. 2000+. J. enters room, describe room. He sees table, expresses his contempt, etc., with clenched fingers. Describe J's clothes. Men at table see him but he doesn't nod. Describe men at table. Owner wants J. to table. Trainer says No, tells that J. is crazy. Owner naïve. Describe reason for J's "craziness." Then bit about food—Saratoga. "Wait," he's coming over. J. with chip on shoulder, orders drink. Looks at food, but then keeps eyes on flowers. Contrast fine dinner of 3 men with "Some people might call it that dinner of J." Friend's leg short. "Well those things happen": from rich man. Three men finish dinner. Food left. J. sarcastic. Drinks. Gains weight. Alone at bar; other people in couples (entrée described earlier—two girls in blazers). Pays with $50 bill. Returns to table; seat rattles; spits out potatoes on the floor. Libertines. Out. Sylvester shrugs shoulder.

Try something with this as a model. Refugee woman in Friends Centre perhaps. The well-fed Friends there well-meaning, but have had their fill of refugees and consider this one just an annoying hanger-on, always dreaming of finding enough money somewhere to go to America. Three months in Paris, three in London because of visa difficulties. Trained psychologist, specialist in Rorschach test. Thinks she can start in a university job. I must disillusion her about that. So many young psychologists turned out. Contrast the meal and the discussion with the refugee's plight. Perhaps discussion à la spiritual reformation. Refugee not sarcastic, but knows how to make you pity her. British people talking with American as she comes in. He wonders why they are so cold; shows he is a little angry. They explain about her. She sees he is new bait and gets him in a corner when he is alone. "How lucky you are to be an American.” “Can I have addresses?” etc. The 50+-year-old professional woman “begging” in this way from a pip-squeak student. She watches them eat always, but when they invite her she says No, she has her own resources. Wants pity, and yet won’t accept it: a kind of technique.

First half above went well this morning. Bring back Cedric and Wallis somehow. Woman must pounce on Elton during dessert until even he sees that the British attitude was perhaps justified. It will work out.

Reinoud and Brecht. Adolescent selfishness. Episode with organ. Young love, etc.

The boy and girl on the doorstep. I watched them from the Quaker Center in Amsterdam while I was typing a manuscript. First boy talked much. Then girl. Then boy silent, girl talked. Then both silent, looking at ground. Begin to notice goings on in the street, to make conversation. Newspaper is delivered, and that suffices for ten minutes or so; then awkward silence again. Boy gets on his bike to go. But doesn’t go. Just sits on bike there full half hour. Conversation waxes and wanes. Finally he goes.

Lovely walk through Sacré Coeur district last night with fellow from South Africa named Wiit, an architect studying painting. He slept a lot, early to bed and late to rise. Met Douglas Steere’s daughter at Quaker Meeting. Visited Grand-mère Giniger, qui habite un appartement très à la mode, Rue Paul Dupuy. Moved to SCI hostel, 77 Boul. Jean-Jaurès, Clichy. The International Secretary is a Dutch girl, half Indonesian, very pronounced Indonesian features, but white skin, light hair, and rosy cheeks. An odd mixture indeed. Casino de Paris very disappointing. Lousy dancing and music, and the nudity too immediately and completely nude to be very sexy. Visited Franciscan center. The monks very jolly and busy, winking to each other when a certain person entered.

Père Gabriel will see if he can get me into a monastery near Paris for a week's visit. Finished Refugee Woman story. Would like to try another now with similar technique. Tight. This one should be pared down from 3750 to about 2000 or 2500 words, but it is so hard to cut! C. writes soulful letters. Got a scholar's card to use the Bibliothèque Nationale, after some red tape. Retrieved my laundry case after two hours through the bureaucracy à la Gare, and payment of presque 1000 fr. Extra. An expensive saving, n'est-ce pas? But the retrieving was humorous. So many papers, so many people involved with this one small item!

Sitting in Salle de Travail du Bibliothèque Nationale. St. Francis parallel to King Lear. Our emotional sympathy is entirely with him, yet one must admit that his ideas for conduct of an order, which had grown so large, were not practical. (?) Elias the big bad villain. Compare anguish of Francis's exclamation on his deathbed with anything in Lear. "Où sont ceux qui m'ont volé mon ordre et qui ont arraché mes frères de mes mains? Si je puis aller au prochain chapitre, je leur montrerai bien quelle est ma volonté!"

Same. Francis could be treated like "Soah" in the play. Modern dress. He is absolutely impossible in the rationalistic sense (e.g., gives last psalter to buy bread for an old woman) but he enlists our sympathy nevertheless.

¶ "The most formidable liberal philosophers have called the monks melancholy because they denied themselves the pleasures of liberty and marriage. They might as well call the trippers on a Bank Holiday melancholy because they deny themselves the pleasures of silence and meditation." —G. K. Chesterton, "Twelve Types."

From Cuthbert's St. Francis, this tale of the merchant Luchasio, whom tradition says was the first member of the 3rd Order. In his young days Luchasio was a successful merchant at Cagiano in the territory of Siena. He was known as a gay spirit with ambitions to rise in the world; and he was not above paying court to the nobles and men of influence, whom he would oblige with his money and delight with his ready wit. He married a woman of sensibility and beauty, who shared his ambitions and contributed not a little to his popularity. People named her Buona Donna, the gracious lady. . . . Luchasio was an ardent politician: he could hardly have attained to any social consideration if he had not been. Then, with a turn of the wheel, fortune went against the Guelphs and in favor of the Ghibellines, and Luchasio had to flee for safety into the friendly Florentine town of Poggibonzi. Adversity and exile chastened his spirit and his thoughts turned to religion. Thus he was prepared to listen when Francis came searching for souls. With the consent of his faithful Buona Donna, Luchasio now sold his property, all except four acres of land, and distributed the money to the poor. Then husband and wife received from Francis the colorless woolen habit of the penitents. From that time Luchasio worked his own small farm and lived on its produce. His house became a hostelry for the poor whom Francis-like he fed daily before he fed himself. Frequently he would take long journeys seeking out the sick, and finding them he would bring them to his house, sometimes putting them upon an ass, at other times bearing them on his shoulders: and Buona Donna received and nursed them. On occasions when the malaria was abroad, Luchasio would journey to stricken districts even as far as the seacoast, to distribute medicines and food. When his own means ran short he went round questing from his neighbors for the wherewithal to feed the hungry, etc. until both died about the same time: "In death they were not divided."

Tirée d' Albert Camus, La Peste:

¶ Ce qui est plus original dans notre ville est la difficulté qu'on peut y trouver à mourir. Difficulté, d'ailleurs, n'est pas le bon mot et il serait plus juste de parler d'inconfort. Ce n'est jamais agréable d'être malade, mais il y a des villes et des pays qui vous soutiennent dans la maladie, où l'on peut, en quelque sorte, se laisser aller. Une maladie a besoin de douceur, il aime à s'appuyer sur quelque chose, c'est bien naturel. Mais à Oran, les excès du climat, l'importance des affaires qu'on y traite, l'insignifiance du décor, la rapidité du crépuscule et la qualité des plaisirs, tout demande la bonne santé. Un malade s'y trouve bien seul. Qu'on pense alors à celui qui va mourir, pris au piège derrière des centaines de murs crépitants de chaleur, pendant qu'à la même minute, toute une population, au téléphone ou dans les cafés, parle de traites, de connaissances et d'escompte. On comprendra ce qu'il peut y avoir d'inconfortable dans la mort, même moderne, lorsqu'elle survient ainsi dans un lieu sec.

¶ Le soir, dans tous les cas, le concierge délirait et, à quarante degrés, se plaignait des rats. Rieux tenta un abcès de fixation. Sous la brûlure de la térébenthine, le concierge hurla: «Ah! Les cochons!»

Les ganglions avaient encore grossi, durs et ligneux au toucher. La femme du concierge s'affolait:

— Veillez, lui dit le docteur, et appelez-moi s'il y a lieu.

Le lendemain, 30 avril, une brise déjà tiède soufflait dans un ciel bleu et humide. Elle apportait une odeur de fleurs qui venait des banlieues les plus lointaines. Les bruits du matin dans les rues semblaient plus vifs, plus joyeux qu'à l'ordinaire. Dans toute notre petite ville, débarrassée de la sourde apprehension où elle avait vécu pendant la semaine, ce jour-là était celui du renouveau. Rieux lui-même, rassuré par une lettre de sa femme, descendit chez le concierge avec légèreté. Et en effet, au matin, la fièvre était tombée à trente-huit degrés. Affaibli, le malade souriait dans son lit.

— Cela va mieux, n'est-ce pas, docteur? Dit sa femme.

— Attendons encore.

Mais à midi, la fièvre était montée d'un seul coup à quarante degrés, le malade délirait sans arrêt et les vomissements avaient repris. Les ganglions du cou étaient douloureux au toucher et le concierge semblait vouloir tenir sa tête le plus possible éloignée du corps. Sa femme était assise au pied du lit, les mains sur la couverture, tenant doucement les pieds du malade. Elle regardait Rieux.

— Écoutez, dit celui-ci, il faut l'isoler et tenter un traitement d'exception. Je téléphone à l'hôpital et nous le transporterons en ambulance.

Deux heures après, dans l'ambulance, le docteur et la femme se penchaient sur le malade. De sa bouche tapissée de fongosités, des bribes de mots sortaient: «Les rats!» disait-il. Verdâtre, les lèvres cireuses, les paupières plombées, le soufflé saccadé et court, écartlé par des ganglions, tassé au fond de sa couchette comme s'il eût voulu la refermer sur lui ou comme si quelque chose, venu du fond de la terre, l'appelait sans répit, le concierge étouffait sous une pesée invisible. La femme pleurait.

— N'y a-t'il donc plus d'espoir, docteur?

—Il est mort, dit Rieux.

¶ La mort du concierge, il est possible de le dire, marqua la fin de cette période remplie de signes déconcertants et le début d'une autre, relativement plus difficile, où la surprise des premiers temps se transforma peu à peu en panique. Nos concitoyens, ils s'en rendaient compte désormais, n'avaient jamais pensé que notre petite ville pût être un lieu particulièrement désigné pour que les rats y meurent au soleil et que les concierges y périssent de maladies bizarres. De ce point de vue, ils se trouvaient en somme dans l'erreur et leurs idées étaient à reviser. Si tout s'était arrêté là, les habitudes sans doute l'eussent emporté. Mais d'autres parmi nos concitoyens, et qui n'étaient pas toujours concierges ni pauvres, durent suivre la route sur laquelle M. Michel s'était engagé le premier. C'est à partir de ce moment que la peur, et la réflexion avec elle, commencèrent.

Cependant, avant d'entrer dans le détail de ces nouveaux événements, le narrateur croit utile de donner sur la période qui vient d'être décrite l'opinion d'un autre témoin. Jean Tarrou, qu'on a déjà rencontré au début de ce récit, s'était fixé à Oran quelques semaines plus tôt . . . [Camus quotes here from Tarrou's "diary" about the rats, etc., and ends the chapter thus:] A titre documentaire, on peut enfin reproduire le portrait du docteur Rieux par Tarrou. Autant que le narrateur puisse juger, il est assez fidèle:

«Paraît trente-cinq ans. Taille moyenne. Les épaules fortes. Visage presque rectangulaire. Les yeux sombres et droits, mais les mâchoires saillantes. Le nez fort est régulier. Cheveux noirs coupés très courts. La bouche est arquée avec des lèvres pleines et presque toujours serrées. Il a un peu l'air d'un paysan sicilien avec sa peau cuite, son poil noir et ses vêtements de teintes toujours foncées, mais qui lui vont bien.

«Il marche vite. Il descend les trottoirs sans changer son allure, mais deux fois sur trois remonte sur le trottoir opposé en faisant un léger saut. Il est distrait au volant de son auto et laisse souvent ses flèches de direction levées, même après qu'il ait effectué son tournant. Toujours nu-tête. L'air renseigné.»

¶ Le mot de «peste» venait d'être prononcé pour la première fois. À ce point du récit qui laisse Bernard Rieux derrière sa fenêtre, on permettra au narrateur de justifier l'incertitude et la surprise du docteur, puis que, avec des nuances, sa réaction fut celle de la plupart de nos concitoyens. Les fléaux, en effet, sont une chose commune, mais on croit difficilement

aux fléaux lorsqu'ils vous tombent sur la tête. Il y a eu dans le monde autant de pestes que de guerres. Et pourtant pestes et guerres trouvent les gens toujours aussi dépourvus. Le docteur Rieux était dépourvu, comme l'étaient nos concitoyens, et c'est ainsi qu'il faut comprendre ses hésitations. C'est ainsi qu'il faut comprendre aussi qu'il fut partagé entre l'inquiétude et la confiance. Quand une guerre éclate, les gens disent: «Ça ne durera pas, c'est trop bête.» Et sans doute une guerre est certainement trop bête, mais cela ne l'empêche pas de durer. La bêtise insiste toujours, on s'en apercevrait si l'on ne pensait pas toujours à soi. Nos concitoyens à cet égard étaient comme tout le monde, ils pensaient à eux-mêmes, autrement dit ils étaient humanistes; ils ne croyaient pas aux fléaux. Le fléau n'est pas à la mesure de l'homme, on se dit donc que le fléau est irréel, c'est un mauvais rêve qui va passer. Mais il ne passe pas toujours et, de mauvais rêve en mauvais rêve, ce sont les hommes qui passent, et les humanistes, en premier lieu, parce qu'ils n'ont pas pris leurs précautions. Nos concitoyens n'étaient pas plus coupables que d'autres, ils oubliaient d'être modestes, voilà tout, et ils pensaient que tout était encore possible pour eux, ce qui supposait que les fléaux étaient impossibles. Ils continuaient de faire des affaires, ils préparaient des voyages et ils avaient des opinions. Comment auraient-ils pensé à la peste qui supprime l'avenir, les déplacements et les discussions? Ils se croyaient libres et personne ne sera jamais libre tant qu'il y aura des fléaux.

Et même après que le docteur Rieux eut reconnu devant son ami qu'une poignée de malades dispersés venaient, sans avertissement, de mourir de la peste, le danger demeurerait irréel pour lui. . . . Il essayait de rassembler dans son esprit ce qu'il savait de cette maladie. Des chiffres flottaient dans sa mémoire et il se disait que la trentaine de grandes pestes que l'histoire a connues avait fait près de cent millions de morts. Mais qu'est-ce que cent millions de morts? Quand on a fait la guerre, c'est à peine si on sait déjà ce que c'est qu'un mort. Et puis qu'un homme mort n'a de poids que si on l'a vu mort, cent millions de cadavres semés à travers l'histoire ne sont qu'une fumée dans l'imagination. Le docteur se souvenait de la peste de Constantinople qui, selon Procope, avait fait dix mille victimes en un jour. Dix mille morts font cinq fois le public d'un grand cinéma. Voilà ce qu'il faudrait faire. On rassemble les gens à la sortie de cinq cinémas, on les conduit sur une place de la ville et on les fait mourir en tas pour y voir un peu clair. Au moins, on pour-rait mettre alors des visages connus sur cet entassement anonyme. Mais, naturellement, c'est impossible à réaliser, et puis qui connaît dix milles visages? D'ailleurs, des gens comme Procope ne savaient pas compter, la chose est connue. À Canton, il y avait soixante-dix ans, quarante mille rats étaient morts de la peste avant que le fléau s'intéressât aux habitants. Mais, en 1871, on n'avait pas le moyen de compter les rats. On faisait son calcul approximativement, en gros, avec des chances évidentes d'erreur. Pourtant, si un rat a trente centimètres de long, quarante mille rats mis bout à bout feraient . . .

Mais le docteur s'impatientait. Il se laissait aller et il ne le fallait pas. Quelques cas ne font pas une épidémie et il suffit de prendre des précautions. Il fallait s'en tenir à ce qu'on savait, la stupeur et la prostration, les yeux rouges, la bouche sale, les maux de tête, les bubons, la soif terrible, le délire, les taches sur le corps, l'écartèlement intérieur, et au bout de tout cela . . . Au bout de tout cela, une phrase revenait au docteur Rieux, une phrase qui terminait justement dans son manuel l'énumération des symptômes: «Le pouls devient filiforme et la mort survient à l'occasion d'un mouvement insignifiant.» Oui, au bout de tout cela, on était pendu à un fil et les trois quarts des gens, c'était le chiffre exact, étaient assez impatients pour faire ce mouvement imperceptible qui les précipitait . . . ¶ Ce qui fait la beauté de l'histoire, c'est la lutte, et ici la lutte n'est pas entre l'homme et les éléments comme dans les temps préhistorique, entre l'homme et les animaux comme à l'aube de la civilisation, entre les nations comme plus près de nous, c'est la lutte de l'homme contre lui-même. Ce n'est pas l'homme luttant pour la vie, pour le pain, pour l'honneur, c'est l'homme luttant pour la conscience. L'unité de la famille humaine est réalisée, consacrée, vécue. Ce n'est plus la vérité tombant, mystérieuse, du ciel, c'est la vérité conquise pas à pas. —Sabatier, Études inédites sur Saint François d'Assise, p. 321.

—Writing the letter for the woman atop Salonika hill, ἀκρόπολις. “Tell them my husband has only one foot.” Τοὺς λέγετε πῶς ὁ σύζυγός μου ἔχει μόνον ἓνα πόδι.

Dr. William Porter is gently awakened by his wife, who has been preparing breakfast and darning their son’s socks. It is very early because on operation days he likes to make the first incision at 7:30 sharp and he thinks now what a good wife he has to bother getting up when other women would let their husbands fix their own breakfasts at such an hour. He dresses, admiring himself in the mirror, though angry at the pouch which certainly is developing. He always makes a good impression, especially on the young beautiful nurses at the hospital. The blond, for instance, who now is absolutely goo-goo about him, though he doesn’t even know her name. He’ll string her along for the fun of it. He fixes a carnation in his lapel, admiring his steady hand. Breakfast is ready. He kisses his wife. The paper and much mail is next to his plate. There are many letters of grateful appreciation from his patients. He cannot suppress his vanity. He thinks how pleasant it is to have the world at his feet. It is time for his young son to get up, and the doctor wakes him and plays with him a bit. Family solidarity. He gets ready. His wife asks what is booked and he tells her briefly. She reminds him that they have theater tickets for the evening. On the way to the hospital in his Cadillac he thinks of the work before him, and of the problems of the patients involved. His entry, as always, is triumphal; and there is a good crowd of young doctors already gowned to watch him. (Describe gowning procedure, etc.) The blond—named Leila—is the scrub nurse. She is so affected when he enters that she drops something. He flirts with her all through the procedure. Others marvel at his calmness, coolness—to be able to flirt and joke while operating. In between operations his wife calls to ask a silly question about supper. He congratulates himself on not getting angry that such an important man as himself should be disturbed over such a trifle. He likes his wife’s dependence, her total admiration almost to the point of incapacity. He returns the admiration, but flirts more with Leila, although she means nothing to him. Lunch in cafeteria. Overhears people talking about his skill. Furtive winks to Leila. Tells other doctors, jokingly, how irresistible she is. Then to office. His schedule is filled and he is rather annoyed when Leila calls (only he doesn't know who she is by name). She hems and haws, and he says, "Either say what you want or hang up, because I'm busy." She hangs up. At the end of the day he returns home. Plays with his son; greets his wife lovingly. They start dinner, but in the middle Leila calls again, and he is rather annoyed. She propositions him. "Are you a man?" He is angry. He says he has no time to be bothered by practical jokers. His wife asks who it was, and he answers, nobody—some idiot. They finish dinner and go off to the theater. Next morning at the hospital Dr. Porter notices that the blond is not there. He asks where she is, still not connecting her up with the person who telephoned. Another nurse says that Leila for some unknown reason resigned the night before and left. Dr. Porter laughs. He says it must have had something to do with a boy-friend back home. Then, to the new nurse, in the same flirting tone he had used with Leila, "Well, it doesn't matter, sweetie. You're cute, too. Come on, let's begin."

¶ It is said that in place of the girdle which he had flung off (perhaps with the more symbolic scorn because it probably carried the purse or wallet by the fashion of the period) he picked up a rope more or less at random, because it was lying near, and tied it around his waist. He undoubtedly meant it as a shabby expedient; rather as the very destitute tramp will sometimes tie his clothes together with a piece of string. He meant to strike the note of collecting his clothes anyhow, like rags from a succession of dust-bins. Ten years later that makeshift costume was the uniform of five thousand men; and a hundred years later, in that, for a pontifical panoply, they laid great Dane in the grave. —Chesterton.

Over and under, over and under, went a leg along a wing as the stone goes over and under the scythe”; [from The Stranger] “there was the great blind bed, with his coat flung across it like some headless man saying his prayers”; [from The Doll's House] “She was a tiny wishbone of a child, with cropped hair and enormous solemn eyes—a little white owl.”

¶ The old people sat on the bench, still as statues. Never mind, there was always the crowd to watch. To and fro, in front of the flowerbeds and the band rotunda, the couples and groups paraded, stopped to talk, to greet, to buy a handful of flowers from the old beggar who had his tray fixed to the railings. Little children ran among them, swooping and laughing, little boys with big white silk bows under their chins; little girls, little French dolls, dressed up in velvet and lace. And sometimes a tiny staggerer came suddenly rocking into the open from under the trees, stopped, stared, as suddenly sat down ‘flop,’ until its small high-stepping mother, like a young hen, rushed scolding to its rescue. Other people sat on the benches and green chairs, but they were nearly always the same, Sunday after Sunday, and—Miss Brill had often noticed—there was something funny about nearly all of them. They were old, silent, nearly all old, and from the way they stared they looked as though they’d just come from dark little rooms or even—even—cupboards!

Behind the rotunda the slender trees with yellow leaves down drooping, and through them just a line of sea, and beyond the blue sky with gold-veined clouds.

¶ My little sisters the birds, you owe much to God, your Creator, and you ought to sing His praise at all times and in all places, because He has given you liberty to fly about into all places; and though you neither spin nor sew, He has given you a twofold and a threefold clothing for yourselves and for your offspring. Two of your species He sent into the Ark with Noah that you might not be lost to the world; besides which He feeds you, though you neither sow nor reap. He has given you fountains and rivers to quench your thirst, mountains and valleys in which to take refuge, and trees in which to build your nests; so that your Creator loves you much, having thus favored you with such bounties. Beware, my little sisters, of the sin of ingratitude, and study always to give praise to God. —St. Francis of Assisi

¶ The Picton boat was due to leave at half-past eleven. It was a beautiful night, mild, starry, only when they got out of the cab and started to walk down the Old Wharf that jutted out into the harbour, a faint wind blowing off the water ruffled under Fenella's hat, and she put up her hand to keep it on. It was dark on the Old Wharf, very dark; the wool sheds, the cattle trucks, the cranes standing up so high, the little squat railway engine, all seemed carved out of solid darkness. Here and there on a rounded wood-pile, that was like the stalk of a huge black mushroom, there hung a lantern, but it seemed afraid to unfurl its timid, quivering light in all that blackness; it burned softly, as if for itself.

Fenella's father pushed on with quick, nervous strides. Beside him her grandma bustled along in her crackling black ulster; they went so fast that she had now and again to give an undignified little skip to keep up with them. As well as her luggage strapped into a neat sausage, Fenella carried clasped to her her grandma's umbrella, and the handle, which was a swan's head, kept giving her shoulder a sharp little peck as if it too wanted her to hurry. . . . Men, their caps pulled down, their collars turned up, swung by; a few women all muffled scurried along; and one tiny boy, only his little black arms and legs showing out of a white woolly shawl, was jerked along angrily between his father and mother; he looked like a baby fly that had fallen into the cream.

Then suddenly, so suddenly that Fenella and her grandma both leapt, there sounded from behind the largest wool shed, that had a trail of smoke hanging over it, Mia-oo-oo-O-O!

'First whistle,' said her father briefly, and at that moment they came in sight of the Picton boat. —Mansfield, "The Voyage"

¶ There sounded from above a long, soft whispering, as though someone was gently, gently rustling among tissue paper to find something. It was grandma saying her prayers. . . .

¶ But if it had been cold in the cabin, on deck it was like ice. The sun was not up yet, but the stars were dim, and the cold pale sky was the same colour as the cold pale sea.

¶ Fenella put her hand on the gate, and the big, trembling dew-drops soaked through her glove-tips.

¶ People went flitting by, very fast; the men walked like scissors; the women trod like cats. —Life of Ma Parker

À la “Life of Ma Parker”: something on village misery here.

June 28, 1955

O God! What a time last night! The culmination of all the difficulties with Mr. Lindsay. Saturday C. didn’t come home; Sunday she said how he had yelled at her again, said unkind things about me, that she was deserting the school, what would people think, that I was rushing her unwisely: I should return to America and return after a year if I really loved her, etc., etc. Of course this had been going on for weeks, with C. coming home absolutely broken and furious at them. But still, in her way, she would never show it to them. Saturday night also, at the Examiner's party, Dimitrios came home fuming because he had asked for C. to return with the family, and Mrs. Lindsay had replied in a rude tone, ἄν θέλει, meaning obviously that she had better well not. Then came the question of the doctor's appointment on Monday. C. and I had arranged for it ten days ago and I told C. over and over again to quickly tell Lindsay so she would be sure to have permission. Day after day I asked if she had told him, and she said No, but said it didn't matter because the staff had arranged for their holidays to begin on Monday anyway. Then Mrs. Lindsay heard about this holiday arrangement and fumed and said they had no right even to talk about it until the directors decided when the work could be finished. So we found ourselves still with the doctor's appointment, but with Chrysanthi also expected at school that day. But still on Saturday and Sunday she didn't tell him because, she said, she was so afraid of him lest he repeat the outbursts against me and the marriage that she had suffered previously. I of course insisted that she go to the doctor's, and she saw the correctness of my desire, since we had the appointment for ten days and needed the exam results before getting married. First C. didn't even want to call the school, but later we thought it best, and Sunday evening contacted Loudha, a staff girl, who said she'd relay the message to Lindsays, but that C. should call back at eleven to speak to them personally. We went to Vouli's house, and C. poured out all her resentment against what Lindsays had done to her since my arrival. Then we went with them to a village and when we returned the stores were shut and it was too late to find a phone.

Monday, at the doctor's, C. was very worried about Lindsays. We called and called, but the telephone was broken. When we finally returned to the house we found a note from Lindsay himself: "Dear Chrysanthi, Muriel and I were surprised at the telephone message which Loudha gave us last evening. We thought that you would telephone again to know if you had permission to stay away from our Staff meeting this morning. The rest of the Staff met. How can you expect or hope for happiness if you fail in the duty and loyalty toward the school and the rest of the Staff. If you look for happiness at the expense of duty, it doesn't happen; this is selfishness. Would it not be a good idea if you and Peter came to tell us your plans? We do prefer to hear from you rather than from others. Our love, Charles."

This, on top of sleepless nights, and all the afternoon on the toilet giving the doctor stool specimens, was hard to take. We decided the last sentence was an opening, and we should go. I wanted first of all to tell Lindsay how much he hurt C. and that the reason she never told him about the doctor was because she was so afraid of him. But when I told her this she begged and begged me not to do it. "He'll suffer," she said. "He'll be sick tomorrow, and I can't see that. . . . No, put all the blame on me. Please, Peter, please. We'll just tell our plans, like he says—nothing else." She told me that all the staff were afraid of him, that he knew it himself even. But we mustn't say it to him, mustn't, mustn't, because he had so many troubles, was so sick, etc., etc. And how would she face him the next day!

Well, we ate, and started to go, with Lola also. Just then some of C.'s friends came to congratulate her on the engagement, and we had an agonizing hour talking about dresses and how well I spoke Greek, waiting for them to go. Finally they did. We took a taxi to the school, found the staff in the common room. Then Muriel came and I said we wanted to see Charles and herself. "Oh, Charles is very sick, in bed; but I'll see." (She returned saying that he said since it was the first time Peter had ever asked to see him, he'd get out of bed. We went. But he said he wanted to see me alone, so C. and Lola went out. Then the business started. First about the medical appointment. I said we had arranged for it ten days ago. "Ah," Charles said to his wife, "remember that!" The tone of a barrister. "Why, I asked?" "Because C. told us she had only definitely made up her mind two days ago." "Ah, that's what she told you." "We're accustomed to hearing the truth." "I'm sorry to disillusion you there, because this wasn't the truth." Then I explained why she had been so tardy with this news and had not said anything at all about the doctor's appointment, because he had hurt her. "No, how, when, impossible!" I spoke about his temper, his screaming. They denied it. Muriel was always being difficult, saying in a self-pitying tone, "But how can you expect to be married so soon," etc., etc. very argumentatively; and luckily Charles always told her to “shut up,” and “if you can’t shut up, get the hell out.” I enjoyed that.

It was evident that Chrysanthi would have to be called in. Muriel got her. We confronted her with my story and Charles’s, and he asked if he had ever yelled. And, damn it, she said “No.” He asked if she or Muriel ever hurt her. She said “No.” I was a little disconcerted. It put me in a very bad light. I explained how because she was so afraid she begged me not to say such things to him. He said that it was evident that someone was lying. We pressed C. more on the point of being hurt, and she finally admitted half under her breath that, yes, when he had said things against me, naturally she was hurt because we were one, and she loved me. “Ah,” said Charles, “but you told me you didn’t love him.” Another blow. God! What to believe! “You told me you didn’t love him and you had decided to marry to avoid that other arranged marriage.” This was heavy for me. It came out that she of course had lied to him, because certainly she told her family she loved me—and was trying childishly to stall Lindsay off, again because of her feeling of guilt and desire not to have scenes. C. involved herself in a whole cobweb of lies with him, and then found herself caught, as though she were the unlucky fly and not the spider who had made the web in the first place. Lindsay, believing that she didn’t love me, and that I was rushing her into the marriage, tried to do everything he could to prevent it—the whole trouble thus arising from his misinformation. “Had I known it was love,” he said, “I would have been exceedingly happy for Chrysanthi”—sorry, of course, to have her leave the school—”but I would have given my blessing. What else could I do? Love sweeps over all other considerations.”

We saw the picture of C. trying to sustain one story with her parents, another with Lindsays—and really caught between the two as it became more and more difficult to keep each story consistent with itself.

We touched other questions also, impressed on C. the necessity for telling the truth always, and this brought us to my signing the paper that our children would become Greek Orthodox. I had very little defense against the wrongness of this signing. I also quoted, as poof of Lindsay’s temper, the witness of Βούλη, Elanoula, the fiancée of Socrates, etc., but Lindsay denied it all, saying it was part of the Greeks’ temperament to project on someone else all their own sins. The damn thing was that I found myself believing him. C. also described how mean the staff had been to her when she returned. When C. went out later, Lindsay said that this could not be true, because he saw how the staff greeted C., and it was with joy. Later I thought of course that the way the staff would act in Lindsay's presence and when alone might be two entirely different things, again proving their fear of him. And I remembered later also that C. had written how mean the staff had been to her. Why would she make it up? Of course she was telling the truth; but I, damn it, despite myself, believed Lindsay, at least for the moment.

Well, finally we left. We were all very quiet on the way to the Depot. It was very late. They said there would be a staff meeting tomorrow (Tuesday). I asked if C. could come on the 9 o'clock bus instead of the 7:30 one. Immediately Muriel said "No, no," annoyed. But Charles said, "Yes, we can arrange to meet later." Muriel had then the real opportunity to show she had a little human sympathy in her, and she muffed it. I could kill myself for not thinking of it at the time to tell her. (P.S. C., true to form, went at 7:30 despite my protests, after 4 hours' sleep.) Later, Lola asked what had taken place, and I, rather meanly in C.'s presence, explained that it was all C.'s fault because she had never told Lindsay the truth and, considering the information they had to work with, his actions didn't seem so demonic. C. got angry and said, "But didn't you see the way Muriel was tonight even? How she immediately loses control of herself, and how the staff wished us good luck against the fearful tyrant?" "Yes, yes, of course I noticed it. But damn it, Chrysanthi, when I told him you had come home so hurt, and he asked you if it was true that he had hurt you or frightened you, you said No, it wasn't true. What the hell was I to do then? You've got to say the truth, not one thing to one person and another to another person." C. was very broken, and when we got home the father also asked what had happened. Lola said that I said Lindsay was right, because C. had lied to him, and then he burst out with "We're the family here, not Lindsay! What does it matter what he is told?" C., having to listen to it all, of course, and no one caring very much to comfort her, was after all bearing more than anyone else. I went over finally and she cried openly. But the father didn't show much sympathy. "Cry-baby, crybaby, baw, baw, baw!" And they all stupidly stayed in the room, talking, talking. Finally they left. C. wouldn't let me hold her, told me to go away, too; but I wouldn't. Lola came back again and chatted. Oh agony. Δύσκολο! Finally she went to bed. C. still crying, not talking. I said I loved her. She sobbed no, she didn't want love any more. "Go away, please." I stayed. She calmed after a while, and showed she wanted me to kiss her. Finally I felt I could go. "Before I leave you," I said, "I want you to tell me the truth: do you love me or don't you?" It was a big mistake. She broke down worse than before. "Do I have to tell you?" she gasped. "If you don't know now, if I haven't shown you yet, how can I ever make you believe it by telling you?" I apologized, said of course I knew she loved me. She'd shown me more love I think than any man ever received before. "No," she said, "You believe Mr. Lindsay. He's a Quaker, so you believe him." "I don't believe him," I said. I said it over and over and she believed me. We kissed. I undressed and we had intercourse. "If we have a baby from this," she said at the end, "it will be sweet, because we loved." I left her, exhausted. Her last thought was: "Oh, how can I go there tomorrow! I hate the Lindsays. I don't love them at all." In the morning she left at seven, and lovingly kissed me goodbye.

The family that used the same large pot to cook in, to wash the baby, bring in drinking water, clean their feet, and wash all the clothes.

We went to the laboratory to give specimens for stool examinations. Another Greek girl was there—Anna—who had met C. on the train from Italy. Chrysanthi had mentioned her to me once before because of the extraordinary fact that this Anna was preparing to go to America to marry a boy she had fallen in love with via correspondence and pictures! Engaged eighteen months, and finally ready to sail in September. Yes, she had met him for three days, because he flew over eighteen months ago for the engagement. Why hadn't she gone over sooner? She had wanted to, but there were always hitches. She had even taken the medical exam for the visa 8 months before, and everything had been all right. This second exam was required since the results of the previous one held only for 3 months. Soon she must send papers to America to get the final visa, after which her husband-to-be would be granted two weeks' leave from the Army to fly over in September and fetch her. Oh happy long-awaited day! They'd live near Durham, North Carolina. Wasn't it wonderful! Going to America at last! I complimented her on her good accent and fluent English conversation. We went out together to purchase the laxative necessary. Of course she knew all about it, because she'd been through all this before. How long before it worked? Depends. "Me, about half hour only." We hurried back to the laboratory in order to be conveniently near the can. Three specimens required, or rather the second and third of three shits. What the hell were they looking for anyway? Worms, she said. Very common in Greece, and you must be worm-free in order to enter the States. Newest immigration restriction: no worms allowed. Well, she'd been through it all before; it was only a formality. She went out for her "turn." It really worked quick, the laxative. C. and I sat squirming, waiting for the pot to be free. But Anna was way ahead of us. She had donated her three specimens before we even had the pains announcing our second. How pale she looked! But then, after we didn't see her for some time (thinking she had left), she came to the waiting room no longer pale, but sobbing red, choked with tears. What was the matter anyway? She had worms, she announced. Oh, how could she, and what would she do now? "Wait till they're cleared up," I said, and tell your fiancé to come a month later. "No, the Army will only free him in September and then only on the assurance that I am acceptable to the States. But now by the time I lose the worms, have another exam, and get my visa, it will be too late for him to get his leave granted. Oh misery, misery. C. and I donated our second and third specimens, and the pathologist congratulated us on being worm-free. Poor Anna. She was broken. She went home, still red, to begin her diet, and to write the sad news to that strange boy in America who had waited 18 months for a girl he had seen only 3 days in his life. And a girl with worms, to boot.

The clothes pin on baby's nose.

Girl across the street. Could you ever think of having X as a husband!" Well, she got him. C. told how when all the girls of the neighborhood were young, they played together (ὅταν ὅλα τὰ κορίτσια τῆς γειτονιάς μικρὰ ἦταν, ἔπαιζαν ὅλα μαζί). The girl across the street, whom we saw sitting on her balcony with her father and her fiancé, was one of the group. The fiancé they all knew also when they were young. He was one of those boys who always wanted to do something for the girls, to carry a book or a sweater, to help them through a puddle, etc. He particularly liked Chrysanthi, though neither she nor any of the other girls could stand him at all. The girl across the street (whom let's call Anna) thought particularly bad of this eager young man. Seeing his attraction to Chrysanthi, she asked C. playfully one day, "Could you ever imagine having him as a husband? How horrible!" and C. of course agreed. Well, in time the children grew up. Last week Anna invited C. over to the house. "Do you remember —?" she asked. "Of course." . . . Then Anna asked again the same question: "Now, after these years, could you picture yourself with him as your husband?" C. laughed. "Of course not. How horrible!" But Anna stayed her: "Say no more, dear," she said, showing her ring, "for I've got him."

The baby at C.'s school seemed to have a very flat nose, and C. wondered what she could do to change it. "When he grows up, he won't be pretty," she thought, "and none of the girls will like him." She thought and thought and thought, and suddenly one day it occurred to her that a clothespin fastened on the nose for short periods might help. But she was ashamed to have the girls see such crude therapy, and fastened the pin only after she thought they were all asleep. She didn't know, however, that some of the girls saw her, for they were very quiet and secretive about it for a long time. . . . Some months later, when C. had entirely forgotten the clothespin treatment, the girls asked her one day: "Miss Chrysanthi, what can we do if we have a baby with a nose too flat?" It was a difficult question. C. thought and thought. "Perhaps massaging will help." . . . "But, Miss, is there no other way?" C. couldn't think of any. Finally one of the brave girls stood up and shyly said, "Could we perhaps place a clothespin on the nose, Miss?" They all burst out laughing, and only then did C. remember what she had done.

From K. Mansfield's "Prelude":

¶ Kezia liked to stand so before the window. She liked the feeling of the cold shining glass against her hot palms and she liked to watch the funny white tops that came on her fingers when she pressed them hard against the pane.

¶ . . . they were clanking through a drive that cut through the garden like a whip-lash, looping suddenly an island of green, and behind the island, but out of sight until you came upon it, was the house.

¶ Dawn came sharp and chill with red clouds on a faint green sky and drops of water on every leaf and blade. A breeze flew over the garden, dropping dew and dropping petals. Shivered over the drenched paddocks, and was lost in the somber bush. In the sky some tiny stars floated for a moment and then they were gone—they were dissolved like bubbles. And plain to be heard in the early quiet was the sound of the creek in the paddock running over the brown stones, running in and out of the sandy hollows, hiding under clumps of dark berry bushes, spilling into a swamp of yellow water flowers and cresses.

And then at the first beam of sun the birds began. Big cheeky birds, starling and mynahs, whistled on the lawns, the little birds, the goldfinches and linnets and fan-tails, flecked from bough to bough. A lovely kingfisher perched on the padded fence preening his rich beauty, and a tui sang his three notes and laughed and sang them again.

‘How loud the birds are,’ said Linda in her dream. She was walking with her father through a green paddock sprinkled with daisies. . . .

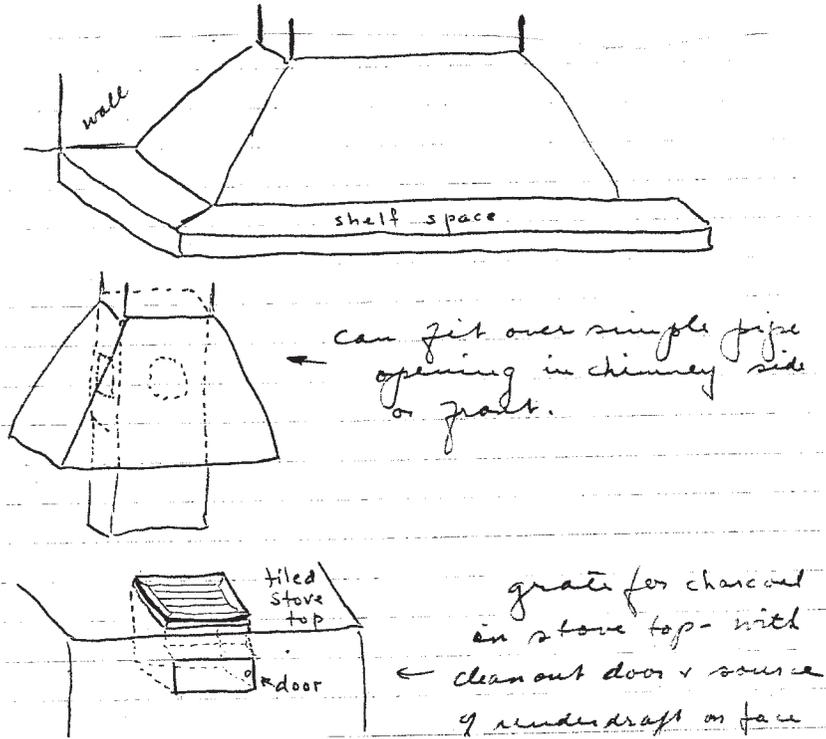

¶ Then she did not hear them any more. What a glare there was in the room. She hated blinds pulled up to the top at any time, but in the morning it was intolerable. She turned over to the wall and, idly, with one finger, she traced a poppy on the wall-paper with a leaf and a stem and a fat bursting bud. In the quiet, and under her tracing finger, the poppy seemed to come alive. She could feel the sticky, silky petals, the stem, hairy like a gooseberry skin, the rough leaf and the tight glazed bud. Things had a habit of coming alive like that. Not only large substantial things like furniture but curtains and the patterns of stuffs and the fringes of quilts and cushions. How often she had seen the tassel fringe of her quilt change into a funny procession of dancers with priests attending. . . . For there were some tassels that did not dance at all but walked stately, bent forward as if praying or chanting. How often the medicine bottles had turned into a row of little men with brown top-hats on; and the wash stand jug had a way of sitting in the basin like a fat bird in a round nest.

—We finally got the marriage permission from the Μητροπολίτη. Cost: 150 dr. The kind priest gave us a receipt, explaining that this would indicate why it was so expensive. Only 140 dr. to the Church and 10 dr. for charity!!! The poor poor Church.

Forgot all about Independence Day, wondered why Consulate was closed.

Sabatier recalls Jesus' antipathy to doctors of law in speaking of Francis's toward Bologna students. The "intolerance" of F. perhaps mirrors a like "imperfection" in Christ himself, and in doing so makes both men more real and more strong at the same time. It is completely irrational that most critics, while insisting on Christ's mildness (refusing to recognize, for instance, any 'noble anger' or intolerance in him), complain when pacifists insist on imitating this mildness and inevitably cite the driving of the money-changers from the temple. Out of the context of their emotional reaction to pacifism, however, these same critics probably cannot really believe that mild meek Jesus did drive out the lousy money-changers.

De Milan, je suis venu dans une ville de nom de Pérouse, où le pape Innocent [III] venait de mourir, mais il n'était pas encore enseveli. Pendant la nuit des voleurs l'ont dépouillé ses vêtements précieux et on laissé son corps presque nu et sentant mauvais au milieu de l'église. Et moi j'y suis allé et j'ai vu des mes yeux combien courte, vaine et trompeuse est la gloire de ce monde. —Jacques de Vitry.

The little old Jewish man in the blue shirt, ex-banker, who lost everything when the Germans came, and is now going to America, where an agency has found him a job as a doorman.

Paula's story. How when she returned she found bits of her mother's furniture in other people's houses, these people insisting that they bought the furniture, whereas actually they helped themselves to it when the Germans sent the family away to the concentration camp.

I could write a whole novel just on the conflicts for C.'s mother: losing her daughter to such a far-away land; and contrariwise, wishing her to be happy.

Read in Harvard Alumni Journal that Dave Aldrich is an assistant editor of Look. Maybe I can sell him a story on Greek village life.

I'm beginning to think that my Francis book must assume more the proportions of an epic than the limits and technique of a novel. Read Odyssey, War and Peace. Ha!

Slept through my first earthquake, dreaming that the bed shook terribly, and waking in the morning to be told by the others that the bed really did shake, as well as the whole house.

E. M. Forster, description of Vallone Fontana Caroso, in "The Story of a Panic":

¶ The valley ended in a vast hollow, shaped like a cup, into which radiated ravines from the precipitous hills around. Both the valley and the ravines and the ribs of hill that divided the ravines were covered with leafy chestnut, so that the general appearance was that of a many-fingered hand, palm upwards, which was clutching convulsively to keep us in its grasp. Far down the valley we could see Ravello and the sea, but that was the only sign of another world.

C. in bed with temperature. I'm only surprised she's borne up as long as she has. Now let's hope she'll be well for the wedding Sunday.

The other night we walked by the sea and saw the most amazing phosphorescent displays. Anything and everything that broke the surface or even came near to the surface shone as though containing somehow a hidden fluorescent lamp. The fish streaked to and fro, big ones darting quickly and nervously, small ones just lazing near the cement sea-wall. Laps of waves against the wall made a continuous kinetic glow where water met the wall; and a small rowboat, half sunk so that the gunwales were just below or above the sea depending on how the waves pitched, was outlined in glowing white. Also the rope that moved whitely just below surface like a long tranquil eel.

The village houses with sagging balconies suspended from the second storey. The old wrinkled black-dressed lady crumpled up in the shade leaning against a fence. The icons placed in carved holes in trees: picture of Christ or the Madonna, and candle. The thrashing mill: donkeys pulling a homemade contraption with a boy sitting on it to give weight. Then the grain is tossed up in the air with a fork. Tedious long work. Men playing backgammon in the cafés. The American Mennonite team in a village near Edessa. I asked them if they frequented the cafés after work so they could get to know the Greek men. "No," they answered. "If we have any leisure we try to put it to more constructive use. We want to be an example of industriousness to the Greeks." And thus, as I readily gathered, the Americans lived isolated in their house, not learning the Greek language or even sitting around trying to talk with hands. To my mind, then, the project failed.

The boy up in a tree, gathering an armful of branches with nice big green leaves, which he told me later they use as food, wrapping meat or rice up in them, and baking them in an oven. The laden donkeys, so loaded with branches or bound hay that they were well-nigh invisible. The woman following behind an ox. The old lady, bent and parched, carrying her jug of water. The condescension with which the policeman spoke to her. The spastic who had café concession in the village. His lovely meaningful face. So long and brown and understanding. The near-useless body, and how well he did what he could with it. Looked like a hydraulic press had flattened him out. Where was there room for lungs or viscera? The Queen's school. Low ceilings, mud walls. Children gathered in the shade talking. All girls. One boy respectfully distant. The sweaty furniture shops of the city; the fruit stalls; slaughtered calves hanging head and all, still bloody, at the butcher's. Blacksmiths. Horses with beaded colorful bridles. How thin and weak the horses are! Panorama πανόραμα. The cleft between the mountains, cool and damp. All else parched. View of the crescent-shaped city. The lights go on finally. Millions of twinkles.

The beach. Fishing nets strung out. Viking-like boats. The cafés—always. “Greek” music. Το καινούργιο σου φουστάνι, σαν πριγκήπισσα σε κάνει. The theater: amateurish but fun. Constant sarcastic remarks toward leading politicians.

M-day minus 2.

Against from E. M. Forster, “Co-ordination”:

¶ She heard the sea; at first it was the tide whispering over mud-flats or chattering against stones, or the short, crisp break of a wave on sand, or the long, echoing roar of a wave against rocks, or the sounds of the central ocean, where the waters pile themselves into mountains and part into ravines; or when fog descends and the deep rises and falls gently; or when the air is so fresh that the big waves and the little waves that live in the big waves all sing for joy, and send one another kisses of white foam. She heard them all, but in the end she heard the sea itself, and knew that it was hers for ever.

From “The Eternal Moment”:

¶ How could he explain the peculiar charm of the relations between himself and Miss Raby? There had never been a word of marriage, and would probably never be a word of love. If instead of seeing each other frequently, they should come to see each other always it would be as sage companions, familiar with life, not as egotistic lovers, craving for infinities of passion which they had no right to demand and no power to supply. Neither professed to be a virgin soul, or to be ignorant of the other's limitations and inconsistencies. They scarcely even made allowance for each other. Toleration implies reserve; and the greatest safeguard of unruffled intercourse is knowledge.

¶ Vorta had taken to the tourist trade. A village must have some trade; and this village had always been full of virility and power. Obscure and happy, its splendid energies had found employment in wrestling a livelihood out of the earth, whence had come a certain dignity, and kindness and love for other men. Civilization did not relax these energies, but it had diverted them; and all the precious qualities which might have helped to heal the world had been destroyed. The family affection, the affection for the commune, the sane pastoral virtues—all had perished while the campanile which was to embody them was being built. No villain had done this thing: it was the work of ladies and gentlemen who were good and rich and often clever—who, if they thought about the matter at all, thought that they were conferring a benefit, moral as well as commercial, on any place in which they chose to stop.

I've spent the pre-marriage day in bed with a stinky cold. Reading.

¶ 'Let me have that child,' she said impressively, 'and I will bring him up. He shall see that they are not the vile creatures he supposes, always clamouring for respect and deference and trying to buy them with money. Rich people are good: they are capable of sympathy and love: they are fond of the truth; and when they are with each other they are clever. Your boy shall learn this and he shall try to teach it to you. And when he grows up, if God is good to him he shall teach the rich: he shall teach them not to be stupid to the poor. I have tried myself, and people buy my books and say they are good, and smile and lay them down. But I know this: so long as the stupidity exists, not only our charities and missions and schools, but the whole of our civilization, are vain.' E. M. Forster, "The Eternal Moment."

More from Camus:

¶ Sans mémoire et sans espoir, ils s'installaient dans le présent. À la vérité, tout leur devenait présent. Il faut bien le dire, la peste avait enlevé à tous le pouvoir de l'amour et même de l'amitié. Car l'amour demande un peu d'avenir, et il n'y avait plus pour nous que des instants.

exemple, les plus intelligents d'entre eux faire mine de chercher comme tout le monde dans les journaux, ou bien dans les émissions radiophoniques, des raisons de croire à une fin rapide de la peste, et concevoir apparemment des espoirs chimériques, ou éprouver des craintes sans fondement, à la lecture de considérations qu'un journaliste avait écrites un peu au hasard, en bâillant d'ennui. Pour le reste, ils buvaient leur bière, ou soignaient leurs malades, paressaient ou s'épuisaient, classaient des fiches ou faisant fourner des disques sans se distinguer autrement les uns des autres. Autrement dit, ils ne choisissaient plus rien. La peste avait supprimé les jugements de valeur. Et cela se voyait à la façon dont personne ne s'occupait plus de la qualité des vêtements ou des aliments qu'on achetait. On acceptait tout en bloc.

Assisi

Preparing to leave Assisi. The city is beautiful and medieval still to the core, but everything connected with St. Francis is extremely disappointing. Treatment of Portiuncula typical. The modest church splashed with mediocre murals outside of the saint's exploits; and the whole enclosed in the most oversized unnecessary basilica imaginable, called Ste. Marie des Anges. Damian, less hampered, but after a monk guided us around he asked for a donation. Old Francis would hardly approve. Re: Subasio hideaway, now connected with civilization by a beautifully carved road up the mountain. Outside gate, man selling coca cola and orangeade. Inside, beautiful grounds, walks, gardens, everything manicured. Happily a poor section preserved supposedly F's room, and also a crude stone cell set up in the entrance of a shallow cave. Of course the setting, so high, and overlooking the olive plantations of the Umbrian Plain, was impressive. I felt the peace of the birds and the quietly rustling wind. C & I also enjoyed (in retrospect) the long uphill walk. It gave an idea at least of how far F. had to walk to reach his favorite spot—about 1½ hour if he went as slow as we did; but of course he didn't have C. to hold him back (or maybe he took Clara for a quiet weekend of spiritual love!).

C. and I spent many minutes watching the skill of the lady-grabber in the Place de Santa Chiara, who grabs you when you issue from the bus, and propagandizes for their particular pension. A very energetic worker, with long hours, we discovered, and thus a successful one.

Salonika

Letter from Alice, enthusiastically describing her work in a camp for crippled children. "There is one eleven-year-old girl whose only means of expression is by crying or smiling. The counselors have to learn to distinguish between the bathroom cry, the nurse cry, the cry when she wants to be moved somewhere else or be made comfortable in her wheelchair. She sits in the chair all day except for meals, swimming, and going to the bathroom. She can't sit straight, but slumps limply, her arms dragging over the arms of the chair. . . . Others race around on crutches, running faster than I can. They scream and talk and laugh and get into trouble just like regular campers. It is a very moving thing to see a girl or boy put down their crutches and standing on braced legs do a dance while one of the bunkmates sings a song. Also wonderful when a badly palsied child (9 years old) holds a pair of scissors for the first time and cuts a hat out of construction paper, a counselor holding the paper and moving it so the kid won't go out of the lines. Every day something exciting happens: a limp wheelchair boy floats on his back in the water without any support; a past polio victim takes four steps by herself not holding on to anything and not using crutches. This is the excitement that one has here."

From Saroyan's "Cocktail Party":

¶ . . . a human being does not live, but is lived. . . . We have been led to believe that being alive is a personal experience, and I do not believe it is. I believe it is absolutely impersonal. No man knows himself. No man knows another. No man decides for himself who he is or who he is to be, what he is to do, or how he is to do it. Every man belongs to matter, that's all. Matter is a large order, and every man is a small order. Matter happens to a man, and the man goes along for the ride, as the saying is. . . .

C. tells about a girl she knew in school, whom we'll call here Helen. Helen was very slight, small, weak, and retiring. Never said anything; never showed any strength, moral or physical. But she was always very pretty. She grew up and married a boy whom we'll call John. John's father, a businessman, was well-off, and sent John to Germany to the university. Helen's family, contrariwise, was relatively poor. John's father could finance his son in Germany but not the wife too; and as her family couldn't help at all she had to stay in Greece. John's father really tried to do all he could to make her stay pleasant, inviting her to the house, etc., but she was consistently unappreciative and mean. Her father went into the business with John's father. Then John's father got sick. Helen did nothing to comfort him; instead she and her father stole the business, somehow having a court transfer the assets to them. John's father from all this had a nervous breakdown and is in a mental hospital. Now Helen forbids John on his return even to see his family.

The doctor said today that C. shouldn't have a baby. She's too weak, especially with the anemia.

I have to be careful about everything I do. I didn't think today and said I'd go to Ritsa's to call the doctor. This offended the family—justly—since why should Ritsa know everything and not Lola or the father speak to the doctor. Thus Lola and I went.

The other day also the same. Who to ask to give the injections? If I asked Ritsa, Eleanoula would be jealous; if I asked Eleanoula, Ritsa would be jealous. The problem was solved nicely when we found that Eleanoula wasn't home.

I said to the family that if we had only known before the marriage about the anemia, we shouldn't have conceived the baby. If the two doctors we visited had only said something. But of course the baby was conceived premaritally, so it would have been too late even if they had noticed her weakness. Such is the mess I am in.

C. is very apathetic, very frightened as usual, still worried about the damn school, etc. She has no life in her at all.

Her mother told me today that she told C. before the trip not to make a child (!), but of course C. never said anything to me; and it was too late anyway.

The family is very good considering all the troubles I've brought in my wake. Really remarkable.

But now I think an abortion is the only thing. But how?

Chorus from Sophocles' Antigone:

¶Where is the equal of Love?
 Where is the battle he cannot win,
 The power he cannot outmatch?
 In the farthest corners of earth, in the midst of the sea,
 He is there; he is here
 In the bloom of a fair face
 Lying in wait;
 And the grip of his madness
 Spares not god or man.
 Marrying the righteous man,
 Driving his soul into mazes of sin
 And strife, dividing a house.
 For the light that burns in the eyes of a bride of desire
 Is a fire that consumes.
 At the side of the great gods
 Aphrodite immortal
 Works her will upon all.

Do something about Basil at the American Farm School: the hopelessness of his wish to get training in America; the comparison of the teaching of modern mechanical farming methods with what awaits him at home. See journal for June 7, June 13, July 14. Small farm with work for 3, but family of 13, etc.

Ο Γεώργιος is very temperamental. Came home last night complaining of his eyes, and pretty sad & silent all day today. Arranged rendezvous with friend of his and latter's fiancée, but didn't want to go alone, and asked Lola and me to accompany him. I didn't want to particularly because I went to Antigone last night and I ought to stay more with Chrysanthi; and Lola said No also because she didn't know the said fiancée and apparently had no burning desire to meet her, whereupon George slammed the door and burst out of the house to go by himself. What a sad situation, that such a man of 35, good-looking, intelligent, well educated, doesn't know a girl to take with him: or rather, for perhaps this is more at the root of the trouble, that a sad situation that in Greece there is so little freedom of acquaintance between the sexes. Perhaps if George asked a girl to spend an evening with him at a café and she accepted, it would be tantamount to an engagement.

C. seemed better the last two days but today she threw up twice and again is completely listless. Θεολόγου says she should have an abortion done, as with the anemia she can't support a baby; the family doctor says the opposite to everything Θεολόγου says, who says, for instance, that the necessary iron needed to cure the anemia cannot be given in a state of pregnancy because it will harm the embryo. A gynecologist says he thinks C. can make it, however; and a pediatrician friend of the family says: wait and see. It's all very tense for the rest of us.

Basil receives a letter that his scholarship is denied. This means that he must return to his impossible life in the village. Make the nice American Farm School machinery, etc. analogous to the literary gentleman in "Life of Ma Parker." Village poverty, etc. analogous to Ma's history. Basil wants to pour out his sorrow to someone. Who? Teacher? But show earlier that teachers do not feel the plight of their students. No sympathy; inability really to understand or help, which Basil realizes. So he has no one to turn to. Show also how fellow students (1) mock his ambition or (2) think him inferior if they got scholarships themselves. Thus Basil is ashamed. There's no one to help. Show earlier his love for animals; thus his desire to become a veterinarian. Perhaps one animal in particular—a prize horse or bull, Basil's special care. As a last resort he walks blindly but finds himself going to the stable to unburden himself to the only creature that understands him: this animal.

¶ 'Ah! That does me good,' he sighed. How easy it is to laugh when you no longer expected anything from anyone. . . .' Thus, while he was dressing, did he discover for himself the nature of asceticism, and the tuneless little song he hummed through pursed lips kept him company like a silly young nun. —Colette, "The Last of Chéri."

C. slightly better. New pathologist says her condition is not serious. But going on three solid weeks in bed now, and not much desire to get up is a little discouraging. Poor girl: she's having it all right,. Funny how even I, supposedly “educated” and “aware,” never conceived in the slightest the corollaries to having a child. And of course this is only the beginning. What about the process of labor and birth itself? Then the constant twenty-four hour care for so many years, not to mention the expense, which only God himself knows how I’ll meet.

—Socrates and Paula. She’s Jewish, so Socrates’s family opposed the marriage. Thus their plans: Paula going to America in December or January on a refugee visa. Socrates must find a hospital appointment for January and go also. He’ll marry her there and they’ll stay. His parents are happy at the prospect of his going to America because they don’t know that Paula is going and thus they figure that Socrates will be far away from her for two years and forget her. This explains why he must go in January also. First of all, she must, because the consulate says all the visas for Greece will be used up after that time. If she goes and he gets an appointment for July, let’s say, his parents will discover her absence, easily discover their son’s plans never to come back, and refuse to let him go. It seems funny to an American that a 29-year-old man should be daunted by his parents’ refusal, but that’s the way it is in Greece. Especially Socrates, who has lived off his father so many years (in Greece, there’s no opportunity for students to earn part of their own way), would not be able to contradict him in this way. And thus Socrates is convinced that if he does not get a hospital appointment for January, he will never go and presumably never marry Paula. She could stay here, of course, but then there would be the same problem of the parents forbidding the marriage, and the Church in Greece will not marry you without your parents’ consent.

I’ve often wondered what would be like the day of a Greek beggar or vendor who walks the streets. We hear them first, shouting their peculiar cries, and then if we care to we can lean out over our balconies and see them walking slowly smack down the middle of the street, shouting or rather singing their song, stopping, looking around and listening for any possible responses, then going on again, undaunted. They come very regularly, too. A boy comes with doughnut-like cakes precisely at seven every morning, waking me up. Another boy comes with the same about fifteen minutes later, and probably does better business, for his forerunner has gotten people out of bed. At four in the afternoon—sharp—the hour that ends the daily siesta, a profusion of calls can be heard, but above all the ice cream man, 'Εβρω and fast behind him another. Then there are knife sharpeners, mattress refurbishers, chimney sweeps, pot polishers, junk collectors, etc. At the bottom of the scale are the true beggars, one of whom I saw yesterday. I gave him five drachmas. He came playing, or rather poking at, an accordion, moaning something cacophonously that was supposed to be a song. A little girl, perhaps his granddaughter, led him on and collected the donations. Perhaps he was blind. I couldn't notice from the balcony. One day also I noticed how the poor lad who came with the κουλούρια (like doughnuts) was kidded by another lad whose job was to deliver ice from a donkey cart. The first shouted κουλούρια, κουλούρια, etc., etc. and then the ice boy said, in the tone of someone who wanted to buy some: κουλούρια. The vendor stopped, turned, and looked at all the balconies for his prospective customer. Seeing no one, he started on again. But the mischievous ice-boy again called (in a disguised voice) and once more the poor deceived mendicant stopped and looked for his non-existent customer. Poor soul!

Let's call the girl Σωτηρία. She is 17 or 18 when she comes to live with her uncle and aunt in Salonika. All we know of her previous history is that she contracted malaria in her youth, was given Atabrine, but took overdoses that made her act wild like a person out of her senses. We also know that for some reason, in her 16th or 17th year, the boy to whom she was engaged in the village broke the engagement, which was a very serious thing to do. Girls whose engagements are broken generally have a hard time finding another boy, and that doubtlessly was the reason Sotiria came to her uncle's in Salonika, where no one would know. Ostensibly she came to see about the family business, a hotel, but since she stayed several months and is still there as far as we know, there was the other factor involved as well. Of course the uncle, a wood-seller, knew the whole story; and he set about immediately to find Sotiria a new man. This he did; but this boy also, for a reason we also do not know, changed his mind. To make matters worse, he let things go as far as the day of the engagement ceremony itself and then, when all the guests were assembled in the wood-seller's home, sent a note recording his decision; and they never saw him again. After this, Sotiria began to show signs of the complete nervous breakdown she was soon to have. The uncle attributed her occasional fits to nervousness, and predicted that if she could really get engaged, all would be well. To this end, he found another young man one Κώστας, a waiter. Of course he said nothing to Costas about Sotiria's troubles; and the one time the future couple were allowed to meet prior to the engagement was a very short and well-chaperoned occasion. To tell the truth, Sotiria was getting worse and worse at the prospect. She said Yes only because she was sick and tired of the whole business, and wanted to get joined to someone, though it didn't very much matter who. The uncle's chief concern, on his part, was to keep Costas from learning that Sotiria was slightly batty. He found a cooperative doctor who injected sedatives that quieted her down for three or four hours, and thus they planned to hide her illness long enough to get the ring firmly on her finger. When she came to Chrysanthi the morning of the engagement-day, she was in a hardly normal state. Her eyes were colorless, blank, starting out of her head. Her paleness and thinness contrasted with her previous village robustness. She paced up and down the room, waving her arms, and talking steadily, incoherently. First she asked for bread and cheese. "No one gives me food when I ask for it." But later she said that when her uncle had meals ready for her she said she had no appetite, so her uncle would think her ill. Thus part of the real illness was the delusion that she was ill deliberately, purposefully—in other words, she's only sick when she wants to be, when it's to her advantage. (Of course perhaps this was true, and everything a magnificent act, but who knows?) She said also that Costas loved her ardently, but that she didn't care a hoot for him because she loved another boy whom she saw accidentally standing at a bus stop, which made everything worse. "I don't want to get engaged. My uncle is forcing me to." Then contradictorily she describes how she secretly managed to see Costas, went to the movies with him. Then he kissed her. "If my uncle knew, he'd kill me." "Look here at these black-and-blue marks on my arms. Costakis made those, Costakis!" (they were birthmarks or freckles.) At other times she says that she never saw Costas, only the once, with chaperones. When Sotiria left, Chrysanthi's father went immediately to the girl's mother, who had come from their village for the engagement ceremony. He described the daughter's condition (as if the mother did not know), and immediately the mother screamed, "Don't tell, don't tell, lest the boy find out and change his mind. Sotiria's not ill; she's just nervous. Everything will change once she's engaged." Well, it wasn't the job of the Giannakos family to interfere, so he left. At seven that evening Chrysanthi went to the uncle's house, bringing flowers. The house was crowded with parents, relatives, friends. And, to Sotiria's family's relief, Costas was there too. Sweets were offered, and liqueurs. Then a plate of sweets was placed on a table beneath the icon, and the best man put the two rings in with the sweets and mixed everything together. Rice was put in the plate also. The best man then took the rings, made the sign of the cross with them, and placed them on the left hand fourth finger of future bride and groom. The couple received congratulations calmly (Sotiria well-drugged, of course). Many presents were given: especially jewelry to Sotiria. Then everyone ate from a buffet of friend fish, meat, salad, cheese, eggs, olives, with wine. After singing and dancing, the guests went home, and Costas departed with his parents. During the ceremony he had seemed sad and quiet, but perhaps it was just his appearance. Sotiria had wanted to talk several times, but as soon as she opened her mouth her uncle interrupted her, lest she reveal her condition by ill-chosen words. As Chrysanthi was ready to leave, Sotiria took her aside and said, "My life is a theater. I'm in a play. The first act is now finished, but the second act will start presently. Only you understand this, Chrysanthi. You are my audience of one." Sotiria appeared happy withal. In fact she seemed to gloat over how well she had played her part—how well, possibly, she had deluded Costas into believing that she loved him. In other words, she 'caught' her man and was proud. Though perhaps all this was still part of her basic craziness. The next morning the uncle came to Chrysanthi to report that Sotiria was in the street, completely insane. She had fought off the injections, refused to see anyone except Costas. Costas, by the way, turned out to be very kind and understanding. He took her to the cinema and bought her ice cream, among other things. He loved her and had no intention of ditching her just because she seemed entirely nuts. Chrysanthi found her at Costas's house, and when she asked her to come to the school, Sotiria said, "No, I must stay with my fiancé. If you get engaged, Chrysanthi, you'll have to stay with your fiancé too. Don't tell Mr. Lindsay I'm crazy. I'm all right. If you tell him, I'll choke you: because you're really stupid." Eventually, somehow, they got her to a doctor's. He asked her, "Do you like your fiancé?" "Why ask me?" she said. "Ask stupid Chrysanthi there." Then she rambled on about another boy she loved so much. The doctor tried to inject her, but she cried out, "No, you can't touch me. You're a man!" "But doesn't your fiancé touch you?" "Oh yes, yes," said she, showing marks on her arms and pinching Chrysanthi with remarkable strength to demonstrate. "Don't you want an injection so you can go to sleep with Chrysanthi?" "No, I want to sleep with Costas." "How many nights haven't you slept?" "Three." "If she sleeps a long time," the doctor said to Chrysanthi, "she'll probably improve." He got a sedative into her somehow, and she slept one day. But when she woke there was no evident improvement. Mr. Lindsay came into the room. "You're a thief," she said to him. "You stole a hundred drachmas. If you come any further, I'll hang myself, I don't love you because you're Christ: you cry when you see me like this. And you keep all my visitors away. But I don't want any, anyway." When the doctor came again, Sotiria introduced Christ (Chrysanthi), a thief (Charles Lindsay), and a bag girl (Muriel Lindsay) to him. Says she loves the doctor's son. Chrysanthi asked to have Sotiria's jewelry for safekeeping. "OK," Sotiria said, "but you can't have my engagement ring, that's final." The next day she was so bad that she was tearing all her clothes into shreds. The doctor administered shock treatments, however, and Sotiria came out apparently returned to normal. The uncle continued to tell Costas all kinds of stories, but the doctor told him the truth. Costas, good soul, only felt more sorry for Sotiria, and remained faithful to his vow. Thus now, as far as we know, they are still engaged; and presumably some day they shall be married and live happily ever after!

¶ Domestic animals play a scarcely noticed but undoubtedly beneficial part in the education and life of children. Which of us does not remember powerful but magnanimous dogs, lazy lapdogs, birds dying in captivity, dull-witted but haughty turkeys, milky old tabby cats who forgave us when we trod on their tails for fun and caused them agonizing pain? I even fancy, sometimes, that the patience, the fidelity, the readiness to forgive, and the sincerity which are characteristic of our domestic animals have a far stronger and more definite effect on the mind of a child than the long exhortations of some dry, pale Karl Karlovitch, or the misty expositions of a governess, trying to prove to children that water is made up of hydrogen and oxygen. —Chekhov, "An Incident"

Do something with Neola and her wayward son, only not smart-alecky à la Mansfield, with stylisms un-imitable. Just straight, style without style, like Chekhov. I used to think, after reading Hemingway, Wolfe, and other stylists, that subject matter was unimportant. Then I found, to my anger, that whoever read my stories always commented on “the way they turned out,” never on the style. Just now I am beginning to see that the writer’s job is at least two-fold: to have something to write about, and to write about it with skill. Chekhov’s and Mansfield’s stories—both—though displaying no great action, compel the reader by their accurate portrayal of character. Once the character is developed, his own personality governs in a sense what will happen to him, instead of visa versa. This is particularly developed in Chekhov.

Neola:

Son: zoot suit type. Never showing up for work in hospital laundry room. Describe work. Describe old man rolling in laundry. Fat women pressers; the one in slacks; the thin boss reading newspaper. Neola hypochondriac. Staying home herself. Thus her employers threaten to relieve her. Needs money. Separated from husband. Must support no good son because he won’t work steadily. Telephone calls while on duty (forbidden * trouble). To lover, who runs after son for her. Annoyed, but does it to please her. Describe: Neola getting old and fat and cross. But undimmed glossy red hair and girlish sexiness, playfulness when feeling well. Trouble also with Helen, the other nursing assistant, who is pretty much a neurotic character with persecution complex. Chronic complainer. Figures she’s working below her level. But thinks Neola talks too freely with doctors, should show deference. At the same time she complains about deference she (Helen) shows, but which she puts upon herself, since the doctors certainly don’t require it. Something decisive must come out of this background. Perhaps some machination for her private affairs which depends on her son showing up, but he doesn’t show up and everything is ruined. Or she exhausts patience of employer, who finally has to fire son despite Neola’s entreaties. She goes out to look for him (on company time) and thus endangers her own job. Paint Neola sympathetically. Has selfless devotion to absolutely worthless son. (Pattern after Clarence, for instance the strutting orderly: one eye, extra pugnacious, car-crazy, great lover, etc.) Helen deprecates

Neola, and on the surface it looks like Helen is right. Thus employers believe what she says, and completely miss the truth: that Neola is to be admired and Helen despised, not vice versa. Helen a busybody, a gossip. Thrives by hurting other people. First show Neola without bringing in son: as employers see her. Her absences, telephone calls. Helen's gossip. So that reader gets initial bad impression of Neola, though realizing also Helen's obvious faults. Then show Neola with son, and latter's problems, which come to a head, resulting that he and Neola both lose their jobs. Helen "vindicated," and no one knows any better except the reader, we hope. Make Neola have to choose between lover and son. Lover gets sick and tired of racing after son and gives ultimatum that Neola must meet him somewhere at a specific hour. But son absent from work again. Neola had asked him especially to be there that day, but couldn't reveal the reason, since business with lover is secret. She leaves work to look for him—subsequently misses appointment and thus selfish lover leaves her. She loses her job, and the son his. But the son is not a bit more reformed for all that. Then: end of Helen's deprecations.

All the orderly characters at RGH. Clarence the lover. The Negro with nine-inch erection, who raped a twelve year old. Bill who changed his name, had no parents, and was going to buy an apartment house! The homosexual who smelled and who boasted of his homosexuality. His rich aunt on East Avenue: fruits of a bar and grill. The banjo player and his mate. Walter, with a grandchild in his 36th year. Silent Sam, the porter. Gregory. God! What a character Gregory would make. His fadisms, femininity, groping toward conscientious objection. Actions in work camp, spilling the mop buckets at the hospital. His lonely trips to the Adirondacks. Trip to McFadden's health-whore-house.

A beautiful Buddhist text quoted in Kazantzakis's Zorba the Greek:

¶ The Shepherd: My meal is ready, I have milked my ewes. The door of my hut is bolted, my fire is alight. And you, sky, can rain as much as you please!

Buddha: I no longer need food or milk. The winds are my shelter, my fire is out. And you, sky can rain as much as you please!

The Shepherd: I have oxen, I have cows. I have my father's meadows and a bull who covers my cows. And you, sky, can rain as much as you please!

Buddha: I have neither oxen nor cows. I have no meadows. I have nothing, I fear nothing. And you, sky, can rain as much as you please!

The Shepherd: I have a docile and faithful shepherdess. For years she has been my wife. I am happy when I play with her at night. And you, sky, can rain as much as you please?

Buddha: I have a free and docile soul. For years I have trained it and I have taught it to play with me. And you, sky, can rain as much as you please!

Imagery from the same: ¶ His face was furrowed, weather beaten, like worm-eaten wood. ¶ I secretly watched him as he emerged from his wrapping of sleep, and saw how his eyes shone more and more brightly.

(1) At the hospital, Miss Tuttle, chief nurse, asks the nursing assistant Joan where is her co-worker, Neola. Joan answers that as has happened on several other days Neola came, used the telephone without permission and left without telling anyone. Joan complains that she must do the work of two people. (Describe Joan's character.) The chief is angry at Neola, pacifies Joan by saying if Neola does it again she'll fire her. "Oh, don't do that," Joan says, hypocritically.

(2) Neola meanwhile is making the rounds of the local bars and drug stores where her son hangs out. She finds him finally with a crony, drags him away, is furious at him for not showing up at this job. Son completely obnoxious. Has no real excuse. Neola takes him to laundry where he works, apologizes to boss, who doesn't want son (Clarence) back, but Neola pleads with him and he agrees to give Clarence one more chance. Neola returns to her own work. Sneaks into locker room. But of course Miss Tuttle knows of her absence, and chastises her, also giving warning that if she leaves work once more she will be fired. Neola tries to explain. Miss Tuttle says she sympathizes but cannot make hospital suffer because of Neola's personal problems. (Describe Neola somewhere, her character, her job, history.)

(3) After work, Clarence meets his crony, who kids him about how he lets his mother drag him around. Dares him to miss work next day and defy his mother. Says they'll go driving in his souped-up supercharged car. Clarence says they'd better go out of town that night. "Why, you afraid of her?" says the other. "You got to stand up to 'er, man. You got to show 'er you ain't no kid no more. See!" (Somewhere describe Clarence, his irresponsibility, aggressiveness; lover-boy; vanity; reactions to his “stinky” job with “a lot of fat old bitches” and the beanpole director who sits all day reading a newspaper while we slave.)

(4) Next morning at breakfast Neola makes Clarence promise he’ll show up for work that day. He lies that he will. She goes to the hospital but just to make sure calls Clarence’s laundry. He’s not there, of course. Joan complains to Miss Tuttle that Neola used the telephone. Miss Tuttle speaks to Neola. Neola says she must leave. Miss Tuttle says it will mean losing her job. Neola leaves anyway, makes the rounds of son’s hideaways and finds him, starts dragging him out. But son won’t go. He’s egged on by his friend. Neola explains what’s at stake. Son weakens, but friend teases him, sarcastically. “Show her who’s boss. It’s now or never, Clarence.” Clarence zooms off in the car. Neola, broken, goes back to the hospital and empties out her locker. Joan can be heard, still complaining.

Funny letter from Goat, who’s still got his dust-dry sense of humor: “We were extremely glad to hear about your marriage,” etc., etc. “Everything here is running smoothly. Trips, I’m afraid, are becoming less strenuous every year. [sic] Best wishes to your family. Bob and Lib.”

Evocative scene from Chekhov, “The Lady with the Dog”:

¶ Afterwards when they went out there was not a soul on the sea-front. The town with its cypresses had quite a deathlike air, but the sea still broke noisily on the shore; a single barge was rocking on the waves, and a lantern was blinking sleepily on it.

They found a cab and drove to Oreanda. . . .

At Oreanda they sat on a seat not far from the church, looked down at the sea, and were silent. Yalta was hardly visible through the morning mist; white clouds stood motionless on the mountain-tops. The leaves did not stir on the trees, grasshoppers chirruped, and the monotonous hollow sound of the sea, rising up from below, spoke of the peace, of the eternal sleep awaiting us. So it must have sounded when there was no Yalta, no Oreanda here; so it sounds now, and it will sound as indifferently and monotonously when we are all no more. And in this constancy, in this complete indifference to the life and death of each of us, there lies hid, perhaps, a pledge of our eternal salvation, of the unceasing movement of life upon earth, of unceasing progress towards perfection. Sitting beside a young woman who in the dawn seemed so lovely, soothed and spell-bound in these magical surroundings—the sea, mountains, clouds, the open sky—Gurov thought how in reality ev-everything is beautiful in this world when one reflects: everything except what we think or do ourselves when we forget our human dignity and the higher aims of our existence.

A man walked up to them—probably a keeper—looked at them and walked away. And this detail seemed mysterious and beautiful, too. They saw a steamer come from Theodosia, with its lights out in the glow of dawn.

“There is dew on the grass,” said Anna Sergeyevna, after a silence.

“Yes. It’s time to go home.”

They went back to the town.

¶ I never tired of seeing with what elaborate precautions, with what gentleness, Zorba removed the cloth in which he wrapped his santouri. He looked as if he was removing the skin from a purple fig, or undressing a woman. . . .

¶ “Boss,” he said, “this is where I count on you. Now, don’t dishonor the male species! The god-devil sends you this choice morsel. You’ve got teeth. All right get ’em into it. Stretch out your arm and take her! What did the Creator give us hands for? To take things! So, take ’em! I’ve seen loads of women in my time. But that damned widow makes the steeples rock.”

“I don’t want any trouble,” I replied angrily.

I was irritated because in my heart of hearts I had also desired that all-powerful body which had passed me like a wild animal in heat, distilling musk.

“You don’t want any trouble!” Zorba exclaimed in stupefaction. “And pray, what do you want, then?”

I did not answer.

“Life is trouble,” Zorba continued. “Death, no. To live—do you know what that means? To undo your belt and look for trouble!”

I still said nothing. I knew Zorba was right, I knew it, but I did not dare. My life had got on the wrong track and my contact with men had become now a mere soliloquy. I had fallen so low that, if I had had to choose between falling in love with a woman and reading a book about love, I should have chosen the book.

‘Ο Γεώργιος ἔστειλε μέλι, ἀλλὰ εἰδηκὸ μέλι καὶ πολὺ ἀκριβό. Τὸ κουτί, ὅμως, ἦταν ἀχεδὸν ἀδειανό. Πρῶτος, εἶπαμε πῶς τὸ μέλι χύθηκε. Ἐν ἔγινε ἔτσι, ὅμως, τὸ πανὶ γύρω ἔπρεπε νὰ εἶναι βρεγμένο. Ἦταν στεγνόν. Τότε φαντασθήκαμε πῶς κάποιοι ἔκλεψε τὸ μέλι. Ἄμα ὁ Γεώργιος θὰ τὸ ἀνακάλυβε θὰ θύμωνε πολὺ. «‘Ο κόσμος εἶναι κακός», θὰ ἔλεγε, καὶ θὰ εἶχε δίκαιον.

Possible stories:

- from my troubles with Mrs. Jones, being sent down to Newell & Smith. Reading books on duty; reactions of an intellectual to such “degrading” work. Compensating actions: method with nurses; always talking about Harvard; reading French out loud in the corridor. Leila Wagenstein; the trio, etc.
- from couple next door at 50 Atkinson Street who browbeated baby. Marital difficulties. Trouble about who’s to clean the bathroom. Them or us! etc.
- that crazy letter of sexual frustration to Elizabeth White. She and his sister.
- two flies landed on my paper, one astride the other, buzzing loudly, as mating.

From Chekhov, “An Anonymous Story”:

¶ She came back with Orlov between nine and ten. Full of the proud consciousness that she had done something bold and out of the common, passionately in love, and, as she imagined, passionately loved, exhausted, looking forward to a sweet sound sleep, Zinaida Fyodorovna was reveling in her new life. She squeezed her hands together in the excess of her joy, declared that everything was delightful, and swore that she would love Orlov for ever; and these vows, and the naïve, almost childish confidence that she too was deeply loved and would be loved forever, made her at least five years younger. She talked charming nonsense and laughed at herself.

“There’s no other blessing greater than freedom,” she said, forcing herself to say something serious and edifying. “How absurd it is when you think of it! We attach no value to our own opinion even when it is wise, but tremble before the opinion of all sorts of stupid people. Up to the last minute I was afraid of what other people would say, but as soon as I followed my own instinct and made up my mind to go my own way, my eyes were opened, I overcame my silly fears, and now I am happy and wish everyone could be as happy!"

But her thoughts immediately took another turn, and she began talking of another flat, of wallpapers, horses, a trip to Switzerland and Italy. Orlov was tired by the restaurants and the shops, and was still suffering from the same uneasiness that I had noticed in the morning. He smiled, but more from politeness than pleasure, and when she spoke of anything seriously, he agreed ironically: "Oh yes."

¶ "Turgenev teaches us in his novels that every exalted, noble-minded girl should follow the man she loves to the ends of the earth, and should serve his idea," said Orlov, screwing up his eyes ironically. "The ends of the earth are poetic license; the earth and all its ends can be reduced to the flat of the man she loves. . . . And so not to live in the same flat with the woman who loves you is to deny her her exalted vocation and to refuse to share her ideals. Yes, my dear fellow, Turgenev wrote, and I have to suffer for it." . . .

"I am not a Turgenev hero, and if I ever wanted to free Bulgaria I shouldn't need a lady's company. I look upon love primarily as a necessity of my physical nature, degrading and antagonistic to my spirit; it must either be satisfied with discretion or renounced altogether, otherwise it will bring into one's life elements as unclean as itself. . . . Try and make [Zinaida Fyodorovna] believe that love is only a simple physical need, like the need of food or clothes; that it doesn't mean the end of the world if wives and husbands are unsatisfactory; and that a man may be a profligate and a libertine, and yet a man of honor and a genius; and that, on the other hand, one may abstain from the pleasures of love and at the same time be a stupid, vicious animal!"

¶ "Why don't you speak, then?" said Pekarsky.

"I've tried, but I can't. One can boldly tell the truth, whatever it may be, to an independent, rational man; but in this case one has to do with a creature who has no will, no strength of character, and no logic. I cannot endure tears; they disarm me. When she cries, I am ready to swear eternal love and cry myself."

¶ He finished the letter and stood up. I still had time. I urged myself on and clenched my fists, trying to wring out of my soul some trace of my former hatred; I recalled what a passionate, implacable, obstinate hate I had felt for him only a little while before. . . . But it is difficult to strike a match against the crumbling stone. The sad old face and the cold glitter of his stars roused in me nothing but petty, cheap, unnecessary thoughts of the transitoriness of everything earthly, of the nearness of death . . .

“Good day, brother,” said the old man. He put on his cap and went out.

¶ You and I have both fallen, and neither of us will ever rise up again; and even if my letter were eloquent, terrible, and passionate, it would still seem like beating on the lid of a coffin: however one knocks on it, one will not wake up the dead! No efforts could warm your accursed cold blood, and you know that better than I do. . . .

Why, almost before beginning life, were you in such haste to cast off the image and likeness of God, and to become a cowardly beast who backs and scares others because he is afraid himself? You are afraid of life—as afraid of it as an Oriental who sits all day on a cushion smoking his hookah. Yes, you read a great deal, and a European coat fits you well, but yet with what tender, purely Oriental, pasha-like care you protect yourself from hunger, cold, physical effort, and from pain and uneasiness! How early your soul has taken to its dressing-gown! What a cowardly part you have played towards real life and nature, with which every healthy and normal man struggles! How soft, how snug, how warm, how comfortable—and how bored you are! Yes, it is a deathly boredom, unrelieved by one ray of light, as in solitary confinement; but you try to hide from that enemy, too, you play cards eight hours out of twenty-four.

And your irony? Oh, but how well I understand it! Free, bold, living thought is searching and dominating; for an indolent, sluggish mind it is intolerable. That it may not disturb your peace, like thousands of your contemporaries, you made haste in your youth to put it under bar and bolt. Your ironical attitude to life, or whatever you like to call it, is your armour; and your thought, fettered and frightened, dare not leap over the fence you have put around it; and when you jeer at ideas which you pretend to know all about, you are like the deserter fleeing from the field of battle, and, to stifle his shame, sneering at war and at valour. Cynicism stifles pain.

numerable theories concerning the underlying reality of marriage and the indefinite demands made upon it . . . ; your everlasting attacks on female logic, lying, weakness, and so on—doesn't it all look like a desire at all costs to force woman down into the mud that she may be on the same level as your attitude to her? You are a weak, unhappy, unpleasant person.

¶ Then she sat down on a low chair by the table, and, leaning her head on the arm of the sofa, wept bitterly. In the drawing room there was only one candle burning in the candelabra, and the chair where she was sitting was in darkness; but I saw how her head and shoulders were quivering, and how her hair, escaping from her combs, covered her neck, her face, her arms. . . . Her quiet, steady weeping, which was not hysterical but a woman's ordinary weeping, expressed a sense of insult, of wounded pride, of injury, and of something helpless, hopeless, which one could not set right and to which one could not get used. Her tears stirred an echo in my troubled and suffering heart; I forgot my illness and everything else in the world; I walked about the drawing-room and muttered distractedly: "Is this life? . . . Oh, one can't go on living like this, one can't. . . . Oh, it's madness, wickedness, not life."

¶ "I can't talk. Forgive me, I am in the mood now when one wants to be alone. And, if you please, Vladimir Ivanitch, another time you want to come into my room, be so good as to give a knock at the door."

That "be so good" had a peculiar, unfeminine sound. I went away. My accursed Petersburg mood came back, and all my dreams were crushed and crumpled up like leaves by the heat. I felt I was alone again and there was no nearness between us. I was no more to her than that cobweb to that palm tree which hangs on it by chance and which will be torn off and carried away by the wind. I walked about the square where the band was playing, went into the Casino; there I looked at the overdressed and heavily perfumed women, and every one of them glanced at me as though she would say: "You are alone; that's all right." Then I went out on the terrace and looked for a long time at the sea. There was not one sail on the horizon. On the left bank, in the lilac-coloured mist, there were mountains, gardens, towers, and houses, the sun was sparkling over it all, but it was all alien, indifferent, an incomprehensible tangle.

¶ . . . Yes, my life is abnormal, corrupted, of no use to anyone, and what prevents me from beginning a new life is cowardice—there you are quite right. But that you take it so much to heart, are troubled, and reduced to despair by it—that's irrational; there you are quite wrong.

“A living man cannot help being troubled and reduced to despair when he sees that he himself is going to ruin and others are going to ruin around him.”

“Who doubts it! I am not advocating indifference; all I ask for is an objective attitude to life. The more objective, the less danger of falling into error. One must look into the root of things, and try to see in every phenomenon a cause of all other causes. . . . Not one hair falls from the head without the will of the Heavenly Father—in other words, nothing happens by chance in Nature and in human environment. Everything has its cause and is inevitable. And if so, why should we worry and write despairing letters?”

“That's all very well,” I said, thinking a little. “I believe it will be easier and clearer for the generations to come; our experience will be at their service. But one wants to live apart from future generations and not only for their sake. Life is only given us once, and one wants to live it boldly, with full consciousness and beauty. One wants to play a striking, independent, noble part; one wants to make history so that those generations may not have the right to say of each of us that we were nonentities or worse. . . . I believe what is going on about us is inevitable and not without a purpose, but what have I to do with that inevitability? Why should my ego be lost?”

“Well, there's no help for it,” sighed Orlov, getting up and, as it were, giving me to understand that our conversation was over.

I took my hat.

“We've only been sitting here half an hour, and how many questions we have settled, when you come to think of it!” said Orlov, seeing me into the hall.

—C. got a letter from Sonoko Strong congratulating her on the marriage, baby, and prospect of going to America. Perhaps C. is in the position of Zinaida Fyodorovna, dreading these things, especially the last, and ironically being congratulated on all sides.

—Saw «Ερωφίλη» τοῦ Γεωργίου Χορτάτση, a classical Greek play from Crete dating about the 17th century, I think. A gory tale, in which the king cuts off the head of his daughter's lover and gives it to her as a present. But extremely well acted and therefore extremely compelling.

—Received a letter from John Davison in which he describes a «crisis» brought on by his feeling of being senselessly enslaved at RGH. He says he was nearly hysterical for two or three days, but got over it.

This led to a discussion—one might almost say an argument—between Chrysanthi and me which she started by saying that John was wrong to feel so seriously about it; that other people were in the same boat, and if everyone was so sensitive to have crises, etc., what would the world be like. I tried to explain that in a way she was right, but that it was a good thing that we had at least a few people like John who reflected enough to see the senselessness of what was happening to them. She maintained that everyone felt the discomfort of being enslaved (i.e., the army), but just stoically accepted it because, as she said, “Laws can’t be changed.” I got a little heated at this and expounded very patriotically how in free America people were always yelling to have laws changed or new ones made, sometimes even with success. We took the Negro problem as an illustration. I described the FEPC, equal school business, etc. She ended up by asking, “Will you let your child play with a Negro?” which of course was the most sensible question to ask. I said of course I would, and she replied that that was all that mattered, which is certainly correct.

Then we went on to the subject of unnecessary things: clothing, cars, following the fashions, etc. C. stubbornly defended women’s right to always have new clothes, on the reasoning that it gave joy. I countered with the idea of greater and lesser joys, and she replied by saying that perhaps what I considered lesser was considered greater by someone else. This makes mockery of all philosophy. And, ironically, of Greek philosophy in particular. She gave later the example of a five year old who sees that Johnny across the street has a better or newer bicycle. How can you explain to him that having a new bicycle isn’t the most important thing in the world? True, I said, but only for a five year old. When he grows up, he should comprehend that, and if he doesn’t, as so many “adults” do not, then he is no adult, but still a child.

Then we got back somehow to Chrysanthi’s illness, or pregnancy troubles, or whatever we can call the damn thing. I got a little angry about the fact that I continually have to keep after her to take her tablets. If I don’t she simply doesn’t take them. She grew heated and said, justly, “Is that such a great trouble for you?” “No,” I said, “but you’re like a baby in this.” “All right, let me be like a baby, then!” And she cried. “Go to your room, please,” I said; “I can’t see you like this.” She wiped away the tears, controlled herself. “I’m finished now.” (We also said before: Why she didn’t take the tablets herself—because, she said, she couldn’t open the bottle. Why not? It makes me sick. I can’t see it. “Then it’s all psychological,” I said. “I don’t know what that means,” was the answer.)

¶ About Henry James’s The Ambassadors: “Page by page, James releases one more clue, one more essential contribution to the shape and purpose of the book, one more fascinating revelation of personality and relationship.”

—I felt lousy about this evening’s argument with C. and went to her tenderly to make up. Earlier I had brought peppermint life-savers, to counteract the bad taste in her mouth. I lay next to her, stroking her knee, but not knowing really how to begin, and scared to try. Then I noticed that instead of sucking the life-saver she had chewed it, thus depriving herself of having it in her mouth for a long period. I told her that she should suck it. “Oh,” she replied sarcastically, “excuse me. All right, if I have to suck it, I will. I must do everything the correct way.” I got angry again and all my good intensions went to the winds. “If you’re going to be sarcastic, I can’t talk to you,” I snapped. “I didn’t know how to use it,” she said. But I didn’t rise to this change in tone. I said “Forget it!” and went out. Now she is still lying on the bed staring blankly ahead, with the light on. She must be very unhappy. I’m finding out what an incomplete selfish ungrown-up person I am. She must be finding out also: and I’m sure neither of us is very pleased at the discovery.

Later: Well, it all ended happily, thank God. As they say, love conquered, and I really believed it did. I sat down beside her again, said something about her going to sleep. She replied why, what had she done all day to make her tired? Nothing. “You must throw me away,” she said, “like a weed in the garden.” “If I throw you away I won’t have you.” “Oh, the weeds grow again very fast. Maybe you’ll find a rose.” “You’re my rose,” I said. I leaned down to kiss her, and she pulled me to her impulsively, opening her mouth wide onto mine. Then she turned her head away, for she was crying. I kissed away the tears. When she stopped I looked at her. “I don’t know what to say,” I said, “but the most important thing is that I love you.” This brought on another passionate kiss. I eventually apologized for my cruelty earlier, but by that time, I believe, the apology was superfluous.

Dear John Davison,

Chrysanthi and I were both pleased to receive your letter, especially since you are one of the few people in America that we both know, even if her acquaintance with you is very slight. We've been getting so many epistles from assorted relatives, friends, etc., whose names mean absolutely nothing to my wife, that it was with real pleasure that I announced one from you and said, "Ah, you remember him, don't you!" She did, and sends her best to you. Fortunately you held back your letter and added a reassuring note after your 'crisis,' so that we know that you are all right. And I have just received confirmation of that fact from Peter Gardner, who described to me much the same state of affairs that you described yourself.

I am very interested in your reactions. Before I go further, lest this "interested" sound rather barbaric and unfeeling, especially when it is in events that have caused you so much pain, I must say that I don't mean it that way. As you may well have already imagined, my situation was somewhat the same as yours. Our temperaments and inclinations and sensibilities perhaps are somewhat the same also—and so it should be little surprising to you to realize that I felt all the things you felt, and expressed them in my own way. This way (which I'll describe in a moment) was not what Peter Gardner calls a sort of temporary nervous breakdown, but it was just as stupid, degrading and useless—probably worse.

I'm sure we discussed in Birmingham some of the things you mentioned: the feeling of your natural talents going to waste, the ogre of slavery, even the horrible conviction that one is not fulfilling one's commitments as a C.O. (except perhaps in useless self-sacrifice). But on the top of all this, from the point of view of anyone outside, you and I and the others in our position would seem to be having it mighty easy—not in the army, nice salary, home-life, free time, etc. How impossible it really is to explain to anyone how little these circumstances mean when one has the feeling that it is all senseless and useless waste! I might add, in the vein of the 'outsider,' that your job was considered by the C.O.s of 'my time' as the softest one in the hospital. Indeed one of your predecessors told me (good C.O. that he was) that if he had been given my job in the Operating Room, he would leave and enter the army. This amount of insincerity may seem impossible to us, but the same boy's brother did just that. He was with me one month before he donned khaki. All the rest of us bed-pan carriers, moppers, kitchen-slaves, etc. always envied you stock-room boys for your independence (not subject to squawking old-maid nurses or irritable chefs), your sensible time-schedule (ask PG how I used to work: sometimes midnight to morning, sometimes 3 p.m. to midnight, sometimes 7 to 3, sometimes 7 to 12 and then 3 to 7), etc. Well, this is all nothing, because the important thing is not the work itself but one's attitude toward it.

I myself have a very poor story to tell, though it may be interesting to you if for nothing else than to feel that you had a fellow-sufferer. I might add before beginning that the end was happy, that after my 'crisis' I adjusted better and better to my work, and now look back upon it as having been a time when I garnered a wealth of experience in people and life. In fact, I can really say (what with so much of college), it was the first time in my life I had really lived, really faced the world on my own, faced the problems that one does not find in books or in college, but that one cannot escape. Even now, in the womb-like security of Greek hospitality, I do not feel that I am as independent or fully living as I felt while enduring the 'slavery' of Rochester.

Well, my very first reactions were to be immensely ashamed of the work I was doing. When I took the mop I am sure my face turned crimson, for at least a few months. It was especially difficult to do such menial tasks in front of doctors, whom in my previous social status I had considered equals, and by whom I was considered an equal, but who now for me were untouchable gods. (If you think this is rhetoric, try it in the Operating Room sometime!) Another irksome aspect was in regard to the nurses. One of the things I meant above when I spoke of the freedom and really living that I experienced in Rochester, was that I wanted (and eventually came to have) some sort of free relationships with girls, which in college I had always excused myself from on the poor rationalization that I was too busy. So, here I found myself thrust from nine years of male society into an Operating Room full of the most beautiful and sexy nurses ever conceived. It did not take me long to discover, however, that nurses regard orderlies as noblemen of yore regarded their valets, and that for it to be known that a nurse was going around with an orderly would certainly not be very complimentary for her, although from the point of view of the orderlies, conversely, it would be quite a conquest (and one of which all my comrades hopelessly dreamed). My response to this situation was just about as childlike as it could have been: I readily informed everyone (unasked) that I went to Harvard (sic) (no one ever heard of Haverford), that my real reason for being in Rochester was to take piano lessons at the Eastman School, etc. As I look back at it I cannot explain why I did not also wear my Phi Beta Kappa key on my pajama-like uniform. It would really have been funny, since the doctors never tired of showing off theirs. It would have shown them, the bums! Anyway, as you can well imagine, this behavior did not ingratiate me at all with anyone, for either they considered I was lying, stuck-up, or just plain crazy. I also tried to inform people of my C.O. status as an explanation for my temporary (sic) descent in the social scale, but this I found very difficult, for no one had ever heard of C.O.s, and I never had time to explain. I elaborated on my trip to Europe (an adventure that the nurses, who, after all my idolization, were only stupid, narrow-minded adolescents from small towns and farms, who could never dream of going to Europe or even to Syracuse or Buffalo); I sat down in my 'free time' and read intellectual books in the halls; I even practised my French pronunciation out loud.

All this had a certain effect on the other orderlies, who called me 'professor' and treated me with a kind indulgence, sometimes offering to take my calls if it looked that I were in the middle of a very important paragraph. But this wore off in time.

I am explaining all this because it will make you understand what happened afterward. At first, you see, despite the humiliation owing to mopping, and the lack of success with the nurses, I was pretty much enthralled by my new life. I was established in a rooming house, unknown to anyone in the town. I was writing short stories, taking examinations for Eastman School, buying books at all the sales, reading, and enjoying my anonymity immensely. (This too wore off very quickly, and I desperately sought company.) The first few weeks at work I remember distinctly I managed to read an entire novel each week on the job, not to mention what I accomplished after work. Pretty soft, I thought. But what was the next step? Just this: from being thankful that the job offerred me time to read, I soon began to feel that I was in the hospital to read, and that when I was called to fetch a patient or mop the floor they were taking me away from my most important work. When it went this far I began to get in all sorts of trouble. Mostly with myself, for, like you, I developed a very vivid persecution feeling, and got grumpier and grumpier with everyone when they called me away from my studies. This made people get grumpier and grumpier with me, which in turn made me get grumpier and grumpier with them. And before long the administration was pretty damn sick of me. I didn't do anything except precisely what I was told (they expected you to look for work when you were not busy), and what I did I did as quickly and unthoroughly as possible, especially cleaning, which I hate, and always will hate. If someone ordered one to do something in a particularly commanding tone (which people do in the OR simply from tension, not from meaning any harm) I didn't do what they asked at all, and pretty soon this behavior led to an 'interview' with the high-ups, in which they actually threatened to fire me despite the fact that that would logically send me to prison (God knows how I would have acted there).

The happy part of the story is that this 'interview' completely and suddenly set me on my feet. Of course I wasn't as bad as I have described above, because along with all I mention was the constant realization of my foolishness. The interview didn't teach me anything I didn't already know; it merely knocked me into the knowledge that if I didn't act better mighty soon, I really would be in a mess. (Not only with the hospital. By this time I had found and established myself in the Quaker Meeting, the FOR, the work camps, etc. Everyone thought I was a perfect little angel, as they probably think you are now! What a surprise they would have had if they had known everything that went on.)

After this, I got on much better, became friendly with my 'superiors' and even with some of the nurses, was promoted, and wound up in a very responsible job, taking part in the operations themselves. I did not lose all my feelings of uselessness, of course, but I found better ways of expressing them; and better still, I found ways to use my outside time in such a manner that I felt my life was worthwhile. In short, my reaction was just the opposite of yours: to drown my sorrow, as it were, I brought down upon myself such a load of activity that it still makes me marvel as I look back, how I did it all. (I might mention that this was all before Peter Gardner came to Rochester; and that after his arrival his pleasant company amply replaced some of the frenzied activity of the preceding time.) One thing, though, which is important, as I look back now, to say to you is that this frenzied activity included very little creative. I stopped writing short stories after the first month and did not resume until about the last month; my piano lessons were more mechanical than anything else, and that is precisely why I liked them; I found little time to read, and the only writing I did was of letters. Nevertheless, all the activity was intensely worthwhile, as I have said; and actually it was a damn good thing that for once I got away from bookish pursuits. I had no time to feel that I was the 'unwilling slave of a senseless power-bureaucracy'; all I knew was that my day seemed to start after I left the hospital, and I did so much with which I was pleased in those after-hours that the hospital part of my time and life receded and became relatively unimportant. It was almost a rest, especially after my tensions with the administration ceased, and I did my job as it should be done. It was a rest because it became a very routine undemanding thing, with yet enough human interest (there are fascinating people at that hospital, as perhaps you are discovering) to keep it from being boring.

Some of the things I did on the outside: First of all, I cycled a total of ten miles every day, to and from the outer limits of Park Avenue, just before Brighton. Summer and winter, rain, snow, hail, and sleet found me peddling along with my sinister poncho and briefcase of books or music on the rack behind. Secondly, I studied piano at Eastman School for a solid year, and really practiced. As I said, the practice was beautiful for me, because it was more or less mechanical, something I could do very early in the morning, or immediately after work, when I was too tired to do anything else. I really think I played two or three hours a day, on the average. Many times I got up at four and five a.m. This was delicious. Play for two hours, breakfast, and cycle in the cool air before the traffic was in the streets. (I had to be at work at seven usually.) Other things: I played chamber music with some interns at Strong Memorial Hospital; I took active part in all the meetings, discussions, clothing collections, etc. of the Quaker Meeting and the Fellowship of Reconciliation; I traveled to Syracuse no less than nine times for various institutes; I visited Young Friends at Cornell; I got interested in work camps and helped organize them at Baden Street; I made speeches at churches, at the Divinity School, etc. to win recruits to the work camp; I led a social life with the boys where I was living (a cooperative student house); I had an affaire of three months with a red-headed nymphomaniac, which I enjoyed immensely; I sent away to Charles Atlas and did exercises, nude or in a G-string in front of my mirror, as he instructed; I built a chimney at my farm, visited NYC once or twice, sung Berlioz's Requiem with the Rochester Oratorio Society, etc., etc. I rarely went to bed before midnight, and I always got up at 5:30 in order to be in time for work. It was a beautiful life. Even now I drool as I think of it, and as I indulge strengthlessly in the Greek habits of laziness and afternoon siestas.

Why do I write all this at such great length, and why does it appear that really I am boasting so? I don't want to boast; I am merely trying to show how one person settled problems that you are facing. You see, like you, I early thought that my job at the hospital was both senseless and that it did not even make me feel that I was doing my duty as a C.O. Like you, I wondered if I had made a mistake in seeking a job away from people, away from the type of demands that PG's work makes on him. But I decided eventually that I was at the hospital and there I would have to stay! I stopped worrying whether or not I was in the right place. Instead, I decided that I would make up for all the lacks of the hospital job by what I did outside. Thus, my work in the work camp, making pacifist speeches, helping in the institutes and other Quaker concerns gave me a feeling that there, not in the hospital, I was doing my C.O. service; and my piano lessons, reading, socializing, experiences with people, gave me a feeling that my life and talents were not being wasted by a power-bureaucracy. The hospital became absolutely the least important part of my two-year stay. And in the slight part that it did play, the job itself became infinitely subordinated to the fascinating people I met there, especially the other orderlies (not the other C.O.s, who were either crazy religious fanatics or complete fakes). Outside, too, I met many people I shall always remember: the Hortons, the Piersols, the McKennas, the Fairbanks, Norman Whitney, Alec and Dirk (unfortunately no longer there), Dr. Farlow (an absolutely superb surgeon and man), one or two nurses, etc. Not to mention later on the pleasure of being again with PG and the group that began to form—'Club 53'—in the last few months before I left. You come into a going little community and should have no difficulty in expanding your acquaintances, whereas it took me about six or eight months to start to get settled. You have beautiful opportunities to utilize your talents and your time. What I found is that you must do this in a non-solitary way: get in with some organizations, 'causes,' chamber-music groups. At least this was the immediate way of salvation for me. After I had my fill of them, I was able to resume some solitary and more personally creative activity, and did not mind being alone, nor fall into morbid states, as you seem to have done in your solitude, with nothing else to occupy your mind.

War and Peace, p. 68: ¶ Natasha only desisted when she had been told that there would be pineapple ice. Before the ices, champagne was served around. The band again struck up, the count and countess kissed, and the guests, leaving their seats, went up to "congratulate" the countess, and reached across the table to clink glasses with the count, with the children, and with one another. Again the footmen rushed about, chairs scraped, and in the same order in which they had entered but with redder faces, the guests returned to the drawing room and to the count's study.

"Is it not better to die for an unknown and even a false ideal than to live for the vain realities of an utterly unpoetic existence?" —Sabatier, speaking of the Children's Crusade of 1212.

I feel closer to a nervous breakdown at this moment than I have ever felt in my life. Chrysanthi continues to be absolutely indifferent to me. She has not spoken a word to me voluntarily in days and days; she answers all my attempts at conversation as briefly and non-interestedly as possible; she pushes me away when I try to kiss her. Yesterday I brought home a shawl. She thanked me by shaking my hand! She is sarcastic about everything and has no opinions, enthusiasms, or interests in anything. When I said I thought we should go to America, to her it didn't matter one way or the other. I must do what you want was in substance her attitude; but if she honestly and enthusiastically desired my good and indicated this to me, it would have been splendid. Instead, she acts like the whole world is victimizing her, and I in particular. She says she wants to die. When I ask her to talk to me she says, "What is there to say?"

When I asked which country's exhibition she wanted to see today at the Fair, she said there was no reason she wanted to see any of them. When I suggested we walk by the sea, she said, "But what can we do there?" When I told her how miserable she was making me, and how only a simply pleasant "good morning" (she hasn't said good morning or good night to me for weeks) would brighten my day, "Ah," she replied in her habitual sarcastic tone, "I guess all men are like that!" "What?" I asked. "Selfish, always thinking of yourselves." I tried to show her that she was being the more selfish, because, in becoming so melancholy, in eating herself away by constantly thinking of her own illness, she was evidently, or morbidly, and wrongly, absorbed entirely in herself. Matters go from bad to worse every day. I cannot stand living with the family (not because they're bad people, they are not, but because I don't feel married, or free. I am pestered, all my decisions are weighed and reweighed by everyone. And last night, when finally I got C. to cook me a meal (the second or third of our marriage!) her father came in and said she was too weak. I blew up, and the meal was ruined.

C. was better from the vomitings a few days, then relapsed. I spoke to Γκινάλης, who says such a history must come from psychological reasons. I still think C. is scared stiff of having a baby. She's never once shown any enthusiasm at the prospect—only says how the women must always suffer. She's also still scared stiff of the Lindsays, as evidenced by her complete refusal to go back to the School to collect her belongings there. God, what am I into now! I am so unhappy! And no one to turn to in this blasted foreign land! My parents are coming. How can I show them a broken marriage only two months old?

September 18, 1955

I talked with C. a long time and finally dragged out of her the complaints that I was not courteous towards her family (certainly true at times), that I preferred Socrates' company to George's, etc. As always, the tonic of talking, of airing grievances, did its work, and today C. is a new girl, just as sweet and darling toward me as ever before. And her illness seems to be improving also. We'll certainly have rough spots in our marriage (for there is a real conflict of customs, especially regarding the significance of family life); but if we can continue to talk, everything will doubtlessly smooth out. I am extremely relieved.

I learned that, at least according to Chrysanthi, a Greek never tells his troubles to anyone outside the family, always presents a smiling front, even if his mother died two minutes before. Also, when a visitor leaves, you must accompany him to the door and not close it until he is out of hearing-distance, lest he think you're in a hurry to get back to your normal life, and thus glad he's gone. The great attention to what other people think.

September 19, 1955

It's so funny to hear the children playing outside calling, "Come on, Xenophon," "That's good, Socrates." And yesterday at the Fair the waiters called the water-and-bread boy Ἄγγελος—that is, "Messenger," the true meaning of our "Angel."

Τὸ μὲν ἄρα ἡδέως ζῆν ἀγαθόν, τὸ δ' ἀηδῶς κακόν. —Πλάτων.

¶ When Princess Mary returned from her father, the little princess sat working and looked up with that curious expression of inner, happy calm peculiar to pregnant women. It was evident that her eyes did not see Princess Mary but were looking within . . . into herself . . . at something joyful and mysterious taking place within her. —War and Peace, book IV, chapter 7.

A touching moment from Tolstoy about what happens in a previously harmonious household when someone is sick:

¶ There were in the room a child's cot, two boxes, two armchairs, a table, a child's table, and the little chair on which Prince Andrew was sitting. The curtains were drawn, and a single candle was burning on the table, screened by a bound music book so that the light did not fall on the cot.

"My dear," said Princess Mary, addressing her brother from beside the cot where she was standing, "better wait a bit . . . later . . ."

"Oh, leave off, you always talk nonsense and keep putting things off—and this is what comes of it!" said Prince Andrew in an exasperated whisper, evidently meaning to wound his sister.

"My dear, really . . . it's better not to wake him . . . he's asleep," said the princess in a tone of entreaty.

Prince Andrew got up and went on tiptoe to the little bed, wineglass in hand.

"Perhaps we'd really better not wake him," he said hesitating.

"As you please . . . really . . . I think so . . . but as you please," said Princess Mary, evidently intimidated and confused that her opinion had prevailed. She drew her brother's attention to the maid who was calling him in a whisper.

It was the second night that neither of them had slept, watching the boy, who was in a high fever. These last days, mistrusting their household doctor and expecting another for whom they had sent to town, they had been trying first one remedy and then another. Worn out by sleeplessness and anxiety they threw their burden of sorrow on one another and reproached and disputed with each other. . . .

"Well?" [Prince Andrew] asked.

"Still the same. Wait, for heaven's sake. Karl Ivánich always says that sleep is more important than anything," whispered Princess Mary with a sigh.

Prince Andrew went up to the child and felt him. He was burning hot.

"Confound you and your Karl Ivánich!" He took the glass with the drops and again went up to the cot.

"Andrew, don't!" said Princess Mary.

But he scowled at her angrily though also with suffering in his eyes, and stopped glass in hand over the infant.

"But I wish it," he said. "I beg you—give it him!"

Princess Mary shrugged her shoulders but took the glass submissively and calling the nurse began giving the medicine. The child screamed hoarsely. Prince Andrew winced and, clutching his head, went out and sat down on a sofa in the next room.

Athens

What a glory is the Acropolis, especially after the crummy ruins in Rome. I cannot say how I felt, by seeing the buildings, all the amazing uncanny greatness of the men and the civilization that built them. And the theater below, with its carvings of the muses, its reserved seats, the sculptures all-abounding—what joy to see such art! How can we say or analyze what qualities make the Parthenon, for instance, so perfect: whence comes its lightness, buoyancy, the absolute joyfulness of the building? Why is the art museum in Philadelphia, for instance, so heavy and disgusting! Oh, the Acropolis is unbelievable; it's a great Gothic cathedral, only better in its grandeur and the resistance with which the monuments have stood and stood since 437 or so B.C. How can the mind understand that date: 437 B.C.? The time is too great!

Met Dad and Mom, who arrived looking well, from Rome. They made all kinds of fuss (rather Dad only) about the hotel and everything else, clinging to every last shred of American comfort rather than wishing to abandon themselves really to see Greece—to soil their feet or eyes. After the poverty I've seen here, it is grinding to see 200+ drachmas spent for a meal, and a lousy one too, in this hotel, the King George, to which we transferred. But the room of course is nicer. I like my comforts too, but one must be reasonable, and a lot more sensitive to want than I find in my father at the present time.

Made the rounds of the offices to see about my work-permit and was told they would not issue one for teaching in the Salonika Institute, though they would if I were teaching in the one here in Athens. I think, and parents agree, that the very best thing is to come home. We'll simply have to face the break with C.'s family, and, judging from the other troubles we've been having, the sooner the better. Ἐτσι εἶναι.

I'm enjoying my knowledge, which is coming in very handy here, and impressing my parents no end.

Athens

Athens, Athens. Τὶ ὠραία πόλις! Today we visited the Theater of Dionysus with its carved chairs and sculptures, and the magnificent column done with the masks of the dramatic art. It's amazing to see the names of the various priests carved in their special chairs, as though it were done yesterday. Lovely!

Near the Tower of the Winds we saw a Roman bath, with privies surrounding it. Still see places to put feet while squatting. There was a baby's bath that Dad sat in, and we photographed. The Theseum is a remarkably well preserved monument where we clearly saw how the architects made the pavement slightly convex so as to compensate for the optical illusion that would make a straight pavement seem concave. Well-preserved friezes. The excavations of the Agora lay below. The guide pointed out where Plato and Socrates talked together, and verily, tears came to my eyes. I never thought "sight-seeing" could be as compelling as it has been here for me in Athens.

The worst thing about growing up is that it seems the older I get the less possible it is for ideals to play a part in life—in making a living, for instance. They seem remoter and remoter from all practical considerations. When I view the lives of almost all the people I know and see around me, their lives really do not seem worth living: a veritable idiotic tale, with the only tangible rationale the production of children who will also have a glorious youth and then grow up to discover the same idiotic tale as their parents and all generations. Only fleeting moments contradict this sour picture: moments of beauty, of great music, of the drama we saw tonight (Euripides' Hecuba), done in the ancient outdoor theater. But then back to stupidity, caviling, false values such as displayed by my parents (who think that I have false values). I am so disgusted with their conspicuous wealth. I have seen such poverty in Greece, such hopelessness, that to throw away money for one's vanity and comfort is an abomination. I want to give every taxi driver, every beggar, urchin, peddler and down-and-out one hundred drachmas, which we throw away on a meal here without thinking twice. But when I wanted to give our guide today the same, as I was in a flush of excitement over the way he opened up every secret for us, my father was furious. To sacrifice the price of an extravagant meal for the revelation of the greatness that was ancient Greece is certainly no great hardship.

I only see now C.'s point of view, and why she was so angry with me, even though the 'comforts' I demanded were infinitesimal compared to my parents' almost senile behavior here. I was wrong—wrong—thinking only of myself, hoarding my money, concerned that I eat before I was concerned for the others or even for my poor sick dear wife who's as good as gold. Yes, I see it all now.

And my father erupted again on all my sins—how I wasted all my time, married out of the faith and out of nationality. Accused me of only worrying about the Yannakoses' suffering, and not their own. We visited Ben Jacob, an Israeli here in the legation, who had some other company, an Israeli couple and a Greek Jewish couple, very nice people, and dad erupted about how nice Jews could be and why did I have to marry into stupid, uncultured Yiannakoses, because we could sit and feel right at home discussing such and such (the usual: what happened to me or you or him with the Paris taxicab drivers; food; clothes), whereas what would they (my parents) have in common with the Yiannakoses, which is true: nothing. And yet the Y's, for all their simplicity and Κυρία's illiteracy, have so much better characters; they have a nobility—THEY BELONG TO THE HUMAN RACE—than those who get upset at a hotel room because it isn't deluxe! My father is neurotic, bigoted, supersensitive, and I think senile. Only nice by mail.

On the other hand, I've got to prove to myself that I'm not the same. I'm so completely convinced that whatever I'll do I'll do badly. I have none of that delicious confidence, that "conquer the world" brashness that leads to success. And I do have problems with my marriage. There are awful barriers of custom to overleap. Even C. herself once said (during the melancholy), "What can I talk to you about? What have we got in common? You like only books, and I'm practical, uneducated." Is it true? What can we do? But isn't there some basic human stuff more important than practicality or intellectuality? Isn't the life we face the same, no matter how we delude ourselves about our "interests"? Can't two people, facing this life together, find comradeship? Πρέπει.

October 5, 1955

Stories. Something on our visit to Athens. Throwing money around with the recognition also of biting poverty in Greece. The beggars, peddlers. Anger at parents and mad desire to give all to a peddler. Parents don't think they're extravagant. Just want to live as they always lived.

Story also on meeting of the two families. Would be nice episode in a novel. The stilted conversation. My father's superciliousness, trepidation. Yiannakoses' sincerity: "Now we know better the kind of environment our daughter is going into, and we like it; we're more at ease about her leaving." Etc.

All well here. Parents left Monday. Father neurotic, miserable, but very pleasant in his rational moments. What a difference between the way he really is and the way his patients and even his friends and relatives know him. Parents keep complaining that I'm too dependent on them, but keep offering me more money, as if trying to keep me dependent, or bribing my love. I told them my policy over three years has been never to ask for a penny, though I've never refused anything that was offered. Got another $500 on Monday, making a grand total of $1400 so far I've hauled in as gifts because of my marriage, and more to come in kind. Oh, forgot $100 from Dimitrios. Wow! It's like collecting a dowry. Well, in Athens I felt it was infinitely better to be poor. If I were smart, I'd refuse all this money or give it all away. Would I were Saint Francis!

¶ Thus I began to study the lives and beliefs of the people, and the more I studied the more sure I became that a true faith was among them, that their faith was for them a necessary thing, and alone gave them a meaning in life and a possibility of living. In direct opposition to what I saw in our circle—where life without faith in religion was possible and where not one in a thousand claimed to be a believer—amongst the people there was not a single unbeliever amongst a thousand. In direct opposition to what I saw in our circle—where a whole life is spent in idleness, amusement and dissatisfaction with life—I saw amongst the people whole lives passed in heavy labour and unprotesting content. In direct opposition to what I saw in our circle—men resisting and angry with the hardships and sufferings of their fate—the people unhesitatingly and unresistingly accept illness and sorrow, in the quiet and firm belief that all these must be and could not be otherwise, and that all was for the best. In contradiction to the theory that the less learned we are the less we understand the meaning of life, and see in our sufferings and death but an evil joke, these men of the people live, suffer, and draw near to death in quiet confidence and oftenest with joy. In contradiction to the fact that an easy death, without terror or despair, is a rare exception in our class, a death which is uneasy, rebellious and sorrowful is among the people the rarest exception of all.

These people, lacking all that for us makes the only good in life, and experiencing at the same time the highest happiness, form the great majority of mankind. I looked more widely around me, I studied the lives of the past and present masses of humanity, and I saw that not two, or three, or ten, but hundreds, thousands, millions had so understood the meaning of life that they were able both to live and to die. All these men infinitely divided by manners, powers of mind, education and position, all alike in opposition to my ignorance, were well acquainted with the meaning of life and death, quietly laboured, endured hardship and suffering, lived and died, and saw in all this not a vain but a good thing. —Tolstoy.

¶ We all profess the Christian law of forgiveness of injuries and love of our neighbors, the law in honor of which we have built in Moscow forty times forty churches—but yesterday a deserter was knouted to death and a minister of that same law of love and forgiveness, a priest, gave the soldier a cross to kiss before his execution. — War and Peace, p. 594.

¶ Sometimes [Pierre] remembered how he had heard that soldiers in war when entrenched under the enemy's fire, if they had nothing to do, try hard to find some occupation the more easily to bear the danger. To Pierre all men seemed like these soldiers, seeking refuge from life: some in ambition some in cards, some in framing laws, some in women, some in toys, some in horses, some in politics, some in sport, some in wine, and some in government affairs. "Nothing is trivial, and nothing is important, it's all the same—only to save oneself from it as best one can," thought Pierre. "Only not to see it, that dreadful it!" — War and Peace, p. 595.

Chrysanthi had a dream about our prospective apartment in Sunnyside, that when we came to occupy it it was full of gypsies, very dirty, with little boys running around barefooted, dressed in rags. There was a big stove in the living room, and only one very weak bulb for light. The stairs were slanted down so it was hard not to slide off each step as one mounted or descended. The rooms were fantastically big, and the kitchen was "millions away" from the living room. Strange dream.

Nice evening last night στο τῆς Βούλης. Lindsays, Margaret Backhaus (chief, European section of Friends Service Council), Nora (her secretary), a Mrs. Δημητριάδου, were also there. Margaret and Nora both immense ungainly eccentric-seeming Englishwomen, typically Quaker, the kind who seem most at home in the salon of the duchess but whose ‘advanced ideas’ wouldn’t make them flinch at a donkey-ride, rugged living, etc. Charles ‘lectured’ us about Yugoslavia, mainly whether or not the people were free to go to church, as if that were the most important thing to consider; and Margaret told a little about her trip to Russia in 1951 (with Kathleen Lonsdale and Paul Cadbury & Co.). Chrysanthi was very quiet, scared, and at one point she said she wanted to go home. Fortunately the Anglo Saxons left early. Immediately thereupon a complete change came over us all. We sighed. Κυρία Δημητριάδου said she didn’t like Lindsay, and we all laughed, congratulating her on her perceptiveness. Chrysanthi brightened into animated bavardage. We all had a hell of a good time, with typical Greek vivacity. What pleased me most was that I did not seem to dampen things as had the other foreigners. Bravo, Πέτρος.

From Maugham, “A Friend in Need”:

¶ For thirty years now I have been studying my fellow men. I do not know very much about them. I should certainly hesitate to engage a servant on his face, and yet I suppose it is on the face for the most part we judge the persons we meet. We draw our conclusions from the shape of the jaw, the look in the eyes, the contour of the mouth. I wonder if we are more often right than wrong. Why novels and plays are so often untrue to life is because their authors, perhaps of necessity, make their characters all of a piece. They cannot afford to make them self-contradictory, for then they become incomprehensible, and yet self-contradictory is what most of us are. We are a haphazard bundle of inconsistent qualities. I shrug my shoulders when people tell me that their first impressions of a person are always right. I think they must have small insight or great vanity. For my own part I find that the longer I know people the more they puzzle me: my oldest friends are just those of whom I can say that I don’t know the first thing about them.

War and Peace, book IX, chapter 16 has a splendid section on the use and frunction or doctors, which expresses magnificently exactly what happened with C.’s illness, especially that visit of Γκινάλης with the ‘psychiatrist’ when C. was depressed, a visit that accomplished nothing—only reassured me and somehow helped relieve the tension.

¶ “It’s a crime that today’s art-popes make the masses believe that just because some snobs collect their works they all have to admire and imitate them. For me, the only place for the contemporary wire sculptures is in the night clubs, and abstract paintings should be on the borders of table cloths. . . . It is the tragedy of our time that most people have lost the instinct to recognize the danger of living in constant disregard to their God-given individualities. . . . Today’s man not only thinks in clichés, he also sees only in clichés. . . . As for me)—famous? I’m not famous. Only Picasso and Coca-Cola are famous. I’m just an educator who tries to be his own best pupil.” —Oskar Kokoschka.

Oedipus:

Let all come out,
 However vile! However base it be,
 I must unlock the secret of my birth.
 The woman, with more than woman’s pride, is shamed
 By my low origin. I am the child of Fortune,
 The giver of good, and I shall not be shamed.
She is my mother; my sisters are the Seasons;
 My rising and my falling march with theirs.
 Born thus, I ask to be no other man Than that I am, and will know who I am.

.....
Chorus: All generations of moral man add up to nothing!
 Show me the man whose happiness was anything more than illusion
 Followed by disillusion.
 Here is the instance, here is Oedipus, here is the reason Why I will call no mortal creature happy.

.....
Oedipus: O dark intolerable inescapable night
 That has no day!
 Cloud that no air can take away!
 O and again
 That piercing pain,
 Torture in the flesh and in the soul’s dark memory.

Chorus: It must be so; such suffering must needs be born Twice; once in the body and once in the soul.

“To be born here and in a mortal body is to begin to be sick.” —Saint Augustine.

¶ “But what is war? What is needed for success in warfare? What are the habits of the military? The aim of war is murder; the methods of war are spying, treachery, and their encouragement, the ruin of a country’s inhabitants, robbing them or stealing to provision the army, and fraud and falsehood termed military craft. The habits of the military class are the absence of freedom, that is discipline, idleness, ignorance, cruelty, debauchery, and drunkenness. And in spite of all this it is the highest class, respected by everyone. All the kings, except the Chinese, wear military uniforms, and he who kills most people receives the highest rewards. — They meet, as we shall meet tomorrow, to murder one another; they kill and maim tens of thousands, and then have thanksgiving services for having killed so many people (they even exaggerate the numbers), and they announce a victory, supposing that the more people they have killed the greater their achievement. How does God above look at them and hear them?” exclaimed Prince Andrew in a shrill, piercing voice. “Ah, my friend, it has of late become hard for me to live. I see that I have begun to understand too much. And it doesn’t do for man to taste of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. . . . Ah, well, it’s not for long!” he added. — War and Peace, book X, chapter 15.

¶ “To endure war is the most difficult subordination of man’s freedom to the law of God,” the voice had said. “Simplicity is the submission to the will of God; you cannot escape from Him. And they [the peasant-soldiers] are simple. They do not talk, but act. The spoken word is silver but the unspoken is golden. Man can be master of nothing while he fears death, but he who does not fear it possesses all. If there were no suffering, many would not know his limitations, would not know himself. The hardest thing [Pierre went on thinking, or hearing, in his dream] is to be able in your soul to unite the meaning of all. To unite all?” he asked himself. “No, not to unite. Thoughts cannot be united, but harness all these thoughts together is what we need! Yes, one must harness them, must harness them!” he repeated to himself with inward rapture, feeling that these words and they alone expressed what he wanted to say and solved the question that tormented him.

“Yes, one must harness, it is time to harness.”

“Time to harness, time to harness, Your Excellency! Your Excellency!” some voice was repeating. “We must harness, it is time to harness . . .” It was the voice of the groom, trying to wake him. — War and Peace, book XI, chap. 6.

I received a letter from American Express in Paris saying they could reserve a hotel room for us for Monday and Tuesday, December 26th and 27th. I told C. and asked if perhaps we shouldn't leave on Friday, so as to arrive the 25th. I wanted to write back and to know definitely. She was a little strange. Instead of looking up as she usually does, she continued her work and spoke in a kind of undertone, her head lowered. She said George would probably only be able to get away Friday night so we'd better leave Saturday. I was a little disappointed at losing the extra day in Paris, but I tried not show this, and saying “OK” went in to write to American Express. C. however could no longer hold back her tears. Trying to smile at me through them, she came into our room and quietly sobbed for a long time. We haven't spoken any more about the incident, but it proved to me that her customary cheerfulness now as the departure time grows near (six weeks) is a mask that she holds up, only with difficulty. What a battle she's making! She's a treasure. And what a difficult thing this departure will be, whether she manages to keep up the mask or no.

¶ While imprisoned in the shed Pierre had learned not with his intellect but with his whole being, by life itself, that man is created for happiness, that happiness is within him, in the satisfaction of simple human needs, and that all unhappiness arises not from privation but from superfluity. And now during these last three weeks of the march he had learned still another new, consolatory truth—that nothing in this world is terrible. He had learned that as there is no condition in which man can be happy and entirely free, so there is no condition in which he need be unhappy and lack freedom. He learned that suffering and freedom have their limits and that those limits are very near together; that the person in a bed of roses with one crumpled petal suffered as keenly as he now, sleeping on the bare damp earth with one side growing chilled while the other was warming; and that when he had put on tight dancing shoes he had suffered just as he did now when he walked with bare feet that were covered with sores—his footgear long since having fallen to pieces. He discovered that when he had married his wife—of his own free will as it had seemed to him—he had been no more free than now when they locked him up at night in a stable. —War and Peace, book XIV, chapter 3.

¶ Pierre's insanity consisted in not waiting, as he used to do, to discover personal attributes which he termed "good qualities" in people before loving them; his heart was now overflowing with love, and by loving people without cause he discovered indubitable causes for loving them. —book XV, chap. 5.

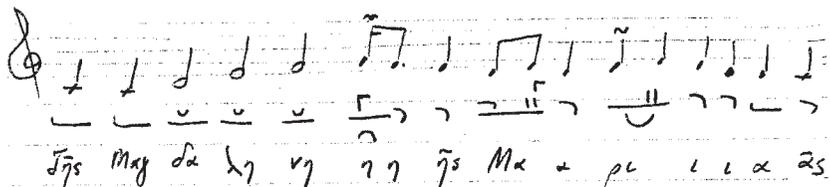

¶ He could not see an aim, for he now had faith—not faith in any kind of rule, or words, or ideas, but faith in an ever-living, ever-manifest God. Formerly he had sought Him in aims he set himself. That search for an aim had been simply a search for God, and suddenly in his captivity he had learned not by words or reasoning but by direct feeling what his nurse had told him long ago: that God is here and everywhere. In his captivity he had learned that in Karatáev God was greater, more infinite and unfathomable than in the Architect of the Universe recognized by the Freemasons. He felt like a man who after straining his eyes to see into the far distance finds what he sought at his feet. All his life he had looked over the heads of the men around him; when he should have merely looked in front of him without straining his eyes. —book XV, chapter 5.

¶ The spring was rather late. During the last week in Lent the weather was still clear and frosty. It thawed during the day, but at night there were seven degrees of frost, and the ground was so hard that the carts could still drive over the fields. At Easter there was snow, but a day or two later a warm wind arose, the sky became overcast with clouds, and for three days and three nights a gentle rain came down. On Thursday the wind dropped and a thick grey mist overspread the earth as if to conceal the mysteries that nature was preparing. The ice was melting everywhere, the streams were overflowing with running water. On the evening of the Sunday after Easter, the mist lifted, the clouds dispersed themselves, and the spring appeared in all its glory. On the following morning the remaining ice disappeared in the hot rays of the sun, and the air seemed to tremble with the vapours rising out of the damp, warm earth. Green blades of grass began to show themselves, the buds swelled on the currant-bushes, the hazel-trees, and the birches, and around their branches a swarm of bees were humming. Invisible larks sent forth their songs of joy over the green fields, the peewit seemed to mourn for their marshes, submerged by stormy waters, the cranes and wild geese flew high in the air with their calls of spring. The cattle lowed as they were turned out of their stalls, the young lambs gambled about near their mothers, children played about on the paths, covering them with the footprints of their bare feet, the merry voices of women bleaching their linen could be heard at the pond, from all sides resounded the hammering of peasants repairing their ploughs and harrows. Spring had really come. —Anna Karenina, part 2, chapter 12.

George and Dionysus are friends since childhood. Each has a sister. George's sister is pretty and has an ample number of suitors; Dionysus's is ugly—therefore becomes educated, takes a university degree to become a gymnasium teacher—but is always looking for a husband. Dionysus suddenly writes to George suggesting that George marry his sister. George has a conflict between offending his friend or marrying someone he doesn't love. Finally he writes that he looks on Dionysus's sister as his own sister, not someone he could marry. Dionysus writes back angrily, that he honored George by the offer and George offended him. George is very sorry to have strained relations with this friend of so many years. But he is convinced that Dionysus acted badly, should never have offered his sister in the first place, and afterward should have accepted George's decision. No contact between the friends. They avoid each other. Dionysus is engaged (he told George in the same letter in which he offered his sister). One day George sees Dionysus's fiancée and Dionysus passing on the street. They either don't see him or snub him. He doesn't call Dionysus. Later on the same day he meets Dionysus's sister. Does she know of Dionysus's proposition and George's refusal? She doesn't show it; pleasantly announces that Dionysus is engaged. George behaves as though he doesn't know, lest she suspect letters. George writes congratulations to Dionysus and suggests that they have a rendezvous, to achieve a reconciliation.

Went to the Quaker school to say farewell to Lindsays. The three children were playing and turning somersaults, imitating each other. Angus asked C. how she knew she had a baby, then put his ear to her abdomen and said, "Ah, I hear it, I hear it!" Languages all mixed together. The staff at the school all complain terribly about Lindsay, but smile to his face.

New York

Dreamed about two children, a boy and a girl, who are told by a teacher that they must kill themselves. All very matter of fact. They are about to do so at the appointed time, but can't. Later they are in the principal's office for some reason and the teacher is too. They try to explain to the principal what the teacher told them to do, but of course it seems ridiculous. The principal doesn't believe them. Nothing else.

Must, must start working again. This idleness is preposterous.

The family. C's comment that "friends" can never be counted on. Only family really are there to help. The disintegration of family in America, and chez Bien. Contrast with Yiannakoses. Over-protectiveness vs. over-independence.

Two high school seniors run away on the night of the prom, planning to elope. While waiting for the J.P. they decide they're acting foolishly and return home to their frightened parents, who of course have called the police, etc. The parents, instead of praising the children for being so mature to change their minds at the last minute, berate them.

My father: picture of the degeneration of a man, sans resources, sans faith. Sits morbidly at home watching the stupidest television. A respectable alcoholism. The rise from poverty, radicalism, family troubles, earning power, money-madness, alienation from me, nervous breakdown, fetishlike faith in the psychiatrist, vestiges of stale radicalism, clinging to the psychiatric illusion of cure, life slipping by, the only pleasure in spending money at a bargain.

Theme of being too late. I wanted to help a beggar at Columbia the other day by buying some pencils from him, but passed him by on my way to lunch and thought I'd get them afterwards. But while I was eating I could see him walk sadly away.

The party scenes with English and Indians in E. M. Foster's Passage to India bring to mind the dinner at Vouli's, with Margaret Backhaus and Norah and the Lindsays, and how relieved we all felt when they had gone (I being considered Greek enough, I suppose, not to matter). 'Ενδιαφέρομαι πάρα πολύ εις τέτοια πράγματα διά τῆς Ἑλλάδας. Νομίζω τώρα πώς ἂν καμιά φορά θά γράψω κάτι πού ἀξίζει, θά εἶναι γιά τήν Ἑλλάδα. 'Εκείνη εἶναι ὅ,τι θέλω, νά ἔχω ἕνα θέμα παράξενο. The court scene in Forster is superb. Θαῦμα! Possibilities of doing Lindsay scene like it: the interview at the school, which was a kind of court with imperial elements ranged against the disorder of love.

¶ "The victoria was safe in a quiet side lane, but there were no horses, for the sais, not expecting the trial would end so abruptly, had led them away to visit a friend." The whole oriental mentality: compare with Greece—the shameful of my outrages at the station when they wanted to give us baggage things the next day, or the bank receipt. Mr. Yiannakos's Buddha-like ability to wait! Marvelous Mr. Yiannakos! Was there ever such a splendid person?! The concepts of time are antipodal in East and West.

¶ The feudal ownership of land did bring dignity, whereas the modern ownership of movables is reducing us again to a nomadic horde. We are reverting to the civilization of luggage, and historians of the future will note how the middle classes accreted possessions without taking root in the earth, and may find in this the secret of their imaginative poverty. —Forster, Howards End, p. 149.

Useful image in Aspects of the Novel, p. 381: ¶ As women bettered their position the novel, they asserted, became better too. Quite wrong. A mirror does not develop because an historical pageant passes in front of it. It only develops when it gets a fresh coat of quicksilver—in other words, when it acquires new sensitiveness; and the novel's success lies in its own sensitiveness, not in the success of its subject matter.

—I find Howards End very tiring and even boring reading, yet the characters are real, and the thing that strikes me most is the Conradian idea of the illusion under which we must live if we are not to go insane: the Wilcoxes have their illusion, the Schlegels do not. I wonder about the writer himself.

March 4, 1956

Today, although we just heard a fiery concert by Friedrich Gulda, I am in one of those depressed moods and angry at Chrysanthi so that I want neither to see her nor speak to her. She, of course, has done nothing wrong, but I see myself accusing her in my mind of many errors of omission: her lack of industry in learning English, her failure today to give me a decent meal, or hardly even a meal at all. I want to talk to her in a technical way about music, art; but I can't. Our exchanges of conversation get so stereotyped, so fixed; and seem to contract down into fewer and fewer. I know she misses her family very much. It's an awful thing for her to be so far away, especially now that she'll have the baby. And yet what am I to do, what am I to do! Oh, God, I want so much to write, and I've stopped. Damn, damn, damn!

March 5, 1956

Recurrent theme of Forster: ¶ “. . . and soon the glass shade had fallen that cuts of married couples from the world.

Last evening spent with a lovely couple: Malcolm and Betty MacKinnon. I certainly am snooty and snobby. I assumed, because he was working in an insurance company as an actuary that he'd be dull and “uneducated,” only to find that he and his wife are extremely well read, especially in the theater, and understand a great deal more about Pirandello and Chekhov (to mention only two) than I do. What is wrong with me anyway?

Last night C. and I had one of those spells of not talking to each other, the first disagreeableness since we came back from Greece, I think. It’s terrible, how weak I am. All the while I kept consciously telling myself “This is stupid, horrible, uncalled-for,” but couldn’t bring myself to make overtures of reconciliation. Happily our visit to the MacKinnons helped, and after it we were in a better mood. I think there is something awfully sadistic in me: I seem to enjoy hurting those nearest me, as if it proved somehow my superiority. Ugh! Oh for an illusion to get lost in!

Forster, p. 261: ¶ London was but a foretaste of this nomadic civilization which is altering human nature so profoundly, and throws upon personal relations a stress greater than they have ever borne before. Under cosmopolitanism, if it comes, we shall receive no help from the earth. Trees and meadows and mountains will only be a spectacle, and the binding force that they once exercised on character must be entrusted to Love alone. May Love be equal to the task!”

¶ . . . one of the illusions attached to love is that it will be permanent. Not has been—will be. All history, all our experience, teaches us that no human relationship is constant, it is as unstable as the living beings who compose it, and they must balance like jugglers if it is to remain; if it is constant it is no longer a human relationship but a social habit, the emphasis in it has passed from love to marriage. All this we know, yet we cannot bear to apply our bitter knowledge to the future; the future is to be so different; the perfect person is to come along, or the person we know already is to become perfect. There are to be no changes, no necessity for alertness. We are to be happy or even perhaps miserable for ever and ever. Any strong emotion brings with it the illusion of permanence, and the novelists have seized upon this. They usually end their books with marriage, and we do not object because we lend them our dreams. —E. M. Forster, Aspects of the Novel, pp. 86–7.

Peroration to Forster's Aspects of the Novel: ¶ I see these two movements of the human mind: the great tedious onrush known as history, and a shy crablike sideways movement. Both movements have been neglected in these lectures: history because it only carries people on, it is just a train full of passengers; and the crablike movement because it is too slow and cautious to be visible over our tiny period of two hundred years. . . . If we had the power or license to take a wider view, and survey all human and pre-human activity, we might not conclude like this; the crablike movement, the shiftings of the passengers, might be visible, and the phrase "the development of the novel" might cease to be a pseudo-scholarly tag or a technical triviality, and become important, because it implied the development of humanity.

A typical passage in V. Woolf's To the Lighthouse (p. 108): ¶ . . . But then, Mrs. Ramsay, though instantly taking his side against all the silly Giddingses in the world, then, she thought, intimating by a little pressure on his arm that he walked up hill too fast for her, and she must stop for a moment to see whether those were fresh mole-hills on the bank, then, she thought, stooping down to look, a great mind like his must be different in every way from ours. All the great men she had ever known, she thought, deciding that a rabbit must have got in, were like that, and it was good for young men (though the atmosphere of lecture-rooms was stuffy and depressing to her beyond endurance almost) simply to hear him, simply to look at him. But without shooting rabbits, how was one to keep them down? she wondered. It might be a rabbit; it might be a mole. Some creature anyhow was ruining her Evening Primroses. And looking up, she saw above the thin trees the first pulse of the full-throbbing star, and wanted to make her husband look at it; for the sight gave her such keen pleasure. But she stopped herself. He never looked at things. If he did, all he would say would be, Poor little world, with one of his sighs.

At that moment, he said, "Very fine," to please her, and pretended to admire the flowers. But she knew quite well that he did not admire them, or even realize that they were there. It was only to please her. . . . Ah, but was that not Lily Briscoe strolling along with William Bankes? She focused her short-sighted eyes upon the backs of a retreating couple. Yes, indeed it was. Did that not mean that they would marry? Yes, it must! What an admirable idea! They must marry! . . .

He had been to Amsterdam, Mr. Bankes was saying as he strolled across the lawn with Lily Briscoe. . . .

They turned and saw the Ramseys. So that is marriage, Lily thought, a man and a woman looking at a girl throwing a ball.

¶ Lily Briscoe knew all that. Sitting opposite him, could she not see, as in an X-ray photograph, the ribs and thigh bones of the young man's desire to impress himself, lying dark in the mist of his flesh—that thin mist which convention had laid over his burning desire to break into the conversation?

Appropriate poem by Yeats:

A CRADLE SONG

The angels are stooping
They weary of trooping
With the whimpering dead.

God's laughing in Heaven
To see you so good;
The Shining Seven
Are gay with His mood.

I kiss you and kiss you,
My pigeon my own;
Ah how I shall miss you
When you have grown.

Visit last night from John Davison. We talked about Gregory. I gave him my novel and several stories to read.

Walter Pater, in conclusion to his "Renaissance": ¶ To regard all things and principles of things as inconstant modes or fashions has more and more become the fashion of modern thought. . . . The service of philosophy, of speculative culture, towards the human spirit, is to rouse, to startle it to a life of constant and eager observation. Every moment some form grows perfect in hand or face; some tone on the hills or the sea is choicer than the rest; some mood of passion or insight or intellectual excitement is irresistibly real and attractive to us—for that moment only. Not the fruit of experience, but experience itself, is the end. A counted number of pulses only is given to us of a variegated, dramatic life. How may we see in them all that is to be seen in them by the finest senses? (This, says Edmund Wilson in Axel's Castle is a good statement of the symbolist philosophy, also followed by the early Yeats.)

How people say the same thing six times over. The English woman in the carriage shop: “It’s waterproof, no it won’t wear out.”

¶ So with the lamps all put out, the moon sunk, and a thin rain drumming on the roof a downpouring of immense darkness began. Nothing, it seemed, could survive the flood, the profusion of darkness which, creeping in at keyholes and crevices, stole round window blinds, came into bedrooms, swallowed up here a jug and basin, there a bowl of red and yellow dahlias, there the sharp edges and firm bulk of a chest of drawers. Not only was furniture confounded; there was scarcely anything left of body or mind by which one could say, “This is he” or “This is she.” Sometimes a hand was raised as if to clutch something or ward off something, or somebody groaned, or somebody laughed aloud as if sharing a joke with nothingness.

Nothing stirred in the drawing-room or in the dining-room or on the staircase. Only through the rusty hinges and swollen sea-moistened woodwork certain airs detached from the body of the wind (the house was ramshackle after all) crept round corners and ventured indoors. Almost one might imagine them, as they entered the drawing-room questioning and wondering, toying with the flap of hanging wall-paper, asking, would it hang much longer, when would it fall? Then smoothly brushing the walls, they passed on musingly as if asking the red and yellow roses on the wall-paper whether they would fade, and questioning (gently, for there was time at their disposal) the torn letters in the waste-paper basket, the flowers, the books, all of which were now open to them and asking, were they allies? Were they enemies? How long would they endure? —Virginia Woolf, To the Lighthouse, p. 189ff.

¶ This land which man has deswamped and denuded and derived in two generations so that white men can own plantations and commute every night to Memphis and black men own plantations and ride in jim crow cars to Chicago to live in millionaires' mansions on Lake Shore Drive; where white men rent farms and live like niggers and niggers crop on shares and live like animals; where cotton is planted and grows man-tall in the very cracks of the sidewalks, and usury and mortgage and bankruptcy and measureless wealth, Chinese and African and Aryan and Jews, all breed and spawn together until no man has time to say which one is which nor cares. . . . Gleanings from Joyce, Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man:

¶ Or was it that, being as weak of sight as he was shy of mind, he drew less pleasure from the reflexion of the glowing sensible world through the prism of a language many-colored and richly storied than from the contemplation of an inner world of individual emotions mirrored perfectly in a lucid supple periodic prose?

¶ . . . and he found himself glancing from one casual word to another on his right or left in stolid wonder that they had been so silently emptied of instantaneous sense until every mean shop legend bound his mind like the words of a spell and his soul shriveled up sighing with age as he walked on in a lane among heaps of dead language. His own consciousness of language was ebbing from his brain and trickling into the very words themselves which set to band and disband themselves in wayward rhythms.

¶ Rhythm, said Stephen, is the first formal esthetic relation of part to part in any esthetic whole or of an esthetic whole to its part or parts or of any part to the esthetic whole of which it is a part.

¶ To speak of [beauty] and to try to understand [its] nature and, having understood it, to try slowly and humbly and constantly to express, to press out again, from the gross earth or what it brings forth, from sound and shape and color which are the prison gates of our soul, an image of the beauty we have come to understand—that is art.

¶ Truth is beheld by the intellect which is appeased by the most satisfying relations of the intelligible; beauty is beheld by the imagination which is appeased by the most satisfying relations of the sensible. The first step in the direction of truth is to understand the frame and scope of the intellect itself, to comprehend the act itself of intellection. . . . The first step in the direction of beauty is to understand the frame and scope of the imagination, to comprehend the act itself of esthetic apprehension.

¶ To him she would unveil her soul's shy nakedness, to one who was but schooled in the discharging of a formal rite rather than to him, a priest of eternal imagination, transmuted the daily bread of experience into the radiant body of everliving life.

¶ —Then, said Cranly, you do not intend to become a protestant?

—I said that I had lost the faith, Stephen answered, but not that I had lost self-respect. What kind of liberation would that be to forsake an absurdity which is logical and coherent and to embrace one which is illogical and incoherent?

¶ I will try to express myself in some mode of life or art as freely as I can and as wholly as I can, using for my defence the only arms I allow myself to use—silence, exile, and cunning.

¶ Welcome, O life! I go to encounter for the millionth time the reality of experience and to forge in the smithy of my soul the uncreated conscience of my race.

Conclusion to Pater’s The Renaissance:

¶ Not the fruit of experience, but experience itself is the end. A counted number of pulses only is given to us of a variegated, dramatic life. How may we see in them all that is to be seen in them by the finest senses? How shall we press most swiftly from point to point, and be present always at the focus where the greatest number of vital forces unite in their purest energy? . . . To burn always with this hard, gem-like flame, to maintain this ecstasy, is success in life. . . . While all melts under our feet, we may well grasp at any exquisite passion, or any contribution to knowledge that seems by a lifted horizon to set the spirit free for a moment, or any stirring of the senses, strange dyes, strange colours and curious odours, or the work of the artist’s hand, or the face of one’s friend. Not to discriminate every moment some passionate attitude in those about us, and in the very brilliancy of their gifts some tragic dividing of forces on their way, is, on this short day of frost and sun, to sleep before evening.

Reading T. S. Eliot’s The Family Reunion puts me in mind of doing a novel using the scene of our gathered family when I returned from college that time when dad had had his nervous breakdown, and everyone was there, though no one could possibly be of any use, each person thinking of course that he knew both cause and cure of the calamity. Bringing together artificially a dissociated family: American diversity in social status and income, education, etc. Could include an archetypal woman, an outsider, etc., a guest.

Also: has anything been written of Magellan's voyage: that would be an exciting yarn, with the Master dying, and the crew at one point boiling up old leather to eat.

The verse in The Family Reunion is very heavy, thudding and pessimistic, as in all Eliot's "serious" works. Witness this last chorus:

We do not like to look out of the same window, and see quite a different landscape.

We do not like to climb a stair, and find that it takes us down.

We do not like to walk out of a door, and find ourselves back in the same room.

We do not like the maze in the garden, because it too closely resembles a maze in the brain.

We do not like what happens when we are awake, because it too closely resembles what happens when we are asleep.

We understand the ordinary business of living,

We know how to work the machine,

We can usually avoid accidents,

We are insured against fire,

Against larceny and illness,

Against defective plumbing,

But not against the act of God. We know various spells and enchantments,

And minor forms of sorcery,

Divination and chiromancy,

Specifics against insomnia,

Lumbago, and the loss of money.

But the circle of our understanding is a very restricted area.

Except for a limited number

Of strictly practical purposes

We do not know what we are doing;

And even, when you think of it,

We do not know much about thinking.

What is happening outside of the circle?

And what is the meaning of happening?

What ambush lies beyond the heather

And beyond the Standing Stones?

Beyond the Heaviside Layer

And behind the smiling moon?
 And what is being done to us?
 And what are we, and what are we doing?
 To each and all of these questions
 There is no conceivable answer.
 We have suffered far more than a personal loss—
 We have lost our way in the dark.

¶ Experience is never limited, and it is never complete; it is an immense sensibility, a kind of huge spider web of the finest silken threads suspended in the chamber of consciousness, and catching every air-borne particle in its tissue. It is the very atmosphere of the mind; and when the mind is imaginative . . . it takes to itself the faintest hints of life, it converts the very pulses of the air into revelations.

¶ The advantage, the luxury, as well as the torment and responsibility of the novelist, is that there is no limit to what he may attempt as an executant—no limit to his possible experiments, efforts, discoveries, successes. —Henry James, “The Art of Fiction”

A Catholic woman gives birth to a deformed child (no arms, legs). A nurse shows it to her the next morning and she goes into hysterics: telling the obstetrician to destroy it—she won’t feed it, won’t take it home! He—the doctor—after having delivered the monstrous child at 6 a.m. went home to bed (with what feelings!); returning, he tries to reason with the mother according to Catholic doctrine: the child has a soul that man cannot presume to destroy, etc.; besides many deformed people grew up into geniuses or in some way found constructive places in society. She’ll have none of it. Later, the husband presents an action against the doctor for driving his wife into psychosis and necessitating psychological treatment, which he wants the doctor to pay for. He couches his complaints in phrases such as “the public must be preserved from such medical practitioners” and invents a history of supposed neglect and malpractice on the doctor’s part: that he didn’t X-ray the wife during pregnancy, or examine her internally, etc.; that he forced her to take the baby, said she’d die of cancer if she didn’t, etc. Question for jury: Is the obstetrician responsible legally for the woman’s psychosis? Question for us: Is he responsible morally? Is the husband lying, just trying to collect money where he sees the chance? What way out is there with such malformed infants?

¶ From Pepys' diary: "So to bed, where my wife and I had some high words upon my telling her that I would fling the dog which her brother gave her out of window if he [dirtied] the house any more."

Two weeks ago I didn't get the job as a lecturer on the Hudson River Day Line; two days ago I didn't get the job as a mail clerk for Life, although the interviewer said my record was (sic) heavy, having gone to Deerfield, Harvard, etc. 50 or 75 people showed up for that job. How did they choose? What mysterious ritual! Today I was put on a list of available tutors for the Searing Tutorial School, at $1.80/hr., but who can say if anything will come of it. Good Humor can hire me, however, at 28% commission in ice cream sales. 60 hours a week. Ugh.

Chrysanthi and Leander are well. Leander is very beautiful now—age six weeks plus.

"If Adam and Eve had not fallen, all generations would have come periodically to Eden, that 'capital seat,' to do their homage [cf. Paradise Lost XI 342]. To you or to me, once in a lifetime perhaps, would have fallen the almost terrifying honour of coming at last, after long journeys and ritual preparations and slow ceremonial approaches, into the very presence of the great Father, Priest, and Emperor of the planet Tellus; a thing to be remembered all our lives." —C. S. Lewis, Preface to Paradise Lost, p. 114 (paraphrase).

Our first anniversary. Chrysanthi as lovely and gracious as ever.

Letter from Vouli brings news that Lindsay is having an affaire with his secretary (Greek) and that half of Salonika knows about it, including Mrs. Lindsay. Also that the new directors of the school can't come because of Greek-English differences over Cyprus, and that Lindsay will stay on until somehow the status quo can be changed. Quite an upstanding man and Quaker, that! And how proud Margaret Backhaus and Co. must be of him!

Chrysanthi tells a delightful story about the tea-cosy at the Quaker School in Salonika. It seems a new staff member came, very naïve, who of course had never seen a cosy before. Chrysanthi in a playful mood told her it was Napoléon's hat, and that Napoléon's brother, who had been very friendly with Mr. Lindsay's father had given it to the latter as a present. The girl believed everything, of course, and lived in especial awe of Mr. Lindsay and his connections with the great emperor.

Another flare-up with dad. He returned from the country, stopped in here before going home, and everything was pleasant enough. Then he left. A half-hour later I received a telephone call from the other house. Why hadn't I mowed the lawn (which I said I would try to do during their absence)? He gave me so much constantly and seldom asked anything in return. Did I have a bloc, etc., etc. in that whining self-pitying voice. I hung up the phone quietly in the middle of it, and refused to answer when he repeatedly called back. Chrysanthi smoothed the ground a little by explaining how tired I was from work, how I spent every spare minute on my thesis (sic); but I haven't spoken to dad since. He seems to have a splendid facility for ruining pleasant moments.

Likewise when we arrived at Lenox the week before. Mother suggested after supper that C. and I race to Jacob's Pillow to see the San Francisco Ballet. At this dad turned green: wasn't I too tired! Weren't there too many detours in the road! What an idiot mother was to suggest it! And besides, quoth he, "I want to go to the theater, did you ever think of that!" (He being there three weeks solid and we our only night—his three weeks being a continued desperate effort to distract his consciousness from having only himself to be confronted with: using radio, news broadcasts—heard twenty times daily, and always the same—; theater which he'd seen on Broadway before, etc.; mother, as always, unfortunately, abject before him, and after being 'talked to' outside, actually confessed that she was wrong, which of course was nonsense, he being a silly selfish neurotic senile-like fool, with a touch of maliciousness and an infant's compulsion to direct others to suit himself.)

Funny, that Chrysanthi says (and truthfully) that I am like him, that I always must have my way! Irony. Probably my antipathy toward him stems from this realization that I am like him; and thus I chastise myself into the bargain.

Ce soir pendant le repas j'appris quelque chose de nouveau de mon beau-frère Georges et de ce qui l'arriva pendant la guère. Son père nous écrit comment Georges cherche l'image de sa soeur et sa mère dans la caractère de sa fiancée, Efthimoula. Celui-là n'est pas très content maintenant, dit le père, parce qu'il s'attend à voir aucune différence entre la fiancée et sa proper famille, mais bien sûr il y a assez de différences. Je remarquais, moi-même, que Georges disait souvent qu'il n'était pas déjà marié parce qu'il voulait trouver une jeune fille exactement comme sa soeur Lola, et ne l'ai pas trouvé. Je dis à Chrysanthi que c'est un phénomène très bien-connue, ça—qu'un homme qui aime sa soeur ou sa mère, quand il veut se marier, tout souvent choisit quelqu'une qui se rassemble beaucoup à la mère ou la soeur don't il s'agit. Telles mariages ne sont pas les plus fortes, entendu.

Chrysanthi fut d'accord. Mais elle m'expliqua que Georges, à cause de ses troubles pendant la guère, a senti qu'il a dû repayer une dette à ses parents, car ils le soignèrent beaucoup pendant qu'il restait en prison. (Les Allemands le prirent parce qu'un jour un des 'guerrillas' décendit des montagnes pour lui demander deux cahiers. Georges fut 'agricole' du village. Sachant que l'aide aux patriots fut défendu, il dit qu'il n'eût pas des cahiers. L'autre, cependant, répondit qu'il fallut les trouver avant le lendemain, autrement Georges se trouverait mort. Ayant donc entre deux diables, Georges prit les cahiers et les donna. Entendu, quelqu'un de part des Allemands le vit. On le jeta en prison, seul, longtemps.)

M et Mme Yiannakos, et Lola lui firent des visites, restant dehors des murs où, cependant, leur fils put leur voir. Ils marchèrent souvent six kilomètres dans la neige; ils apportèrent de la nourriture, et, plus important, ils apportèrent leur amour. Monsieur Y. pria les Allemands de délivrer son fils. Lui et Lola aussi, quelquefois souffrirent aux mains des soldats et après tout eut arrangé, Lola tomba malade: crise de nerfs.

À cause de tout ça, Georges, étant, comme M Yiannakos nous écrit, σφιχτά δεμένο à la famille, trouve maintenant qu'il est affiance, qu'il ne veut pas quitter la maison. On pouvait dire: "Oedipus complex," n'est-ce pas? (sans le désir contre le père).

Au même temps, Lola va se marier avec Costas. Je me demande alors qu'est-ce c'est que Georges au fond en pense.

Ich kan es vielleicht benutzen.

¶ The three most important things a man has are briefly, his private parts, his money, and his religious opinions. —Samuel Butler.

Ich ging gestern zum Bibliothek um Artikeln von Hartley zu finden. Ich sah besonders in der Zeitung Times Londons an, wo bemerkte ich auch viel vom Krieg Griechenlands mit Deutschland geschrieb en. Dann dachte ich, wie ich—wenn vielleicht ich will einen Roman von Griechenland eine Tag schreiben—vom Geschicht Kriegs und andere notigen Sachen lernen könnte, wenn ich nur die Zeitungen Kriegzeits suchen will, welche wird viel leicht zu tun.

Ich kam nach Hause zurück, und nach dem Essen, meine Frau begleitete mich zum Kino, wo wir Moby Dick Melvilles gesehen haben. Es war natürlich gut, aber war es fremd, Leute, die im Gott glaubten, zu hören Starbuck war Quaker, aber mit einem sehr schwer Beruf und mit einer schwerer Wahl zu machen, ob Herr Ahab zu schießen, oder jederman zu sterben lassen, auch ihn selbst. Ich kan nicht sagen, daß er recht hatte. Gegenteils, wer kan es sagen, daß er unrecht hatte? Herr Melville gab uns nicht die Antwort.

Ich möchte nun das Buch widerzulesen.

¶ The novel as a piece of domestic and recognizable realism, has lost its fundamental subject. If it does survive in face of the contemporary tendency toward the simplification of dramatic art, I suspect it will do so only by a return to the impersonal tale from which it arose: the heroic, the romance in which the hero has no specific identity. —V. S. Pritchett in N.Y. Times Book Review.

¶ Quakerism is a movement. It was started as a protest, not as a new religion. When it ceases to move, it is dead. Are we living our testimony against war? Are we living in Christian love? Are we showing in all ways possible our belief in justice and liberty for all people? We have the power. God is our Father, in whom is all power. He is ready to give us favors. He sent the seventy unlettered men out, and they returned amazed at the power given them. It is ready for us. But all the giving cannot be on our Father's side; we have obligations to Him.

Do not be afraid of failures. God can use them. Better to fail than not to do. What we need is not a new doctrine, but a new life. We do not know yet all the ways to be disciples of Christ. Find a need, and supply it within the scope of your own particular ability. Do something. Go preach, practice. Wherever you go, be examples. Keep your courage, and then, as George Fox said, 'Walk cheerfully on, seeing that of God in every man.' —Anna Curtis, Eleanor Good and May Hoag, expressing the message of the Yearly Meeting of New York, 1956.

Wee are all conceived in close Prison; in our Mothers wombs, we are close Prisoners all; when we are borne, we are borne but to the liberty of the house; Prisoners still, though within larger walls; and then all our life is but a going out to the place of Execution, to death. Now was there ever any man seen to sleep in the Cart, between New-gate and Tyborne? Between the Prison, and the place of Execution, does any man sleep? And we sleep all the way; from the womb to the grave we are never thoroughly awake; but passé on with such dreames, and imaginations as these, I may live as well, as another, and why should I dye, rather than another? But awake, and tell me, sayes this Text, Quis homo? Who is that other that thou talkest of? What man is he that liveth, and shall not see Death? —John Donne, To the Lords upon Easter Day at the Communion, the King Being Dangerously Sick at New-Market, March 28, 1619.

¶ The thought occurred to Hester that the child might really be seeking to approach her with childlike confidence, and doing what she could, and as intelligently as she knew how, to establish a meeting point of sympathy. It showed Pearl in an unwonted aspect. Heretofore, the mother, while loving her child with the intensity of a sole affection, had schooled herself to hope for little other return than the waywardness of an April breeze; which spends its time in airy sport, and has its gusts of inexplicable passion, and is petulant in its best of moods, and chills oftener than caresses you, when you take it to your bosom; in requital of which misdemeanors, it will sometimes, of its own vague purpose, kiss your cheek with a kind of doubtful tenderness, and play gently with your hair, and then be gone about its other idle business, leaving a dreamy pleasure at your heart. —Hawthorne, The Scarlet Letter, chapter XV.

Falls schrieb ich etwas, über des Geschicht Paulas und Socrates, könnte ich als Modell den Roman Hawthornes nachahmen, dann es gibt auch über der Schuld. Socrates würde die Schuld fühlen, weil er seinen Vater betrügen hatte—während er sein Geld fortwährend genommen hat. Paula, gegenteils, weiß, daß sie die Verantwortlichkeit dafür hielt. Jederman ringt für die Freiheit, gegen die Sitte; aber auch Schuld mit Ehrlichkeit kämpfen.

The Scarlet Letter is marvelously plotted, and with so few characters! It is classic in its sparcity and intense power, Aristotelian in its perfect tragic construdction. I like the air of mysteriousness and symbol that Hawthorne delights in. Forster would call this «Prophecy,» Stephen Dedalus «Radiance,» or the stuff of which radiance is made. Models, models. Schaffen Sie! Ποιοῦ !

A UNE PASSANTE

La rue assourdissante autour de moi hurlait.
 Longue, mince, en grand deuil, douleur majestueuse,
 Une femme passa, d'une main fastueuse
 Soulevant, balançant le feston et l'ourlet;
 Agile et noble, avec sa jambe de statue.
 Moi, je buvais, crispé comme un extravagant,
 Dans son oeil, ciel livide où germe l'ouragan,
 La douceur qui fascine et le plaisir qui tue.
 Un éclair . . . puis la nuit! — Fugitive beauté
 Dont le regard m'a fait soudainement renaître,
 Ne te verrai-je plus que dans l'éternité?
 Ailleurs, bien loin d'ici! Trop tard! jamais peut-être!
 Car j'ignore où tu fuis, tu ne sais où je vais, Ô toi que j'eusse aimée, ô toi qui le savais!

—Charles Baudelaire

¶ 'A mesure qu'on a plus d'esprit, on trouve qu'il y a plus d'hommes originaux. Les gens du commun ne trouvent pas de différence entre les hommes. —Pascal (quoted by Th. Hardy in Tess of the D'Urbervilles).

¶ The grey half-tones of daybreak are not the grey half-tones of the day's close, though the degree of their shade may be the same. In the twilight of the morning light seems active, darkness passive; in the twilight of evening it is the darkness which is active and crescent, and the light which is the drowsy reverse.

Being so often—possibly not always by chance—the first two persons to get up at the dairy-house, they seemed to themselves the first persons up of all the world. In these early days of her residence here Tess did not skim, but went out-of-doors at once after rising, where he was generally awaiting her. The spectral, half-compounded, aqueous light which pervaded the open mead impressed them with a feeling of isolation, as if they were Adam and Eve. At this dim inceptive stage of the day Tess seemed to Clare to exhibit a dignified largeness both of disposition and physique, an almost regnant power, possibly because he knew that at that preternatural time hardly any woman so well endowed in person as she was likely to be walking in the open air within the boundaries of his horizon; very few in all England. Fair women are usually asleep at midsummer dawns. She was close at hand, and the rest were nowhere.

The mixed, singular luminous gloom in which they walked along together to the spot where the cows lay often made him think of the Resurrection hour. He little thought that the Magdalen might be at his side. Whilst all the landscape was in neutral shade his companion's face, which was the focus of his eyes, rising above the mist stratum, seemed to have a sort of phosphorescence upon it. She looked ghostly, as if she were merely a soul at large. In reality her face, without appearing to do so, had caught the cold gleam of day from the north-east; his own face, though he did not think of it, wore the same aspect to her.

It was then, as has been said, that she impressed him most deeply. She was no longer the milkmaid, but a visionary essence of woman—a whole sex condensed into one typical form. He called her Artemis, Demeter, and other fanciful names half teasingly, which she did not like because she did not understand them.

'Call me Tess,' she would say askance; And he did. —Hardy, Tess of the D'Urbervilles, chapter XX.

October 7, 1956

¶ . . . Men are too often harsh with women they love or have loved; Women with men. And yet these harshnesses are tenderness itself when compared with the universal harshness out of which they grow; the harshness of the position towards the temperament, of the means toward the aims, of the to-day towards yesterday, of hereafter towards to-day. —Tess, chapter XLIX.

—The position toward the temperament puts me in mind of Edgar Parry, that compassionate Soul enshrouded in the living deathness of Pan American World Airways System, Inc., Atlantic Division, Idylwild Station, Traffic Department, job title: senior agent. Remember also John Tanner, his women on two continents (girl dead in Montréal). Try enthusiasms, anti-bourgeois sentiments, yet being strung up in the business world, another anonymity of P.A.A. Or Gene Grant, the comedian. Did he really steal the $50? The glory of his reinstatement. . . . Jacobs and smiling Murphy over the vacation. Hans Otto the perfectionist, Skalond the sadist, Hank the fool; The French-Canadian with six children and no intellect, his going to Newark with cash-register keys: Fred Babineau. Napoleonic Norman Weiner, self-deprecating Irene Barklay. Parry's hopeless courting of Lee Kyle. Favoritism for the Germans. The front boys: Rhnaghan, Trainor, Nelson Danziger and mustache, inc. Gen-saler. Ann Ruffo always on the telephone. Write-its. Joe Domichi the ex-psychologist. Felix the ex-diplomat. Leslie Richer the ex-? His wife, the television and the air conditioner—eternal triangle. Sacha the ex-squadron-leader. My temptation for the $13.60. My victory over temptation. Punching wrong, and almost having to pay $28.05! No mercy from upstairs.

Tess is overpowering. I couldn't put the book down. A lesson in plotting, suspense. And one gets so furious with the characters for their hardness, their blunders. It wasn't coincidence alone that doomed Tess, though that helped—but even more the characters of herself, of Angel Clare, and of Alec D'Urberville. Perhaps she joined the latter the second time because of the death of old Durbeyfield and the consequent hardship and eviction of the family, which he was in a position to alleviate. And yet one feels that she still had free will and could have refused; she could have applied to Rev. Clare instead. These things make the book real, the characters round and alive, not just melodramatic. A marvelous work, with marvelous atmosphere-painting, symbols, occurrences—not one superfluous. A web, as Hardy would say himself, catching the flies; each strand helping in the final doom.

¶ He who makes a colossal fortune in the hosiery trade, and by his energy has succeeded in reducing the price of woolen goods by a thousandth part of a penny in the pound—this man is worth ten professional philanthropists. —Samuel Butler, Erewhon, chapter XX.

¶ People oppose money to culture, and imply that if a man has spent his time in making money he will not be cultivated—fallacy of fallacies! As though there could be a greater aid to culture than the having earned an honorable independence, and as though any amount of culture will do much for the man who is penniless, except make him feel his position more deeply. —Erewhon. (This is typical of Butler's position, also in The Way of All Flesh and in his own life.)

¶ A literature of wonder must have an end as inevitably as a strange land loses its strangeness when one lives in it. Think of the lost ecstasy of the Elizabethans. "Oh my America, my new found land, think of what it meant to them and of what it means to us. Wonder can only be the attitude of a man passing from one stage to another, it can never be a permanently fixed thing." —T. E. Hulme, "Romanticism and Classicism" in Speculations.

¶ All the masters of painting are born into the world at a time when the particular tradition from which they start is imperfect. . . . Each field of artistic activity is exhausted by the first great artist who gathers a full harvest from it.

¶ One of the main reasons for the existence of philosophy is not that it enables you to find truth (it can never do that) but that it does provide you a refuge for definitions. . . . It provides you with an elaborate and precise language in which you really can explain definitely what you mean, but what you want to say is decided by other things. The ultimate reality is the hurly-burly, the struggle; the metaphysic is an adjunct to clear-headedness in it. —T. E. Hulme, op. cit.

¶ Action: Teachers, university lecturers on science, emancipated women, and other spectacled anaemics attending the plays at the Court Theatre remind me of disembodied spirits, having no body to rest in. They have all the intellect and imagination required for high passion, but no material to work on. They feel all the emotions of jealousy and desire, but these leading to no action remain as nothing but petty motives. Passion is action and without action but a child's anger. . . . Just as sentiment and religion require expression in ritual, so tragedy requires action. —T. E. Hulme, "Cinders."

—Yesterday, at a party for grandma, who is 75: whole family there, including Schweitzers and Bulls, whom I hadn't seen in years. I had looked forward to talking to Will, but at the end of the evening had not said one word to him except hello and goodbye, nor he to me. I felt extremely nothing, as though after having enjoyed the attention that everyone seems to pay to children, I have now emerged into an indifferent world, as an adult and have to distinguish myself by personality or deeds in order to be noticed. Another feeling I had at the party was occasioned by the high spirits of Jimmy Bull and Abe and Irving, who were quite full of Scotch, and to the dancing—taking of other people's wives, etc. I saw myself another edition of my father, gauche on my feet, self-conscious, unable really to take part in the merry-making, yet ready to bore someone with a 'serious' conversation, only not, at least, thank God, on medicine or sickness. I always get this depressed feeling when I am among extroverts, the feeling that I don't know how to live, and yet if I look at these people dispassionately, they seem such nonentities, so hollow, and I rejoice in my Philistinism. Irv came in a hired Cadillac with a liveried chauffeur! Joan got emotional about politics and the fact, as she says, that in the South the Jews are assimilated and even go to the same country clubs as the gentiles. She's very anti-Semitic, which irks her father. I suppose people consider me anti-Semitic also. But I think I am beginning to accept finally my birth and see that it is stupid to try to hide it or to become something else, though I would like somehow for Leander to escape the curse of introspection and ineffectualness that seems to be inherited in my family. Even Alice is that way. I am very bad—I can't love, I'm sadistic and cruel toward Leander and Chrysanthi, and I can't seem to control myself, though I know very well what I'm doing when I'm doing it, and I'm disgusted. We're very much an island here, no social milieux except my parents, who annoy me no end.

A plot. A son who does everything he can not to be like his father but who has it gradually revealed to him when he's older that he reacts in every situation exactly as his father does, and that their personalities are unquestionably the same. Then the son cannot stand himself, just as he cannot stand his father.

He wants to arouse us to a sense of reality, to break through the veil that easy and familiar words and the ever-increasing fog of commercial propaganda spread over the human situation. . . . The contemplation of a vast display of insipid greeting cards for Mother's Day in "the World's Largest Drugstore" leads him through a consideration of the religious symbol of the Great Mother—creator and destroyer, the power of birth and death—that has in the course of ages been trivialized into the sentimental and commercial idol of modern America, to a conclusion that not only theologians would do well to ponder.

¶ Our religious symbols, such as the Cross, refer only to the realms of ethics and what may be called pure spirituality. We have no religious symbols covering the other aspects of the cosmic mystery. . . . Will it ever be possible to revive the Great Mother, or create some equivalent symbol of the cosmic mysteries of life and death? Or are we doomed to remain indefinitely, or until the masses lose their minds and run amuck, on the level of the greeting card? —from a review in the London Times Literary Supplement, Oct. 12, 1956, of Aldous Huxley's new collection of essays, Adonis and the Alphabet.

November 7, 1956

Last night I had two strange dreams. In the first I was sleeping on a cot in a dormitory-like room, apparently with some other people. Then Miss Brewster (who is my pro-seminar director at Columbia, an elderly gray-haired lady) came to my bed and put one hand in my mouth while with the other she reached down under the covers, through the fly of my pajama-trousers, and grasped my genitals (much as Chrysanthi does in real life!). I began to get angry, and sat up. But she pulled something out of my mouth, a big lump with threads dangling from it. This apparently was a beneficent service, for I thanked her, and she stayed by the bed nursing me, as it were, for the wound in my mouth. . . . The second dream showed Cy, who is the garage chief at Renault, selling me a charcoal broiler for indoors. He showed me a two-part device, one part being a heavy black construction, the legs; And the other, a grate that fitted into the former. A pipe had to be arranged to carry the smoke out the window.

November 13, 1956

Another dream. I was on a kind of seashore farm, with a big mansion built of cross-ended logs but resembling, on the outside, McCarthy's unfinished blackpaper house. I remember remarking to someone that the chinking was very good. There was another house on the property, shaped like a butterfly nut, which I remarked must have been the old farmhouse. I saw a boy enter it, wearing tight satin pants, fly-less, I think. Then I was on another building, which stood on the sea, near the border of the land. Great rocks went down onto the beach. There was a machine outside, perhaps a plow. I seem to remember it was foggy and we were afraid the machine would come into the building. At the same time, however, I saw three or four men standing on the grassy slope, fishing. The furthest among them was named Malcolm Muggerridge (we had spoken of the editor of Punch in Tindall's class, in connection with his debunking biography of Samuel Butler), who resembled, however, Vladimir in Waiting for Godot, as played by Bert Lahr last season. This person's penis was exposed and was in a very extensive erection. He was pulling hard at the line all the while. Suddenly he pulled a gigantic black fish out of the sea, which resembled an enormous sea-horse, or even a dragon. He fell over backwards and pulled the fish on top of him as though to embrace it, but then, suddenly revolted or at any rate changing his mind, he pushed it away and it stood up again on its haunches. At that point, the alarm clock rang.

¶ The effort really to see and really to represent is no idle business in face of the constant force that makes for muddlement. The great thing is indeed that the muddled state too is one of the very sharpest of the realities, that it also has color and form and character, has often in fact a broad and rich comicality, many of the signs and values of the appreciable. —Henry James, Preface to "What Maisie Knew."

A few days ago, C. had again a spell of weeping—now quite rare—which upon persevering request was revealed to me as referring to her feeling that she was a slave here, a Greek, backward, and that we all expected her to do nothing but work all day without thought for herself, and that if she neglected any of her (self-imposed) duties, she would be deemed lazy. She had felt sick, with a cold, and had decided to stay home from school, whereupon I said that it was a shame, she taking this to mean I was angry because we had spent the money and therefore she ought to go, which of course was the thing furthest from my mind. So, out of spite, she dressed and went anyway, and then came back sour-faced, refusing to get into bed as I had repeatedly requested her to do, saying that she had too much work, etc., etc. Whereupon came the weeping and the “confession” that revealed also her homesickness, her missing of her family, especially her mother, who, she felt, would have in such circumstances been very solicitous of her (Chrysanthi’s) health, put her to bed, massaged her, etc. The weeping and the confession over, I tried to explain that her ideas of herself as a slave, as inferior because Greek, were entirely of her own making, and smiles followed, plus a delicious reconciliation that was consummated in bed.

¶ I hold that philosophy is the critic of abstractions. Its function is the double one, first of harmonizing them by assigning to them their right relative status as abstractions, and secondly of completing them by direct comparison with more concrete intuitions of the universe, and thereby promoting the formation of more complete schemes of thought. It is in respect to this comparison that the testimony of great poets is of such importance. Their survival is evidence that they express deep intuitions of mankind penetrating into what is universal in concrete fact. [p. 88] . . . I hold that the ultimate appeal is to naïve experience and that is why I lay such stress on the evidence of poetry. [p. 90] —Whitehead, Science and the Modern World (Mentor edition)

The kidnapper of Greentree's baby was sentenced to death a few days ago. He kidnapped the child to get money to meet payments on money he had borrowed to meet other payments, etc. He, combined, let's say, with the little struggling PAA clerk, plus Jack of Rochester General, might make a splendid protagonist for a novel. Only would it be too naturalistic à la An American Tragedy? Δεν ξέρω. Two plots could be brought to a meeting, one involving him, the other the parents of the baby, as Faulkner handles the two plots in Light in August, only they must be made to be organic, which Faulkner doesn't do.

Saul brings his children up the old-fashioned way, by not elevating them to thrones. The girls cook and wash dishes without complaining. Amos keeps quiet when he's not wanted. Yesterday he slipped a bit, interrupted Saul and me to ask a perfectly reasonable question. Saul, strictly, reminded him that he was interrupting us. "Are you supposed to do that?" he asked. The child put on a hang-dog face and did not answer, but capitulated at last and answered "No." Thereupon we resumed conversation, and the question went unanswered.

Saul's troubles at Columbia. His obstinacy; will not mediate; wants associate research professorship or nothing. The story of the pre-med student who abandoned medicine because he felt the moral caliber of his fellow pre-meds was so low. Not a very good reason; rather a reason, if he was superior to them, for him to enter the profession as a counterbalance.

Saul tells about his marriage: forced into it, he says, aged 21. He and Minna had been "going steady for three years." He liked the arrangement: a sure girl-friend with no responsibility. She didn't: no freedom, and no security. She gave an ultimatum: either you marry me or let me go out with other boys. He didn't want to marry her, nor did he want her to go with other boys—so he married her.

¶ The world is made up of a mass of people and a few individuals.

—D.H. Lawrence, The Plumed Serpent, p. 32.

Last evening, in the Registrar's office, I had the feeling of what an "individual" is. A man stayed discreetly near the back wall, waiting for me to finish with someone else who was rather boisterous. The man hardly said anything, but 'something' about him seemed to set him apart: a dignity, worldly-sense, breeding—how can one describe it? He came to the counter and registered for a Spanish course. His name was Morrissey, and I noticed he gave his address as the Plaza Hotel—rich, I suppose, perhaps aristocratic; although he had the face and clothes of an actor rather than of a stockbroker. The impression of dignity was so evident, I wish I could analyze it adequately in order to see how it was achieved. And withal he didn't seem cold, separate, but the opposite: warm, approachable, "civilized."

Lawrence always tries to connect the present-day actions of his Mexicans with the civilization of the Aztecs. This could be done for modern and ancient Greeks, only one of course would not have selected the Athenian golden age as one part of the comparison.

Other aspects of The Plumed Serpent also fit the Greek situation: political solutions—socialism, democracy; brutality of the army; what happens when a people is constantly ruled by another; ignorance and filth of villagers; sinister depravity and incipient murder. The unfinished station in Salonika. Cf. "And this is Mexico. Whatever pretentiousness and modern improvements it may have, outside the capital, they are either smashed or raw and unfinished, with rusty bones of iron girders sticking out" (p. 104).

Martin Buber spoke in Harkness Theater, where I stood against the wall packed in as in the subway. He spoke of various ways of experiencing a “reality” greater or more inclusive, more unified than our everyday one. One way was that of the Gita, through trance, dream, sleep, where the individual is perfectly united with himself, and in contact with the cosmos. A second way was that of mescaline (Buber spoke at length about Aldous Huxley’s experiments). This produced a result similar to that of the Hindus. Buber said that Huxley’s perception saw the world transformed: infused with meaning, with Godhead, if you will. But strangely, this transformation did not apply to other human beings. The mescaline-eater had to avoid the presence of others, had to achieve what he could in solitude, the absolute solitude that also reigns in trance- or dream-states. Buber spoke of union with the cosmos, but of failure of union with the logos; or realization of the “I,” but of failure of the “we.” Thus he rejected both the Gita and mescaline methods, for the solitude they presuppose is inimical to true realization of “reality.” Reality is a “We” and not an “I”; it is the logos and the cosmos, not merely the cosmos. At this point, unfortunately, I had to leave to go to my job in the registrar’s office.

Fielding, on the necessity for a writer to know and treat all conditions of men; rich and poor, etc.: ¶ And though it may be thought that the knowledge of either may sufficiently enable him to describe at least that in which he hath been conversant, yet he will even here fall greatly short of perfection; for the follies of either rank do in reality illustrate each other. For instance, the affectation of high life appears more glaring and ridiculous from the simplicity of the low; and again, the rudeness and barbarity of this latter strikes with much stronger ideas of absurdity, as when contrasted with, and opposed to, the politeness which controls the former. —Tom Jones, Bk. "But, of course, when dealing with intellectual peanuts . . ." His story about the palsied boy who announced at school that he wanted to play a musical instrument. A tuba was fitted up on a stand, and he actually got sounds out of it. The whole town began to take an interest, starting with the Board of Education. An inventor devised an electrical device whereby the boy was enabled to operate the valves by twitching his atrophied fingers, to which strings were attached that activated an electric motor that in turn depressed the valve. Now, says Herb, the boy can play all the notes, slowly, of course. And he has finally been able to do something that gives him value in the sight of others. Occupational therapy. The town, after a time, bought him a tuba. Good sentimental story. Why should sentiment be always bad?

Received word from the police that Rookie Patrolman Sperakotas apprehended a drug addict in the process of making off with the portable radio in my car. He apparently had pried open the window with a can opener and was in the car when people shouted and Sperakotas came running from Morningside Park. The addict then left the radio, stepped out, threw the can opener under the car, and started walking away. He was easily apprehended. Tomorrow I must go to court. The detective advised me not to leave my car in such a bad neighborhood. It was directly in front of the residence of the president of Columbia University!

I understand the fact that the law is really a legalized means of revenge. I must go tomorrow and plead that the fellow be tried and convicted, attesting that it was my radio, that the car was locked and the window forced, etc. What the hell do I care, except for the morning that will be wasted? But didn't I feel a warm thrill of sadistic pleasure at having this perfectly respected and accepted way of destroying somebody else? Of course!

Why did the fool do this so much out in the open, where he was bound to get caught?

¶ I feel as though I were split in two. . . . Chrysanthi tells of a village where she interviews girls. So poor that the girls were ashamed to show their homes—mud huts without floors. When I entered one of these homes, where the mother was baking, she disappeared and reappeared with a clean apron, washed face and hands, giving the impression of spotlessness amidst sordidness. Later, the girl offered the visitors all they could: glasses of water. The tray was a piece of tin off the roof. But over it was an intricate embroidery. Δεν είχαν τίποτε εκτός από την περιφάνια τους.

Mr. Lindsay might be a potential Kurtz.

C. P. Snow deals with the problem of suspense in a simple and effective way: chapter one sets up the problem of who will be the new master. We have to read the whole book before finding out.

This thing is clearing in my mind. Narrator, writing book on St. Francis. And an airline employee. Could be doubles—i.e., airline employee is part of narrator's personality projected. Deal with illusion: of St. Francis; of the employee's re: air-age glories and glamor. Employee: frustrated, naïve. Tension: can only be relaxed by sneaking into a plane and taking off, resulting in crash and death. (Mechanics of this: counter-employee; but during indoctrination taken to hangars; taken back in plane; taxiing; mechanic, trying to “make like” a pilot, glibly explains controls. Employee’s obsession begins.) The unities: could take place on one day: day of crash, with background done by flashback. At least two points of view necessary: mind of narrator; mind of employee. How do this?

The σπουδαίο is to connect employee-theme with narrator-theme and St. Francis. Illusion and destruction. Actual moment of stealing plane. Do like the moment in La Condition humaine when Kyo is in an antique shop awaiting Chiang Kai Shek’s car. Flying off with airplane would of course be a sex-symbol. Employee must be a woman; frustrated also. Edgar Parry and Lynn. All this might be enough, without St. Francis. Narrator would correspond to the narrator in La Nausée; employee to l’Autodidacte. Employee: being inarticulate, does and feels but cannot express what the narrator, being over-intellectual, knows and articulates, but cannot do. Thus each is half a man, and together, the composite, is fullness. Therefore: doubles or employee projection of narrator’s inhibited id-libido. Each is questing completion and fulfillment. Narrator escapes through history, aestheticism, and myth; employee through physical sensation (has woman-trouble but could visit whores or be a homosexual).

Frustration: partly mental; partly naturalistic; lack of education; or of money to pay for solo hours to become a pilot; people being promoted while he isn’t, etc. Should narrator and employee know each other? Could pass same streets, etc., independent, close, but no connection. Cf. early stages in Ulysses; or Mrs Dalloway and Septimus; see same things. Narrator could read an account of the crash in a newspaper. Ironic: the destruction of his own double. How end? Could have encounter in library, perhaps homosexual. Employee part must be objective, non-analytical, quick-moving; narrator part subjective, analytical, involved.

Chrysanthi suggested that the narrator contact the employee though the narrator's desire to fly to Assisi. Perhaps this could be the occasion of the employee's difficulties: be accused, let's say, of stealing à la Gene Grant. Narrator would have to testify. Scruples, à la radio case. Employee could be really guilty, but be acquitted by narrator's lying, because narrator wants to steal himself and gets vicarious pleasure from employee's succeeding therein.

Chrysanthi and I had a lovely walk on the beach, our feet half-frozen by rushing-in waves. The sea-roar, the gong of the buoy, the birds; noises soothing; air salty-cool. Today we woke up to carbon sediment and the Con Edison Company's pneumatic drill tearing up 47th Street.

Last night: an interesting intercourse, if deflating also. After some of the usual preliminaries in bed, we got up, turned on some slinky music, and danced, naked, in the living room. Things reached a point and Chrysanthi was on the couch, I on top of her, my penis inserted, her climax coming apace—when the music stopped. “A five-minute summary of the latest news: the crisis in Jordan, today, reached new proportions when . . .” etc. The intensesness of the intercourse deadened out any other impressions; but in that delicious coda when detumescence begins and tenderness increases, the silence of escape from consciousness was invaded by the radio voice, so that I found myself alternately off in my delicious near-unconscious reveries and back in my conscious awareness of the “news,” until, like someone in a room trying not to watch a turned-on television set, first glancing now and then at it, then more and more frequently, until his resistance gives in (unless he turns the set off, which he can’t if someone else is there with him), and he watches full time; I too listened full-time: and the realities of the political world invaded the intense private world that one achieves nowadays perhaps only in sex. It was, to coin a phrase, the last turn of the screw.

People who write books about things never seem to be quite successful in the thing they are writing about. Machiavelli never became a prince. Castiglioni was an unimportant courtier. Bacon failed to gain the highest positions. Jacques Barzun is supposed to be a very bad teacher. Doctors who write textbooks often cannot succeed in their practices.

¶ By the way, do you know Greece? No? So much the better. What should we do there, I ask you? There one has to be pure in heart. Do you know that there male friends walk along the street in pairs holding hands? Yes, the women stay home and you often see a middle-aged, respectable man, sporting mustaches, gravely striding along the sidewalk, his fingers locked in those of his friend. In the Orient likewise, at times? All right. But tell me, would you take my hand in the streets of Paris? Oh, I’m joking. We have a sense of decorum; scum makes us stilted. Charlotte Rhodes' daughter, a pupil at Cherry Lawn School, told the headmistress that she had to visit her mother, and left. By coincidence, Charlotte, knowing nothing of this, called the school the same evening. The headmistress asked, surprised: "Isn't she home with you?" "No, she isn't." Charlotte, after some more telephoning, found that her daughter had gone to a friend's house under pretext of returning home. Charlotte, relating this to Chrysanthi, was in tears, rightfully so, for it must be unpleasant to be deceived by one's own daughter.

Chrysanthi wasn't surprised. She told me that she had noticed what kind of a character the daughter had when we all visited Cherry Lawn a few months ago. I was with the Bardens; the others went to a golf driving range in the afternoon. The daughter said that she wanted a hamburger. Leo said OK, but wouldn't it be better to wait so that they all could have supper together at six o'clock—hamburgers, too; but of course, if she was so hungry that she couldn't wait . . . "No, no," said the daughter. "I'll wait, of course." Whereupon she went to the driving range with her friend (her parents having gone off somewhere else) and immediately ordered a hamburger.

Odysseas, C.'s brother, is in Tashkent, Russia. C. told how during the war Lola used to bring bread to him secretly. Only the children could do it, as the Germans didn't suspect children. Lola would put two pieces of bread in her brassiere so they appeared like beasts (she was young, but old enough to be developed). This ruse always worked. Odysseas fears to return to Greece because he was declared guilty (of ?) unanimously, the three "judges" concurring, which made him an outlaw. That is, anyone could shoot him down at sight, and legally, still can.

C. tells also of the officious policemen, uneducated village boys who felt themselves important because of their uniforms. Cf. the officer who assured C. (who held her passport unobserved in her hand) that she surely could never get a passport.

Walked with Leander in my arms along Silver Point Beach to the lighthouse. Fog heavy, seemed to be following us. Gulls and sandpipers in squadrons. On the way back I sang in time to my steps, making up words, first in Greek and then in French, to the tune of La Mer, until Leander fell asleep in my arms.

Employee is driven to last rope by his unjust dismissal for stealing. His taking the plane is a combination of a childish vengeance (he half-knows he will destroy it and himself) and of a desire to fulfill himself now before he loses all chance—that is, before his shield is removed and he is thrust out, without a recommendation, to try to find a new job. Emphasize, leading up to this, that the air job constitutes the employee's sole experience: he came to it fresh out of high school with romantic hopes of rising to pilot (cf. Hans!), was encouraged somewhat treacherously by management, but frustrated by various factors: the bureaucracy of the union, etc., demanding seniority for promotion; lack of money, consequent to this, flying lessons being so expensive. His position is worsened by the fact that (1) he is always surrounded by pilots, and envies them; and (2) he is able constantly to handle huge sums of money, but never to have any. He is tempted of course to steal, and even tries to work out a plan, but ironically he is apprehended when he wasn't stealing, or when he was actually being compelled by conscience to put the money back in the register. This adds to his bitterness. A further factor can be his love-life. In various ways this can tie in: desire to marry, but impossibility of doing so while he earns so little; worse than this, the girls toss him over because they want the romantic pilots, or at least the pilots' impressive salary. Further irony: other clerks steal money, even boast about it, but are undiscovered. Managers know vaguely that they are being cheated. Make him a test case: thus their insistence on his being dismissed in any case, even if evidence isn't too convincing. The employee could be like Lord Jim, rather inarticulate. Perhaps the narrator's function should be to articulate, as Marlow does, but also to present his own problems, fears, frustrations, which are basically similar to those of the employee—e.g., Marlow and Kurtz. Kurtz gives in to the jungle; Marlow realizes his own propensity toward doing the same, and takes precautions. In fine, we learn more about Marlow than about Kurtz. This perhaps justifies the melodrama, for Kurtz's plot and the employee's are perhaps too melodramatic.

I see that this novel is getting to be contemplated in such a way that only a large canvas and a complicated one would do it justice. I can't seem to keep things simple. But sit down and write the thing, damn it!

Wouldn't a good pedagogical method in literature be to have the student recapitulate the history of literature, so that when reading at any given stage he would have as his background the same literary background that the author had? He would start with Greek mythology and the Bible, then go through Homer, the Greek dramatists and philosophers, their Roman counterparts, then medieval romances leading to Trouvères and Provençe, down to Sicily with Frederick, up to Tuscany with Grinnizzelli, Calvalcanti, Dante, Boccaccio, Petrarch, the Humanists and epic-writers, then with the French armies up through Lyons to Paris and the Pléiade. From here it gets much more complicated. After Ariosto he can cross quickly to England and suffer the Faerie Queene, etc., etc.

A portmanteau dream I had involved the following (all at the same time): I was carrying the side door of the farm house, the one made out of barn wood, and looking for a place to leave it. I saw a barnlike shack and was about to set it against the wall in back, when some men drove up in a truck. I asked their permission. They weren't the owners, but anyway they said I would be crazy to leave it in the open, as it would surely be stolen. "This?" I said. "It's only an old no-good door." I didn't know what to do. Meanwhile the men had sat down, each in front of a wooden chair-frame, and were putting in the cane slat. One man was in front of me and the other in back. The one in front was complaining that he was so fat he couldn't work except at arm's-length. Then, at the same time, I seemed to be in the home of the one in back. His wife looked thin and bedraggled. She was preparing to nurse the baby. "How old is your child?" I asked. "Three years." "Well," I said, "you may not have the record for breast-feeding, but you must be near it."

The biographer of St. Francis could be cynical and sarcastic, as in Lucky Jim, and drive the employee to suicide because of his (the intellectual's) theories of dangerous living à la Thomas Mann, and also his devil-may-care attitude and his conviction that we'll all be blown up anyway by the atom bomb. He appeals to the employee's desire to be something, not just be a cog in the giant company's wheel and an anonymous inhabitant of the giant city.

"It is most important in this world . . . to be pushing; but it is fatal to seem so." —Benjamin Jowett

¶ Most human beings are born for harness and are melancholy when out of it too long. Like Wordsworth, they feel the weight of chance desires; the definite routine, the daily necessary task, eliminates the need for self-imposed activity, and they are freed from that irresolution, that degrading sophistry of laziness which is the curse of those whose tasks are voluntary and can be performed at any time. —Logan Smith.

¶ ἔχω οὐκ ἔχομαι —Aristippus of Cyrene. “I am taken by these things, but they do not take me in”— i.e., I take them or leave them. Good motto.

Santayana explained that happiness lies not in absolute solitude, but in the substitution of an ideal for a natural society, in converse with thoughts rather than with things. Such a substitution, he adds, is normal, and a mark of moral vigor. ¶ “To substitute the society of ideas for that of things is,” he says, “simply to live in the mind; it is to survey the world of existences in its truth and beauty rather than in its personal perspectives, or with practical urgency. It is the sole path of happiness for the intellectual man, because the intellectual man cannot be satisfied with a world of perpetual change, defeat, and imperfection.” —quoted by Logan Smith.

I wonder how much has been done in collecting Greek village beliefs, the type of thing that Yeats and Lady Gregory did in Ireland. But Yeats had his Lady Gregory to foot the bill; if I were to travel the Greek villages, who would be my Lady? And Yeats was Irish; and Yeats was a genius—maybe.

Amis's That Uncertain Feeling touched many things that I, and people in my position, know in our own lives: the problem of babysitters; what happens when daddy forgets to put the rubber pants over baby's diaper; finding the sugar bowl always empty, the tea pot always full—of old tea leaves. Plus: the annoying neighbor downstairs; the boredom of routine; the stringencies of apartment-house living. Luckily, however, for Amis's characters, they had a good solitary place to make love and go for swims in the nude. That would be rather hard to find in New York.

¶ . . . His marriage had been a good one, he loved his children, he was getting near middle age; yet now he was craving for a woman, as though he were a virgin dying with the intolerable thought that he had missed the supreme joy, the joy greater in imagination than any realized love could ever be, as though he were Keats cursing fate because he had not had Fanny Brawne.

In those that I had seen die, the bitterest thought was what they had left undone.

And, as a matter of truth, though it was not always an easy truth to take, I had observed what others had observed before—I could not recall of those who had known more than their share of the erotic life, one who, when the end came, did not think that his time had been tolerably well spent. —C. — from Ælfric's homily on new year's Day
(Ælfric: 955(?)–1020(?))

From Alfred's preface to his Grammar (translated in Cook & Tinker):
¶ . . . It behooves every man who has any good talent to make that talent useful to other men, and to commit unto others the pound which God hath entrusted unto him. . . . It is fitting that young men should acquire knowledge, and that the old should teach their youth wisdom, since, by means of learning, faith is kept, and every man who loveth wisdom is happy; whereas the mind of him who will neither learn nor teach, if he can, becomes cool toward holy lore, and thus, little by little, he turns from God. Whence shall come wise teachers for God's people unless they learn in youth? And how can faith increase if learning and teachers fail? . . . Hence I say, not that this book may help many to knowledge, but that, if it pleases them, it may be, as it were, an opening to every language. [For the original, see Zupitra's edition, pp. 2-3.]

Visit from Paula and Socrates Kentros. Paula showed herself as snide as always. C. was inwardly infuriated by Paula's obvious assumption that no one was anything except herself. She actually asked if I'd gotten my B.A. yet! And she spoke of the wife of a student friend of hers working in a restaurant to help support her husband (who is a minister and idealistic) as shocking and utterly beneath anyone of dignity. Chrysanthi explained that Paula exemplifies the qualities in Salonika Jews that everyone despised, qualities of self-esteem that apparently predominated over other, perhaps more agreeable ones, which they may have had. Of course, American Jews are just the same: aren't we brought up to believe that we're naturally better than everyone else? It's the greatest disillusionment to a Jew when he finds that Protestants and even Catholics can be brilliantly intelligent. Perhaps to avoid this disillusionment Jews tend to stay in intellectual ghettoes. Anyway, Paula was very annoying, and Socrates seems to have picked up her worst qualities. He is sure of his importance as a mighty surgeon, and equally sure of my unimportance as a struggling student and teacher. Of course, maybe he's right, but one naturally doesn't enjoy hearing such things.

Reading Jack Kerouac's On the Road put me in mind of my wild hitchhiking and jalopy-traveling days: the ride in the back of the manure truck, with two mad Vermonters doing 60 mph on winding Route 8; lying on the oil drums with Donella on an English lorry headed for Edinburgh; the trip in the old Ford with Tom Wilson from Brant Lake during the hurricane, with flooded roads, falling trees and electric wires all around, and never thinking it a hurricane until we saw the headline in a diner, only then getting scared and thinking what stupid heroes we'd been, and how lucky; also the mad car-driving of Sherman, with his catalogue of possessions and smash-ups and trade-ins, solemnly delivered while he was recuperating from the last escape, and him never even having a driver's license; and the mad car-driving of Clarence and cronies in Rochester; and the Studebaker I bought for $20 and sold for $5, with no first or reverse gears, and the troubles we had with its windshield wiper. Cars, cars; the road. Kerouac has found what really is America. I felt it immediately. Also the mad trip to Keene Valley with Peter Gardner, and mountain climbing in the dark; the frozen food; the stove that wouldn't work; the frozen beer afterwards; the invasion of the pancake place, and the mad ride back over solid ice with the defroster not working and the only vision the size of a half-dollar through the windshield.

Also thought of the Port Saïd restaurant and its vulgarities.

Last night seven of my students of G.S. English EV6a, section 16 (whew!) took me out, and we all had beers and talked about America and Europe and sex and language and books. Fine!

Incidents: Theory-mad doctors, like Mischa with his vitamins, killing a patient. Vitamins and the whole cult of artificial health production is disgusting! Isn't it better to live life vibrantly than to worry about health? Or the advice Mischa gave Jerry Springer: not to marry his intended because she had a weak heart. And Jerry, the fool, listening to God Mischa, throwing her over, and then on the rebound marrying the idiot who is ruining his life. But she has a strong set of values and ventricles, bless her!

For Kerouac, the worst sin is yawning.

My father's insane preoccupation with good food, and yet he doesn't even enjoy it, but eats saccharine and protein bread and vitamins and special jam, etc., etc. His gluttony and boorishness, never waiting for others to be served, but er fresst immediately. Also his intolerance, snob-bishness, refusal to be touched by Negroes or the lower classes. This all came to light over the question of buying the apartment in Morningside Gardens. Such are radicals and social reformers under the front—sometime.

Malcolm Brown's mad driving in a Ford '35, and Dean Freiday's in a Willys. Mischa's maniacally careful driving.

The sequel to the beer drinking with my students was the session, uninterrupted yesterday from 2 p.m. until 9:30 p.m., in which we marked the exams and decided on final grades. Crowell has a system. After counting the number of errors on all the EV6 papers, we read them off to him and he makes a curve. On the basis of this he assigns letter grades: A, B, C, D, or F. these we can raise or lower one step, D to D+ or D-; C+ to B-, etc. because of the student's good or bad work during the term. Then we examined the final impromptus, which had been marked either failing, passing, or passing question-mark, where there was a discrepancy between, let's say, a failing impromptu and a good score on the exam. Crowell read the composition and each of us, Martha, Bea, Bombose, and myself, had to vote whether or not we should fail the student, and if not, how to compromise with a proper grade: usually D. Crowell was terribly strict; he wanted to fail everyone who was the slightest bit questionable, on the reasoning that the next class, EV9, is supposed to be college level. Given his reasoning, I could see the justice of so many failures, but the reasoning itself was unjust from the students' point of view. Many did passing work in the course but still were not really ready for EV9. They failed. In my class, Borda, Cziriak, Varga, Halpern, Glickman, Hay, Couteras all failed. I was stupefied. I at least saved Mutevally with a D, and also Devoris. These students of course—several of them anyway—really did fail the exam (making errors I would never have expected, and making me feel miserable, mortified), but this failure was arrived at on the basis of the curve where they had to compete with three other classes, two of which, the day classes, had four hours a week as opposed to our three. Most unfair, I think.

How can I explain to the students, who I am sure will receive the news of failure as a complete surprise? I certainly had given them the impression that no one would fail. I feel especially sorry about Borda and the other Hungarians who are working for degrees. How will this look on their records? And I would never have failed any of them judging merely on their performance in the class, on home compositions, etc.

When we started yesterday I of course tried to raise all the marks, and never voted against a student, at which Crowell smiled and said I'd learn differently, and that everyone acted as I was acting after they'd taught only one class. But after I saw how many of my students were going to fail, I felt inclined to see that students in the other sections failed also, to balance things out; and although I'm sure I didn't descend to vindictiveness, I'm also sure that some such feeling of revenge or hurt pride prevented me from supporting students I would normally (i.e., naïvely) have supported. This is the way we judge our fellow humans, as C. P. Snow says.

Probably Crowell was extra-strict this time because of the Report advising abolition of GS non-matric, due to its "low standards." Our students perhaps aren't intellectually as select as those of Columbia College, but they do have a seriousness, a sense of motivation, and an optimism that I felt strongly when I read their compositions. It's a shame to crowd them out, for they are really desirous of education. Mrs. Bryant told me (on the Q.T.) at the party Mrs. Dobbie gave for Lois McIntosh, that a good deal of this was due to the ideas of Jacques Barzun, who, she said, is an insufferable snob, and therefore recoils before the filthy, immigrant population of G.S. He wants to make Columbia as lily-pure as Harvard and Princeton. Why doesn't he go to Cambridge then, and leave Columbia with its best feature, its non-snobbishness? Why does anyone think himself important?

After the session, half starved, I went to Juilliard in time to hear the last movement of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, which quieted me somehow; then came home to find C. still up and worried where I was, whereupon we ate, and then tried to sleep.

Martha told me that every new teacher has to realize that even he cannot make mediocre students pass exams, and that I'll become used to failing people without qualms, as time goes on. That's nice!

Paradise Lost V, 577 ff.:

As yet this World was not, and Chaos wild Reigned where these heavens now rowl, where Earth now rests Upon her centre poised, when on a day
(For Time, though in Eternity, applied
To motion, measures all things durable
By present, past, and future), on such day
As Heaven's great year brings forth, the empyreal host
Of Angels, by imperial summons called,
Innumerable before the Almighty's throne
Forthwith from all the ends of Heaven appeared Under their hierarchs in orders bright.
Ten thousand thousand ensigns high advanced,
Standards and gonfalons, 'twixt van and rear
Stream in the air, and for distinction serve
Of hierarchies, of orders, and degrees;
Or in their glittering tissues bear imblazed
Holy memorials, acts of zeal and love
Recorded eminent. Thus when in orbs
Of circuit inexpressible they stood,
Orb within orb, the Father Infinite,
By whom in bliss imbosomed sat the Son,
Amidst, as from a flaming Mount, whose top Brightness had made invisible, thus spake:
"Hear, all ye Angels, Progeny of Light,
Thrones, Dominations, Princedoms, Virtues, Powers,
Hear my decree, which unrevoked shall stand!
This day I have begot whom I declare
My only Son, and on this holy hill
Him have anointed, whom ye now behold
At my right hand. Your head I him appoint,
And by myself have sworn to him shall bow
All knees in Heaven, and shall confess him Lord."

Extraordinary sermon by Dr. McCracken at Riverside Church on "Maintaining Your Independence Despite Social Compulsion." He spoke of The Organization Man, The Hidden Persuaders, and The Lonely Crowd, and minced no words as far as the congregation was concerned, composed, as everyone realized, of influential men in advertising, radio, TV, and other offending institutions. McCracken described and illustrated the spirit of conformity that rules today; called it insidious, cited the great non-conformists in the world's religious and secular history, and challenged us all to live according to our own inner selves, our own knowledge of right and wrong, our own bit of divinity, instead of letting ourselves be propped up and directed like "wooden soldiers" by social forces expressed via advertising and the mass media. He ended by reminding us that Jesus was the greatest non-conformist of all. McCracken represented today the best of a courageous tradition of frank pulpit oratory, challenging, hitting social problems fearlessly, and with conviction, fervor, and skill.

I thought of the sermon in A Portrait of the Arist as a Young Man. That too had tremendous power: a good device for conveying ideas discursively in literature.

I met Crowell on the campus after Mr. Borda saw me, and reemphasized Borda's predicament to the great Professor. "Peter, he said, "you've got to learn not to have any sympathy for the student." Here endeth the first lesson.

Possibility of a father-son relationship, the two together really representing one complete being. The father being the mind-principle, idealist; the son bought up under this, rebelling, and discovering sensuality—at, for instance, Millington Road orgies. The father could be writing a book on St. Francis. The son would have to have an affaire, and get married probably. Then there'd have to be some reconciliation between the mind principle as seen in the father, and the body principle as seen in the son.

Mrs. Solomon, who ruins our 5th Day Meetings, is a fat old bag of guts that talks interminably. She collects Arabs, tries to direct the lives of young people, getting them apartments, dinners, jobs, etc. Yesterday she went on about her care of a penniless African revolutionary: feeding him while he got a degree. Now he'll go back to Uganda and work for independence. All very fine, but she's a bore. This revolutionary got his start at Woodbrooke. I told Mrs. Solomon that the British Friends would be in a ticklish position when they learned that their protégé had torn another part of the Empire away from them. An unpleasant remark, I admit, but she didn't at all take it as the joke I intended it to be.

Wednesday, C. P. Snow and his wife, Pamela Johnson, spoke in Harkness. He repeated his position about the need for a return to nineteenth-century realism. She added a few stupid remarks about "projecting character" and other technical devices. He was jovial and attractive, she horrible. She reminded me of Sheila! I gave Snow my paper. Geoffrey Wagner was at the meeting, looking ridiculous in a derby and stiff-collared shirt. Martha Salmon surprised me. She sat next to me and during the question period begged me to ask a question for her, saying that she was always petrified to do so. Amazing in a grown woman, and a teacher! I refused, and she finally put her hand up feebly. She spoke in such a retiring, halting way that it was hard for Snow to hear her, but at least she did speak up. John McKenna, of course, asked the best questions of the night.

A recapitulation of America's intellectual position. Unformed boy coming from a Puritan household is first attracted to the idealism of Emerson and Thoreau, goes to the woods and builds his cabin, meets fast characters and is inducted gradually into beat-generation types of activities: brutality, speed, sex, cynicism, disillusion. Perhaps in between: a spot of political radicalism. But the biggest problem, for the character, and for America, is what to do next!

The scene in The White Peacock in which George is brought home drunk reminds me of the time when I was 16 or so and was kindly conducted home by Philip Oppenheim and Eugene Girden or Arthur Kaleidin or somebody else, from Allan Schleifstein's party where the idiot of a father had kept offering me whiskey afer whiskey until of course I was completely sick. Philip told me afterwards (since I was incapable of remembering, certainly) that I threw up all the way home, threw up on the stairs of our house (and Philip cleaned up the mess, bless his soul. They somehow got me to my room, took off all my clothes, and left me strewn naked on the bed, in which condition my mother found me in the morning. That was the first and last time (so far) that I got drunk.

To buy and to sell, but above all, to commingle. In the old world, men make themselves two great excuses for coming together to a centre, and commingling freely in a mixed, unsuspecting host. Market and religion. These alone bring men, unarmed, together since time began. A little load of firewood, a warm blanket, a few eggs and tomatoes are excuse enough for men, women, and children to cross the foot-weary miles of valley and mountain. To buy, to sell, to barter, to exchange. To exchange, above all things, human contact.

“That is why they like you to bargain, even if it’s only the difference of a centavo.” —D. H. Lawrence, “Market Day” in Mornings in Mexico.

¶ Slightly bending forward, a black gourd rattle in the right hand, a small green bough in the left, the dancer dances the eternal drooping leap, that brings his life down, down, down, down from the mind, down from the broad beautiful, shaking breast, down to the powerful pivot of the knees, then to the ankles, and plunges deep from the ball of the foot into the earth, towards the earth’s red centre, where these men belong, as is signified by the red earth with which they are smeared. —D. H. Lawrence, “The Dance of the Sprouting Corn” in Mornings in Mexico.

Was it Margot who told me of the girl she’d heard about—a teenager pregnant—who’d bound up her body to hide the pregnancy, suffering horrible tortures all the while, and finally killing both the baby and herself? This could be used in the mountain vice-nest scene. The girl, excited at the Millington-type seducers about illicit doings, enjoys the backwoods bothel, in all innocence as to “how babies come.” When she gets pregnant, however, and understands what is going on, the old Puritanism comes out. Society will not accept the illegitimacy she instinctively feels. And in this sense, society kills her. In her naïveté, compare her to Dewey Dell in As I Lay Dying.

In the airline plot: an unimportant employee could embezzle but be exonerated by the union at his hearing (cf. Gene) while a higher up, whom everyone trusted, could be found out to have been stealing regularly, with good intentions of paying back, because of family needs. (Al Miller, with his ten children.) Another theme: the shifting of personnel, the insecure life on this account, the desire to lord it overseas, etc. Also: John Tanner-type flitting on-the-road nests, with no roots, and a frustrated desire to fly. Love affairs, et al. The boss’s son, accustomed to VIPs. Injustice to Puerto Ricans. Pro-Germanism: the rise of Hans; perhaps also element of homosexuality. Change in personality when someone is raised to be a boss. Impossibility of ——'s rising beyond chief rep because of good-natured personality. The Little Dictator and his promotions. His limited Spanish. Baggage-room shenanigans.

Hero could be John Tanner-type Englishman flitting across the Atlantic & back, trying to find himself. Father wanted him to get into business. He plans to, but gets plane fever when in RAF. His French mother dies, leaving a small legacy, which he soon squanders. Girlfriend in Montreal. Plans to marry her, but learns of her death in an auto accident. Affaire with older married woman in NYC. This unsatisfactory. But can't free himself. Plans to find a job in Europe, but is drawn back to her. Tries to advance. Goes through dispatcher's course while working also. Strain. Passes. Then turns down a job in a remote station, flits around, lets the license expire, and is forced to work again as a clerk at $55 a week. Has vague aspirations to be a novelist but feels he has no talent. Is drawn to intellectual people but then is embarrassed because of his lack of education. One of his friends could be our old friend who's writing a book on St. Francis: which method of escape is, if anything, worse than the on-the-road one. The two compared, etc.

M. Bédé, au séance que nous avions la dernière semaine, nous a montré l'influence sur le développement des genres littéraires que les niveaux de la société ont joués. Par exemple, le chanson de geste devenait un genre des marches, de la bourgeoisie. Entrant dans les cours, il s'est transformé en roman, plus intime, qui a préféré des autres thèmes et méthodes. Puis, passant encore une fois à la bourgeoisie, un autre genre s'est développé. Je me demande combine c'est vrai, en générale, que l'histoire des genres a suivi la même paternerne. Il s'agit de la mode. Un genre est à la mode; plus tard, un autre le remplace. La première passé au nouveau milieu, et se transforme. Après ça, peut-être, le même genre devient de nouveau à la mode, et se transforme de nouveau. Il faut demander s'il y a déjà un livre savant qui s'occupe de ce théorie.

¶ Most tedious was the close study of English literature. Why should one remember the things one reads? —D. H. Lawrence, The Rainbow, p. 333.

¶ Gradually it dawned upon Ursula that all the religion she knew was but a particular clothing to a human aspiration. The aspiration was the real thing,—the clothing was a matter almost of national taste or need. The Greeks had a naked Apollo, the Christians a white-robed Christ, the Buddhists a royal prince, the Egyptians their Osiris. Religions were local and religion was universal. Christianity was a local branch. There was as yet no assimilation of local religions into universal religion. —Ibid., p. 340.

Visit from Peter Gardner. His tape recorder and five-string banjo were stolen from his car one night while it was parked on 121st Street. Poor fellow—he's just getting set up: put $250 into the recorder, only to have it stolen, not insured, and is reminded of it every month as the payments come due. He told me that Izzy is going to take a two-year psychoanalysis. He says she has a fear of marriage, of committing herself at any rate, something I hadn't known. I thought it was a question of her parents, who were opposed to Pete because he wasn't Jewish. Actually, this did sound a bit phony. A girl needn't be too terribly strong these days to defy her parents in such a matter. Apparently, however, the real difficulty is that Izzy is afraid of marriage, with whomever the man may be. This certainly is a cake of a different color. Pete should drop her completely, but he won't. Why do men follow these hopeless women to their own destruction (the men's), both in novels and in real life?

Passages in Women in Love reminded me of the moonlit canoe rides on Brant Lake, and especially of the times we went naked for a swim, jumping out of the craft and then sat in the bottom, drifting. How romantic!

Pete tells me of his first experiences in show business. The promoters he has to deal with in Boston seem to have a standard proviso: that he spend the night with them. So far, he says, he hasn't succumbed. Foul, sick, damnable world!

For conversation and inquisitiveness or camaraderie in a railway carriage: Recall the ride to Sidherokastron, where the neighbors investigated our life history. The man with live chickens under the seat; the gigantic but timid Evzone returning to his village with his album of snapshots; the family in Yugoslavia; the conductor who wanted to be friendly; and the cleaning lady at Zagreb.

The St. Francis author should be cock-sure of himself at first: full of theories, always talking, preaching—about fulfillment, etc. A walking Aldous Huxley tract. The burden of the novel must be to make him realize gradually his own emptiness until he comes to a point, as Gerald Crich does in Women in Love, where his sense of frustration and chagrin and emptiness becomes overpowering, even a physical feeling, which needs an outlet, which he finds in sex. But note how deftly Lawrence treats this kind of theme. First of all, quite aside from Gerald as a character, the reader is prepared for Gerald's passion by the example of Birkin and Ursula. Then, concerning Gerald himself, he is prepared. He gets tastes, and mild setbacks: he has had his kissing, but not yet his full satisfaction. The kissing under the bridge, however, is enough to make Gudrun, though surprised, receptive to him when he does come to her. The melodramatic entry into her house shows perfectly the extremity of his position.

Chapter XXIII, "Excuse," dealing with Birkin and Ursula is also magnificent in its portrayal of a woman's passion come to bloom irresistibly. It is the closest thing to the Riek episodes that I've seen in literature.

The St. Francis person can get his preparation perhaps through the affairs of another—more earthly—person of whom he at first (of course) disapproves.

March 13, 1958

The St. Francis person and the earthy person can in the course of the novel change places, as it were: can learn from each other, or both approach a mean. Their friendship or union at the end would signify the union of all the elements that should be in a man if he be a whole man. Something like Stephen and Bloom (Sloom and Blephen!).

March 14, 1958

The St. Francis person's lacks as a human being must be shown in a scene such as the motor-chair one in Lady Chatterley's Lover or the toboggan race in The Shrimp and the Anemone. Then, after this, there can be a confrontation (which neither Hartley nor Lawrence gives), with the hero being “told off” so that he realizes his own position as well as the reader does.

1st letter: from George, tells of engagement; offers sister, Theodora. 2nd letter: from Kostas, rejects Theodora. 3rd letter: from George, furious at Kostas, says he honored K. by offering Theodora.

Café: Kostas with Eleni, his sister, and Loudha, a friend. Eleni sees George and fiancée walk by. Passing boys pay attention to Eleni. Loudha jealous; not so pretty; getting old. Kostas’s comment on ugliness disheartens her. Later Theodora appears, walking with her mother. Tells Kostas of D’s engagement. K. has to pretend not to know of it. Now must write congratulatory note.

Theodora: educated, pleasant, sophisticated, a dreamer, has university degree, but plain and ugly, fattish, old. Eleni: pretty, sleek, thin, young, wants Kostas to marry Loudha. Fiancée: very ugly. Kostas: introspective, idealistic, extremes of melancholia and gaiety. George: wrathful, a friend until crossed. Loudha: doesn’t know about Kostas and George. Aiming for Kostas herself.

Kostas’s conflicts between offending an old friend and marrying someone he’s not attracted to. Writes: that he looks on Theodora as his own sister, not a possible mate.

Background: rhythm! Symbol (expanding). Skiff with masts (phallic); dark hold (feminine, cf. cave in Sidherokastron); industry, sea, lapping sounds. Singer & band; waiters; acquaintances come to next table; see George & fiancée walk by. This sets up various trains of thought. Kostas’s thought; George’s letters, etc. Should he hail George? Did George snub him?: Vocal: “George didn’t see us. That’s his fiancée, isn’t it?” Loudha: “The fiancée is uglier than I am.” Eleni: “Good that Kostas didn’t marry Theodora.” Is Loudha interested in him?

Boy (Socrates) pays attention to Eleni. Make conversation while Kostas thinks over 2nd and 3rd letters. Theodora passes; says she’ll return shortly. Opinions of George, Eleni, Loudha, Socrates re: Theodora. Theodora returns. Enthusiastic about George’s engagement and his fiancée. Confusion: what to say?

A trip to Europe may also be used, such as the one in Women in Love. This trip can be originated by the Francis-man’s desire to see Assisi. But the trip must be dramatically necessary, and not just a travelogue.

Note Lawrence’s technique of first introducing a character and then having other characters talk about him, as Birkin and Gerald talk about Loerke. Thus we see the character, the other characters see him, and we see how the others see him. To add to this, Loerke's speeches show how he sees himself. The picture, therefore, is rather complete.

The episode to reveal character of Francis-man could be the ascent to the Saint's hideaway above Assisi, where Francis-man refuses to listen to reason and drags himself and wife? girlfriend? along despite her pains and fatigue. This can precipitate the confrontation scene, the girl previously having thought he was practically a saint himself.

Bill Schweitzer: browbeating Joan in front of guests; she runs whimpering upstairs. Sarcastic. Makes grandma sick while he's courting Gertrude because of his sarcastic remarks. His father: nice, died at age 38. His mother: horrible. Bought her way into presidency of old people's home. Everyone hated her. Finally kicked her out. She goes to California and dies. She invited Honigsbergs to her home while Bill was courting Gertrude. Door opened by butler. Invariably he announced that Mrs. Schweitzer was "in conference" (i.e. over old people's home business). She always kept the Honigsbergs waiting an hour or two before she appeared. Bill the young lawyer; pretends he operates Nash agency in N.J. (Really, he made a killing on Nash stock.) His antagonism to me because (1) I'm undisciplined, (2) a coward (CO business), (3) running away from Jewishness. Bill himself was always anti-Semitic. But is completely uninformed and even irrational. Claims that Jesus never existed.

Theme of young man seeking a way of life in America. What is America? What traditions does it provide by which he can express himself? Most obvious: the glorified American tradition of the land; Emersonian individualism; Thoreau, Frost, etc. Hero tries this, but finds that in everyday life it no longer operates. This is a fossil of the American past. The present-day America embodies opposite characteristics. Works in a group, interested in material progress, this-worldly but also pessimistic (at least the intellectuals). The old ways of self-fulfillment are closed, exhausted, or unpopular. What's left? Fringe groups, Catholicism, pacifism, but nothing in the main stream. Whom does the American admire? Only the rich man in successful enterprises.

Αγκαλιάσματα των παντρεμένων: η γυναίκα «τελειώνει», ο άντρας αποκοιμάται, και η γυναίκα. Ξαφνικά ξυπνάει αυτός: «άραγε τελείωσα ή όχι;» Δεν θυμάται καλά καλά. «Όχι, αποκοιμήθηκα.» Τώρα πια δεν έχει ούτε επιθυμία. Η γυναίκα βαθιά στον ύπνο. Όμως πρέπει να τελειώσει. Αρχίζει ή γυναίκα, δεν ξέρει τι γίνεται. Κάτι αισθάνεται στα όνειρά της. Αγάλια αγάλια καταλαβαίνει και ξυπνά.

¶ Americans have never loved the soil of America as Europeans have loved the soil of Europe. America has never been a blood-homeland. Only an ideal homeland. The homeland of the idea, of the spirit. And of the pocket. Not of the blood. . . .

Europe has been loved with a blood love. That has made it beautiful. —D. H. Lawrence, Studies in Classic American Literature, Anchor Books, p. 122.

¶ You can't idealize the essential brute blood-activity, the brute blood-desires. The basic, sardonic blood-knowledge. . . . You can't idealize hard work, which is why America invents so many machines and contrivances of all sorts: so that they need do no physical work. —Ibid., p. 122.

¶ Beautifully the sailing-ship nodalizes the forces of sea and wind, converting them to her purpose. There is no violation as in a steam-ship, only a winged centrality. It is this perfect adjusting of ourselves to the elements, the perfect equipoise between them and us, which gives us a great part of our life-joy. The more we intervene machinery between us and the naked forces the more we numb and atrophy our own senses. Every time we turn on a tap to have water, every time we turn a handle to have fire or light, we deny ourselves and annul our being. The great elements, the earth, air, fire, water are there like some great mistress whom we woo and struggle with. . . . And all our appliances do but deny us these fine embraces, take the miracle of life away from us. The machine is the great neuter. It is the eunuch of eunuchs. In the end it emasculates us all. When we balance the sticks and kindle a fire, we partake of the mysteries. But when we turn on an electric tap there is as it were, a wad between us and the dynamic universe. —Ibid., p. 137.

The New Englanders, wielding the sword of the spirit backwards, struck down the primal impulsive being in every man leaving only a mechanical, automatic unit. In so doing they cut and destroyed the living bond between men, the rich passional contact. And for this passional contact gradually was substituted the mechanical bond of purposeful utility. The spontaneous passion of social union once destroyed, then it was possible to establish the perfect mechanical concord, the concord of a number of parts to a vast whole, a stupendous productive mechanism. And this, this vast mechanical concord of innumerable machine-parts, each performing its own motion in the intricate complexity of material production, this is the clue to the western democracy. . . . This is what makes good businessmen. And in this the American is like the Jew: in that, having conquered and destroyed the instinctive, impulsive being in himself, he is free to be always deliberate, always calculated, rapid, swift, and single in practical execution as a machine. . . . In other races the impulsive mystery of being interferes with the deliberate intention of the individual. In these not. . . . They must run on, like machines, or go mad. . . . Hence the Orestes-like flight of unrest of Americans and Jews. —D. H. Lawrence, “The Spirit of Place,” English Review XXVII, pp. 328–329.

Leander’s crying and sickness brought this tearful response from C. in the middle of the night: “I care for him so much. Why does he get sick, then? And why does he call for παππού and not for γιαγιά?”

The movie Gervaise was excellent. Zola’s technique—if the movie does not improve on l’Assommoir—was especially good in the counterpoint achieved in two instances: the dinner party, with its true gaiety, but with our and Gervaise’s knowledge that Lantier was outside (this also heightened by the going out of Coupeau for a 14th guest). We all expect he’ll bring Lantier, but doesn’t. Lantier only comes later. All this is plotted brilliantly. Of less success, but also interesting, was the showdown between Gervaise and the forgeron, at the outdoor dance. To have such revelations while jiggling is very poignant, and also perhaps very true to life.

C. and I had another time of stress last night, and as always I came away feeling my own wrong-headedness and also the complete inability to resist directions which I can see should not be taken. And still perhaps I am not entirely to blame, and the very having of words was beneficial. I had hoped, after the movie, to go to a club, to be jolly and carefree and not have, for once, to worry about the baby-sitter (because Leander was sleeping at my parents'). But during the movie C., whenever we want to do something, of course she wanted to go right home. I reproached her with getting sick precisely whenever we went out, as though she planned it that way. This assertion of course was probably ridiculous, but it was not the main reason for my dissatisfaction. This was rather something that I've felt for some time: a lack of any real demonstration on her part of affection, a disinterest in sex (until I arouse her, but I always have to be the initiator), a kind of indifference shown by failure to say good morning or good night; and also a nagging about my deficiencies as a father: that I never play with Leander or read to him (*which now she's maneuvered me into doing); that I never wash the dishes, that I come home too late from the library, etc. Of course, this family-career tension is inevitable, and with me it's complicated by my feeling that the family situation has sapped whatever creative energies I had. But perhaps this is just an excuse.

In any case, we drove home sullenly, not speaking except for my reproaching her for being like a "corpse." At the garage, walking home, she tried to slip her arm in mine. I refused, walking defiantly alone ahead of her, as I remember I did once in Greece after some argument. This way in silence, all the way, I turning somersaults of reproach and self-righteousness and self-censure in my mind, combined with feelings of telling her off, beating her, leaving her, getting drunk, shouting, and other such. Finally in our room she asked me why I was angry and we went through the dizziness complaint, where of course she had all the right on her side. But she was bothered especially by my insinuation that it was a sign of some psychological trouble, as perhaps is her acne. This is a remembrance of the time in Greece when I agreed to the suggestion of our gynecologist Gianialis that her pregnancy troubles were also purely psychological, and to have her visited by a psychologist, which we did, and which, I'm sure, she has never forgotten, as the ultimate humiliation. She reproached me with it last night, saying that certainly I was probably ready to send her for an analysis. Well, we got past this part and came with difficulty and hesitation to the more basic complaints. I said she hadn't, by her own will, put her arm around me or kissed me or come to me in bed or taken hold of my penis (I didn't say that, alas, but wanted to), or even shown herself to me naked—ever, or in many years or months, depending on the case. She reproached me with wanting only to “get” and of course she was right. She admitted it, but I said that one has the right to expect to “get” as well as to give, and that I was sure she wanted herself to “get” as well as “give,” which she admitted. She implied that I didn't “give” anything. In this, it turned out, she meant my working on Sundays, neglecting Leander, etc. I asked her, Didn't she like sex? And she said No, she didn't: so why don't I go and get a psychiatrist for her. Then it came out that she answered in this way, she said, just to be ironic, and that of course she liked sex. “Who doesn't like sex?” she said; and “Have I ever said No to you?” which of course she hasn't. And also, judging from her orgasms, she seems to enjoy sex very much, once we get started. I complained that when she never made any advances or coquetry herself. I felt guilty in coming to her and felt that I was always disturbing her, that she'd prefer sleeping, since whenever I got into bed she was always like a sack of potatoes. I realized all the time, however, that perhaps the normal woman just is not aroused until the man arouses her; and also that my desire to be titillated probably shows some female sexuality in me. Perhaps homosexuality: I want to be ravished by a virile man. I don't know. Certainly this is only a part of the story, if it is a part at all.

She justified her potato-sackishness by the hard day she has with Leander, and there is no doubt she exhausts herself with the baby. I told her she was over-indulgent and this pained her. She said she had to keep the baby as close to her as possible now, because inevitably some day he'll leave both of us for good, and also because of all the evil influences of society, juvenile delinquency, and the like. Ridiculous argument. She's an over-protective mother, doubtlessly. But I didn't want to belabor the issue because, as I told her, she'd probably learn a lot after she has two children to deal with and finds that she'll have to leave one of them to his own devices at least part of the time. I imagine most women resemble C. in this learning process.

We didn't reach much in the way of a conclusion. She cried her bit and I went to bed—a separate bed in 3902—still feeling rancorous, and feel that way even as I write. I think, however, that as always in the past we'll have a warm and lovely reconciliation . I know for one thing that few girls would put up with all that she has from me.

John Davison came on Friday and played his new symphony. 2nd movement quite disorganized, but first and third sometimes achieve a certain grandeur. I told him he was afraid to rest in his music. There are never any long notes, any suspensions or silences. Only motion, motion, like a St. Vitus dance. He liked my sketch, "Leaving Greece," saying that I'd captured a Homeric flavor in the prose. He thought the ending of "A Scholarship" rather corny, which it is. He told me of his roommate in Rochester, a Texan who is disillusioned by academia (U. of R. history department) and has become "beat" to some degree, leaving school, returning, defying everyone, etc. But not producing anything as a result, which at least Kironas has done. John said he—John—believed in God, which his Texan friend did not: the cause of his troubles, naturally. We agreed, however, with our disgust with the Quakers. John now goes to conservative Presbyterians. I told him of my desire for ritual, for emotional experience, and mystery, not the political and sociological discussions of the Quakers. But where can one get mystery now? He left us a can of turtle soup as a present.

Friday night we had a riotous Seder at my parents' with Hone drunk and Irv happy, as usual. Mother tried to make everything just right, according to symbolism, which she explained. The biggest hit were the hard-boiled eggs in salt water, the salt water standing for tears. This was mince meat for Hone's humor. Pass me the tears, please! Grandma laughed so hard she cried, and I put the hard-boiled egg bowl under her eyes. Very reverent Seder! But the worst was yet to come: the prunes for desert. Mother also suffered inevitably from the fact that half the meal had come out of bottles, cans, or boxes. Even the fish: right out of the bottle. "Open another bottle," Hone yelled, and recalled how in the good old days grandma chopped for a week to make this delicacy.

Folks went to Constantine Kaledin's memorial service at the Community Church. About twelve people present. Harrington read some psalms and poems and a eulogy of the deceased written by Arthur, who called his father too unaggressive, too good for this world. Harrington hardly knew K. He had seen him at a few forums, and said his face radiated "peace." Harrington's great insight! Such was the end, after forty years in the U.S. Twelve people and a preacher who'd seen him once or twice at a distance. My compassionate parents of course attended forgetting in their self-righteousness that my father had refused to lend Costa $100 a few months ago! Arthur said his father retained his serenity under a life of incredible frustration. This I can believe. Here was this man, born into the upper class in Russia, university student, intellectual, participant in the riots against Rasputin (and hitting the monk on the head with a snowball (Apocrypha!)), forced into exile in 1917, and then forty years in a three-room apartment, trying to make a living in rare books, rare textiles—anything: and competing with the sharpest in the game. And Mrs. Kaledin a shrewish over-talkative unpleasant woman to boot. On top of this, Arthur's ouster and his Greenwich Village sojourn, Eugene's defection at Princeton: his experience with the evangelizing ministerial students. Also Costa's sad ineffectiveness as a Russian language teacher, and his chagrin at Arthur's refusal to learn.

I delighted the other day in watching Leander and noting his physical and mental progress—and his joie de vivre: and it seemed to me completely incongruous in light of the futility and meaninglessness and pettiness of adult life: the waste of it: at least of mine at this point.

Our visit to Shrub Oak community last year: how ludicrous the whole thing was. First of all, Charlotte, lonely, just separated from Leo, in her sloppy house, trying to keep people around her. Then the visit to the house in process of extension: new fireplace, paneled walls, etc. Cakes, ices, two families, others dropping in; the maintenance, in the country, of life as it is on Central Park West. Then, to top it off, we stop in on Mason. His house: beautiful to the last detail (not like the shabbiness of the houses of the professional people), and full, full with fat ladies and assorted relatives with mustaches. And Mason Buddha-like, taciturn, wearing skin-tight shorts around his thick belly, and his testicles sticking out when he sat down. Lovely! More food, cheesecake, coffee, noise, utter confusion. And other visitors arriving as we left. We hurried back to the peace of 121st Street.

This weekend as usual the folks arranged to go to the beach. I insisted on staying here, on pretext of studying for Dobbie's exam. Chrysanthi went, reluctantly, but out of a sense of duty. Mrs. Solomon never came back to Meeting. I saw her on the street the other day, but we only exchanged polite hellos. The girl involved tells me that Mrs. S. wrote a note of "apology" saying she would stay away until she learned to control her temper. By accepting the blame for the argument we had which caused all the trouble (a stupid flare-up over the virtues of the Golden Rule trip into the atomic testing area) she put us on the defensive. Wasn't she being too horribly Christian?! I told the girl that all was well as it was and that Mrs. S. made a fortunate decision (to stay away), which she should not be encouraged to abandon. The girl also managed to escape the irksome visits to Mrs. S's Near-East filled house. The poor students who are captured by her! Marilyn Murphy says she hears violent arguments frequently. Mrs. S's appearance: like a potato sack filled with lumpy jelly. Her endless stories of aid to Arab students. I wonder if, after all, she is a Jew. That would really be funny. The name? But of course it was her husband's.

Mrs. McCarthy usually talks a blue streak, especially the first time I see her every year: all about her children, usually, and whatever else comes to mind. Today I stopped for a stamp, prepared to stay—forcibly—for twenty minutes or so, but there was no response. She cut short my greetings by asking if I wanted an envelope, and then went to the garage next door ostensibly to change some bills. Obviously, something was wrong, and I left, as evidently she wanted me to. I saw Freddie later and asked what could be the matter. It came as a shock: Bruce was killed this winter in an auto accident. Freddie said that Bruce was driving with two other freshmen (this was Bruce's first year at college; last spring he was accepted at Dartmouth, RIT, Cornell, etc.), driving home for a weekend during a very bad snowstorm. Apparently he was going right along and attempting to pass a long line of cars despite the blizzard, on a two-lane highway. He crashed head-on into a meat truck and was killed instantly. He was a boy who had had everything in his favor and consequently didn't have a care in the world. He was tremendous, strong, a star athlete, intelligent, and heir to all the McCarthy holdings. He was also, of course Marie McCarthy's whole life, especially since her husband left her and small Marie went to live in Florida.

Freddie killed eight porcupines in my barn this winter. Also a bobcat which, as he says, "was sitting upon a rock just like a house cat. I had my twenty-two and I shot him right in the neck. He just rolled off the rock, kicked a couple times, and . . . that was all!"

There's a blazing full moon to the east tonight, and a very insistent whippoorwill outside.

The question came up of Alice's living in our apartment while we were away in England. She wanted to, and said she would try to convince Judy, her prospective roommate, who apparently wanted something cheaper. Next day, mother called me to say that they, and Alice, had definitely decided against the idea. "Alice doesn't want it. It's too big," said mother. Later Alice came and I asked if this were true. She responded by telling of the to-do after I left, with dad and mother, strongly reinforced by grandma, all shouting her down. Reasons for not taking the apartment: (1) It's in a neighborhood with Negroes and Puerto Ricans. (2) If either Alice or Judy left before we returned, dad would be stuck with the rent (according to him). Grandma kindly suggested that, after all, Alice had been away for four years at college; now she should live with her sweet mother and lovely father.

Letter from Greece that Ευθυμούλα had a son on June 20. She gave birth at Serres, with a former student of Dimitrios's as doctor. Dimitrios reached the hospital at 2:00 a.m. and as a friend of the doctor and in general as a well-known and important man in Serres, was admitted as a visitor. Eftymoula is in a private room, ensconced in assured respectability, she being a teacher and George an agriculturalist. This was the first of his grandchildren that Dimitrios has seen: those of Odysseus and Chrysanthi being so far inaccessible. He saw Dimitraki, age ½ hour, and felt that "it" was rather a blob of something very strange indeed. He had brought the traditional first present a λίρα χρυσού and tried to press it into the child's hand but, as he wrote, the child didn't seem to care.

Plot: a man commits a serious crime in early life, without being apprehended. He goes through life, becomes respectable, successful, and is never found out.

Party at Mary Heath's, with most of the employees at the 5th Avenue "couture" place where she works. There was a Negro woman in a tight dress, very pretty face, with two daughters of high-school age. The mother looked all of 25 years old! She existed only for dancing (rock-n-roll, cha cha, etc.), danced every night with her daughters. Once danced professionally in a chorus (her great achievement). Called everyone “lover-boy.” The elder daughter began to take after her. There was an interesting incongruity: physically the daughter had all the disabilities of adolescence: pimples, sloppiness, a figure not really yet defined. But her manner was not at all the same. She gamboled and flirted and danced with complete assurance. She tickled me (and the others) under the chin, called us “lover-boy,” etc., without the slightest feeling of sexuality. This also was incongruous: both in her and in her mother, for the dances themselves were all sexy, consisting mostly of shaking of hindquarters; yet there was this antiseptic quality also, a kind of gymnasium quality. Perhaps these dances, rather than an excitement to sex, are a sponge to soak up the passions and squeeze them out as sweat.

I was interested also in the reactions of one of the other couture girls: a small old-maid or spinster type, quite vulgar and ugly—having apparently accepted the fact. She was in ecstasies over the mother’s dancing. “Isn’t she terrific? Isn’t she great?” she repeated in her NY accent. And then: “You should have seen her at our Christmas party. She wore a hula skirt with nothing underneath and with her long legs just like Cyd Charisse—wow! She was something!” This kind of unconscious, unabashed Lesbianism could only come out of this type of woman.

An interesting contrast was formed by the Greek people present. The party was in honor of Antonia, a 200-pound plain-looking girl dressed entirely in black. She, partly because of her obesity, seemed permanently sad—and Chrysanthi later told me her story, which explained this. She had been jilted by a boy after a ten-year engagement! This could only happen in Greece! Antonia joined in the cha-cha and rock-n-roll but with an entirely different spirit: a dignity brought about by her dancing on her toes and having the graceful, smooth movements of folk dance rather than the heebie-jeebies of the mother and daughters. Antonia was returning to Athens, her job (nurse), and her motorcycle, after having been “used” for a year by her brother and sister-in-law, who brought her over to care for their baby so the wife could work. They gave her no money at all, and she too had to work 6 to 12 in the evenings after caring for the baby all day.

Some Greek music was put on and danced to by Antonia and several others present, notably a lady of about 60, also squat and fat, who suddenly blossomed (as Antonia had done) into feathery lightness and grace. There could be no greater contrast than that between these Greek dances and the American ones that they followed. Certainly the dance must reflect time and place as well as does literature and art. The Greek dances had an element of long-suffering endurance and of communion with the earth. The feet of the dancers seemed necessarily connected with the floor below. You could see a whole slow moving persevering peasant civilization: unsmiling, yet bodily and mentally content. The American dances were quite the opposite. I observed the mother well. She would start off smiling in her beautiful way, but this would not last. The smile, as it were, was "part of the act." The natural expression, which she soon enough fell into, was of boredom mixed with a kind of clenched determination to continue the gyrations at whatever cost. It became movement for its own sake, ragged meaningless monotonous movement whose only rational could be continuation to a state of orgasmic ecstasy, which, I suppose, sometimes does happen in the dance halls. But the American dances seem to be a means of forgetting one's life, while the Greek ones are a means of remembering it, epitomizing it, ritualizing it.

It is possible that in the future the role of the sexes may become completely reversed. Robert Graves in The White Goddess speaks of one such reversal that took place: the arrival of Olympianism in Greece—the shift from a matriarchial to a patriarchial society. In the former, the women chased the men, goddesses predominated over gods, etc. This survives in myth and, thinks Graves, asserts itself periodically in «Romantic» movements such as the time of courtly-love, or the worship of Queen Elizabeth. The shift having once taken place (we have examples of matriarchial societies even today, which shows at least that they can exist), there is no reason why it cannot take place again. It is the logical outcome of present tendencies: and also may be forced on the world by the atomic-warfare situation.

The questing young man, looking for what can be considered valuable enough to make life worth living in the future, and growing out of the false attractiveness of intellectualism, kultur, idealism, otherworldliness, political agitation (socialism, etc.), and/or the cult of sensation as in the beat generation, may find the answer in the simple everyday problems, joys, and tendernesses of family life: of birth, death, marriage, love of parents for children, etc. This is the feeling one gets from Forster's Where Angels Fear to Tread, where against all the falseness of the life in Sawston is held up Carella's tenderness for his child, and his acceptance, and conquering, as it were, of the facts of death. Even though it is against our better judgments (our Protestant Anglo-Saxon judgments), we feel that Carella—the cad—is alone leading a worthwhile life. This novel, in its clearness of structure and perfection of realization, would be a fine model. In its way, it is perfect: and transparently so!

Visits from Gregory, John Davison, Bill Watson. Gregory kept asking me if there were any “conservative” organizations such as NYA left in New York. I thought he was an ironist. But later, when I mentioned the word “subversive,” in another context, it turned out that that was the word he had wanted. Malapropism exists in real life. But of course, perhaps Gregory isn’t real life. He gave the usual story of his remote contacts with homosexuals (according to him): of girls who rejected him, etc. The funniest story was of his army career. He was inducted, taken to boot camp, given aptitude tests, declared to have no aptitude, and honorably discharged after eight weeks. Quite a nice service career! He was in NY looking around, after having done the same in Montreal and Albany. He wanted a change of job, being tired of Rochester, where he is still porter in the OR, but at a maximum salary of $1.31/hr.—not bad. In Albany he’d have to start at the bottom scale (same job). I advised him to stay in Rochester.

John played a lovely suite, quite the best thing I’ve heard of his, though it seemed perhaps even better fitted to strings than to piano, for which he intended it. I think he’s really getting good and can produce some significant music.

Bill Watson shows his four years at Harvard. His mission in life, he told me, was to illuminate the history of trade routes between Spain and England in the 13th century!

Before leaving, we had little parties with Hone and Irene, Pete and Izzy (who’ll be married in November if all goes well, Pete having had to convert to Judaism!), and all the folks on our floor. Stefan gave me a painting. I chose an abstract—very striking.

Virginia Woolf, Jacob's Room (chapter XII) on the temples on the Acropolis:

¶ The extreme definiteness with which they stand, now a brilliant white, again yellow, and in some lights red, imposes ideas of durability, of the emergence through the earth of some spiritual energy elsewhere dissipated in elegant trifles. But this durability exists quite independently of our admiration. Although the beauty is sufficiently humane to weaken us, to stir the deep deposit of mud—memories, abandonments, regrets, sentimental devotions—the Parthenon is separate from all that; and if you consider how it has stood out all night, for centuries, you begin to connect the blaze (at midday the glare is dazzling and the frieze almost invisible) with the idea that perhaps it is beauty alone that is immortal.

Added to this, compared with the blistered stucco, the new love songs rasped out to the strum of guitar and gramophone, and the mobile yet insignificant faces of the street, the Parthenon is really astonishing in its silent composure; which is so vigorous that, far from being decayed, the Parthenon appears, on the contrary, likely to outlast the entire world.

Henry Gifford said today that he regretted the fact that the U.S. and England share a common language, since this makes the influence of the U.S. on England so much easier and faster, an influence that he views with horror—of competitiveness and rushing in the academic life, hitherto quite foreign to the English. They, for instance, don't clamor to be promoted, or to publish.

Tea with Henry Gifford and family. He lives in a new house, quite American-looking, in Westbury-on-Trym. Very clean and pleasant. He showed me some dozen or so letters from Thomas Hardy written to his grandfather, whose cousin was Hardy's first wife. One was the announcement of her death; Others offered the use of his house in Dorchester, etc. Hardy's handwriting was gorgeous. Gifford also had some letters from James Russell Lowell, then Ambassador to the Court of St. James, who gave away Gifford's grandmother (an American) at her wedding. History suddenly seemed telescoped, as Gifford's father, very elderly, still lives. He was a prospector for gold in Montana in the early 1900s.

I'm finally reading The Magic Mopuntain. I actually felt ill at first because of the book. Now I am at about page 300 and find it rather boring. He should have written the whole thing in 300 pages instead of 700.

November 1, 1958

We spent the afternoon sightseeing in Bath: the Roman baths, the circus, Royal Crescent; 8th century elegance, now somewhat drab. The one thing I'll remember, I think, is the lift in the station: an immense, extremely done-up one, with benches on the periphery of the rather circular shape, and a large open space in the center—made for, as the operator told us, the traffic of large bath chairs that conveyed the wealthy invalids to this resort in the 19th century.

Our trip to Wells two weeks ago was also memorable, chiefly, of course, owing to the cathedral, with its powerful west front looking over the enclosed green, and the four inverted arches in the center. Bath Abbey, however, though nowhere of the beauty of Wells, had one advantage to my mind: no division between nave and apse, so one could look clear down the full length of the building to the square block of stained glass at the East end.

Redland Meeting today was good. We heard a very colloquial and therefore effective translation of some of the moral advice Paul gave to the Romans: quite à propos today: don't let yourself be molded by your society, but mold yourself according to the teachings of religion and virtue. Then a long sonorous expansion of this. Finally a cracked voice of an old Irishman, the confessional type of message, saying he'd been saved by prayer, and he knew prayer worked, because when Hitler was deliberating whether to invade England or Russia, he (the Irish Friend) prayed that Hitler would spare the Christians (England) and attack the heathen (Russia), which prayer was obviously "fulfilled." Amazing that we can hear things like this still. So many critics, e.g. Willey in The Seventeenth Century Background, try to make literature more real by putting us back in the proper mentality of the time: but that mentality is often still with us, though not, I must add, in the best minds (I hope).

I am getting letters every day, it seems, from Hartley. All to the good. He is a strange combination of self-assuredness and extreme humility, of social elegance and of naturalness. But the best vignette of him was that of Cynthia Asquith, that he was a splendid leader-on talker. I certainly found that to be true. No sooner had we met and had our first drinks in our hands (and admired the view over the Avon) than did he begin heavily in his lecture-theme, the 17th century moralists, especially Richardson. He was in the middle of Pamela and very impressed, though of course bothered by the extreme length of the work. He kept telling me, "But of course you know much more about all this than I do," which of course was as far from truth as one could get. But it illustrates his manner, for it was said in all sincerity, with not a touch of condescension or sarcasm. Over lunch we mostly talked about other writers, especially Hartley's friends: Huxley, Eliot, the Sitwells; and about whether or not writers are mad. He held they were, saying Richardson must have been mad and citing the obvious examples of Blake, Swift, Virginia Woolf. I wasn't so sure. Fielding seemed quite level-headed, as did E. M. Forster and many other moderns. We retired to our coffee and then it was I who delivered the questions I had set down—which, to my dismay, were exhausted only too rapidly. But he continued, thankfully, to be a leader-on talker.

The lunch was memorable for its profusion of wines, Hartley filling my glass immediately I emptied it. Also H's extreme graciousness. The servant started the meal and then retired, and H. himself got up and brought around seconds to us. At one point Alec could be heard crying. We said it was nothing (it wasn't a very vigorous cry), but he insisted on going up to the bedroom to investigate. Obviously he hadn't had much experience with infants. Anyway, the servants were taking splendid care of the situation, and knowledgeably, for they were grandparents, they assured us, four times over.

With all the beauty of H's house and garden, it must be rather deadly to live there; he said himself in his last letter that the place was normally rather melancholy.

November 5, 1958

It is one of the joys of life to discover for oneself something that is stupendously first-rate and that one had no notion existed. I remember my ecstasy last year in playing and hearing the Bach Chaconne with Stefan, and, to a lesser degree, the Kreutzer Sonata. Today, just now, I found another little masterpiece, Couperin's Sarabande, a canon, in Schirmer's Album of Early Keyboard Music, volume 1559. It starts off like this:

This is Guy Fawkes day. Firecrackers (mostly duds) are shooting upwards and fires crackling. Each house seems to have its own separate fire: the English keep their garden walls in force even for their celebrations. Well, now that it's over I hope there won't be any more boys in the street with stuffed effigies, accosting one with "Penny for old Guy, sir?"

Last night we saw Osborne's Entertainer, a very deficient piece as drama, I thought, but tremendously interesting for its topical significance, its commentary on life in England at the present day. The old music-hall singer just goes through the motions, knowing himself that he never "feels" anything—in a medium that has long since died. At the end, however, he shows his British spirit by choosing prison over TV and automobiles in Canada. I should think that a similar kind of allegory of US life, more or less explicit, could be done. It would be better as literature than the usual open-faced novels, which are just dialogue renderings of the Organization Man. Having the Entertainer epitomize the English predicament was, I think, a splendid idea.

Stephen Spender, in World Within World, tells how he was attracted to a girl once because of the sparkling quality of her eyes. He got to know her better (in fact he married her, I think), and one day while they were walking together he noticed that she deliberately squeezed her eyelids together so that tears came, and then skillfully kept the tears from falling, so they gave the reflective brilliance to her eyes. One is reminded of the girl in Hardy's Jude who produces dimples at will. Evidently this wasn't imagined by Hardy, but observed.

Last Saturday: journey to Gloucester, where the cathedral is interesting because the nave is Norman, with big fat brickwork columns, round arches, and plain ceiling, while the choir, which was reworked in the 14th century, is Perpendicular: thin stovepipe columns, pointed arches, windows with tracery, and fan-vaulted ceiling. In parts one side of the column was refaced in the new style, while the other was left in its original Norman condition. The east window, between choir and Lady Chapel, was immense and palely lovely, the tomb of Edward II very evocative historically. We had great fun on the trains, hoisting the baby carriage into the luggage van, baby and all. And we ate fish and chips in a Tudor inn whose floor wobbled as sheets of roofing do.

Even at a very early age, I was struck by the refusal of people to admit the elements of existence out of which they make their lives. Most lives are like dishonest works of art in which the values are faked, certain passages blurred and confused, difficulties evaded, and refuge taken by those bad artists who are human beings, in conventions that shirk unique experiences. As a child, even, I wanted to know someone who saw himself continually in relation to the immensity of time and the universe: who admitted to himself the isolation of this spiritual search and the wholeness of his physical nature.

¶ Today there is more realization of problems than there is faith in solutions. Discouraging as this may seem, it means that if and when solutions are found, the public is prepared to pay a drastic price for them. After the previous war, people expected much of the League of Nations, but were not prepared to abandon national sovereignty. This time, a great many everywhere are prepared to sacrifice a great deal of nationhood and possessions which they formerly clung to, but they do not believe in the United Nations. The most important condition of change—a widespread realism—has been achieved. —Stephen Spender, World With World (1951), pp. 291–2.

Spender describes his grandmother, a wealthy widow who became a Quaker. “She lived with extreme simplicity, preferring to sit always on a three-legged wooden stool, eating, when she was alone, meals which consisted usually of stale bread or buns and a little cheese, wearing black dresses which were undistinguishable one from the other. . . .

“Her own remedy for the ills of society was simple: everyone should love everyone else. . . .

“We discussed everything, including art, religion and sex. . . .

“Dear Stephen, say something quickly to shock me,” she would exclaim sometimes when I came into the room. . . . I was to discover that there was a trace of duplicity in my grandmother’s nature. Like many highly intelligent but naïve people, she was not so guileless but that she did not sometimes exploit her own innocence in order to gain confidences and assert her power. . . .

“Her icy-cold flat in which the bedrooms were never heated and in which, to save electricity, little oil lamps burned along the corridors, depressed me. These lamps were by no means the least of her economies, the most impressive of which was that she retained from the First World War small squares of sweetened paper, used as a sugar substitute, which she continued to put in her tea right up to the Second World War. She often used to eat her lunch, consisting of a roll picked up at tea from a Lyons Restaurant, on a bus, on her way to Friends' House.

"At the teas to which we went every Sunday there were always stale cakes, relics of some bygone day when cakes and buns were new. Nor could we well avoid eating these, because if, when one of us was handed a plate, he attempted to choose the least mildewy, my grandmother who was watching from her corner would immediately cry out: 'No, darling, take the one nearest to you. It's the stalest, and was put there on purpose.' Breakfasts and luncheons were full of orders such as, 'Eat that orange, darling, it's going bad,' or 'You must eat every one of these lovely, lovely scones. My sister sent them from the country, and they won't last.'

"Yet her economies could strike no one as mean. Indeed, they were one aspect of an enormous act of generosity of a woman who not only gave much away, but who, out of a sense of the wretchedness of humanity, lived in some ways less comfortably than the poor." (pp. 15–17)

George Herbert gives good advice to scholars (in ‘The Church Porch,’ The Temple):

Art thou a magistrate? Then be severe:
 If studious, copy fair what time hath blurr'd;
 Redeem truth from his jaws: if soldier,
 Chase brave employments with a naked sword
     Throughout the world. Fool not; for all may have,
     If they dare try, a glorious life, or grave.

I had a sudden remembrance the other day of the most horrible and disgusting symbol of man's smallness, his mortal state, his irresponsibility and essential lack of nobility. It was the vision I had of that time in Rochester when we had to take care of a corpse: perhaps someone who had died on the operating table (I forget). Our first instructions were to guard against his soiling by stuffing cotton up his behind, and by tying a string very tightly around his penis. Very sensible, of course. But that is hardly what we like to think the end of man is like.

A most interesting article in The Observer by A. Alvarez on the American beat-generation puts them somewhat into perspective, in an extremely interesting way. He stresses the “coolness”—i.e. the refusal to show any emotion, which can be seen in Rock & Roll dancing, where the partners must not smile or even look at each other; and in the attitude to sex, which far from being a passionate experience, is regarded as of no more consequence in a day's affairs than, say, eating a sandwich. The background to all this, says Alvarez, is a reaction to the intense emotionalism of the early jazz-addicts. The musicians themselves, and then the auditors, tired of all the heat, began to “play it cool.” Now, any display of opinion or feeling is taboo. As an example, Alvarez says that at parties, one of the “chicks” will undress and lean over the phonograph, asking someone to change the record. The someone must do so with complete nonchalance, and if he touches the naked lady so near him he is certainly a disgrace. Alvarez speaks of another factor in the whole picture: the fantastic postwar prosperity. With everything so rich, it was inevitable for the Beats to strike out against the American “trinity” of “production, consumption, and easy living.” But if things get difficult economically, Alvarez forecasts, the bohemian philosophy will inevitably change.

Oh wearisome condition of humanity,

Queen Elizabeth came to open the new Engineering building of the university. The preparations, going on in much evidence for the past ten days, seemed ludicrous then, but perhaps not so much so now that I have seen the result: a pompous (in the good sense) convocation in the Great Hall, with processions of academics and of civic dignitaries, each in proper costume and head-dress; the organ sounding Vaughan-Williams and Bach, and a gigantic fanfare of trumpets just before the royal processions entered the hall. My heart was beating, I confess it, in anticipation of the Queen, since the order of entrance was so arranged to emphasize that all this was leading up to, anticipating, being a pale show for, the real thing to come. Of course the Queen Herself is just a short woman, not very pretty, and well-powdered. Everyone had on robes of state, it seemed, except her.

University was closed for the day and the preceding afternoon, so we had to remove all our books from the library, which was used for a reception. (Sherry-stains on my desk afterward.) Other preparations including polishing the floors, vacuuming the walls, re-cementing sidewalk blocks, painting a radiator along the Queen's path, and constructing a special room complete with wall-hangings and a white telephone, where the Queen could "retire." Students and professors seemed to consider these preparations ludicrous and annoying, but certainly many seemed to come uncompelled in order to see the first of the preparations today. My final feeling, however, was that human beings look just as silly in robes and ermine as without them, unless seen at a great distance. It is the great advantage of the stage, or of painting, that it can make all this pomp seem credible: that it can lift people higher than themselves.

Coffee with John Hunt, an egotistical play-acting King's College graduate who has a novel written, so he claims (though the other day it was a “mystery”). He is clever, witty, a good mimic, and says intelligent things often in the seminar, and is universally disliked by the others it seems, perhaps for these reasons.

Chrysanthi came home from the dentist's unexpectedly minus one tooth.

This morning I read a book of Paradise Lost, and the first few chapters of Swinnerton's Georgian Literary Scene, which I think will give me ideas for my Hartley paper. This afternoon another book of P.L., and some of Auden's poems, which impressed me—note the Birthday poem to Christopher Isherwood. I am also reading, gradually, in Fairchild's translation, the Aeneid, and enjoying it immensely, to my surprise. It's fully as exciting as Malory, and would be a fine children's story, gore and all.

Back after five days in London staying at 15 Brandon Mansions, Queens Club Gardens, Hammersmith, in the apartment of John and Woody Wilson. Woody was bubbling and delightful, while John grouched the whole time and spoiled much of the fun. It was good for me, however, to see a grouchy person from the outside, because I certainly am often the same. He buried himself in his Manchester Guardian while the rest of us talked and laughed and coped somehow with all the children. When he and I went together to eat supper in Soho he insisted on inspecting restaurant after restaurant, to find the cheapest. Finally, from weariness, we went into one with no menu outside at all, and were so late we couldn't enjoy the meal. We were to meet Woody and Chrysanthi at St. Clement Danes for a Christmas concert, at 8 o'clock. John looked at his watch all through dinner every 45 seconds or so. Very nervous type. And yet he, who should have his head in eternity instead of in the minutiae of time, is a minister of religion. The concert, at any rate, was lovely.

The day before had been delightful, reminding me of my month in Paris. I spent the morning and afternoon in the Reading Room of the British Museum, compiling my Hartley bibliography, then went to a review with fan dancers and plenty of semi-nudity, very enjoyable. An elderly man next to me cursed under his breath whenever the patter-man came on, and purred like a kitten as soon as the naked girls reappeared.

After this I met Chrysanthi at Piccadilly Circus and we went to a superb performance of a superb play: O'Neill's "Long Day's Journey into Night": one of the most intense evenings I've ever had at the theater.

On Thursday we drove with the Wilsons to Canterbury, a rather exhausting trip, only to have to rush back because we promised a Greek dinner to the Wilsons and the Sterns. Rush, rush—hardly a way to vacation. Friday, relieved of the Wilsons, we regained our leisure and had a lovely return trip. Stopping off at Hampton Court, where Leander was enticed by the king's bed, and Stonehenge. Both Stonehenge and Avebury, where we stopped on the way up with Robin Marlyn, convey their antiquity and the ruggedness of the society they represent—Stonehenge especially, being on a windswept hillock in Salisbury Plain: very desolate, even with the National Trust ticket and guidebook office adjacent.

Christmas, with plenty of presents, a chicken dinner, a radio broadcast (yesterday) of King's College Chapel Choir, and a communion service this morning in Bristol Cathedral, half empty as is usual with English churches. The sight of magnificent cathedrals creaking along with a dead faith is very instructive. Really, they should stop the pretense, and turn all the cathedrals officially into what they are in reality: museums.

This afternoon we went to Professor Baker's, where his family, about fifteen people, were gathered. We had great fun with Leander. Blocks were brought down, the maiden aunt started building towers, then the professor and his nephew tried a cantilever bridge (unsuccessful) while Leander gorged himself on candies, and gleefully pushed over towers as soon as they were built, to everyone's amusement and uproarious joy. Candles were lit on the Christmas tree, lights turned out, presents distributed. Leander got a walking-stick pencil, and a covered wagon, Alec a paper umbrella with a thimble as its tip. When we left, the aunts were still building a castle.

Good inscription for a bedroom, from Iliad VII 482: κοιμήσαντ' ἄρ' ἔπειτα καὶ ὕπνου δῶρον ἔλοντο.

Tea with Konrad and Sheila. Sheila's parents were visiting. The father worked himself up in an insurance office from office boy to a high position, retired recently and was given a six-month trip to the US as a present. Konrad had warned me of the horrible conventionality and unimaginativeness of the man, and this was confirmed. He described his trip in this way: We went from A to B, B to C, C to D, D to E. In E we stayed at the X hotel, and everywhere we went we took Grayline bus tours, since we didn't have much time. In NYC they stayed at the Dixie Hotel in Times Square. They complained of the dirty subway and (what I hadn't expected) of the food. Said they couldn't get a simple meal. They liked American kitchens, and Boston, because the people there, they said, seemed to be pro-British. "On the boat," said Sheila's father, "I did a little reading. A biography. And then I looked at some modern stuff! Well, if that's what they're been writing in the last few years, I haven't missed anything." I could kick myself now for not asking what this revolting book was. Poor Konrad and Sheila were so on edge, having to live with these people, who didn't even have a way with the children. And yet this man was a brilliant success in his work, probably idolized by every office boy even now.

Konrad gave me a 1775 edition of Dr. Johnson's Journey to the Western Isles of Scotland—a delightful and unsuspected gift.

Irita Van Doren, editor of the NY Herald Tribune Book Review, wrote asking me to review Snow's The Search, which is being republished. Snow, it seems, praised my article to her, and this is the result. I'm reading the novel now. It is very second-rate, but can I say that in my review?

I bought Kitto's The Greeks and have read, so far, only the introduction. But what a splendid mind Kitto has, and what a lovely whimsy.

Last summer in NY, with all windows open, a certain radio or phonograph playing Puerto Rican songs at highest pitch became extremely annoying. Sometimes, especially Saturday and Sunday, it went on four or five hours at a stretch. Many people in our building were ready to complain, but it was difficult to tell exactly from where across the street it was coming, as several buildings were Puerto Rican, and the sound was difficult to localize. I had noticed one apartment where an old man sat hours on end at the window, staring absent-mindedly into nothing, and where a man in his thirties, probably the old man's son, often stood on the fire escape, but for shorter periods. Once, while the music was blasting, the man happened to be out on the fire escape while I was walking home, and I asked him if he knew where exactly that music was coming from. He said it was from inside, pointing into his own apartment. I asked if he couldn't make it lower, whereupon he got angry and said he couldn't, asking me where I lived, and saying: "You'd better call a cop!" I saw there was no arguing with him. I felt annoyed at the time, and thought of this man and of the Puerto Ricans in general as barbarians, not subject to thoughts of their neighbors' comfort. But just now the utter desolation of the whole scene has come on me. Here they were, father, son, and probably a large family. They'd lived doubtlessly on a farm, where they'd had space to move in and room to absorb all their noises. Now they were on 121st Street. The father, quite obviously, never left the house. His one recreation was to stare across the street at the dirty gray brick opposite. The son probably worked at some menial job. On weekends, to get some air, he caged himself on the fire escape, also enjoying the lovely view opposite, but glad to get out of his cramped smelly living-room. Both father and son then forgot their present world by having it literally drowned out with romantic Spanish songs played over and over again. And this one escape, one joy, was then challenged by the man across the street!

Argument with Chrysanthi. We haven't argued for ages, it seems. This was over that old problem: family versus work. She had asked me to stay with the children in the afternoon, so she could go shopping. I was delighted to do so, but then, instead of leaving as soon as possible after Leander went to sleep she lingered unnecessarily with Alec, who was also ready for bed. I asked when she was going and she said in an hour. I told her this was unfair, that she should leave immediately, which she did, being chased out, I suppose. This was followed in the evening with further unnecessary encroachments and disturbances while I was reading. I reproached her this morning, and she, as usual, couldn't see what she'd done wrong, and then embarked on the usual complaint that she was a slave and that she would never ask to go out again as obviously I needed my slave 24 hours a day, and that when the children cried I always wanted to close the doors so we wouldn't hear them, and that I never bathed or changed the babies, as all other fathers did, etc. This mixed with tears, of course. Then she refused to eat her breakfast (she enjoys punishing herself further), and has been rushing about the house in a fever of cleanliness. This will blow over soon enough, I know. Actually, in the past few months we have been closer, I think, than ever before, and I think we have actively felt each other's love. Perhaps this is because here in England we are more on our own; perhaps because of the three-months' separation when Chrysanthi and the children go to Greece at the end of March.

We took the train to Avonmouth, a city of workers and factories. What fantastic faces some of the workers have, and how irrevocably separate they are in bearing and dress from the middle class. We couldn't get to the water, as we had hoped, and had to walk and walk until finally we went all the way to Severn Beach, where we climbed up the sea wall and looked across to Wales, shining in the oblique rays of a half-hidden sun.

A PRAYER ON GOING INTO MY HOUSE

God grant a blessing on this tower and cottage
 And on my heirs, if all remain unspoiled,
 No table or chair or stool not simple enough
 For shepherd lads in Galilee, and grant
 That I myself for portions of the year
 May handle nothing and set eyes on nothing
 But what the great and passionate have used
 Throughout so many varying centuries
 We take it for the norm; yet should I dream
 Sinbad the sailor's brought a painted chest,
 Or image, from beyond the Loadstone Mountain,
 That dream is a norm; and should some limb of the Devil
 Destroy the view by cutting down an ash
 That shades the road, or setting up a cottage
 Planned in a government office, shorten his life, Manacle his soul upon the Red Sea bottom.

—Yeats

Fragments from Chrysanthi's family history:

Her father's mother died one year after Dimitrios's birth. His father, Chrysanthi's grandfather, died when Dimitrios was seven. At this age, Dimitrios had to arrange the funeral himself. He loaded the coffin on one side of a doney, putting another box full of stones on the other side, to balance the weight.

Chrysanthi's mother's family were very rich, owning houses, hotels, etc. in Nigrita. There were, besides Magdalene, two brothers and one or two sisters. They all died in the same year, one after the other. One sister, the mother of Aphrodite, Helen, and Mimika, was operated on and making a splendid recovery when, two days before she was due to leave the hospital, she died suddenly for an unknown reason. One brother was operated on for appendicitis, and died on the table. The other died supposedly from alcohol. He had been an entrepreneur, owning several hotels in Nigrita, and other interests nearby, flitting from village to village, always anxious to make more money. Then, for some reason, he lost everything except a small inn, the one whose café he had loved to sit in. He tried to shoot himself several times, then turned to drink. The son of one of these brothers tore down the top of one of the family houses. There were two houses owned by C.'s mother and let to relatives who never paid rent. C.'s mother, furious, preferred to have the house thereafter locked and empty, but vandals got at it, so she decided to rent it to a stranger. Then it was vacant again. This son, at the time, was living in a house in back of it, and his view of the βόλτα was impaired; so, angered by not having been given a rent-free place, he chopped down the top story so, as they say, he could see his girl-friends taking their daily strolls. The other house was destroyed by the village in a street-widening project and a promise was made of another house in a favorable position as a compensation. This was never given. On several occasions, aspiring office-seekers came to Salonika and promised Dimitrios if he voted for them they would see that Magdalene got her promised house and was paid damages for the one chopped away. But Dimitrios, fed up with the whole business, found it wiser not to go to vote at all. Thus it was that although C.'s mother and her family were so rich, and C.'s father and his so poor, that during the war it was her father's inherited vineyards, orchards, and meadows that fed the family, while nothing at all was forthcoming from the mother's side. Also, when a large sum was needed to buy George out of prison, it was the father's properties that were sold.

When George finished his university training he was offered the job of γεωπόνος at Nigrita, but Dimitrios dissuaded him, saying it would be suicide to be among so many relatives, all asking for favors and conferring none. Lola, too, was offered a job at Nigrita teaching, and refused. The teacher would be in almost as bad a position as the agriculturalist, with parents begging and bribing to get their children passed. Chrysanthi laughed at the thought of the kinds of presents brought teachers with this purpose, such as cheese wrapped in an embroidered handkerchief.

In the villages, apparently new headmen, if they want, can destroy all previous public records so that if you own a house or have not the deed in your possession, you're out of luck. The falsification of C.'s birthday is another example of this juggling with records.

I told the story, as much as I knew, of Eugene Girden's father: his basketball betting, nudist camp sympathies, Russian roulette, etc. His "big man" pose; and then being fired from Warner Brothers, no doubt justifiably, after 25 years there; how he bought, probably on borrowed money, a single theater catering to Negroes, in Maryland, and this failing took his Russian roulette pistol and shot himself in the head. And all his brothers, the famous doctors, refused to come to the funeral. I must include also how the five brothers had been such an unusual basketball team and how Jules continually as an adult lived as if he were back in this period of glory.

Leander is so cute. Now, by his decree, the whole family has new names. Leander is Topsy (the name of a dog in one of his books), I'm Lion, Chrysanthi is variously "meeow" or Tiger, and Alec is Angus.

Konrad and Sheila want to spend four weeks in Greece this summer, but must find a way of leaving their children behind. Could we do a similar thing? I don't think so. Is their desire to abandon the children to a stranger in this way a comment on them, or is it connected with the fact that the children are adopted? Perhaps the latter. I seem to feel so little one way or other about my own natural children that I suppose if my sons were adopted ones I wouldn't think twice about leaving them if they stood in the way of a long-cherished vacation. But I wouldn't do it with Leander and Alec.

Tea again yesterday with the Giffords. His father was not there (we had thought he lived with them, but he doesn't, and they seemed very happy about this), but the son, Nick, was home from prep ("public") school: a mousy looking chap interested in making documentary movies. Also there was the teenage daughter of Professor Dickinson, in blue socks and sweater, and a lisp. "The Irish," she said, "seemed so more foreign” than even did the French. English children talk to each other in a remarkably refined way.

Gifford himself seems to me to have very little vitality. Whenever we meet we talk of the same things: the English establishment in literature, its coming disappearance, Gifford’s article on Dr. Zhivago, the excellence of Tomlinson’s poems, the glories of Professor Knights, the Americanization of English life and thought, the shame that English people have to share their language and see it changed (mutilated?) by Americans and others.

Soon after we got back from tea with the Giffords, Denis and Ruth Chorley came unexpectedly and stayed until 11 p.m. He knows his literature very well, it seems, and yet is teaching in a Secondary School, not even a Grammar School, and a class of mentally retarded children who can hardly learn how to read. For him it is just “time-serving” and a way to make money. His real love is antique cars and racing cars. He complained that antique cars were being taken out of Britain by rich Americans. When I suggested that it was a shame for the Elgin Marbles to be separated from the Parthenon, he replied, “Why not bring the Parthenon here?”

My father’s eyesight has again gone bad. He can’t drive at all, he writes. Ethel is chauffeuring him. He is back on drugs, in controlled doses, and is waiting to see if they do any good. He realizes that he may have to give up practice very soon, but says nothing about what he’ll do afterwards. This poses a tremendous problem, as he has no interests that are not basically visual. The same problem would apply to me if I were to go blind. My life seems now to be occupied with only three things: reading, playing the piano, and building at the farm. Without sight, I could do none of these. For me, if I had to choose, it would be plainly wiser to choose loss of hearing rather than of sight.

I got clearer the story of the Yiannakoses during the war. These are some of the things that Chrysanthi told me this afternoon:

Regarding George: He was working as an agriculturalist during the German occupation, and staying out of the resistance movement; indeed, trying simply to carry on as before, without getting involved in politics. His job entailed going from village to village. His troubles started when, as he was walking to a village, two partisans sprang at him, armed, and said they needed paper for their typewriters (they knew he worked in an office and had access to paper and other similar supplies). If he didn't give them what they wanted, they would kill him. They arranged a time, and he gave them the paper. This came somehow to the knowledge of the Germans, who immediately arrested George on a charge of aiding the partisans. There was a trial of sorts. He was asked if he'd given the paper, and he said yes, but that he had no choice, as they would have killed him otherwise. "You should have reported the incident to the police," he was told. He was found guilty, sentenced to death, and taken away to prison. But his sentence was not carried out. He didn't know why at the time, but later realized it was because of the German officer who was commander of the prison. He and George had become friendly, since the officer was by profession an agriculturalist also. The practice at the prison was to kill only a certain number each day, and the officer kept putting George's name at the end of the list. Eventually, this officer helped George get a new trial. Here George was helped by a lawyer and by an official in the Greek government who had been a classmate of Dimitrios's and very indebted to Dimitrios because at school Dimitrios had always whispered the answers to the mathematics questions to him. Also it was a question of money. Dimitrios sold all his lands and vineyards and paid those who had to be paid. The lawyer at this second trial argued George's predicament. If he had gone to the police they would have had to give him protection, which of course they wouldn't have done. Otherwise, since his job took him out on lonely roads to the villages, he surely would have been done off with by the partisans, as a traitor to their cause. Apparently, says C., the Germans took pains to preserve the forms at least of trial procedure when they were dealing with educated people. The jury voted 4 to 3 in favor of death, of upholding the original sentence. Then, somehow—I'm not very clear about this stage—this was commuted to life imprisonment. As soon as the Germans were defeated, George of course was released.

Chrysanthi said that the picture at the end of the war was brought back to her vividly when I recounted what I had read in The Observer of Castro's triumphant march into Havana last week. As soon as the German commander fled Greece, the partisans came down from the mountains, shouting through megaphones: "Stay in your houses. Soon you shall be free, and will see the flag waving from the Λευκός Πύργος." Also, people issued from houses fully armed, hundreds of people whom no one had suspected were involved in the resistance movement at all. The harbor was full of German ships to evacuate the troops. What was amazing was that the partisans did not kill the ordinary German soldiers (though they were out to get certain of the leaders). Chrysanthi remembers peeping through the shutters watching across the street where Kostas's vegetable stand is. Several German soldiers were hiding there, waiting for a chance to get down to the harbor. The partisans discovered them and merely shouted, in German, "Go quickly," letting them off.

When the Germans were gone, the people all came out into the streets, crying, shouting, and watching as the partisans, still coming down from the surrounding mountains, marched in triumph, and while the Greek flag was raised for the first time in so many years. And yet a short while later Greek was killing Greek in civil war.

This is when Odysseas's troubles began. He was a university student and of his clique was the only one who had been for the partisans. (Then, almost all students were from rich families and tended to side with the Germans and make what they could while they had the chance.) All during the occupation, without his family even knowing, Odysseas had been active with the underground in Salonika. Chrysanthi says that he was an almost saintly person, could never hurt a fly even, was naïve, and hitherto had centered his life on soccer. Now he was a lecturer to the partisans. He never actually fought, apparently. When the Germans left, the partisans formed the government and of course Odysseas gladly came out in the open with all his meetings and activities. His friends, meanwhile, were mostly arrested. He went, says Chrysanthi, for each one of them to the partisan authorities and vouched for them, getting them released, though he knew as well as anyone that they had sided with the Germans. But when the partisan government fell, things became dangerous. Policemen were everywhere, arresting people and shooting them. Odysseas came home to tell his mother he'd have to flee, or surely he'd be killed. But no sooner did he get in the house than 15 or 20 police came up. They had been tipped off by a certain Nikos, one of the "friends" whose release Odysseas had secured shortly before. (Nikos, C. says, is now in an insane asylum, God having punished him in this way.) Odysseas broke into the neighbor's apartment and hid behind the bathroom door. The police meanwhile searched the Yiannakoses' apartment, turning it upside down, looking under beds, in the bathroom, opening the trunks, etc. Not finding him, they entered the neighbor's apartment, but apparently weren't so thorough. All the while the poor neighbor, an elderly woman, was nearly scared out of her wits. They left. Odysseas got down to a ground floor apartment (all the people in the house were very good about helping him) and then through the garden to Ευζώνων. The next thing the family heard was that he was hiding out in a garage, dressed as a mechanic, and sleeping under a bus. He was there two weeks, during which time Lola visited him, somehow evading the police. (Lola, Chrysanthi said, was ready to die for both Odysseas and George. It was these events that led to her nervous collapse.) Odysseas was waiting for the partisans to fetch him so he could get across the border to Bulgaria. This was a very risky business, and the partisans wanted to be sure they took nobody who might be a spy for the other side. Probably Odysseas's aid to his friends gave them cause to suspect him. But eventually he was smuggled out successfully. Of course the family only knew that he was gone. They heard various reports by hearsay, quite contradictory ones, some saying he was dead, others that he had escaped. They didn't hear from him directly for ten full years, 1946 to 1956. Chrysanthi's mother was sure he was dead, because for some time before 1956 messages had come from others of the exiled partisans, but not from him. But now of course we know where he is, and have pictures of his wife and children. Chrysanthi's mother says that she cannot really feel sad that he is so far away, because of the miracle that he is alive at all. She is content with this, and glad that he's married.

But his escape did not end the family's troubles. The government was putting the relatives of the partisans in prison. Chrysanthi came home from school one day to find that both her parents had been taken away. Lola, who was still bedridden with her breakdown, had been left. Chrysanthi went to the prison and was put in with the others, but was released after 15 days due to the intervention of Mr. House and of Doreen Gilbertson. Mr. and Ms. Yiannakos were imprisoned for one year and for ½ year respectively on an island in the Dodecanese: Macronisos. The condition of release was, for Dimitrios, that he give a lecture (he being a teacher) to the other prisoners, saying he abhorred communism and disowned his son. This he did, after a year in prison. Magdalene refused, but in three months' time was convinced to do the same, and so they were both free again. But the aged mother of Odysseas's wife was just released last year, after more than ten years in prison!

And Chrysanthi's difficulty in getting a passport was of course also the aftermath of Odysseas's partisan activity. No wonder, poor girl, she hates so to see policemen, even American or British ones. She says she remembers, too, during the Occupation, how the Greek puppet police would come in the middle of the night and she would suddenly be awakened by a flashlight beam shining in her eyes, and asked gruffly, "Where's your gun?" Then the men would look under the pillow, and proceed to Dimitrios. Chrysanthi says she can still hear the sound of the blows they gave him as a way of saying goodbye.

I dreamed of a collection of derelicts—bearded, in tattered clothes, slumped over newspapers—in the lobbies of the New York Public Library, suddenly awakened into animation by a discussion of America's past: Lincoln, Teddy Roosevelt, etc. Strange!

January 23, 1959

I spoke to about twenty people in Dulverton, Somerset, Secondary Model School on young people in America, and was the target of questions, especially shot by the young village rector—e.g., "Why does America fear Russia so?" "Why do the U.S. movies exalt gangsters?" and the like. The program was organized by R. Sowden, the district director of the Somerset Youth Service. I stayed at his house in Minehead, a lovely village built in a crescent around a beach and harbor, with 17th century fishermen's cottages, 19th century hotels, formal gardens, hillside lanes, and a commanding hillside church. Very clean and fresh and pleasant—all. Sowden took me in the morning for a drive over Exmoor, where sheep graze untended and are gathered only for sheering. The moor is a vast high rolling area covered with furze, bracken, heather, with sudden valleys with brooks at the bottom, and steep cliffs covered with greenish-barked trees. Deer and wild ponies are also on the moor, but we didn't see any. We went looking for a hunt, supposed to meet at Tarr Steps. No sign of them, but we saw at least these steps, a prehistoric stone bridge over a stream, nicely done with piers every three feet or so, and flat stones laid across. Sowden told an amusing story of a recent hunt where the hounds had made the kill in the garden of a hotel, which was bad enough, but to make things worse it was a vegetarian hotel.

We saw Dunster castle and village, where you still get the feeling of the medieval system. The castle has been owned and occupied by the same family for 600-odd years, and they still own much of Minehead, as well as most of Dunster itself. Feudalism dies hard.

On the way back I stopped at Taunton, where there is a lovely church tower and a museum in the old castle, containing prehistoric finds.

We had dinner with Ian Michael, wife, and boy and girl. The boy was dressed impeccably in a grey suit, and served the cider without complaining—perfectly behaved. The girl, who was basically ugly, like her big-bosomed mother, complained goodnaturedly of not being allowed to go with a group of friends hosteling in Sweden. She is 15. The mother didn't think it was a good idea. Her daughter wasn't "sensible" enough. Another guest was a colleague of Ian's in the Institute of Education, a middleaged spinster woman. Both she and Ian go about this term observing the practice teaching of their students in outlying grammar schools. Talk centered on her greater ease in doing this since she'd gotten a car, on mileage allowances, and such things. Ian is also doing a study of grammar books from Mulcaster on down, and the influence of Latin methods on English. He seems quite alive and pleasant, and yet is so proper, probably the wife's fault, with her impeccable dinner party and use of her son as butler! And the children went to bed without a murmur, too. Give me cowboys, please.

¶ If Dante had seen a civilisation that understood beatitude only in terms of cinemas and silk stockings and electric cookers and radiators and cars and cocktails, would it have surprised him to find it all of a sudden waking to the realisation that, having pursued these ideas with Working on my translation of Ο τελευταίος πειρασμός.

Our first shock, on arriving here, was to see how poor and slummy the apartment at Σαρανταπόρου 11 seemed. I didn't remember it being so depressing, and thought that perhaps I was seeing it with different eyes than I had in '55. But after we were here a few days we learned the reason: Kostas Sphairopoulos, Lola's husband, had presented an ultimatum a few days before his marriage: either you give me everything or I break the engagement. Then he came to the house and said, "All right, empty out!" The electric stove, beds, carpets, cushions, etc. are now all at Lola's. Our second shock was to learn about this Kostas, that he existed only for money, for climbing the social ladder, that he begrudged any expenditure, not even giving Lola a servant in her first months of motherhood. George, who makes a practice of supporting nearly everyone on his meager income, angrily offered to pay for a girl. Apparently George hates Kostas's guts, and with reason. Indeed, it is pitiful to see Lola, formerly so forceful and dynamic, deliberately being crushed by her husband, so that now she never even argues with him or complains, but simply accepts. When we visited them the other night I could see how they lived. We talked about types of baby carriages. Kostas said he wanted the cheapest possible; Lola said she wanted a large one. Kostas said a large one couldn't fit in the elevator of their new apartment house. Thereafter Lola was simply cut short by her husband, who was nearly yelling "Shut up and listen to me, you slave," whenever she ventured an opinion. I talked with him and was not surprised to hear his pronouncements that life consisted of bettering one's financial position, that he already owned three apartments, that living in the center of the city was good because you saved bus fare, etc. And their new apartment, which they move into next week, was really super-duper. This insane desire for newness! The new apartments here are just like those in New York: shining, of course, but sinfully small. The rooms at Sarantaporou are each twice the size of Lola's.

Our third shock was when we visited Vouli and Demosthenes. This shock was of a different order. It was because of what seemed, to Chrysanthi first and to me after we talked about it, the tragic restriction of their lives. The house was a shop-place rather than a place in which to live. Every item was just so: probably arranged and dusted three times a day. And Vouli's life seemed to revolve around the marital difficulties, by hearsay, of her friends. Chrysanthi felt Vouli had nothing to do, because Greek society tacitly praised having nothing to do, whereas the married lady in America interests herself in so many things, in artful cooking, in social work, politics, courses, etc. I tried to point out that in the end people in both cultures were simply making a desperate effort to pass the time, so they wouldn't be bored, but I agreed that in America one could pass one's time in a more varied way. Then Demosthenes suggested: Πάμε βόλτα. He had a new car. We got in, and he drove us from one end of Εγνατία to the other, then out to Αρετσού and back. This was the βόλτα. It seemed so futile, so inferior in a way to the βόλτα by foot that the car supplanted. But who does not fall for new toys?

Chrysanthi seems made for an Αμερικανίδα and, since she must live in America, it is certainly just as well. As for me, I felt here not the bad things alone but many good ones: the lovely clean, clear air, the sun, the magnificent view of the bay with Olympus across the way, the lovely sailing boats, the housewives singing as they work, the children chattering in the street, the avenues full of people and life, not dead and deserted as in English suburbs. But of course there are also the ugly things such as the beggar we saw today, coming up Sarantaporou in a donkey cart, his feet extended and wrapped in a blanket, his long wiry hair completely wild, his face dirty, black Negroid-looking, his clothes just patches and tatters, calling out: Παράλυτος! Παράλυτος, and waiting.

Saw C's uncle, the father of Ελένη, Μημικά, και Αφροδίτη. Chrysanthi told me what is going on in that family. Eleni is still single; she sews to make a living, and dyes her hair blonde. She and Mimika still live with their father. Mimika is married to a man who repairs damaged automobiles. We met him too: a quiet, nicely dressed fellow with black hair and a reddish mustache, and a gold-capped tooth that protrudes in front of his mouth. He apparently is a model husband and father (they have an infant daughter). Mimika, before, had been looked down upon by everyone as somewhat loose because she changed boyfriends so much. But evidently by doing so she gained the experience and opportunity to choose wisely for her husband. This man lives 100% for the family; he always helps, always accompanies his wife on walks, etc., and he and the old father have become close friends. The husband will never sit to eat, says Chrysanthi, unless ó μπαμπᾶς, is with him. So, they all live under the same roof, in two rooms, and in harmony.

But Aphrodite's situation is entirely the opposite. Her husband, a shoemaker, seems to be a devil indeed. They have two children and live together with the man's old invalid (cancerous) mother, and a cousin. The mother of course has a right to her son's aid, but the cousin appears to be merely a sponger. Because of these two people he has to support, the husband insists that Aphrodite work. She hates her job, hates leaving her children but, as an old-fashioned Greek wife, she cannot lift her voice against her husband. The saddest part is what is happening to the children. The eldest, six years old, boards during the week μέ τόν μπαμπᾶ, Eleni, Mimika, and her husband. Eleni, when she visited us, cried and cried concerning the child's predicament, for it has grown sad, despondent, always calling for its absent mother. When Mimika's husband comes home from work, he goes immediately to his own baby and plays with it, while the other child sadly watches, saying, "Play with me, too, uncle," which he does, but of course more out of pity than love. Aphrodite collects the child on weekends, but because she works out all week her weekends are too full of household chores—cleaning, cooking for the mother and cousin—for her to give much time to the child. She also tries to stop by at μπαμπᾶς's house after work, but she is always rushed because the cranky old mother must be served dinner just on time.

Story: How Chrysanthi built up a picture of her sister's husband (rich, giving her the good life she had always missed, etc.), and the shock to find how miserable Lola is and what Kostas is really like.

Events from Stavroula's point of view. Arrival. Hard work. The American. Attraction. Dejection. Her father's history. Sitting at table ignored. The theatre. Preparations for party. The party. Her desire to help me always, to serve me. . . . Impressions of George and family, of Kostas and family, of the guests, etc.

I bought an electric Turkish coffee-maker (μπρίκι) for the Yiannakoses. Kostas saw it the other day and asked them what they needed that for, and why they bought it. His attitude is that they are ready to die and therefore to buy anything is a waste of money. C. told me that one time he told them it was silly for them to keep this big apartment, that they should come live with him, giving him their pension. He'd feed and clothe them, and they'd have no worries. Mrs. Y. would wash diapers and cook, and Mr. Y., well, he wasn't good for much, but at least he could do the shopping. That way Lola would have a maid and butler dirt cheap!

Disillusion about Efthymoula. After the honeymoon: incident—the pins and the liver. George and the nerve-wracking car. He becomes a chauffeur.

Changes in Salonika. Cafés disappear; human relationships are destroyed, because of the epidemic of new apartment houses.

The party: 40 to 50 people.

The night before, 11 persons sleeping. Mrs. Y. says the house never is too small for good people.

Attitude of the Yiannakoses: They try desperately to keep George from getting a divorce. "All women are the same," they say. "Don't expect anything more. That's life." Their attitude to Kostas's proposal: We'll keep our house, and die all alone, thank you!

Hotel du Genève, 30, Rue du Rocher, Paris

I've been traveling exactly a week now, without having written anything save numerous postcards to Chrysanthi. So: A week ago Sunday we had Leander's birthday party. Phew! The morning was all a frenzy of shifting furniture, putting embroidered covers on chairs and beds, hiding everything unsightly, etc. And what a houseful, even before the guests arrived! Eleven people slept over Saturday night: οι γονείς, Chrysanthi and I, George and Efthymoula, three children, and two maids: Ελευθερία και Σταυρούλα. How sweet it was to see the house so full—the two girls busy in the kitchen with the food, the wives running after, and gossiping about, their children, and the men—well, useless and a bit restless, I suppose. Sunday morning Dimitrios and I went to Floca's for the ice cream. 100 drachmas worth, served in a wooden barrel filled with ice. D. said we'd better go well in advance because although he had ordered the ice cream he was sure—since the restaurant people were Greeks—that it would not be ready. And sure enough we arrived at Floca's to find out that the ice cream was still at the factory! A man was dispatched to fetch it, while we waited and passed the time eating some outrageously expensive patisseries, and drinking Nigrita mineral-water.

Finally, about 5:00 p.m., the children began to arrive, mostly from the street below (they were the only ones we knew). We stuffed them with nut-cake and τριγωνά and cookies and honey-cake and ice cream. Then Leander blew out his three candles and they were obliged to eat birthday cake also. After the candle-blowing, Chrysanthi and the children danced the συρτό while poor Leander, completely bewildered, seemed chiefly interested in the tricycle presented him by his Uncle Kostas. Not knowing how to pedal, he pushed himself forwards and backwards with his feet, generally bumping into everyone and making us all somewhat angry.

George and Efthymoula had already left (more on George later), and we sent the children away with a piece of chocolate—but only then did the chaos begin. People, people—the dressmaker from downstairs, two sets of cousins, complete with screaming children, Aliki and her sister, Lola, Kostas, and child, and more whom I don't remember. Feeling somewhat headachy, I served the ice cream to keep myself busy, and kept finding additional chairs: it seemed there were never enough. At around 7:00 o'clock Leander's crankiness showed how sleepy he was, so we moved the people out of the τζαμαρία but they didn't take the hint and sat instead in the σαλόσι. They sat and sat, and finally left at about 8:30 or 9:00. When the last one had gone, we all crossed ourselves and vowed never to have a party again!

The next day—Monday—I read a little in Ο τελευταίος πειρασμός, packed my things, and took a last walk with Chrysanthi by the sea, Leander trailing behind, hopelessly trying to pedal his new tricycle, but unable to. As usual, he occupied us so that we were hardly able to say a word to each other. Then, to add to our discomfort, we ran into Lola and Kostas at a café. Immediately Kostas began his interminable, importunate invitations: Come to us, why don't you come to us, etc., etc. And Lola and Chrysanthi began talking, of course about children. Βαριέστηκα πια! When we returned to the house it was almost time for my train. At the last moment, Leander saw a folding hanger (for nylon shirts) in my knapsack, took it, and performed his favorite trick: threw it over the balcony. Just as when he threw my Parker pen out of 414, I got furiously angry, and more so because the hanger, unlike the pen, was destroyed. I spanked Leander hard and threw him in his room on his bed, closing his door. All this was a half-hour before my departure. I don't know what Magdalene and Stavroula thought. I sullenly tried to fix the hanger for ten minutes or so, and then had to leave. I said goodbye to Leander as best I could under the circumstances. Magdalene told me it was right to scold the child, but she still was, I think, unhappy about it underneath. I felt extremely bad myself, and told her so, which may have helped. The night before I had explained to Leander while he was in bed, drinking his milk, that I was going away for a long long time and wouldn't see him. I felt very sad, and even cried. He understood in his own way. So on Monday, after the scolding, all I had to do was say goodbye, tell him to be a good boy, etc. I left. I knew I would miss Leander, but I had no emotions one way or the other about leaving Alec. He still to me is primarily a urine, feces and vomit producer, not a human being.

Chrysanthi and I met Dimitrios at the station. In the waiting room, D. saw one of his old pupils, who was seeing another girl off to Munich. We were introduced. We would make παρέα for each other on the trip. On the platform we found a compartment, Chrysanthi making sure that I got a corner seat. D. stayed watching the luggage—purposefully, I think, to leave C. and me alone. We paced the platform a bit, not having very much to say. Then I had to get on the train. I leaned out of the window and Chrysanthi stood below me, trying to smile. I felt awful. I didn't know why I was going away at all! We exchanged συμβουλές, talked a little about what I was to buy in Paris, and a little about how much bigger the children would be when I returned. Chrysanthi was as she always is when she is holding back emotion: quiet, non-communicative. We stood for several minutes saying nothing, not even looking at each other. Then the train started, and as I waved goodbye, leaning out of the window, I saw her face break in two as it does when she cries. «Τι δύσκολο να φύγουμε!» said my new acquaintance, and we were off.

This girl turned out to be a vivacious and cosmopolitan Athenian, apparently with plenty of money. She'd been before to Austria, and was now going for a month to Munich. We shared the compartment with a taxicab owner from a small city in Macedonia who was going to Germany to buy two new cars for his fleet, and with a Greek whose home was in Stockholm: a skilled mechanic in the automobile works there. The taxi driver immediately extolled the American car to me—it was the best car ever, etc. He took out his wallet and proudly produced, instead of his wife & children, him and his Chevrolet, with his other Chevrolet behind it! Lovely, we all said. We were soon joined by a fatish middle-aged man traveling Wagon Lit, apparently an acquaintance of the cab driver. He let us know soon enough that he was an έμπορος, that he came from rags to riches, that he dealt in millions of drachmas—or was it millions of dollars?—and on several occasions he produced a large wad of dollars from his pocket, nonchalantly. We were discussing the black market, the limit on exporting currencies, etc. (the others all having dinars in excess). Thomas (that was the merchant's name) said for a man like him, who dealt in immense sums, it didn't pay to take a chance just to save pennies. He left us, saying that a nice σεβίτσα would be waiting for him in Belgrade, where he did his business! We all laughed (after he'd left) at his middle-aged sexuality.

Rich Greek merchants are really funny. I remember the one also whom we met on our trip two weeks before. How dapper he was, with suede shoes, cuff links, etc. When he found a few of his compatriots he started showing all the things he'd bought, quoting prices, to show how well he'd done. Then, when it came time for the Greek customs inspection, he distributed his cache among seven or eight of us. To me he gave two hats, one for Leander, one for myself, which we promptly declared as "personal effects"!

On this trip also we had an interesting encounter with a Greek train conductor. We traveled in a first class compartment with second class tickets. In Yugoslavia we paid the difference. But it seemed silly to pay from Idomena to Salonika—one hour. Besides, we had only enough drachmas for the taxi home. So we argued with the conductor. He gave in shortly, saying "Poor Greece! Yugoslavia gets the money but Greece doesn't." A quarter of an hour later he returned, sat down, wiped his brow, started admiring the children, produced photographs of his own family, asked me what I did for a living, and when I told him I was a student but that I taught for two hours a day and made do, he was incredulous. "I work all week," he said, "and still haven't enough to live." I felt ashamed at my advantages. Imagine, I'm going on 29 years old and I've never really had to work yet. Is this a blessing or a curse? If a blessing, well, I've made no use of it. I've produced nothing—nothing—nothing! And I just grow lazier and more disillusioned and fidgety every day.

But back to the train to Munich. The four of us, the three Greeks and myself, had a lovely παρέα as far as Belgrade, even sleeping a bit. I was praised as usual for my fluency in Greek, but still I knew that half of what they were saying I couldn't understand. At Belgrade we had to change wagons, and found ourselves with a German teacher of ancient Greek at a gymnasium. He spoke Modern Greek haltingly, so we got along. He was interested in philology. We talked about language and books as best we could, but soon came to Greek vs. Western women! The teacher praised the Greek wife's devotion to her husband, saying this was unknown in modern Germany, whereupon his wife (a German) trumped him by saying "You've been unlucky then, haven't you?" At Ljubljana the taxi driver and the girl paid with their black market dinars for Wagon Lit, so we were four in the compartment. But the poor German, who had immensely long legs, couldn't sleep. He eventually found an empty compartment and moved out.

I slept at about one or two a.m. and was awakened at 5:30 a.m. by the girl, fresh after a night in the Wagon Lit. We were in Salzburg, and since I knew I couldn't sleep any more, I decided to get off. It was nice washing up and shaving in the cold, deserted station. Salzburg is very small, and is nestled beneath sharp cliffs, with a fortress atop one of them and, below it very dramatically, the cathedral square and ducal palace. Buildings, however, rather drab, all gray stucco, and the sculpture in the palace gardens strictly amateurish. How petty these courts must have been! How really very new the Austro-German civilization. There was nothing behind it to produce the excellence of Paris or Rome.

My main desire was to see Mozart's home, which I did. His clavier and piano are preserved, also some letters, programs, etc. It was strange to see these rooms where he studied and composed as a child, and hard to imagine why and how such genius should have appeared precisely there, in that tiny town, no bigger, I think, than say Chestertown (yes, a little bigger, perhaps even double). I was interested to learn also that he had two sons; one at least was a music teacher, and both died without having married. Thus his line ended almost immediately.

Around noon, I took the train for Munich. I found this city disappointing. It has grand monuments, squares, parks, etc., but these cannot compare with those in Paris. In general, Munich seems very American, perhaps because so much of what I saw seems new. The English Garden, famous as it is, did not impress me. But the Frauenkirk did. I entered, never expecting to see the all-white interior, devoid of ornament, with large square columns, and modern stained glass in the apse. The church interior was destroyed in the war, and rebuilt magnificently in this mixture of Gothic soaring with modern cleanness of line and functional simplicity. The trip to Munich was worthwhile solely for this church, but it was made more worthwhile by the Alte Pinakothek. I don't know whether it was the intrinsic merit of the collection or perhaps simply the fact that it has been so long since I've gone leisurely through an art museum, but in any case I was strongly impressed. The collection of Rubens is superb, and there are several lovely somber Rembrandts. I felt more strongly than I have for a long time that art is the only thing in this life that seems to have any rationale, any real raison d'être. As I walked through the rooms, awed by the immense canvases and fascinated by the finesse of the small ones, I marveled at the ingenuity of man. I wanted Chrysanthi, George, Lola, and Dimitrios to be there so I could show them and say "Behold! Did you ever dream that human beings were capable of this?" And still we have wars, and still we are petty and selfish and ridiculous. For shame!

In the evening, because somewhere I'd also gotten the impression that Munich was a wicked city, I decided to go to a nightclub. I entered, and was immediately charged DM 3 to check my coat. I sat down, saw a fat, ugly girl with bare breasts do a hula dance, and was approached with the menu. The cheapest item, a half-bottle of wine, was DM 25. I wisely left. The waiter told me that two floors below was more my speed. I went, sat at the bar and made a beer (DM 2.20) last an hour and a half. There was dancing interspersed with acts: some Spanish dancers, another hula, and bare-breasted girls modeling lingerie. They were all very fat. Too much sausage and beer! This was wicked Munich!

The following day I continued on to Ulm and then to Friedrichshafen on the Bodensee. Ulm immediately strikes one as being much smaller, and in a sense much friendlier and livelier than Munich. It was particularly enjoyable shopping. The girls enjoyed my broken German and did all they could to help me. Of course an unpleasant element for the visitor is the evidence of American occupying forces. A tremendous sign in the Bahnhof reads: "To newly arrived military personnel: How to use German telephones." The cathedral, which was of course my reason for detouring to Ulm, dominates all the other buildings. Indeed, it is advertised as having the highest tower in the world. One is struck by the effect of transparency that the designers of the tower achieved. Besides the filigree that can be seen on most Gothic structures, this was achieved by actually making the tower in vertical segments, so that the blue sky shines through the middle. It is an amazing effect when first seen. Inside, the most distinctive feature seemed to me to be the fan vaulting that was crossed just as it came up from the pedestal.

¶ Et qu'eût-on d'autre part cent belles qualités,
On regarde les gens par leus méchants côtés.
—Molière, Le Misanthrope, I. ii. (lines 355–6).

Le voilà devenu mon plus grand adversaire
Et jamais de son Coeur je n'aurai de pardon,
Pour n'avoir pas trouvé que son sonnet fût bon!
Et les hommes, morbleu! sont faits de cette sorte!
C'est à ces actions que la gloire* les parte!
Voilà la bonne foi, le zèle vertueux,
La justice et l'honneur que l'on trouve chez eux!
Allons, c'est trop souffrir les chagrins qu'on nous forge;
Tirons-nous de ce bois et de ce coupe-gorge.
Puisque entre humains ainsi vous vivez en vrais loups, Traîtres, vous ne m'aurez de ma vie avec vous.

—Ibid., V.i. ll. 1514–1524. *la gloire = la vanité, le sot orgueil.

Ulm, continued: Also, the great Gothic "cap" over the pulpit: this is the perpendicular style carried to its ridiculous extreme. The designer just couldn't stop, so up and up and up he went, almost to the full height of the vaulting itself.

I caught a slow train to Friedrichshafen and talked with a woman who told me she traveled to Greece and Italy the cheap and comfortable way: by reading Goethe! Perhaps she was very wise.

Friedrichshafen is on the Bodensee, which at that point is the border between Germany and Switzerland. It is a simple resort-town, with gardens and a promenade by the water, something like Minehead in West Somerset, but otherwise uninteresting. I stayed in a lovely hotel, however, with fresh flowers on every staircase landing, and a print of a famous portrait on the wall. As it was late, I had a bottle of beer, and went to bed.

The next morning I took the steamer to Switzerland—a beautiful modern boat run by the Deutsche Bundesbahn. I expected to be in the middle of the Alps the minute I landed, but was disappointed, of course, as there are no mountains in the northern part of Switzerland—that is, around Zürich. Zürich, however, I found to be truly lovely. Yes, James Joyce had very good taste in his residences: Trieste, Zürich, Paris. I walked up the winding cobbled streets of the hills, coming upon fountains and little squares, and bookstores, bookstores everywhere! This is what we miss in the new world: in the midst of a bustling city, residential streets, right in the center, that are as quiet as they were in the middle ages, probably quieter. No cars—that makes the difference. And then, of course, the bridge and park where the river empties into the Zürichersee, with rowboats and sailboats and cafés: all this was beautiful, and charming. The Cathedral is a disappointment, but instructive. It was here that Zwingli effected the Swiss part of the Reformation. He was the preacher of the Zürich Dom, and thus the church is a mother-church of Protestantism. And how bare and stark and ugly it is, both inside and out! The Protestant spirit—just as I saw it in Holland, in the Zutphen Cathedral, where all the decoration had been removed or whitewashed over. Just drabness, not even luxuriating in whiteness and simplicity, as in the new Frauenkirk of München. But the Swiss, judging from the automobiles and shop windows of Zürich (wonderful furniture!) have taken advantage of the Protestant virtues, and produced—produced a high standard of living! Thank you, they can have it (say I, who live parasitically on our own high standard and never tire of condemning it).

I walked and walked, up and down the steep streets, until I was quite tired out, and then took the train for Basle. I had my supper in the park as dusk was falling, then went to a Bridget Bardot movie whose main attraction was about 30 seconds of her dancing with a naked behind. I returned to the station, to find it mobbed with English school-children on a “Swann’s Tour.” I despaired of being able to lie down, and was correct in my fears, as I traveled all night to Paris with the compartment full up.

I arrived Saturday morning, found a cheap hotel room (800 Fr.) and went immediately to the Bibliothèque Nationale, only to find that the following Monday it would close for two weeks! I got my ticket anyway, for all I wanted, really, was to see the early editions of Montaigne and Rabelais, which could be done in a few hours. I found, however, that the First Editions were in the Réserve—the rare-book collection—and that I would have to justify my need for seeing them. So I had to content myself with a lovely 1595 folio of Montaigne, and two earlier, and of course incomplete, volumes of the Essais: 1582 and 1588.

In the afternoon I went to the Concert Mayol. This is something that I think must be unique to Paris. Not that striptease and nudity do not exist elsewhere, but that somehow, though extremely sexy, the Mayol show has nothing of the risqué feeling about it, nothing of the underground or underworld. To begin with, instead of being some den, it is simply a theatre like any other, and with reasonable prices. You don't feel that you are paying for pornography. You are simply paying to see a musical show. It is all so taken for granted, so accepted! In the lobby, a woman sells kodachrome slides of the stars, just as though she were selling chocolates. And the audience is like any other audience, with almost as many women as men. The effect of cleanliness comes, probably, from the absolute nudity of the girls. There is much more strip than tease. True, every possible type and variation of disrobing was presented: the hot, mysterious type, the jocular, the satirical, etc., but the disrobing was always relatively quick, leaving a glorious woman standing or dancing in the raw. Of course there was quite enough provocation, besides the nudity itself: bumps and grinds, one act where the girl rubbed herself against a post, writhing as in the sexual act, another where the danseuse bent over, her naked behind toward the audience, placed both her hands between her legs and caressed her crotch and buttocks, and still another where the girl knelt backwards and slowly pulled a drape over her vagina. But despite this, the net effect was more purgative than excitative, perhaps because of the saturation of nudity: one act after the next, all variations (and clever ones—human ingenuity can express itself even here!) on one theme. Certainly every city should have a theatre like this. It is so much better than the clandestine pornography of New York, with so many magazines like Playboy and the imitations with their cheap stories of some conquest described in detail. A young man, or an old man, seeing such stuff wants to masturbate, whereas someone seeing the Concert Mayol comes away with the feeling that the naked woman is a beautiful—a miraculously beautiful—creature, something to be revered.

Saturday night I had a delicious sleep, recovering from my train-ride of the previous night. In the morning, Sunday, I read some cantos of the Inferno in the park nearby (Place Henri Bergson), and somehow lost my packet of cards with poems of Yeats, Hopkins, passages from Dante, etc. In the afternoon I went to the Bois de Boulogne. It was a brilliantly sunny, hot day, and all of Paris was there: kissing couples, young teen-aged boys walking arm-in-arm, families having a picnic, tired husbands sleeping on a blanket. Paris is all it is said to be: everywhere beautiful, full of life and activity, fabulously rich in culture and entertainment, and good food!

Monday morning I spent reading Stendhal in the Arsenal Bibliothèque. Then I walked along the Seine, stopped in at Notre Dame, and then went to the Louvre. What I liked best in Notre Dame was the Ambulatory, and also the Choir with its fantastic stalls and decorations. Three ancient priests, all with white beards, entered and were reading their missals preparatory to a service. In the Louvre I was delighted to see Da Vinci's "La Verge aux rochers," which I didn't remember having seen there before. Really, visits to museums are worthwhile if we find one picture we really like—indeed it is exciting to have one or two favorites in each museum and to keep coming back to see them over and over, as I do with the unfinished Michelangelo in London. This Da Vinci painting is superb beyond description, especially the way he paints the light on the flesh: not realistically at all, but with an exaggerated melodramatic quality also present in Michelangelo. It is as though the light were in its essence, not the slightest bit different or hazed as in real life. How unbelievably splendid it would be to have such a painting in one's home! Do people paint like that nowadays? Is it really true—what is so easily said—that everything was better two and three and four centuries ago? Why? We should be able to do the same—perhaps even better. (I am tired out with the scholarly attention to the past, in literature, architecture, and everywhere. Why don't we give more energy to creating now, ourselves, and less to what went before? But the past offers a living to professors and booksellers and tourist agents. I suppose it will offer a living to me as well!)

Tuesday I read Molière's Le Misanthrope preparatory to seeing it at the Comédie Française on Thursday. I shall also see Andromaque (Racine) and Le Malade Imaginaire, and must try to read them all.

This brings me up to date. It remains to say why I am taking this trip, and the answer is, really I do not know. Should I not have stayed another week at least in Salonika? I have no stick-to-itiveness anymore. Instead of wishing to learn one language well—Greek—and taking advantage of every day, every hour, of possible sojourn in Greece, I find myself wanting to speak German, French, and Italian all at once. But how can a tourist speak a language except the bare minimum in offices and stores? My idea of staying at a pension in München overlooked the reality that they were all filled up! But I must say, I am enjoying Paris, although I do feel that I must constantly keep asking myself, What should I do now? How can I pass the time? — almost like the clowns in Waiting for Godot. I miss Chrysanthi very much at times, not because I feel lonely—if any person is used to loneliness it is I—but because I feel I want to share everything with her. I feel that what I am seeing is somehow being wasted on me; I have seen it all before. She would find so much pleasure in living the way I am living (for a short while). Well, of course with the children this is impossible; she couldn't be free even if she were here. I also grudge spending so much money—and I know this is wrong. When I tell myself, as I have to several times a day, that now is the opportunity, now is the time the money should be spent if it can somehow enrich one's life (what does that mean?), I feel better.

Of course this year I constantly feel that I don't know why I do anything. I certainly have very little enthusiasm left for my studies. Scholarship and professors seem such a sham, really, so parasitic, so really unimportant, and by contrast so abnormally important in their own eyes. The only thing that is important is the literature itself—art, creation—and here I have spent four years desultorily reading and trying to remember who wrote what, without having written a thing myself. I don't really have the will, the burning desire to practice, to master, a craft. I am so afraid of failure: I want the first thing I do to be acclaimed and admired, and yet I don't even have the patience to rewrite. Even this translation of the first three chapters of Ο τελευταίος πειρασμός is hasty, lazy. I'm sure Cassirer will reject it.

I received a lovely letter from Chrysanthi. She is so absolutely good—good in herself, good for me. Sometimes I cannot believe I was able to find such a perfect wife! Certainly in this I am extremely lucky, and I am conscious of this at this time because I am reading Tolstoy's fantastic "Kreutzer Sonata" and don't agree with his point of view at all. Nevertheless, much he says is true, and above all, he can write (even in the French translation).

This afternoon I saw Racine's Andromaque at the Comédie Française. When I read it the other day I wasn't too impressed, but seeing it is an entirely different matter. One really understands how very much depends on the actor. Well, the actors here were superb, and the drama became (even for me, who understood so little of it) intensely gripping. It was the closest I've seen to the purity of the Greek tragedy, and it had perhaps a greater intensity because completely unrelieved by humor (messengers, etc.) or by the digressions of a chorus. It was also intensely human; the problems presented were those that can be encountered any day and in any place, and not only in fabulous antiquity. Each character was driven by forces beyond his control. Orestes, for instance, had little choice whether or not to demand Astyanax, for he (Orestes) was acting in a public capacity. He could of course have renounced his ambassadorship, which actually is what happens in effect at the end when the Erinyes destroy his sanity. But in those days (and in ours, except in "select circles") the state as an organism came first, and perhaps rightly so. The English-American insistence on individual freedom of conscience is probably ultimately based on the security of their bodies politic. It's harder to be a C.O. in France—clearly.

The audience at the Comédie Française was a young one: well-to-do teenagers and younger. They looked so sweet, so brushed and superbly dressed, and quite different from the French people one sees on the streets.

Noontime in the park I saw a man in one of those wheelchairs that the occupant can propel by raising a lowering a bar. He came into the park with a girl. She sat down on a bench and then he, still in the chair, made love to her: they embraced passionately as best they could, all the while I was eating lunch.

This morning, Rodin Museum. His portrait of Balzac is immense.

How shocking it must have been to the Academicians. His great patriotic statue with Miss France is also a successful defiance of tradition, less daring than the Balzac. Miss France has the vitality of a Michelangelo figure.

I sent George a copy of Brave New World (in French). I had thought to send him "The Kreutzer Sonata" but decided that this would have been unfair.

Lovely verses in the interlude between acts II and III of Le Malade Imaginaire:

Profitez du printemps
     De vos beaux ans,
 Aimable jeunesse;
 Profitez du printemps
     De vos beaux ans,
 Donner-vous à la tendresse.
 Les plaisirs les plus charmants,
     Sans l'amoureuse flame,
     Pour contenter une âme
 N'ont point d'attraits assez puissants.
     Profitez du printemps . . . etc.
 Ne perdez point ces précieux moments;
     La beauté passé
     Le temps l'efface,
     L'âge de glace
     Vient à sa place,
 Qui nous ôte le goût de ces doux passe-temps.

April 11, 1959

I saw Molière's Le Misanthrope. It was wonderful the way the hero burst onto the stage from the very first full of his distinctive anger and righteousness. The play goes deep, for here is a man who undoubtedly is right, who undoubtedly stands alone in a world of hypocrites and flatterers, and yet he is obviously also a figure of ridicule (at least Molière means him to be) because he is completely dominated by this one "humour" so that, in a sense, he is just as blind as the men he condemns. The scene of the sonnet was most delightful.

I also saw Rameau's Les Indes Gallantes, a great "spectacle" complete with singing, ballet, recitations, and scenic effects such as an earthquake, a storm at sea, angels descending from heaven, angels ascending from the floor, cupids with their bows (boy dancers), the Taj Mahal, the desert, leopards, etc., etc., etc. It was, to an extreme, the gratification of the French love for elegance, for the "tableau" and the spectacle. Otherwise, the music, though splendid, was unvaried in rhythm and feeling: too rococo all the way, or baroque. The choreography also, probably because of the stateliness of the music, could never become unstately enough to be really exciting. The goal was elegance, not virtuosity.

This spectacle was held in the appropriate place, the Paris opera house, which is pure elaboration, all gold and filigree, but beautiful and most impressive. I particularly admired the portion of the ceiling that is done completely in mosaics. As I promenaded in the great hall during intermission, I thought what a really democratic world this is. Here I was, here anyone could be, simply for paying 600 francs, in a setting too good even for kings. But all this elegance is perhaps after all stupefying in the end. Once you start elaborating a scheme of decoration in this way, there is simply no stopping, and the net effect is perhaps one of excess, as in the pulpit-hood at Ulm.

I read Le Malade Imaginaire with laughter and imagination, thinking how much better it is, in the same or similar genre, than Milton's Comus.

I saw a film called "Les Strip-Girls," billed with photographs of girls in varying states of undress. How absolutely deceptive this billing was, and how dishonest a capitalization of sex. Certainly, these scenes were in the film, but only a small part. The ludicrous element was that the film was meant to show (and did so) the sordidness of this life of demi-mondaines: strip-girls, semi-prostitutes, "hostesses" at cabarets, etc. A country lass gets drawn into this life because of her naïveté, and escapes it to marry a wholesome man! But the billing capitalized on the very element that the purpose of the film was to denigrate. This was really what Lawrence calls "doing dirt on sex." The European movies seem to be doing this more and more: inserting artificially a so-called sexy scene or a nudity scene, quite unnecessary to the film, in order to be able to use this in the billing, and to attract the public. And the public, as I suppose in all ages, is never satiated with pornography and at the same time, as far as I can judge by my own reactions, never thrilled by it. Certainly the scenes in this film gave me no pleasurable sexual sensation—indeed no sensation at all. Perhaps it is that we really are satiated with all the pornography we see. There is nothing new or exciting now in viewing a naked breast or behind. And yet the public always goes with the hope, the expectation, that something more exciting will be offered. Here is the making of the decadence that we saw in Huysmans and Wilde (Dorian Gray), where the satiated aesthete must search for ever-more unusual stimulation. I, for one, certainly felt very strongly the vanity and uselessness of this kind of “pleasure,” although I felt (and as perhaps a rationale for this trip) that I must “live” more, experience life, know sordid things, etc. I conclude, after my nightclub in München and this film and the Concert Mayol, that I much prefer my usual pleasures: reading and playing the piano. All the while I have been in Paris, seeing so many things, the thing I have enjoyed most by far, the one thing that has really drawn me to it, is my reading of “The Kreutzer Sonata.” But perhaps all this “experience” is good simply to understand why sensitive men in all ages have fought and sweated to withdraw, how even (which seems so repugnant to us at first) they crave celibacy, purity, a life free from pornography and temptation. I think, however, one must thoroughly wallow in the sins of the flesh before he has become a really honest celibate. I, however, decidedly choose the Third Order, the life of the flesh within the family. Yes, I miss Chrysanthi very much indeed!

Stavroula’s father was the youngest child of a large family that set off from Greece to go to America. At the station he stopped to get a drink of water, and the train departed, leaving him behind. Fantastic, but she swears it is true. Can one imagine the feelings of the parents, of the child, of the onlookers? He was of course then without family, home, or village. He wandered, found work as a day laborer, eventually settled in a village and bought his own farm.

We wanted Stavroula to go out and enjoy herself, even just to take the children for a walk. But she refused, saying she couldn’t go out of the house unaccompanied since she was of marriageable age.

When she arrived from the station I shook hands with her. I remember how sweaty and clammy her hand was.

She arrived early in the morning and worked immediately and continually until late at night, washing all the diapers, preparing the meal, etc. Then we had to put her to sleep with Alec, and he of course woke up several times. This continued for a week or so, Stavroula working and working, no sleeping nights, and never once setting foot outside of the apartment. At meals sometimes we exchanged no conversation at all with her, not of course from haughtiness, far from it, but simply because there was nothing to say. (We often spoke very little even among ourselves.) How could she have felt at the end of this week? On top of it all she got a touch of flu: headache, shivers, etc. Finally we took her to the theatre and to a café for a glass of wine. I felt delighted to hear her laugh heartily at the show. We also changed her bed, put it in the salon: less private, but less noisy.

I enjoyed the way she called Dimitrios Θείος and Magdalene Θεία.

I felt that she found me very interesting. I was a phenomenon, probably the first American she'd ever seen (her father had never heard again from any of his family in the States). She also enjoyed, I think, my broken Greek. I noticed when the other girl came—Eleftheria—Stavroula brought her to the kitchen door while I was talking to George, in order to see the sight. And she always wanted to do everything for me. At table, if I suggested to Chrysanthi that we have a cup of coffee, Stavroula immediately would jump up to get me a spoon. She even, I think, once tried to help me on with my coat. But I protested. Could there have been a sexual attraction? I don't know. Certainly she was attractive to me. Her face wasn't pretty but it was very delicate—somewhat oriental, even Indian-looking, with fine earrings as accentuation. And she always wore a tight bodice that made her lovely indeed. I always felt a certain—a great—tenderness when I was near her, perhaps what one feels more toward a child or a dog than toward a mistress. But there was also, I felt, a conscious effort on both our parts not to have our eyes meet, as though we knew we would blush if they did, and we were ashamed. It was a lovely feeling: this complete warmth and attachment between two people, yet unspoken, unexpressed. Could it have remained this way? I think of the case of Riek Kleefstra. We started similarly and all was fine until she asked me to kiss her. Can a similar tenderness exist between friends (married people are in a different category: their tenderness can persist because they have more at stake than just their two selves)—between friends who have had a physical contact? It seems a “law” that this leads eventually to recriminations, tragedy, jealousy, despair, and all the rest. Perhaps this is why the Middle Ages tended to idealize the period before the first kiss and built all its poetry around this initial sexual, but aphysical, tenderness.

My very first impression of the Cathedral of Chartres was one of disappointment. It lacked the spectacular feeling of Wells, the sinewy length of Salisbury, the Gothic soaring of Ulm, the flowery decorativeness of Notre Dame. It seemed plain and somewhat decrepid. I soon understood, however, that the glory of Chartres is not in its architecture proper (although I suppose this would be disputed—experts point to the superb proportions, the technical feat of having so much window space, the near-suppression of the gallery above the main arches, etc.)—not so much in the architecture proper as in the decoration: the windows and the sculpture. The series of sculptured scenes around the Ambulatory are most impressive, as are the figures of saints and prophets at the West front and the north and south porches: their elongated, spiritualized bodies, the simple flow of their robes, the suffering yet ecstatic expression on their faces. Yet the stained glass is, I think, the chief feature. First of all, there is the sheer amount of it, more than in most other cathedrals, although there is no great tour de force like the great window of Gloucester. Secondly is the fact that almost all the windows have been preserved intact since their construction in the thirteenth century. The three rose-windows, petals of light against the blackness, are more like jewels than flowers: emeralds gleaming on a card of velvet. Then, around the apse, a great series of windows, each more perfect than the last; and above, along the whole length of the nave, and the four side-walls of the transepts, more and more. Of course, from the distance one can hardly see these windows in their detail, but the reproductions available (I bought five) indicate the quality of each figure, each scene. The use of colors, the design of the figures, etc. struck me as very close to that of modern painting: a subordination of “realism” to the demands of design—both the overall design of the window as a whole and the individual design of each particular scene.

Chartres itself is a pleasant contrast to bustling Paris (just as Ulm is to Munich). It is a charming, quiet, medieval looking town, with market squares, many green patches, old houses leaning over with fatigue, and above it all, the two asymmetrical towers of the cathedral.

I returned in an omnibus train packed with Saturday crowds coming to Paris. And what faces: an old, white-haired farmer resembling Harold Carman or Carl Sandburg, the back of his neck baked and cracked from the sun; a funny looking man in a beret, with big nose and dark beard; a dapper man-about-town, dressed to kill in the worst taste, his tie just right in his immaculate collar, but his two-toned shoes in need of a shine; a lady in furs and black gloves, powdered and rouged, obviously unhappy amongst all the rabble; four Algerians (I think, or gypsies perhaps); workmen, in thick leather pants and turtle-necked sweaters, with gnarled, filthy hands and dark, long, sad faces; they counted their money, read over the papers in their pockets; and old red-faced man with white hair who spent five minutes methodically opening a box of lozenges; a very old man, eightyish and talkative, who spoke to a young soldier the whole trip—a one-way conversation, the soldier obviously wishing to extricate himself but unable to; a half-pretty girl with lipstick matching her sweater and gloves, powdered with infinite care—in ten years she'll be fat and ugly. One of the Algerians, in counting his money, dropped some coins on the floor. He recovered most of them, but one piece, I think of 5 francs, rolled behind a valise so he couldn't see it, though I could. I was ready to get up and give it to him or show it to him, but then I thought he'd probably find it sooner or later, and for some reason I was afraid and I sat still. Eventually he closed his purse and got off the train, but by that time the valise had been moved and the coin pushed somewhere, so it was no longer visible at all.

Robin and Elizabeth had an argument, each one being too stubborn to give in. E. moved her library position to be away from R., refused to come to tea, sitting by herself in the corner, etc. Today Karl Stead came down from London. We all went to the park for lunch, and could find only one small bench empty. Karl, to be funny, sat on E's lap, trying to liven her up. She, to be cruel, got up from under him and insisted she sit on his lap, while Robin, standing by, was of course meant to be—and was—infuriated.

Sunday. I did ten pages of translation. A record!

Last evening we had another musicale at Becky's. Robin, Becky, and Elizabeth sang. We did one thing that I found marvelously beautiful: Byrd's Mass for 3 voices. The opening Kyrie seems perfection indeed. Its beauty hits you, slaps you in the face, and it's only a few bars long, over hardly before it begins.

Toward the end of Lindsay's reign at the School a new interpreter came, a widow, and L. fell in love with her. From what reports Chrysanthi has, he did not even try to hide this affaire, but was always with her, used for instance to take the car from Yiannis and go off with her, not returning until 2 or 3 in the morning. He spent a great deal of money on her. Once Vouli was in an expensive hat shop when the widow entered. She saw a hat for 500 dr. and said, wait a moment, I must get the money. She stepped outside to a waiting car, and Vouli saw that L. was inside. Then the widow returned with the money. L. also made her dress sexily. Once, she appeared somewhere in tight bodice and tight slacks. She was told "You ought to know better than to dress like that in Greece." "I can't help it," she said. "My man forces me to dress like this." All the time Muriel was of course fully aware of the whole business, and took the opportunity to act in a Christian way, saying she cared only for Charles, and if this affaire made him happy, well, one couldn't control one's heart. Μπράβο της ! Sooner or later the London Quakers got wind of everything and rushed Jones, who was slated to take over, out several weeks earlier than originally scheduled. L. asked the widow to follow him to England but she refused, out of consideration probably for Muriel and the children. Lindsay had to agree. Before he left he took her with him to a bank and used his influence to get her a job, or rather forced them to give her a good job. After L. left, one day little bits of paper were pinned up everywhere and passed around among the staff, and no doubt the students also: Πάρετε «Εικόνες»! Apparently the widow had written a letter to the "Problems" column of «Εικόνες» anonymously, of course, but obviously describing exactly what had happened: that she'd fallen in love with a foreigner who had a devoted wife and children, etc., that he asked her to follow him. What should she do? The answer was something to the effect that of course she should not break up the family, and although one could not outrightly condemn her actions, because the ways of love know no rules or restraints, one thing was 100% sure: that the man's wife acted superbly.

Well, the Lindsays returned to England and Charles was made Warden of the Quaker Centre in Oxford on St Giles. Soon after, he took sick. He had cancer. How could Muriel have felt, seeing him dying, and yet knowing that his love was for this other woman? She, of course, in her super-Christian way, showed no resentment and apparently cared for him night and day for the nine weeks of the illness that resulted in his death. Seeing this, he repented, admitted his folly, and reaffirmed his love for Muriel, his gratitude, etc. Muriel wrote to the Joneses afterwards that she had never felt so close to Charles as during those last nine weeks.

Chrysanthi says that his sick-room was like a flower shop, with flowers and telegrams pouring in daily from archbishops, consuls, ambassadors, professors, and the like. He died in his glory.

Chrysanthi hears from the staff the strange statement that Lindsay's reign was the golden age of the School (this seems incredible, when one remembers how they all hated him while he was there). They say the new man, Jones, had no qualifications at all for directing a school; he has no ideas, he can't talk in public, etc., and he's από Σκοτεία, whereas Lindsay, for all his nervousness, was at least vigorous and extremely quick-witted, and solicitous of the staff. He, for instance, would drive them to the depot on their days off, but Jones refuses, saying if there is no convenient bus going from the Farm School, well, it's too bad; they'll have to walk. On the other hand, they say, he uses the school car and the school money to drive his own children to school every morning. Note also that he sends his children to the special Anglo-American primary school whereas Lindsay sent Angus and Adam to the Greek school.

Yesterday we went to Mycenae by bus along the Saronic Gulf and over the Corinth Canal. Mycenae sits between two horribly stern and bare mountains, commanding a view of the plain and the surrounding mountains and sea that is breathtaking in its magnificence. The remains of the Acropolis are few, mostly foundations and grave holes, but the finds in jewelry, etc. were startling. We saw all those in the Athens museum the day before. Most impressive were the three beehive tombs, great underground domes in the shape of a beehive, built up with squared stones and approached by an avenue leading to an impressive entranceway. What ecstasy Schliemann must have felt when he discovered these treasures!

We ate in the government tourist περίπτερο and paid 120 dr. for a good but scanty meal. Must warn Konrad Elsdén against this. Returning, stopped at Daphni to see the scowling, angry, ugly and magnificent face of Christ on the mosaic of the tholos. Then to Piraeus for a stroll and dinner in a restaurant on the waterfront, full of sailors: delicious fish. I felt like Kazantzakis's capitalist and expected any moment to encounter Alexis Zorbas. The waiter, a young fellow, very jovial and vocal, shouted out each order with glee: Δύο σαλάτες, μάστορε. Everything μάστορε! Chrysanthi talked to me intently and at length, and I apparently was gazing longingly into her eyes, because I noticed one of the diners wink at the waiter and imitate those eyes γουρλημένα, as though to say, Αχ! η αγάπη. Να τους!

The other night we visited Mary Heath in Κηφισιά, a fashionable suburb on the slopes of Πεντέλης, with gorgeous villas and gardens, all rented to Americans! We overheard one American cussing out a Greek for some reason; he had bumped his car or something. I felt very ashamed at the almost automatic “master-race” attitude taken by these, our “diplomats” in small, weak “backward” countries. Mary's reception of us did not seem very warmhearted and C. felt quite angry. Then we went to Mary's fat friend whom we'd met in Brooklyn, and this was even worse. No warmth, and hardly any politeness. We talked with them a bit. The girl wanted to stay in Greece because she could work and pay a maid here to take care of her child, whereas in the U.S. she had to take care of her child herself! The boy, on the other hand, wanted to return to the U.S., the land of opportunity.

There seems to be a great traffic of people—young people—who've lived in the U.S. for a while and then have returned to Greece with their pockets full, and they lounge around and gradually get bored and decide to go back again to Brooklyn or Detroit. It seems they spend their time stopping Americans on the street and telling them that they've lived in the U.S. and plan to go back soon. Life isn't good in Greece, etc. I came across the same thing in Italy.

Visited Demosthenes, who is recovering from a heart attack. There were two other visitors there, one a gynecologist, very clever and philosophical, the other D.'s cousin, a merchant, and quite dim, even a little μισοπαλαβός. The conversation flourished between D., the doctor, and me, with the merchant dead silent. Then the παμπόνηρος doctor asked the merchant perhaps the only question that could rouse him: Τι είχες να φας το μεσημέρι, καλέ; The merchant, without the slightest feeling that he was being teased or mocked, jumped up and started to describe his meal, which was liberally seasoned with ούζο.

Here is a passage that I think I translated rather felicitously (pp. 257–8):

¶ Καταγκρεμίζονταν στο λογισμό ετούτον, ώρες. Ο ήλιος ανέβαινε, πυρπολούσε τον άμμο, τρυπούσε το απανωκαύκαλο του Ιησού, έμπαινε μέσα του και ξέβαινε το μυαλό του, το λαιμό του, το στήθος. Κρέμουνταν τα σωθικά του, σαν τ' αποτσάμπουρα στο αμπέλι, το χυνόπωρο. Η γλώσσα του είχε κολλήσει στον ουρανό του, το δέρμα ξεφλούδιζε, τα κόκκαλά του πρόβαιναν· τ' ακροδάχτυλά του είχαν γίνει κατάμπλαβα.

¶ He was plunged in this thought for hours. The sun came up, set the sand on fire; it pierced Jesus' scalp, went inside him and parched his mind, throat and breast. His entrails were suspended like bunches of leftover grapes after the autumn vintage. His tongue had stuck to his palate, his skin was peeling off, his bones emerging; and his fingertips had turned completely blue.

Chrysanthi and I became godparents today to Νικόλαος Σφαιρόπουλος. Chrysanthi did all the work at the baptism; I took pictures.

The christening was the occasion for more troubles with Efthymoula, who refused to come at the last minute. We had troubles with her the whole weekend. George came Saturday evening and first thing I warned him that Alec might be sick with measles and that his child, Dimitraki, would naturally be exposed. To me, it seemed nothing to worry about—indeed, a chance to get gamma globulin and have measles in the mildest possible form. But Efthymoula exploded: Why did we expose her darling, why didn't we telegraph them not to come, why did we come near Dimitraki, because the disease was contagious at second and third hand. In vain did we argue with her. Chrysanthi got furious and left the room, George went to bed with a headache. In the middle of the night I heard her screaming at him, but then he hushed her, afraid we'd all overhear, and I couldn't catch what she was saying. But I can imagine because she also screamed to Chrysanthi that George didn't care if her baby got sick, etc., etc., didn't do anything to help her, and she was so tired with all her jobs, etc., etc. Chrysanthi replied that she, Efthymoula, had the best husband in the world; he did everything for her, including becoming her chauffeur; that maybe she had some faults herself, etc. Well, on Sunday morning, today, the doctor came and told us after all that it wasn't measles but a very mild contagious infection. That helped a bit. We had all gone to the beach earlier. Efthymoula didn't want to go, but Chrysanthi convinced her, feeling if she stayed home she'd have more basis for complaining that George neglected her and the child. She came, sat in the shade with the child the whole time, not even taking off his shirt. Then she dragged us back early, because Dimitraki had to be exactly on schedule for eating and sleeping. It was when we returned that the doctor came. Efthymoula asked, of course, if her own child would catch the disease and the doctor was non-committal. Then Efthymoula asked if children one year old should be put in the ocean. I was delighted to hear the doctor answer Yes, of course, why not? Poor child! She doesn't even let him crawl on the ground. He sits with sullen expression and drooping head with none of the liveliness and devilishness of our Alec, who is the same age exactly.

Back to the baptism. We gave her invitations to be delivered to her brothers, and now Chrysanthi tells me that she tore them up. George drove us all to the church—a car-full—, left us, and returned for Efthymoula, but returned to Lola's alone, Efthymoula having refused to come. Chrysanthi says she couldn't find an elastic to fix the child's bloomers just as she wanted, but this may be a little bit of female exaggeration. In any case, it was a great insult to us all because, as Chrysanthi's mother put it, she completely lacks σεβασμός for the Yiannakoses, while at the same time eating their food and ordering the whole house around. But she can't go to her own mother because the two of them are constantly arguing. She is, as we say, a sad case. But what can they do? The Yiannakoses don't talk back to her or scold her; they take everything lying down because they're afraid—rightly—that anything they say will in the end only devolve on George. Poor George, after suffering so much in the war, and longing for marriage, dreaming of a household and children of his own, finally marrying at such an advanced age: to end up like this, with a real bitch!

Chrysanthi had it out with Kostas, telling him that the 6000 dr. were a loan, not a gift, and the money that she had worked so hard for—and that she had paid all her life for her sister, her tuition, etc., and had never kept a λεπτό of her salary for herself except this sum, which she wished her parents to have. Kostas replied that everything Mrs. Yiannakou had told Chrysanthi about him was a lie, that he would never speak to his mother-in-law again, would not even come to her grave! If C. was hard up, he could let her have one or two thousand, but as for the 6000, it was a gift: that was why he had felt obligated to give C. the fur coat and now, the ring. C. resolved to give the ring back, and to send the coat back from America, since it had gone off with the trunks.

C. told her parents about the argument but they took their usual position: Leave well enough alone. Don't stir up any more trouble.

George told us at the beach how his parents really feel that when we leave tomorrow it will be the last time they ever see us. They both thrived wonderfully during our visit, forgot about their aches and pains, became young again, especially Mr. Yiannakos, who played indefatigably all day long with Leander, taking him to the swings in the morning, to the RR station in the evening, etc.

Another nice Kazantzakis passage: the last paragraph of Chapter XX.

Riparius

I accidentally chipped off Roy Millington's front tooth—his best apple-eating tooth—while we were sawing wood. Took him to Dr. White in Chestertown, who put on a cap and hopes the tooth can be saved.

Saw Nick Millington again. He lost his arm in the sawmill, now has a hook, and a twitch in the left shoulder where the straps are. He's given up his cement-ceramics and is now trying to teach himself to be an artist. He gets $145 per month from the government, so is fine that way. He mixes his own colors, and has seen great improvement, so he says, over the past year. He has hopes of going to NY and entering a school. He always talks of his cosmopolitan experience. I don't know if it's all through his [illegible] or not—his knowledge of French and German, his experience in Europe, etc.

I saw Alvin Millington yesterday, too. He's a virile looking chap, much younger than I'd thought, with a prize-fighter's nose and a scant beard. His project now is making his own bullets and loading used shells with them. He has elaborate molds and precision machinery on this, and says he saves about 80% of the cost of new bullets.

The Millingtons need to move from across the way because Carman lied to them, saying he'd sold their place to two families, one of which was going to occupy the blacksmith's shop, where the Millingtons now live—when in actuality he hasn't sold the place at all yet, but has received a deposit from one family, which will come only in the summer and live in the lower house. But, as Hal says, it was a good way to get rid of the Millingtons.

I like the Millington children: Roy, David, Jimmy, Dale, Earl, Catherine, and a few others. Roy takes charge of everything. Jimmy is the black sheep. David is the best looking. Chrysanthi says they're all barbarians and corrupting Leander.

We visited the Adirondack Museum at Blue Mountain Lake. They had the cabin that a hermit lived in for 30 years, and I immediately felt it would be wonderful to duplicate it for the children. It was about 5 × 8 feet and perhaps 4 feet high, with a kind of shelf at one end for a bed, strewn with pine needles. It was built almost like a tent. Poles at either end, with center-board supported on them. Roofing of strips of heavy bark. Dirt floor. Stumps for chairs. No windows.

Am I, like Stephen Dedalus, searching for a father? Is it my virtual rejection of my own father, at least as an object of respect, which has led to my interest in God, and my tendency to form friendships with older men such as Stefan Lokos, Bernard McCarthy, Richard Hatch?

Chrysanthi and I went to the dentist. C. had several very small cavities. The question was: Should they be filled with silver, which would be relatively permanent, or with porcelain, which would last only three years but would blend with the surface of the tooth and be invisible? But the cavities were so placed that you couldn't see them anyway unless you looked very hard. C. wanted porcelain, however, despite all logic; I insisted on silver. I conceded, however, to say that if the cavities had been in conspicuous places, I would have agreed to porcelain. "Well," said the dentist, "I'm glad to see that you've got a little poetry in you at least."

A similar manifestation of the feminine mind occurred the other week when we went to buy shoes. Kreuger wanted me to take the same style as I had previously because that particular shoe was the best made and longest lasting. But Chrysanthi insisted I take an inferior shoe (at practically the same price) just because it had a different design.

Idea for a sensational novel, combining interests of the historical novel, sex and violence, plus commentary on the contemporary social scene:

A group of orgiastic devotees is miraculously revived from the days of ancient Greece, and settles in a secluded region of the U.S. They continue their practices undisturbed for some time, but gradually the rest of the community gets wind and there is a scandal. Investigators are sent, indictments handed out, and the whole thing goes to the courts. In the process the investigator, starved like everyone in his society for spontaneous passion, is attracted to the cult and must fight within himself where to bestow his ultimate allegiance.

Dick McKenna here. He described the Church today, saying that it had gotten over its flirtation with pacifism and realized that it must live or act in a world of power politics. As he continued to explain its methods and organization, I felt like replying that the next thing it should do is incorporate and issue stocks and give dividends; it had all the other characteristics of a big business. It should also, of course, throw over Jesus altogether and worship a god more in keeping with its beliefs.

Susan Fisher tells us, second-hand, that Izzy is pregnant, and that she’s been subject to fits of depression, staring off into space—feels guilty about what she did to her parents—and of her literally physical fear of the parents; how Susan had to accompany her home one night because she was afraid to enter the house. And that she didn't want to go to California, and asked Peter, sheepishly, how they were to live. But he, despising "materialism," refused to discuss it. Susan also said that Peter was begged by the owner of the Paper Book Gallery to become a partner. He refused instantaneously, and if anyone suggested that he was acting unwisely, he branded them as materialists and bourgeois.

Surely the baby is an accident. How gauche of them! And Peter's career? This, it seems, will end it abruptly since all their practice had been as a team, and since he will now need steady money and probably a home. Will the marriage break up? Or will Peter, out of his sense of duty—his ridiculous sense of duty sometimes—sacrifice everything and take a distasteful job and be a good father?

Chrysanthi's story about the boiled spinach and the starving staff at the Quaker school, and how the director discovered the spinach in a drawer.

Story of the agriculturalist who gave a basket of 100 eggs and how the girls tried to cook something nice for him. They broke 50 eggs into a pot and didn't know what to do next. Added flour, baked, . . . and it turned out inedible.

Story of psychopathic chiropodist (female) and her gossip about a young student flirting with the 80-year-old cleaner of toilets because both spoke Turkish; and the treatment C. received at her hands during her stay in Athens.

Novel: Devon lad, son of fishermen, takes to the sea. War, torpedoing, etc. Meets girl in USO in New York. She is rich and somewhat forcefully beautiful. Marriage. (Her lover previously killed in the war, and she takes him, as it were, on the rebound.) He resolves never to go to sea again. Says he hates his previous life: its poverty, etc. Job as salesman through the wife's father. Squabbles. Joins another firm. Wife turns out to be pampered and a spendthrift. Child: she dotes, gets red, green, brown shoes, never wears an apron, soils all her best dresses. Huge cleaning bill, etc. He, qua sailor, always likes to drink, but previously it had been for joviality; now it's from boredom. Wife takes to drink also, gets worse and worse. Loses her beauty. Shows up drunk at parties, etc. Religious question, too: husband deprived of the simple Church of England faith of his childhood. Wife a «liberal» and refuses to go near a church, or to let him go. He suddenly begins to realize that the only time life had any meaning to him was when he was at sea. He, as a salesman, begins having girlfriends in other cities. Keeps up his spirits. How to resolve this? Go back to sea? Leave wife to return to Devon? Could be an allegory of what America does to someone. Could include the grandmother, the only “friend” the wife has, and confidante. Should she be a Jew? Or perhaps from a Quaker family: strict, like Logan Pearsall Smith’s. He as salesman, first believing in what he’s selling, and the advertisements, etc. But gradually comes to realize the dishonesty of the whole business, based on getting people to use things they don’t need. Or should he be too thick to perceive these things, and simply delighted that he can earn $16,000 a year—saying, as Jimmy Bull does, “Why, if I were in England, could I get £1000? No!” But does his $16,000 really cancel out all the other things?

Novel: Peter G's problems; Izzy's maternal instincts denied. P's sadism and cruelty. "Free spirit" vs. the bourgeois. Izzy in motel in Aspen 5 months, pregnant, while Peter skied. Sleeping in back of station wagon. The dog. Izzy's parents. Her background: never finished anything: college, flute, piano, voice. Peter's scorn of academia and of "arty" set. They are forced to change type of songs they sing: to be entertainers, not "musicians." Marlon Brando walks out in S.F. shrugging his shoulders; he came to be entertained, not sung in various languages and given a lecture on ethnic music.

My father for weeks had been talking about the legs on my desk, which we sawed off to make the piece look better. Now for some reason he wants to put them back on. Yesterday, while I was out, he brought the legs and a bottle of glue and, against my mother's wishes and advice, announced that he was going to replace them. This was entirely absurd since the desk with the legs on (assuming they would stay on, just with glue) would be utterly useless because too high, whereas now the height is made perfect simply by inserting a Columbia University catalogue under each side. Well, he commandeered Chrysanthi, who felt herself in a very difficult position: she knew the whole attempt was nonsensical and yet she didn't want to say anything because she also knew how sensitive my father is, and that he had convinced himself that he was doing this for my benefit. They proceeded, with my mother still vociferously objecting. Chrysanthi lifted one side, positioned the legs in place, and was told to keep that side steady while my father lifted the other. As soon as he did, the legs of course slipped out and the whole desk came down on Chrysanthi's hand. My mother started screaming hysterically at my father and berating him, while Chrysanthi, embarrassed of course and in great pain, disappeared discreetly to the bath room, where she fainted. Eventually my father bandaged the hand, first ascertaining that, luckily, there were no broken bones. He felt guilty, of course, saying that his whole effort was to help Chrysanthi, and now, here, look what he'd done!

There is a lovely lyric quality in Sikelianos's Η Παναγία της Σπάρτης. I translated it today as follows:

THE VIRGIN OF SPARTA

Immortal idol, I shall not shape thee
From brass or Pentelic rock, but from a column
Of cypress-wood, that my work may Sweetly smell for all eternity.

And, on the hill where, like a crown of state,
The Venetian castle lies, a great church
I shall build, and enclose thee within,
Behind, an imperturbable iron gate.

Bells I shall place that will groan like a buckler
Under sword-blows and the lance's shaft,
And others too, still higher, like rattles!

And in its windows then to shade her,
Deeply colored crystals I shall match —And each an arrow-slit designed for battle!

I dreamed a strange dream. Germans or Russians or some unnamed enemy were bombarding the East coast, causing of course great panic and excitement, and none of the silent fortitude with which the British people met the blitz in W.W. II. After it became clear that the bombardment would continue, and most likely be followed by invasion, people began to evacuate the East and start for the West. In my dream I saw them as I have seen (in photos) Indian refugees filing along a dusty road: carrying all their possessions, or as much as they could, in their hands. Some had suitcases, some baskets, like laundry baskets, others knapsacks. Everyone seemed to be going on foot. No autos, no trains. The American people, suddenly, had become peasants and were moving once again, though in entirely different circumstances—out west!

I went to the English Graduate Union to hear Lionel Trilling last night, saying I'd be back at about 10:00. It happened that Trilling spoke at great length, and that afterwards I chatted with Paul Cornelius and Mark Flanagan, resulting in my arrival home at 11:30. When I got out of the elevator, there was Chrysanthi in the hall just returning from Chet's. She had asked him to go to the Faculty Club to see what happened to me! When we got inside our apartment she fell to the floor suddenly: her knees had given way, she was almost hysterical over my lateness, quivering on the floor. And she didn't sleep all night long either.

Nice situation for a short story: Susan Fisher's embarrassing situation where she was loaded with expensive gifts (silver, a mink coat, furniture, etc.) for the wedding by members of her father's rich Chicago congregation, and then had to face them and her father to announce, less than several months later, that she was getting divorced. I don't remember whether she said she gave all the gifts back or not.

Novel set in Adirondacks with Army poison gas base. Gives jobs, etc. to young men. Then city folks come: F.O.R. and start a vigil. Effect of this on the townspeople. Also put in local color. Welfare. Millington with his pistol. Violence? Carl and his problems. Nick Millington. Lumberjack with hut full of pin-ups. Thievery. The Methodist camp. Perhaps rich uncle who doesn't like Cos. Also effect of vigil on the high school students. Carman, of course, makes money out of the deal.

Easter service in Riverside Church was soupy and ψεύτικο, as always. This disjointed Protestant ritual: you stand up, you sit down, you can't think of anything to say to God, so you recite inane poetry, and this alone would be unendurably boring, so you sing it to hymn tunes, every damnable verse. The great moment in the service, when a hush and then exaltation is felt, is when the vestrymen bring the loot of the offering up to the altar. The offering gets the best music, the central part of the service, etc. It is the most important aspect! There is no affect in this kind of service. It is too conglomerate and mechanical: an inexorable order of events that must be got through somehow and have no living relation the one to the other.

But an amusing thing did happen. Something was wrong with the public address system. During the prayer and Bible reading band music whispered in the background somehow; and when McCracken began his sermon the whole thing went haywire. First there were just voices; then as he spoke out in his huge voice about a friend who doubted immortality and, referring to death, said that when we die we simply “call it quits,” then, as he continued, the sound “quits—quits—quits—quits—quits—quits” boomed out all over the church for about two minutes. Sometime later the word “adventure—adventure—adventure” did the same, so that the whole sermon was a kind of counterpoint, until someone fixed the microphone.

The liturgy at the Greek Church, where we went on Friday night, was much better, and certainly much different. While the choir sang the passion-story for three hours to the same tune, repeated over and over again, the church was a kind of warm chaos, with hordes of people lighting candles, the sacristan blowing them out and bringing them to be resold; and a never ending line advancing slowly down the main aisle to approach the επιτάφιος before the altar. They went forward in twos, crossed themselves, bent down and kissed the gold Bible and then received a white flower. Then, flower and lighted candle in hand, the majority of people issued onto the street and waited outside, where it was cooler, for the service to be over. Drivers exiting from the George Washington bridge saw the strange sight of crowds lined up on either side of Wadsworth Avenue with candles glowing in the darkness, and the reflection of the flames in the red plastic cups, slit in the bottom and slipped over the candle to catch the wax, which the people who had been willing to pay 50 cents for a candle had received.

The hero could be a scoffer, an opt-out, but he is gradually drawn in to the aspirations of those on the vigil, and joins them, arousing great opposition. He commits some crime—civil disobedience—and is tried in court (here the issues can be presented) and sentenced.

Visited Pete and Izzy. Pete is manager of the new 3rd Avenue store, personnel director for all three stores, and in charge of ordering. The boss handles the bookkeeping. Pete said Marty (the boss) made his money first by selling a gadget on 14th Street, a kind of extra-special pants-hanger. He and his wife walked up and down 14th Street and made $200 a day! Pete has—characteristic of him—had a complete reversal: now he is 100% bourgeois: he says he wants to make as much money as he possibly can in five years, then quit. Marty says the same thing. In other words, he'll get all he can out of the store and then, when competition catches up and the going gets harder, he'll sell out, enjoy his earnings without any headaches.

Izzy sits home all day with the dog—lonely. She doesn't have much to do with her parents, of course, and Peter is away all day, returning only at 8:00 p.m. Nor can she go out for the whole afternoon, for the dog refuses to be confined for more than two hours at a time. One afternoon, following Peter's advice, Izzy called everyone she knew and didn't get a single answer. She was convinced (who could blame her?) that the world was against her.

Chrysanthi in the park the other day saw a Negro woman, when her son had committed some minor crime (I think throwing a shovel over the wall) take off her shoe and while the four-year-old stood before her shaking and pleading "Forgive me! Forgive me!" she proceeded to beat him with the shoe until blood spurted from his nose.

¶ Many of us in this continent [Europe] have come to regard the Renaissance as the fount of all that remains to us to admire in "modern" life, and the Reformation as a cataclysm that ruptured the entire continuity of our culture, and which moreover has bred successive new cataclysms, the revolutions and senseless wars which have bedeviled in particular the past two centuries and snatched from our lips those elixirs which we were supposed to derive from increasing technological dexterities. —from a review of Crane Brinton's A History of Western Morals in the TLS, April 22, 1960, p. 259, objecting to Brinton's so-called "American" viewpoint of the Reformation as preferable to the Renaissance.

Chrysanthi and I saw the intense and poetic “Wild Strawberries” last night in Long Beach, on a double bill with “Room at the Top.” What a super thing Bergman has done with the cinema as a medium. When we returned, at midnight, I went for a solitary walk for an hour along the beach to the lighthouse jetty, under the bright moon. My glasses were hazy from the damp mist by the time I got back, and my shirt and hair clammy.

I thought of a novel about the farm. I have a peculiar passion to chop down and bring out a great virgin pine back in the swamp. No difficulty daunts me. There is the episode of the bemired horse; then a path has to be corduroyed. A log falls on me and pins me down. Encounters with a buck, with flies and other insects and flora and fauna. Visitors could come at intervals and question me, try to get me to explain this obsession. I would of course also have dreams and be involved with local characters and probably with a girl also. What would baffle everyone would be that getting the tree out would have no practical purpose, no commercial value even. Actually (I haven’t decided the outcome), perhaps when sawing, or after the tree is felled and skidded, we may find that it is hollow inside from disease, and thus useless. An interval could be spent away from the farm, even at the Washington work camp, and this would be a means of articulating the situation and of comparing “useless” endeavors with the so-called purposeful endeavor of everyone one meets. Perhaps better: make the hero rather dull-witted and inarticulate. Perhaps like Wayne. Family runs chicken farm or ex-chicken farm. Relative: Harold Smith, renting boats on Pharaoh, and with wife-trouble. Wayne has gone to work in the city and thus meets educated people who visit the Adirondacks and get involved with him in his obsession. Perhaps he, with his cow-like placidity, and his endurance, will show up the educated cynical friend. The friend, offering to help Wayne, could get the horse bemired—an index of his egotism: he didn’t want to fail the job. His cruelty to animals, whereas Wayne, though not sentimental, of course, has an instinctive respect for animals. Include the scene of Ad Kingsley getting secret thrill out of seeing horses copulate. Also perhaps question of whether or not Wayne should move to the city and thus leave this sub-standard region. He tries a job (hospital? airline?) but decides to go back because of a kind of instinctive need for the land. The tree could not only be in a swamp. Perhaps on a steep slope, with the swamp as an obstacle on the way—e.g., topography on Carman's, with beaver dam or stream, and a lone blue pine, which Sherman admires. Intellectual could be a technician like Dave Lurie. Could Wayne also have Mac's energy and dynamism? Or perhaps better as a sluggish type? Should he be a Jehovah's Witness? If so, this could be the original bond between him and the intellectual, if the intellectual were a C.O. serving in the hospital. Also, the C.O. could be all for improving the world and be sort of staggered by Wayne's indifference. Yet it could be Wayne, not the other, who had the moral fiber.

Chrysanthi told me of a village where the president's sons, high school graduates only, took on duties of doctor, agriculturalist, and teacher. Then, there was an opportunity to have a qualified doctor come to the village, and the sons and of course their father opposed this. The people, not knowing any better, had faith in these boys, and did not object.

I had to get up to answer some complaint of Leander's last night. Awakening from a deep sleep, I felt as though I were pulling myself with a gigantic slurp! out of a bath of clinging mud.

Saw Freddy and Sherman and entourage in North Creek. Sherman just got out of jail on bail after 44 days, for breaking into a camp at Brant Lake. The police found the loot subsequently in his car. Freddy, who had been with him and sleeping in the car, was also sent to jail, on Sherman's squawking. They introduced me to a friend, a real tough-guy type with his chest bulging out through his T-shirt, and an air-force tattoo on his forearm. These people have no social graces. When introduced, I said "How do you do" and held out my hand. He acted as though this had never happened to him before, and looked embarrassed. Freddy complained that the new people at Carman's place "lied" to him three times, and so he left. They wanted him to stay as caretaker, and to live in the bus, which he says is unbearable in summer.

¶ Education . . . is nevertheless moving . . . to the world where it is better to be envied than ignored, better to be well-paid than happy, better to be successful than good—better to be vile, than vile-esteemed. —William Golding in TLS, June 17, 1960, p. 387.

Saul and Minna visited unexpectedly. We talked delightfully about the atomization of intellectual pursuits, especially in science; and about the general decline in standards. Saul has faith that since youth have abandoned their traditional role as radicals and reformers and protesters (being now either defeated, or negativist like the Beatniks, or, in most cases, deliberate conformists) that older people will value eccentricity and outspokenness and will say what they believe and try to preserve truth, and individual virtue.

The neighbors' boy (Frankie Deckert) came for a visit. These city boys have no imagination or initiative. Chrysanthi asked if he wanted to see my office; he said he was too tired! She asked if he didn't want to climb a tree and do tricks. No, he didn't. Did he want to see the sheep house? No, it was too hot outside! And so forth. In contrast to this type, the Millington children, undernourished as they are: what vitality they have; unintelligent and badly educated as they are, what imagination and resourcefulness. Surely they are superior to the products of an effete television-civilization.

Harold Carman's new work schedule. At 8:30 p.m. he reports to Green Mansions, where he is night watchman, making rounds every two hours, and spending the rest of the time with the night telephone clerk in a little office. He returns home at 6:30 a.m., sleeps until 11:00 a.m., grabs a cup of coffee, then drives the school bus from Sodom to North Creek, picking up children for the summer playground program. Home again at 2:00, he sleeps for an hour, then brings the children home again. Returns for supper, and leaves for Green Mansions.

Buttons, our two-month-old goat, seemed sick—won't eat. So we went to see Will Tubbs. On his lawn he has a beautifully smooth and rounded stone shaped about like an egg. He says he found it while digging a ditch, and is saving it to use as a headstone. (He is over 80 now, and a real κοτσονάρτος. We found out the real story about Floyd Fish and our goat. Fish said he'd paid $7.00 for it; actually, Tubbs had given it to him, along with three other goats. Fish had complained to Tubbs that Buttons wouldn't eat, but of course he said nothing about that to us. Now we see Buttons growing weaker and more despondent daily. He just sniffs around in a torpor, and doesn't even bother to get into the shade. He won't eat anything, except now and then a carefully chosen blade of grass. Of course what he wants is goat's milk. Mrs. Tubbs gave him some and he lapped it up with joy. He won't touch the milk we give him, though—cow's milk; nor the grain we give the lamb.

Tubbs told me that he couldn't stand living in cities, not even in a village. He'd farmed a big dairy farm for 30 years in Montgomery County, then bought his present place to spend his old age. The county took it in turn, in exchange for welfare payments until the Tubbs die. This old man has such a fine way of looking at his old age and approaching death. He seems as though he's ready at any time simply to walk off the stage with a smile, at the director's bidding. Meanwhile he raises goats and enjoys the mountain scenery and air. A great contrast to Bob Gerstenzang, whom we saw Sunday on our way back from Yearly Meeting at Silver Bay. Bob had a stroke this past winter, and looks a wreck. You can see immediately that with his whole being he's afraid of death, and he surrounds himself with doctors who reassure him. This buoys him up for a while. It is this gnawing self-concern and cry for longer life that is so self-defeating. Tubbs, who wears a smile when he talks of his headstone, is vibrant and active and full of compassion for his goats, not for himself.

Charles Cowles, after trucking our purchases up from the Loon Lake Colony auction, told me that he had to discontinue his phone because, while he was out working, people used to break into the house and make long-distance calls for which he was billed.

A great Dionysian brute, smelling of trees.

You might wonder how I ever came to meet Wayne. Not that I'm any better than he is—no, I don't hold with that kind of snootiness. But just the improbability of people of our—how shall I put it?—"diverse backgrounds" having anything to do with one another.

A great brute, smelling of trees. He stands in urine-splotched undershorts, frying some fish. The old man—a pile of spread out yellowed newspapers about to crumble to dust—hunches over the stove in the parlor.

Jim Mahoney, Tubbs' neighbor, spends his time digging dirt from the bank on one side of the road and using it to fill the hollow on the other side. He also has a collection of wagons.

We cleaned the organ and saw a baby mouse crouching inside. Chrysanthi quickly went and brought the cat, who pounced. A little squeak and then silence, the cat walking methodically away with a tittle of fur between her teeth. But then Alec screamed mightily. He, poor thing, could see nothing but injustice and tragedy in this planned and well executed murder. I was reminded of the scene in The Shrimp and the Anemone in which Eustace sees the anemone devour the shrimp and, recognizing an evil principle in back of the universe, begins to wail.

A few weeks ago Towsley's driver got stuck in the mud in the little depression leading to the south field. What followed was interesting. For four hours he dug and jacked, putting rocks in the mud-bath under the wheels, racing the motor and getting almost to the top of the incline in front of him, then racing backwards, just managing, because of the rocks, to transgress the mud, and getting almost to the top of the incline in back of him. But he wouldn't leave it at that; no, he had to get clean out without help. Where there's a will there's a way. So, instead of being glad he'd gotten as far as he had, and working for traction from that point (we could have put sand under the wheels), he would rush through the mud hole once more, each time more precariously, until his tracks shifted, he slid off the rocks entirely, and got stuck ten times worse than he had been in the beginning. At this point he ran out of cigarettes, which made him nervous (though his patience was exemplary)—he was only interested in showing that he, having gotten stuck, could get out. Man against machine and nature. I think he had almost wanted to get stuck in the first place. In the beginning, when I raised the question of going to the office-site to deposit the lumber, he looked at the hollow and was very dubious. I didn't press the matter, though I suggested putting boards down. As I was bringing the boards he, without waiting, started off, saying, "If we get stuck, we get stuck," and so he did. Finally, after Deckert and I couldn't budge him with our two cars (breaking all my ropes), we got Beecher Sawyer with a chain and a four-wheel drive Jeep. The driver drove off without a word after we'd split the $3.00 cost.

I'm trying to write again, but my heart isn't in it yet. I must do something every day until the knack returns—if it does.

August 2, 1960

The story I'm writing is hopeless. Should I continue just for the discipline of bringing it to some resolution? I had better start properly, like students of painting, by copying a model. Could I do something on the plan of Simonetta Perkins but set in Greece? Simple, straightforward, with a clear-cut situation, but also an opportunity for poetry. I don't want to write the prosaic plot-filled type of novels exemplified by one I am now reading, Malamud's The Assistant.

Reading Κατίνα Παπά, Σ' ένα γυμνάσιον θηλέων. Possible translation.

Anglicisms: potato crisp instead of potato chip; driver's cabin (of lorry) instead of cab.

Reading Iris Murdoch's The Bell. Περιφανο ! Until quite near the end, where too many things happen all of a sudden, too much melodrama, obtrusive manipulation of the plot to draw it to a close.

August 12, 1960

After I'd picked too many of the wrong kind of black cherries, Chrysanthi told me that I was just like her father: whenever he went to buy food he came back with too much, and always the poorest quality, paid for at the highest price. Apparently he had absolute trust in the shopkeepers, and wouldn't watch what they put in the bag; and even if he saw a rotten orange going in, he was too polite to remonstrate. The funniest parts are the scenes that followed, as Chrysanthi relates them. Magdalene would berate him endlessly for wasting his meager income, and he would sit with his Byzantine liturgy, singing all the while, his nose in the book, and every so often saying absent-mindedly, Ναι, εντάξει, έχεις δίκαιο, έχεις δίκαιο, εντάξει . . .

Couldn't a fascinating plot be built around something like the situation Murdoch paints in The Bell, but using characters and incidents from the Polaris Action campaign? It could have excitement, sex, scenery, public issues, private, religious, and moral questions, topical interest, etc. Study The Bell carefully; also look again at Conrad for style.

From Lawrence Durrell, Balthazar (NY: Dutton, 1960):

¶ Egotism is a fortress in which the conscience de soi-même, like a corrosive, eats away everything. True pleasure is in giving, surely. p. 53.

¶ Where can a man who really thinks take refuge in the so-called real world without defending himself against stupidity by the constant exercise of equivocation? p. 113.

¶ The object of writing is to grow a personality which in the end enables man to transcend art. p. 141.

¶ At the time when we knew him he was reading hardly anything but science. This for some reason annoyed Justine who took him to task for wasting his time in these studies. He defended himself by saying that the Relativity proposition was directly responsible for abstract painting, atonal music, and formless (or at any rate cyclic forms in) literature. Once it was grasped they were understood too. He added: "In the Space and Time marriage we have the greatest Boy meets Girl story of the age." p. 142.

August 17, 1960

Went to the exhibit for the auction of the property of Georges Baumann at Minerva. Baumann, chief chef at a large NY hotel and a Swiss, built five cottages at the top of a mountain and stuffed each with objets-d'art and books he collected. He built the additional houses solely for this purpose, and though nobody ever lived in them nor did he intend to have anyone do so, he installed beds, stoves, kitchens, etc. in each, to make it a complete camp. The last ten years he lived all year here, alone after the death of his wife. His books included many volumes on the American Indian, travel books on Switzerland, some standard novels, the Britannica and Larousse, and a shelf-full of books on sex, love, prostitution, etc.—Havelock Ellis and the rest. This delighted the auctioneer, who savored the title "The Art of Love by Ovid" [o:vid]; "that must be a hot one." And "Sacred Prostitution. Now what could this be? Good title, eh!" We felt a strange feeling considering how the result of his long mania for collecting and the strange result—porcelain and paintings and amour and statuary and stained glass and books and maps and fine china and magnificent period furniture—all set away in these miserable cottages on a mountain-top with a poor substitute for a Swiss panorama: how the result was that all these vultures, ourselves included, should be tramping there, and the collection soon to be dispersed piece by piece at the hand of the ignoramus auctioneer.

One aspect of Einstein's relativity theory is that as speed increases, time decreases. Thus time becomes part of geometry, and the universe is a four-dimensional one. A clock launched into space would tick slower and slower as its velocity increased, and the elapsed time would be much less than the elapsed time of the trip as recorded on earth.

Yesterday's mail was rather spectacular. I received (1) a clipping from a N.Y. Times ad for The Last Temptation announcing it as "a major literary event: and quoting ecstatic reviews; (2) a request from Collier's Encyclopedia to write an article for them on Kazantzakis; (3) a telegram from the Voice of America asking for an interview in Greek; and (4) a letter from Tindall, announcing that he has read and accepted my dissertation!

We then went to the Baumann auction and bought a beautiful mahogany bed and inner spring mattress for $15.00; and 22 books for $16.00—about 8 volumes of Conrad in a nice edition, Wilson's Memoirs of Hecate County, Moncrief's translation of The Charterhouse of Parma in two volumes, Villon's complete poetry, The Woman of Andros and The Bridge of San Luis Rey by T. Wilder, Wells's New Worlds for Old, George Moore's Esther Waters, a translation of Boccaccio's Elegia di Madonna Fiammetta, a Petit Larousse, four volumes of Tolstoy's religious essays, Balzac's Thérèse Raquin, etc.

Possible short story: Kostas and the 6000 drachma confrontation. His orphan boyhood; need for substance, etc. Contrast with American high standards, which permit more idealism.

Another: Hartley's "Three, or Four for Dinner" transposed to a Greek setting. Finding corpse on the way across the bay. Anti-Greek attitude of one of the Americans (perhaps the wife of a diplomat). Study also Hartley's "Podolo" for horror effect. Very deft.

Chrysanthi told me how her mother, during the war, used to keep the children clothed by ripping her own dresses (mostly national costumes) one at a time and from each making two identical dresses for the two girls.

Chrysanthi also mentioned that when Mr. House succeeded in getting her released from prison (held as a kind of hostage because of George—or Odysseas?), the condition was that she remain at the Quaker school and have no contact at all with anyone outside. Thus for a whole year she did not even go as far as the Farm School. It was a horrible year. Lola was sick in bed (nervous disorder) and the parents had left Salonika (I'm not quite clear about this). Chrysanthi divided her salary between the rest of her family, as she was the only one earning anything.

She also reminisced again about earthquakes: how, in the village, everyone spent night after night outside in their yards, rather than sleep in the house, which might tumble down. Dimitrios, on those nights, used to teach his children the various constellations.

Then there was that other time when Chrysanthi was on her way to Athens, sent first class in the automotrice by the School. There was an earthquake, sending huge boulders onto the tracks, and the passengers had to spend the night in a café in Larissa. The first class was occupied only by old, rich people, and Chrysanthi had talked to no one the whole trip. Young and shy, she naturally felt very frightened; but she discovered a young honeymoon couple in the wagon; the man turned out to be an agriculturalist and friend of George's, so Chrysanthi spent the time with them. She says she'll never forget when, the next day, the train proceeded over that horrific bridge in the mountains, inching along. Everyone expected the trestle to collapse any minute; the passengers were screaming and wailing hysterically.

The Woman of Andros: disappointing.

Astonishingly beautiful music in Kazantzakis's "Tertsines." This is gorgeous (p. 16):

Αχ, νά ταν θέ μου, εγώ πηλό να πάρω, φλόγα και νου κι αγέρα, να σε πλάσω!
Θά σουν αγνάς, καλός, κι η κρουσματάρω

Θα γλύκαινε καρδιά, κι το άγριο δάσο
 Θα ρόδιζε της αδικιάς μια μέρα.
 Μα τώρα, Θέ μου, πια πού να προφτάσω!

Chrysanthi is despondent over her experience so far in the city, especially the lack of graciousness and hospitality. She complained bitterly about Alice and Peter. We had entertained them so many times for dinner, and kept them two days at the farm, etc. Now that they're our neighbors they haven't invited us really except with a vague "come over and see us." One day we went. Peter came home with some croissants. Leander of course immediately jumped up. Alice gave him the tippy-tippy end of one, and nothing to Alec! (Not to mention offering us nothing.) This stingyness and complete lack of an ingrained feeling of hospitality pains Chrysanthi immensely, as it does me. Her response is to resolve to become "an American" in this respect. Why do things for people, she says, when they never appreciate anything and are only interested in their own pockets. I objected. The response should not be to descend to the faults of others. I tried to convince Chrysanthi that one must be hospitable, gracious, etc., without ever expecting anything in return. Then, if someone does reciprocate, surprise will add to the pleasure.

I, too, had a heavy feeling of shock and disgust when I came back to NY. I went downtown the first day to see Korda, and felt in a different world (the day before, we had entertained Floyd Fish, after buying his mowing machine!). So many women, dressed to the teeth, staring greedily at the jewels in Winston's window; men rushing helter-skelter. And I felt a pang for the elevator operator in Rockefeller Center. How much better off Floyd Fish is on his poor-white farm, surrounded by vibrant horses. But would any of the elevator operators exchange?

I was having a haircut when something unusual happened. A squat, baggy-pantsed Jewish peddler entered the shop and asked the barber if he wanted any nylon combs. I didn't know such peddlers still existed; he seemed to me something out of Ireland of the early 1900s: the peddlers described by O'Casey. "One for 15 cents, two for a quarter," he said. The barber asked how much a dozen were. The peddler seemed taken aback, as though he had to think. "All right," he said, "a dozen for $1.60." I figured out, sitting in the chair, that at two for 25 cents, a dozen would be $1.50, but apparently this didn't occur to the barber. The peddler showed the combs. "I'll give you $1.00," said the barber. The Jew laughed and patted him on the shoulder. "Good-bye, my friend," he said. "I came not to lose money. Good-bye." "1.20," said the barber. The Jew pondered. "I'll let you have them for $1.40," he said. "A real bargain. I usually get $1.80, so you'll be saving 40 cents. This is my last dozen. You'd better take it. I can sell any number of dozens today." The barber, however, did not give in, but stuck to his offer of $1.20, whereupon the peddler walked out.

Tonight, a second strange thing. A man knocked at the door—obviously a bum, with dirty shirt, and jacket three sizes too big, shoes with the soles coming off, and said he'd been given my name by someone in the 15th Street Meeting and could he come in. I said Yes. He fawned immediately on the children, and they got all excited, so it was hard for me to pay attention to what he was saying. I caught this: He was writing a book on geriatrics and needed money to finish it—needed about $400. He'd worked in the coal mining district of West Virginia during the depression; then inherited $100,000 but in a few years had given it all away. Then he got into debt and is still about $5000 in debt. But he must finish the book. Did I know of anyone—any philanthropist—who might help him. Just a loan; he'll pay it back when he can. He knew I was of Rochester Meeting and asked about people there. I of course knew no one. I gave him a check for $10 and he asked immediately where he could cash it. Obviously he hadn't a penny, and needed money on the spot. I tore up the check and gave him a travellers cheque. He gave his address as a P.O. box in Atlantic City. He thee'd me throughout. The only thing that made me suspicious was when I referred to the name of some Friend and said he could find the address in the Directory. "Oh, do they have a directory?" he asked. Would a Friend have said that? On his way out he said he wouldn't go to social agencies because they wanted to take away his two children on the grounds that his wife, a manic depressive, was unsuitable to bring them up.

"Play your records," Chrysanthi said to Leander, "and you'll probably fall asleep." "I don't want to fall asleep," replied Leander. "I just want to fall a-rest."

Oh God, my God, could I but swarthy clay
 Enfold to make you mind and air and flame,
 Chaste and good you'd stand, all anger would away
 With sweetened heart; of wrong the forests tamed
 One day a rosy face would show; but now,
 Oh God, my God, it's late to voice your name.

The third line has six feet, unfortunately.

Good period for a historical novel: the times between the Testaments; the conflict between Hellenism and Judaism in Palestine.

Hone finally got a job: analyzing financial reports. He was to report to work last Monday, and spent Sunday in feverish expectation. But getting up Monday morning, racing through breakfast and to the station to catch the train, was not so easy. He managed indeed so well that he arrived at 8:45 and had to wait outside for 15 minutes. Finally he was installed at his desk. That evening Dad called him to offer congratulations on his first day of work. "Work?" Hone replied. "I quit!" Then he told how sitting behind the desk nauseated him. He got to thinking: he would have to rush his lunch, he would have to run to get the 5:15 back to Harrison, he would have to work a full year before being granted a one-week vacation. At twelve o'clock, therefore, he informed the boss that he was through, and waived all salary.

Linda Bien, Saul's elder daughter, is at Cooper Union, having left Antioch, where she had had an unhappy love affair and did poorly academically. Now she can't sleep at night and she has allowed herself to grow horribly fat. She weighs 140 lbs.

We went last week to Harvey Springer's Bah Mitzvah. Just a few weeks before, the boy had gone into a coma, and it was discovered that he had diabetes. So the happy ceremony was performed with somewhat forced gaiety, and with underlying gloom.

Surprise visit from Paul Davidoff. He'll get his law degree this January, the same time as I (I hope) get my Ph.D.

Reading Death of a Salesman reminded me of another aspect of Hone's recent job. Like Willy Loman, Hone built himself up, telling my father they were so impressed with his experience, etc., etc. that they acceded to his demand to work only until 4:30 instead of 5:00. The truth was that Hone, because he wanted to get out before the crowds, agreed to a salary cut proportionate to the time not worked. Hone could be made into another Willy Loman. His drunkenness, his need for "freedom"—going to lunch with the "boys" and spending 2 or 3 hours at it; the necessity of a martini before catching the train back to Westchester; the fantasies of retirement in Paris; the parties there and (?) the philandering; the experiment of a year's leisure, farming, etc., but the attraction soon wears thin. Remorse, perhaps, at having sold the business. Dénouement (?): suicide. The family relations could be bought in too. Emily's refusal to go to college. Or, better, substituting Linda Bien for Emily.

Alec, falling asleep in the car, proved the brilliance of the end of the penultimate chapter of Ulysses. Alec, as I stopped for a red light, began mumbling, "Daddy stop red light, go green light." He continued: "Daddy stop red light, go green light, stop red light, go green light, stop green light, go red light, stop green . . . , go . . . red . . . green . . ." And he was asleep!

We went to the new aquarium at Coney Island with Hillel and Miriam Black. Ate at Nathan's. Barbaric. Crowds pushing to get frankfurters, then eating while standing on the filthy street. We leaned against the side of a building and watched Nathan's garbage collector come by every few minutes with a huge barrel-full of discarded paper plates, cups, wrappers, etc. An old man appeared once, stood near one of the waste baskets, waiting for someone to throw in a half-eaten frank, and then picked it out and ate it. What humanity one sees at the Island! Cruel, uncultured faces, fat women stuffed with knishes, teen-aged boys looking for a good time or rushing about in open convertibles, Negro pigmies running shooting galleries, etc. On the beach, I glimpsed two young boys who had taken off their shirts; their girlfriends were running their hands over the bare chests, playfully, sexily.

¶ There was a great deal of grimy infant life up and down the place.
—Henry James, "Brooksmith".

Visit the other day with Kimon Friar. The most egotistical man I have ever met, even for a Greek. The moment I stepped in he brought me to what he called his “Rogues’ Gallery”—a series of framed photographs of famous people—Edith Hamilton, Archibald MacLeish, Kazantzakis, and various actors, etc.—all inscribed to Friar. Then he showed me his scrapbook: review of his publications, invitations to lecture, newspaper photographs, the Calypso song written about him when he lectured in Trinidad, etc. Then his copies of The Odyssey: A Modern Sequel, about 9 or 10 in all, lined up next to one another, one copy of each edition, one of the Book of the Month Club edition, etc. Then the bust of himself made at the age of 26, because that was the age at which Keats died—Keats, his idol, whose bust stood next to the one of Friar himself. “At 26,” Friar told me, “I died too.”

The rest of the evening he spent informing me how much Kazantzakis loved him, how K. considered him his “spiritual son,” how he gave him full rights to all royalties for the Odyssey, and how Friar, out of the goodness of his heart, voluntarily returned 50% to Mme K. when she complained that K. never meant what he did and that Friar was robbing her. Friar said he had K’s letters to prove his story but that Mrs. K. wouldn’t give permission for him to translate and publish them. He pictured her as a woman intent on making every drachma she can out of K’s works, and as a paranoid. When K. died, he said that Mrs. K, although feeling genuine grief, also felt relief, for K. had been terribly difficult to live with since he had an oriental view of women: that they should stay indoors and wait on their husbands, nothing else. Mrs. K, after the death, went to Paris, bought an outfit by Dior, dyed her hair blue!

Friar said that K. was very inhumane, not only in his attitude toward women (this is what made Galatea leave him—see her novel), but also in his political philosophy. He fully accepted the idea that millions of innocent people might have to die because of the coming of the new order—communism—and he could have no compassion for these individuals because he viewed communism as bound to triumph owing to some kind of historical rule that the barbarians always descend on each exhausted civilization. When asked which side he would fight on in a war between Russia and Greece, he said he would side with the Russians.

Friar himself is a wiry man, very small. He bounces on his seat when he talks, and seems to take obvious pride in being a scholar and also a man of the earth: interested in money, in love (hetero- or homosexual?), in dancing, in travel, in glory, etc. (He told me that John Lehmann and Demetrios Capetanakis were lovers.) He wants to leave translating now, and complete his own projects: a novel, an epic. Also, he's doing Homer into hexameters for a deluxe edition to be boxed with The Odyssey: a Modern Sequel. He had just returned from Hollywood, where he completed the "treatment" for the film Skouras is going to make of K's Odyssey (Friar's salary: $1000 per week for ten weeks).

He seemed to attach great importance to the fact that Max Schuster gave him a cocktail party at "21" and especially because the previous day he had gone to one at the same place given for Olivier, and was able to say, casually, "Oh, I'm having my party here tomorrow."

I hadn't been feeling very well the whole day, and when I got ready to go, after drinking several glasses of retsina, I felt faint, really faint. I sat down just in time, and Friar said I had really turned livid. He gave me a bromo seltzer, and I left.

Mama and Daddy Giraffe are grieved because their baby has a very short neck. "It's your fault," says Moma to her husband. "No, it's from your side of the family," the husband replies. "You know as well as I that your maternal grandmother had a short neck." The baby grows up, is sad and retiring. All the other giraffes make fun of him, and he can't reach the top of the trees to get the tenderest leaves. He is addicted to lonely walks in the forest, where he meets a racoon who helps him by bringing down the tender leaves. Finally, raccoon suggests that his friends the elephants might be able to help. They come, discuss the situation, and decide on a plan. Putting the giraffe's head in the fork of a tree, they get on either side of him and pull and pull and pull, until his neck, little by little, and faster and faster, begins to stretch. By the time they stop, giraffe has the longest neck in the world. When he returns to his parents the whole village of giraffes comes forth to admire him. The elders hold a council and decide that baby giraffe must be made king, since he has the longest neck of anyone. This is done, and giraffe lives a happy life, feasting on the tenderest leaves. (Or; expand: other giraffes are jealous; they seek to learn how he achieved his expansion, etc.)

¶ Πικρή είναι η νιότη, πικρή, ακατάδεχτη δεν καταλαβαίνει και όταν αρχίζεις να καταλαβαίνεις η νιότη έχει φύγει. Ποιος είταν ο κινέζος σοφός που γενήθηκε γέρος, με κάτασπρα γένια, με κάτασπρα μαλλιά, με τα μάτια γεμάτα δάκρυα; και σιγά σιγα, όσο περνούσαν τα χρόνια, η τρίχα του μαύριζε, τα μάτια του γενούσαν, αλάφρυνε η καρδιά. Κι όταν ζύγωνα στο θάνατο τα μάγουλά του παρθένεψαν και σκεπάστηκαν με ανάλαφρο παιδιάτικο χνούδι . . . Τέτοια, αν ο Θεός πονούσε τους ανθρώπους, έπρεπε να ξετυλίγεται η ζωή τους. —Καζαντζάκης, Αναφορά στον Γκρέκο, χειρόγραφο σ. 119.

To Voice of America to have picture taken with Albert Rick, Mike and someone else who, in affected tones, pronounced Kazantzakis “turgid.” Then to Putnam’s. They liked the Ὄρες very much but as I expected found it too short to be publishable by itself. Wallace asked for a report, however, on Alcibiades. Mrs. Negroponte disappointed, of course. I will send the MS to Elizabeth to get her opinion, also to George Hill.

Evening: Faust. Stylized performance—witch dressed as Victorian lady; Walpurgis Night done in idiom of Brecht & Weill.

Supper with Tim Bartlett the other night. He returned haggard from the UN. They were trying to discover if Lumumba had been killed. I joked cynically as usual, asking him how he could keep from laughing at the antics of the Congolese. The next day a glance at the Times showed the horrible seriousness of the whole thing, with riots in the council chamber and all the rest. To top this, C. and I heard Mrs. Roosevelt that afternoon and she said the significance of the new administration is that it is telling America we must wake up to what is going on in the world, and to the fact that other peoples are desperate and irrational in their desire for independence and economic advancement.

Dad made arrangements with a young doctor to come to the house at 1 p.m. to talk about his taking over the office. They waited and waited and at 2:30 finally called him. He said that he and his wife had talked things over and decided they didn’t want to live in Sunnyside, and he had “forgotten” to call in order to cancel the appointment.

My father’s sudden and intense desire to move: he says trucks keep him awake at night, and the neighbors’ children during the day. He looks at dismal apartments in inner courts, his sole criterion being “quietness.”

Virginia told how her father finally went back to “the old country” after years of dreaming about the trip, years of the refrain, “But in the old country it’s like this; the apples are as big as melons,” etc. He was supposed to go with his wife, but she insisted on waiting until her son returned from college in June. The father wanted to see Syria in the springtime, so went on ahead, planning on a year’s stay. For this he sold one of his real estate properties in Michigan City. The mother was to join him later. He went with trunks galore, about 15 suits, numerous shirts, etc. After two months, just as the mother was packing to go, he wired, "I'm coming home. Send jet fare." He had found the old country very unromantic indeed. He was used to a daily bath with running hot water, and in his village they didn't even have toilets! Then his two brothers quarreled over whose house he was to stay in. Then also, all his relatives, and also acquaintances, came and asked to borrow things, including his suits, shirts, and even his underwear, none of which was returned. Also, he got dysentery almost the first few days. Virginia met him when he got off the plane in New York. He was gaunt and sickly, and had no luggage. Even the suit he had on wasn't his, and the shirt was several sizes too big. "But the old country, Papa," said Virginia. "Shut up about the old country," was his reply. "It stinks!"

A fine project for days of leisure: production of a literary atlas showing and describing all geographical sites connected with literary figures, with authors and also their works. When I was in England I would much have liked something of this nature. I didn't know, for example, that Nether Stowey was so near Bristol. What a section would be devoted to Venice!

Ideas for children's stories: 1. Scrambled egg as protagonist. 2. Child says, "I wish our house could grow each day, like the cabbage plants in the garden" — and it does.

Sylvia Austerlitz here last month for a few days with Monica and Paul. Expect the Gardners today. They are singing tonight at Crystal Lake Lodge.

I lost a lamb the morning after we bought him, because I went to get the two lambs from their shed, by myself, and while I was holding one, the other slipped out between a crack resulting from a loose board (the house having been patched together hastily the night before). The other lamb struggled furiously to escape as well, but I held on to his foot. I could hear, actually feel, his heart thumping, making the entire body quiver. It was a sudden, furious effort. I thought surely he would drop dead from a heart attack. The successful escapee stood off about 20 feet from the house, glaring at me, and then both lambs began bleating plaintively at each other. I called Chrysanthi, and we (very stupidly) tried to head off the lamb, forcing him back toward the barns. But he kept retreating in the opposite direction, and before long went into the woods. We followed him a few minutes, our shoes drenched, but soon realized we could make no headway at all. We thought that if we tied the other lamb out in the field, perhaps the lost one would come to him. But we never saw him again. We walked about the fields an hour or so later, and hearing nothing, assumed that some animal had already killed the poor lamb; but a few days later we learned that the lamb had been seen in town, near the post office on the following morning. Carson Harrington's man saw him. Carson telephoned Betty Filkins to tell me, which she did—four days later. Carson must have laughed, because as he gave me the lambs he warned me that I would probably lose them, and I said oh no, we would be careful!

The remaining lamb must have a charmed life, however—ferocious, unpleasant beast that he is, always glaring at me hatefully with his head lowered, as though glancing over the rims of bi-focal glasses. I say so because last Sunday, as we were driving home from our swim and picnic at Minerva Beach, we saw the blackest, cruelest looking clouds I had ever seen, and rushed back home, beating the storm by just a half a minute. I had tied the lamb to the shed and left the door open, and the rain came down so furiously, with lightning and a hurricane wind, that I didn't have time to go out to him; or rather, I was about to go to him when I saw his entire shed rise up in the air, fall again, and the next time rise and continue rising, sailing through the air like a kite and landing upside down about 60 feet from its original position. Chrysanthi, who is terrified by thunder, implored me not to go out, so I waited until the storm passed, and then ran to the field, expecting to see the poor lamb strangled. But there he was, wet but healthy, next to the shed, the rope around his neck. We set the building upright and gave him an extra dish of grain—the filthy beast! The same wind also toppled over the out-house, ripping off its peaked roof. I had to spend the next day salvaging the roofing and making a new, shed-type roof.

Our first month here is already gone! I finished the first draft of Saint Francis and have started the revision. No time for another reading, however, My projects so far: enlarging the garden, building the sheep shed, peeling 110 cedar posts, putting in the windows in the kitchen, building a set of shelves using glue and dowel-pins, my first venture in this type of construction. Also, fixing up the chicken house and putting a fence around it. Of our five chickens, only one lays, and she only every other day. Also, we got two kittens from Mr. Tubbs, and one disappeared the other night, probably scared by some animal that came to eat the cats' food. The other kitten, which has two club feet, couldn't run far enough to get lost. Here is an example of where a defect aided in the battle for survival. Of all our animals, only the rabbits have suffered nothing very spectacular, although their house was also overturned in last week's storm.

We visited Hanover early in June, saw Dean Jenkins again, and inspected our assigned apartment at 7 Valley Road. This turned out to be small, cold, ugly, inconvenient: a great disappointment to Chrysanthi. But it's near the college, also to the grade school and nursery school. We met one of the kindergarten teachers, a Miss Cadbury, sister of the Dean of Haverford.

We had gorgeous weather last week, and as I sat under my tree writing each morning I said silent thanks for all this beauty and serenity, although sometimes I am frightened by owning so much: I felt that way as we crowded all our possessions into the cellar at 3902 when we left Morningside Heights.

Robert Frost met Wallace Stevens in a Florida hotel. Stevens was drunk, and fingering the legs of the waitresses. “The trouble with you, Frost,” he said, coming right out, “is that you write about subjects.” Frost pondered this, and replied, “The trouble with you, Stevens, is that you write about bric-a-brac.” Frost says that Stevens was a strange character, fastidious and precious, and yet at the same time one who loved to wallow in vulgarity. He also told about Ezra Pound—how Pound has been writing letters recently to T. S. Eliot, telling Eliot that he (Eliot) isn’t a poet, only a critic, and repeating endlessly that his work is a lot of shit. Frost says he doesn’t care for this or similar four-letter words, and never uses them, except that he came close once when Pound said to him, “Frost, I’m sick of your witticisms.” “Pound,” Frost replied, “I’m sick of your shiticisms!” Frost also says he’s sure that Ernest Hemingway committed suicide. He placed a shotgun in his mouth and blew off the entire back of his head. He says Hemingway once offered Frost all the money he needed, if he thought this would help get Ezra Pound out of St. Elizabeth’s hospital. He says Archibald MacLeish thinks Pound’s poetry superb while Howard Mumford Jones thinks it worthless. —All this from the hour or so that about ten of us had with Frost at Dickey’s house, after Frost’s reading to the college.

Also here recently: William Golding (Lord of the Flies), who read a magnificent two pages on Salisbury Cathedral, and Anthony Powell [Po:l], who agreed with me when I said that Hartley’s latest novels show a decline, and then proceeded to chronicle Hartley’s domestic troubles, all the ones I’d heard of also. Apparently this is what Hartley has as the main subject of conversation. Poor man.

Strangest dream last night. I was reading Hartley's Simonetta Perkins, struggling to finish it, when someone suggested that I must cremate it. I went with several other people to the crematorium, which, as it turned out, was operated by Dr. and Mrs. Chambers, although only the latter was present. She led us through corridors to an open courtyard in the back, where the 'pitch' was. I had expected flaming fires, but instead, on top of the pitch, were four corpses in chairs, facing each other as though playing bridge. They were in various stages of having been consumed, and there was no smell. There was a large billboard across one side of the pitch. Mrs. Chambers kept urging me to proceed with the ceremony. I was on the next to last page, struggling to finish, struggling . . . struggling . . . struggling . . . Here the dream ended.

Mixed up into this weird story were, it seems to me, memories of Hartley (I had begun re-reading "My Fellow Devils" on Tuesday), of Mrs. Chambers (her strange voice was duplicated exactly), the 'pitch,' as the word is used in P.L. (I looked it up yesterday), and the account perhaps of the cremation of Shelley, recited so histrionically last week in the course of Camino Real.

Kenneth Webb's story about Priscilla Crandall and the school in Covington, Connecticut. Negro girl applies and is accepted. Townspeople irate. Pressures brought against P, but she does not heed them. All white parents withdraw their children. Thus P. turns school into school for Negro girls. Trades people refuse to sell her groceries. Negro father of original colored girl brings provisions regularly. Legislator rigs bill to stop school. Girls are commanded to leave, or pay fine, or receive lashes on bare back. One girl refuses to leave, refuses to pay fine, and asks to be lashed. Townspeople cannot bring themselves to do this. Nor seek other means to get rid of school. They incite hoodlums to throw bricks, etc., and finally they burn down the building. This, finally, ends the school. But many many years later the Connecticut legislature voted an official apology to Priscilla.

¶ [Leadbitter] instinctively . . . knew that one [present] was better than two: two presents robbed each other, made excuses for each other. Each hinted at the other's inadequacy; each seemed an afterthought. Better make a bold plunge with one. —L. P. Hartley, The Hireling, pp. 204–5.

On the Absurd: (Quoted by Edward Albee in the NY Times Magazine, Feb. 25, 1962, pp. 30–31).

¶ Camus: "A world that can be explained by reasoning, however faulty, is a familiar world. But in a universe that is suddenly deprived of illusions and of light, man feels a stranger. His is an irremediable exile, because he is deprived of memories of a lost homeland as much as he lacks the hope of a promised land to come. This divorce between man and his life, the actor and the setting, truly constitutes the feeling of Absurdity."

¶ Ionesco: “Absurd is that which is devoid of purpose. . . . Cut off from his religions, metaphysical, and transcendental roots, man is lost; all his actions become senseless, absurd, useless.”

¶ Martin Esslin, in The Theatre of the Absurd: “Ultimately, a phenomenon like The Theatre of the Absurd does not reflect despair or a return to dark irrational forces but expresses man’s endeavor to come to terms with the world in which he lives. It attempts to make him face up to the human condition as it really is, to free him from illusions that are bound to cause constant maladjustment and disappointment. . . . For the dignity of man lies in his ability to face reality in all its senselessness; to accept it freely, without fear, without illusions—and to laugh at it.”

¶ Albee: “. . . man’s attempts to make sense for himself out of his senseless position in a world which makes no sense—which makes no sense because the moral, religious, political and social structures man has erected to ‘illusion’ himself have collapsed.”

The trouble with the peace movement is that we keep to the fiction that decisions by governments are made on a rational basis. Or perhaps the trouble is that the governments themselves keep to this fiction. Kennedy’s decision to resume testing is a case in point. He argued it like a logician, but it could be argued just as well the other way. The actual decision, I’m convinced, was a direct flouting of what one knows is best; it is the expression of some primitive need for self-protection.

Trip to Washington last week to give Kazantzakis lecture at Georgetown. John Cummings conducted me to a room that he had reserved, and we almost opened the door to the Jesuit cloister by mistake, but were saved from this catastrophe by a gruff priest who directed us in the nick of time to where we wanted to go. Lecture was OK. Questions came sporadically but several students seemed quite impressed and interested. Out for a beer afterwards with members of the Classics Department, all very young and most congenial. Though Catholic, they laugh at the Jesuit faculty. Peter and Alice joined us, and I went to Chevy Chase to sleep. Next day took the train to Baltimore. Had read Joyce's Portrait on the way to Washington, and was flabbergasted to find myself among the Jesuits. Now I carried the incongruities further by going to a burlesque show and marking student themes during the intermissions. Baltimore burlesque is the rawest I've ever seen. One dancer appeared stark naked and paraded her vulva all over the place, and the others all gave liberal views. The place was most lively, being filled with businessmen who had come to see the baseball game, which had been rained out. Back to NY, went to see Behen's The Hostage: very like O'Casey. Still fighting the civil war. Some memorable lines: "There's no place on earth like the world." "I'll have you know my voice was trained by an electrocutionist." And: Negro homosexual to the keeper of a brothel, as he goes upstairs with his white boyfriend: "What do you think of mixed marriages?"

Look Back in Anger seems to bear on my projected novel about the peace crusaders. Osborne's point is that whereas at the time of the Spanish Civil War intellectuals were able to translate their ideals into action, in the 1950s–1960s, with the hydrogen bomb impending, all one can do is rage in impotent anger. The intellectual is paralyzed, and those who continue to pursue older ways of expression have not reacted to the nature of the times.

A beautiful twentieth-century sight: a double jet-trail colored rose against a blue-black sky by the sun, invisible behind the horizon soon after sunset.

Jerry English, Leslie, and Dr. Barnard here for supper. Last Tuesday they had a lucky escape when sparks from their trash barrel ignited the grass, which ignited the barn. Luckily the wind was blowing away from the house. Luckily also, the barn held the fire for some time, and the firemen, who had arrived en masse meanwhile, were able to soak down the fields to prevent the flames reaching the forest. Jerry had an attack and Peg gave him oxygen and he recovered. Sis McCarthy called the fire departments, then went up the hill and directed things, feeding the men, sending Peg to town for four cases of beer to keep them going, etc. Two teenagers stood watch all night, and the next day in the afternoon the fire was officially pronounced out. Still, Roy McKee, the fire warden, showed the Englishes how pockets of danger remained underground: where the fire would travel along a root, the only sign being puffs of smoke observable at times.

Jerry told me of his dealings with Harold Carman after I mentioned how Carman invited me to store my barn wood in his barn and then stole it for his stables. I hadn't realized that Peg and Jerry had actually lived for a time in the Waddell homestead across the road, and that Carman was responsible for them buying their own place.

Chrysanthi told something I hadn't known before about George and Efthymoula. On their honeymoon, when George wanted so desperately to divorce her immediately, she threatened to expose him to the police as a communist, delivering missives to the partisans on his περιοδείες. Last Saturday I went to New York to have lunch with Ange Vlachos. He is the permanent representative of Greece to NATO, stationed at Geneva, and is in New York for the General Assembly of the U.N. A most cultured gentleman, very un-Greek in appearance and manner, but very Greek in intellectual interests, as witness his trilogy of historical novels on Alcibiades, the Comnenoe, and the projected one on '21. We talked about Ἔρως ζῶης, which I still have hopes of publishing somehow, and then turned to other topics, among them Kazantzakis. He said, among other things, that Mrs. K. is money-mad, and talks of nothing except how she can milk some more out of K's books. As for K himself, whom Vlachos knew for many years: a hard, unsociable, difficult individual, very Manichean in outlook. Vlachos told of how, once at an art exhibit, he saw K visibly offended by a painting of a nude, and suggesting caustically (to the artist, who was present) that the woman must be the kind that “sell themselves.” He said also that K’s attitudes found their way into his books in the form of contempt for the reader. As an example he cited K’s lack of concern over physical detail. On one page he’ll have rain falling; on the next, forgetting about the rain, he makes the sun shine. He also said that in Zorba K completely misrepresented Mme Hortense, who was a historical personage, and who was treated accurately in Prevelakis’s To χρονικό μιας πολιτείας. Another thing that Vlachos objected to in Zorba was the unrealistic presentation of village life, especially concerning the beheading of the widow. Where were the police? asks Vlachos. Such a crime could never go unpunished, as K has it. Vlachos saw this as a kind of disrespect for Crete. I remonstrated, saying something to the effect that K is interested in ‘poetic truth’ rather than facts, and that Zorba is really a fairy tale—or, better, a myth played out by ‘gods’ who are exempt from such things as police action. This is necessary for the effect K wishes to achieve. It explains, as I told my class, why we never once feel that Zorba is a sexual maniac or a degenerate, but rather a Dionysus raised somehow above normal morality. Something of the same effect is achieved in Never on Sunday, where Ilya, hardly an accurate portrayal of a prostitute, is acceptable because she is in effect a goddess of sex. . . . Vlachos suggested a possible novella to be coupled with his Ωρες ζωής, namely Τα δόντια της μιλόπετρας by Kasdaglis. . . . After lunching together, we went to the Metropolitan Museum of Art and contemplated Aristotle contemplating the bust of Homer.

This was my first glimpse of my parents’ new home, a co-op apartment at the fashionable address of 20 E. 74th Street purchased for $19,000. They sold 3902 for $30,000. The location, of course, is magnificent, but the apartment itself: what a comedown from our wonderful four-story home in Sunnyside. And all my furniture in my room is gone! Dad complained so much about the trucking noise on 39th Avenue; now he has the trucks, buses, taxis, the horns of Madison Avenue, and it was pitiful hearing him trying to convince me, and himself, how ‘quiet’ the apartment is. Then, at night, the person directly below turns on his television for four hours every day, and every word penetrates through the floor. Quiet indeed! It is pitiful, but fashionable, and perhaps the best thing for them because of its location, considering my father's virtual blindness. We are to spend Christmas there with the children, if we can stand it.

Faculty meeting these two past Wednesdays concerning change in the Freshman English program. Dewing accused the framers of restricting the individual liberty of the members of the department. At the next meeting, Terrie made a 'smooth' and emotional speech 'disproving Dewing' and then (this was all planned out in advance, I'm sure) recognizing Brady (over Dewing). Brady moved that the proposal be adopted en bloc, Crawford seconded it, and the damn thing was almost 'put over' on us before we knew what was happening. Luckily, others refused to be manipulated in this way. I sat through the meeting without speaking, overcome with dismay at the thought of how impossible it is that an acceptable program should ever come out of such a meeting, where everyone was talking at cross purposes.

Going on the train from White River Junction is like traveling from the north of Europe to the tip of Italy, insofar as the further south one goes toward New York City the more 'Mediterranean' do the passengers become. We started out with the Anglo Saxon 'purity' of Hanover, but by Hartford Italians, Puerto Ricans, and Negroes began to enter en masse. One great Italian laborer sat next to me, dressed in wonderful homespun. Zoot-suited boys strolled the aisles, with their fancy hairdos. These creatures are so completely foreign to Hanover, and this is bad.

Dedication the other day of the Hopkins Center, a beautiful "home for the arts." Speakers: Wallace Harrison, the architect, who said he was glad we didn't have yet another "colonial" building, and Nelson Rockefeller, who struck me as a rather silly, but wonderfully intelligent in a crafty way, extrovert. Also Martin Hopkins, who reminded me of Frank Boyden, and Warner Bentley, a regular curmudgeon.

November 18, 1962

"The stoic temperament which refuses mere surrender has, after all, only two alternatives. It may elevate inaction into a principle, and look with detachment on the meaningless spectacle. Or it may act as though life did not matter, and construct a tentative and desperate humanism." —Albert Guerard, Jr. in Joseph Conrad (Direction ONE, 1947), p. 78. This, with the statement by Montaigne, should form the thematic backbone of my long-delayed (will it ever be written?) novel. There's more of interest about Conrad in Guerard: "[Both] unreflective energy, good will and active humanitarianism [and] speculative apathy and cautious action . . . bring on disaster. [Neither detachment nor meddling can work.] The nature of the ego would seem, indeed, to leave no alternative of escape. The destructive element in which we are asked to immerse ourselves is no other than life itself. Why . . . is such a conclusive pessimism not merely depressing? To a certain extent, no doubt, the books are saved by their purely literary virtues: by density of style and imagination which none of Conrad's contemporaries possessed. More important, the pessimism is conclusive but never merely passive. Conrad seldom concerned himself with accidental or uncombated evil; he cast only a passing glance at motiveless malignancy or irremediable social abuse, and immediately looked beyond. For all his sense of cosmic indifference, he created an intensely moral universe. His heroes remain separate from the nature which threatens them, and continue their struggles to the end. . . . Finally, the charity of the pessimist, aware from the start of the perils which beset us, is always more rewarding than the disillusioned optimist's outrage; Johnson is more charitable than Rousseau. . . . Resignation, not mystic, not detached, but resignation open-eyed, conscious, and informed by love, is the only one of our feelings for which it is impossible to become a sham. . . . There is serenity in acknowledging the worst. To define the human tragedy is not to accept it, or it is to accept it with such honesty and courage that lucidity survives the absurd."

Marlow in Lord Jim, chapter VII, end: "A certain readiness to perish is not so very rare, but it is seldom that you meet men whose souls, steeled in the impenetrable armour of resolution, are ready. To fight a losing battle to the last, the desire of peace waxes stronger as hope declines, till at last it conquers the very desire of life. Which of us here has not observed this, or maybe experienced something of that feeling in his own person—this extreme weariness of emotions, the vanity of effort, the yearning for rest? Those striving with unreasonable forces know it well, —the shipwrecked castaways in boats, wanderers lost in a desert, men battling against the unthinking might of nature, or the stupid brutality of crowds."

Ned Perrin here last night, with Mansell and Laaspere. The desperation of it all; the impossibility of human communication.

“There is a permanent as well as a primitive myth in every great mythical heritage. This deals with aspects of reality which are supra-scientific rather than pre-scientific. . . . ‘Poetry,’ declares Santayana, ‘is religion which is no longer believed.’ . . . Religion, to transpose Santayana’s phrase, is poetry which is believed. Religion seeks mythically to grasp life in its unity and wholeness. This unity and wholeness can never be expressed in terms of complete rationality; for reason only observes and deduces.” —Reinhold Niebuhr, “The Truth of Myths,” in Philosophic Problems (Macmillan 1961, pp. 611, 612).

“Religion is forced to tell many little lies in the interest of a great truth, while science tells many little truths in the interest of a great lie.’ The great truth in the interest of which many little lies are told is that life and history have meaning and that the source and the fulfillment of that meaning lies beyond history. The great lie in the interests of which science tells many little truths is that spatio-temporal realities are self-contained and self-explanatory and that a scientific description of sequences is an adequate analysis of causes.” Ibid., p. 616.

Bob Daubenspeck (whose house and studio burned down last week) in Meeting this morning: “Many of us don’t mind being seen in public with friends like Tennyson and Wagner, but most are apprehensive about being seen in public with Jesus.”

February 2, 1963

Henry Williams has a collection of Quaker jokes! One tells of a weighty Friend addicted to punning. One day as he was seated in Meeting a woman dressed in satin of a brilliant scarlet color entered and sat down in front of him. He leaned forward and whispered into her ear: “Satin without, Satan within.”

February 14, 1963

Henry Terrie gave me a lift home. Bill Crawford was in the front seat with him, so I sat in the back. They were both just coming, obviously, from a meeting of the committee to revise (once more) the Freshman curriculum. And they continued their conversation, as though I wasn’t there.

“Well, do you think we’ll get the Department to accept this proposal?” Bill asked.

“There’s only one way to do it,” said Terrie. “That’s to keep quiet. If you say too much, if you explain the thing in detail, they start asking questions. So we won’t say anything this time, and maybe the results will be better.”

A very revealing conversation, showing (as I rather suspected beforehand!) that they are really interested not in improving education but in imposing their wills on their colleagues and, in the last analysis, in stymieing open discussion, and in “putting something over” on the rest of us. Terrie's oily, emotional speech the last time, and then the rush tactics so openly and unsubtly resorted to by Crawford and Brady, gave the show away. And now we are about to have an encore!

Performed Ruth Thornburg's "Bagatelles for Flute and Piano" with Dick Williamson at the Friday evening concert. Somehow we got rather disorganized with the 4th movement, and in effect I was improvising, and Dick simply stopped playing. But for some miraculous reason, it sounded good, and nobody seemed to notice. I continued after a while, Dick picked up a cue, and we finished safely! Ruth's music is superb.

Broken condom last night. Should have realized it but didn't, not in time anyway. Now we'll see what happens. Jissim (learned that word from Wm. Burrough's Naked Lunch, a vile book) not very abundant or propulsive. But Chrysanthi is so superbly fertile!

Just finished Orwell's Coming Up for Air. This fits perfectly Hartley's words about the attributes of the realistic novel. It gives us the pleasure of describing things we too have known or felt, the pleasure of recognition. The beginning is wonderfully funny, but then the long reminiscence about childhood becomes somewhat boring, and is told with too little technical sophistication. And yet the persona Orwell has created is just perfect: the 205-lb. "little man" of the suburbs, a little too perceptive perhaps, but nevertheless that wonderful combination of absurdity and depth. This book could very well be the model for a semi-political novel. The opening might be: "So I'm fat—what the hell!" The protagonist might also be a traveling salesman (à la Jimmy Bull?) who can have his fling with women, can have a rotten home life (Jim and Joan: religious difficulties, her vapid sophistication, his commercial ambitions). But the pacifist propaganda would have to be done very subtly.

¶ Gentle reader, we see God through our assholes in the flash bulb of orgasm. . . . Through these orifices transmute your body. . . . The way out is the way IN. (p. 229)

¶ Sir Charles Shumigton defines pain as "the psychic adjunct of an imperative protective reflex." The vegetative nervous system expands and contracts in response to visceral rhythms and external stimuli, expanding to stimuli which are experienced as pleasurable—sex, food, agreeable social contacts, etc.—contracting from pain, anxiety, fear, discomfort, boredom. Morphine alters the whole cycle of expansion and contraction, release and tension. The sexual function is deactivated, peristalsis inhibited, the pupils cease to react in response to light and darkness. The organism neither contracts from pain nor expands to normal sources of pleasure. It adjusts to a morphine cycle. The addict is immune to boredom. He can look at his shoe for hours or simply stay in bed. He needs no sexual outlet, no social contacts, no work, no diversion, no exercise, nothing but morphine. Morphine may relieve pain by imparting to the organism some of the qualities of a plant. (Pain could have no function for plants which are, for the most part, stationary, incapable of protective reflexes.) (p. 248)

When Mike Choukas returned to Samos and went to his parental village, one day a χωρικός came to him, carrying a rock, and explaining that that day, as he was plowing, he had composed a poem honoring Choukas's arrival, and, not having pencil and paper in his house, had scratched the verses onto this rock.

Larry Zalcman told me the story of a friend of his who wanted a bass fiddle terribly but couldn't afford one. Then he heard of a contest: the person who could write the word "money" the most times on a postcard would win. He bought a special pen and began practicing by sending letters to his friends on the back of postage stamps! Then he executed the card, and won the prize of $300, with which he bought his fiddle. Only in America!

November 4, 1963

Dottie Champion rushed up to me at Henry Williams's house to say how overwhelmed she had been by Saint Francis. "Oh," she said, "I felt just like selling everything and dressing in sackcloth!" I think she meant it: that is, she really did feel that way for a moment. But her husband had just finished telling me how he had bought a Greyhound bus and fitted it out with stove, refrigerator, electric plant, lavatory, and eight bunks, for use on family skiing trips!

Yesterday at Monthly Meeting I was rather vehement about Friends' inclination to do nothing whenever a "crisis" presented itself in Hanover. Henry said, "Yes, but we must act in love, not in hate!" What he really meant by this lovely formula was, "We'd be safer doing nothing." But today he phoned me. He, on his own initiative, had decided to organize a group of faculty to collect money for Negro Rights outside the fieldhouse tomorrow before and after Governor Wallace's speech. I shall be one of the collectors.

D. H. Lawrence, quoted by Graham Hough in Dark Sun, end of the chapter on "The Man Who Died" (quoting "Apocalypse"?):

¶ For man, the vast marvel is to be alive. For man, as for flower, beast and bird, the supreme triumph is to be most vividly, most perfectly alive. . . . The magnificent here and now of life in the flesh is ours, and ours alone, and ours only for a time. We ought to dance with rapture that we should be alive and in the flesh, and part of the living, incarnate cosmos. . . . That I am a part of the earth my feet know perfectly, and my blood is part of the sea. My soul knows that I am part of the human race. . . . There is nothing of me that is alone and absolute except my mind.

President Kennedy was assassinated ten days ago, on November 22. I heard the news at the end of my English 2 class, and from then until Monday evening I shared a kind of paralysis that seemed to descend on everyone. We stayed glued to radio or television (at Peter Janicki's house), compulsively, even when (i.e., most of the time) nothing new was to be learned. We also felt a need to be with people, talk to them, first about what had happened (knots of people could be seen everywhere, and always the same incredulity, the same questions could be heard), and then simply about anything, in order to forget for a moment what had happened. The evening of the assassination we had dinner guests: Colonel and Mrs. Furlong, the Kelseys, Herbolds, and Laasperes. Saturday night we went to Chauncey Loomis's house and stayed until 2:30 a.m. talking departmental politics, but only as an excuse not to repeat what was really on our minds. Sunday we spent the afternoon with the Clancys. The Quakers had a memorable meeting Sunday morning and an even more memorable special service on Monday. I spoke of the blow to order, to stable government, and of the miracle that our government does continue peacefully even after such an occurrence. We take this too much for granted, and we should think back to the times of the Plantagenets and Lancastrians, when ordered government was the exception rather than the rule. . . . There was a good deal of sentimentality connected with Mrs. Kennedy and the children, but it was honest sentimentality. (Chrysanthi's first reaction, on hearing the news: "Two more orphans in the world!") There was also a good deal of the feeling of absurdity—the motiveless assassination, and then the equally motiveless (so it seemed) shooting of the assassin, and by the owner of a striptease joint! Fate, coincidence, ineptitude, and sheer gratuitous evil seemed the order of the day. Not all Dartmouth students reacted as one might have wished. One, when the news was announced in the bookstore, yelled "Hooray, he had it coming to him."

David Mirza visited last week. His delightful stories about the stockbroker's board room, the true microcosm, where every human emotion, every social class, is seen reacting to similiar stimuli. —From the crass opportunist (The public are a bunch of fools. You just gotta be smart and you can put anything over on 'em. Why, just the other day I cleaned up twenty grand on a little manipulation . . .) to the one who is sincerely convinced that stocks are the bulwark of free enterprise, which is the bulwark of all civilized decencies!

David also told of his father. An immigrant from Syria, he earned a Ph.D. in political science from Johns Hopkins, taught one year, and then abruptly quit. He had decided that teaching did not give him enough time to do what he wanted to do. So he spent the rest of his life as the proprietor of an oriental rug concession in a Dayton, Ohio department store. If he sold one rug a month, David said, he had enough to live on. So he spent his time sitting in his corner and chatting and philosophizing with a stream of people who would seek him out. Or he would stay up all night talking with visiting professors, publishers, and writers. He also wrote books—children's books, retelling Persian fables.

More departmental politics, in the best C. P. Snow fashion. Last year Crawford, Brady, and Terrie & Co. pushed through a revision of English 25 after they were defeated in their proposed revision of English 1 & 2. Now, at our first department meeting, Harry Bond announced that the CDC had recommended that the revision be rescinded. Conveniently, Brady had left, Crawford was on a fellowship to Italy, and Terrie was on leave! Also, John Finch announced that he had never sent the voted proposal in to the Administration, because, he said, it was too late in the year. The skunk! Bond reminded us that according to Robert's Rules of Order a rescinding motion could only be initiated by someone who had originally voted for the original proposal. Conveniently, Harry Schultz had changed his mind and was ready to make the motion. Someone asked about Terrie. What would he say? Shouldn't he be present? Bond said he had talked privately with Terrie, who had also—miraculously, it seems—had a change of heart, and had given Bond his proxy. The motion was seconded and passed almost unanimously. I had been against it, but I feel that the handling of the rescinding was disgraceful. Later, the rumor went around that Bond had secured Terrie's consent through a deal. Terrie agreed, so the story goes, to offer his support to the rescinding action providing Crawford be received back without prejudice. This brought home to me—I am so naïve—that Crawford had been awarded his fellowship, in part at least, to be gotten rid of. By going away he automatically gave up the chairmanship of Freshman English, and his position on the various faculty committees he had been appointed to during his meteoric rise. Apparently Crawford was cultivated as being an energetic, forceful, efficient person, but then he “got too many ideas,” tried to “stir things up,” offended “certain parties,” and thus had been relegated to the doghouse. Perhaps he deserves it (I, after all, side with Bond, Perin, Hunter, Loomis, Handler & Co. against the Crawford-Terrie axis). But still . . . the whole trouble here is that hatred and conniving are all done with such gentility, such courtesy. It is all so civilized, and basically corrupt.

My Cavafy essay is finished and ready for Columbia University Press. But Dalven’s publishers are withholding the translation rights to the 35 poems I have freshly translated.

Nice letter from Jeff Amory, now in Athens for a year.

December 16, 1963

A most flattering review of my Hartley book in the Dutch periodical Literair Paspoort. Among other things the critic, C. Buddingh, says: “[Bien’s study] is een der beste kritische geschriften die ik de laatste jaren las en ik hoop dat Peter Bien al weer druk bezig is een andere romancier te becommentariëren . . .”

¶ From a scientific point of view, optimism and pessimism are alike objectionable: optimism assumes, or attempts to prove, that the universe exists to please us, and pessimism that it exists to displease us. Scientifically, there is no evidence that it is concerned with us either one way or the other. The belief in either pessimism or optimism is a matter of temperament, not of reason. —Bertrand Russell, History of Western Philosophy, p. 759.

¶ The world of high classicism exists simultaneously with the cult of death; beneath civilization lies “Kultur,” in Naphta’s sense. The old antitheses! Yet Castorp half-awakened, is able to reconcile them. The “People of the Sun” live with such exquisite humanity and form precisely because they know of cruelty and tragedy at the roots of life; they realize the power of death but do not abdicate before it, they create form because they are aware of the strength of dissolution. Settembrini, who acknowledges only the world of light, is a Philistine; But Naphta, who has betrayed that world, is evil. Both are wrong, and their endless playing-off of death against life, illness against health, spirit against nature, is essentially meaningless. Man must be “master of the antinomies”: he must stand between them and understand life through his knowledge of death, and health through illness. Not Settembrini’s reason, but love is stronger than death. —Henry Hatfield, Thomas Mann, pp. 79–80.

Hotel Byron, Corinth, Greece

Class D hotel, with pillows like sandbags, and sagging beds and a smelly WC, but lovely, white, and clean. Price for four of us: 55 dr. The owners, a brother and sister, both unmarried. The sister greeted us effusively as though we were the only customers she had had in ten years (which wasn't true). Her mannerisms were particularly childish, with the kind of self-effacing, shy smile seen in Greek adolescent girls, the equivalent, I suppose, to the self-effacing courtesy that is customary in Japan. Later we discovered that she was a γεροντοκόρη. This fit: she was somewhat grotesque, and pathetic, the adult whose emotional life and outward mannerisms had been petrified prematurely. In our room we found an embroidery on the table, obviously hers, part of the group of pillow-cases, etc. she had prepared for her dowry, and had never used. Chrysanthi felt this very strongly, and explained that what with so many wars in Greece, the women far outnumbered the men, and thus many remain unmarried. The sister also hugged our children profusely, but it was interesting that she was completely ingenuous in her childish way. Δεν επαντρεύτηκα, she said, και αγαπώ τα παιδιά. The next day, when Alec returned somewhat longfaced over the death of a butterfly he had found on the radiator grill of the taxi, she presented him with a fresh butterfly!

Alec, at his Greek kindergarten, has to say the Άγιος ο Θεός, άγιος ισχυρός, άγιος αθάνατος, ελεησόν ημάς. He came home proudly today and recited it, but it came out like this: Αι σκυλός, α-σχημός !

April 22, 1964

To the National theater with the Choukases and Mrs. Κακούρη. They played Τα Πάθη του Χριστού, an old miracle play from Byzantine times, probably bits and snatches of other works put together rather artlessly by the monks of the time. The work was played beautifully, but itself had little to recommend it. Christ was presented very realistically, first on the cross, from where he spoke to Mary just before he died, then in his appearance to Mary Magdalene on the third day, and finally in his appearance to the assembled disciples. Each time Christ appeared, a woman behind us in the audience spoke out spontaneously, Αχ, τι ωραίο ! And indeed it was truly beautiful the way he did appear on the stage, right out of the old icons, he seemed. The woman's spontaneous reaction reminded me of the incident Kazantzakis relates in Report to Greco where the man is reciting the passion on the ship to Palestine, and the woman cries out Παιδί μου !

Ξενοδοχείο Κοσμοπολίτη, Ηράκλειον, Κρήτη

Kazantzakis has words for everything. Yesterday morning, just before Mike Antonakis, Jeff Amory, and I left for Piraeus to sail for Crete, I translated something very à propos: Τι ωραίο να ξεκόπτεις από τη γης που αγαπάς και να φύγεις· τι χαρά να δεις τη γη κι τους ανθρώπους που αγαπάς να αλαργήσουν. I'm botching the actual quote, but whatever it was it "spoke to our condition."

The boat, the Αιγεύς, was to leave at 6:30. We were warned to arrive early, lest someone claim our beds (such things happen, apparently). Accordingly, we arrived at 3:30. But no boat! It was delayed, and did not get to Piraeus until after 7:00, and did not sail until nearly 11:00. While we were waiting, Alec walked absent-mindedly into the tray of a waiter in a coffee shop, and slit open his eyelid. But other than this, no further casualties. But what a boat! The whole vessel reeked of urine; the toilets looked as though they hadn't been cleaned in six months. Our cabin was deep down in the stern, just above the propeller shaft, as we discovered once the boat started out. Cluck-cluck-crack-bam; cluck-cluck-crack-bam, all night long. But we were aristocratic in our second class comfort! Most of the passengers had only deck space. Men lined their valises up in a row and stretched out between them and the railing, so that they seemed in their coffins; one peasant lady in her black skirts and her μπολίδα was curled up on top of three large pack-baskets. Other people had claimed bench-space, or were doubled over or crouching in various corners. Early arrivals had spread blankets out to their full dimensions, thus giving themselves ample space to breathe. Two intrepid Americans sacked out in sleeping bags on the upper deck. When the boat finally got under way we went up to the deck, trying without much success to find a spot where the wind did not carry the stench of urine. Some boys with guitars were singing in harmony in one corner, not too successfully; in another, a young soldier was playing a bouzouki rather amateurishly, but was drowned out by a transistor radio. I got to talking with a young student at the University of Athens Medical School, and we stayed up till 1:00 a.m. He, as is so typical, hoped to come to the U.S. because of the lack of opportunity here in Greece either for doing research or even for practicing, since there are more physicians, apparently, than the demand requires. He had read two of Kazantzakis's novels, which rather surprised and pleased me. . . . The boat finally arrived at Herakleion at 3:00 o'clock (it was due at 8:30 a.m.). How nice—especially after the propeller and also the terrific pitching—to set foot on land! The approach to Herakleion is very dramatic. First you see mountains: snowcapped Ψηλορείτης, cone-shaped Στρόμπολι, and to the left Γιούχτας, which, in a startling way, offers the profile of the sleeping Zeus: hair, eyes, nose, mouth, and beard flowing down (as Kazantzakis says) to the plain:

On the left, before you reach the harbor, is the rocky, barren island of Δια, completely uninhabited and uninhabitable—an immense round of solid rock that still seems to show how it formed: it seems to be the solidified state of great flows of molten stone. Then as you come nearer: the Venetian fort guarding the harbor entrance, and you have arrived.

We all felt terrible: sick and tired. But we determined to do something with the remainder of the day. Our first stop was the Historical Museum.

They have a room dedicated to the heroes of the revolutions and uprisings, together with mementoes of Prince George: his desk, uniform, a large portrait, etc. Then there are costumes and embroideries, a typical interior of a Cretan χαμόσπιτο, with the τζάκι, water-bag, carved walking stick, the σταμνί in one corner for washing, the embroidery on the wall next to the high, elaborate bed, and kneading trough on the floor, the walls whitewashed and immaculate.

The main attraction for us, of course, was the Αἴθουσα Νίκου Καζαντζάκη. Here was his library and desk, plus some photos and portraits, plus the original MSS of Ὁ Χριστός ξανασταυρώνεται and Ὁ τελευταῖος πειρασμός. Also some letters, including several to his father, in one of which he speaks of wanting to become a professor at the University of Athens. Another, from Moscow in 1927, describes the scene there in words almost exactly the same as those used in Ἀναφορά στὸν Γκρέκο. In two display cases on the opposite wall are his various books, including the myriad translations. Over the bookshelf, it was interesting to see a rather large icon of the crucifixion. The library comprised books in Greek, Latin, English, Spanish, French, and Italian. I noted the book about Nietzsche presented to him by someone in Paris when he first went there to study. He speaks of this in Greco. Other mementoes are report cards from the school in Naxos, and a commonplace book in which K. copied out poems he enjoyed.

We proceeded from here to his grave on the Venetian rampart overlooking St. Minas, the entire city, and the sea in the distance. The gate was locked; we shall have to return tomorrow. Apparently the grave was desecrated by religious fanatics, necessitating the fence and lock.

The city itself is small and charming. Many things are just as K. described them—still. Especially the courtyards. I peeked in to many, and there were the γλάστρες βασιλικό and the tree in the middle, and the lovely smell of flowers in bloom.

Strolling near the walls, we heard music from a small tavern and saw an old man dancing with a plate on his head. It is good to know that this still exists elsewhere than in Never On Sunday!

Tomorrow I hope to see K.'s nephew Νίκος Σακλαμπάνης and his mother, who is K.'s sister.

The other day I spoke with Αλέξανδρος Σεγκόπουλος for an hour. He is Cavafy's executor. He showed me the entire correspondence with Hogarth Press and Harcourt Brace. Harcourt actually negotiated with him only for the thirty or so “early poems.” The rights to the others they bought from Hogarth Press directly—the “exclusive English language rights” unfortunately. Sengopoulos had Cavafy’s armchair, table, etc. He confirmed what has been often said of Cavafy’s charm and fascination as a conversationalist. He also said that one must be very careful of Malanos, whose books are full of lies and κακία. Apparently Malanos was an unsuccessful poet, and his attacks on Cavafy were a kind of sour grapes. Sengopoulos especially said that Malanos is not right about Cavafy’s anomaly, that he exaggerates and distorts.

April 28, 1964

en route Χανιά-Αθήνα via Olympic Airways

Sadly, we returned to Athens after almost a week of enlightenment, beauty, and rest in Crete. Even today, the last, which Mike and I had thought would be spent just killing time until departure, was spent profitably and enjoyably. We wandered around Χανιά, through its narrow lanes, down to the harbor and out onto the breakwater, and found ourselves suddenly at the central church, a strange building with a barrel-vaulted roof, and one tower a campanile, the other a minaret with the μολύβι and the μεσο-φέγγαρο missing. At the unexpected invitation of two boys, we climbed the 100 steps of the minaret and emerged on the highest of the two parapets, to see the entire city in panorama. The boy explained that the back part of the church, the present sanctuary, was originally Greek, the middle part, with the barrel vault, was originally Venetian, and the front, the present “porch,” etc., was part of the Turkish mosque. This explains the strange appearance of this disparate building.

We went next to the Historical Museum, where the directress was impressed by our knowledge of the Greek language, and also of Cretan history, which was somewhat familiar to both of us, of course, from Kazantzakis’s various books. We saw more of Prince George—pictures of the landing at Σοῦδα (K. was wrong in saying that he landed at Ἡράκλειον); we saw banners and τουφέκια from the various revolutions; we saw a picture of Δασκαλογιάννης, who was flayed alive by the Turks, and about whom a ballad was written (cf. Notopoulos’s record). She told us the story of how during a bombardment of the region by a Russian battleship one of the cannons backfired, killing the Russian crew. The barrage had previously ruined the church of Ἅγιος Ἡλίας, and the czar of Russia—being a God-fearing soul—took this as a judgment by God on behalf of St. Elias, and rebuilt the little church, furnishing it with icons that we later saw when we visited the village of Agios Elias. The guide also told of the incident when the Greek banner was shot down, its staff broken, how soldier after soldier held it up, offering himself as a human staff in full view of enemy fire. As soon as one was killed, the next caught the flag before it touched the ground. According to the story, this so impressed the enemy that they ceased fire!

We spoke to this woman about the Turks. Mike asked her if they left anything good on the island, and the answer was No—nothing. She didn't blame the sultan, though, but rather his corrupt underlings. When, for instance, the sultan lowered the head tax, the functionary collected the old tax and pocketed the difference. As the woman spoke of all this, she became more and more emotional, and seemed on the verge of tears.

A benign-looking Englishman was in one room, carefully transcribing some Byzantine musical notation. Hearing me speak Greek with the woman, he said, in a most peculiar idiom, "You have good the Greek don't you!"

We've just flown over Μήλος. The water below looks like μουσαμάς.

Leaving the museum, we went by taxi to Venizelos's grave high over Haniá. The Greeks still have a genius for dramatic sites, although they're not hard to find in Greece. The taxi driver had a new Pontiac, just three days old. He asked us how much a Pontiac costs in the States, and I said about $3000. He said he bought this for $7000! By time payments, of course. He has to pay in three years, at the rate of $150 per month—450 drachmas. How can he ever make enough to cover this?

At the grave is a simple inscription, something like: ἵσως ἔκανε λάθη, ἀλλά ἦταν ἓνας ἀληθινός ἄντρας. The father's grave is near that of the son, Σοφοκλῆς, who died about three months ago. But the really impressive thing is the statue of liberty, with the inscription ἐλευθερία . . . ἰερόν. This is a huge female figure looking out over the plain toward Haniá. She bears a warrior's helmet and is carrying a shield. When you walk around to the front to see the face, you are immensely surprised. For here is an ugly face indeed, a kind of Byzantine rigor, with fat cheeks and, most startling of all, two huge pointed goggle-eyes staring out at you like oversized buttons. At the statue's base, strewn about, were the circular forms of various wreaths that had been placed there and then abandoned. The flowers had withered away and disappeared, leaving these macabre right-shaped “bones.” A shepherd was driving his flock along the steep incline just below the statue. The sheep passed by it, baaing, the shepherd-boy swishing at them with a piece of white cloth, and making chuckling noises with his mouth.

18 Βενιζέλου, Νέο Ψυχικό, Αθήνα

I am relating this trip in a most arbitrary order. The day before we returned by air from Haniá was a very interesting one, too. In the morning we went to the Archeological Museum at Iraklion, where the finds from Knossos, Phaistos, Malia, Agia Triada, etc. are deposited. The actual wall-paintings from Knossos are of course but mere fragments, and it is easy to be duped by the restorations into thinking that more was discovered than actually was. The finds are in no way as startlingly beautiful as those from Mycenae, in the Εθνικό Μουσείο of Athens. But it was nice to see the snake goddess with her thimble-waist and big round breasts, and the acrobat engraved on a knife-handle, and the huge double-axes, and the large saw, almost identical with present day two-man saws.

At noon, Mike and I took the bus to Haniá, Jeff having decided to stay a few extra days in Iraklion. As usual, two people had been assigned the same seat, and there was a sudden flaring up of tempers and much effort to shift responsibility. At last a modus vivendi was achieved when the girl involved was allowed to sit in the seat opposite the driver, the one reserved for the πράκτορας. Some official protested that this was forbidden, but she remained nevertheless. Later, just before we entered a certain town apparently noted for its police, the driver politely requested her to move back, and she did.

A hawker visited us just before departure, selling material for trousers: 400 δρ. Πού να βρείτε πανταλόνια για τετρακόσια! he kept insisting, but he had a most quizzical manner, as though he himself knew—and wanted us to know that he knew—that he was taking everyone for a ride. He seemed to be playing a game in which the actual sale of his merchandise was entirely incidental. Needless to say, there was no sale.

The road from Iraklio starts climbing immediately. Hairpin turns, sheer drops, absence of guardrails! Up and up, to the very crest of the range, with beautiful views of the sea at various points, and of mountains at other points, and occasionally a fertile patch with vineyards. I feared the driver would go racing down the other side in neutral, but he didn't. There was constant honking, at every curve, and whenever a car or truck or bus approached from the other direction both vehicles had to stop, and then inch past one another, gingerly.

The mountainsides are cultivated, wherever possible, and often far from any village. The goat tracks are visible everywhere, up and down, across and back, and the peasants must travel long distances each day to reach their holdings. It is staggering to think that out of one of these mountain villages came Domenicos Theotocopoulos, also Venizelos.

We passed Σοῦδα, where Prince George landed; Also we passed the road to the Arkadion monastery, 18 kilometers to the south. This I wanted to visit, but could not, for we were rushing to catch the last day or two, before the Easter break, of the filming of Michael Cacoyannis's film Zorba.

(Alec today said that the sunset was "bumpy.")

Item: re: the citification of Greeks. A family near us had help from another family nearby. The woman went back to her village, a great center of λάδι production, and brought a huge jug of λάδι to give to the family as a present, to show her appreciation. The next day, to her surprise, the jug was returned with an accompanying note saying, "We're not beggars, we have money to buy λάδι. Thus the urban demon of self-sufficiency wins again!

Item: overheard last night at the theater where we saw Ο αντιπρόσωπος ("The Deputy"). Just before curtain time, from two ladies behind us, very chagrined because the curtain was five minutes late: Τι νομίζουν; Νομίζουν είμαστε χωριάτισσες; Νομίζουν είναι η πρώτη φορά που πηγαίνουμε στο θέατρο; One more victory for the urban spirit!

A propos of this, in today's paper there was a long review of Prevelakis's new novel, Η κεφαλή της Μέδουσας. Prevelakis's prescription for our problem is a return to λαϊκός πολιτισμός. Incidentally, Prevelakis told me the other day that one of the characters in this book is modeled on Kazantzakis.

Yesterday, Chrysanthi and I visited Kimon Friar, who has a lovely apartment at Καλλιδρομίο 10. Ανδρέας Καραντώνης came in shortly after we arrived. He is known as the best Greek critic. At first I thought he was blind; he had a peculiarly blank kind of stare, and his eyes seemed all milky, as though they had no irises or pupils. He was extremely simple —on looking at him you would think he was some stolid businessman without a thought in his head except food and account books (indeed he was rather plump and well fed). We talked briefly about Kazantzakis, whom he admired but said was definitely of a past generation, and not at all an influence on contemporary Greek writers. It was especially K.'s rhetorical quality, his μεγάλο στόμα, that the moderns rejected. Even his existentialism, according to Friar, is distinctly old hat, and is theoretical and academic rather than truly, livingly, contemporary. I asked how the Nobel Prize was thought of here, and Karandonis replied that of course most Greeks had never heard of Seferis but that his fellow poets respect him greatly. His work is for the choice, the elect; it can never have the universal appeal that Kazantzakis has. Friar mentioned that in Seferis's translation of The Waste Land, "rag" in "O that Shakespearian rag" is rendered κουρέλι!

Friar was in good form. The flat was lovely, full of art and color and books, and with a beautiful view of Athens and the surrounding mountains. Friar said that though he'd lived in the U.S. since the age of 2, he was Greek at heart, and had come here to spend the rest of his days. He wanted to die here in Greece! He said that although the amount of "culture" in NYC is so much greater than here, in Athens art is practiced, new works are written and painted, the emphasis isn't so much on playing or reproducing the past. Also, and one is hard put to know exactly what is meant by this, Friar insisted that here in Greece "life is lived." To be sure, he had many adjustments to make. He had to learn the spirit of δεν πειράζει and δεν βιαριέσαι. He had to learn never to apologize—no Greek ever apologizes, says Friar. He quickly got used to the little annoyances, including the cheating, the overcharging, etc. He learned to appreciate the good things and to overlook the bad, a lesson that both Chrysanthi and I have yet to learn.

Friar chatted about Kazantzakis. I said I was amazed that K. had been able to write so much in such a short time, and Friar replied that the reason was very simple: K. did nothing else but write! When Friar stayed with him at Antibes he used to go to Cannes every night to dance until 3 a.m., and when he showed up at K.'s study the next morning ready for work, K. would ask him what he had done the night before. Friar would tell him and K. would say Bravo! He appreciated the γλεντζές because he wasn't one himself.

Friar hasn't become any less modest since the last time I saw him. He still has his gallery of famous figures on the wall. He pointed to Arthur Miller's picture and said, characteristically, "Arthur just sent me a copy of his new play."

The most surprising event of the visit was that Friar offered me a job as assistant editor of Greek Heritage! I had to say No. Why? If I were single I would jump at it. I told him I have a responsibility to return to Dartmouth, since the College financed my trip here. Also, I imagine that work on the magazine, although certainly having its glamorous and interesting side, would be largely the drudgery of copyediting. Friar himself said that for two years he has been so busy with the magazine that he hasn't done any writing of his own, and this is a bad sign.

Friar told me that someone is already writing a book on Cavafy. But that doesn't matter, he said. "You can write a better book."

I wonder if—when Friar said that one can "live" in Greece—he meant that one can find and keep boys more easily. Also, I wonder if being his "assistant" would mean compromising oneself in any way, either in reality or in the eyes of those who know of Friar's sexual proclivities.

C.'s mother has an ulcer. So does George. C. said that about half the girls at the Quaker school had ulcers. Here is the hidden fruit of the war! And what about that stupid cliché that only Americans have ulcers?

No, it turns out that it isn't an ulcer but a "fallen stomach" for which an elastic belt and a special diet are prescribed.

From Paul Tillich's The Courage to Be, p. 39: ¶ The human mind is not only, as Calvin has said, a permanent factory of idols, it is also a permanent factory of fears—the first in order to escape God, the second in order to escape anxiety.

(This presupposes Tillich's distinction between fear and anxiety: fear has an object and thus calls forth courage to meet that object; anxiety has no object, "or rather . . . its object is the negation of every object" (p. 36)—i.e., nonbeing.)

Today the second annual Greek peace march took place, from Marathon to Athens. Last year the Karamanlis government prohibited the demonstration and broke it up with tanks; this year Papandreou said that although the other Western countries prohibited such demonstrations [sic] and although it transgressed the Greek constitution, he would not interfere. Nice of him!

The slogan was Λαμπράκης ζει! Grigoris Lambrakis was murdered by the Greek secret police in the open air after he gave a speech in Thessaloniki. He had apparently infuriated the Court because he organized the demonstrations against Queen Frederiki in London, calling for amnesty for political prisoners. Today his spirit was very much alive as the marchers descended on Athens shouting Λαμπράκης ζει, είμαστε Λαμπράκηδες! As they passed the Averof prison, where female political prisoners are still held although 20 years have elapsed since the civil war, the shout altered to ΑΜ-ΝΗΣ-ΤΙΑ. The women in the prison waved white handkerchiefs from behind their prison windows. At the huge congregation at the end of the march, the group was greeted by Mrs. Pauling, and also by Bertrand Russell's representative. The latter had been expelled from Greece (as last year) upon his arrival, but apparently he went back to Rome and was somehow able to embarrass the Greek government into reversing its decision and letting him enter after all.

There was a heavy downpour yesterday afternoon, the first in months. Obviously the pious will say that God was punishing the marchers. But they, wet to the skin, entered Athens dancing and barefooted.

Last night we visited a neighbor's house, a man who works in the τελωνείο. What one couldn't help remarking was the complete absence of anything really Greek. He served whiskey and cocktails, also little tidbits—cheese and crackers, etc.—just as at an American gathering. He also said that he never goes to the taverna, but entertains at home. Another couple was there and we spent the evening looking at amateur movies of their babies and wives, and their holiday in Rhodes! The house itself was American style: combination living and dining room, a suite of armchairs, and a couch, coffee table, etc. Only the children were different; they sat like automatons, not breathing a word for hours. When the other couple left, the wife remarked Τι παιδι έχω· ποτέ δεν ακούει!

Λαγκαδάς

Feast day of Saint Constantine the Great and Saint Eleni, his mother. We took the bus last night and came to Salonika. This morning, early, George drove us to Langadas to see the Αναστενάρηδες. We went immediately to the κονάκι, which was the house of the αρχιαναστενάρης. From outside, the monotonous banging of the νταούλι could be heard, and the scratchy, monotonous melody of the Cretan lyre (played with a bow—a tiny tiny viol, like a rebec). We entered the house: hallway leading into a small dark room, low ceiling of dressed boards, one small window, dirt floor tamped hard as rock, τσάκι in the center of one wall, large bed with brass bedsteads, other bed along the wall opposite the tsaki. Dark. The only lights were from the wall opposite the window. Here, on a mantle-like shelf, were various icons. They say that these icons were rescued from the church in the πατριδα of the chief Anastenaris's family. The church burned, but the icons miraculously did not. Two such marvelous icons were brought here to Langadas, one to the village of Agia Eleni near Serres. The icons were on the mantel, and below on the floor, on top of a heavy, decorative blanket, was a candleholder with many burning candles, and also a receptacle with burning incense. In this room a man was dancing. About 40 years old, and good looking, dressed in a white shirt with open collar, and ordinary trousers. He held an icon in his hand. The icon had a red cover over it, attached to which were many votive offerings, which tingled like bells. This man danced forward and backward with short steps, swaying his body from side to side and gracefully transferring the icon from one side to the other, his head inclined toward his right shoulder, his eyes sometimes closed, sometimes staring straight ahead. A woman told us that he had been dancing and praying since early morning in an attempt to make the icon of St. Constantine move (of its own accord). Every so often he emitted short shrieks—EEEE! EEEK!—grimacing his face. Several times he did this in front of the icon of Constantine. Once or twice he lifted this icon and shook it vigorously, as though trying to convince it to move. He danced inside for some time, but periodically danced his way out of the house, made a little turn in the yard, always with the same inclined head, the icon held out in his arms in the same way, and then returned inside. An older lady dressed in a μπόλια and black robe wiped his face every so often, as he was sweating profusely. Several times she implored him: Φτάνει πια! But he continued his dance, even when the music stopped. (The lyre-player endured, but the drummers relieved each other from time to time.) Finally he stopped, put on his jacket, and went out into the yard. Immediately he began talking as though nothing had happened—as though he was completely unaware of the state he'd just been in. I asked him if his σόϊ came from Thrace, and he said yes: Ανατολική Θράκη. But then an Italian television interviewer came and started pumping him with questions: What did you feel like? How long did you dance? He immediately clammed up. When asked how long he'd danced, he replied, Δε ξέρω, συ να ξέρεις. Then he disappeared inside. These Italians were particularly officious; they followed the dancers everywhere to take pictures, sitting in front of them, running along with them, etc. Later, the αρχιαναστενάρης, justifiably disturbed, passed once with the θυμιατήρι, placed it under the nose of the photographer, and chased him back a few meters!

After this short intermission, the dance began again with the same man and also, now, a young boy about 18 years old who I afterwards learned was the son of the αρχιαναστενάρης. The man held the icon again, the boy had over his shoulders the special kerchief that the Anastenarides use. Soon afterwards, an older woman joined the troupe. She danced in a slightly different way, raising her arms in spasmodic movements. Later, when another officious photographer came, this time right into the konaki, with flood lights, and shone the intense light right into her face, she did not even blink, but kept on dancing, always with the identical expression. This rapid, intense dancing lasted about three quarters of an hour, until the archianastenaris came and shouted to us all: Έχω! Έξω! We filed out through the narrow hallway. The icons were now placed on chairs outside of the house, then transferred in a procession to another site in back of the house. While all this was happening, one of the family led the cows out from their stable in the back part of the house; thus ecstasy and everyday concerns proceeded synchronously.

At this point the αγιασμός took place: the blessing of the water. A pail of water was placed in front of the icons, which were once more lined up on chairs. The archianastenaris blessed the water, kissing the icons and throwing some coins into the pail. (The local priest naturally refused to perform the blessing, as the Church quite rightly deems all this idolatry.) The lady who danced previously approached with a little tuft of stalks, dipped them into the water, and sprinkled the surrounding people. Then the rest of the anastenarides kissed the icons and took some of the water in glasses; after them the remaining people of the village.

Immediately after this, two animals were slaughtered, a calf and a sheep. Two young boys, about 14 years old, did the butchering. The animals were flayed, dismembered, and cut into small sections, which were distributed raw to the village houses, starting with those of the anastenarides, and continuing to as many houses as the meat lasted.

After this, all the group danced in front of the αγιασμός: ο αρχιαναστενάρης, his wife, his son, the man who screamed ΕΕΕΚ, the woman with the spasmodic hands, plus several new initiates: a man dressed immaculately in stiff collar and shining vest and tie, and a young soldier (who had formerly taken his turn at the drum), and another young man about 20 years old, wearing a pullover, all the time with the same tune on the lyre, the same incessant beating of the drum.

Thus ended the morning's preparations. As we left to go to have lunch, I overheard the archianastenaris say, Πάω να ταΐσω τα ζώα.

At 4 in the afternoon we took our places to await the fire-walking. George, a VIP in the village, secured an invitation from the νομάρχης entitling us to seats, and we settled ourselves in the front row, directly behind the wire enclosure. So far so good. We resigned ourselves to the long wait. The sun was beating down, but luckily we had an umbrella to shade us. Chrysanthi wrote letters; I wrote in this diary. We enjoyed looking at the people around us—lots of foreigners, including some Negroes, who aroused great curiosity in the village, and the ever-present photographers who had been so offensive in the morning. Soon the area inside the wire fence began to fill too, at first with just a person here, a person there, but soon, so it seemed, there were more people inside than out. The νομάρχης was going mad, as were the committee in charge of arrangements, although all maintained good humor. One of the men was an acquaintance of George's, a good-looking farmer in his forties, owner of many στρέμματα, a kind of entrepreneurial peasant. Apparently each of the invited VIPs had brought cousins and girlfriends, so that the actual number far exceeded the expected number. Chairs appeared from nowhere and filled the edges of the arena. The νομάρχης paced back and forth on his lame leg, trying to satisfy everyone. Finally a group came and placed itself directly in front of us: some young men with their girlfriends. They said they were journalists. The girls sat on stools in front of us, saucy, and fat in the behinds. We razzed them, insulted them, called them all kinds of names, but they remained put. A woman in back of us stood up suddenly and screamed that she was the wife of a βουλευτής and wouldn't stand for such an outrage, but the νομάρχης pretended not to hear.

Meanwhile, no developments with the fire-walkers. In time, however, wood was brought—slim branches, perhaps dead wood. Several of the fraternity, two old men very slow and dignified, piled the wood into a neat pyramid and lighted it, with an infinite number of photographers snapping away. The wood burned, the pyramid subsided. The men stirred up the fire, reversing the poles whose far ends remained still unburned. In about an hour there was nothing but embers, which the newspaper the next day reported were about 200° C. (392° F.) Then while we were still complaining about the three backsides blocking our view (it was a good way, after all, to pass the time), suddenly the faint sound of a drum was heard. They were coming! The huge crowd suddenly became silent. Never have I seen such a sudden shift, such tense anticipation. You could feel that we were in the presence of something that was extremely meaningful to each person, although probably no one could explain exactly why it was meaningful, something demanding concentration and respect. In a moment the troupe appeared amidst a swarm of spectators. The same lyre-player was playing the same tune, the drummer was banging away vigorously. The number of αναστενάρηδες had increased greatly. Besides all the ones I had seen in the morning, there was ο Κύριος Εμμανουήλ, a co-αρχιαναστενάρης, and three or four younger boys, including two sons of the other archianastenaris. Several were walking on fire for the first time. They were all dancing as before, each in his or her own way, yet sharing a basic similarity with all the rest. Each, also, had his or her own manner of fire-walking. The wife of the archianastenaris (she was fat, with a red face and a goiter) simply walked across in a shuffling gait, with a kind of forward momentum seen in sufferers from Parkinson's disease. As she did so, she rhythmically hissed: shish-shish-shish. Her husband also walked shuffling across, but in silence, stolidly. The man in the fancy clothes (by now he had discarded his necktie) was the fanciest. Waving his arms wildly, he stamped and pranced on the embers, and later, when presumably they had cooled a little, he dug his feet down into them and kicked them in the air. He, of all the dancers, remained the longest on the embers at any one time. One of the young boys was also dramatic: he entered the fire with arms spread out horizontally, and took high leaps over the embers. Another of the youngsters seemed less sure of himself. Chrysanthi said he looked extremely pale, but I could not see this. All in all the πυροβασία lasted about an hour. Before long, several of the group were sifting the embers in their hands. Toward the end, the co-chief, ο κ. Εμμανουήλ, shouted, 'Όλοι μαζί, να τα κάνουμε στάχτη, όλοι μαζί, and the entire group danced together on the embers, chanting Στάχτη να γεν, στάχτη να γεν. Once again the devil had been conquered; good—the human soul had stamped out evil! The wives and children of the anastenarides now formed a ring about the ashes and began a συρτός. At the very end, the well-dressed fire-walker approached the VIPs and shouted triumphantly: Και του χρόνου! The miracle had been achieved, another year had gone by, and the tradition would be carried on indefinitely, just as it had already been carried on from remotest antiquity.

I have been reading Mme Kakouri's book on this subject. She sees a direct transmission from Dionysian rites in Thrace to various heresies in the Christian period, thence to the anastenarides.

Walking away from the site of the πυροβασία, I stopped to chat with a monk who was selling napkin rings, jewelry, etc. made at the 'Άγιον Όρος. He was about 65 or 70 years old, with a sparse beard, all gray except for scattered black hairs. He kept scattering away children who stood in front of the display (a rug spread on the ground, with all the products spread out). I asked him if he was from the 'Άγιον Όρος and he replied that he was. Από ποια μονή; 'Όχι. Εγώ μένω στην ερημιά, στη σπηλιά. I was impressed, though I found it difficult to reconcile the ερημιά with this mercantile enterprise on festival day in Langadas. He said that he'd been a monk for 40 years; he went when he was in his twenties. I tried to ask more, but couldn't, for I then became the unwilling listener to an endless monologue—the monk went into his spiel: how this life is vain and ephemeral, how we must bend all our efforts toward getting into heaven instead of going to hell, how we must reject the false joys of the world, etc., etc., etc. Finally I extricated myself and “fled.”

Of course, the strangest part of this whole business is the fact that in many ways the monk is so absolutely right. But the absolutely literal and unimaginative version of a truth, as seen in this man, somehow vitiates that truth.

George drove us back. We spent the evening at Kostas’s and Lola’s house. It was Kostas’s name day (Saint Constantine) and the house was full of relatives: his sister and her husband, their daughter, a lively talkative girl married to a morose, taciturn young man just finishing his army service, and various cousins. Kostas’s sister said that when she saw the anastenarides she felt ashamed that such things were allowed to exist. “They humiliate man,” she said; “they make civilization go back to where it began; they resemble animals.” I of course disagreed strongly, saying that the fire-walking, rather than being an example of superstition and animalism, is an instance where man’s soul has conquered his body. I could have added a good deal more: how the capability of ecstasy, and of single-minded devotion, has gone out of modern civilization, whereas it is something natural and necessary to the religious life; how these people really practiced their faith, if in this eccentric way, instead of simply going hypocritically through the motions, like most “advanced” representatives of modern civilization. But Kostas took the cake. I had seen enough of him the last time we were in Greece to see that he very openly valued money and money alone. But even so, I was surprised at the explanation he gave for the anastenarides, an explanation that was so wonderfully in character, which could only have come from him. “It’s obvious,” he said, “that they do it all for money! They get paid plenty, don’t you worry, for putting on that show!” O Pappous had warned me never to try to argue with Kostas, but nevertheless I offered a little resistance to this malignant and absurd notion. “Listen,” Kostas said, philosophically, “men do things for money and only for money—don’t kid yourself.”

Hotel Pithia, Delphi

Traveled to Δελφοί with Chrysanthi and the children. Leander talkative and disobedient as always, Alec full of tummy aches, Chrysanthi breaking into cold sweats because of the mountainous road. Βρήκα τον μελά μου! Even all this could not quite dampen the lovely spectacle of Delphi. The museum is somewhat poor, the chief attraction being The Charioteer. But even more interesting was the great stone ὀμφαλός, symbol of Delphi's position as the omphalos of the classical world. The village—i.e., the modern Delphi—is on the flank of Parnassos, with a stupendous panorama from your hotel balcony: a ribbon of dry riverbed at the base of a ravine, a great expanse of tufty green on the plain below, thousands upon thousands of olive trees, and Itea sparkling in the distance at the edge of the sea.

We arrived at 5:30 and went immediately to see the ancient remains. The weather-gnawed columns of the temple of Apollo are visible from below; one heads toward these. Not much is left, just the paving stones, one little temple that has been partially restored, these few columns, and a great number of foundations from the various buildings comprising the oracle. In back, the sheer, cave-pocked walls of Parnassos. Aside from the setting, and the beetling mountain, the remains are not very impressive. Not yet. But wonderful surprises are in store. You traverse a short winding path in back of the temple of Apollo, mount 20 or so steps, and suddenly find yourself standing in the orchestra of Delphi's theater! And what a sight this is! From the top row of seats you look down precipitously to the circular ὀρχήστρα, then past the remains of the temple of Athena and out and out to the mountains, the strip of plain, the sky and clouds. As so often in Greece, the site is all. Why did the ancients choose such inaccessible, dramatic settings for their cultural and religious centers? How did they build them, carve the theater, for instance, out of Parnassos's flanks, haul the stones—conceive the idea? And what wealth must have been represented! What an accumulation and accretion of decoration and adornment, as over the centuries the rich gifts were brought to the oracle by kings and generals!

But the greatest surprise of all was still awaiting us. You are already half way up Parnassos; you look above you and see nothing but thick pine groves, and then the sheer, naughty rocks behind them, with a blackbird sitting on the topmost pinnacle and cawing-cawing. You mount a path, you don't know where you are going, really, you pant from the exertion, you mount some more, turn suddenly in back of a huge boulder, and there, stretched out in front of you: flat, tamped, beautifully dimensioned, with tiers of seats along one side and curving gracefully around the western end, is the ancient stadium! More than at any other site, here, I believe, one can envision the ancient times. When you encounter this stadium so beautifully preserved beneath the cliffs of Parnassos, with the starting grooves still visible, and the seats so warmly rowed with grass trying to sprout in every crevasse, you can feel the crowds on all sides, and the officials in their assigned, very important-looking seats, and the splendid, naked athletes racing and jumping and hurling the discus. What crowds must have been here, judging from the theater and the stadium. Down below, near the “Tholos” and Temple of Athena Pronea, there seem to be the remains of an entire village. People desiring to consult the oracle came here first, and were questioned and examined, and had to pass several days before being granted admission. Thus the need for recreation. What else they had is hard to know—perhaps the scholars can tell better. We see the theater, the stadium, and we know that the priestesses were often holy prostitutes. Perhaps, also, the ancients took walks, as we did!

High up over the museum and overlooking the village is one of those typical, and typically horrible, Greek statues: a bust on top of a stele, both absolutely white. We approached with curiosity to see whose bust it was. “Probably the archeologist who dug out Delphi,” I said.

en route to Aegina, Poros, and Hydra

But when we went around in front of it we saw with surprise that the statue was of Sikelianos! Inscribed beneath were several μεγαλόστομους στίχους on Delphi, how it was the center of the universe, the ομφαλός της γης. How lovely it would have been if next to this statue there had been another one, of Cavafy, with lines from «Πρέσβεις απ’ την Αλεξάνδρεια»: how the envoys came to Delphi to settle the problem of succession to the Egyptian puppet-kingdom of the Ptolemies, but the oracle was given in Rome!

At night, in the Hotel Pythia, Chrysanthi went to bed early and I sat in the lobby talking to the hotel clerk and a friend of his who turned out to be a waiter. They were impressed and gratified to see an American talking Greek. They complained that no tourists were coming to Delphi this year because of the Cyprus question, and especially because, as they said, Italy and England gave their citizens the false impression that Greece was actually at war with Turkey.

At the way home we stopped for a moment and had marvelous wine, χύμα, from a huge demijohn. It was wine from Αράχωβα, the village just before Delphi.

One of my nicest experiences here was a visit to Pandelis Prevelakis. A most cordial man. When I called him on the telephone I started laboriously introducing myself, imagining that I would be a complete stranger. But he immediately replied: «Μα είστε ο Κύριος Μπην· βέβαια ξέρω τό όνομα και πολύ εκτιμώ τη μετάφρασή σας.» He said that he would be delighted to help me with my problems in translating the terzina “Greco,” and we arranged an appointment. He lives in Plaka, in a new apartment house. The apartment is very nicely appointed, with a huge study giving onto the street. Tables, books to the ceiling, couches, a stand with whiskey and glasses, etc. Prevelakis is middle-aged, with a funny not-ugly not-pretty face. He said he was from Rethymnon. Mike and I had stopped there briefly on our bus ride from Iraklion to Haniá. I remember remarking: What must it be like to live in a village like this? How remote! How dismal! And here was Prevelakis, in his book-lined study, beautiful paintings on the walls—the senior “man of letters” of Greece, surrounded by poets and writers—and he originated in Rethymnon! It is something to think about. I felt the same when I was pointed out the tiny mountain village that was the birthplace of El Greco.

Prevelakis showed me his treasures: the original MS of Kazantzakis’s Odyssey, comprising (I think) the 4th and 5th drafts: written out in K’s own hand over a three-month period (i.e., just the copying). P. also has 400 letters from K. that he is readying for publication. He told me that while K. was writing the terzinas he wrote to P. frequently, expressing his discouragement or enthusiasm at each stage of the composition. Thus P. in a sense followed the writing of these poems step by step, as he did many other of K’s writings. P. said that K. “stole” many things from him—e.g., the idea to use Mme Hortense, the wonderful expression Χριστός ανέστακας, etc. But P., in turn, “used” K. as one of his characters in Η κεφαλή της Μέδουσας.

While we were talking, a young poet called for a few moments. He had stayed up all night reading Terzakis’s Η πριγκηπέσσα Ιζαμπώ and was συνεπαρμένος, couldn’t put the book down. We discussed it a little. I said I remembered feeling a sense of drowning in details. But of course for the Greek, all the events related and historical people presented are more familiar, and do not tax the memory so. The poet left, and P. and I sat down side by side and did the Greco terzina line by line—all 160 lines! Three hours' work! How many mistakes I had made! And how could I have known some of the expressions used? For example: να μάσεις τα αποστούπια. Τα αποστούπια, P. explained, are the pubic hairs of women. During impetuous dances, pubic hair falls to the ground. When the dance is finished, the couples depart; then those without girlfriends can, if they wish, have the thrill of gathering up the pubic hairs—να μάσουν τα αποστούπια! What a curse to utter: να μάσεις τα αποστούπια! I was reminded of Thomas Laaspere's expression: to go around smelling bicycle seats.

The other day, Chrysanthi and I visited Ελένη Καζαντζάκη at Κηφισιά, where she is staying at her sister's house. She is about 55, and talks with what seems to be a slight lisp. We found her on the veranda, examining the galleys of the German translation of Greco against the Greek text to make sure that no changes or omissions had been made. She complained bitterly that the German publisher thought he could improve of K.'s style, and thus changed words and phraseology indiscriminately. This was one further indication of what seems Mrs. K.'s excessive, perhaps pathological, fear of being cheated in one way or the other. In this vein, she enlarged on her troubles with Friar, saying that he once told her that his translation of the Odyssey was better than the original. And that he is K.'s "spiritual son," a compliment K. apparently paid him, and which he has clung too as a justification for in a sense becoming K.'s legal heir! But enough of Friar who, according to everyone's testimony, will do anything for money. As Mrs. K. said, he is neither a Greek nor an American, but has taken the worst characteristics of both peoples.

She spoke a little of her life with K. She said that he truly wanted to "transubstantiate his flesh into spirit," especially as he grew older. He began disburdening himself of all worldly possessions. Why do we need this? Why do we need that? he would ask. When they went on trips and Mrs. K. suggested first class tickets, he would hesitate a minute, anxious to please her, but then say, "Why go first class? Let's go fourth class, like Albert Schweitzer!"

She also spoke of his eternal liveliness and intellectual alertness. When they were in Aegina she would go from the house to the market to do shopping, always along the same street. When she returned, he would ask her: Τι νέα; Αμ τι; Τι να δω; Μόνο πήγα στην αγορά. Τίποτε.

He in the afternoon would take the same walk, however, and return full of excitement: I saw this, I spoke to that man, I noticed a new flower, I smelt such-and-such smell . . .

She described what K. suffered in his last years. He had a large chronic wound or sore on his side, and he lost the sight of one eye. Yet he worked on and on, να κάνει το χρέος του.

I asked why the film Celui qui doit mourir ended the way it did, with the pilgrims barricaded behind a rock shooting it out, the priest in the forefront. The book had nothing of this martial feeling, and indeed the resort to arms, it seems to me, negates everything the book tries to say. She replied that Jules Dassin had insisted on the new ending. “He was very leftist at the time—I don’t know how he is now, perhaps Melina [Mercouri] has changed him—and he wanted, by means of the ending, to give courage to the oppressed masses.”

Αναφορά στον Γκρέκο is being pirated in Greece, and Mrs. K. cannot prosecute the offenders because she cannot find them, nor can she prove their crime since they reproduce the book by photo offset and it is impossible to distinguish a pirated copy from a genuine one.

Tillich in The Courage to Be, p. 19, says something that may be valid even today as a way of explaining the difference between Greece and the Western, protestant democracies: ¶ . . . the contrast in the valuation of the individual on the part of ancient and modern humanism. While the ancient world valued the individual not as an individual but as a representative of something universal, e.g. a virtue, the rebirth of antiquity saw in the individual a unique expression of the universe, incomparable, irreplaceable, and of infinite significance.

On our trip to Crete, we went to Haniá and took a taxi out to the Κόκκινο μετόχι, the set where Michael Cacoyannis is filming Zorba the Greek. We were soon taken under the wing of a bearded fellow named Nichols, who turned out to be the public relations man for the film—an American expatriate living in Rome. We learned later that his parents were Greek; he didn’t look Greek at all, and when I told him my address, he didn’t know how to spell Ψυχικό in Greek. He spoke the language, however, and thus was perfect for this job. Cacoyannis has collected around him a polyglot, international crew. The cameraman was a young Britisher, actually a German refugee living in England since 1939. He too spoke Greek, enough at least to direct the electricians. Nichols told us he scene was repeated four or five times, the same “spontaneous” merry-making seemed evident at each take—after all, the people were enjoying themselves.

George said after Kennedy’s death, wherever he went, even to the remotest villages, the people were concerned and lamenting. Illiterate peasants, who hardly knew what Kennedy looked like, grieved him as though he were their own son. This confirms an incident recorded in Αναφορά στον Γρέκο about the peasant so concerned about Norway’s fate during the war. In Greece, pictures of Kennedy are often found in shop windows, sometimes next to the king. Mrs. Kazantzakis’s sister had his picture framed on the wall of her house. In some places he has been placed on the iconostasis, with a watch-light burning in front of him.

Visited Professor Κακριδής, who collaborated with K. on the translation of the Iliad and now is continuing the Odyssey alone, since K. died. Twenty-four years he’s been working on the Odyssey, he told me. And I am so fed up with Greco after only three months! We spoke about Homer and Euripides (he agreed with me that Euripides is a sad decline after Sophocles and Aeschylus). He spoke about K.: the same impression one hears everywhere, of a man with a fantastic capacity for work—up at 6 a.m., at his table steadily until 8 at night. Kakridis also said very interesting things about τους Αναστενάρηδες and similar phenomena—namely, that there is much more in this way of survival than one would expect. He himself was aware of other villages with phallic processions, the celebrants holding the phallus to their breasts and stroking it lovingly, all in the name of Christ, and one village where on a particular saint’s day the men gather in a κοβάκι, take off all their clothes and proceed, naked, to tell old tales and fairytales. This apparently coincides with ancient Dionysian ritual.

I asked him why Greeks insist on pronouncing Homer and the other ancient authors with the Modern Greek pronunciation. His answer was the only sensible one I’ve heard on this question. He said that already by the time of the Golden Age—and probably before—the pronunciation was different from Homer’s time. That is, Aristotle, Plato, etc. pronounced Homer with their own pronunciation; the Byzantines pronounced him in their pronunciation, which differed from that of the Golden Age, etc. In other words, Homer has always, in a sense, been “contemporary” literature for Greeks instead of just an object of historical study. In reading him in modern pronunciation, today’s Greeks are merely doing what their ancestors have done for 2500 years.

I also visited Ζωή Καρέλλη, a poet. Kimon Friar had given me her address. I found her with her son, a graduate of the University of California and presently a resident of Australia. Η Ζωή was really ζωηρή, full of passion and ideas and καημός. She is a poet of man’s alienation and desperation. No exit! seems to be her recurring motif. Friar has done some translations of her work—the best things I’ve seen of Friar’s yet, really a splendid job: a poem in the full sense, in English. She is a great fan of T. S. Eliot’s, and translated The Family Reunion into Greek. I voiced my antipathy to Eliot’s “solution” to problems—i.e., retreat to the fashionable church—and she censured this (quite rightly, I concede) as a very superficial judgment. It was splendid to see such a woman in Greece. A widow, probably about 60 years old, perhaps more, her mind was alive, her pen active. She never wrote poetry until after her 40th year—she and Cavafy, as she said: late developers. After she raised her children, she turned to literature. Brava! How many similar examples have we got? She was one more example of the tenacity of the few writers and artists here in what is largely an intellectual wilderness. They read, write, discuss on their own, without affiliation to universities or publishing houses. In front of them I feel ignorant and tongue-tied.

The favorite poet of everyone here seems to be Cavafy. I’ve not heard a bad word about him, and most seem to have him by heart. As I said in my pamphlet, he speaks to our condition.

Άγια Τριάς, οικία Μίτσου Ρουσσάκη

Back to the filming of Zorba: We talked with Cacoyannis for a few moments during the intermission. He said he viewed Zorba as a tragic book. This rather surprised me. First of all, he said, there isn’t a single decent human being in the story except the fool. This, I suppose, is true: the widow, the murderers, even Mme Hortense and Zorba are unethical and egotistic. But . . . ! The book is tragic because love is squelched, everything goes wrong, innocence is destroyed, cunning triumphs. Yes . . . but . . . ! It seems to me that Cacoyannis, like many others (Vlachos, for instance) insists on taking this book realistically. It is not realistic; it is a myth, as is clearly evident from the text itself, and also from K's remarks about the book in Report to Greco. We have to take the book this way; otherwise certain scenes just don't work: the burning of the monastery, for instance, or the stoning of the widow. Cacoyannis eliminated the monastery scenes, quite rightfully, as detracting from the central focus and interest. "The viewer isn't interested in the private troubles of the monks," he told me. "We've got to keep the thing focused on Zorba and Basil." As for the stoning scene, Cacoyannis said he tried to make it a true rape, a kind of mass psychodrama in which all the men of the village, who craved the widow sexually but could not have her, take their revenge, so to speak, by stoning her. Cacoyannis also said that he had had many objections from Cretans regarding this scene. "We don't stone women," they protested, "not even whores!" Who knows?

Cacoyannis impressed me greatly. He worked with quiet precision, no frills, no affectations like the Italian sub-director. He has a wonderful face, with a mop of curly, almost kinky hair, like a child's—uncombable. A little like Dylan Thomas, in build, hair, and face—i.e., the face has something babyish about it. But his chin is more pronounced than Thomas's. He didn't seem to be doing anything, which was perhaps the best sign. Of course he wrote the script! Found the set! Cast the players! And doubtlessly rehearsed everything in private many times. Now it was mostly a question of bad timing, or noise from onlookers, that necessitated re-takes. Only once did Cacoyannis lose his temper. It was at night, during a scene with Madame Hortense, the time when Zorba delights her by setting the table with three plates and inviting Hortense to dine with him and Basil. The electricians had been having trouble with the lights. The transformers kept heating up. To avoid burnouts, they kept switching to an auxiliary transformer, then switching back when that one began to overheat. Each switch meant a blackout, and the trick was to finish the scene before the blackout. In other words, nothing could really be shot. Cacoyannis bore all this patiently, up to a point. But about two hours had passed without a single take: the onlookers were making too much noise, Mme Hortense wasn't playing her scene just right, Quinn's left elbow was too close to the lens and thus distorted when he bowed and made a flourish. Finally, Cacoyannis shouted «Βαρέθηκα, βαρέθηκα – α – α – α – α!» It was noble, Lear-like anger. I thought everyone would quail and cower (I would have). But the chief electrician screamed right back to the effect of “Why don’t you give us decent things to work with instead of this Japanese junk!” Finally the scene was shot. Somehow I enjoyed this shout of Cacoyannis’s, and I confess sheepishly that a month later, when the children had been disturbing me inordinately while I was trying to write, I rushed into the room where Chrysanthi was sewing peacefully, and shouted «Βαρέθηκα – α – α – α – α!»

One of the things I’ll remember from our trip to Crete is the ride to Μάλια in the Volkswagon of a boy Jeff had known from the AFS. We were five. This boy, the son of an apparently well-to-do businessman in Iraklio, a dealer in auto parts, tires, etc, had graduated from the gymnasium a year or two before, and was now settling down to life as a local merchant. He had with him a friend, a younger boy in the last grade of the gymnasium, very handsome, with a deep voice and engaging manner. Jeff, Mike, and I made up the rest of the fivesome. We chatted on the way, small talk about the scenery, school, girls—I don’t remember what. We visited Malia just as the sun was setting, and the guide took us the rounds. On the way back we made a small detour to go to a village named Χερσόνησος (I think), a small fishing village grouped around a crescent-shaped harbor, facing east, on a peninsula (thus the name of the village). We drove through the village and suddenly climbed a sharp hill to a little παρεκκλήσι overlooking the village, the harbor, and the sea. It was thumbsized, perhaps two or three yards square. We entered. The boys said that it was a pretty church and we should see it. We entered and looked around in a touristic manner, enjoying the site above all, as so often with Greek churches and temples. What impressed me was this: these two “jazzy” high school boys entered the chapel and without any affectation (my second thought) dropped some money in the box, took candles, lit them in front of the icon, and kissed the icon. I stood aghast. I don’t know why, really. I suppose it was because I thought only old ladies acted this way still in Greece. It was at first so incongruous to see them act the way they did—in other words, I couldn’t imagine an American high school boy doing the same. Then, after a moment, not at all incongruous, they were so natural; it was part of them, they did it without thinking, and yet there was no flippancy, but rather a true sense of reverence, an everyday kind of reverence, not something done up for a special occasion. This little incident meant more to me, by far, than the stones of Malia.

That night we visited Νίκος Σακλαμπάνης, K.'s nephew. His mother was K.'s sister; in other words, Saklambanis's grandfather was Captain Michael! We went first to his office, a cavity in the old Venetian walls of the city, with walls five or six feet thick, and a little window near the ceiling. It was Sunday, but he had been working all day. He welcomed the intermission, and we went to his very substantial home just outside the city. He is, I think, the president of the Irakleio bar association, obviously a very successful lawyer. First he took us out on his porch and, pointing to a declivity not too far from the house, told us that people lived there in caves. He said it with an air of acceptance. There were rich and there were poor: that was that. Another typically Greek phenomenon was his maid, a girl of perhaps ten or twelve years, whom his wife—a perfectly lovely woman in all (other) respects—ordered around like a slave. We spent three delightful hours talking first about Kazantzakis, then about Captain Michael, then about demotic and katharevousa. S. told a lovely anecdote about his grandfather. When K. was young he championed the demotic tongue and was jailed for this. All his friends rushed to the jail to try to get him to “publicly recant,” and thus get himself released. Βρε Νίκο, έλεγαν, τι θέλεις; Να μιλήσουμε σαν χωριάτες, σαν αγράμματους; Thus his “friends.” K.'s father, Captain Michael, came also. Seeing his son, he said: Νίκο, εσύ είσαι γραμματισμένος, εγώ αγράμματος. Εκτιμώ τη γνώμη σου. Εσύ ξέρεις τέτοια πράματα, πού να ξέρω εγώ; Μήπως θέλεις ένα καθαρό υποκάμισο, ή μια κουβέρτα για να μη κρύωσεις; S. said how he had found K.'s early—schoolboy—work, the Συμπόσιο, and had given it to the Iraklion museum. He also spoke, like everyone else, about K.'s fortitude and diligence, his poverty. He never had any money, not even, at one point, enough to get a new set of false teeth.

I asked him about βράκες. He said they were a peasant form of conspicuous consumption. They had so much unnecessary material that they were heavy and unwieldy. Someone wearing βράκες obviously has had the money to spend for such an extravagance. Also, he has no need to work, because the βράκες are so uncomfortable that to work in them is impossible.

I asked S. what he thought about katharevousa, and he answered that he felt it had a very definite place and function. In other words, he was not a δημοτικιστής, like his uncle. I was surprised. But S. was rather persuasive. He said that katharevousa is a wonderful instrument for showing respect. There are some men, either because of their intrinsic qualities or their position, to whom one instinctively feels he must speak katharevousa. Obviously this can be abused. I suggested that it was just a form of social snobbery, but he disagreed, saying that, although this might have been true in the past, now when so many people go through the gymnasium and learn katharevousa, simply to speak it is no mark of distinction—everyone can do it. I had an experience of what he meant when we saw O αντιπρόσωπος in Athens. All the characters spoke demotic, until the pope appeared. He spoke the most pure of katharevousas, and it was right, dramatically and socially.

Our language has lost even the you-thou distinction. We have nothing approaching a language of dignity, only one of pomposity (except, of course, the very subtle dignity that good writers or speakers can give to our language). Katharevousa, perhaps, instead of being a curse on the Greek λαός, is one very strange expression of Greek linguistic flexibility and genius.

Other memories from Crete:

- The grounds-keeper at Kazantzakis's tomb, who said his salary was 1000 drachmas a month.
- The griffin on the wall paintings at Knossos: bird's head, leopard's body, and a snake for a tail. In other words, the forces of heaven, earth, and the underworld amalgamated in one idol. A very sensible god.
- The λειτουργία at Άγ. Μινάς. Palm Sunday. The αρχιεπίσκοπος in his finery. We were sent up to the front (qua ξένοι). The ψάλτες sang with all their soul, antiphonally. Two desks, with a chief ψάλτης, an older man, surrounded by a chorus of men of all ages. It was good to see youths, including high school boys. And one of the faces I recognized as a φοιτητής who had come the day before with us on the boat. How nice to leave the university and come home to sing in Άγ Μινάς the next day!

Άγια Τριάδα

One of the tenants of George's "hotel," a sophisticated, plump, shrill-voiced lady of uncertain age with a slimly pretty, rather nubile daughter, lost her expensive bathing suit. This lady, called by the rest η Αθηναία, with all that connotes, possessed of course only the very best and latest fashion suit, price 500 drachmas. She hung it on the fence to dry and when she wanted it again it was lost. What did our sophisticated lady do? She journeyed to Salonika to a fortune-teller, who would assuredly inform her who absconded with the suit. But the fortune-teller, it seems, proved the more sophisticated of the two. When our lady arrived, the fortune-teller began informing her that her husband was a nervous type, that he needed calm and coaxing care, etc. “Forget about my husband,” said the Athenaia. “I want to know who stole my bathing suit.” “When did you last see it?” asked the fortune-teller. “Yesterday morning.” “Ah, then I’m afraid I cannot help you. You have to get to me less than eight hours after the theft; otherwise I can do nothing.” And she believed her! Between this Athenaia and Κυρά Πρατικάκη with her bones of Αϊ-Γιάννης, what am I to think of sophisticated Greek ladies?

But there are fine surprises, too. Next door to us is a tailor and a shriveled old lady, a κουβάρι who sits in the shade all day long and sews for him, her feet resting comfortably on a chair in front of her. All day long, sun-up to sun-down, as though her entire life she was glued not only to this village but to that very chair. But the old lady keeps eyes and ears open, it seems. Yesterday she called to Chrysanthi: «Ελα ’δω, χρυσή μου. Όταν ακόμα σου πρώτ’ είδα, σ’ αγάπησα. Είσαι απλή, κι κάθεσαι κι ράβεις κι κεντείς, κι τα παιδιά σου κι αυτά είναι απλά κι χαριτωμένα.» Then she went into a bitter denunciation of the parasitic wives we see all around us, who sit on their verandas with their high heels and fresh hair-dos while their servants run desperately after their headstrong children, trying to feed them. «Τι θα γίνουν τα παιδιά αυτά; Πώς να γίνουν τα κορίτσια νυκοκυρές καλές, πώς να φροντίζουν τα δικά τους σπίτια και παιδιά και άνδρες; Πού πάει η απλότητα; Στα παλαιά χρόνια τα παιδιά έκαναν μπάνιο στα βρακάκια τους· τώρα έχουν μαγιώ, και τα κορίτσια, πέντε χρονών, έχουν bikini κι όλας!» Then followed the most surprising statement—no, not really surprising at all—but perhaps incongruous coming from this woman who one would think never thought about social problems but sat empty-mindedly in her chair: «Ξέρεις τι θέλουμε; Θέλουμε κι μεις μια λαϊκή δημοκρατία!» The little old communist! But no: she sees the decadent capitalists and comes to a simple conclusion, optimistic about a people’s democracy solving all problems. «Σκότησαν τον Κέννεντυ», είπε, «διότι ήταν απλός άνθρωπος κι ήθελε την ειρήνη· μα και θα σκοτώσουν κι τον Κρουστέφ, θα τον σκοτώσουν κι αυτόν, διότι είναι απλός ο Κρουστέφ σαν και τον Κέννεντυ, κι θέλει την ειρήνη!» When Chrysanthi related all this to me, I told her that the middle class stinks to high heaven in all countries; the peasants and the aristocrats (i.e., those who needn't show their wealth, and those who don't have any to show) are the salt of the earth. In Greece, middle class children are not allowed to play in the street for fear they'll dirty their expensive clothes or come in contact with "undesirables." In Neo Psychiko, there was one house conspicuously larger than the rest, with a big yard. In this yard was a swing, a slide, and other things for the enjoyment of children. Leander and Alec often asked if they could go in and use the swings. They could not. So they played soccer in the street (with Chrysanthi!). The slide and swings were for the precious only child of the house. While the other children played in the street, he sat in his yard, behind the high bars, alone "enjoying his advantages"!

Yesterday a waiter in the café next to George's house sat down and started chatting with me. He, too, was very much a leftist. It was the same story—how all those who collaborated with the Germans were given power after the civil war, how all those who fought the Germans were stigmatized as communists. He said that recently the German officer who was in charge of sending Salonika's Jews to the gas chambers journeyed again in Greece, with a beard, but was recognized, captured, and brought to trial. In the course of the trial, witnesses divulged who had collaborated with him, and one of the collaborators was the present wife of a cabinet minister. Needless to say, she was not sentenced. This same waiter also told me that when Karamanlis was in power, at each election a policeman came to him and instructed him at gunpoint to vote EPE, or else. He said he'd vote as he pleased and be damned. He did, they examined his ballot (conveniently possible to do in the Greek system) and came to him after the election and systematically beat him up. The EKA newspaper says that the man who falsified the count in favor of Karamanlis in the last election but one is still a high official in the royal court. In the by-elections on July 5 the EDA was victorious everywhere in Greece. These elections were for local officials—village presidents, mayors, etc. Papandreou said the other day that the by-election was in no way an indication of how the people felt toward his government, because in local elections the voters do not vote on the basis of political party or creed but simply vote for their friends! Wonderful sophistry!

August 2, 1964

The other day Chrysanthi and I remarked on how filthy the beach was, full of papers, children's feces, watermelon rinds, etc. Why, we wondered, couldn't the village place some trash cans on the beach and hope that people would use them, as surely would be done in America, for instance at Minerva Beach, where there were more trash cans than people. Today, as if in answer to our wish, a cart came along and placed cans at intervals along the beach. They were painted a bright orange and on each, in white capitals, was written Καθαριότης πολιτισμός. America has come to Greece with a vengeance.

The other day, with Themistocles and Miranda Altas, our neighbors here, she stone blind for eight years, we went to Χορτιάτης, the village that the Germans entirely destroyed in the war. There is part of Salonika's aqueduct system there. Two German soldiers came to put some disinfectant in the water; they were killed by partisans. As reprisal, the Germans gathered the entire village (some people had seen them approach in time and had escaped to the mountain) and burned every last soul in the ovens, then burned all the houses. There is a memorial, a painting of the village priest in the flames, surrounded by women and children, with the names of the dead inscribed below. Today the village has been rebuilt, but the shells of some of the old houses remain.

We continued on a little above the village, to a summer campground for the Salonika orphanage. A nice villa overlooking mountains and sea. This serves as infirmary. The boys are in tents and a ragged tin shack. They all have the same clothing: kaki shorts and blue shirt, and look dirty and unkempt and woebegone. Many are musicians. The orphanage prides itself on the musicians it produces—mostly players of band instruments, who then make a career of the army. The director, a jolly man, told us with pride that the present director of the army band is an alumnus. It was raining, so instead of climbing the mountain we sat inside and chatted. The director was an amateur gardener. Despite our protestations, he went out in the rain and gathered fresh cucumbers and tomatoes for us, which were served with delicious local φέτα cheese. All this came after the inevitable γλυκό κουταλιού και καφέ.

The Greek language is wonderful in its inventiveness and complexity. This morning three street-venders passed the house. Their calls were as follows: Αμερικάνικα! Μπανάνες! Αμύγδαλα! What did these mean: Αμερικάνικα = καρπούζια, Μπανάνες = πεπόνια (i.e., as sweet as bananas), Αμύγδαλα = cucumbers as crunchy as almonds.

Two vivid memories came in my sleep. (1) When the fat Negro woman clasped me ecstatically in her arms in Rochester and began to dance and sing. (I had worked in her house during the work camp, and was returning to show a friend what we had done.) (2) When Fritzi Girden, once in the basement of 3902, also clasped me in her arms and danced with me, and when I felt for the first—and last (?)—time what it means really to dance: to forget oneself, to fly buoyantly through the air.

Just now I was reworking a passage of Greco where K. describes his former classmates, pp. 169–170: κιόλας είχε περάσει η ζωή αποπάνω τους και τους είχε ισοπεδώσει. . . . Ήξεραν ποια ταβέρνα έχει το καλύτερο κρασί, πού μπορείς να φας τους πιο αφράτους λουκουμάδες και τι προίκα έχει η κάθε κοπέλα. This describes perfectly so many of the people I've met here in Greece. They are sunk in the mire of bourgeois non-entity. I especially remember how George knew exactly where to take us for the “fluffiest loukoums.” But on the other hand, do I not exhibit some of the superciliousness and scorn that apparently Kazantzakis exhibited, precisely on account of his high standards for himself and others?

Chrysanthi was telling Alec about the feats of Hercules. “And then Hercules caught the two poisonous snakes and killed them,” she said. “What did he do next, Alec?” “He washed his hands,” said Alec.

What the αναστενάρηδες do is a valid religious experience because it is a means of obliterating the ego, which, as the mystics all say, is the greatest obstacle standing between us and God. Cf. the Dervishes and their dancing. See Αναφορά στον Γκρέκο, the chapter on Knossos.

Today I had a strong remembrance of the time I went to Allen Schleifstein's birthday party. I must have been 14 or 15 years old. Allen's father stupidly fed me whiskey after whiskey. I can still feel the dizziness that descended so pleasantly upon me as I sank deeper and deeper into the armchair in their living room. After that everything was a blank. Apparently I walked part of the way home on my own two feet, vomiting constantly in the street. Somehow, with the aid of Buzzy Oppenheim and Arthur Kaledin (I think), I reached home. I vomited on the stairs, on the nice gray carpet. My friends hauled me up to my room, undressed me and left me lying naked on my bed, my clothes strewn about. This was how my parents discovered me the following morning.

Yesterday I bought an icon of Agios Menas, the protector of Crete. The artist is a little middle-aged man who has a shop on Εγνατία. He sits in the window and paints. On the wall are icons: St. George, St. Kyrillos, the Prodomos, Elias ascending in a chariot, Christ harrowing hell, etc. But what moved me the most was the very excellent self-portrait of the artist as a young man with palette and brush. What dreams lay hidden in that portrait! And now he sits in the window and paints icons.

Nicknames overheard: Θέμης (Θεμιστοκλής), Εύρης (Ευριπίδης).

Yesterday the church bells tolled in a new way. A single gong, slowly, at widely spaced intervals. Even without being told, I could realize easily enough that this bell announced death. Our neighbor, the tailor, closed his shop and departed with his wife for the deceased person's house, for the bell announced, in effect, that the body was "prepared" and ready to be seen. Soon, from all the other homes, villagers walked in the same direction, children tagging along behind. All were going to pay their last respects and to await their own turns.

Sunday we went to the πανηγύρι at Μιχανιώνα. This village celebrates the Κοίμησις της Θεοτόκου (the Assumption of the Virgin Mary), August 15th. Then on the 9th day, as with mere humans, the Virgin presents κόλλυβο in the church.

Dad once had a patient who was by trade an engraver. He was a clever man and had invented some process that greatly simplified a certain aspect of engraving. He was also an epileptic. One day he had a seizure on the street and fell down foaming at the mouth. Even after the seizure proper passed, he was maniacal. In this state he was picked up by the police, driven to Bellevue, and placed behind bars in the psychiatric ward. When his mania waned he found himself in this predicament, with hordes of violent cases as his cellmates. He tried to convince the attending physician that he was perfectly sane. But one of the questions the doctors always asked suspected psychos was, "And I suppose you've made a great invention?" They asked him this, and he replied, "Yes." This convinced them that he was indeed insane.

Last week J-P Sartre refused the Nobel Prize. The Times reported: "To have accepted the honor and the $53,000 that goes with it, Mr. Sartre explained, would have diminished his life's meaning. 'A writer,' he said, 'must act only with the means that are his . . . the written word'; to add to his pen the influence of an institution 'is not fair to the reader. . . . It is not the same if I sign myself Jean-Paul Sartre or if I sign myself Jean-Paul Sartre, Nobel Prize winner.' Or, as he put it in his latest book, 'The Words': ' . . . with empty hands and empty pockets . . . I have set myself to work to save my whole self. . . .'"

Deerfield dinner. Mrs. Boyden remarkable as usual. She had read my Cavafy pamphlet, which Col. Furlong had gotten for her. She said she didn't particularly like Cavafy, with all his decadence, and couldn't really know his poetry. But she said that I made her feel how much I really knew and liked the poetry—which I think was the nicest and most perceptive thing anyone has said about my pamphlet.

We spent Saturday and Sunday in Boston. I went to a dreary meeting of the Mosher Book and Tract Committee of New England Yearly Meeting. We lodged with Tom and Becky, and who should be there by Elisabeth Marleyn, who has been here chaperoning the Bristol-born winner of DuPont's Beauty Contest (1st prize, a five-day visit to New York, where she was taken to an interminable found of musicals and night clubs). Poor Elizabeth winced when her Beauty Queen invariably chose the worst musicals in preference to the opera, concerts, or the galleries. Becky as sweet and simple as always. We visited her parents, the Hoges, in their Boston suburb, and all had Sunday dinner together. I prowled through Thayer Hall, Lowell House courtyard, Lamont and Widener, without much emotion, except at Lamont, which had always seemed very inviting. Thayer, which was decrepit when we lived there, has been brightened considerably, and is almost unrecognizable. We all went to a concert at Sanders on Saturday night: recorder, viola da gamba, and harpsichord, very intellectual, and full of bearded students, the most disheveled of which, it turned out, were actually from Brandeis, where we saw them the next day. Brandeis is sprawling and nondescript. We visited the three tiny chapels, all rather deserted. Becky and her parents use thee in good Quaker fashion.

Absurd ways to die:

- (a) Last spring in Greece, in a village, friends came to the memorial service 9 days after someone's death, when the κόλλυβο is distributed. The next morning everyone was dead. Later it was discovered that the κόλλυβο had been made with agricultural poison instead of flour, the two sacks, unlabeled, being near each other on the shelf.

- (b) Recently, a ceremony was held at a great bridge on the Athens-Salonika railway. This had been destroyed by the Germans, then rebuilt, reestablishing communications between the two cities. As a crowd gathered at the site, there was a great explosion that killed many people. Someone had stepped on a land mine, still active twenty years after the war.

Yesterday in class I spoke of Freud's Interpretation of Dreams, in connection with Joyce's use of dream language, especially condensation and portmanteau words, in Finnegans Wake. This morning, most à propos, Chrysanthi related a dream she had last night, a dream that could have come right out of Freud's casebook, so complete was it with blends and incongruities—yet each element taken, as Freud insisted, from (usually recent) personal experience. She saw herself back in Terpni as a girl but she was living in an apartment house (!). Her aunt was lying in bed, sick. Chrysanthi was fanning away the swarms of flies that infested the room even though everything—the linens, walls, floors—was immaculate. Suddenly her aunt, who apparently had leprosy, sat up and pointed to the distance. "There's your husband," she said. Chrysanthi (still a girl of about 9) turned and looked. In the distance she saw an Eskimo, dressed however in knickers. (Chrysanthi, thinking about this at breakfast, remembered (a) that the night before last when she was at Mrs. Sonnerup's house, one of the ladies there had recounted her experiences in Alaska, with particular emphasis on the Eskimos, and (b) that last night in bed she had seen pictures of knickers in the Sears catalogue.) The Eskimo came closer, but then he wasn't an Eskimo but instead the weird gypsy imbecile who used to clean the "square ditch" at the Quaker Domestic Science School. Here the dream ended.

¶ . . . a man must identify himself with something more tangible than his own personality, and establish his pride somewhere, either in his social position, or in the quality of the work he is obliged to do, or simply

A long letter to Henry Gifford:

Dear Henry,

I've turned your letter over to our Chairman. He had already heard from your colleague, and I imagine that he will be writing to him directly in the near future.

He asked me in the meantime to sound you out on a matter very dear to our hearts. We are interested in developing plans for some of our better students to study English literature in England or Scotland. These men would be junior English majors who would plan to spend at least two and normally three terms at their host university. We would like to know if you could admit a small group of carefully selected students from Dartmouth College. There would be many minor problems such as housing, tuition fees, and transportation, but the primary questions for now would seem to be admission and then programs. Our general experience with British universities and my particular experience with Bristol lead us to believe that our students would benefit greatly from an opportunity to study for a time in your Department.

May I also sound you out on the possibility of informal faculty exchange from time to time?

I'm glad my Cavafy pamphlet set you thinking about this strange poet. I haven't seen your article yet, as my copies of the TLS are piled high at the moment, awaiting the solitude and dolce far niente of next summer at our farm. As for any further translations of Cavafy from my pen, there won't be any because Harcourt, Brace & World, the publishers of Rae Dalven's Complete Poetry of Cavafy, refused to let me use my own renditions for the excerpts in the pamphlet, and indeed have refused to let anyone translate even one line of their "property." Edmund Keeley, Philip Sherrard and I have all protested, but to no avail. There seems to be no rhyme or reason in these matters, for Hogarth Press, which held the rights before Harcourt bought them out, was quite liberal in granting permission for new translations of individual poems, or for excerpts to be used in scholarly essays. I recently learned that the P.E.N. club discussed this problem several years ago. On the supposition that no single translation can ever do justice to a poet, and that it is therefore artistically immoral to tie up a poet for 56 years, they recommended that copyright protection in such cases be reduced to about 15 years. But of course it is a long way from recommendation to enactment. I was wondering if you and Charles Tomlinson hit up against this problem at all in your work.

When I showed your letter to Chrysanthi we both commented how fresh in our memories was the picture of you in your domestic setting: your lovely house, the fields beneath it, and your family. We wondered how the children are. Your boy must be a full-fledged artist by now; and your daughter, is she already at college? Our Leander is in 3rd grade and shows signs already of being a voracious reader and also a good musician. And little Alec, whom you will remember as just a sniveling blob of flesh, now has his mincing kindergarten personality, and is pestering us to let him begin studying the violin!

We visited recently with Tom and Becky Shankland in Cambridge (Mass.), and who should be there but Elisabeth Marleyn! Do you remember Robin and Elisabeth, with their eternal arguments? She writes the Women's Column in the Western Daily Press and was in the States as the chaperone to Miss Bristol, who, as winner of the Du Pont, Ltd. beauty contest, was awarded a five-day sojourn in New York City. Poor Elizabeth described these five days as the most dismal of her life; they consisted of an endless round of nightclubs, champagne, ceremonies in the plush inner offices of advertising executives and cigar-smoking industrialists. All the while, Miss Bristol, whom Elisabeth described as abysmally dumb, kept a sharp eye out for some one she could marry, so that she could remain in the States. And Elisabeth herself, though certainly not enamored of the one aspect of American life she had been forced to see, was rather glum about returning home, where Robin is struggling along as an uncertified teacher in a grammar school, at a salary of £10.0.0 a week!

To turn to more pleasant matters, I wish I could sit down face to face and try to convey to you what a stimulating six months we had last year in Greece. It was the first time (although my third extended stay there) that I felt I really came to know the country and its people well, or to begin to at least. Part of the reason is that we spent three full months in a village, a fishing and grape-growing village on the Aegean, about an hour by caïque from Salonika. Living there that length of time, we were able to feel, and more important, eventually to share, the rhythm of Greek life—a rhythm that is an expression of a state of mind, a way of looking at the universe, which in turn is an expression of Greece's topography, climate, and history. Never have I felt such a connection between the actual land and the day-to-day conduct of the civilization that developed on that land; never, also, have I felt body, soul, and mind so continually interacting in myself and in everything around me. There is a naked sense of all of life's contradictions, all existing very much together and very much visible. The town idiot, for example, who in England or the U.S.A. would be committed to an institution and thus shut from view, is accepted as part of nature's scheme. The toothless gaffer sits with his cane in the café and tells tales, while his dirty-bottomed great-grandchild crawls in the dust beside him. Incredible poverty—gypsies in rags, peddlers walking all day with heavy suitcases, trying to sell shoddy cottons, one-armed mountebanks with puppets or clarinas, nomads with performing monkeys and bears—all exist side by side with an ever-more-affluent middle class enjoying automobiles, tape recorders, Leica cameras, and vacations in Paris. Then I mustn't omit to mention how nice it is—how incredible, really!—to see men rise spontaneously in the cafés and dance away their joy or grief, or in the street, for that matter. And the constant music (which can become grating while you are there, but which I missed the moment I returned home) and the constant street-cries and the constant talk, talk, talk—with all the twistings and extensions of grammar and vocabulary that I had come to know in Kazantzakis's writings. Two or three other things stand out, in addition to our life in the village. One was the opportunity I had to meet Kazantzakis's circle in Athens: poets, professors, novelists, book-designers, art-critics, scholars. The other was a week spent in Crete, as though at a shrine. As I landed in Iraklio I realized that I already knew so very much about it—its squares, the nature of its streets, the design of the houses, what kind of flowers were kept in the courtyards, the smells one encountered while walking up a lane (Greece is full of the most diverse smells), the icons in the cathedral, the names of the various mountains surrounding the city, the Venetian fountain with its lions, the ramparts overlooking the sea, the serene beaches nearby—all from Kazantzakis's books, all as real to me from literature, even more real, than they could be from actual observance as a tourist. This was indeed a pleasure, and it was topped by an excruciating ride over the mountains in an ancient vehicle, to Haniá at the Western end of the island, where I had the pleasure of spending a day on the set during the filming of Zorba the Greek, and of chatting for some time with Michael Cacoyannis, the director, about the book and his interpretation. . . . The other experience that stands out was our witnessing of the fire-walking ceremony of the Anastenarides. This is something that has come down from pagan times in Thrace and bears amazing resemblance to the Dionysian ritual; it includes a wild chase in the mountains at night, for instance, also a ritual sacrifice and dismemberment, with distribution of raw flesh, which is then eaten or else plowed into the ground. It also includes self-induced trance, induced by dancing—all of which I observed. Then a fire is built, the red-hot coals raked out, and the “troupe,” when it has reached the proper intensity of ecstasy and when the saint (the whole thing is celebrated in honor of Saint Constantine on May 21) gives the signal, the troupe dances out in procession with drums and a squealing rebec, then dances on the glowing coals, barefooted, shouting “Let them be ashes!

Let them be ashes!" In this way, they feel, they subdue the fiery powers of the devil, through the grace conferred on them by the saint to perform this miracle. And they insure good crops of corn and children for the ensuing year. I of course have never seen trance, much less barefooted walking on fire, and the experience was most memorable. It suddenly made all too terribly real all I had read in ancient literature about the mystery cults—this one, too, is a mystery, carefully restricted to certain families of initiates. The ceremonies were performed in secret until relatively recently. Now they have become a tourist attraction, which I imagine means that they will eventually disappear. The thing that interested me most is that the participants did not strike me as orgiastic, uncivilized, bestial, or dangerous. On the contrary, they radiated an extraordinary dignity, and in some strange way seemed more rather than less human. Perhaps I have been reading too much Nietzsche. But Nietzsche or no Nietzsche, this is what I, and many others, felt as we watched.

Lest you get the wrong idea about our stay in Greece, I should add that I also worked! The fruit of this effort was the translation of Kazantzakis's autobiography, all 220,000 words of it. The book is called Report to Greco and will be published, I think, next fall. For me, at least, it is a beautiful beautiful book, full of the meditation of age and the exuberance of youth. I hope that you'll read it.

Forgive me for carrying on for so long, and for mixing the personal with the "official" in this letter. To end of the properly "official" note, let me say that whatever answer you can give to our proposal I shall communicate to our Chairman. Or perhaps you would prefer to correspond with him directly. His name is Harold Bond.

Sincerely,

C. H. Gifford, Esq.

A most extraordinary thing happened at the banquet for the Alumni Council. The scheduled speakers were Norman Doenges and then President Dickey. I was scheduled to speak to the Council the next morning, along with several others from the faculty, and we had met Thursday for lunch with Doenges to hear what he intended to say, so there wouldn't be any repetition. We decided that he would speak in general on the question of the need for faculty research and the help available for "onward self-teaching." Then the rest of us would speak about our individual experiences, one with NSA grants, another with the Ford Foundation grant subsidizing the Far Eastern program here, and I on the Faculty Fellowships. Doenges hadn't got anything written yet but he left with a good idea of what he should talk about. On the banquet night, when his turn came, he stood up and began, "At Dartmouth, the teacher-scholar is the honored norm," etc., etc., the same old crap. After a few sentences, a strange noise began intersecting the words—every 30 seconds or so—an excruciating rattle, something between a death râle and the fiendish "eek" of the anastenarides. Nevertheless he continued. John Finch, who was sitting with me, said that this was a normal mannerism with Doenges. He continued, saying nothing in so many words. Then he stopped in the middle of a sentence, stood there while we all waited, then began again. This was normal enough, the kind of pause seen in many speakers, as they gather together (so to speak) what is to come next. He began again, the râle as evident as ever (and as painful), then stopped a second time, for a somewhat longer period. A cold sweat broke out on my forehead, and I stared at my plate. But he resumed, finally. The next time he stopped, however—it was just after the hateful phrase "at Dartmouth . . ."—he just stood and stood, I'd say for a full three minutes. Finally, Dickey asked him in a whisper if he'd like to sit down. He smiled strangely, mumbled "I'm sorry," and returned to his seat. The toastmaster speedily introduced Dickey, who handled the situation brilliantly. Before he began his prepared speech, he ad libbed: "Well, Norm, public speaking isn't always easy. The time you really have to worry, though, is when—as with me—it becomes too easy!" Finch then asked me for a pencil, and wrote me a note on his napkin. It went something like this: "The hollow men are usually so damned articulate. Here was a hollow man who had nothing to say, but this time the gods stepped in: He was struck mute by the god!" (Note: Doenges is Professor of Greek.) Finch later said that Doenges was a sycophant and bootlicker, the kind of man who screams continually about the need to publish and has never published anything himself.

January 31, 1965

Vic McGee here, also MacCormick, Perrin, and Hillel & Miriam Black. Vic said that Doenges's silence sounded like a minor epileptic fit or heart attack. Strange how one's frame of reference changes (or is changed by) a whole outlook on life. Finch's remark of yesterday came from a mentality capable of taking in the entire scheme of things—man, nature, the gods, the “circumambient universe,” as Lawrence would say. Vic's remark cuts man off from everything. That is why science is so discouraging and the pagan vision so essentially more profound.

I think I understand now what E. M. Forster means when he wants something of “fantasy and prophecy” in his books. He wants Finch's mentality and not Vic's. Forster, by the way, is the only writer I can think of who would do fictional justice to the Doenges incident.

After my talk to the Alumni Council, in which I told of my troubles with the word ὄρτσα, I was introduced to Mosbacher, the sailing ace. He and a friend, also a sailor, were delighted because they said I had given them the name for a boat: ORTSA. They also said they were chartering a yacht this May with the Dickeyes, out of Πασαλείμενο. I suggested that when they board the first time and the crew lines up neatly to greet them, that they walk up to the chief officer and say, nonchalantly: Ὀρτσα και μη φοβάσαι. What an impression this would make!

In New York a few days ago I saw ballet, Giraudoux’s Judith, Lowell’s The Old Glory, and Albee’s Tiny Alice, bought a mandolin for Chrysanthi, visited Times Square haunts, lunched with Hillel and a visiting engineer from Tel Aviv, had a short discussion with Dad while walking through Greenwich Village before going to the Theatre de Lys to see The Old Glory, a discussion triggered by the sight of some girls wearing tight trousers, “just asking to be goosed,” as Dad put it. Also Dad mentioned a friend of his who took his daughter to a gynecologist before she left for college, and had her fitted for a contraceptive. The question of the promiscuity of this generation came up. Today, in Stuart Gilbert’s book on Ulysses I came across a fascinating insight into this problem. The behavior of the present generation is not inseparable from the Puritanism that insists that brothels are dens of iniquity. We have closed the brothels, but in effect, instead, have made all girls into whores. Instead of the professional we now have the ubiquitous amateur. This also grows out of a loss of religious outlook. Gilbert writes (p. 316): “‘Brothels are built with the bricks of religion.’ [Blake] . . . The Catholic religion, upholding the inviolable sanctity of marriage, accepts no compromise and condemns the ostrich morality of those hybrid creeds which, burying their heads in the sands of seemliness, refuse recognition of the weakness of the flesh. . . . The man who . . . visits a . . . brothel cannot but know that he is committing a deadly sin; no compromise with conscience is possible, none of the callow pity which condones fornication or adultery as a romantic necessity or unpremeditated lapse. Nor, of course, are the modern devices of quick divorce and free love, promiscuity in fact, compatible with the existence of brothels. In such an ambiance the prostitute disappears; in a world of competent amateurs the professional has no place.”

The other day, being as it was sunny and as I had an exceptionally full bladder, I went outside without dressing at all, and urinated on the grass. Such was the pressure on my bladder that I just “let go” and in so doing I made what seems to me a remarkable discovery: that the human male, when naked, can urinate like other animals, that is simply by spreading his legs a bit. The habit of clutching the penis and extending it is a habit necessitated by trousers. It was a great pleasure to return to the “natural” procedure.

Proust has M. Swann, in his older years, return more and more to the habits and attitudes of his Jewish forebears—something that I see very bluntly in my father. Perhaps Proust’s ways of thought illumine this very common occurrence: of a reversion to childish experience. Proust’s whole book is meant to illustrate the thesis that as we grow older we lose the child’s easy flights of imagination, his agility at creating fantasy, and we become more and more the prisoners of the drab world of “reality,” seen at its drabest in the typical bourgeois home. Unless, that is, we escape either by art (the path of the few) or by memory. Memory transports us to that world of childhood that now, with the distance of years, seems more idyllic than it ever was. Unconsciously, the older man begins to live more and more in terms of recollection, the only terms that can bequeath some beauty and order and meaning to his life. One facet of this may be the identification with the father (hitherto considered an ogre) and the father’s narrow religious and moral views. The romance and coherence of tradition now outweigh the irrationality and cruelty of that person and his arbitrary, dogmatic adherence.

August 9, 1965

I feel as though I am running a hotel here, and am sick of it. After Ballards and Mirzas, Dagmar came with her children, then Alice and her children for 10 days, then Ellen DeCesare, two children, and an English maid for a week. They left today for Montreal. Tomorrow Suzanne Laaspere comes with her family; they leave Sunday, and Ellen returns from Montreal. Then next weekend the Doyles, and the summer is over! The routine is broken, the quiet evenings, the excitement of the single outing on Sunday to Lake Minerva, the freedom of feeling tired when one wants to, and of going naked when one wants to, and of getting up later than usual or going to bed earlier than usual—mainly: the delicious removal from people, a removal that makes us long for people . . . come September.

And most guests are very boorish; they eat your food, use up your time, and bring nothing in return. Though Ellen was, I admit, very sweet and stimulating. Each one, if he or she had been the only ones to come, would have been more than welcome. It is the steady stream that makes all of them a burden.

I find the kind of self-pity that Tony Last felt when informed that Beaver was coming to Hetton Abbey. I enjoy the self-enclosed life, the remoteness—and, I suppose, the self-centeredness—that he enjoyed. I console myself that I am not too self-indulgent, because I demand this only for two months.

Ellen told about the tragedy of a certain doctor’s wife in Hanover. This unhappy woman lost her twin sons one day in winter, when they ventured out on the Connecticut River, the ice broke, and they were drowned. This tragedy I had already known. But I hadn't known something else: the fact that this same woman, after her fourth child, voluntarily had her tubes tied—i.e., had herself sterilized. The death of her sons, of two no less, would seem to be retribution by the gods. She offended Aphrodite, or Eros; she committed hubris; and the offended god smote her in payment.

Some days ago the forester was here, also Bill Heid, who is going to cut pulp on our farm next year. I learned a lot about trees, especially about the cycle of growth: (1) brush (alders, etc.); (2) popples, pine; (3) birch; (4) maple, ash, beech, basswood. Group (2) seeds only in open areas where there is ample sunshine—i.e., in abandoned fields. Popples and birch are relatively short-lived, but once they are established they provide shade that (a) kills off the brush, (b) encourages the maples and other hardwoods, which seed only in shade. If forests are cleared selectively, so that the operation is in effect a thinning and not a stripping, then maples, etc. will continue to seed. If too great an opening is made, the cycle will start all over again with the brush.

Popple is a very fragile wood, as anyone knows who has handled it. Popple trees, and also alders, grow and grow until their own branches become too heavy; then either the branch breaks or the entire tree topples over. This of course doesn't happen to other trees, which die through rotting and disease. The life history of the popple was brought to my mind this morning as I read the concluding pages of Proust's The Past Recaptured. There he speaks of aging as a process by which time provides us, as it were, with ever-increasing stilts. We grow taller and taller until we become unable to manage our stilts, and topple over.

Another analogy suggested itself recently as well. This summer we arrived at Terpni to find our house riddled with bullet holes. Someone, hunters presumably, had used the electric meter and (most ironically) the "O" of the word POLICE on our sticker, as targets. Various people who have been shown the results have commented: Well, most likely they spent a few days hunting unsuccessfully for deer and were frustrated. They had to have something to shoot at, and they got to such a point that they didn't care what it was.

The same human reaction was apparently operative recently in Vietnam. Officials actually admitted that American marines had burned a village—i.e., women and children. (If they admitted to one atrocity, a rare thing, there must have been dozens.) Regrets were expressed, of course, but the commander on the spot, when reprimanded for letting his men do such a thing, gave an explanation analogous to the one given me. The marines had been shot at and killed for weeks by guerrillas, but had never been granted even a glimpse of their enemy. They simply had to retaliate, to use their power on something; it was a case of nerves. This incident, the full horror of it, put my incident in perspective.

Protagoras in Plato's dialogue (318e) preaches the "successful" life. This Sophistic doctrine has come down to our own day where "rightness" is equated with success, where "efficiency" becomes the chief virtue, the chief ingredient of ἀρετή. By all means we must avoid inner upheaval, uncontrolled emotions, mania, ecstasy. In their place, as a sop, we can have external substitutes such as alcohol and "planned" excitements.

Crass sensuality is akin to excessive rationality in that both are "objective," armed against emotion. They are equal negations of "humanness." The human being is made to be prey to passion that penetrates to his core. In denying or frustrating this he denies or frustrates his humanity. Thus "love" in the Greek sense (a mania induced by ἔρωσ) is human, whereas lust and ascetic rationality are not.

Hans Castorp has all the German-bourgeois emblems: "the good leather bags, the expensive clothes, his discreet gargle, the cigar, his sense of decorum, the eating of those good meals out of self-respect rather than appetite" (Brennan, p. 120). Knowing this, one understands Peter Buseck and his parents much better. Especially the cigar and the meals. Add to this the meticulousness over trifling things.

Laing in The Divided Self, echoing Freud, says that our civilization inhibits transcendence. Most appropriately, I have just dipped once more into the Phaedrus, with its cataloging and defense of the manifold forms of θεία μανία. Gide, Laing, Plato, Mann, Nietzsche, Kazantzakis, Freud all seem to be saying the same thing. One wonders if the more audacious sexual habits of the recent years are truly a sign that this suppression is breaking. And yet, the other night at the North Creek fair, when the band called for square dancers, only a few adolescents volunteered. The rest of the people stood around dumbly, waiting to be entertained.

“Originality,” said the young novelist Radiguet, . . . “consists in trying to be like everybody else—and failing.” (Brennan, Three Philosophical Novelists, p. 126.)

A chance observation in Kafka’s “Metamorphosis” awakened Proustian recall in me. Speaking of Gregor’s debilitated father, the narrator writes that he walked slowly, “shuffling laboriously forward . . . and, whenever he wanted to say anything, nearly always came to a full stop and gathered his escort around him.” This evoked for me, with extraordinary vividness, my walk with Δημοσθένης Προύσαλης from his cottage near Ρέμβη to ours at the opposite end of the village. As we walked, ever so slowly, along the shoreline, Dimosthenis came to a full stop every time he replied to my words. I remember that we talked about yawning, which I said was a sign of boredom, and which he proceeded to attribute solely to a physiological need for more oxygen. I remember being surprised and perhaps even a little annoyed at these constant halts, especially since, he being so short, I had to look down onto the top of his bald head while he spoke. But then I reflected that in his concern for his weak heart, he had formed the habit of exerting himself in only one manner at a time. He could walk and he could talk, but not simultaneously.

A week pulling rocks, big ones. Plowshare broke. Difficulty in replacing it—probably outmoded. Forester here. Also Harold Hogan of the soil conservation service. We may construct a pond, assuming that the forest will pay for it. Got seed yesterday: Kentucky 31 fescue, also 10-10-10 fertilizer. My compulsion—my excitement—about plowing, harrowing, fertilizing, and seeding the fields is strange. A sense of power over nature, I suppose. “You fields, do as I direct! Stop your brush, your weeds! Produce grass!”

Saul here for a night, with Minna and Amos. What an egoist he is! He is charming for an hour or so, but I’m afraid that to most people, especially if they are forced to be with him for extended periods, he must be obnoxious. He doesn’t listen when others speak, as evidence by his interrupting at any moment to pursue his own line of thought, which usually concerns some great past, or projected, accomplishment of his. Yet I like him. He is open, like Geoff Ballard.

Dick Sipperly marked trees over 3½ acres for us to kill by girdling and application of a hormone that speeds up the leafage to such a degree that the roots cannot provide and the tree dies. This will be my first attempt at forest management.

Seeded and fertilized part of the south field. The gods were cooperative, as it rained for a day and a half immediately afterward. But just previously we lost our garden owing to frost—so the ledger is balanced. Poor bedraggled string beans lasted two nights and then gave up on the third. But the squash collapsed on the second. Dead. The tomatoes we covered and they are doing fine.

Herb and Mel Goertz came for an hour or two, bringing Herb's father, a 75-year-old gentleman who is visiting here from Germany. Herb in shorts and sport shirt, Mel in slacks, the father dressed as for a day at the stock exchange: suit, vest, tie perfectly done, tight collar. A vision of Thomas Mann's fastidious bourgeoisie. His elegantly carved walking-stick.

A review of Greco in the Herald Tribune said I mistranslated the title; It should have been "Report to the Greco" (imagine!) because the Greek is Αναφορά στον Γκρέκο, and that K. really meant Report to the Greek—i.e., to all Greeks. How can one respond to such ignorance? How easily, how off-handedly, a person's integrity and knowledge can be called into question by people incapable of judging.

In four days we must leave Terpni. How I love it here! This farm fulfills me, expresses me. This summer, besides building the new cottage and outhouse, clearing more land, plowing and seeding, mowing all the fields, removing huge boulders, initiating a forest management program, I read twenty books slowly and thoroughly, prepared the raw materials for my course in Comparative Literature, gave Leander piano lessons and Alec recorder lessons, played the organ a good deal myself, and even did some very pleasant daydreaming. My only sense of emptiness was in not pursuing some original work of my own, either my projected study of Kazantzakis or the novel that has been postponed now for ten years. Though I enjoyed reading Proust, Gide, and Kafka, rereading the Odyssey, studying commentaries on Joyce and the other authors, examining Plato's Phaedrus closely, etc., I did not have the sense of urgency and of real accomplishment that I always had even when I was translating Kazantzakis. Yet I do hope to be "creative" in my lectures this fall, though God only knows how I shall manage to prepare them all in time. I foresee ten weeks of frenzy and tension.

Herb Wekselblatt, the other night, told me of an opera review that appeared in the paper the morning after the blackout, when the electricity failed all over the East. It praised the singers to the skies, the only trouble being that the performance had been cancelled. The review (as apparently is often the case) was written before the performance.

Vivid memories of Greece, stimulated by reading Βασιλικού, Η μυθολογία της Αμερικής.

Chrysanthi's father's reaction to the movie we took him to in Άγια Τριάδα—the typical peasant reaction.

The little maid at Saklambanis's house.

The monk seen for the 2nd time at the festival for 15 August near Άγια Τριάδα.

The doctor's blind wife.

The orphanage on the mountain.

The museum directress in Haniá, weeping copiously.

The talk with the waiter about Karamanlis's politics, at Άγια Τριάδα.

Easter.

Lovely feeling, last September, when I traveled to Terpni and watched the dragline and bulldozer at work building our new pond. Pride of ownership and accomplishment, of having money enough to make, as Samuel Butler would say, the steam shovel an appendage of our primitive limbs. In moments the machine cleared more land than I have been able to do in weeks. Perhaps all our notions—sentimental agrarianism à la Thoreau—ought finally to be outgrown. Why not see that man's development also is expressed in the machines he creates? On the other hand, I often feel, when contemplating my farm, what an expression of selfishness it is. All that energy, all those man-hours of labor, all that expenditure, and only for my own comfort, and to isolate myself from the problems and congestion of the outside. Up to now I have never questioned the nobility of the work there. Building with one's own hands, laboring with one's own muscles, seemed good and admirable: it was self-justifying. However, when I receive letters from Mrs. Horton at AFSC asking me to apply for the directorship of a summer project, and then think that I cannot do so this summer because I must seed the banks of my new pond, continue to plow and reseed the fields, remove the stones, perhaps build a new shed for the harrow, fertilizer spreader, mowing machines and plow, plus thin out the trees as arranged with the forester, I begin to wonder. The self-justifying aspect of the whole undertaking is shaken, and that is bad because up to now I have felt the farm as something to which I could give all my energy, without hesitation or question. Let's see what the future will bring.

This has been a busy Christmas, as always. I've seen old friends: Stefan, Herb, Paul, Peter Gardner. Hillel seems to be out of town, as is Dan Wilkes. We've gone to the theater: a wonderful work of art, a true opera—Fiddler on the Roof. Then to the opposite: an overrated cliché—Oklahoma (with the children), a good movie version of Crime and Punishment with Peter Lorre as Raskolnikov; "The Devils," adapted from Aldous Huxley's The Devils of Loudon, an interesting but very faulty play, where the hero is less interesting than one of the minor characters; the Play of Herod, done at St. George's Church on 16th Street: quiet dignity and stateliness, the old processional and pageant quality of the middle ages. The high point however was the Dali exhibit at Huntington Hartford's Gallery of Modern Art. Dali is a great painter; he combines superb technique with superb imagination. He can paint anything: impressionistic landscapes, poster art, surrealist fantasies, "double-vision" pictures where from two feet you see one thing and from twenty feet something entirely different. I was fascinated by the obvious affinities between what he has been doing in the visual medium and what Kafka, Joyce, Mann et al. did in the novel. I also made my annual pilgrimage to 8th Avenue, the thrill of the clinic, and bought the usual magazines but the physiological results were nil as usual. Like Gide I try to redirect this predominant diversion.

A young woman, age 22 or thereabouts, is a miracle, a magnet. Peter Gardner's new wife, Maitch (for M.H. = Mary Helen) is pretty and sexy in her way: fresh, young, with a wide mouth and wide-set, dark eyes. Was I jealous of his second chance at adolescent romance (my era of romance is so obviously past; I mean the time of real, overwhelming physical attraction as distinguished from sexual habit, when thrills can be achieved only by what is so euphemistically called "variation" and where stimulation quickly dulls sensitivity, leading to the need for stronger or varied stimulation). I begin to understand what none of my students, I know, can possibly understand—namely, the progression of satiation that leads to sexual masochism and even to self-flagellation and mutilation. There are stranger things than this in the bizarre history of mankind. The adolescent is thrown into a paroxysm of shivers when his knee touches the knee of his beloved beneath the table (as I know from my little girl in Rochester before I left there), or as he places his hand in the warm, moist hand of his beloved (as I know from rides with Chrysanthi on the top deck of the bus from Selly Oak to Birmingham and back). What can a student know, really, about what lies beyond this? What realization can he have, really, that this will end?

So Peter G. is remarried; Paul is remarried. Divorce or death raise their heads in the Garden of Eden. Chrysanthi is depressed by this. It is grotesque, somehow, to see Paul Davidoff joking and laughing, with a new wife who cooks excellent meals, services his bed, and caresses his old wife's children. He spoke of Rusty only once last night when we visited him in his substantial house in Larchmont. "Once Rusty and I went driving on one of the your New Hampshire back roads," he said, and then told how they got frightened and turned around lest they get lost. He spoke of her as of some acquaintance, a person he might see again from time to time, like a roommate.

And yet, what is the alternative? Should one act like Miss Havisham? No. The old customs were probably the best compromise. Two years of "official" mourning, with dark clothes or at least an armband. I like that; I like ritualized expressions of emotion. They do a job for the bereaved and also for society. He pays his respects in the accepted way, and afterwards, no questions are asked.

His wife, Linda, is the daughter of a Pittsburgh labor leader and union official. She is liberal, radical, in the Little Red Schoolhouse-Norman Thomas-socialist way. All the “right” attitudes, the noble causes—peace, equality, integration, etc., etc. The first thing we said when we entered was something like “Oh, what a nice house, what a dignified and quiet street!” “Yes,” she replied. “But Larchmont is unrealistic. It is all white upper middle class. Our children are deprived of diversity. They should know Puerto Ricans and butchers’ sons—Negroes.” “But that is very simply solved,” I said. “All you need do is move to the Bronx or the lower East side, and Paul would be closer to work into the bargain.” “No,” she replied; “we want the others to come here.” How typical! And let her bring her model, “typical” Puerto Rican or Negro or butcher, and see how they like it! But her conscience will be salvaged. She will be less bothered by the discrepancy between her liberal-socialist views and her bourgeois-capitalist privileged existence. But why should I talk? We are all the same.

Peter Gardner is really not settled. His job doesn’t fulfill him, he has no professional training, he is floating around, looking, looking for something. Bad. But the old joie-de-vivre is still there, and the girl is charming.

After visiting Stefan at his new home in Woodstock, I hurried to his exhibit at Long Island University. His painting has changed, improved. He is nicely representational, but always in an abstract way. A neat compromise between the two. His experiments with sand and gravel are effective; a fine texture results (of course Dali does this too—probably it is the vogue). It was interesting to see LIU, which is housed in the old Paramount Theater building on Flatbush Avenue in Brooklyn. The huge, gilded lobby is sectioned off into a cafeteria and hallway. In the cafeteria: chaos. At some tables, individual students typing away at their papers in the midst of the hubbub; at others, girls and boys singing quietly around a guitarist. Everywhere sloppiness, dirt, strange faces, strange languages. The theater itself is the school gymnasium, and quite a sight. Half the seats were removed—that is, those near the “screen.” Here a basketball floor was laid down and, around it, a track. Groups were playing under each basket while a few runners circled them. In the background, an athlete working out on the trampoline, beneath the fantastic gilt-work of the old theater, and the ornate ceiling, and the royal boxes. In back of the court, the rows of seats were left intact, all plush, with the original purple carpets. Also the balcony.

After I finished viewing Stefan's pictures (hung disgracefully in a corridor on the 11th floor) I was on my way out when I heard some blasts on a trombone and an electric guitar. I followed the sound and went down a wide staircase, lined as always by the purple carpet, to what was originally the theater's lounge—an enormous room in the basement, with a kind of series of anterooms. In one of these was the band, a group of teenagers. A sexy boy of 15 or so at the drums, chewing gum but looking cherubic rather than hoodlumic, as most drummers do, some beanpoles on the electric guitars, assorted types or auxiliaries with bongo drums or other percussion or rhythm pieces—one lad with hip-hugging jeans and hair that reached to his shoulders. But all looked rather stolid and bored. The band began to play. Inside, the students were massed, but only a few danced—in the foreground a couple consisting of two girls, one rather squat and ugly in a tight white sweater that outlined her enormous breasts. She and the other writhed and twisted, shaking breasts and thighs obscenely while the others watched. While this was in progress, two boys came down the stairs and peeked in (I was standing at the entrance). They were obviously Greek. They took one look and one said to the other, Τι βρώμικη. Πω πω! Τι βρώμικη. Ας φύγουμε. They were obviously brought up in the Church.

Parents telephoned to give us two items of news: (1) that Hone has cancer and will probably never leave the hospital, (2) that Alice is pregnant and will have her third child in about 7 months. I thought of “Ecce Puer.”

Interesting two days with György Márkus, a Marxist philosopher from Budapest who came here to speak to the Great Issues course on Marxist humanism.

To Burlington for Quarterly Meeting. Saw Douglas Steere, very dignified, unctuous, and talkative, as always. A good man.

We went to the Greek church. I know now why the priests wear beards in Greece. It is a good custom. Without a beard, the priest is a personality, Reverend So-and-so. With beards, they all look alike. Your attention is diverted to the function; the man is forgotten.

A cute typing error in a student paper, speaking of Will Brangwen: his “reactionary black studpidity which seals his mind from any aspect of the world.”

Back from a week in NYC. Uncle Hone died of cancer after a four-month illness. Knew he was going, of course. When Irving visited him in hospital, he still showed the old playfulness, greeting him with “Well, you old bugger!" When mother, on the last day of her visit, said she hoped to see him again in Harrison (he was hospitalized in Florida), he quietly took her hand and kissed it. He wrote in his will that he should be cremated and that no service be conducted. Instead, friends should be invited to the house for a kind of Irish wake. Irene followed his instructions. Irving of course was scandalized; he wanted a service with a paid rabbi eulogizing a man he'd never met (and who had been violently anti-religious all his life). Also, Irv objected to the lack of a visible remains, such as a tombstone. Hone was consistent, like Zorba. Bravo. Strange case of a man who outwardly seemed to do nothing in life but who succeeded in (a) an extremely happy marriage, (b) winning innumerable friends, (c) giving joy to many people. He will be remembered. Irene was a rock. She'd lost her mother, sister, brother, and now her best friend, Viola, is also dying of cancer. But she is devoid of any self-pity. She remembers the good days and is thankful for them. She talked, when we visited her, of the burgeoning trees and the crocuses. She asked if we'd like a willow tree for our new house. Imagine!

I learned two things about Dad's father. One: that he cursed God shortly before he died. Two: that when he was given prescriptions for glasses by the ophthalmologist, he always refused to have them filled, but instead went to the pushcarts on Orchard Street and tried on pair after pair of used spectacles until he found lenses that pleased him. The pragmatic approach. In Lvov, I also learned, he had a bread route, pushing a cart.

We visited Stefan Lökös on the way back. Inge's niece has come over from Germany to live with them—a buxom seventeen-year-old girl with a limp. Stefan told me that her leg had been amputated a little above the ankle; she wears a wooden leg and foot which, when covered with a heavy stocking, does not show. This was the result of an infection that set in after an operation. Will she find a husband?

Stefan and I played the Spring Sonata, plus Handel, the Mozart concerto in A major, a Bach sonata and the D minor unaccompanied suite, including the Chaconne, with Schumann's piano version. We left at 6:30 and drove home in torrential rains, with Chrysanthi very tense and scared the whole way, arriving at about 1 a.m. Luckily there was a fascinating discussion on the radio about alcoholism with a brilliant Harvard psychiatrist named Chafez.

In Greenwich Village we saw a well-dressed man walking his dog. The dog left a nice bowel movement on the sidewalk. The man took out a Kleenex, picked up the shit, and deposited in in the gutter.

Lunched with Hillel, who is now at William Morrow. He says he's interested in my proposed Kazantzakis book, and also why don't I write up my lectures. (Why don't I do a lot of things??)

Lunched with Louis Cornell, who chose Hanover, NH over England as a place to spend a year off. Some people! Still, we'll have his viola for our Wednesday nights.

Today, saw Dick Williamson, who was away at Stanford for six months. He learned to smoke marijuana. Says he heard things in music that he never heard before, when under the influence. Also thinks he played the flute better. Insists that it is non-addictive.

March 26, 1966

I've been reading Throckmorton's The New Testament and Mythology in connection with the sermon I'm to give the Unitarians on Easter Sunday. He summarizes and defends Bultmann's thesis in Kerygma and Myth. I'd heard of Bultmann from Robin Scroggs but knew nothing directly. Now I find a kindred mind regarding the presence of the eternal in the Now, for instance. Along these same lines, Rollo May's article in the Saturday Review recently (March 26) about sex and especially the need for Dionysian ecstasy in the experience seemed like a restatement of my lectures last fall in Comparative Literature.

Chrysanthi reminisced about the war in Greece. When the bombers first came over Salonika she was living near the Jewish cemetery. The Greek houses have no real cellars so, for "air raid shelters" the people removed the stones from the graves and hid in the graves. The only trouble was that when a bomb landed nearby the concussion sometimes causes the walls of the grave to cave in, burying the people alive.

The bombing got worse and the family decided to evacuate. They put their belongings into pillowcases and started walking out of Salonika, eventually going to a village called Πίτσα in Halkidiki. C. remembers the first night, when they slept under a tree. Then the planes came over. She says she remembers what a beautiful sight it was in Thessaloniki: the whole sky illuminated by flares, and in the light of the flares thousands of parachutists descending gracefully.

Everywhere along the march they were received graciously and given bread, because Dimitrios had former pupils or relatives of former pupils everywhere. In Riza they stayed for six months. They used to go out to the fields each day and collect daisies. Magdalini ground these up, added a little oil and flour, and this was their food, plus corn bread that stuck in the throat.

Odysseas was then about 18, an athlete, handsome, vivacious, with a huge appetite. He was always hungry. Magdalini used to hide the bread under the bed but he kept stealing it, which led to recriminations. When he was forced to leave the house later on during the civil war he hid out in a garage pretending to be a mechanic. Lola, on pain of death if caught, brought him scraps of bread that she slipped to him as he lay beneath the cars.

It was because of Odysseas, of course, that Chrysanthi and her parents were imprisoned. C. was kept about 20 days in a large cell with many other women, including her mother. No food was provided and the prisoners shared whatever was brought by relatives. She was released through the efforts of Mr. House, and went to the Quaker school, very depressed and sick. Her mother and father remained. Vouli helped very much at this point, sending Demosthenes and Creon to cheer Chrysanthi up, having them serenade her over the telephone, etc.

March 30, 1966

In preparation for my talk to the Quaker-Unitarian group this April 10, I have been burying myself these days in a study of the Resurrection and its possible meaning for our time. The main thing I have discovered is the eschatological view, strongly favored by Albert Schweitzer in his sketch of the life of Jesus and in The Quest of the Historical Jesus, also by Bultmann and Berdyaev. This of course had been entirely absent from my "liberal" Christianity. The Resurrection—indeed, everything in the Gospels—can be seen only in terms of the eschatological expectation: i.e., the coming of the Kingdom of God, of righteousness, love, beauty. Now all this must be interpreted existentially rather than supernaturally. The early Church very soon discovered that the Kingdom was not to come by an act of God. The Kingdom will come only if man brings it. This does not mean, however (as it has meant in liberal religion) the amelioration of material conditions on earth, or the pious and sentimental hope that human beings will one day become better than they now are. We must be eschatological and moral in full cognizance of the truth about human nature—i.e., we can hope for momentary intrusions of the Kingdom, for fleeting touches by the finger of God, for sporadic escape from the tyranny of necessity and death. We must not make the mistake, so brilliantly analyzed by D. H. Lawrence in his Studies, of thinking that a “negative of species” is a “new species.” That is, we must continue to think of the Kingdom as wholly spiritual, as an escape from the material—from death. (Thus the Resurrection is an eschatological event.) We must not think we are bringing the Kingdom if we improve or ameliorate material conditions. The formula for ethics becomes: Act in such a way as to bring closer the Kingdom of God. Such action, since the Kingdom of God is antithetical to the conditions of the Darwinian world, inevitably means suffering. Suffering, therefore, becomes a sign of religious behavior, though it should not become an end in itself. Regarding all this, compare the ethical section of my Liberal’s Credo, which makes a lot more sense when linked with eschatological ideas. I must read Bultmann directly; so far I’ve only gotten him second hand through Throckmorton. Also must see Robin Scroggs on all this.

This is all extremely relevant to pacifism.

April 24, 1966

Leander played C. P. E. Bach’s “Solfeggietto” at the school variety night and was introduced as playing a piece by P. E. —that is “Physical Education”—Bach! The whole evening, except for L. and the boy who played the recorder, and some acrobatics and gymnastics, was terribly ugly: rock and roll, etc. Our culture!

John Rassias, back from Africa where he hired teachers for Peace Corps orientation, was interested in what Africans consider sexually attractive in a woman since so many African women appear publicly with bare breasts. He was told that three things are valued especially: extremely white eyeballs, extremely black, sleek, oily hair (a sign of cleanliness; otherwise the hair is dusty and drab), and round, meaty hips.

From Exiles: ¶ Robert [to Richard]: You have that fierce indignation which lacerated the heart of Swift. You have fallen from a higher world, Richard, and you are filled with fierce indignation, when you find that life is cowardly and ignoble. While I . . . have come up from a lower world and I am filled with astonishment when I find that people have any redeeming virtue at all. (p. 58.) ¶ Richard [to Robert]: Have you the luminous certitude that yours is the brain in contact with which she must think and understand and that yours is the body in contact with which her body must feel? (p. 57.)

May 4, 1966

Alfred Alvarez spoke, and reminded me a little of Stephen Dedalus. He spoke of the commercial quality invading the arts: the fashion, the instant success made possible by mass media adulation, etc.—all this having the effect upon the artist of making him consciously a public entertainer and even buffoon going through his paces . . . for a price (à la Allen Ginsberg). Well and good. But here was Alvarez himself speaking for a fee of $600, obviously unprepared, substituting personality for real involvement in the subject matter, or real dedication to the craft and responsibilities of criticism (read: “poetry”) and, as he as much as said later, hardly believing in his own pronouncements. Stephen Dedalus all over again: the poseur, the juggler and mountebank fooling his audience members into believing they are receiving something profound.

With Alvarez there was, however, a rationalization not present in Stephen Dedalus. His flippancy, his nihilism, lack of values, his reversion to posturing and smart cynicism were all predicated on a firm belief that the world will be blown up by H-bombs in ten or fifteen years. So, at the same time that he sees flippancy and nihilism in modern art for this reason, he himself strangely exemplified this flippancy even more than the artists. Perhaps we should (I wonder) at least give him credit for being thoroughly honest in refusing to aspire to anything more than buffoonery. As he said, writers (and presumably critics too, judging from him) have nothing to lean against, no stable wall of values from which to lament the absence of values in the world about them. They participate in that absence. If this is the case, we are back at the nihilism from which the existentialists tried to rescue us. Even worse, because contemplation of modern life in people like Alvarez produces not despair (in despair there is paradoxically a seed of hope ) but instead simply a giggle, and a dedication to “getting away” with as much as possible . . . before the big bang.

May 8, 1966

Weekend in Riparius. Chrysanthi angry and morose on Saturday but softened a little by Sunday. She is furious because I seem to prefer my students and my work to my family. Maybe I do! We went with the hope of seeding the area around the pond. All I succeeded in doing was to get the tractor stuck in the mud! Bill Heid came and pulled me out.

Joycean epiphany: Harold Carman, speaking of Jane's latest boyfriend: "His father's a doctor." Clare (not quite attuned to his desire to impress me): "Yes, he's going to pull two of my teeth tomorrow."

May 11, 1966

Leander suggested that cows, when milked, should give not milk but bubble gum.

June 15, 1966

We went to North Creek at 7:00 p.m. to pick up my tractor tire, which I'd left at Alexander Bros. garage to be fixed, and were told that it had not been looked at. But this disappointment, and the wasted trip, was compensated for when we went to the dump. A row of people was standing at the lip of the trench, most peculiarly, as though the dump was now the new place for meeting one's friends. But when we came closer we understood the reason. A huge black bear was slinking around in the undergrowth just behind the garbage. This was my first view of an Adirondack bear.

June 16, 1966

David Mirza and Leona arrived with a Frenchman and his family on the way back to Caen in Normandy where he teaches English at the lycée and directs the summer language institute. His name: Jean-Pier Fichou. He told me of his admiration for André Malraux, and especially for the Maisons de Culture. These are established in all cities over 100,000 population. For a fee of approximately $1.00 per year, subscribers are given the opportunity to attend a cultural event every night of the year practically. There are concerts, professional theater troupes performing classic plays, lectures, classic films, and even an opera once a month. The hope was to attract workers though so far only a small minority of the audience is from the working class. But the important thing is that the events do not play down to the cultural level of the audience but rather try to raise that level. Jean-Pierre told me that the Director of the Caen Maison has written personal letters to every citizen of the city outlining the advantages and opportunities of the Maison.

I also met an interesting and friendly Frenchman when I went as external examiner to the University of Virginia: Claude Richard of the University of Montpellier. He was spending a year at Virginia finishing a dissertation on Poe.

Yesterday I was greeted at my “office” by a browsing deer. Today, as I sat reading Toda-Raba, a huge dragonfly perched on the edge of the table with a small brightly colored insect hanging from its jaws. It devoured this insect leisurely, then flew off.

Kazantzakis’s letters to Prevelakis are one more revelation, one more confirmation of K.’s genius, his insatiable curiosity, his knack for turning all experience to account. The letters are full of memorable sayings. For instance, after describing the disparity between an ugly petroleum village and a young dancing girl—a disparity that suddenly for him became a unity: a symbolic representation of the twofold nature of man, the drabness of the flesh, of material necessity, on the one hand, and the miraculous grace of the spirit, on the other—he writes: Τούτη είναι η μεγάλη ελπίδα του ταξιδευτή: να βρει στα πέρατα της γης τις εικόνες που εκφράζουν την ψυχή του και τον βοηθούν να σώσει και να σωθεί. (p. 61, letter 42.) K.’s relation to Prevelakis is intense and obsessive; he almost clings to this man 26 years his junior. But at this point he gives a plausible and touching reason: Όταν θέλω ν’αναζήσω την αγάπη μου αυτή σε Σας, την αποδίδω σε καθαρά εγωιστικά υπερήφανα αίτια. Είναι σα να μιλώ στον εαυτό μου, τον εικοσοχρονίτη . . . και βλέπω τον εαυτό μου έφηβο ν’ αγωνιά και να θέλει να κυριέψει τον κόσμο.

I saw this in my own feelings for Larry Simms recently. He wrote a fiery letter, all impatience with pretense and stuffiness (à propos of Dartmouth’s graduation) and just about the time I received it I was re-reading some of my own letters and writings of my college years at Harvard and Haverford (all stored in boxes here). I was terrified at myself! As K. would say, Τι θεριό ήταν αυτός; Τι τον έτρωγε;

¶ “You remind me of the poor philosopher in the boat,” he said. “The philosopher said to his boatman, ‘Do you know philosophy?’ ‘No.’ ‘No?’ then half your life has been lost.’ A little while afterward, a violent storm came up. ‘Oh, philosopher,’ called the boatman, ‘do you know how to swim?’ ‘No.’ ‘No? Then your whole life is lost.’” —Toda-Raba, p. 34, chapter 3.

Alice and my parents have been here for a week. Peter Buseck went to N.H. for a chemical congress. Father pathetic as usual—dead. Conversation: “How tired I am!” “Did you sleep well?” “Are you rested?” “I took a nap this afternoon.” The other subject: food.

The oven broke again yesterday, and I rigged up a kind of improvised Dutch oven in order to bake the bread that Chrysanthi had already kneaded. Very successful. This “accomplishment”—the substitution of primitive ingenuity for modern conveniences gave C. the greatest pleasure she’s had (or shown, at any rate) since our arrival. (She’s been melancholy owing to morning sickness on account of her pregnancy.) Perhaps this is the great joy left to modern man: to revert—in play—to primitivism, and thus to show himself, or fool himself into believing, that he is not a slave to his own conveniences.

Our pond is full, and delicious. I read until lunchtime, then cooled off with a quick plunge. At last I’ve found a place where I can swim with nothing on, or just a cover-up.

Leander and I have been playing duets—Kuhlau, and now Eine Kleine Nachtmusik. Joy. Also, we’ve begun sight-singing and theory. Everything takes so much time: hours. But this is important, and also wonderfully enjoyable.

Kazantzakis’s schedule: rise at 4 a.m., write. Lunch of milk, eggs, butter, potatoes. Siesta of two hours. Write again. Evening: walk. It is strangely disconcerting for me to spend my mornings with Kazantzakis, that flaming soul, and my afternoons with my parents and Alice, those cold ashes.

Kazantzakis’s remarks on communism in Letter 92 apply perfectly to our side as well. The gist is: life is very complicated and into this complication comes a slogan—for example: proletariat vs. bourgeois. It is only after the slogan is formulated that the two classes really develop, or that class-consciousness appears. In other words, the simplified slogan actually transforms reality, making people think in simplified terms that formerly did not exist. The same with our own slogans of west-versus-east, freedom vs. communism, etc. This will only serve to produce a cleavage that of itself would not develop.

Kazantzakis also sees Russia's great ideal to be, paradoxically, the USA—i.e., the goal of materialistic comfort for all, worship of the machine. Thus communism is a logical end to the bourgeois era of civilization that replaced religion with science. The chief difference is that the communists seek a more just distribution of material goods. (But we are now doing exactly the same.)

July 4, 1966

The thoughts in Letter 92 are supplemented by the manifesto reproduced in Toda-Raba, pp. 116–120. One phrase appeals to me especially. In speaking against the materialism of our age (a materialism shared by West and East alike), K. gives one symptom as “the outrageous overestimation of commonplace know-how.” Does this not say worlds about our situation in the United States?

Coleen Sibley spent the weekend with us, bearing sad news of a precarious marriage. The chief villain seems to be Ora, who—says Coleen—is more married to Carl than she (Coleen) is! She told us of a Thanksgiving dinner the three had together. In the midst of it, Ora had some kind of a fit . . . supposedly. She began screaming, “She stole my son, she stole my son!” Carl called a doctor, who prescribed some pills, presumably a sedative. Coleen saw Ora put the pill in her mouth, but conceal it in her cheek instead of swallowing it. She then asked for a Kleenex to wipe her lips, and deposited the pill in the Kleenex, surreptitiously. Coleen of course discovered it there, and they forcefully administered another pill, and thus quieted Ora down. Coleen turns out to be a simple and probably naïve girl from South Carolina who was “rushed” by Carl—married him before she knew anything of the relationship between mother and son. Now they are separated; Carl lives with Ora on 24th Street and commutes to work in Yonkers; Coleen lives in the apartment they found in Yonkers and commutes to work in Manhattan! I felt compassion for her all weekend—that is, in her exposure for three days to a family: grandparents, brother and sister each with spouses, lots of children, all reasonably close and amicable; and the parents not, really, interfering in the children's lives. We swam in the pond, went to the Riverside Church supper, picnicked at Minerva, talked a lot, listened to music (home-made), ate, drank. (Also, Peter Buseck and I got a good start on the thinning project in the woods: tedious work in 90°+ heat.) I enjoyed Peter's company immensely. He has a lot of vitality, and is (without even trying) a constantly pleasant, good-natured fellow.

Kazantzakis's prayer, in a letter to Eleni, June 30, 1928 (in Toda-Raba, p. 213): "God grant that you will experience great joys and great griefs with me, and never mediocrity or boredom."

Prevelakis remarks (p. 117) that change of place is equivalent to removal in time. How true this is! When we go to Greece, for example, we transport ourselves back 50 or 75 years in time. I am constantly delighted because I see things there that I remember from my youth: trolley cars, pushcarts, open markets, hurdy-gurdy men with monkeys.

July 10, 1966

Geoff and Shelagh spent the day here yesterday. Geoff solved the mysteries of my new pump—it was simply a problem of air seepage in the suction hose, and of proper priming. We talked about ponds . . . and people. Everything in nature (for instance the total life existing in a pond) tends toward equilibrium, said Geoff. Man is the only creature who constantly wishes to upset nature's equilibrium. Carp, perch, bass, trout, frogs, plant life, oxygen supply, etc. will all, in time, establish an equilibrium. But man, dissatisfied, does not welcome this.

July 13, 1966

Culture has crept close to Riparius. The new Saratoga Festival presents the NYC ballet for an entire month! We went last night and saw Divertimento, Tarantella, Agon, and Stars & Stripes. The Agon is haunting, terribly sensual, with the jagged, disconnected rhythms and gestures of our times. Suzanne Farrell was superb, as I'd heard; the men were adequate. On the way back, a hot pastrami sandwich in Lake George!!

Whenever I thought of Jim Clancy and his life as a director I always felt aggrieved that such splendid efforts should be so ephemeral. The show is on the boards for a week, and that is all; it can never be resurrected in the same way again. But reading Kazantzakis's Odyssey, with its re-enforcement in the letters, throws new light on this. K. says that the supreme creativity is to create and then obliterate—leaving the slate clean so that you can begin again. We tend to think of the artist as someone who strives for permanence: Shakespeare's sonnet about the poem being the most lasting monument, etc. But for sheer creative élan, at least in K.'s view, the impermanent medium is superior. He develops this theme especially in relation to the cinema.

Neither C. nor I gave each other presents on our anniversary on the 17th. Nor did we say anything. Today we explained why, and laughed. I had thought far ahead and had ordered a pair of shoes for C. from Sears, but—as always!—they had been out of stock, and it was too late to send in another order. C., in her turn, had baked a very special lemon pie, but it had turned out so badly that she threw it away.

Lou Smith came to fix the oven. Marie told me that he is a bird fancier, so much so that whenever he finds a dead bird of an interesting species he takes it home, wraps it carefully, and stores it in his freezer.

Reading a TLS lead article about Lucien Goldmann yesterday, I suddenly had insight into my perhaps fanatical attachment to Terpni. Goldmann, echoing Marxist orthodoxy, talks about the alienation or “reification” contingent upon industrialism. The whole problem is that men “do not recognize themselves in their work.” And that is the whole secret of this farm. Everywhere, at every turn, I recognize myself! Every field was hardly a field until I re-cleared it, every path is kept open by my sweat, every building was designed and erected by me, every rock in the chimney fetched, lifted, and placed by me. I thought also of how non-alienating is the job of professor, where each classroom session or lecture is a “product”—ephemeral, granted but so are automobiles and refrigerators—that bears upon it the full impress of its designer and executor and packager: me. Or at least it ought to be so, and if it is not the failure is in me and not in any impersonal economic, social, or “historic” force.

Yesterday, at the dinner table, we were having one of those conversations that is like a waking day-dream: talking about whether we'd take the boat or the plane to Europe, whether we'd go to England first or directly to Greece, etc. Of course, Leander expressed himself emphatically on all points, and I became a little annoyed because of the frivolousness of the entire proceedings; there seemed something irresponsible and immoral about this serious debate over which pleasure should be preferred to another, while so many people had no pleasures at all to choose from.

Today I read in Time and Free Will something that throws a new light on our discussion of yesterday, and alters my attitude. Bergson says (chapter 1, pp. 9–10): “What makes hope such an intense pleasure is the fact that the future, which we dispose of to our liking, appears to us at the same time under a multitude of forms, equally attractive and equally possible. Even if the most coveted of these becomes realized, it will be necessary to give up the others, and we shall have lost a great deal. The idea of the future, pregnant with an infinity of possibilities, is thus more fruitful than the future itself, and this is why we find more charm in hope than in possession, in dreams than in reality.”

July 20, 1966

The lovely naïveté of children! We were talking at table about the provenance of bacon and ham. “But how does the pig give bacon?” asked Alec. “Is it like a cow gives milk?”

Coleen here again. As Marie said last time in her sarcastic way: “Firmly attached! Firmly attached!” The situation with Carl doesn’t seem to be any better. Coleen works, lives alone, Carl doesn’t support her, and he visits her only when he wants sex.

Dad sent me a sermon from the Ethical Culture Society called “Neither Gentile nor Jew,” taking up from Paul’s statement to express a bland kind of eclecticism where people would identify with the “human race” rather than with this group or that. I used to be taken in by such wish-washy liberalism, but am not any more. The whole point of Paul’s plea was that there was another strong, dynamic and meaningful identification, namely Christianity, which could embrace both Gentile and Jew, and make the smaller divisions meaningless. By the same token, communism or any other great force unites diverse people so long as that force remains alive. But the “human race”? That is no rallying cry, and will never be, at least not until we have to unite qua humans to battle the apes or the angels or the Martians instead of each other.

¶ The beliefs to which we most strongly adhere are those of which we should find it most difficult to give an account, and the reasons by which we justify them are seldom those which have led us to adopt them. In a certain sense we have adopted them without any reason, for what makes them valuable in our eyes is that they match the colour of all our other ideas, and that from the very first we have seen in them something of ourselves. —Bergson, Time and Free Will, chapter II, p. 135.

¶ We estimate the talent of a novelist by the power with which he lifts out of the common domain, to which language had . . . brought them down, feelings and ideas to which he strives to restore, by adding detail to detail, their original and living individuality. —Bergson, ibid., p. 164.

¶ Hence there are finally two different selves, one of which is, as it were, the external projection of the other, its spatial and, so to speak, social representation. We reach the former by deep introspection, which leads us to grasp our inner states as living things, constantly becoming as states not amenable to measure, which permeate one another and of which the succession in duration has nothing in common with juxtaposition in homogeneous space. But the moments at which we thus grasp ourselves are rare, and that is just why we are rarely free. The greater part of the time we live outside ourselves, hardly perceiving anything of ourselves but our own ghost, a colourless shadow which pure duration projects into homogeneous space. Hence our life unfolds in space rather than in time; we live for the external world rather than for ourselves; we speak rather than think; we 'are acted' rather than act ourselves. To act freely is to recover possession of oneself, and to get back into pure duration. —Time and Free Will, pp. 231–2.

Ballet again. The Cage, L'après-midi d'un faun, & Halinquinade. Stravinsky, for me, is a continuing revelation; the others were very ordinary. Hope to see Firebird on Thursday.

Coleen told us that Carl has discontinued her telephone now, and has changed his Esso credit card so that her name is removed, etc. She is living in the Yonkers apartment with no furniture, eating off a card table, sleeping on a mattress on the floor. She comes from a South Carolina farm, one of seven children. Father raised tobacco, cotton, melons. He now plants cover crops for which he collects a federal subsidy.

Daniel Tisdale here for ten days: Leander overjoyed. Tomatoes luxuriant, also corn and string beans. Hens laying five eggs per day. Cornucopia. Even the wild irises we dug up on the roadside and transplanted are thriving. Hummingbirds frequent the purple flowers given us by Peg and Jerry English some years ago. I finally replaced the amplifier that I built (with Peter Gardner's help) in Rochester in 1953 and that insisted on buzzing instead of playing. It's nice to make the acquaintance again of old disks. Also, Leander is becoming proficient in sight-reading the pedal parts to my organ pieces—and we play away. He is doing well in his solfège, though he says he doesn't like to sing. Laudato si mio signior "peer tutti" (= per tutte).

Bergson is sobering in his insistence that the intellect was given us for practical purposes: adaptation to the surrounding world, and not primarily for contemplation, artistic composition, etc. I should remember this when I (it is a malady common to my class and profession) turn up my nose at businessmen, engineers and the like. Bergson, p. 145 of Creative Evolution, says: "As regards human intelligence, it has not been sufficiently noted that mechanical invention has been from the first its essential feature, that even to-day our social life gravitates around the manufacture and use of artificial instruments, that the inventions which strew the road of progress have also traces of its direction. This we hardly realize, because it takes us longer to change ourselves than to change our tools. Our individual and even social habits survive a good while the circumstances for which they were made, so that the ultimate effects of an invention are not observed until its novelty is already out of sight." . . . "If we could rid ourselves of all pride, . . . we should say perhaps not Homo sapiens, but Homo faber." (p. 146)

July 26, 1966

Idea for a novel (I never give up!): "Tom Brown's Schooldays" à la 1966 at Dartmouth, with the whole truth of "identity crises, fraternity hell nights, mutual masturbations in the common room, student government resignations, faculty squabbles over basic approaches and liberal arts vs. technology and/or science vs. humanities, plus nice things also: the sudden awakening to new ideas, religious conversions or de-conversions, a beautiful evening by a fireside with a girl, solving all metaphysical and political problems. . . . Now, with my perspective of 15 years, I might perhaps be able to write intelligently of student life, putting into the book my own experiences of that stage in life (drawing on diaries, letters, etc.) and also what I have seen, at Dartmouth, from the outside. . . . But when—when? . . . Now: back to Creative Evolution!

I like Bergson's formulation of the 2nd law of thermodynamics: "all physical changes have a tendency to be degraded into heat, and . . . heat tends to be distributed among bodies in a uniform manner. . . . It tell us that the instability to which we owe the richness and variety of our solar system will gradually give way to the relative stability of elementary vibrations continually and perpetually repeated" (pp. 256–7).

The end of Chapter III (pp. 280–286) is a composite statement of Bergson's philosophy—or rather, a call, a Cry (Κραυγή) for a new religion that would be a humanism possessing a supra-human dimension.

Bergson is very sensible on the question of life on other planets (pp. 269–70), especially when we remember that he was writing over 50 years ago. He refuses to worry about the presence of an atmosphere, appropriate temperatures, signs of green vegetation, etc. because he carries things back to their fundamentals. Life is a process whereby available energy (i.e., sunlight) may be stored and then utilized. In our system the storage depends on oxygen-carbon chemistry, but this was a mechanism developed by the élan vital to meet particular conditions. Given other conditions, other mechanisms were no doubt developed. Thus the likelihood is not so much that there are other worlds that duplicate the conditions of this world, but that there are completely different forms of life that grew up under the contingencies of different conditions.

I started Galatea Kazantzakis's Ἀνθρώποι και υπεράνθρωποι. What a terrible picture it paints of Kazantzakis, and yet it does seem plausible, from the evidence of K.'s own books, and also from remarks by Friar.

My Alec is a little old man whereas Leander is a real child: a devil. Alec is punctilious in everything; he infuriates me in this; but of course he is doing everything "correctly"—he is the pride of the house because he never forgets to brush his teeth! Galatea describes this situation very nicely (p. 31): Η Δανάη μεγάλωσε χωρίς να σταθεί ποτέ της παιδί. Δεν είχε κανένα από τα χαρακτηριστικά που ξεχωρίζουν τους μικρούς από τους μεγάλους και που το κυριότερο απ' όλα είναι η ξενοιασιά.

July 29, 1966.

We put a second floor down in the attic room and painted it a bright red. Transformation. A dingy garret became a cozy bedroom.

Galatea gives a lovely description of the arrival at Χερσόνησος (where Jeff's friend drove us to see the little chapel, on the way back from Μάλια). She catches especially the tone of the women with their children, the same that I observed at Άγια Τριάδα:

Το λιμάνι ήτανε μεγαλούτσικο, γεμάτο κίνηση. Βάρκες και καΐκια λικνίζονταν στα νερά, μια μπενζίνα αγκομαχούσε πέρα κει, και ξυπόλυτοι χωρικοί, με ανασκουμπουμένες πάνω απ' τα γόνατα μπλάβες ξεθωριασμένες πάνικες βράκες, σφιχτοζωμένοι τα κόκκινα ντόπια ζουνάρια, οι πιότεροι δίχως πουκάμισα, φόρτωναν μεγάλα σακιά χαρούπια στις μαούνες, μέσα στο λιοπύρι. Από τις πόρτες των σπιτιών, σ' όλο το μάκρος της παραλίας, έβλεπες γυναίκες μπαμπουλωμένες σ' άσπρες μπολίδες. Άλλες έπλεναν, άλλες κλώθανε, άλλες με το σταμνί στον ώμο έφερναν νερό, άλλες με τις κασίκες ξοπίσω τους πήγαιναν να τις βοσκήσουν. Πλήθος παιδάκια έπαιζαν στο γυρογάλι ή κολυμπούσαν. Κι άκουσες τις μανάδες:

—Μπρέ συ Γιωργιό! Ε, Γιωργιό, έβγα μπλιό μωρέ συ αντίχριστε από τη θάλασσα, γιατί θα σε σκοτώσω στο ξύλο σα γυαγίρεις. Γροικάς ίντα σου λέω!

—Ίνδα εδά θα βγω μα! Να λίγο-λίγο ακόμη και βγαίνω! (σελ. 121

August 1, 1966

Tom and Becky here over the weekend, also Richard Dellamora with eight boys from the ABC program. Typhoon!

Tom and I did some more "practice B-10: chemical thinning." Tom, like Peter Buseck, was surprised that I didn't want to have the forest pure and untouched. Why don't I? Somehow I like the idea of exploitation. I wouldn't have felt this way 10 or 15 years ago.

In the afternoon we raked the north field, which C. and I had mown last week. Slow work with hand rakes. Tom commented on the inefficiency of this practice. I replied that I didn't do it because it was efficient or inefficient, but because I enjoyed raking: the sun, the cool breeze the lovely smell of the hay. Also—and especially—the rhythmic narcor, the mindlessness. I thought of Malraux and of Gisors in La Condition Hu- mane—Gisors and his opium: the human need for forgetfulness. Does physical work, especially this type, accomplish the same for me? Is it my opium? Is this why I devote so much time to it, when I ought, perhaps, to be continuing with my studies? If it is an opium, it seems to me a good kind—healthy rather than debilitating; and, in its own way, constructive, the effects being always visible.

Reading Galatea's book this morning I thought again of the unconscionable affluence and comfort of our lives here. I am really ashamed now that we have the pond, and the farm takes on more the aspect of a private estate with every provision for enjoyment. Galatea, in her rather unpolished way, describes the period of the Occupation: people dying like flies in the streets, from hunger. I thought by contrast of our steaks and chops, our delicious local cheeses, our fresh vegetables from the garden, our liberal consumption of beer, our blueberry pies and fresh baked bread. Now, with Ashline's store so near and so cheap, also with my salary up to the colossal figure of $12,000, we are more liberal than ever. Yesterday I bought a porterhouse steak for the Shanklands and us, the first we've ever had. We ate lunch at 2:30, planned to go to hear country music at the Warrensburg jamboree, so had to have supper at 6:30 when no one was really hungry. Nevertheless: beer, salad, steak till we burst! I feel the extravagance of all this (especially in such close proximity to the ABC boys), but I also feel something quite opposite: the conviction that it cannot last, that some immense catastrophe will change everything, and that in the meantime we should enjoy, enjoy!

Now that I think of my salary, I am amazed at how fast it has risen. It is now, at the end of my 5th year at Dartmouth, exactly double of what it was when I began. If I remember correctly, the figures are: Instructor: 1961–2, $6000; 1962–3, $6700. Assistant professor: 1963–4, $7500; 1964–5, $8500. Associate professor: 1965–6, $10,000; 1966–7, $12,000. Plus 16% each of the last three years paid into TIAA-CREF.

Kay Horton is still pressing me to submit an application to lead a Quaker project. Will I ever do this? Will I give up my comforts? Is my farm surreptitiously becoming a weight around my neck?

Becky, yesterday, said that I obviously like people. I was astonished. I am like Leander: people must come to me, on my terms, under my hospitality. I always feel reluctant to go to them.

The jamboree at Warrensburg was very enjoyable and very memorable for many reasons. First the entertainment: “Doc Williams” and his country music. This was the usual group—guitars, bass, banjo, and “country” fiddle, plus Doc as vocalist. In addition, a clown who doubled as drummer, fiddler, bassist, and guitarist! The banjo player was tall and gaunt, a young Abe Lincoln; he wore a vermilion shirt with fringes hanging from shoulders and sleeves. The others all had string ties. I was delighted by the music. This is just what we see in Greece today: commercial, composed music firmly rooted in folk and ballad tradition. There was a ballad about a farm boy who says “I’ll be home in the morning,” gets shot however and is brought back in a wagon, whereupon his brother tells Ma: “I’ll be back in the morning (i.e., after he accomplishes his revenge). Another comic song about a husband locked out of his house by his headstrong wife Hannah. Another in which the violin imitated the whistle and chug-chug of a locomotive. Another which was a “sacred number” one by special request. The clown was a first-rate mime; he could do wonders with his tongue and mouth, make all kinds of grimaces and noises: belches, farts, squeaks, howls; and he made good use of his baggy pants. The jokes were all from burlesque, but good—e.g., “I saw a boy and girl playing checkers on the slope of a mountain, in the dark.” “Checkers in the dark! Impossible!” “Well, it must have been checkers.” “What makes you think that?” “Well, I heard the girl say to the boy: ‘You make another move and I’ll crown you!’” Or: “Skirts are going up and up, necklines are going down and down.” “That’s true.” “I’d sure like to be there when they meet.”

The audience howled. All farm people. Gaunt American Gothics, grizzled grandpas, little bony women in worn skirts of $2 dresses. Teenagers in their best jeans. It was so good to see live entertainment carrying on, still demanded, still appreciated, with a real warm close proximity between performer and spectator, with ad-libbing, microphone troubles, complete informality. All that is deadened with television, the opiate of the masses. It was good, too, to see a folk culture still surviving, how I don’t know. Doc Williams was the main attraction, but there were many others. The rides, of course: Ferris wheel, spinners, railway merry-go-round. A fat—huge—man-boy, with a tiny stupid-looking head, spun himself interminably in the spinner, cruelly, self-destructively. He more than filled the little cockpit. He went again and again and when he finally emerged was staggering and bleary-eyed. David Millington ran up to me to say hello. I didn't recognize him, he's so big now. He gasped that Roy had just crashed his Dodge into a telephone pole but had escaped unhurt. "He drinks," David said; "beer. Dad told him not to, but he does. You know Roy, the one with the buck teeth." "How's your mother?" "Fine. She's working seven days a week now. I've been here all day. I'll come up and see you" and off he went with his friends.

Besides the rides: gambling—small time stuff, a nickel a throw. And food: franks, chips, sugar candy (aghh!) and beer; thousands of empty cans of Carling everywhere. You waded through them.

Finally, the greased pole. I'd never seen this before. At the top, pasted on one next to the other, ten $1.00 bills. When we arrived, it was the time for "married women" to try. They didn't get far. Hefty, mature girls clambering one on top of the other up to a limit of three tiers, where-upon the poor girl at the bottom would give way and the others come sliding down, their skirts and blouses smeared with grease. The men took over. What persistence! First they found that no one could shinny up. Next they found that they couldn't just stand one on top of the other, because no bottom man could possibly support more than two or three above him, and to reach the top required at least five or six tiers. So they began planning. A dozen men ringed the base to give support. Then the next tier climbed up, two or three this time; after that, one for each tier. They clung to each other, stepping on heads, eyes, shoulders, hips, for footholds. Soon all had removed their shirts. They looked like a cluster of grapes, all arms, legs, buttocks intermixed, like some scene out of Dante's Inferno, especially against the dark background of the hillside, and illuminated as they were by the glint of the full moon. Finally another bright idea: use children for the top tiers. Two young boys about twelve or thirteen were impressed, one in jeans, the other in what looked like red tights, both shirtless. They scampered up and up, how many times, but always, just short of the goal, something happened and the whole cluster disintegrated, first slowly, inevitably, then with acceleration, and all were back on the ground again. But discouragement? None! All over from the beginning. We arrived at 8:30; it wasn't until nearly 10:00 that they finally reached the top and "harvested" the $10.00. Perseverance! Strength, agility! You could see how much more svelte some were than others. Soon only the best were performing. Completely tireless. They weren't even enjoying themselves, not after the first few times

(the collapsing was really hilarious for participants and audience alike). Certainly the prize was negligible—at most they'd get $1.00 each. They were filthy, hot, their clothes were being torn. Why? Why do this? Irrational. Simply the need to accomplish what cannot be accomplished. Not to have to go home and say, "We tried but didn't make it."

Galatea's book is disturbing, perhaps because in the portrayal of Alexandros. I see bits of myself, with the crucial difference of course that Alexandros (Kazantzakis) was somewhat justified by the facts of his genius and his productivity. There is the same scorn for the middle class based at least in part on a pathological shyness and a feeling of inadequacy and insecurity. The same abhorrence of sickness that leads to a callous treatment of the sick person. The same willfulness and egotism. Kazantzakis, for instance, made "Danae" accompany him on long walks, sometimes up mountains, oblivious of the fact that whereas his indomitable health made these walks pleasant for him, they were tiring and painful for his wife. I remember dragging Chrysanthi after me up that terribly long road to Saint Francis's hermitage outside Assisi, disdainful of automotive transportation because I felt that if Francis walked it, I should too. But Chrysanthi was sick and queasy with her first pregnancy (although I didn't know that at the time, not until we reached Rome and went to the doctor). In short, there is the same απανθρωπιά, a fundamental inability to love, to "feel with," να συμπαθώ.

August 3, 1966

Suddenly, reading Kazantzakis's Rock Garden (like all of his books, it can't seem to avoid being good: fascinating) I renewed my desire to write a "guide book" to Salonika, a very personalized one, like Kazantzakis's various Ταξιδεύοντας and like Forster's Alexandria. I already have much material: the journal entries from Άγια Τριάδα, the trip to Χορτιάτης, the episode of Paula and Socrates, the behavior of the new middle class (Danae's husband), theaters, restaurants, episode with George and the barbecued chickens, knowledge of menus, resorts, etc. Also, of course, the Αναστενάρηδες, a word about the Quaker School and the American Farm School, the material about German destruction of the harbor in Vassilis Vassilikos's Οι φωτογραφίες, contacts with poets, with Kakridis, the murder of Lambrakis, St. Paul's letter, the churches, Pella, the museum, the funny chrome-plated campground near Άγια Τριάδα, the saints' day at Μιχανιώνα. I should also investigate Pappas's new factories; get another letter of introduction from Mr. Boyden. Also, a king was assassinated in Salonika. Decimation of Salonika's Jews (interview Paula maybe). The dancing at Ρέμβη. Visit leather factory (C's relative; maybe rug factory; also tobacco processing plants, etc.). Also red light district (my reception when I came on the bicycle). The entertainers in Agia Triada: the "one-one band"; the lovely dance he did in the café, with castanets. The bears and monkeys; the hawkers. Street cries. Παράλυτος!

¶ If you believe you have found salvation, you have found it; if you believe you have not found it, you have not found it. (The Rock Garden, p. 145.)

¶ A man never travels except around the edges of his own soul. (Ibid, p. 62.)

Χαίρουμε τώρα διαβάζοντας Ο αλήθινος Ζορμπάς κι ο Νίκος Καζαντζάκης του Γιάννη Αναπλιώτη—είναι λίγο σαν μυθιστόριμα, όλο ανέκδοτα. Ο Ζορμπάς στην αλήθεια βγαίνει όπως τον έχει παραστήσει ο Καζαντζάκης στο βιβλίο του: γλεντζής, χωρατάς, γυναικοφαγάς, δουλευταράς, με όρεξη ζωής κι ενέργια ακαταμάχητη. «Δεν άφηγε ούτε λεφτό να περάσει χωρίς κάτι να κάνει, ούτε δευτερόλεφτο να πάει χαμένο. Όταν δεν δούλευε στο κάρβουνο, καταπιανόταν με κάτι άλλο» (σ. 58). Πώς θάθελα να είμαι έτσι κι εγώ! Είμαι λίγο σαν τον Καζαντζάκη (μήπως γι' αυτό μου ελκύει τόσο); φοβάμαι τους ανθρώπους, είμαι κλειστός, φεύγω από τον κόσμο διότι δεν θέλω να τα βάλω με τους άλλους—ενώ ονειρεύομαι να τα βάλω με τους άλλους, να γίνω ένας που μπκλέκεται στο πάρε-δόσε της καθημερινής πραγματικότητας, που έχει μυρίους φίλους (εστώ κι εχθρούς). Όμως στα αλήθεια . . . εδώ κάθουμαι στο χωράφι με συντροφιά τα πουλιά, κι μιλώ—γράφοντας—στον εαυτό μου! Γίνουμε όλο κι πιο πολύ κλειστός. Άμα γυρίσω στο σπίτι, πάντα το ίδιο: οι σακλαμάρες των παιδιών, κι ότι είναι χίλιες φορές χειρότερα, τα παράπονα της Χρυσάνθης, που έχει χάσει όλη τη ζωηρότητά της. Τώρα ακούω το ίδιο refrain από το πρωί ως το βράδυ: κρυώνω, κουράζομαι, πονώ. Ενθουσιασμός, καννένα. Ζεστασιά, τρυφεράδα, λιγοστά. Με τα παιδιά, όλο μη! μη! μη! Δεν τους διδάσκει, δεν παίζει μαζί τους, δεν τους χαρεί όπως προηγουμένως. Μόνο κρυώνει (στο καλοκαίρι πια!), κουράζεται, πονάει. . . . Καλά 'μαι εδώ, στο χωράφι, με συντροφιά τα πουλιά.

Kazantzakis says, via parable, what I tried to say to the students at the Tucker retreat last spring. This is in his Αγγλία, cited by Anapliotis, p. 109:

Κάποτε ένας ανατολίτης σοφός είδε μερικούς σκοινοβάτες να πραγματοποιούν με τα κορμιά τους τις πιο επικίνδυνες τόλμες. Και ξέσπασε σε κλάματα.

—Γιατί κλαις; τον ρώτησαν.

—Γιατί συλλογιέμαι, αποκρίθηκε ο σοφός, πως αν όπως γυμνάζουμε έτσι τα σώματά μας, γυμνάζαμε και την ψυχή μας, τι θάματα θα μπορούσαμε να κάμουμε!

August 8, 1966

Saturday night. Beers-Barnes circus in North Creek. A pretty small affair: two elephants, some trained horses, camels, seals, dogs, two boring clowns, a lady juggler. Also sex: a woman with a whip, snapping into two various objects held by a gorgeous young girl in a leotard, followed by a comedy routine—the worst kind of burlesque type—where the clown holds a baton-like roll of paper between his legs and she threatens to cut it shorter. The high spot, for the men (judging from whispers heard behind me, and also my own reaction) was a pretty blond aerialist in stage hose and a costume that exposed most of her buttocks (The French style dancing costume; I remember gasping when I saw Mille Marchard like this in the Rolland Petite ballet in Boston, when I was at Harvard; I went with John Harvey, I recall). The sweet tyranny of the flesh!

August 9, 1966

Overheard while I was working upstairs and Bruce McCarthy-Pitkin (age 5) was downstairs with Leander:

Bruce: Leander, am I your best friend?

Leander: No. I like Jeff Daley better.

Bruce (devastated): But I want to be your best friend. I don't have many friends. I'm all alone.

La condition humaine!

Our hotel continues to operate at capacity. We now have Ellen De-Cesare with two children and Doreen. Ellen talks constantly about food: exotic recipes. I am putting moldings in the kitchen, finally. Also bought cedar shingles to finish the south gable.

The whole impetus of America toward leisure, sport, vacation, retirement, even culture, is dissipated beneath the Marxist critique and the Marxist goal, as expressed by Malraux, for instance, in the letter at the end of La Condition Humaine: Une civilisation se transforme lorsque son élément le plus douloureux—l’humiliation chez l’esclave, le travail chez l’ouvrier moderne—devient tout à coup une valeur, lorsqu’il ne s’agit plus d’échapper à ce travail, mais d’y trouver sa raison d’être.

That is a real text for many sermons.

Regarding the above: men’s pride asserts itself no matter what the conditions. Our neighbor Moyer, for instance, worked for a while on the Thruway (he’s a carpenter, so they say, and I think they had him making forms for poured concrete). When I saw him one day at Ashline’s, he came up looking very pleased and said proudly, “Our bridge was voted the best of the section!”

August 9, 1966

Dear Pete,

It’s Sunday morning, about 10:30. I’m sitting under my huge spreading yellow birch tree in the south field—my “office.” Usually I stay away on Sundays, but as I have to take Chrysanthi to the doctor tomorrow morning for a monthly checkup (she’s pregnant, the fertile myrtle; one of those things, you know), I thought I’d spend an hour or so today finishing up a book, and then go back to work on the house. But instead I’m going to write this long-overdue letter.

My life here doesn’t need much elaboration; it’s pretty much as you must remember it. In fact the nice thing about the farm is that things do not change. The quiet rhythm of established routine—not a deadening routine in this case, I hope, but a fertile one. Five good hours of reading in the morning. This is a real pleasure for me, because it becomes less and less possible to do while I’m in harness at Dartmouth. Five hours: uninterrupted. No telephone, no students asking questions, no mail. I’m like a goat at present, chewing up thousands of pages and really beginning to learn something about that demon Kazantzakis. It’s a scholar’s dream—and nightmare. You are led half way around the world, you have to chew Greek, French, German, and English, the political and social history of Europe and Asia from the 1880s onward, philosophy, theology, aesthetics. And controversy. To one he's a saint, to another he's a monster; to one his writings are the new holy scripture, to the other they are awful drivel. Both sides are right—that's the trouble; and I, somehow, have to walk a tightrope between them. How to do this, and what form my book will take, I still don't know. I'm really just at the beginning and there is so much to digest: newly published letters, reams and reams of essays by and about him in journals and newspapers, going way back to 1905; a few unpublished (and unpublishable?) manuscripts; all kinds of journals, notebooks, worksheets. I shouldn't continue with the list, because I become more and more frightened! Ten years' work, which I hope to finish in two. Most important, and most difficult, I want to make my book literate and wise, not just a dry collection of facts, dissertation style. I want it to be a true "judgment," enthusiastic but not fanatical. The tightrope again. Timetable? Hard to say. The research, at least, should be finished in eighteen months—we're going on leave next March, as I probably told you, but we're going to be able to stay now longer than I anticipated: until the following December, nine months in all. Most of this will be spent in Greece, with maybe one term in Woodbrooke, though that looks somewhat doubtful now because I lost the chance of getting accommodations there, owing to my procrastination. How much of the actual writing will get done, I can't say. Probably not much. And nothing at all can be done during the school year: that I've discovered, and am reconciled to. Which leaves the ensuing summers, and the farm.

The farm, as always, is a blessing. It's too good. It can't be so good, but it is! You would find it now very different but also very much the same. The fields are cleared and mowable, and I've begun to plow and reseed slowly. The guest house is occupied a good part of the summer (too much to my liking); the cabin is getting close to completion (but don't worry, it's far from completed, and still has tarpaper on two sides, in case you suspect we're getting too fancy). This year we had an infestation of bird lice in the attic; this made us empty out the room; and this, in turn, pushed us to do what we'd been planning to do for so long—put down a solid floor, and finish off the gables. So, at long last, all the junk is removed—kerosene stoves and lamps of yesteryear, scraps of roofing shingles and the rest—, the floor doesn't sag like a trampoline when you step on it, the gables are fly- and mosquito-proof (maybe), and the whole place gleams with fresh red and blue paint. I also stuffed plenty of insulation wherever I could, still laboring under the fear (the hope?) that we may choose, or be forced, to live here at colder times of the year. But this gives Chrysanthi goose pimples and we don't talk about it. . . . The decisive change this year, though, is the pond. Yes, imagine! It's really full of water. Now, in August, it's fairly cool—you'll enjoy knowing this, down in Texas—and one doesn't feel such a strong desire to swim; but in June and July, when the thermometer was in the 90s day after day, what a new-found pleasure to stop work at 1:00, run down to the pond, strip, and jump in before lunch. And even more pleasurable: to swim after the afternoon's physical work, to lose the sticky feeling of sweat, to become clean. Cleanliness, as you probably remember, is something we didn't have very much of around here in former years. But now we are all resplendent—except Chrysanthi, who, even in 90-degree heat, complains that she is cold, and asks when summer is going to arrive so that she can go swimming! Floating on my back, looking at the sky and the birches and pines around the border of the pond, I keep asking myself what I have done to deserve all this; I see myself as some reprehensible filthy capitalist, wallowing in physical pleasure, monopolizing the great luxuries—time, freedom, peace, privacy—that are denied to so many. Then I try to console myself by remembering that all this does not represent a huge horde of capital. And when I am in a particularly lively state for rationalization, I say to myself: "Why, you are doing just what the Marxists say a man ought to do. The whole trouble with the world, according to Marx, is that in the industrial system men no longer see themselves in the products they create. What have I done here, if not create a product in which I can see myself?!" This is sophistry, I know, but also profound in its way. Indeed, the more I think about this, the more I conclude that this is the key to the happiness I have enjoyed here all these years, and also in my teaching and writing. A student came up to me last fall—one of those deliciously morose and inquisitive freshmen who have not learned yet to be a Dartmouth “type”—and asked me after a lecture (I think it was on Thomas Mann) why I stood on the platform every day and talked. Imagine! He was very serious, though; he wasn’t being impertinent or sarcastic; he wanted to get to the bottom of motivation—maybe that was what I had been lecturing about, I don’t remember. He obviously had no motivation himself as yet to do anything, even to remain at college, as I discovered later. I asked him what he thought the motivation might be, and he gave the most obvious and also the most superficial answer. Well, he said, I probably wanted to “convert” the students, to make them see things the way I saw them, maybe even to lure them into the professional study of literature. I told him that if he thought that he was an idiot. How can anyone but a fool, a Don Quixote, persevere with such motivation? Even the dullest or most idealistic teacher learns soon enough that no one is converted, that hardly anyone even listens. Or at best, one in a thousand. To go through the drudgery for the sake of this one, to be buoyed up by him alone against the down-drag of the other 999, is obviously impossible. I answered the student that I lectured with (what I hoped at least was) enthusiasm day after day simply because I had the motivation of an artist: the non-utilitarian hope to make a perfect work, for the sake of perfection alone; and although lectures are not novels, they too are “aesthetic” arrangements of ideas, or at least I tried to make them so. The student was very skeptical about all this; first time he’d heard any such nonsense. Why, where he came from people did things for a reason, something you could put your finger on and touch, something that was worth something, could be sold, something you could calculate: such as, “I converted x, y, and z last month.” . . . I think I was honest in my answer; in other words, I stated the motivation as I saw it at that time. But now I would answer him differently, or at least I would append a second and more fundamental motivation—precisely what I said before: the need to produce something in which I can see myself. For surely this is the case in these courses; that is the beauty of literature. I always used to think that I chose books because they were “the best,” or because they were classics, etc. Now I know better. I choose books that answer some need of my own, that correspond to my own predilections or dreams. It is all very personal. And beyond that, once the books are chosen, the way of approach, the interpretation, is entirely reflective of these same personal needs and predilections and dreams. So that the whole is a lengthy, indirect projection of the soul of Peter Bien. Why not? If they are willing to put up with it (or are duped into thinking it is something else such as the explanation of what Mann or Gide or Kazantzakis or Joyce were trying to say), why should I care?

I was talking about happiness. A conscious sense of a satisfaction that (I hope! I hope!) is something entirely different from inertia or lethargy or the absence of conflict. (Goodness knows, the conflict is there, both in the family and professional sphere, but the balance falls on the positive side, always.) At the same time, I am more and more haunted by some dreadful premonitions of catastrophe. It is all too good, it cannot last, it is out of keeping with the conditions of the world around us, with the very metaphysical facts of life. The thought of atomic war never leaves my mind; the shame of Vietnam makes me weep for my country and feel that the retribution cannot be far away, and will be deserved. Everywhere: automobile accidents, illness, fires, calamities. Why not here? When? How long? All very morbid, I know. . . . I also have the continual sense of being on the periphery of things; this is heightened of course here at the farm, but exists also at Dartmouth. I see very clearly and very personally that one can't have his cake and eat it. I want now, so much, to go for example and work again in a Quaker project; at the same time I want my nice house and family, and my “time, peace, privacy.” I'm well established at Dartmouth, with good salary, esteem, some small kind of influence not to mention the children's school and circle of friends, and it would seem too decisive to throw all this over for two years, say, and then have to start again, probably somewhere else. But in any case, the worm is working inside me, and we shall see. All I can say now is that I've been in touch with the personnel division of AFSC—the person in charge, by the way, is Kay Horton, formerly from Rochester. Did you know her while you were there? I was quite involved with both her and her husband.

It is an understatement to say how wonderful it was to see you again last year in New York, also to learn of the new venture in Houston. Of course it was strange, as you must have felt too. Especially for Chrysanthi, who only knew you after you were married, when you were one half of a couple: Peter & Izzy. Both of us were close to you only in the early part of the marriage, when things seemed to be going well—though we were aware too of difficulties. The divorce came more or less as a sudden announcement, and then, in New York, as a palpable fact. We couldn't suddenly wipe Izzy from the slate and convince ourselves that she no longer existed, especially as we both always liked her and enjoyed her company. I am being very frank, because I know I can be with you, more so, I think, than with anyone else in the world. And that is something to cherish and preserve! In any case, it's finished, and Maitch is vivacious and charming and talented. How well you picked up again. My sadness for what happened was more than balanced by my happiness for the present and the future. I only wish that we could be nearer so that we could get to know you—and I mean you in the plural: Maitch for the first time, and you yourself for the second (or third), because you are bound to be different now; one assimilates somehow to his wife, and she to him; otherwise it's not a true marriage, just two lonely individuals who happen to be eating and sleeping together. But this, I fear, will remain only a wish, at least for now. We shall obviously be at Dartmouth for another two years, until my leave is over, and right now I see no reason why we shall not remain longer. You, on your side, from all I can gather, are remaining in Houston, especially that the new school has been opened. So be it. Perhaps you'll come to New York again periodically. Actually, this next Christmas Chrysanthi will probably be having her baby, so we shall remain in Hanover, and next Easter we'll be leaving for Europe, and the following Christmas we'll be on the boat returning from Europe. Which means that if you do come East, perhaps you will see your way to visiting Hanover—that is, if it is before next March. But all this, I know, is unlikely. Letters . . . ? We're both very bad, and getting worse. A few weeks ago, while cleaning out the attic, I spent an afternoon sorting the barrels of junk and papers there, and came across hundreds of letters—all my letters to Jeanne Ludmann, for example (which she dutifully returned). Good god, what letters! Where did I find the time, the energy? I saw in them a person that I no longer recognize, but that I'd like to resurrect. I can't write letters like that any more—but maybe I could! It's no good to write "state of the nation" epistles like this one. It's little things, everyday things, that really communicate: even a postcard's worth, "Dear Peter, a deer with two fauns walked within ten feet of my office today, obviously thinking I was a tree. Keep well. Sincerely, Peter." . . . "Dear Peter, a condom broke last night and I am in a cold sweat. Will let you know what happens." . . . "Dear Peter, I just spent another three hours in a committee meeting, arguing futilely over the amount of graduate study Dartmouth can assimilate without detriment to the undergraduate curriculum. Words. Hot air. I am so disgusted, I want to— . . . Hope you are fine." . . . "Dear Peter, there are moments when I feel so lonely, all alone in the world, surrounded by people, even those supposedly closest to me, who do not understand, do not understand. . . . Then it passes. Some nice music, a kind word, a caress, a successful class, maybe a little extra wine at dinner, and all is well again in the world."

With love to you both,

Kazantzakis speaks in Journey to the Morea about the primitive lying that is hidden in each of us and that comes to the surface at certain times—for example, when there is a fire. We are drawn to a conflagration by some primordial survival: of the caveman buried beneath the "trapdoor," as K. would say. I experienced and observed this most recently when the men came to burn our brush pile last June. There is a mystique about a fire; something deeply soothing.

¶ Today's Greeks must love sport and the body through loathing for the spirit. For them the body is not sacred because it holds the spirit; it is admired as a reaction against the spirit. Socrates would never go fishing for souls in today's gymnasiums." —Journey to the Morea, p. 101.

¶ Malgré la contraction des commissures des lèvres, ce corps affolé de soi-même s'éloignait de lui sans espoir; jamais, jamais, il ne connaîtrait les sensations de cette femme, jamais il ne trouverait dans cette frénésie qui le secouait autre chose que la pire des séparations. —Malraux in La Vie royale, p. 232, cited by Claude Mauriac in Malraux, p. 82.

Ken and Susan Webb were here on Thursday for supper. Ellen and entourage took off for Montreal. Ellen talks about nothing besides food. The useless lives these women lead. Compared to Susan, running her camp! Ken annoyed me a little by pointing out all the things I was doing wrong, such as feeding the hens too much, planting the corn only in a single row, which discourages pollination, leaving the squashes on the vine too long, not weeding the garden. But of course he was correct on all points, so I tried to conquer my amour propre. He is a fine conversationalist and has an active, alive mind, though he's a little dated, as I will be too when I'm sixty, no doubt—if I'm not already. He also keeps talking about the 5th freedom: to be without clothes. He developed some land in Vermont, selling plots with the double proviso that the men be (a) interracial and (b) that nude bathing be allowed for those who desire it. I forgot to mention to him what happened when the ABC boys came. Three or four had forgotten to bring bathing suits, also one of the tutors. I said they could go in nude, since our pond was completely private. None did. They preferred not to swim. It also is strange to see everyone in the gym talking showers with bathing suits on.

Finally finished the upstairs room. Chrysanthi painted the floor bright red and the walls "wedgewood." It looks like a bridal chamber. I felt a little embarrassed when the Webbs told me of Henry Cadbury's camp on Indian Lake. No electricity, no road, and they live in tents.

Lukács is as brilliant as everyone claims. I am reading The Meaning of Contemporary Realism and find it marvelously fresh—so compact, so sparse and incisive.

Ken said that I had created a rare accomplishment—brotherly love—as he watched Leander and Alec playing. Maybe.

Lukács on the post-WWII period, and the cold war: “The opposition of socialism gathered momentum and was soon transformed into an ideological crusade which, though nominally concerned with the preservation of democracy, was really nourished by a growing fear of the threat which mass society poses to the ruling élite.” —The Meaning of Contemporary Realism, p. 62.

Lukács really speaks directly to the questions I have been putting to myself for several years, but in such an un-thoroughgoing halfhearted way. How, for example, escape the solipsism of modern writers, how return to a sense of community, of the human’s involvement in his environment, instead of a desire to flee his environment. I chose Golding’s The Spire as a novel that transcended angst, but it still does not really confront the contemporary scene. Lukács writes: “. . . acceptance or rejection of angst? Ought angst to be taken as an absolute, or ought it to be overcome? Should it be considered one reaction among others, or should it become the determinant of the condition humaine? . . . The crucial question is whether a man escapes from the life of his time into a realm of abstraction—it is then that angst is engendered in human consciousness—or confronts modern life determined to fight its evils and support what is good in it. The first decision leads then to another: is man the helpless victim of transcendental and inexplicable forces, or is he a member of a human community in which he can play a part, however small, towards its modification or reform?” (pp. 80–81)

¶ Hegel once formulated . . . the social purpose of education under capitalism as follows: “During his years of apprenticeship the hero is permitted to sow his wild oats; he learns to subordinate his wishes and views to the interests of the society; he then enters that society’s hierarchic scheme and finds in it a comfortable niche.” —Lukács, p. 112.

Actually, I seem to be enjoying the great envisioned benefit of the communist society: I am able to consume according to my needs, and society is, I think, extracting work from me according to my abilities. . . . Lukács differentiates between socialism, i.e., the first stage, and communism (classless society, withering away of the state): In communism each man, because of adequate production, consumes according to his needs; in socialism he only consumes according to his work. "There is also that new morality which, as Marx said, sees in work not just a means for ensuring the necessities of life, but 'one of the requirements of life itself.'" (p. 130)

12 Ledyard Lane, Hanover, NH

Geoff Ballard here for a few days, with an air force group negotiating with CREEL. He went through a month-long course given by the army on the U.S.'s foreign policy regarding war, particularly in Vietnam. He told me something that I'd heard for the very first time and that I found rather interesting. According to what he learned at the conference (and the participants were all cleared for classified information) the rationale of U.S. policy is as follows: At all costs the U.S. must prevent red China from gaining control over any of the underdeveloped countries in Asia. Why? Because such control would drain China's resources and divert its energies from the production of consumer goods and from generally raising the standard of living for its own people. Our theorists seem to argue that if only China can achieve a decent standard of living, she will think twice about using the atomic bomb for two reasons: first, she'll realize, as Russia does now, that she will have more to lose than to gain; secondly, as her people gain economic independence, they will have more say in government, more power. Right now, Mao says that China could lose  $\frac{2}{3}$  of its population in an atomic conflict, and still have more people left than any other nation. In other words, he is saying that he is willing to sacrifice  $\frac{2}{3}$  of his population. He can say this because the masses are in poverty, they are illiterate, and cannot object to being used in this way as cannon fodder. But a more advanced population would not tolerate such a policy. The theorists, in short, contemplate the same progression of attitude for China as has apparently taken place in Russia, and the same thaw.

I also asked Geoff about the munitions makers he encountered, and especially about scientists engaged in chemical and biological warfare. How can they, morally, do what they do? The munitions people, he said, just refuse to face the issue. If they didn't produce the arms, they argue, someone else would. But the biologists and chemists have clear consciences. This of course surprised me. They have clear consciences, he said, because their search for effective chemicals and/or microbes for warfare has one main purpose: to enable them to develop antidotes against these same agents, to protect our own population when and if such weapons are used against us by the enemy. Apparently no one contemplates using such things. (I wonder. Haven't we heard this story before?) Geoff also added that the chemists in particular are actually engaged in humane work, since their greatest efforts at present are directed toward the development of an incapacitator (à la James Bond!) that would paralyze or hypnotize whole populations temporarily, without doing permanent harm. What a world to live in!

Sometimes one wonders whether art imitates life or life imitates art. Yesterday afternoon I saw Orson Welles's splendid film of Kafka's The Trial. This morning an FBI agent came to my office, asking about Andy Jackson, Stoney's son. The first thing he said was something like "The case started four years ago, and it's just been reopened." I didn't sense the correlation until later, while I was walking home. But to make the whole episode even more absurd, I realized about half the way through the interview that I had confused Andy with Chris, Stoney's younger son. I thus answered all the questions in terms of the wrong person. And when I realized this, I simply kept on as before. Actually, what I would say for Chris would certainly apply to Andy.

Chrysanthi is nearing her time. This morning when I came for breakfast I asked her how she felt. She answered: "I can't lie down, I can't sit, I can't walk, but otherwise I'm fine."

¶ To believe in something not yet proved and to underwrite it with our lives; it is the only way we can leave the future open. Man, surrounded by facts, permitting himself no surmise, no intuitive flash, no great hypothesis, no risk, is in a locked cell. Ignorance cannot seal the mind and imagination more surely. To find the point where hypothesis and fact meet; the delicate equilibrium between dream and reality; the place where fantasy and earth things are metamorphosed into a work of art; the hour when faith in the future becomes knowledge of the past; to lay down one's powers for others in need; to shake off the old ordeal and get ready for the new; to question, knowing that never can the full answer be found; to accept uncertainties quietly, even our incomplete knowledge of God. This is what man's journey is about, I think. —Lillian Smith, The Journey.

¶ A man must identify himself with something more tangible than his own personality, and establish his pride somewhere, either in his social position, or in the quality of the work he is obliged to do, or simply in the superiority of the idleness he may be fortunate enough to enjoy. —Conrad, The Secret Agent, pp. 116–117 (Anchor edition).

Hotel les Lions, Genève

Mrs. Kazantzakis very cooperative, indeed ebullient as usual. We went—the whole family—to her apartment at 32 Ave. William Favre. Without really any hesitation, she gave me her copy of Όφεις και Κρίνο, and also the only existing manuscript of Ξημερώνει, and the one printed copy of Ο πρωτομάστορας that she knows of. Also the διατριβή on Nietzsche, which is hard to obtain now. But best of all—this I had never expected—she gave me the τετράδια that Prevelakis keeps referring to. These are extraordinarily rich. They go back to 1907 and record K's lecture notes and readings while he was in Paris; his dreams; his later readings arranged under headings such as Θρησκεία, Φιλοσοφία, Λαογραφία, Τέχνη, as well as his preparations for Ο τελευταίος πειρασμός and Ο φτωχούλης του Θεού, his plans for future works such as the Ακρίτας, etc.

Luckily, I was able to have the whole lot photocopied at a cost of 467 Swiss francs or about $110.00, to be paid for I hope out of the $400 grant that Gramlich and Rieser gave me from the Comparative Studies Center funds. I was thus able to return the originals to Mrs. Kazantzakis. She naturally did not want them to leave Geneva, and still for me to have the documents to work from, at my leisure. And quite a job it will be, to read all this material. The handwriting is one problem, and of course everything is in Greek, French, or German.

Mrs. K. spoke, as always, of how K. was, and is, misunderstood in Greece and elsewhere; also cheated, financially, for example by Goudelis, the editor of Καινούρια Εποχή. She said that K. was never primarily or firstly an artist. His basic drive was the search for God—γυρεύει το Θεό—and his artistic production was really a kind of tool in this search. She said this is why he seems to be so able to communicate to all peoples, always in translation—to Japanese, Chileans, etc., as well as to French, Germans, and Americans. In other words, it is his search for God that speaks to this universal need in all men; and his work does not lose because of transposition into another idiom. K.'s effectiveness doesn't depend on stylistic effects but rather on passion and on visual imagery, both of which remain intact in translation.

I remonstrated that K.'s language, despite all this, is truly "stylistic," and certainly the possessor of a beauty that is lost in translation. I noticed this even in the first work, Ὀφεις και κρίνο, which reads with the smoothness of Virginia Woolf. It is very symbolistic, probably Parnassian. Mrs. K. suggested that it was à la D'Annunzio. She said that K. loved the Parnassians when he was young, and loved Baudelaire all his life, though he lost his taste for Mallarmé. In this early enthusiasm he confirms Karandonis's remarks about the intellectual climate of Greece during the decade 1900–1910.

Κολοκοτρώνη 13, Θεσσαλονίκη

I had an early taste of the political climate here. The first day I went to read in the βιβλιοθήκη των καθηγητών του Πανεπιστημίου Θεσσαλονίκης, a huge group of students gathered outside for a demonstration. But already the place was full of policemen, and truckloads of soldiers kept arriving. The group was dispersed, και πολλοί έφαγαν ξύλο. Many of the students entered the university building itself and soon they were surging through the hallways, shouting Αίσχος! Αίσχος!, the girls giggling, the boys rushing hither-and-thither somewhat comically. They marched from one end of the hall to the other, shouting—of course no one was there to hear, except themselves—and then they marched back again to where they had started.

It was very amusing to go to the toilet, and find in the stall not the usual graffiti one expects—crude drawings of genitalia, dirty words, etc.—but rather complete political manifestoes. In the stall nearest the window was written Κάτω ο Βασιλεύς, Ζητώ ο Λένιν, Βασιλεύς προδότης, plus much more in the same vein. In the stall next to it: Ζητώ ο Βασιλεύς. Κομμουνισταί προδότηδες, and much more in the same vein. With a shudder I realized that perhaps someone watches to see which stall one uses!

Η Ευθημούλα went to her school one day wearing a red blouse, and the principal reprimanded her and forbade her to wear red to work in the future. Γεώργος experienced the same at work when he wore a red tie!

Overheard in a tiny hardware store, as a well-dressed man came to buy a large flower pot:

- Πόσα έχει η βάζα αυτή;
- Πενήτα.
- Δεν μου τη κάνετε πιο φτηνή; Κάτω στην αγορά είναι πιο φτηνές. Θα πάω εκεί.
- Τι λες! Εκεί κάτω τις περνούνε από μας. Εμείς έχουμε το εργαστήριο.
- Θα σας δώσω σαράντα-πέντε.
- Καλά. Πάρτε τη.

Hotel Omonia, Omonia Square, Athens

I awoke today, went down to have breakfast as usual at about 8:15, and was surprised to find the dining room full up; the other days it had been quite sparsely populated. Also, there were no waiters; the busboys and elevator boys were trying to serve the crowd. The reason for this was soon apparent. During the night, at about 3 a.m., as I later learned, the army had taken over the country and martial rule had been declared. Omonia Square, usually swarming with people at this hour, was deserted, as were all the streets. Instead, the square was manned by tanks, army trucks, squad cars. At each corner a soldier with a submachine gun. Ranks of soldiers with rifles and bayonets along the sidewalks. More soldiers on the roof of the hotel. The radio gave some succinct announcements, but no explanation of why this was happening and when it would end. The announcements consisted of Απαγορεύεται sale or purchase of gold liras, or changing of money, until Monday. Απαγορεύεται all traffic, automotive and pedestrian; all schools closed, etc. In short, everyone stay home until further notice. After the announcement, the radio broke out into a lovely Greek song, and the Greeks around the table sarcastically commented: Ω πα!

Everyone congregated in the lobby and entranceway to the hotel; everyone had his version of what was happening and how long it would endure. Προλυπτικά μέτρα, enabling the authorities to round up the EDA, because secret word was received about a demonstration tomorrow. This seemed the general opinion. Also, Papandreou was scheduled to give a speech in Salonika, and there was to be a cavalcade of 200 cars going from Athens to Salonika. Apparently this, too, was a threat to the King's party.

It soon became clear that the situation would last beyond the morning. In the afternoon the radio announced that a new government would be sworn in at 7:00 p.m. with a member of the Areios Pagos as prime minister. Also that there would be martial law indefinitely, that all letters would be opened, etc. Right now the radio is playing stirring patriotic songs, and there is no further news.

The opinion of the Greeks I spoke to obviously was very various. Some seemed delighted that the "reds" were finally getting it, and felt that Andreas Papandreou ought to be the first to be arrested. They felt that both Papandreous had wrecked the country, after the prosperity under Karamanlis. Others simply sighed at the chaos of Greek political life. Πηγαίνομαι ένα βήμα μπρος και δύο πίσω, έτσι είναι η ζωή μας.

Around 6:00 o'clock we were ordered away from the windows. Firing began—rifles and small cannon— but apparently in the air: a show of strength. One of the electric wires was hit, and fell to the ground. Let's hope this is the only casualty!

Everyone in the hotel is very jolly. Groups are playing cards, others talking quietly. The greatest deprivation seems to be the inability to get cigarettes. So far the hotel has seemed able to feed everyone—I don't know how. The poor help must be exhausted. The people on night duty were pressed into service all day, since no one else arrived. The chambermaids still had not eaten at 4:00 p.m. They shouted from a balcony near me to one of the soldiers below: Φρούρε δώσε μας κανένα ψωμάκι! I don't know what happened. Let's only hope that by tomorrow morning some of the normal life of the city will resume. Among other things, I wonder how I will get back to Salonika. If transportation resumes, the crush will be terrible, since all the foreigners will want to leave. Also, the Easter exodus will be starting next Wednesday, if not before.

Today I was supposed to visit Τέα Ανεμογιάννη and to pick up the ξένες κριτικές that she had from Mrs. Kazantzaki. I was also supposed to visit Kay Cicellis. All this was impossible—and no way of contacting anyone. Also no way of course of contacting Chrysanthi. No telephone service at all.

Tomorrow I'm supposed to have lunch with Πάρης, Αμαλία και Αυγούλα Τζιφοπούλου. I doubt that this will take place. I'd like to hear what they say. Actually, I fortunately arrived in Athens early enough to get a great deal done. I flew down Sunday night. On Monday I started research at the Εθνική Βιβλιοθήκη in the morning, met Edward Bradley, a future Dartmouth classics professor, for lunch and then went with him to examine the suitability of the Hotel Stanley for our Dartmouth Program in Greece. In the evening I visited Prevelakis and sat with him for three hours, discussing my translation and also Kazantzakis in general. Everyone tries to convince me that he was Kazantzakis's best friend, most trusted confidante, chief solace, etc. I had just come from Ζηζή Αργυροπούλου, a second cousin of Mme Kazantzakis's, and she spoke of her relation with Kazantzakis in this way. Then I went to Prevelakis and he said the same. Also went on at length about how many events, characters, etc. Kazantzakis had taken from Prevelakis's books, also that when Prevelakis gave adverse criticism regarding certain works K. would rewrite or scrap accordingly—e.g., a whole act of Christoforos Columbus. Also, he said that Kazantzakis didn't know the elements of poetry when he started writing the Odyssey and that he—Prevelakis—had to give him lessons in the difference between anapests and trochees. Later on in the week I went to Friar, and he, too, claimed to be K.'s "spiritual son," just as Prevelakis had! Έτσι καταστήσαμε!

On the way home from Prevelakis I called on Karl Kroeber, a professor of literature at Wisconsin, here on a Fulbright grant, and a friend of Martin Meisel's. Among other things he seemed to be suggesting that I come to Wisconsin sometime as a visiting professor. Let's see what happens. I left the door open.

Tuesday, after a morning at the library, I visited Friar at 6:00. He is just the same—talking exclusively about himself. He is doing translations of Greek poetry for an anthology. His apartment is decorated with photos of pretty boys. While I was there a university student came; he had heard Friar lecture on Kazantzakis the day before and wanted to talk further. He had read Askitiki twenty times, Greco ten times, etc., and had seriously considered quitting the university (he as studying engineering) under K.'s influence. Obviously Friar was pleased, as rightfully he should have been. Soon afterward another young fellow arrived, also of university age—this time obviously Friar's lover of the moment. He made eyes at Friar and practically drooled over him and held his hand. Friar also told me of a poet-novelist named Merrill who was his protégé, and also, I would guess, his lover. He had dedicated a volume of poems to Friar, and had recently published a novel with Friar as hero. The whole situation, the poet surrounded by young male admirers, of course reminded me of Cavafy and his poem Ἡρώδης Ἀττικός. Obviously, Friar loves this!

Afterwards, I called on Rodney Rooke. He is an Englishman, now married to a Greek girl. She was unbelievably ugly, but very lively notwithstanding. He finally came home, about a half hour after I'd arrived, and a sudden pall descended on the house and on our conversation. Then the wife started rolling on the bed, complaining of a stomach ache. I left.

Wednesday morning I called on the people in the bank referred to me by Elenitsa, in regard to the Dartmouth house or apartment. One gave me the address of a Ξένων Νεότητας in Βύρων, Καλλιπόλεως 20. I went, met the warden, Δημήτριος Βακάλης, and concluded very satisfactory arrangements, I think, for the group. Let's hope that Wiencke agrees. Απόγευμα διαβάζοντας. Evening to a Greek revue, very lively, with political satire pro and con Papandreou and Karamanlis, which becomes somewhat gruesome in light of today's events.

Thursday: reading again, and then to Carolos Koun's production of Pinter's The Homecoming — Ο Γυρισμός. Very well acted and very touching especially at the end of the first act when the horrid old father cries out, tears in his eyes, "So you really loved your old father, you really loved him!"

Athens airport, waiting for a late flight

Ο Πάρις cleared things up somewhat yesterday. He came home at 2:00 p.m. after having spent the night in the Veterans' Hospital because of the emergency situation. (He is an army doctor, with a commission.) According to him, the coup was entirely that of a particular section of the army, and by no means the whole army. Secondly, it did not emanate from the king. On the contrary, the king was forced to sign the decrees declaring martial law, suspending various articles of the Constitution, etc. Also, the government as now constituted, with Kollias and the other ministers, is only a front; the real power is elsewhere, in the army. Paris said that G. Papandreou and the head of the EDA were under house arrest; that Andreas Papandreou, Kanellopoulos and others had been brought «επάνω», i.e., to a detention building, a school or other public building, where all the prisoners were being kept. During the night there had been systematic ferreting out of all “enemies”—communists, recalcitrant journalists, politicians, etc. Paris said that they came to the hospital in the middle of the night and went to each superior officer, asking Είστε μαζί μας ή όχι; If they said Yes, they stayed at their posts; if No, they were taken «επάνω». All this was confirmed by others I spoke to. One taxi driver said that many had been taken during the night from his neighborhood. Another said that Ψυχικό, apparently a hotbed of leftists, had been heavily raided. Tea Anemoyanni said that that very morning many journalists had been taken, and that only Eleni Vlachou of Kathimerini was left alone. (This was probably an exaggeration as four newspapers came out today.) She—Tea—also knew that one of her relatives or acquaintances was being hunted and was in hiding. All the while I was in her house, about two hours, from 5:00 to 7:00, friends and relatives kept coming in to see what had happened to their mutual friends. Today’s papers clarify the situation somewhat. The prohibitions against banking, money changing, etc., have been lifted. The articles of the Constitution that are suspended are printed in full, frighteningly: habeas corpus, freedoms of speech, assembly, right to civil trial, etc. The government asserts its right to enter homes by day or night, to imprison people, and to try all prisoners by courts martial. It forbids all assemblies of over four people! It imposes a 1:00 a.m. to 5:30 a.m. curfew. It denounces “yellow” journalists, etc., etc. All this is very clearly proclaimed in the papers and on the radio, without mincing any words.

All the people I spoke to—that is, all the “simple people”: waiters, cabbies, chambermaids—were in a state of despair. Τι χάλια! Πάει η ελευθερία! Δεν μπορούμε ν’ ανοίξουμε το στόμα τώρα. And not only simple people but also of course Tea and her whole circle. Among those who came while I was there were a young fellow and girl, both very handsome, vibrant, and articulate. He was big, with coarse features and a huge smile. She was delicate, with a strong, bony face, very angular, and broad motherly hips. She was wearing the new net stockings now in fashion; her legs were most appealing. It was a somewhat delicate situation. I was there to talk about Kazantzakis; they were there because of the gruesome events. There were whispers at the door, Tea Anemoyanni assuring them that they needn’t be put off by my presence. They came in briefly, left for a moment, then returned and stayed. We began talking about Kazantzakis. And the boy said quite categorically, Για μένα, ο Καζαντζάκης είναι ο χειρότερος συγγραφέας που έχουμε! I asked him to explain, and he did, at length.

—Kazantzakis creates people and devises stories that are basically antisocial, that take no account of the needs of community life.

—Kazantzakis's books, book after book, are just elaborations of his own anguish, and we get tired of this completely personal dimension.

—In his attempts to get outside of his own personality and to depict, objectively, the world around him, he is unsuccessful. Indeed, he is a ψεύτης. The Greece he paints—the villages, the people, the life—never existed. (Here, Tea Anemoyanni disagreed strenuously. Later she told me that the boy felt this way chiefly because he, being urbanized and sophisticated, never knew the villages, especially the Cretan villages.) In any case, the boy said that Kazantzakis was meaningless to him because he did not find, in his books, a Greece that he could recognize, either a present or past Greece. In contrast he cited Palamas, who, he said, brought to life an entire quarter-century of Greek existence. He also saw Kazantzakis as terribly behind the times, immersing himself in Nietzscheanism, a philosophy that was alive and creative 75 years ago, not to mention the nature of that philosophy! Lastly, he questioned Kazantzakis's treatment of women, a treatment, he claimed (and I have to agree) that could emanate only from someone very sick in this domain, maybe even a suppressed homosexual. The sole element he agreed to praise in Kazantzakis was his language—surprisingly, for me. Both he and the girl agreed that Kazantzakis's language can be truly startling, and that his talent for simile and metaphor was extraordinary. I was glad to hear them affirm that the figures of speech that seem so fresh and original when translated into English are just as original and fresh in Greek. They are not Greek clichés.

The lovely girl spoke in much the same way. What use is a writer like Kazantzakis to us now, she asked. He always fled social and political problems, ran from them into fantasy and negation. Who cares about ελευθερία από την ελευθερία and other metaphysical subtleties, when in the real life of our country freedom is taken from us? We need writers who are politically engaged, and who fight with the pen for liberty, concretely, not abstractly. We need writers who aid society instead of writing σχόλια on themselves. . . . I immediately thought of course of Lukács's view, and of the early Malraux, and she agreed that the Malraux of La Condition humaine was her ideal.

I obviously agreed with both of them up to a point, but differed because I don't think that writers can be made to order, either social or antisocial. A writer expresses what he is, which lies so deep in his being that it cannot be changed. The beauty of Kazantzakis is that this is precisely what we see—namely, a writer trying to be something else, but failing, and always consciously, with a bitter-sweet resignation, returning to his own deepest self.

When they had left, Mrs. Anemoyanni went on about Kazantzakis, with whom she had spent much time at Antibes and elsewhere. She said that he had a marked fear of ageing; he could not stand the fact that his physical and mental powers would inevitably diminish (cf. Odysseas). This, she said, is what made him so reluctant to see his former friends when he returned periodically to Crete, or elsewhere. Seeing his friends, he would comprehend how they had aged and, by analogy, how he too had aged. This need to prove continually to himself that he was still young and that he could endure hardship is what determined him to take the trip to China, much more than curiosity to see the new régime. She also noted that this trait was characteristically Cretan. The Cretan is always a παλλικάρι. She said that during the period of the German occupation, men of 85 had taken to the mountains with their rifles, to fight!

I asked her about Galatea. She said that Galatea in some ways was a wonderful woman and very important for Greece. Apparently she was one of the first, and strongest, of the Greek "bluestockings." Her behavior in Iraklio was unheard of: living with a man, reading books, associating on even terms with intellectuals, etc. But she was completely incapable of appreciating and compassionating Kazantzakis's very real inner turmoil. She thought he was acting. Also, at heart she was very bourgeois. She wanted her nice furniture and her regular meals. (This is of course is quite evident in Άνθρωποι και υπεράνθρωποι.) Another problem was Kazantzakis's powers of concentration. He could work for 8 or 10 hours with absolute single-mindedness. When you spoke to him, he didn't hear, and Galatea, not understanding this, took it for rudeness.

Tea said that the book by Elli Alexiou, Galatea's sister, is good in places but full of very significant factual errors and misinformation.

I asked about Kazantzakis's reputation in Greece in the early years, a reputation that seemed both great and immediate, judging from my reading of old newspaper clippings this past week. She agreed, and said that it was all owing to Palamas. From the very first, from Όφεις και κρίνο, Palamas recognized the young Kazantzakis as a writer of extraordinary genius, and encouraged him, saw that he got published, etc.

I think that I enjoyed Tea Anemoyanni more than any of the others of the circle. Why? Because not once did she claim to be Kazantzakis's best friend, truest disciple, or only solace. She spoke of him, not of herself.

9:15 p.m. We just arrived over Salonika. I could see the promenade clearly. Then it was announced that we would have to return to Athens because strong winds below prohibited landing. So back we go. This trip began at 5:00 p.m. at the Athens office. The plane was due to depart at 6:00; it finally departed at 7:45. An excursion!

My week in Athens, which now seems about to be prolonged, was very pleasant and full, to say the least. How nice, really, to be away from the constant pettiness and nagging of family life, where insignificant things are continually popping up in the form of crises. The freedom to come and go—to have quiet—is beautiful. But not, obviously, forever.

I did a great deal of talking during the week, and visited with many people, so did not feel isolated or lonely. In the hotel the day of our enforced stay there, I spent time with two Englishmen whose names I never got. Both had come to Greece to take part in the annual march of the Λαμπράκηδες to Marathon, a march that never took place this year. One was a farmer from Warwickshire, the other is what we'd call a professional peacenik, secretary of the "Committee of 100." I'm sorry that I didn't get his name. I was struck by how completely ignorant they both were of all respects of Greek daily life or of the characteristics and culture of the people. And yet they were here to intervene, to encourage. Much as I sympathized with their pacifism, I found this ignorance disturbing. Also the secretary showed himself somewhat as categorical and narrow-minded as he feels his opposites are. In talking on Friday, we found one man, obviously a very cosmopolitan businessman, who seems quite content with the προληπτικά μέτρα, very antagonistic toward Papandreou, etc. This one our English friends immediately labeled as "a real right-winger and a fascist." Sad.

Sunday morning I went to Agiou Konstandinou, near Omonia. The priest screamed and gesticulated during a long sermon, but I couldn't really understand enough to be quite sure what he was saying. He of course said the expected: that Christ was the true king and that the people of the time had realized this and signified same by crying Hosanna. He also said (I think) that although the Jews crucified Christ once, the true-baptized Christians crucify him over and over. Whether there were political overtones here or not, I don't know. The congregation showed no outward sign of anything out of the ordinary. But the sermon's vehemence seemed extremely out of the ordinary to me. Quick visits to Benaki, National Museum, and Acropolis filled out the day. It was ironic to go through the various rooms in the Benaki dedicated to the signing of the Constitution in 1844 now that the Constitution had been abrogated.

The Acropolis was startling and grand, as always, especially in the strong wind and scuffling clouds. I had no idea that the same strong wind would be responsible for my μετέορα position at the present moment.

Salonika

Went back to the Omonia Hotel last night, Then chanced on a κέντρο full of young working-class people, mostly boys. Orchestra, Greek dancing, χασάπικο, ναυτικό, etc., though the dancers weren't really very good. Struck up conversations with two young fellows. One was from Serres, another from Nigrita (!). The one from Serres was currently trading in cars. He had worked in the coal mines of Germany for 26 months, then began driving German cars to Greece and selling them. He said the Greeks were forced to leave the German mines because the U.S. undercut the German price, thus decreasing the demand. He was a rather low type, a little drunk, but very convivial. He insisted on buying me beers. Though married and the father of a one-month old baby, he was on the make. Said he couldn't sleep with his wife for 40 days after the birth. The waiter told him of a place across the street, and he left, only to return instantly. It was closed owing to the coup d'état. Toward the end of the evening he grew rather argumentative, and I was glad that the 1 a.m. curfew drove us all to our homes. The other lad was younger, maybe 22. I asked him what he thought of the political situation, and to my surprise he said he liked it. Why? Very simply, the leftists, he said, were all τεμπέληδες. As for him, he wanted to work, not to sit around talking politics. But the past two years, what with strikes and stoppages, he'd been able to work only a small part of the year. He was in building trades, installing heating and air conditioning units in new apartment houses. He said he makes about 7,000 drachmas a month and lives very comfortably: 1,000 for rent, about 1500 for food (all in restaurants), and the rest remains. He actually was a native of Salonika, and had been six years in Athens, but was leaving tomorrow to return north. This explained the way one of his friends left him at about 11:30 p.m. He rose, and the two pressed their cheeks together with exquisite tenderness—20-year-old boys.

It's amusing how a régime is favored or opposed by the common man for purely personal reasons, often completely non-political and certainly non-abstract. Here was this lad who favored the régime because (he hoped) it would give him steady work. Then there was the taxi driver whom I asked:

—Τι εντύπωση έχεις από τη κατάσταση αυτή;

—Χάλια.

—Γιατί;

—Δεν βλέπετε; Τέτοια ώρα, πριν, η Αθήνα είχε μεγάλη κίνηση.

Και τώρα;

In short, he opposed the régime because it frightened people off the streets, imposed a 1:00 a.m. curfew, and thus gave him less business.

On the plane this morning I met a Κύριος Πέτσας, director of the Salonika museum, who had just returned from the U.S., via Rome. He said that all the Roman papers had made much of the coup d'état, and had the suspicion that the Italians were secretly happy about the new situation, since it would force tourists to avoid Greece and go, presumably, to Italy instead.

It is so strange the way life goes on exactly as before, at least on the surface. And yet, then one comes suddenly upon indications of what is happening underneath. Walking past the central Telephone and Telegraph office in Athens, for example, and seeing a soldier in the doorway, wearing a camouflaged steel helmet and carrying, not a rifle, but a submachine gun! Or what Chrysanthi told me today: how, Saturday morning, the school near Lola's house, where the captured leftists were interned, was surrounded by wives and children bringing scraps of bread to the men inside—and weeping.

Last night, in the hotel, I heard shooting again. Who knows how many have been killed, wounded, interned?

April 26, 1967

Today ο Παππούς returned from the café and said that he heard that Θεοδωράκης had been killed. My heart sank. We are living through the Germany of 1933! Later, Kostas and Lola came, and said that the BBC and other stations said that Theodorakis had been exiled to the Dodecanese—i.e., incarcerated as a political prisoner. I don't know if this is true and if true if it is much different or better, really. G. Papandreou, they say, is critically ill, in the hospital; Andreas is “under custody,” and wounded in the leg. Kanellopoulos has renounced politics. The newspapers are disgusting—all spouting propaganda for the new régime; all dissenting newspapers have been silenced. Papandreou was supposed to have made a speech in Salonika on Saturday, before Palm Sunday. To welcome him his supporters had amassed enough laurel leaves (cut on Mount Athos) to pave the entire way from the airport to the city. He would have entered as Christ himself! Today, the “official” news is that papers were discovered in the offices of the EDA showing that violent incidents were planned, to stir things up, on the day of the speech. Thus the προληπτικά μέτρα of the army were justified!

What strikes me most is how, on the one hand, life can seem to go on so normally—movies, I in the library, children in school, bread and milk, songs in the tavernas, theaters, concerts, everyone leaving town for the Easter holidays—while, on the other hand, these unbelievably fascist horrors are perpetrated, people are hunted down, imprisoned without trial, others are thrown out of their jobs, separated from their families, harassed. But to speak up, to resist openly, is impossible. The Nazis, all over again.

Today, ironically, I was reading Theotokas's account of the last fifty years of Greek history. He described the horrors of the Metaxas régime—the censorship, how all free discussion ceased—and then added (he was writing in 1958) Μακάρι να μη ξαναδούμε τέτοιες μέρες. But here they are! “The seim anew.”

April 27, 1967, Holy Thursday

The government officially banned mini-skirts for girls and long hair for boys. Will offenders be subject to courts martial? Also, every child must go to communion. Church and State hand and glove. We went to the reading of the Gospels at Aghia Sophia: church full to bursting, but later, around 11:00 p.m., the streets were nearly empty, which is abnormal for Greece—very. Visited Θέμης Άλτας to get a prescription for more penicillin for my damned throat. The other night I thought I would die of suffocation. Couldn't swallow. Phlegm running continually, and thus hard to swallow. Agony. Daphne constipated, waking every hour and bawling. Chrysanthi wonderful, as always, all patience and self-sacrifice.

How frank and communicative the Greeks are! The first time we visited τον Δημοσθένη και τη Βούλη, he told me at great length how low and pessimistic and lethargic Vouli had become, mostly the result of not being able to have a child. He encouraged her to find a way to make her life useful to others, and especially to get out of the house. So she began teaching again after finishing her Cambridge certificate. One meeting, and the important things were out in the open, whereas with couples like the Williamsons or Goertzes, whom we've known for years, the same subject, obviously a very crucial one in those cases, has always been buried. Same with Pappous. Immediately he spoke of his life since retirement, his chagrin at being forced, while still healthy in body and soul, to lead a parasitic existence.

Every householder in Salonika—in all of Greece—was told yesterday that he had to register with the police the names of any guests in his home, within 48 hours, or else face a court martial. Likewise, all possessors of radio transmitters. Yet the newspapers try to give the impression that life goes on as usual. Especially, they don't want to lose the tourist trade.

Strange how Americans are followed by the lowest trappings of their way of life. Constitution Square is full now of books, in English, on Lesbian love, and of pin-up girlie magazines, muscle-boy and nudist magazines, and Playboy. I wonder if the government will ban these, or still cater to the needs of their sick American guests.

Just heard, via foreign radio reports, that they executed the former hero of Greece, ο Μανώλης Γλέζος, the man who lowered the German flag from the Acropolis. Now, of course, he was a communist—so, boom! The radio says 5000 communists were captured in all. How many of these will be shot after summary trials? Αίσχος! The same as after the 1922 catastrophe: they shot the entire government. And what did that solve?

April 30, 1967, Easter Sunday

Apparently ο Γλέζος wasn't shot. Yesterday's papers had a picture of him being interviewed by reporters in "the hotel where he is being detained." The "official" press release—the same one is carried in all the papers—said that the men in question, including A. Papandreou, had no complaints regarding their treatment, food, availability of medical assistance, etc. [!] Naturally. The word now is that Gromyko personally intervened on Glezos's behalf, telling the Greek ambassador in Moscow that it would be a barbaric crime forever held against Greece if she executed this "hero in the struggle for democracy." Who knows? In any case, the minister of the interior issued a long statement, carried of course in all the papers, to the effect that all this about Glezos and the rest was owing to the perfidy of the BBC and the foreign press in general, that Greeks were not assassins, that no one would ever be executed without a trial (court martial) [!!!], that the government loved liberty, etc. As George Orwell so well knew, words easily lose their meaning. Double-think is here; slogans have replaced reason.

Fortunately there have been some small signs of resistance. Yesterday, upon waking, the Athenians found handbills everywhere saying: Death to the Fascists. How was this managed? And Lola, in church on Good Friday, overheard something else. The soldiers who have such a prominent part in church services here were all wearing a black arm band, signifying their mourning for Christ. As they passed, one young wag in the congregation turned to his friend and said, "Who died?" The other answered: «Ο Κόλλιας»!

I asked George if he was in any way endangered. Chrysanthi said, for example, that in such situations there is always a complete reshuffling of posts. If some close adherent of the present régime felt that he wanted George's post, he could remind the authorities of George's past, and have him bumped. But George laughed this off, and said there was no danger. His reason was very telling. There will be very little of this sort of thing, he said, and very little of squealing, turning stool pigeon, etc. Why? Because Greeks have learned over the last fifty years that the wheel turns. Those who inform on others under one régime will most likely meet a very unpleasant end come the inevitable day when that régime falls and is replaced by another. Who's in who's out is a game whose rewards are so short-lived, so bound to expire and boomerang, that the game is no longer worth playing. Perhaps this knowledge and experience, also, explains the strange (at least outward) insouciance that I see around me. Life goes on because, the faces seem to be saying, time itself will do it work. This will pass; the wheel will turn.

Yesterday I noticed that all the anti-royalist graffiti in the john at the university had been meticulously erased.

Easter, this year, was complete anguish and disappointment for me. I felt nothing, no emotion except disgust at the superficiality of humans. Perhaps it was the big city, and the crowds, and loss of immediacy and intimacy—practically impossible to get into the church; church like a bus; everyone pushing for position; trying to enter or leave. Perhaps it was the omnipresence of soldiers and guns. In the great parade on Friday, the epitaphios, first came the band (boys from the orphanage we visited on Panorama last time with Themis Altas), the boy scouts in uniform, then girl scouts, then army, then navy, all with fixed bayonets, helmets and all, although the guns were turned nozzle backwards; then finally one or two priests with Bible and cross. In the Μητρόπολη, where we went afterwards να προσκυνήσουμε, again soldiers, policemen. A group came in together; they removed their helmets, revealing brutal faces. They kissed the icon and then emerged, ready to kill again. Saturday night, the Ανέσταση, was just as bad. Navy men with bayonets lined the avenue from Aghia Sophia to the Mitropoli. The square around Aghia Sophia thronged with people. Ropes to keep people in place. Police everywhere. Couldn't see, couldn't hear. No sense of the service that was ensuing. The whole thing simply a second-class carnival, parents bringing their children as if to a circus. The moment of the Ανάσταση, when the priest chants the wonderful hymn Χριστός ανέστη ἐκ νεκρῶν, θανάτῳ θάνατον πατήσας, καὶ τοῖς ἐν τοῖς μνήμασι ζῶν ἡρισάμενος, was unbelievably vulgar. The military band immediately began the national anthem [!], the officers standing at attention and saluting at the same time that a few rockets went off with muffled poofs while children and adults scrambled to get a light for their candles. What was somewhat touching, however, was the exchange of handshakes and greetings that followed: χρόνια πολλά, χρόνια πολλά. Each παρέα kissed and greeted. I enjoyed seeing the soldiers shaking hands likewise, with broad smiles, like cousins and uncles. Then everyone brought out the dyed eggs and each person cracked his egg against someone else's, to see who would have luck—namely, the one whose egg remained uncracked. The soldiers did this too, with great ughs & ahhs coming from the losers. Then most people peeled and ate the eggs. In a few moments the crowd was dispersed, everyone still holding his lighted candle; the custom is to keep it lighted until you reach home. In a flicker the restaurants had filled, the spits were turning with οβελία και κοκορέτσι, people were tearing huge hunks of bread and drinking copiously, their lighted candles on the tables in front of them. Also, flowers everywhere, especially πασχαλιές. I brought some home, along with three carnations; the house filled with perfume. . . . I insisted on going into Άγια Σοφία for a few minutes. The crowds were now gone, although the ναός was still half full. The two choirs were chanting beautifully. I felt a little—oh so little—of the mystery of the service. Then taxi, haggling over price, children whining and fighting about their candles, and bed.

May 4, 1967

Kazantzakis in his letter of March 7, 1933, to Prevelakis writes: Τη στιγμή τούτη μαθαίνω . . . πως έχομε Golpe de estado [coup d'état] και στην Ελλάδα. . . . Όλος ο αιώνας τούτος θά 'ναι αιώνας διχτατορίας. . . . This was the abortive coup headed by N. Plastiras, organized during the night by the army. Very familiar. Reading this, I suddenly entered the Greek mentality, suddenly understood the seeming indifference, the fatalism, the determination to lead normal lives despite the dictatorship. The reason is very simple: it has all happened so very frequently in the living memory of the people here, in the 20s, in 1933, in 1936, etc. Cavafy was right: the seim anew, the wheel turns, and returns. Knowing this, the people carry on, and wait. This sense of change as the lower level of a higher stability, the turning wheel, is unknown to Americans. Suddenly what I had learned intellectually, through reading, became a felt, tangible experience, and thus true knowledge for me. The problem now becomes: how, despite this acceptance and fatalism, to act in such a way as to make the wheel turn faster. Perhaps here, in a very concrete historical example, we have the dilemma faced by Kazantzakis's Odysseas and all his other characters.

I remember Prevelakis's remark when I tried to convince him to lighten the weight of the 400 Γράμματα by removing, in the English edition at least, some of the details of the correspondence—e.g., where Prevelakis was when he received the letters, etc. He replied that he wanted this to be a record of his life as well as of Kazantzakis's. Δεν με θεωρούν μεγάλο τώρα, μα καμίαν μέρα ίσως να με θεωρούν μεγάλο, γι' αυτό.

One of the men I chatted with on April 21 in the hotel turned out to be in Athens as representative of several of the monasteries of Mount Athos. His business was to find buyers for several μετόχια, to be sold as wholes, at 3,000 drachmas per stremma, obviously to someone who would then "develop" them for tourists! The monasteries, he explained, will do much better by investing the proceeds of the sale in apartment houses in Salonika. I asked him how the monasteries were faring. The Russian one, he said, has 30 monks, and 1000 cells. He thought all the monasteries should eventually be turned into hotels! I asked him whether there were any young monks. Δεν παίρνουν νέους, είπε. Γιατί; Προκαλούν σκάνδαλο. Παίρνουν άντρες 25-30 χρονών.

Kazantzakis says, after meeting the Jewish wife of Renaud de Jouvenel, Οι Οβραίοι έχουν κρυφά μια νοσταλγία Ανατολής κι ένα ρομαντισμό vehement (400 Gr. #183). How true! Maybe this is why Jews like Kazantzakis's work and Anglo-Saxons do not.

—Έχετε εφημερίδα, παππού;

—Όχι.

—Γιατί;

—Δεν αγοράζω εφημερίδες πια. Είναι όλες του κράτους. Κάνω παθητική αντίσταση. Και δεν αγοράζω λαχεία, να μη βάλω λεφτά στην τσέπη της κυβερνήσεως.

These are small ways of resistance. Also today when the Greek fleet came to Salonika and the sailors paraded through town (a show of their solidarity with the army that effected the coup), people lined the streets as always for such parades but stood stock still, mutely, refusing to applaud as the troops passed. Παθητική αντίσταση. A recent government decree dissolved the EDA and also all the Λαμπάκηδες groups.

May 7, 1967

The government has now ordered that the classes in History of Democratic Institutions in the high schools be disbanded, and replaced by classes in History of the Army!! At the same time, Kollias insists when speaking to the foreign press that this is not a fascist government and that the whole purpose of the intervention was to lead Greece back to democracy: «Η κυβέρνηση επιδιώκει εφαρμογήν πολιτικοῦ καὶ κοινωνικοῦ προγράμματος μεταρρυθμίσεως, τὸ ὁποῖον θὰ καθεστᾶ δυνατὴν τὴν ἀποκατάστασιν ὁμαλῶν συνθηκῶν καὶ ἐπιστροφὴν εἰς τὴν κοινοβουλευτικὴν δημοκρατίαν» (Kollias in an interview with Velt am Sonntag, Bonn). The government also has plans to alter the Constitution, according to yesterday's paper. Also, they abolished the permanent civil service so that all government employees, including schoolteachers, can now be dismissed for political or other reasons.

Last night to theater to see the sexy blond “bombshell” of Greek stage and screen, Αλίκη Βουγιουκλάκη. After a mix-up regarding our seats, which had apparently been sold twice, we settled down and the show began, about  $\frac{3}{4}$  of an hour after the scheduled time. A farce, with a κοσμική κυρία, a maid speaking in malapropisms, a γεροντοκόρη with a huge φωνάρα. Plot made up from extraordinary coincidences, exchange of identity and clothes, and deepening confusion, until all is suddenly solved and the couples involved live happily ever after. Like early Shakespeare, without the poetry. The lovely thing was that it still works on the stage, as sheer entertainment, though certainly not as art. It requires, to be sure, an audience like that of last night: completely responsive, laughing uproariously at every joke, gasping at the successive costumes worn by the heroine, ah-ing and gasping again at the sudden revelation of a coincidence—e.g., the employee's wife is putting on a big dinner for the boss to help her husband get a promotion; she goes to buy pastas and then, trying to get a taxi, gets into an argument with a man who wants the same taxi, ending up calling him χαϊδούρι, he calling her καμήλα, etc.; then, the boss comes to the house while the wife is still inside, dressing, and explains to the husband that he just had the most awful argument with a woman over a taxi, she called him χαϊδούρι, he called her καμήλα! Gasps in the audience: Αυτός ήτανε, αυτός ήτανε! The husband is distraught. How can the dinner now proceed? Conveniently, the boss has to go out for a minute to buy pills, and in the meantime the husband gets an idea: let the maid and his wife change positions, he'll present the maid as his wife. Here, the complications really begin, as the boss is stimulated sexually by the “maid” (i.e., the employee's wife). Φούσκωσα, he says, in an obvious pun, and swallows his pills. (Little Andreas, at that point, asked naïvely, Τι φούσκωσε, μπαμπά, τι φούσκωσε;) It goes on in this way for three acts, relentlessly. The point is that this kind of play works for this kind of audience. I can now see the Shakespearian groundlings gasping at every coincidence, every false identity suddenly revealed. How delicious!

I dared to eat κοκορέτσι after the theater and had violent diarrhea an hour later.

The hordes of children and relatives, the paucity of intelligent conversation, the super-bourgeois round of eating and acquiring makes me very nervous and, as Kazantzakis would say, suffocates me. How different from the people I met in Athens, who have ideas in their heads, who read, and express themselves.

Εκδρομή στο Σταυρό με τον παππού και τη γιαγιά. Chrysanthi wanted to go because she had once gone there on a school εκδρομή when she was 12 or 13 years old. Reliving her childhood. Village between sharp mountains and the sea, with a beautiful group of huge plane trees, each one like the Buttonball at Deerfield. I rented a car and we drove. We suffocated from the heat on the way there, and it wasn't until the return trip that I discovered I'd had the heater going full blast. Alec and Leander were already there, having gone with the Σχινά group. Ο Κύριος Γουργούτης joined us for an ούζο. 1922 πρόσφυγας, διορίστηκε τη 1923 and is still teaching. The huge, fat, manly δασκάλα με τη φωνάρα της, like the comic character in the play the other day. Ο παππούς και η γιαγιά φοβήθηκαν (ρεύματα!); thus we sat in the square instead of by the sea, but Chrysanthi and I walked later under the plane trees. Very idyllic. Pappous said he wanted to show us a beautiful placed called Κυανή Ακτή, the Côte d'Azur of Greece. We drove and drove, and finally came to a stony beach—no trees, no houses, burning sun: horrible. The Κυανή Ακτή!

Εκδρομή με την Ἐταιρεία Μακεδονικῶν Σπουδῶν στους Πειρήνες, Δίου, Τέμπη, Πλαταμώνας, led by Mr. Petsas. On the bus from Athens to the airport I had sat next to him and chatted a little; he was returning from the USA, University of Wisconsin classical congress. Then Chrysanthi and I went to his lecture on recent finds in Macedonia and here we learned about the excursion. A fine day. Good conversation, interesting people. Among others the poet-λόγιος Γ. Θ. Βαφόπουλος. We chatted for a long time after lunch. He is a great admirer of Friar and Friar's translations; says that Kazantzakis's Odyssey in the original is unreadable and that Greeks prefer the English version! Also doubted that more than a dozen people had ever finished the epic. He praised the writer Παναγιωτόπουλος, said that he had encouraged Βασίλης Βασιλικός after his first book (Vasilikos is probably in prison now; he wrote a novel about Lambrakis) but that Vasilikos wanted to "make it" too fast and compromised his gifts with rapid and slipshod publications. We all agreed that the book on America is mediocre. Vafopoulos strongly censured Karandonis, said he also is πουλημένος, and certainly very much of a clique, always playing the same tune: Γάτσος, Ελύτης, Σεφέρης. Said that Seferis is really not a great poet because all he did was transpose T. S. Eliot into Greek. As for Kazantzakis and Sikelianos—both—he said they are absolutely dead as far as today's Greek writers are concerned. No one reads them, no one is influenced by them. Strange how these reputations go. I am sure, however, that a segment of Greek youth still reads Kazantzakis and is inspired by him.

On the other hand, two young fellows, one an archeologist and the other a philologist, confirmed what Vafopoulos said. They disliked Kazantzakis intensely, said he had no experience of life, and wrote only from his mind. They praised Myrivilis's Ζωή ἐν τάφῳ by contrast. I asked them what American authors are read here. The favorite seems to be John Steinbeck. I had my revenge by telling them that no one reads Steinbeck in America. So it goes.

The excursion made its first stop at the plain of Πειρήνες, where the Romans defeated the Macedonians. Petsas read from Plutarch, who describes the terrain exactly. There was a lively discussion afterwards as to why the Macedonians were defeated—probably because they had lost Tempe, which they knew how to defend, and were forced to give battle on an open plain. But there were other factors, ones that Cavafy would appreciate: (a) there were many Greek soldiers in the Roman army, (b) many of the towns, e.g., Βέροια, gave up without a fight. «Περιμένοντας τους βαρβάρους». After all, the Romans were some kind of a solution!

Also in this area are prehistoric mount tombs, not yet excavated.

We then stopped at Katerini for a coffee. We sat with Θεοδώρα Κουμβαγκάλη, Altas's aunt. She was wearing slacks, had short hair, a gruff voice, etc. A villager at the next table was obviously listening to our conversation. Finally he asked her where she was from—from Πόντος, which village, such and such. Well, he was from there also. Then he kept calling her συμπατριώτης, trying to continue the conversation. In other words, he thought she was a man! Otherwise he would have said συμπατριώτισσα.

Next stop, Δίον, beautifully situated just under Olympus. Here there is a Hellenistic tomb very well preserved. Also a small museum. The villagers turned out to meet us, and enjoyed having their pictures taken by me. Chrysanthi and I walked through the streets: tobacco, pigs wallowing in mud, no electricity, naked children, lovely breeze. We talked to a γιαγιά μαυροφορούσα. Σας αρέσει το χωριό μας; Ναι, πολύ. Βέβαια. "Οποιος μένει εδώ, θα κερδίσει δέκα χρόνια ζωής. Then she told us about her nephew, who went to Salonika and was constantly sick; then he returned to the village and will live 10 years longer than his allotted time as a consequence. And indeed, it must be a healthy life!

We ate at "Maxim's," situated on the Athens-Salonika highway, with a splendid view of the sea and the κάστρο της Πλαταμώνας, then went to τα Τέμπη, where there is a church, Άγια Παρασκευή, built into the rock, and an άγιασμα. Also a huge sign on the roadway explaining why no right-minded Greek should be a communist. A group of teenagers on the river, dancing and eating. Coolness, rushing water, huge trees, foliage, shade.

Finally, back to Platamonas and the Kastro. Good lecture by a professor explaining how it was built on top of walls of a prehistoric town, and was the site of a Hellenic and Hellenistic acropolis as well, then the present structure built by the Franks, preserved and used by the Turks until the end of the nineteenth century, when cannon fire rendered this kind of fortification obsolete; lastly, it was used as a refuge by retreating New Zealanders in 1941. Unfortunately, the Germans destroyed them. The entire spectrum of the violent history of this strange land of contrasts.

The return trip in the bus, for two hours: singing. About 100 different songs, with Petsas leading. One of the men also started dancing the Γερακίνα in the aisle, but the driver told him to sit down. We returned at 9 p.m., exhausted, having left at 7 in the morning, and gotten out of bed at 5:30 a.m.

May 15, 1967

To the Αλλοδαπών in the morning to get our άδειες παραμονής. A milk-toast-like man, very skinny, in patched trousers and ragged shoes, with an old broad-brimmed hat: he had overstayed his visa, but wanted a renewal. The Προστάμενος very gruff. Why didn't he come before? I was sick. Sick for six months? Yes. A likely story. If you can't produce a doctor's certificate I can send you to prison. Get out! He went to the waiting room and sat with hanging head, very dejected. I thought of the scenes drawn by Kafka. The poor always suffer. Maybe he couldn't read the wording on the visa, maybe he just postponed, naïvely, as Greek do, maybe he really was sick, etc. Our hearts bled for him. But in this case we were probably wrong. We wondered what he was. A Yugoslav? Bulgarian? Later we saw that he was a gypsy, because his mother (or wife or sister) arrived in gypsy costume. They knew damn well what was what, and he wasn't a meek little man but had a very caustic tongue indeed.

Special service in the Rotunda marking the end of classes at the university. Five priests, beautiful voices, wonderful acoustics. Very stark and moving: this huge bare structure. I thought of Dartmouth. Our great buildings are constructed for sports events; the Greeks have the old churches still. Once upon a time, at least, they expended money and labor on something entirely spiritual. There was something very meaningful in this παμπάλαια λειτουργία. In the midst of the political instability of Greece, the Church is something solid and unchanging. The service goes on in exactly the same way as though oblivious of outward events—of Turks, Franks, dictators, communists. I see why many Greeks welcome this one-and-only force for stability and continuity. But decorum is very fragile. After the service ended and a priest began to speak to the students, everyone began to leave. There was such a commotion that the poor speaker couldn't be heard. Officials at the door, turning the students back and making them stay, only made matters worse because of the arguments that arose. Thus the end of the "program" was entirely disastrous . . . and extremely funny!

I went to a dermatologist for my finger. His waiting room balcony afforded a view of the courtyard of a γυμνάσιον, and the boys were outside learning how to dance. Συρτός, κλπ. How awkward they were, all going in different directions, and yet how nice. The young men in Greece are very sexy and beautiful, the girls not at all: fat, short-legged, with hard, cruel faces.

Sometimes Kazantzakis is really divine, for example in his letter of 28-2-50 to Prevelakis (400 Γράμματα, no. 359): Τι ευτυχία νά 'σαι καλά, νά 'χεις ήσυχη κι αγαθή την ψυχή σου και νά 'χεις ένα σκοπό που η πραγματώσή του να κρέματα μονάχα από σένα, και κάθε μέρα να κάνεις ένα βήμα ομπρός και ν' ανηφορίζεις! 65 τώρα χρόνια πάω κι έρχομαι και σεργιανίζω στο σκοτεινό αυτό μπουντρούμι, με τα δυο παραθυράκια, που το λένε άνθρωπος, και κοιτάζω από τα παραθυράκια τον κόσμο και δεν τον αποχορταίνω. Δεν ξέρω πόσο καιρό θα βαστάζει αυτή η ευτυχία κι η δύναμη κι η γονιμότητα, μα κάνω σα νά 'ταν να βαστάξει αιώνια· γιατί ξέρω τι θα πει αιωνιότητα. Είναι ποιότητα, δεν είναι ποσότητα— αυτό 'ναι το μεγάλο, πολύ απλό μυστικό.

And think how much right Kazantzakis had, considering all he had suffered at the hands of others, to be embittered or fatalistic or negatively ironic or sarcastic in his old age.

Went to Λαγκαδάς on Tuesday to see the third and last day of the αναστενάρηδες. I was allowed into the konaki again. Many new faces. The most εκστατικός was a middle-aged man who obviously didn't know the dance, but just tramped back and forth moving his arms and staring into space with the whites of his eyes. Later I learned that he had come especially from Athens to take part; he was a bank clerk whose father and grandfather, however, had been αναστενάρηδες. Apparently he too danced without being burned. It was interesting, however, to see how he, who did not know the beautiful shuffle-like dance, lowered the proceedings greatly. His first time across the coals he gave a shout, Άντε μπρος! and heavily, clumsily strode across to the applause [!] and laughter [!] of the crowd. This applause and laughter was repeated each time, and the δέος was lost; the ceremony degenerated to the level of a stunt, as far as he was concerned. Not with the others, however. They possessed the same θεία μανία as when I saw them previously, and, to me at least, this abnormal condition was in some way more elevated, more dignified than the normal. Obviously the rhythm and beauty of the dance wherein the spastic irrational movements of frenzy are tamed and beautified by “Apollo” was the deciding factor. Unfortunately, politics entered the event. The Υπουργός Βορείας Ελλάδος with his retinue was the “chief” spectator, and the αρχιαναστενάρης came up to him and shouted Ζήτω η Ελλάς, ζήτω ο Βασιλεύς, ζήτω ο Διάδοχος (the queen had given birth to a son on May 21), ζήτω ο Στρατός. But toward the end of the πυροβασία, one of the αναστενάρηδες—the same one I had seen three years ago shrieking in the konaki—went up, icon over shoulder, to one of the high army officers in the front row and just stood in front of him for what seemed an interminable time, staring into his face with ecstatic black eyes. Then, suddenly, his whole face contorted and broke, like a piece of ice that suddenly cracks and melts, and he began to weep. But just as suddenly, again, he recovered, and danced away with the usual calm, dignified step. It was almost a scene out of Marat-Sade.

I took some pictures in the konaki, but the candle-lady came up and asked me to stop. Θα θυμώσουν αν βγάλεις φωτογραφίες. Εδώ είναι εκκλησία. The πυροβασία was delayed until after dark. I took some more pictures but I doubt that they will come out.

In the afternoon, after leaving τον παππού και τη γιαγιά να ξαπλώσουν in the local hotel, in a room next to the βόχα of the toilet, we walked with George two kilometers along a lovely road, to the λουτρά of Langadas—natural hot springs. There is a lovely hotel with garden, private baths, and a large public bath sunk below the ground and full of steam, like the harem baths shown in the movies, or the old Roman baths.

Poor Chrysanthi couldn't enter the “grandstand” with the baby, so while we waited for four hours in our seats for the pyrovasia to begin, she roamed the streets with the carriage, enjoying herself, as she said, because she had a few hours free from the constant bickering of the assembled relatives, each simple move requiring complicated and endless discussion before any decision is reached.

Tuesday was the αγορά στο Λαγκαδά. I admired some beautiful samovars but they wanted 1500 to 2000 drachmas for them. Also very imposing braziers.

Saw Kakridis for a few minutes. He too seems to have lost his great enthusiasm for Kazantzakis. He surprised me by saying that Kazantzakis is no Shakespeare, no Tolstoy, but he . . . he . . . has a place in the history of Modern Greek literature. After all, he was the one who introduced Nietzsche to Greece [!]. I expressed my amazement at the persecution Kazantzakis had received in the later years of his life (I'd just been reading his awful letters from Antibes at the time the government wouldn't even give him a visa to travel to Italy for a holiday). Kakridis reminded me that Kazantzakis wasn't the only one who had received such treatment. Hourmouziou and others, including Kakridis himself, I surmised, suffered likewise. Kakridis attributed a good deal of it to what he described as an inferiority complex on the part of the persecutors. Not having the qualities that Kazantzakis possessed, this is a way they could assert themselves against him. But Kakridis also stressed that Kazantzakis himself didn't help matters. He was a very difficult man socially; found it very difficult to associate in a relaxed way with others. This probably explains the warmth of Kazantzakis's correspondence, and also his need for disciples/admirers/friends like Prevelakis.

Spent the evening with Γρηγόρης Τζατλάνος, who married Chrysanthi's old friend Δανάη. He is a lawyer, very witty and bright, the first person I've met here in Salonika who had a broad outlook and a truly inquiring mind. Among other things he was the first ever to ask me to explain Quakerism. I was also glad to see him joking constantly at the expense of Παττακός although he is probably a βασιλόφρων. He, and everyone else, takes it for granted that the coup d'état was really engineered by the C.I.A. All the key figures, Παττακός και Παπαδόπουλος at least, are graduates of U.S. military schools. Also, they say, on the night of the coup the U.S. fleet was outside Athens—i.e., in case of failure, the leaders could have taken refuge aboard our ships. What a mire politics is! Later in the evening we were joined by a young engaged couple, both just finishing their degrees as γεωπόνες. The girl was fresh and delicate and soft, ripe for plucking, with beautifully projecting teeth, but rather fat legs. The boy was chic and assured. He drives a Thunderbird, owns hotels, huge farms, and is heir to a dealership in pharmaceuticals. The rich get richer, the poor poorer.

My birthday. 37. How awful! Chrysanthi sent flowers.

“The trouble with modern theories of behaviorism,” as Hannah Arendt once wrote, “is not that they are wrong but that they could become true.” —A. Alvarez in TLS, March 23, 1967, p. 232.

I have done it again.

One year in every ten

I manage it—

A sort of walking miracle, my skin

Bright as Nazi lampshade,

My right foot

A paperweight,

My face a featureless, fine

Jew linen.

Άγια Τριάδα

Saw an old grandmother, dressed in black, of course, and sitting in a kind of stupor, as they do, on the front porch. But this one had a full-grown, neat, extensive, black moustache.

June 16, 1967

Kazantzakis speaks somewhere of the young girl who lives on unchanged behind the withered features of the old crone. This I experienced today. Our landlady Κυρία Μαρτιάνθη is bent and withered, with the typical crackily voice of the old. But today I heard her singing quietly in the back yard, and her singing voice was delicate and sweet and clear: the voice of the sixteen-year-old girl.

The other day I received a letter from the Danforth Foundation saying that I had won the Harbison Award for Distinguished Teaching. What nonsense! They ask me to choose whether I want $10,000 outright, or two terms' leave at full salary. I thought of poor Kazantzakis's struggles to make a living. The money would have been better spent on him. But now it's too late.

Prevelakis writes, abruptly, that the publication of the 400 Letters is all off. He is returning his advance and tearing up the contract. Mrs. Kazantzakis demanded royalties; Korda demanded that Prevelakis share his with her; Prevelakis refused. Thus, no book, and I am suddenly out of a commission and $5500. And I had spent a week in the library looking up the difficult words, allusions, etc. But I feel more sorry for Kazantzakis and for Prevelakis than I do for myself. These damn Greeks, they can't get along, they're always fighting. Damn individualists.

Chatted yesterday with the village priest. Eventually he was joined by his wife and son. He introduced his wife as η Πρεσβυτέρα μου. I shook her hand and was shocked at its coarseness; the palm was like sandpaper, from washing clothes and dishes. The son turned out to be the boy who has been so ready to make friends with Leander and Alec, and whom our neighbors have warned us against, saying that he steals, uses bad language, etc. His name is Απόστολος.

George very depressed and melancholic. Fears that the government will dissolve the ή Αγροτική Τράπεζα in order to appropriate its huge ταμίων (the government apparently is in desperate need of money already). Also, each γεωρπόνος is now required to write a biography giving, in detail, everything he did since 1940—i.e., whether or not he was with the popular resistance, his status in the civil war, etc. How many will lose their jobs remains to be seen. Obviously there will be yes-men who desire these places and who will be elevated into them, the same that happened in German universities and elsewhere under Hitler. Speaking of universities, Lola says that the same thing is happening there. Suspected professors are being given six-month “leaves” that will obviously be “renewed” indefinitely, this of course without pay (actually ¼ salary). The yes-men will not be waiting to fill the positions. Apparently Kakridis will be among the first to suffer. He has already been relieved of his position as head of the Εκπαιδευτικό Συμβούλιο in Athens. Horrible, unthinkable.

Despite the propaganda in the newspapers, things are not going well. Tourism is almost zero. Our friends here in Aghia Triadha confirm this. Pavlos's father's hotel is almost empty; there are only a half dozen campers at the plage. When the Israel-Egypt crisis started and American citizens had to be evacuated, 1500 were brought to Athens, because all the hotels there were empty. The U.S. embassy took over 24 hotels—at the height of the tourist season! Kostas says that his businessmen friends are moaning. A wholesale distributor of wine and other drinks says his business is 20% of what it was last year. People are afraid of their jobs, of the future, and thus are hoarding their money instead of spending it.

George went to an επιθεώρηση in Salonika. These revues always thrived on political satire. Now they must satisfy a censor before opening. There were one or two lines about how good it was to be rid of chaos, and well, we didn't want elections anyway, but no one applauded.

Jokes at government expense are springing up. Here are two examples:

Ένας αξιωματικός κάθεται πλάι σε μιαν κυρία στο λεωφορείο. Ξαφνικά η κυρία του δίνει έναν μπάτσο στο μάγουλο. Τότε σηκώνεται ένας άντρας απέναντι κι αυτός του δίνει έναν μπάτσο. Έγερτα από το βάθος του λεωφορείου ένας άλλος κύριος σηκώνεται, προχωρεί στο διάδρομο και του δίνει έναν μπάτσο. Τους τρεις όλους τους παίρνουν για στρατοδική. —Γιατί εσείς κυρία μου του εδώσατε του αξιωματικού έναν μπάτσο; λέει ο πρόεδρος. —Διότι με πείραζε με το χέρι του, απαντάει εκείνη. —Κι εσείς, κύριε; —Διότι η κυρία είναι η γυναίκα μου. Τελευταίος, ρωτάε τον κύριο που σηκώθηκε από το βάθος. —Εγώ, κύριε πρόεδρε, λέει αυτός, είμαι ο πιο ένδοχος. Νόμισα πως έπεσε η κυβέρνηση.

Ένας πτωχός πάει στον Παττακό και του ζητάει μια φωτογραφία. —Ευχαρίστως λέει ο Παττακός. Την παίρνει και γυρίζει στην πατρίδα του. Σε λίγο, όλος ο κόσμος εκεί πέρα ξαφνιάζεται. Αυτός ο πτωχός, ο οποίος δεν είχε παρά κουρέλια τόσα χρόνια, τώρα φοράει ωραία ρούχα, έχει αυτοκίνητο, κλπ. Απορούν όλοι πώς έγινε παμπλούσιος έτσι γρήγορα και μια μέρα ένας τον ερωτά: —Τι έκανες εσύ, που δεν είχες τίποτε και τώρα έχεις απ' όλα; Πώς τ'άκανες; —Ήταν εύκολο λέει ο τέως πτωχός. Τ'άκανα όλα με μια φωτογραφία. Τη δείχνω στον κόσμο και λέω: 2 δραχμές το φτύσιμο, 3 δραχμές το χέσιμο.

Yesterday was πανηγύρι στην Άγια Τριάδα. I took the children to church. Five ψάλτες από την Πόλη, όπως μου 'πε ύστερα ο νοικοκύρης μας, ο κύριος Αλέκος, που είναι κι αυτός πρόσφυγας απ' την Πόλη. Η εκκλησία κάτασπρη, με το μόνο στόλισμα ο Παντοκράτορας στον θόλο απάνω. Κόσμος μπαίνει, βγαίνει, θόρυβος, κίνηση, παιδιά ντυμένα άσπρα-άσπρα, κορίτσια με λουλούδια και φανταχτερά φορέματα. Τη θεία τρέλλα που περιγράφει ο E. M. Forster στη Passage to India, στο τέλος. Κανείς δεν άκουε τη λειτουργία, όμως κατάλαβαν κάτι, με άλλο είδος αντίληψη από τη δικιά μας τη δυτική. Έπειτα, περιφορά, στη βροχή, με μουσικιάντηδες του στρατού παίζοντας στρατιωτική μουσική που δεν είχε καμιά σχέση με θρησκεία, μα δεν πειράζει. Στρατός και εκκλησία: και τα δύο είναι Ελλάς, ας πάνε μαζί τότε. Also a double line of soldiers with expressionless faces and robot-like movements, dressed in battle helmets and sporting rifles with fixed bayonets. The whole σύμπλεγμα, τόσο αταίριαστο για εμάς, ήταν ένα σύμβολο του ελληνικού χάους, ή, αν θέλαμε, του ελληνικού ταλέντου για το συνδυασμό αντιθέτων πραγμάτων.

Το βράδυ: γλέντι. Σε ένα καφενείο μια μεγάλη παρέα τραγούδιζε ύμνους—«Η ζωή έν τάφω» και άλλους, με αδρές φωνές. Σε άλλο, μια ορχήστρα: βιολί, κιθάρα, μπουζούκι, κλαρίνο, με τραγουδίστρια. Όλο λαϊκή μουσική έπαιζαν, αμανάδες ανατολίτικες, και σιγά σιγά οι ακροαταί ήρθαν στο κέφι, άρχισαν οι παρέες να χορεύουν, πρώτα ζευγάρια, με σεμνό χορό, το συρτό, ύστερα πήραν θάρρος τα παλικάρια και τι χορούς δεν έκαμαν! Κλέφτικους, ναύτικους, χασάπικους, λογιής λογιής, με πηδήματα, μαντηλάκια· χόρευαν μόνοι, και δυο-δυο και τρεις-τέσσαρες. Ύστερα ένας γέρος σηκώθηκε και αυτός χόρευε ένα κλέφτικο σαν νάταν νέος. Χειροκροτήματα, γέλοια, κέφι. Η ορχήστρα όλο κι έπαιζε πιο ορμητικά, εκστατικά. Ο αμανές θα άρχιζε σιγά σιγά, σαν θρήνος, και ξαφνικά θα άλλαζε ο ρυθμός, θα προσπαθούσε να πηδήξει και αυτός και θα συνέχιζε όλο κι πιο ορμητικά ως το τέλος. Και το τέλος δεν ήταν οριστικό, όπως σε μας. Καθόλο, καθόλο coda ή cadence. Αντιθέτως, ξαφνικά ο ρυθμός, η μελωδία, το μέτρο αποσυνθετίζονταν, έσπαζαν, και το τραγούδι κατέληξε σε κακοφωνίες και χάος. Το ίδιο ο χορός. Δεν τελείωσαν τα παλικάρια θετικώς, οριστικώς, μα ελύγιζαν ξαφνικά, μαζί με τη μουσική, σαν να έλυωναν τα ωραία κορμιά τους, και γύριζαν στις θέσεις τους.

Καθόμωνα εγώ και τους θαύμαζα ως τα μεσάνυχτα, μόνος, διότι η Χρυσάνθη είχε πάει σπίτι για να κοιμηθεί τότε που κοιμόταν το μωρό.

Όταν μπήκα στο δωμάτιο, την βρήκα ξυπνητή. Γιατί; της είπα. Πώς να κοιμηθώ με ανοιχτή η πόρτα; Γιατί άργησες τόσο; Έτσι καταντήσαμε.

¶ Ο ύπνος θρέφει το μωρό και το κρασί το γέρο. —Ο Πρωτομάστορας, σελ. 14.

Πήγαμε με τη Χρυσάνθη τη δεύτερη μέρα του πανηγυριού και καθήσαμε μαζί με τον Μήτσο και δύο γέρους. Έπειτα ήρθαν και ο κύριος Αλέκος ο δικός μας ο νοικοκύρης και του Μήτσου ο αδερφός, ο Στέφανος. Πάλι χοροί, κέφι, ως τις 2:00 π.μ. Πίναμε νομίζω 22 μπουτίλια μύρα! (Εγώ τους τα κέρασα τα πιο πολλά.) Τα παλικάρια χόρεψαν κι οι γέροι χόρεψαν κι ο Στράτος, απέναντι με μια Αθηναία ξετσιπωτη· χόρεψαν κι ο Μήτσος κι ο Αλέκος ένα χασάπικο. Εγώ τους καμάρωνα. Μιλούσα μαζί μ' έναν από τους δύο γέρους (κι οι δύο πήραν τα μάτια τους κι εξαφανίστηκαν πριν ήρθε ο Στράτος για να πληρώσουμε). Είπαμε τα μυστικά μας, δηλαδή ότι κι οι δύο αγαπούμε την ελευθερία και μισούμε την τωρινή κυβέρνηση. Ο γέρος, 72 χρονώ, κοτσονάτος. Η Ελλάδα είναι πτωχή, λέει, αλλά έχει πλούτο και καρδιά. Σύμφωνη! Μου αρέσουν αυτοί οι απλοί Έλληνες, οι χοριανοί που με κυκλοφορούν ιδού πέρα, μα δεν μου αρέσουν καθόλου οι πλούσιοι αστοί που βρήκαμε στη Θεσσαλονίκη. Σαν να κρέμονται αυτοί· δεν είναι ανατολίτες, δεν είναι Ευρωπαίοι· τα πόδια τους δεν ρίζονται σε καμιά γης· είναι μετέωροι.

Ο μαέστρος ήταν από τη Νιγρίτα, παλαιός μαθητής του παππού μας. Μιλήσαμε. Όλα μακεδόνικα τραγούδια έπαιζαν, όπως τη προηγούμενη βραδυά, σαν αμανάδες. Καθόταν μαζί κι ο άλλος γέρος· δεν ήταν από το χωριό αυτός. Αγόρασε ένα οικόπεδο εδώ, κατάγεται από τη Θεσσαλονίκη. Αυτός πολύ δύσφορος, κατσούφης, όλο και έχαλνε το κέφι. Μια φορά, παράγγειλε χορό και όταν ήρξε η σειρά του κι άρχισε η μουσική, καθόταν και αρνήθηκε να σηκωθεί να χορέψει. Άλλη φορά σηκώθηκε για χασάπικο μαζί με τον Μήτσο και τον Αλέκο και τον άλλο γέρο. Άρχισαν να χορεύουν. Πολύ ωραία, γοργά, ζωηρά, μα αυτός ο διστροφος, να τον σε λίγο να κάνει σημάδι με το χέρι του και ν' αναγκάζει τον μαέστρο να πάψει. Δεν με κάνει τόσο γλήγορα, λέει ο γέρος. Ξανάρχισαν πιο σιγά μα εν τω μεταξύ οι άλλοι είχαν χάσει το ρυθμό. Έχασαν το κέφι τους· κάθισαν. Έτσι απέτυχε ο χορός τους, με τον γέρο τον αίτιο. Ύστερα πάλι, άρχισε μεγάλο καουγά με έναν άλλο που κατέφτασε—τον συμπέθερο τού κυρίου Στεφάνου, έναν παχύ μα σφιχτοδεμένο, με χαμόγελο και φωνή του λέωντος. Η τραγουδίστρια κατάγεται από τη Νιγρίτα ή από τη Βέροια; Αυτός ήταν ο καυγάς. Ξαχλαμάρες. Έτσι τέλος ο παχύς είπε να βάλουν στοίχημα και έβγαλε δρ. 500 αμέσως και τις κατέθεσε. Ο γέρος δεν είχε, κι όλο και δίσταζε και τέλος άλλαξε τη κουβέντα για να καυχωθεί πως ξέρει δεκαπέντε γλώσσες (ήταν ναύτης φαίνεται). «Ξέρεις τα ρωσικά;» «Πώς!» «Τα γύφτικα;» «Πώς!» «Τα βλάχικα;» «Βεβαίως! Πώς θες να μην ξέρω και τα βλάχικα!» «Μήπως ξέρεις και τα αμερικάνικα;» «Αστείο έβαζες; Τα ξέρω, τα ξέρω, όλα.» «Για πες δυο λόγια στον κύριο Πέτρο εδώ, να δούμε πόσα ξέρεις.» Στράφηκε τότες σε μένα και είπε με βαρεία προφορά, “Fucking you! Fucking you! I fucking you!” Έτσι απέδειξε τη γνώση του!

Πέρασα πολύ ωραία. Γυρίσαμε με τον Αλέκο, τον Μήτσο και τον Στέφανο στο σπίτι την ώρα 2:00 και έπεσα να κοιμηθώ. Η Χρυσάνθη είχε γυρίσει πιο ενωρίς και κοιμόταν. Την άλλη μέρα μου ρώτησε αν ήμουν μεθυσμένος, αν έχω πονοκέφαλο, κ.τ.λ. «Όχι, είμαι μια χαρά. Πέρασα πολύ ωραία.» «Ήσουν με το στοίχειό σου!» μου λέει και γελάσαμε με τη ψυχή μας.

Ήταν στο γλέντι και το village idiot and the village hunchback. Ο μωρός—ένας παλικάρι με ωραίο σώμα αλλά με το άδειο κουτό χαμόγελο ενός μωρού. Κάθε τόσο σηκωνόταν κι αυτός για να χορέψει. Πηδούσε λίγο, χαμογελούσε. Πρόσεξα με τόση τρυφεράδα όλος ο κόσμος συμπεριφέρονται μ’ αυτόν.

Σήμερα ο βασιλεύς ήλθε στη Θεσσαλονίκη. Ο Γεώργιος ο καημένος έπρεπε να χάσει και μια άλλη Κυριακή να παρουσιαστεί στον Λαγκαδά, όπου ο βασιλεύς θα επιθεωρήσει τους εκεί στρατιώτες. Η Ευθυμούλα, άφου είναι δασκάλα, έχασε κι αυτή την Κυριακή, γιατί έπρεπε μαζί με τους μαθητάς της να παρουσιαστούν στο δρόμο, να πούνε Ζήτω όταν θα περάσει ο βασιλεύς και η ακολουθία του. Όλοι οι μαθηταί των γυμνασίων πρέπει έτσι να φανούν, να κάνουν μεγάλο πλήθος δλδ. για να μπορέσουν να γράψουν αύριο οι εφημερίδες πως όλος ο λαός αυθόρμητος (!) παρουσιάστηκε για να δείξει την αγάπη του προς τον πρώτον Έλληνα. Είπα εγώ μια στιγμή να καταβούμε με τα παιδιά στη Θεσσαλονίκη για να δούμε κι εμείς, μα τότε μετάνοιωσα. Γιατί να χάσω το καιρό μου για τέτοιες ψεύτικες τελετές; Αντί να πάμε εκεί, πήγαμε εδώ πέρα στις επιδείξεις του δημοτικού σχολείου. Πριν αρχίσουν κρυφάκουα μερικά απ' τα παιδιά να κουβεντιάζουν μεταξύ τους. Ήταν γύρω δέκα χρονώ, στην πέμπτη τάξη και ξαφνιάστηκα από τη σοβαρότητα της κουβέντας τους. Ο ένας έλεγε (πού το έμαθε δεν ξέρω) ότι στον Καναδά δεν είναι υποχρεωτικό να πας στρατιώτης, ενώ στην Ελλάδα είναι. Τότε μιλούσε για τους Έλληνες σε Κύπρο και σε Βόρειο Ήπειρο, και τι θα γινόταν αν άρχισε ένας πόλεμος. Τα άλλα λόγια δεν άκουσα πολύ καλά· τότε όμως ήρθε κι ένα άλλο παιδί και το άκουσα καλά-καλά να πει: «Ελεύθερος; Εγώ δεν θέλω να είμαι ελεύθερος! Αμ τι, νά 'μαι ελεύθερος να πάω στρατιώτης στο Βιετ Ναμ και να σκοτωθώ; Αυτό θα πει ελευθεριά;»

When Kazantzakis was in Aegina in the 1930s, penniless, he wrote to Jouvenel about his house, the sea, his beloved μοναξιά, and concluded: 'Όπως το ετόνισα κιόλας, είμαι εδώ σχεδόν ευτυχισμένος: μοναξιά, θάλασσα, δουλειά, δεν λείπει από την ευτυχία μου παρά το ουσιαστικό: η δυνατότητα να φύγω (Νέα Εστία 72, σελ. 1572). How true. Even in Paradise, man cannot be happy unless he knows he can leave when he wants.

Alec is sensitive in a lovely way. While we were still in Salonika we made the mistake of walking with him through the meat market, where the carcasses of course hang in all their gore, large sheep-eyes looking at you imploringly from skinless heads. For weeks afterwards, Alec refused to eat meat.

Today, the father of Ούλης took Alec and Leander fishing. Alec of all people was the one who caught a small fish. At first he was elated and ran with it to the house. But soon he became all too aware that it was dying or dead and he began to cry, and to reproach himself for murdering it. What could we say? Actually, we said the one thing worth saying: that he should run quickly back to the sea and replace the fish in its element. He did this and, miracle or miracles, the fish revived and swam away.

In the "Greek Park" vaudeville in Salonika the master of ceremonies, at one point, asked the audience to give him five or six words: two with accent on the last syllable, two with accent on the next to last, two with accent on the 3rd from last. Then he asked for a theme, and it was given: miniskirts. He said "Thank you." After the next act he returned a read a poem he had composed on the set theme, using the given words as line-endings!

Last Sunday I helped George get rid of a pile of wood, storing it on the τεράτσα; also trimmed the lower branches from the pines he had planted, and had a lesson in pruning grapes. He was very melancholy, as usual. Says that all the γεωρπόνιοι are on tenterhooks, στα αναμμένα κάρβουνα, waiting from day to day, not knowing if they will be among those to be “released” from their positions for political reasons. The initial “release” is for six months, at ¼ salary! But how much hope is there of reinstatement after that?

Sleep is strange. This afternoon, in my midday sleep I suddenly found myself composing a limerick:

There was a girl from Nigrita
 Who didn’t like dandies to greet her.
     She gave them a bop
     They never forgot
 And now they run when they meet her.

What a blessing is liberty, mutual trust, stability. These “patriotic” slogans that I always found sentimental and “stupid” when I heard them in America, now have an intense meaning and value. Here, everywhere there is fear. You can’t speak, not even to your friends or relatives. Everywhere are paid spies and informers. Η Θεοδώρα, η θεία του Άλτα, was telling Chrysanthi last night about the εταιρεία where she works, some kind of αντιπροσωπεία ζάχαρης. Every day, it seems, people who had been there for years suddenly no longer appear. Somewhere, among supposed friends, or in a café after a few beers, or at work in a moment of laxness, they said a word against the government. Immediately they are reported to the αστυνομία, και πάνε και αυτοί! The other sad thing is how easily people change allegiance. So many, nominally liberals previously, now have nothing but good words for the Pattakos régime, the end result being that you don't know what they really believe, nor how to act in front of them. In any case, it is foolhardy to express any opinion whatsoever. The other day ο πατέρας του Νούλη, ενός παιδιού που έπιασε φιλία με τον Λέανδρο μας, μας εκάλησε να φάμε μαζί στη Ρέμβη. Είναι chauffeur αυτός, έχει μεγάλο φορτηγό και κουβαλάει ύλη για την κατασκευή δρόμων—πέτρες, άμμος, κ.τ.λ.—όμως έχει μεγάλα ιδανικά για τον μονάκριβο γιο του, το Νούλη. Έβαλε και έρχεται ταχτικά στο σπίτι μια δασκάλα αγγλικής γλώσσας, ο γιος μαθαίνει, είναι έξυπνο παιδί, ο προορισμός του είναι να πάει στο Κολλέγιο Ανατόλια και από πέρα ίσως έξω στο εξωτερικό να γίνει γιατρός. Έτσι πάντα είναι το ιδανικό τετοιών ανθρώπων. Είναι καλό, με τη διαφορά ότι κι ο γιος και ο πατέρας τώρα καταφρονούν τον αγγάμματο. Ο Νούλης έρχεται στο σπίτι μας, πιάνει τον Λέανδρο και τον λέει «Ελα να παίξουμε μαζί να μη παίζεις με αυτά τα άλλα παιδιά του χωριού· είναι πρόστυχα, δεν ξέρουν γράμματα, δεν ξέρουν αγγλικά, είναι καλά μόνο να σκάβουν στα χωράφια, τι τους θέλεις!» Έτσι, και είναι μόνο 11 χρονώ. Λοιπόν, ο πατέρας του προόδεψε πολύ επί του Καραμανλή, φυσικά επειδή ο Καραμανλής έπαιρνε χρήματα πολλά από τους φίλους του τους Αμερικανούς και έφτιανε δρόμους. Ύστερα, ήταν σταθερή για λίγα χρόνια η πολιτική και, σε μερικές περιπτώσεις, αυτούς τους δρόμους και άλλα έργα που άρχισαν, τα τελείωσαν. Κοντολογής, ο πατεράς έβγαине τα λεφτά του. Επί όμως του Παπανδρέου, οι απεργίες, σχεδόν ατέλειωτες, τα έκανε θάλασσα. Το αποτέλεσμα είναι ότι αυτός ο άνθρωπος τώρα είναι υπέρ τον Παττακό. Έστω. Μπορώ να καταλάβω την αιτία. Μιλήσαμε π.χ. για τον τουρισμό. Πρέπει να συνέχίζει ο τουρισμός, λέει, και δεν μπορεί να καταλάβει γιατί δεν έρχονται οι τουρίσται. Είναι οι Ιταλοί που μας έκαναν το κακό, επειδή εδημοσίεψαν ψευτιές στις εφημερίδες τους. Δεν είναι αλήθεια αυτά που λένε για την Ελλάδα. Τίποτε δεν έγινε εδώ. Είναι όπως πριν, ελευθερία έχουμε . . . Θέλει να πει: εγώ δουλεύω όπως πριν και καλλύτερα γιατί τώρα η κυβέρνηση μετακινεί και βουνά για να αυξανθεί ο τουρισμός και γι' αυτό φιάχνουν ένα δρόμο από τη Θεσσαλονίκη στην Άγια Τριάδα, και κουβαλάει τα ύλη αυτός. Ας λέει όλα αυτά. Μήπως είναι κουτός και τα πιστεύει; Μήπως είναι opportunist; Ποιος ξέρει. Το κακό είναι ότι ούτε εγώ, και οπωσδήποτε κανένας Έλληνας, δεν μπορούμε να τον αντισταθούμε, δεν μπορούμε να πούμε τη γνώμη μας, πως πολλά άλλαξαν και μάλιστα τα πιο ιερά και σημαντικά. Πάει η ελευθερία, δεν μπορούμε να τον πούμε αυτό, φοβούμενοι μήπως είναι και αυτός σπιούνος πληρωμένος, και να τρέξει στην αστυνομία να μας καταγγείλει. Αυτή είναι η κατάσταση.

Λένε ένα αστείο. Δύο σκυλιά συνάντησαν στους δρόμους της Αθήνας. Το ένα είχε στο στόμα του ένα μεγάλο κόκκαλο. Ήταν τακτοποιημένο, θρεμμένο. Λέει το άλλο το σκυλί, «Εσύ βρε τα έχεις πολύ ωραία. Έχεις τη μεγάλη την αυλή σου και το κόκκαλο, ούτε ψείρους δεν έχεις.» «Μπα, ξέρω έχω όλα αυτά, βρε φίλε μου, μα πάλι είμαι πολύ δυστυχημένο.» «Εσύ δυστυχημένο; Πώς;» «Βρε συνάδελφό μου, μα θέλω να γαυγίζω!»

Ο Γεώργιος μας είπε ότι προχθές ήλθε ένας αξιωματικός στον Λανγκαδά για να βγάλει λόγο μπροστά στους δασκάλους και τους υπαλλήλους της τραπέζης, κτλ. Τέτοιοι λόγοι γίνονται τώρα ταχτικά· η κυβέρνηση προσπαθεί να «φωτίσει» το λαό. Σήμερα αυτός μήλησε προπαντός για τα σχολεία. Είπε πως οι δάσκαλοι τώρα πρέπει ν' έχουν ως σκοπό τους να βάλουν τα παιδιά να καταλάβω ότι ο στρατός έσωσε την Ελλάδα, που βρισκόταν στα χείλη της αβύσσου. Να φροντίστε αυτό, λέει· αυτό τώρα είναι τα εθνικά σας καθήκοντα. Και τελείωσε την ομιλία του με το σύνθημα: Αυτά που θέλει η Ελλάς είναι όχι μορφωμένους, μα Έλληνες!

In the Stadium της Θεσσαλονίκης, the army gave great στρατιωτικές επιδείξεις, δωρεάν, και μάλιστα ήλθε και ο Κόλλιας. Ο κόσμος έτρεξε, γεμάτο το στάδιο (δηδ. η παθητική αντίσταση απέτυχε, αυτό τότε μπορούσε να πει η κυβέρνηση). Ήλθε ο Κόλλιας, ο κόσμος σηκώθηκε και φώναξε το Ζήτω. Δύο νέοι, μάλλον φοιτηταί, δε σηκώθηκαν, δε ξεφώνισαν τίποτε. Κάποιος βέβαια τους παρατήρησε, σε λίγα ήλθαν οι χωροφύλακες και τους πήραν στο τμήμα. Έτσι είναι η Ελλάς! Και κάθε μερα διαβάζουμε στην εφημερίδα ότι οι κύριοι τάδε και τάδε καταδικάστικαν σε φυλακή επί 4-5 μήνες δια χλευασμό εναντίον του βασιλέα.

The newspapers published a list of forbidden books by communists, native and foreign. O Pappous, passing by a bookshop the same day, saw policemen plucking the offending titles from the shelves and throwing the books into the street. Authors on the list were Γαλάτεια Καζαντζάκη, Βάρναλης, Έλλη Αλεχίου, Βασίλης Βασιλικός, κλπ. but not Nikos. Marvelous! Εκεί κατάντησε!

We were very miserable. Chrysanthi depressed and nervous, full of hatred for Greeks and everything Greek. I all too conscious of the discrepancy between my project and the environment in which I am pursuing it. We spoke of leaving Greece. All this was just before we moved to Aghia Triadha. “I cannot stay,” Chrysanthi said. “I cannot see my brother suffer like this.” We spoke of leaving then and there, instead of moving to the village. But where to go? I sent hurried and somewhat dramatic letters to Reinoud Oort, Shanklands (in Newcastle for the year), Konrad Elsdon, and Gifford. In the meantime, as must happen in Greece, the whole family gathered to discuss the matter. George, Lola, even Pappous (who the night before had agreed with Chrysanthi) said stay, stay. . . . So, we decided to stay, partly out of inertia, partly out of fear of not finding a place to live elsewhere at such short notice, partly in order not to disappoint and offend the family, break our agreement with the landlords in Aghia Triadha, and partly, I must confess, out of curiosity (on my part) to spend some more time here and have that much more direct experience of what it is like to live under fascism. The very next day we moved and of course were consoled somewhat by the beauty and friendliness of the village. Soon afterwards came the replies from various friends: First a telegram from Konrad—“Come immediately Huddersfield. Wire time & place arrival”—followed by a letter saying that his house was at our disposal. Then from Reinoud, the same. We have a large house. Come, stay as long as you like. Then we can look for a seaside cottage. And from Tom & Becky: we’re leaving the keys of our house with a neighbor. Come. Stay. We’re going to Switzerland for a few weeks. Occupy our house in our absence and then we’ll see what happens. From Gifford, not quite so much, but at least some newspaper clippings showing available cottages in the West of England. How nice to have friends! I wrote them all, rather embarrassed, that it was a false alarm but that I felt warm at the thought that I could address myself to them, and hoped that they would always feel equally as free to address themselves to me in time of need.

Nice remarks by Kazantzakis:

Ωραία πολιτεία το Βερολίνο, μα έχει πολλούς . . . Γερμανούς.

(From Alexiou, sel. 329.)

. . . αλάτι ο θάνατος και τη ζωή τη νοστιμίζει . . .

. . . δύο βόδια: ο ίσκιος μου κ' εγώ, μπήκαμε πάλι στο ζυγό και οργώνομε το χάος. (From Alexiou, sel. 331.)

Good motto: “When in Rome, do as the Greeks do!”

To Salonika yesterday, shopping. Returned to Χαΐμ to get little samovars. He was wearing short sleeves, and on his left forearm, just above the wrist, was tattooed a star and a number—from the concentration camp. Now he has a son in Anatolia College, hopes he'll go abroad, wants him to study electrical engineering in the U.S.

People like to romanticize street vendors—how lovely their cries, etc. This morning I heard a childish voice hawking sandals, beach clogs, etc., in a lovely singsong. A boy of about 12 passed, carrying 2 heavy valises, one in each hand. Πέδηλα, τσόκαρα και γυναικήσια έχω, πέ—δη—λααα, τσό—κα—ρααα . . .

How history repeats itself. Here is Kazantzakis in 1922, writing to Galatea (letter #45) re: the coup d'état of General Πλαστήρας after the Asia Minor catastrophe: Όλη η αθλιότητα του ρωμιού. Απαζημίωσες, συκοφαντίες, οι ίδιοι που σώπαιναν και ζητωκραύγαζαν στο άλλο καθεστώς, τώρα προβαίνουν πάλι υπερασπιστές της επανάστασης. Είμαστε αμόρφωτοι, δειλοί, μικροί. (σελ. 123)

Letter 49, sel. 140: ¶ Θαρρώ πως οι αρετές της ράτσας μας αναδείχονται μόνο έξω από κρατικά καθεστώτα. Ως κρατικός ο Έλληνας είναι φρικαλέος: ως Οδυσσέας, περιπλανώμενος, εργαζόμενος, εμπορευόμενος, σκεπτόμενος, χωρίς δικό του κρατικά σύστημα, σαν τους Εβραίους, είναι μοναδικός στον κόσμο. Μπορεί, όπως οι Εβραίοι, να γίνει δραστικότατο προξύμι για ν' ανεβεί η γης.

Kazantzakis's hyperbole is sometimes delicious. Too bad he didn't exploit his sense of humor more. Here is a description of Naples: Και παντού μια ακαθαρσία royale, λάμπουσα μέσα στον ήλιο, όλοι φτύνουνε, κατουρούν όπου βρούν, χώνουνε όχι τα δάχτυλα μα τα χέρια τους σε τεράστια, ελαστικότητα ρουθούνια.

His description of the library in Naples: . . . οι άνθρωποι φτύνουν κάθε στιγμή κατάχαμα, φωνάζουν, από τη διπλανή πόρτα μπαίνει ασφυχτική η μυρωδιά του ουρητήριου. Τι διαφορά από τη Γερμανία. Τούτοι εδώ είναι χειρότεροι από τους Έλληνες. (Letter to Galatea no. 80.) A little better, but not much. I think of the toilet in the Εθνική Βιβλιοθήκη in Athens. What filth, smell! No lock on the door, no paper, flies in swarms—though it was a little better this time than three years ago. And the couriers who are supposed to fetch the books. How lazy they were! Every time I gave them a slip they made me feel that I was some unspeakable monster. And most of all they scowled when I ordered the large bound volumes of newspapers, because they were heavy and smothered in dust.

Η βιβλιοθήκη των καθηγητών in Salonika: opposite me, the professor of Old Testament, chatting for hours, receiving his lackeys, figuring out how much money was to be collected from his mimeographed publications that all the students have to buy. Across the aisle, a fat, greasy professor forever clearing his throat or spitting into his handkerchief with the most excruciating sound, as though exhibiting his phlegm to the world. The librarians—talk, gossip, the weather, recipes. The chief librarian: respectable, necktie, long fingernail. All movements with utmost leisure and lethargy. And they only work from 8 till 1:30. All afternoon free.

To Salonika with Miranda and Themis to see Koun's production of Βάτραχοι. What imaginative combination of ideas, spectacle, mystery, farce, music, dance! Everything was done with Pantagruelian exaggeration. Heracles was dressed in a weight-lifter's jersey and trunks, with 50 medals pinned to his chest, and a huge moustache with waxed ends, which he kept twisting. Dionysus was old and degenerate; he looked like Cavafy's death-mask. Ξανθίας, the slave, was a leering hunchback mixed with a comédia dell'arte buffoon. Euripides was a modern smartaleck, very sure of himself, Aeschylus an old-fashioned pompous “patriarch” yet somehow dignified withal. There was a delicious and meaningful use of anachronisms. The chant of the funeral procession obviously sounded Byzantine; Euripides when he prayed to the gods crossed himself; the chorus hopped and jerked to jazz-like (or, more accurately, Marat-Sade-like) movements; and best of all, chorus, Euripides, Aeschylus and Dionysus had a few “numbers” when it was a question of 5th century B.C. political satire, which employed the catchy rhythmic format of the Greek “revue” B. P. (before Pattakos).

This was the first production of Aristophanes I’ve seen. One realizes immediately, and with a strange blow of astonishment, what a decisive influence this form has had right to the present day, without even mentioning the Latin comedians. We see Aristophanes written all over Molière, for instance. And Peter Weiss, in trying to revive the theater of ideas, has found a modern way to employ the chorus, music, dance, plus intellectual and topical debate, which Aristophanes combines so well: and also, in Weiss’s case, to return a sense of the “nouminos” to the theater. It is a sad commentary when we realize that this is provided, in his case, by lunatics, and the debate between a psychopath and a political fanatic, the insane asylum in the 20th century replacing Olympus or Hades of the Greeks.

We are about to have a girl come in to live with us: Susanna, a second-year student in the university, formerly a gymnasium pupil of Efhymoula’s in Siderokastron. This is so that Chrysanthi can finally get some sleep at night, which is fine. But still, I look with great displeasure at the prospect of a ξένος άνθρωπος in the house, and also the prospect of a maid, which I suppose is the final capitulation to the bourgeoisie. She asked for 2,000 drachmas, which is about double what such servants usually get in Greece, but still not very much by our standards: about $13.00 a week! George came very apologetically and confided that it was doubtlessly «αυτή» (i.e., Efhymoula) who propagandized the girl and gave her the courage to ask so much. George apparently lives a continuous martyrdom with this very disagreeable wife of his, but he disliked her even before they were married, and went into the union with open eyes, out of weakness and inertia probably, or maybe sexual blackmail. Who knows? Chrysanthi told me the detailed story last week when the two of us went together (i.e., alone) to Μηχανιώνα for a few hours and sat in the café surrounded by grizzly fishermen playing τάβλι.

Sudden report that Danae's husband, Gregory, is in prison. No details.

Theodorakis sentenced to 8 months in jail, commutable by payment of a fine of 200 gold pounds sterling per day, a total of 48,000 pounds sterling! Reason: abuse or "insult" of the Αρχή (authorities) by his telegram of 9.10.65 to the president of the Βουλή and various newspapers —i.e., for a crime of speech, not act.

In Μακεδονία, 9 July, there was an article on the απαγόρευσις των κομμουνιστικών βιβλίων, a good example of the doubletalk and doublethink that George Orwell knew so well. After describing the "willful blindness" toward the communist menace of all the parliamentary governments before April 1, it goes on: Την απόφαση της επαναστατικής κυβερνήσεως να απαγορεύση την κυκλοφορία των κομμουνιστικών θεωριών, οι αληθινοί δημοκράται υπεδέχθησαν με ανακούφιση. . . . Το αντίθετο συνέβη με τους κιβδηλοποιούς [counterfeits] της δημοκρατίας. Αυτοί έβγαλαν αναστεναγμό και μίλησαν για δίωξη της σκέψεως! . . . Λοιπόν η απαγόρευση της μαρξιστικής σκέψεως δεν αποτελεί δίωξη του πνεύματος, αλλά μέτρον αυτοπροστασίας. Και μέτρο αναπτύξεως των δημοκρατικών ιδεών. Γιατί κάθε θεωρία . . . έχει το δικαίωμα να προστατεύη εαυτήν από τις υπονομευτικές παρενέργειες [side-effects] της αντιπάλου κοσμοθεωρίας. Δηλαδή, σ' ένα ωρισμένο στάδιο της αναπτύξεως και της εμπεδώσεώς της [of its consolidation, establishment] η δημοκρατική κοσμοθεωρία έχει κάθε δικαίωμα να αχρηστεύη [make useless] τον αθέμιτον [illicit] ανταγωνισμό των μαρξιστικών ιδεών. Τούτο δεν αποδεικνύει αδυναμία των ελευθέρων ιδεών της δυτικής δημοκρατίας . . . αλλά απόλυτη συνείδηση του κινδύνου που . . . αντιπροσωπεύει η ολοκληρωτικώς αναπτυσσομένη . . . κομμουνιστική κοσμοθεωρία. And so forth.

In the same issue there is an article with a statement by the government strenuously denying reports that the Athens Festival had been censored, and that works by ancient Greek authors had been deemed unsuitable for the new establishment. As proof: a letter from Αλέξης Μινωτής, director of the National Theater. He said that the repertoire remained unchanged, except that the incidental music written by Theodorakis for some of the plays would no longer be used. As witness to the democratic spirit of the "revolutionary government," he cited the fact that one of the plays, Euripides' Πλούτος, I think, will be done, as planned, in the translation by Κώστας Βάρναλης.

Ο Θωμάς, ο εγγονός της αδελφής του Δημητίου, ήλθε σήμερα. Είναι ηλεκτρολόγος και δουλεύει σ' ένα εργαστάσιο που κάνουν οργανικά λιπάσματα. Τον ρώτησα για τις συνθήκες. Λέει ότι είναι τρομερές. Έπειδη η πρώτη ύλη του οργανικού λιπάσματος είναι απορίμματα, υποφέρουν όλοι από μια βόχα και μύγες και σμάρια κουνούπια. Αυτοί που δουλεύουν την ύλη αυτή τη δουλεύουν με γυμνά τα χέρια τους και υποφέρουν πολύ. Ο μισθός τους, 80 δραχμές την ημέρα, επάνω-κάτω 400 την εβδομάδα, 1600 τον μήνα. Αυτός, ως ηλεκτρολόγος, πληρώνεται κάπως καλύτερα, μα όχι πολύ. Αναγκάζεται να δουλεύει και στα μέγαρα που κτίζονται, ύστερα από τις ώρες του στο εργοστάσιο. Δουλεύει μέρα-νύχτα, 20 ώρες την ημέρα, και βγάζει 5.000 δρ. το μήνα το πιο πολύ. (Λέει ότι ο διευθυντής του εργοστασίου είναι ένας Αμερικανός που έρχεται μια φορά τον μήνα.) Το παιδί αυτό φυσικά θέλει να φύγει από την Ελλάδα. Ήλθε να μεταφράσω ένα γράμμα που πήρε από τη Αυστραλία, που τον καλεί να έλθη, και στέλνει μικρές αγγελίες της εφημερίδας, απόδειξη ότι οι ηλεκτρολόγοι ζητιούνται πολύ. Θα πάει ασφαλώς για δύο χρόνια σα δοκιμή. Όμως, όπως λέει το γράμμα, πρέπει να δώσει εξέταση στην αγγλική γλώσσα για να πάρει την άδεια να δουλεύει ως ηλεκτρολόγος. Δεν ξέρει τ' αγγλικά, όμως κάνει προσπάθειες και θα τα μάθη. Λέει ότι θά 'ναι εύκολο διότι σπούδασε λατινικά στο γυμνάσιο και γι' αυτό ξέρει τα στοιχεία. Καλα! Όμως τι κρίμα να σπουδάσει ένας έτσι υποχρεωτικά τα λατινικά, που είναι νεκρή γλώσσα και άχρηστη, αντί για να σπουδάσει τ' αγγλικά ή τα γαλλικά στο σχολείο; Τι καλό έκανε ο Παπανδρέου, τι καλό για τους εργαζόμενους, όταν άλλαξε το σύστημα και πέταξε τα λατινικά! Μα τώρα με την επαναστατική κυβέρνηση αυτό το βήμα μπροστά καταστρέφεται και η εκπαίδευση κάνει δύο βήματα προς το πίσω. Πάλι θα σπουδάζουν οι μαθηταί τα λατινικά υποχρεωτικά.

Ο Μάριος Καρασάβας ήλθε με τους γονείς του. Ο πατέρας είναι, και φαίνεται, ετοιμοθάνατος. Χωρίς στομάχι· μόνον πετσί και κόκκολα. Πρέπει να τρώει συνέχεια από λίγο ψωμί και τυρί, φτύνει πάντοτε και παντού, τα μάγουλα είναι φαγομένα, τα δόντια λείπουν, το αυτί δεν ακούει. Και ήταν κάποτε αυτός στρατιώτης, αξιωματικός, πολεμιστής!

Ήλθε και ο Richard Cross με τρεις φίλους, έναν άλλο, τον Peter Lehmann, που σπουδάζει οικονομικά στο Πανεπιστήμιο του Sussex, και δύο Αμερικανούς που σπουδάζουν στο ίδιο μέρος. Τους πήγα στη Μηχανιώνα. Υπάρχουν εκεί δύο καφενεία, το ένα βλέπει στη θάλασσα και δεν είχε ούτε έναν πελάτη, το άλλο είναι αυτό που καθόμασταν με τη Χρυσάνθη προχθές στη πλατεία, χωρίς θέα, μα ήταν γεμάτο. Τους είπα, Τι προτιμάτε να δείτε, τη θάλασσα ή τους ανθρώπους; Προτίμασαν τη θάλασσα οι άτιμοι! Ήταν όμως καλά παιδιά, όλα, και διασκέδασα κι εγώ. Μιλήσαμε για ώρες· τους πήγα ύσερα στη Ρέμβη για να φάμε. Μιλήσαμε πολύ. Οι δύο κοιμήθηκαν στα κρεβάτια των παιδιών, ο ένας στην αυλή, ο τελευταίος στο αυτοκίνητο. Σήμερα έκαναν τα μπάνια τους· φάγαμε όλοι μαζί στην αυλή, μακαρόνια, και φύγαμε για την Αθήνα.

Η Σουζάννα πέθανε από ενδιαφέρον, ήθελε να μιλήσει γαλλικά μαζί τους και ήταν γελοία αυτή με τα ελληνικά της. Ο Peter Lehmann με την αγγλική του προφορά και άγνοια προσπαθώντας και οι δυο να μιλήσουν γαλλικά. Αποτέλεσμα μηδέν. Μα πώς λαχταρούν τα κορίτσια εδώ ν' ανταμώνουν άνδρες, πώς θέλουν να δέσουν σχέσεις με ξένους και να φύγουν απ' την Ελλάδα, όπως προσέξαμε όταν ήλθαν και οι ναύται και τους έστειλε ύστερα το ερωτικό γράμμα αυτό που εγώ το μετάφρασα για το κορίτσι που κάθεται και δουλεύει στο καφενείο του Αρίστου. Και η Σουζάννα η καμμένη ήθελε να πάρω τη διεύθυνσή τους, να πιάσουν αλληλογραφία. Μήπως στα γαλλικά!

Πόσο απελπισμένος είναι ο κόσμος εδώ! Ο Θωμάς, τα κορίτσια που γνωρίσαμε, η Φωφώ, η Σουζάννα, ενώ εμείς έχουμε όλα και παρ' επάνω παίνω υποτροφία $10,000 από το Ίδρυμα Danforth χωρίς να κάνω τίποτε, σχεδόν να μη σηκώσω δάκτυλο. Τώρα καταλαβαίνω, θα κατέστρεφα τους καθηγητές πρώτα απ' όλους.

Ο Θωμάς made it very clear why the factory is able to employ men in such filthy repulsive work and yet pay them only 80 drachmas a day. It is because outside the factory, every day, are lines of other men, the unemployed, begging for a job at any wage. The unemployment in Greece is bad, naturally for the unemployed but it is also bad for the employed. And now, of course, since all labor unions have been abolished, things are worse than ever.

Dear Larry [Simms],

I cannot tell you how truly delighted I was to receive your card, the one sent from Amsterdam. Delighted and embarrassed, because I've been planning to answer your fine letter of Bloom's Day 1966 (!) for over a year now, and have procrastinated and procrastinated. My excuse is that I wasn't sure of a valid address. I knew that the Cambridge, Mass. address in the letter was only temporary. Actually, sometime last year an investigator came to me, doing a routine check on you in connection with your work in the Navy (FBI man, I should say, instead of the euphemism "investigator") and I asked him for your address. Now, your postcard with the stamp U.S.S. Essex confirms the address he gave me, and thus this letter, which I hope reaches you safely, wherever you are. The FBI asked about your "character," I think; I told them the truth as I saw it—that you were not at all docile, but very headstrong and impulsive; also very sincere and open. Whether this did you good or did you harm I of course cannot know, but one does his best with these interrogations, and the only method, really, is to be completely honest and frank.

Unfortunately, I shall not be able to see you when you come to Greece. First of all, we are not in Athens, but in a village about 30 km. from Salonika; secondly, we're leaving the country the last week in August, to go to England until Christmas. (Address: 4 Fox Hill Close, Selly Oak, Birmingham 30, England.) The S.S. America spent some days in the harbor here last week, and some of the crew came to the village to go swimming. My son was enlisted as an interpreter in a dispute about the bill at the café, and some of the sailors began dragging and pulling him, swearing, etc. (they were drunk, and probably ruffians to begin with anyhow), so that it all ended with him in hysterical tears and they leaving without paying their bill. This is our recent impression of the U.S. Navy.

I wish I knew Athens better and could give you a long list of off-beat places to visit. But I can't. We lived there for three months several years ago, but what with children didn't do much touring and night-clubbing. I am a sedentary bourgeois, aware of my Prufrockian bald spot, and trying not to develop a beer-belly. . . . In any case, I would say the following: National Archeological Museum, of course—this is magnificent, with all the treasures dug up at Mycenae, and a marvelous selection of classic age sculpture, including the Ephebos of Marathon and a stirring Poseidon. Acropolis, of course. Plaka (old section; taverns, tourist-traps). Piraeus, by subway from Omonia Square: fish dinner in Tourkolimano there. These are the things everyone does. Aside from this, I like the Benaki Museum because downstairs in the basement, almost hidden, they have a splendid collection of Greek peasant costumes, displayed on mannequins; upstairs are mementos of the Greek War of Independence, the granting of the constitution (ha! ha!), etc. This wouldn't mean much to you, especially as the captions are in Greek, but the costumes are worth a visit. The Monastery of Daphne, just a little outside of Athens, has a fine mosaic of the Pantokrator, a very fierce and Jehovah-like Christ. There is supposed to be a really good taverna (singing, food) on Mourouzi Street, which is just after the Royal Gardens, the far side, away from Constitution Square. Beaches you'll hear about yourself. If you can get outside of Athens for a time, go to Delphi. This can be managed in a day if you leave early, but staying overnight makes the whole enterprise much more pleasant. On the way, stop at Arachova, the town just before Delphi, and ask for some wine on tap—the Arachova wine is one of the best in Greece (my other favorite is Samos-Moschato). . . . Then of course there is the Athens Festival. If you're lucky, you'll be able to see an ancient tragedy or comedy played outdoors. . . . But enough of this. I sound like Baedeker, and you'll manage very well on your own.

You're probably wondering what I'm doing here. Working on Kazantzakis, of course. What else? And coming to realize every day how much more, really, I like Joyce! This statement is not irrelevant, because the two started out with exactly the same problems: loss of god; discouragement with all the pieties of bourgeois society; a tremendous urge to fill the void with something of their own making; a romantic, adolescent sense of their own supposedly unlimited powers; a scorn of human contact— they could very well spend all of life without a single friend if their “principles” demanded this; an arrogance and egotism and pride that indeed did isolate them from the human community, etc. But Joyce, even in the Portrait, realizing that this was self-defeating, took pains to show that the “superman” in Stephen is just, really, a mask, although Stephen himself doesn’t know this yet. And of course in Ulysses the next step is taken, and Stephen himself faces this truth. But Kazantzakis spent forty years fooling himself and producing, for he most part, completely artificial and fabricated works because he dealt only with the mask and rarely with the true face underneath. There are of course slips, moments of chagrin or surprising sincerity, and these are the great moments in his books, but they are buried in so much else that is unbearable. For forty years he was just like pimply Dedalus, dreaming of sending his epiphanies to all the great libraries of the world, including Alexandria (!) and hardly realizing that his works were hysterical and monotonous and repetitious to a degree probably unique in literature—all the faults of D. H. Lawrence, the same idée fixe, with few of Lawrence’s virtues. And a great part of the trouble lay in the fact that Kazantzakis insisted on writing in verse despite the truth that he was a very poor poet. So he had Lawrence’s faults without the redeeming feature of Lawrence’s great handling of the language. Then, suddenly, in his 60th year (imagine!) he found himself, and this is of course what makes him so exciting to investigate. First, he switched to prose, though still feeling that this was “beneath him”; second, for some reason, perhaps simply age and repeated failure, he began to remove the superman mask, to come to terms with his own weak humanity, to feel the need of connection with the rest of weak humanity, which formerly he had despised, and, best of all, to draw his material from his own experiences as a boy (before Nietzsche got hold of him), and to make use of his marvelous natural gifts as an observer of life. Forty active years of writing, all in the wrong direction!

These are the sorts of things I am discovering thanks to my stay in Greece, where naturally I’ve been able to read everything he wrote in the long period before he became internationally known.

I've driven the people in the National Library in Athens (you might take a peek into this building) batty, I'm sure, by demanding volume after volume which, judging by the amount of dust, hadn't been looked at in decades: huge bound volumes of newspapers and periodicals from 1906 onwards; then the same in Salonika. Added to this is a whole pile of musty manuscripts, notebooks, commonplace books, lecture notes, and copies of early works that he renounced and are now unavailable—all made available to me by Mrs. Kazantzakis in Geneva, which was our first stop. I have all the workbooks for The Last Temptation and Saint Francis, for example, showing exactly what Kazantzakis read in order to "work up the subject." He was a very scholarly fellow, actually. Then there are also his early notes about what should go in each chapter, what characteristics to give to the various characters, etc. I have his lecture notes when he was a graduate student in 1907 at the Sorbonne, showing exactly what he read by Nietzsche et al., and what impressed him; I have volume after volume of random jottings, including detailed working-out of planned books that he never had time to write, including dreams that he recorded, strange words that appealed to him, etc. All the raw materials that, as he would say, had to be then "transubstantiated" into a work of art. In addition to this, I have been able to read the most important articles and books written about Kazantzakis in Greek, a good deal of it either just slander or adulation, and largely worthless, but some of it of first quality; and all in all giving an idea of the artistic currents during the fifty years of his career.

From all this you'll be able to conclude correctly that our stay in Greece is not at all very romantic or exciting. I hate to say this, but I spend my days reading and taking notes, first in the libraries, now at home in our village. And Sunday? Sunday I write letters, like this one! Unfortunately I still read Greek very slowly, and have to concentrate all the time, so progress is slow. Now, after about three months of this, I have a "loot" of some thousands of pages of notes, with the result that I am becoming more and more frightened about the next step: i.e., what to do with them. Somehow, it's easier to go on reading than to stop and try to extract the quintessence from what you already have. Of course, things aren't quite so dull as they may sound. First, it was fun to spend three days in Geneva with Mrs. Kazantzakis, talking with her, and running around furiously trying to get everything photocopied. Next, my trip to Athens at the end of April was by coincidence timed exactly to give me an eye-witness experience of the coup d'état. Indeed I was confined to my hotel (Hotel Omonia, Omonia Square, at the very center) for 36 hours while outside the square was deserted except for tanks and soldiers with machine guns. Inside, you can imagine: uncertainty, speculation, every kind of fantastic idea about what was going on, who was overthrowing whom, when it began, when it would end, what would be found for us to eat, how we could get home, how to send assurances to wives (all telephone and telegraph service was cut for several days), etc. I also had the experience of visiting some of Kazantzakis's circle the day after the coup, and seeing the effect. All this may sound very cruel to you, as though to me it was just "an experience," "something to be observed," "excitement"; this is not at all true. Quite the contrary. If I felt myself free, I could explain to you why not, and in great detail, with examples of particular people. But unfortunately I am not free to do this, as letters are censored, and I am taking a good deal of chance merely saying this much. I'm hoping that the censor will become discouraged by the length of this letter and not get this far. Let me just say that one of the most illuminating moments was when two young people, about twenty years old, cursed Kazantzakis violently, and with long and rational and detailed justification, saying that he was an example of precisely what is wrong with intellectuals: their ultimate refusal to take a position, their "ironic" stance that puts them above politics, or enables them always to see both sides. They of course were Marxists, and their ideal of a writer was of course André Malraux (before he became a right-wing apologist for General de Gaulle). In any case, aside from my human involvement in the consequences of this coup, I am also "benefiting"—what a horrible word, in this context—from it, because I really now, for the first time, understand the Greek climate, the climate in which Kazantzakis functioned for forty years. What I mean to say is that this sort of thing (it took me a while to realize this) is what is normal; the few years of democracy and parliamentary government were entirely abnormal. Also, one realizes to what an extent politics invades every aspect of life, and of course especially for someone who was such a public figure as Kazantzakis was. When the government changes, everything stops, first of all; then everybody in high position is fired and replaced with new people who are followers of the junta in power. Everything that has been accomplished in the old régime is rejected out of hand, simply because it was done by the old régime. The net result is that everything, in the long run, remains at a standstill, or goes backward. This is especially true in education. At every change of government, all the textbooks are changed, history is rewritten, the very language (“pure” or “popular”) alters, etc. Faculties, especially at university level, are juggled. I begin to understand, really for the first time, the splendor of our division of powers between the federal government and the states. This local autonomy may mean that Georgia’s education lags behind New York’s, but it also means that those who want to experiment and go forward can do so without fear of intervention from the federal government. I am almost becoming a patriot—almost!

I can’t resist telling you a little about our village; it is so different from Hanover and indeed from any American environment, and so idyllic in its way. First of all, the entire rhythm of life is different. We rise early, walk barefooted on the dirt streets to the baker and buy a loaf of hot, fresh bread. This, with honey, makes breakfast. Then, for the next hour or so my wife runs in and out buying provisions for the day; it is strictly a day-by-day affair; you get just what you’re going to need for dinner, and no more. I say she runs in and out because an endless succession of street-venders passes, each with his cart and his specialty: grocer with tomatoes, potatoes, eggplant, okra, string beans; fish man with last night’s catch (this is a fishing village); fruit man with watermelon, strawberries, cherries, pomegranates, and (soon!) grapes: this is a grape village, too. Then, if you need a piece of cloth, or an extra dish, or some underpants or sunburn lotion, you wait for the appropriate vendor, and buy. All this is changing, of course, with the influx of refrigerators and preserves, also with the building of good roads and the establishment of decent bus service, which enables people to go to the cities to shop. It is the last gasp of the old system (how old? thousands of years) whereby you stayed put and the wandering peddler came to you—also, in the old days, and still to some degree here, the wandering entertainer (Homer?). In this category, things have degenerated somewhat. All we get is gypsies with trained monkeys or bears, singing to the accompaniment of tambourines. But I haven't got much beyond breakfast! From 7:00 or 8:00 until about 2:30 is the "morning." I establish myself in my chair under the acacia tree in the back yard; the boys begin their lessons (alas, they have to keep up with the American mathematics they missed, since we put them in a Greek school for the spring term; we also have a piano and violin, and they practice); Chrysanthi prepares the midday meal and tends to the baby—I forgot to mention, we have a daughter now, aged seven months and named Daphne. At about 1:30 we all go for a swim in the Adriatic; at 2:30 we have our big meal, Greek style (string beans with tomatoes and onions, or fried fish, or eggplant and squash, always with beer or wine—30 cents for a half gallon—and fruit. Then—ah, wonderful—we all go to sleep until 5:00 in the afternoon (all except Daphne, but we try to get her to cooperate). By this time, the heat of the day has subsided, the fishermen are preparing to go out for the night, the shadows are long and sweet. The day begins, as it were, all over again. The children play, I reestablish myself in my chair under a different acacia, and eventually the sun sets. At about 9:00 we all go to a café and have some yoghurt or maybe caviar and oil, for the evening meal. Then: walks, conversation, letter-writing, or just sitting, the latter seeming to be the Greek national pastime. All this is in a semi-tropical setting, which is probably not so strange to you, being a southerner. Our garden has acacias, plums, mulberries. All around us, besides the grapes, are figs, dates, some palms, olives, and of course cypresses. In the fields, just beyond: wheat and acre after acre of vineyards. Life in general is more elemental and certainly more in touch with sun, sea, soil, than we are accustomed to. The meal, as I described above, is a daily concern. The toilets, most often, are Turkish style: namely a hole in the floor, rigged to a flushing system. You squat, like a Chinaman. The weather is a subject of constant concern. If it rains, it's good for the watermelons but not for the grapes and tobacco; if it doesn't rain, the water supply runs out and the watermelons don't swell; if it hails—two months ago we had hail stones as big as plums—it is disaster for tobacco, peaches, cotton. If it's too hot, everything dries up; if it's not hot enough, tourists don't come to the village to go swimming, and the cafés don't do business. Everyone is philosophic. "Life is hard" is the constant refrain, the expression of a fatalism and endurance built up over centuries, and extending to political as well as meteorological difficulties. So the net result, the final reaction, is not to worry excessively, but rather to eat, make children, laugh, dance, sit, and talk. In this way, time passes; the wheel turns; good, one hopes, eventually establishes an equilibrium with bad.

I found to my great relief that Greeks still dance—just like in the movies! But you have to be in a village at "panegyric" time; or, if you're in a city, you have to go to the real dives, where tourists don't go. And that reminds me: how could I have forgotten, when listing all those safe and customary places to go to in Athens, if you can fight your way past the prostitutes, you'll see Greek dancing, not very expert dancing, I'm afraid, but nevertheless very spirited. It's in a cellar more or less opposite the back entrance of the hotel; there isn't a sign, but you'll hear the music. Don't bother going before 10:30 or 11:00 o'clock; it takes time for things to warm up. The place is frequented by young fellows in their teens and twenties—working class: plasterer's mates, electricians' helpers, bellboys, traveling salesmen, gasoline attendants, and the like. They spend their evenings getting drunk on beer, and dancing. If they have enough money and feel in the mood, they go across the street for a girl (more correctly, a harridan); but mostly they just sit in a kind of narcotic torpor, staring at the band, and then suddenly, as though waking from a dream, rising, flinging a 50- or 100-drachma note at the musicians, and dancing. Eventually they all go home to sleep, ready to face another day at work—or, which is just as likely—unemployment.

Fortunately, we were here in the village when their annual festival took place, and I sat in the café until 3:00 a.m. All the women had long since left, and the strange Greek fraternity of the male sex established itself. This is really the extraordinary thing about Greek dancing, at least as compared to dancing as we know it, which is always somehow connected with courtship. Here, it is completely and exclusively male, an expression of masculinity and, somehow, a wordless expression of the fatalism or endurance I spoke of above; perhaps of the rubric "Life is hard." I never realized how local these dances are, or how many of them exist. Here, most were Macedonian, which I had never seen or heard of before. Each area, almost each village, has its own. The variety is striking; there are solitary dances of various types, terribly sinuous and oriental, performed not only on the ground but on top of chairs placed on top of tables; there are duos, where two men, linked together, function as one, defiantly kicking the ground, leaping, dipping, circling; and there are the less exciting group dances, where only the first in line really does anything, and the others simply follow, dancing a very elementary step, until it is their turn to be first in line. The other nice thing about these events is that all ages take part. There were grizzled old fishermen, with gray hair and drooping moustaches, leaping and pirouetting with the youngsters. There was also the village hunchback, who did not dance; and the village idiot, living in a blissful world of his own, who got up every so often and joined the others awkwardly, usually interfering with them, and was always repelled with exquisite gentleness. When I returned home in the wee hours, my wife turned over in bed and said, rather sarcastically, but half in her sleep, "I see you were in your element." Unfortunately, she was wrong. Like the Boss in Zorba the Greek, I don't know how to dance.

As the old saying has it: those who can, can; those who cannot, teach. This is painful to accept, and yet there is a truth in it. Teaching, perhaps like the monasteries in the middle ages, provides a refuge, one fortunately honored by society and of social usefulness, for those who lack a certain vigor and outgoingness, and who probably could never succeed as businessmen, admirals, or politicians. Really, the more I progress in the profession, the more I realize how "soft" and insulated it is. After the first little battle of getting a job and holding it, there is nothing more—only comfort, security, and adulation of post-adolescents who are ever-ready to accord standing ovations to second-rate performers; and an insured pension. It's an immense, caressing, warm featherbed into which one sinks easily, voluptuously, and remains. The whole thing is like a strange dream; not only the parade in those silly robes on graduation day, which revolted you, as indeed it ought; not only this, but the entire proceedings. As Kazantzakis says when he is in his nastiest and most Nietzschean mood: there are two kinds of people, (a) the young, healthy, developing ones who lunge upon the prey of their choice, immorally, and devour and conquer in order to find their place in the sun, to exert their overflowing instincts and strength; and (b) the older, satisfied, satiated, who have already conquered, who have plenty to eat, and whose one urgent desire is now simply to preserve themselves in the comforts that they have attained, and keep others from interfering. The bad dream that I speak of is to see oneself pass inevitably and hopelessly from (a) to (b), knowing that such passage is insidious and wrong, and yet doing nothing about it. It is as though the person who has made this passage, and who now wallows so contentedly in his materialistic insulation, is someone else, a phantom quite distinct from the startled mind that sees how wrong this all is, and yet it is not a phantom: it is you! Things are always relative, of course. That is why a sojourn in Europe, or a knowledge—such as I have gained recently through both experience and my researches—of, for example, the continued struggles of honest men here in Greece, or of Kazantzakis, the most struggling man who ever lived, I should say—gives one a base from which to judge, relatively, the absurdity, the fantastic injustice, of the comforts that we enjoy in America. I'm not arguing from the point of view of the socialist or social ameliorator, who wants better distribution of wealth, and who accuses the comfortable merely because their neighbor is in want; but rather from an absolute point of view that realizes that comfort, in an absolute sense, is the great temptation presented to a true man's manliness: to his vigor, assertiveness, independence. When I think of the way I and my colleagues live in Hanover (and worse, what the students take for granted as their material rights),

I can only see us as so many emasculated Turkish aghas, bloated and narcotized, sitting in our splendidly insulated, heated, and air-conditioned buildings on French provincial couches beneath reproductions of Holbein and Gauguin, while pretty servant-boys administer opium to our egos. Yet, as the saying goes, ya gotta giv da public vot it vants.

Well, I mustn't continue in this bitter vein. I merely wanted to say, in all honesty, that I have an increasingly vivid sense that life has been much too good to me, and that everything has been much too easy. I say all this because I feel, with you, the same freedom that you so graciously say you feel with me. You apologize in your letter for possibly "boring" me with your comments; I am replying at this inordinate length (which I had never intended when I began this letter) because I know very well that you will not be "bored" by what I have to say, just as you knew all too well that I would not be bored by your letter, nor by the letters that I hope will follow. Perhaps you'll send me your impressions of Greece in September; you have the address in England that will find me from September through Christmas; or mail can always be sent to Dartmouth. Better still, I'd like very much to hear about the Navy: what you have done and not done, what the people are like, and what your future plans are. You say in your card that you are anxious to go back to school. Does this mean, as before, religion/philosophy/literature? Or have new directions established themselves? I'm sure you have much more to write about than I do.

Sincerely,

P.S. Regarding your comments about the Swedish girl you met in Cambridge, I agree fully about the superiority of European women; that's why I married one! . . . John Weston renounced law school at the last minute, and is going to Columbia to study literature. Somehow, I still see him as the man to manage my trust funds, not the man to teach me to love beauty.

Suzanna told me that her father, a farmer in Siderokastron, was paid 1 drachma per kilo for string beans—i.e., not enough to pay even for the transportation to market. Potatoes are worse. Crops remain unpicked.

All the villages are being emptied. Chrysanthi went to the hairdresser's. The girl there—she had studied in Paris and was an accomplished practitioner—is paid 2500 drachmas per month. She manages to live only because she rooms with her parents and thus pays no rent. They have a common pot for meals, etc.

We are playing royal hosts to visitors. Elizabeth Keller, Chrysanthi's roommate at Woodbrooke, has come from Heidelberg; Reinoud and Brechtje Oort have come from Den Helder. On top of this, Lola and Kostas are now living in Aghia Triadha, and I rented a room so that Pappous and Yiayia could stay here also. Reinoud is complete with beard and the beginnings of a stomach, but still a fine pianist (also plays recorder, violin, organ) and a true intellectual. As he said, we seemed to take up where we left off 15 years ago, as though no break had intervened, with theological and philosophical discussion. He is a liberal in theology, believer in the higher criticism, etc., but is not always in liberal surroundings in his previous church and in the present one. I should think that his life is very disagreeable, always being expected to be so completely proper and conservative, subject to reproach by the elders, etc. At one point, the other minister of the town was discreetly told not to visit Reinoud lest he be corrupted! Aside from this, the weekly preaching on a text from the Bible, the prayer meetings, catechism, visits to sick and dying, etc., seem (to me at least) an unbearable way to live. How much better to be in the university, with a freer range and with an audience of young people who appreciate new, fresh ideas, passion, creativity, and who hate stuffiness. But I suppose the main thing is the question of belief. Does he really believe in Jesus Christ our Lord and Savior—i.e., what he must preach week after week? If so, then I suppose all else has meaning and is a joyful service. But if not . . . !

Brechtje is not very pretty, though pretty I suppose as Dutch girls go. But she is very feminine and tender and intelligent. She loves to read, and embarrassed me by her questions relating to all the English and American novels she had read and I hadn't (including Peyton Place, which Reinoud read too, and admired as a λαογραφικό of small-town American life). I told him about the police court in Lebanon and the experience of Peter Gardner's brother-in-law in Whitehall.

We talk, spend long hours over meals, long hours in the water swimming and talking. Today, up to our necks in the Salonika Gulf, we discussed Bergson, Kant, biblical criticism. We play the piano: Mozart symphonies 4-hands with me trying desperately to do my half decently, and of course failing. Tomorrow they go off to Thasos and Philippi. Next week, after Konrad Elsdon arrives, if all goes well, we'll spend some days at the "Ἁγιον"Ορος.

August 2, 1967

Noel Jones, ex-president of the Quaker School here, appeared unexpectedly with his daughter Katherine, now an immensely overweight balloon of 16 years. We talked politics and old times. He said that Bruce Lansdale told him that a British MP (Noel-Baker) told him that the British ambassador told him that the CIA was not directly involved in planning this particular coup on this particular day, but that certainly in a general way the CIA, as well as Bruce and lots of other people, knew a coup was coming. Apparently the CIA at least made the colonels feel that the U.S. would support such a move should it be the last ditch stand against communism. But this is obviously all 10th hand if that.

What amused me more was Jones's belief that I had chased after Chrysanthi on a motorbike and had driven on this mythical bike all the way from England to Salonika in a record time of three days. I explained to him the reality on which this lovely Lindsay-created myth was based—that I had an old policeman's bicycle that I had purchased for £1.0.0. This I shipped across to Ostend, where I saw Chrysanthi off for Greece. Then I cycled through Belgium and southern Holland, placed the bike on the train and went to Assen to see Reinoud, then by bike to Groningen, Leeuwarden to see Riek Kleefstra, then down the dike to Amsterdam, where I stayed, then to Rotterdam for three days, then to Paris for a month doing research on Saint Francis in the Bibliothèque Nationale and living in the Service Civil camp in Clichy, until finally—that is, about two months after Chrysanthi and I had parted—I traveled to Greece by train with my bike but did indeed ride it from the rail station to Sarantaporou, where I appeared in a state that might have led people to believe that I had indeed cycled all the way from England in three days!

Asked why I didn't follow Chrysanthi directly, I told Jones that I had to give her two months at least, to prepare Lindsay and her parents for the shock of my arrival and my intentions.

Felicity, Roland, and Nikos, after five days driving in hot weather—exhausted. Sheila very nervous and ornery, as before. Almost ready for a mental hospital, I'd say: depressive type, melancholy, eats up her own soul, especially about unimportant things. All day long the question is whether or not she is going to buy a bikini. She had nagged Konrad apparently for the whole trip, crying she wanted one, and then when he said with a twinkle in his eye, let's go and get one, she reneged and could not be persuaded. But no humor, no deep laugh—acts as though the world came systematically out to destroy her. Usual hypochondriacal aggravations as well: bad back, she can't help with the tent, or lift anything, and then of course immediately after arriving in Greece: diarrhea.

Konrad copes beautifully. Humors her, knows when to concede a point, when to try to change the subject, etc. He is another hero of the marital war. He is now an HMI: Her Majesty's Inspector of schools, like Matthew Arnold, what the Greeks would call ένας ανώτατος δημόσιος υπάλληλος, top rank in civil service, the policy-making level. Talks freely and fluently about his own affairs and accomplishments, but isn't a good listener. Apparently he holds a position of immense prestige. Noel Jones had met him once at a conference, and when I mentioned Konrad's name and said we were expecting him, Noel looked up with awe-struck eyes: "He's an HMI, you know!"

August 3, 1967

To Κερδύλια with Ζήσης Γιανούρας to see Ritsa and Stereos. When we returned, Elizabeth told me that she had read a book in German about the typical German businessman of these times, and that Ζήσης seemed to fit the description even though he was Greek. They form an international breed. Conversation consisted of how close he was to the big boss, how the latter was about to visit him, how they were on a first-name basis, how cultured the owners were—hours full of books, archeology as a hobby, etc. How cultured he himself was: loves music, goes to Salzburg every year (well, not exactly every year). At home he has 200 records—200!—and 4000 books. I wanted to ask when he had last counted them, but restrained myself. He'd been to Beirut six times. I asked Elizabeth if she'd been to the Casino, or had seen the greatest show on earth or knew such and such a hotel, never realizing that she hadn't gone on an expense account. Also, repeated talk about his desire for responsibility, the millions of marks that passed through his fingers, etc.

He worked 72 hours a week but it was worth it because he wanted, and had, responsibility. Yet, withal, such a fine chap, and so wonderfully hospitable. He outdid himself for us, rented a room so we could sleep, and this afternoon insisted on treating us all to lunch, though it was really my turn, etc. We spent a truly lazy day, Greek style: sat and talked, then swam, ate, slept, sat, drank coffee. Chrysanthi was away from Daphne for the whole day, the first time in seven months (no, except for the εκδρομή with Petsas). We came back a little later than expected and her parents rushed to the car crying «Γιατί αργήσατε, γιατί; Είπατε να είστε εδώ στις 7 και είναι τώρα 9:30». Chrysanthi lit up at once: «Περάσαμε θαυμάσια μέρα, πρώτη φορά που έφυγα από τη Δάφνη και τώρα μου τη φαρμακώσατε!» Of course peace was restored quickly, since Dimitrios, like Chrysanthi herself, has the wonderful quality of giving way easily, not standing on his dignity. But afterwards I mentioned to Chrysanthi, «Να μάθης από αυτό, γιατί πολλές φορές αυτό που σου έκανε ο μπαμπάς σου εσύ μου το έκανες εμένα».

Next to Ritsa's cottage came another businessman, the holder of the exclusive franchise for northern Greece of the locally made τρίκυκλα. He was ugly, fat, with breasts like a woman's, but very pleasant and, as often with Greeks, strangely and unexpectedly tender with children. I asked him if it was true that business was bad under the new régime, and he said, "Yes, it was indeed very bad. Why? Because they won't let us steal and cheat anymore—that's why!"

Surprises come. Three years ago Noel Jones sent his daughter Katherine and son Christopher, then about 15, to us here in Aghia Triadha to go swimming and spend the day. Yesterday, when he came with a metamorphosed Katherine but without Christopher, whom they had left in England, he told me that Christopher had remembered that day as the most splendid of his whole stay in Greece. Strange! Maybe because I talked with him man to man, "intellectually"? I can't think of any other reason.

Speaking with the local representative of the grape-growers' cooperative. Last year the farmers got 1.75 drachmas per kilo for the grapes sent to Germany. The state gave a subsidy of 0.50, making the total 2.25. They sell in Germany for about 4 marks per kilo, or 30 drachmas. The Greek grapes have to arrive early in August before the Italian, because the Italians can undersell. Italy has some thousands of refrigerated freight cars for shipping; Greece has only a handful. Last year was a particularly bad year. This year, with the rains and now the great heat, they hope to do better—that is, to earn 2.50 or 3.00 drachmas per kilo.

Salonika–Ouranoupolis

To Ouranoupolis with Reinoud by bus over twisting, frightening roads, forests, plains, now and then a village, up a mountain via reverse curves, then down gradually. Women in the seat opposite throwing up copiously. As Konrad says, that is part of the feminine mystique in Greece. Suddenly, at the foot of the descent, the extraordinary town of Αρναία. Central square surrounded by old style buildings with hanging balconies, but on each balcony a full grape arbor, hanging clusters of grapes just turning purple. Yesterday, lying on the beach at Aghia Triadha, we were discussing happiness. I mentioned Peter Janicke's report. Who is most happy? The Greek with his uncertainty yet his lovely extroversion and ability to entertain himself, or the American with his emptiness, health, and opportunity? In Αρναία I felt that true happiness is to be able to walk out onto your balcony amidst flowers, in August, and pick ripe grapes from the arbor above your head.

After Αρναία, the sea, first just a glimpse, then you are on top of it, hanging over it, on top of a cliff, afraid the bus will topple over. Finally, nearer to Ουρανούπολις, you ride comfortably beside it, 22 km of dirt roads, narrow, through trees, twisting through villages. The end of the world, it would seem, but suddenly the sight of a taxi belies this. Ξενία hotel; signs in English. Then the tower, which stands on a promontory: Mrs. Locke's tower, build by Andronicus II for his wife to wait in while he contemplated on Athos. We arrived at 2:30 and ate in a café by the sea. Sitting there, luckily, was Ηρακλής ο μαραγκός, who directed us to Konrad. They were sleeping. The νοικοκύρης obligingly told us to help ourselves to any shady tree we wished, and to lie down. Which we did, beneath an olive. Noises. To the left, chickens laying, roosters boasting. To the right, donkey hee-hawing. Straight ahead, bus driver and friends laughing. I tried to sleep, my handkerchief over my face. "Real Greek style," as Reinoud commented. He, not yet Hellenized, began writing up his diary. Too soon, Konrad appeared. Welcome, etc. Immediately, however, the strange bad news. Sheila was having her fits. Her diarrhea had continued a little, was now improving, but despite this she insisted that they return at the end of the week to England. They had come for a month! What to say? She is a manic depressive and belongs in a psychiatric clinic. In any case, Konrad would come with us to Athos. Good!

Where to go? We'd have to go to the tower and consult with Noel Jones, who was planning a boating party tomorrow, swimming on the island opposite, or maybe around Athos. Sounds like an E. M. Forster novel. To the tower. Met Mrs. Locke, whose memory comes and goes. Didn't really recall Chrysanthi. Her rugs on the walls in a lovely room in the tower, with western view over the sea; books, chairs, trunks. It was time for tea. We were in England. "Do you take milk or lemon?" asks Mrs. Jones. I was stuffed from my large Greek lunch, but I took lemon, American style. Noel Jones, who had been very effusive and demonstrative while alone with us in Aghia Triadha, was strangely transformed in his all-English tearoom in Andronicus's tower. Proper, deliberative, restrained. Other "celebrants" were Mrs. Locke's Swiss "companion" and a Greek gentleman from the Bank of Greece. Where to in Athos? Big deliberations. Maps. Konrad announced solemnly: Our objective is (a) architectural, (b) artistic, (c) historical. Jones added details of distances. We had the guides in front of us, full of information. Suddenly I said, "Let's go where we feel like, when we get there: ότι μας καπνίζει. The Greek gentleman lit up: Bravo! Greek versus English mentality. I obviously am "Greek," as I discovered bluntly when I entered this "tearoom." To shout, gesticulate, be indiscreet, etc. is a thousand times better than to be efficient and dull.

Swimming on Ouranoupolis's beach. Rocks full of sea urchins. We changed on a balcony of Mrs. Locke's tower. The W.C. is a hole in the stonework, leading to where no one knows. In use 500+ years and not yet full.

Met Konrad at 8:00 p.m. by arrangement to have dinner. He said that Sheila was in one of her "states" again, and had decided she had to clean the house. She'd meet us later. Restaurant on the street, outdoors, because Konrad doesn't like jukeboxes. Crowded. Owner-waiter pressed, but incapable of moving faster or more efficiently because he is a Greek! After the meal, this sweet man came and apologized: δεν μπορούσα να σας περιποιηθώ. As Konrad says, the Greeks have a lovely dignity and grace. We, as usual, behaved more like barbarians, calling repeatedly for the water that he had failed to provide, the retsina he'd forgotten, etc.

Sheila arrived, and a pall fell over the company. Did she want to eat? She didn't know. Konrad very gentle and saintly as usual. Children quiet, obviously understanding, and embarrassed. These meals are nice to have over. Konrad went home; rendezvous 6:00 a.m. the next day.

Reinoud and I hadn't decided whether to rent a room for the night or to sleep on the beach. Earlier, we'd asked the tavern keeper for a room. Now we asked again, but also asked if one could sleep on the beach. I liked the way this man, who stood to gain a night's rent, suddenly glowed and said: Στην άμμο, στην άμμο να κοιμηθήτε. Κι εγώ, αυτές οι νύχτες που κάνει ζέστα, παίρνω τα σεντόνια μου και κοιμάμαι εκεί δίπλα στη θάλασσα. So we chose our site, like two dogs ready to urinate, circling every tree. Stars, the soft lapping of the waves, utter silence. I placed my T-shirt on the ground, rolled up my shorts for a pillow, and stretched out on my stomach, deliciously. But soon the wind rose; cold; no blankets, no sweaters (Chrysanthi had told me to take my heavy shirt, but I "knew better"). We moved further back on the beach, to a more protected spot, and managed to sleep several hours. Up at 5:00 a.m. Barefoot, trousers rolled up, I washed in the sea, tasting the salt water. The soap wouldn't lather; it felt like soft leather on my face. But this, and then shaving in the sea, was a great pleasure. A βάρκα came from the island opposite. A family. The mother and father jumped out, playfully, knee-deep in the water. The children, the oldest perhaps 12, turned the boat around and putted back home. A lovely scene at 5:00 a.m. The elements of transportation, a scene repeated for thousands of years, with the only difference being the motor.

The night before, in the café, sudden laughter. The village idiot, a dwarf, had jumped up and begun dancing to the jukebox music. A strange amalgam of grace and childish spasmodic motions. He kicked, circled, shrieked, enjoying the laughter and encouragement of the others. Another primordial scene: pre-television. The village and its "theater": the fool. Reinoud thought it cruel that the others should laugh at him; I didn't. He was finding his place, his own kind of esteem in the village context. Better than having him in an institution, by far.

Ouranoupolis-Daphne-Karyes-Iviron

The boat carries a few monks, one with sacks of sugar and a big roll of garden hose; many tourists. The captain enjoyed having his picture taken by Reinoud and asked to have a copy. Primitive steering: the rudder pole directed by frayed cords on double pulleys, so the captain could lean over the side and see what was ahead. Single cylinder diesel engine, vibration unbearable at first, but how quickly one becomes accustomed. Konrad and I sat in the stern. After a little prompting, he told me about Sheila. Single child from a “deathly respectable” loveless divorced home. Incapable of giving or receiving love. She had a complete breakdown in 1955, was confined to bed for months, helpless, then another bad time last year when she had a “bad back” for six months and was in traction in bed. Refuses all help; won’t take tranquilizing drugs; won’t see psychiatrist, although she was an outpatient for a time in 1955. Has always refused to go on vacations, but has often enjoyed them once she had been convinced to start out. But not this time. She has sabotaged it from the start, and now insists they go home. Worst of all, she is taking all her spite and desperation out on Konrad, and has now begun, for the first time in this long sad history, to try to turn the children against him, to make them feel that they must choose between the two parents. In any case, Konrad was glad to get away from home for a few days. Perhaps his absence will provide some temporary relief, perhaps the reverse. What a hell, such a life!

Daphne. Soldiers, police, customs inspectors. Hardware store. A trinket shop, café, cases of beer, ouzo, brandy. The chaos of embarkation-disembarkation. Our passports, the papers we got from Αλλοδαπών. As always, there was someone who had no papers, but they let him pass: a Uniate Catholic priest who had his letter from the Πατριάρχης but no letters from the Υπουργείον. Then there was the American student in curls down to his shoulders. Δεν επιτρέπεται! He bought a hat and stuffed his hair inside, and looked much better. A French boy had shorts. Δεν επιτρέπεται! He bought a pair of trousers, ridiculously too large and baggy for him. I was in my T-shirt. Δεν επιτρέπεται! I put on my good shirt. Later, this same old man whose job was to insure the respectability of the “pilgrims” was reprimanded severely by a policeman for pushing (gently) one of the foreigners into the bus. Οι ξένοι δεν θεν σπρόξιμο. Obviously the new government was at work here, with a reformed constabulary.

There were too many people, so we couldn’t all fit in the small, ancient bus that now goes between Δαφνή and Καρηές on a road built by the army for the millennium celebrations in 1963. The police said a truck would come down and get us. After an hour, still no truck. I went to the policeman. “The prettiest police station I’ve ever seen,” said Konrad, and indeed, though the building was unexceptional, the balconies were filled with flowerpots and vines: flowers, grapes, happiness. We ate; eventually the truck came. Reinoud very restless, but I told him we had now entered a new time scheme, that of eternity, and he should learn how to sit and wait, like a Greek. We ate γεμιστές, μπάμιες, beer. Down came the truck. The driver descended, filled a bucket with water a few times, and cooled the radiator by heaving the water onto the radiator screen. Side-racks and benches, about 20 people, some cargo: the frightening ascent, mostly in first gear, along the twisting road. Sheer drops, no fences, rocks and sea below. Bouncing; mules on the road; another truck coming in the opposite direction. We held our breaths and prayed. But the views were extraordinary: the boundless, calm sea, here and there a fishing boat, Athos with its forests, ravines, an occasional skete. Then suddenly a view of the peak itself, rising abrupt to a point, like the diagram of Dante’s Mount Purgatory. The truck climbs continually. You pass one large monastery, Χεροποτάμου: olive groves, terracing on the mountainside. Then sharply up again. Wilderness, impossible terrain. And then, over a hump and a gentle decline, whereupon, miraculously, in the middle of nowhere, incongruously, appears Καρυές—a whole city, it seems, dominated by the immense monastery in the center. Domes, Byzantine τρούλοι, tiled roofs. Narrow streets. Shops, scaffolding, construction in progress. A restaurant-café. We proceeded to the police and were issued a paper to take to the προτάτον. But because we had missed the bus it was now noon and everything was closed. More sitting. Reinoud becoming increasingly reconciled. Café. Πορτοκαλάδες. I struck up a conversation with a farmer who had come from near Νιγρίτα to see a monk. The usual questions: Οι μαύροι στην Αμερική, τι θέλουνε, γιατί φωνάζουν; Γιατί δεν τους δίνετε την ελευθερία που θέλουνε; I tried to explain. The conversation turned to Christopher Columbus and American Indians. He also told us tales that turned out to be Aesop, although he claimed he was illiterate. We passed the time. At 3:30 the προτάτον. It was a surprise to see all the lay people in Karyes: shop owners, workers, kinds of servants. Also young boys, adolescents. The boy who served coffee to the Holy Fathers in the protaton was indeed young, fuzzy-cheeked, very dangerous for the monks! Finally: papers all in order. Fee of 100 drachmas. We ran to catch the bus to Ιβήρων.

So far, our trip had been anything but efficient. We had spent almost two full days, and by 4:00 p.m. of the second had just managed to obtain permits to visit the monasteries, though of course the “getting there” was also tricky. But our luck now changed for the better.

The entrance to Ιβήρων is astonishing. You turn a corner and suddenly are faced by grandeur. At this particular moment, the courtyard in front of the monastery was filled with pack mules, each with its bell. Sweet tinklings in the air. The πορτάρης greeted us. Ευχαρίστως, μάλιστα, μπορείτε να μείνετε εδώ. Θέλετε να πάτε στο ξενώνα, ή στην εκκλησία πρώτα; Στην εκκλησία, we answered. We passed into the inner courtyard. At that moment the campanile began to sing. One huge booming bell, boong, boong; one carillon playing a lovely melody, and two or three high-pitched ding-dongs like the mixture on an organ, all going at once. I felt chills down my spine. The peace, the beauty and strangeness of the monastic buildings, the monks, who seemed creatures from some other world, all added together, produced this perhaps sentimental yet very moving response.

We had arrived at the moment when the daily Vesper services were beginning. The church, like the one at Karyes opposite the protaton, is absolutely staggering in its richness. Frescoes on every square inch of wall space, a benign Pantokrator in the dome (no dome in Karyes), baroquely ornate solid-gold frames for the icons, candle-holders of gigantic proportions, and, hanging from the ceiling, a huge Byzantine crown perhaps twenty feet in diameter (also in Karyes).

The service was beautiful, although it lost its effect for me because of its length. We were very few: the celebrant, in a brilliant green surplice; the two choruses, left and right, a rather indifferent and sarcastically smiling monk who only yodeled the Χριστός ελέεισον, a few older monks in the shadows, in various corners and about twenty visitors. We all sat in the στασίδια. The chant and the psaltery were entirely different from what is heard in Orthodox churches “in the world”—perhaps a more pure survival of the Byzantine rite. Very beautiful. The monks had fine rich voices. One very old man, in particular, boomed out his sections as though his life depended upon it. The church reverberated his words. Another monk, even older, insisted on persevering when two younger monks next to him offered to take the text and relieve him. Though he faltered a bit, he brought his section to a close. Cf. Yeats: "An aged man is but a paltry thing, / A tattered coat upon a stick, unless / Soul clap its hands and sing, and louder sing / For every tatter in its mortal dress." The service includes an impressive, stylized candle-lighting. From all over the ναός the candelabra are lowered on their cords, which are rigged to pulleys and controlled by the monks in the shadows in various corners. Candles are lit; then the cords are drawn up and secured. At the end of the service, the monks extinguished the lights, again in a stylized way, with huge fans at the end of poles blowing them out, in effect. The singing, the monks, the building are all as though from some other world, the fabled Byzantium of Yeats's poems. The men that created and now continue this expression of the human spirit seem a biologically, qualitatively different species from the men who built New York. Both are beautiful, each in its own way, but this seems a dead tradition interested only in preserving itself in face of the intrusions of modernism. Yet it is infinitely touching to be here in these monasteries, where so many of the monks are elderly and the others well past middle age, and to realize that an expression that has lasted here 1000 years and grew up during a period of at least 800 years before these monasteries were founded, is soon to be extinguished. I asked a monk about this, a talkative old man on the caique to Daphne. He said the only thing that he could say: that God, and in particular the Virgin, will provide the solution. A way will be found to preserve the monasteries by divine means. And if not, that will be God's wish too.

We visited the Ιβήρων library; ο πάτηρ Αθανάσιος, aged 82, presided. When we entered, he was reading a Salonika newspaper, and he grumbled openly at being disturbed. We scattered like mice over the cases, ready to nibble. These libraries are treasure houses, full of manuscripts, incunabula, early printed books. I was opening a fine copy of an early Venetian gospel in Greek, when Athanasios suddenly threw us all out, unceremoniously. The monasteries here, in the summer months, have become small scale Eifel Towers; every day the crowds (15 to 25) come, are ushered hurriedly through the libraries, and καθολικός εκκλησίες, told that this is the 10th century, that is so-and-so's grave, this is one of two extant copies of Dioscurus's Biology, etc. Then they leave, without even a thank you. The monks are reduced to becoming guides for several hours a day, and it is no wonder that so many that we have met are sullen and glum toward the visitors.

The guest-master, however, was all κέφι and courtesy, serving us λουκούμι, raki, water—young, bouncy, fluent in broken German, with a smattering of English words: “OK, boy!” We later learned that he is Ιωάννης Διαμαντόπουλος, studying for the priesthood in the monastery only for six months and destined to go to the seminary in Boston (!) shortly. I gave my address, and hope to return the hospitality he showed us. . . . Supper: lentils; olives; hard, dry bread; water. After supper, cigarettes on the balcony. Long talk with a dark bespectacled Greek who turned out to be a theologian. From him I learned a good deal about the Ορθόδοξο πνεύμα as against what he called the δυτικό πνεύμα. It was strange to hear a young man so conservative. Orthodoxy’s mission, he said, is to defend and preserve ορθή δόξα, correct doctrine, against all invasions and influences. This means a firm belief in the divine inspiration of the Bible, in the holiness of the saints, in the incarnation, the efficacy of the sacraments, etc. From these basic dogmas, he said, Orthodoxy will not and must not budge an inch. He was scandalized recently, he said, to hear of a Protestant minister who, from the pulpit, suggested that the resurrection was a myth invented by the first Christians. He condemned the western spirit of individual inquiry, rationalism, scholarship, saying, quite rightly, that this breaks up the unity of any body and destroys one’s deep roots in faith. Orthodoxy has those roots, he said, and also has a strong unity—indeed, it is monolithic, all of one piece. It doesn’t want individual inquiry, nor permit it. It is sure in its beliefs, and thus sees no need of change. I tried to say that the conditions of the middle ages are no longer valid in an age of science and that the western churches recognize this fact and try to make religion rational to some degree, or at least to speak with new symbols, new phraseology that the contemporary man can understand. He replied by saying that the astronauts verified, as they circled the earth, that God must exist: the universe was so overwhelming. At this point, the discussion really could not go much further. We both learned that we have mutually exclusive ways of thought, and perhaps gained some respect for the opposite camp, even though disagreeing. In addition, I realized more deeply than before why the Church had to oppose Kazantzakis, also that the opposition wasn’t necessarily stupidity and bigotry (it is so easy for us to substitute slander for argument) but rather the outgrowth of a way of thought wholly antithetical to Kazantzakis's and strongly opposed to his western freethinking. Insofar, also, as the Orthodox Church does form the Greek culture—its unity, its assuredness about its own values, its past and its history—then the Church was quite correct in saying that Kazantzakis was anti-Greek and non-Greek in spirit.

Sleep. Thin mattress over rough boards. Very tired. I slept through, soundly, while the monks, from 2:00 a.m. to 5:00 or 6:00, recited the liturgy. (They sleep afterwards in the morning hours, before noon.)

Iviron-Vatopedi-Lavra

Rise at 5:00 a.m. Boat to Vatopedi. By now we had found friends along the route, people who had been on the boat from Ouranoupolis and had followed the same route as we had. Three Americans: a young professor of Slavic from Cornell, with a nice moustache; a Cornell graduate student with a beard; and another Cornell student with a beard and also hair down to his shoulders. All Jews. The last very Semitic looking, like an orthodox rabbi. All three had been in prison in Greece for 20 days, where the professor had learned much Greek. They wouldn't tell me the offense. Also a Uniate Catholic priest with a red beard, whom we talked with at Lavra; two sexy French teenagers in jeans and cowboy hats; a Greek high school teacher from Salonika and a friend of his, with whom I had a long talk on the last day as we went from Άγιος Παύλος to Δαφνή.

Vatopedi's entrance is also beautiful. The πεζούλι, the pavilion outside in which the monks or visitors can rest and cool off before entering the monastery; the huge oleanders; the placid mules with their tinkling bells, grazing or carrying piles of wood strapped to their sides. The ritual of welcome: coffee this time, no raki or γλυκό. We went off to the library, which is one of the most impressive on Athos. Several storeys high, everything catalogued and ordered, rare books in cases—unlike Iviron. The βιβλιοθηκάρχης gave the usual speech: This is an eleventh-century gospel; this is an octateuch; this is a parchment book of hours of the twelfth century, and so forth. Afterwards he asked what faiths we were. He said it didn't matter, that Protestants are human too, all Christians have some value even if they haven't been baptized (i.e., are not members of the Orthodox Church). All the monks showed a kindly tolerance toward us "heretics," their kindness based on the firm assurance that they alone were following the true road and that the truth of this road was so evident that heavy proselytizing was not even necessary. All one has to do is think, reflect, study the Holy Fathers, and it will be evident to any reasonable man that Orthodoxy is the true way (so the Αρχο-ντάρης at Άγιος Παύλος told me). I also asked the librarian how he felt when the fire broke out last year in the cloister next to the library (I had seen a photograph projected during Petsas's lecture in Salonika). He replied: "If God had wanted the library to be burned, it would have been burned. I wasn't frightened because I knew that whatever happened would be God's will."

The τράπεζα, not used now in this idiorhythmic monastery, is beautiful and unique. Also very modern in feeling. There are marble tables, each a slab shaped like a backwards "D," surrounded by benches with indentations in various places around the periphery, perhaps because in the old days the food was deposited directly on the stone and the monks, over the years, wore away the marble with their spoons. Frescoes everywhere. Two modest saints, naked, with long beards covering their private parts. A raised pulpit for the αναγνώστης. Apse for the abbot and his elders. We spent much time here, together with the French lads, because it was the feast of Saint Pantoleimon and the monk in charge of showing the church was absent, off somewhere in a κελλι saying his devotions. We waited several hours for him, talking, sitting outside on the πεζούλι writing this journal. The cat with her kittens. There are some females on the Holy Mountain!

Frescoes on front of the καθολικόν. Especially the sections on the last judgment. Rivers (literally) of blood cascading the sinners down into the jaws of death and hell. Beasts—jaguars, salamanders, lions—devouring people; they're depicted with a head or a hand or a foot still sticking out of the beasts' mouths. The faces of the people being devoured are strangely blank and expressionless; they are like wooden dolls. True "primitive" art by unschooled and unskilled painters, although the composition is effective and the sadism and love of the macabre are bewitching. Finally we were taken hurriedly through the καθολικόν by our guide, who obviously found this very distasteful.

Hospitality at the Holy Mountain varies considerably. Gold, Byzantine splendor, baroque clutter. Famous icons: the Βηματάρισα, η Εσφαγμένη. Relics: splinter of the true cross, girdle of the Virgin, cranium of Saint Demetrios of Thessaloniki. “Those who wish to do obeisance, do so; the others may pass and look.” As always, the priest had to keep people from crossing in front of the Holy Altar, which only the priest saying the mass may do. One has to be vigilant, careful not to infringe rules of behavior, dress, posture. No crossed legs, no hands behind the back, no exposed flesh in church. The crowd, this time, was full of officious Greeks who wanted to be shown everything—and quickly. They probably “count monasteries” and relics too, so that they can go back home and give a quantitative account of their experience: “I visited 16 monasteries and venerated 72 relics!” But not all were like this. I had a lovely chat with an old monk. —Πότε ήλθατε εδώ, πάτηρ; —(fresh laugh, twinkle) Πόσα χρονώ είσαι, παιδί μου; —Τριάντα εφτά. —Λοιπόν, είσαι ακόμα μικρό. Εγώ ήλθα εδώ σε 1905! —Σας ενοχλούμε ασφαλώς. Τι εντύπωση έχετε του τουρισμού αυτού; He then began telling a story about Turks and Greeks. I thought he had not understood, or that his mind was wandering. But no. It was a parable to illustrate what he wanted to say in reply to my question: Μας ενοχλείτε εάν δεν οφειλείτε. Εάν όμως καταλαμβάνετε κάτι από τη ζωή και την πίστη μας, χαϊρόμαστε.

We were then given our lunch of bean soup and olives. I hardly ate. The bread was dry, hard, tasteless; it seemed to fill your mouth with ashes. No wonder the monks develop such pouches. It isn't that they overeat; it's that they eat so much starch. Also, their posture in the στασίδα tends to make the abdomen distend.

Midday. Κάψα. We went to the pavilion to await the μοτοράκι. Reinoud left us to walk to Iviron, but soon returned, having lost his way. The conversation with the stuttering πορτάρης, the only stutterer I've encountered in Greece; the Belgians; Reinoud's joy in being able to speak his own language. I stretched out on the bench, a handkerchief over my face. Mule bells; smell of oleanders; divine silence. Afterwards we refreshed ourselves at the fountain, and descended the rocky path to the quay. Reinoud left us at Iviron because he wanted to return to his wife. Strange how soft and feminine and uxorious he is. When I returned, Chrysanthi, who had of course spent the days with Brechtje, told me how she herself laughed at her husband's concern. He was all hesitations about leaving her for three whole days, whereas she was happy to be alone, though of course she couldn't say this. How easily we disguise our own weakness and need by convincing ourselves that we are harm to others!

Konrad and I continued on to Μεγάλη Λαύρα. The restored tower on the seashore is strange: poured concrete. Weary from a day of fasting, hot, with headache, I started to climb to the monastery. But after a few yards we came upon a roadside full of the lopped branches of a mulberry tree, full of huge, ripe mulberries. Konrad and I were shameless in our plundering of these branches. Berries had, for me, always been a delicacy; now they were almost a necessity. Instead of the usual leisurely hike on full stomach, looking for berries, this was a meal sent to the starving, as though from heaven. While the other visitors continued up the path, Konrad and I gorged ourselves, gleaning every last ripe and edible fruit. My hands were blood red, my lips, my handkerchief—I looked as though I'd been severely wounded. Fortunately there was one of the fountains one always finds near the monasteries, and I was able to wash most of the stain away.

As we approached the entrance, we saw a monk driving a huge Mercedes Benz bulldozer. Lavra was the great disappointment of the trip. First, it is architecturally very ugly, an inorganic oversized mass of disparate buildings; secondly, it is always visited, and thus besieged by crowds. The guest-master was gruff and perfunctory; we were herded around like a busload of tourists in Paris or Rome. Rush to library, a new, separate building. Usual spiel, made comical-annoying by the presence of an officious Greek who insisted on elaborating—e.g., explaining to us in detail who Plutarch was, that he had written a book called Plutarch's Lives, etc. (we had been shown a manuscript of Plutarch among the other treasures). Konrad was very annoyed. By now it was very dark. We were herded off to the καθολικόν, which could hardly be seen any more. Frescoes, icons, two-minute tour. A Greek man kept rushing in and out, trying to convince the guide to hurry us over to the “treasure room” before darkness set in completely. Two-minute tour of the church; then to the treasure, all in a new museum with glass cases. Crosses, stoles, Fokas's dress uniform, Fokas's crown. Konrad, completely fed up by this time, chose to wait outside. The only thing that sweetened my heart in Lavra was the gigantic cypress tree, supposedly planted by Saint Athanasios himself (his tomb is in the church) and dominating the central courtyard. Planting trees is a good thing to do, something I should do more of—a way of temporary, relative immortality, of being remembered maybe, if you're lucky. Kazantzakis says that there are three things every man should do before he dies: plant a tree, build a house, and write a book.

Supper of beans again. Poor me! Hard bread. Bad wine. Conversation on the balcony. Konrad and I sat with the Uniate Catholic, a young fellow from Canada, of Ukrainian background, in appearance something like a Brethren or Mennonite. All through our stay, what marvelous conversation! Not a superficial thought; everyone seemed pared to essentials, as though aware from the very atmosphere of Ἀθῶς that only essential things matter. What joy to turn to people one has never seen before and to plunge immediately into the great questions: What is God, where is the world headed, why are you here, what are we doing or failing to do with our lives, which kind of religious expression is most valid? Not a moment of the desultory chitchat of the outside world, the horrible groping for contact that occurs normally when strangers or near-strangers come together and have to talk to one another, as at Hanover dinner parties. It was the spirit of a pilgrimage, and strangely I realize this only now, as I write this a few days later in Aghia Triadha. At the time, it did not occur to me, and I am glad, for I was too much inside the experience to have been able to look at it as though from outside and say to myself, consciously: now I am on a true pilgrimage, with other pilgrims. Together, we are searching for something we can call spiritual, for an essence, and finding it perhaps first and foremost in our own intense concern.

My Uniate friend—they are really Orthodox in tradition and rite but have joined with the Catholic Church—tried to explain to me the true significance of icon-worship and why this is so vital in the Eastern Church. “I’ve always seen this,” I said, “as a kind of left-over paganism, or the debasement of a truly spiritual religion. The pagans wanted gods who were tangible, accessible; icons provide this in the Christian context. But the pagans had the advantage of openly desiring such tangible gods while the Orthodox Church, on the one hand, preaches a God who is “spiritual,” not of human form, completely “other,” and on the other hand offers idols to its communicants because of their need for the tangible and accessible. This is less than sincere.” “No,” he said. “The icons, most deeply, are not a concession to man’s inability to derive consolation from a God who is wholly spiritual. Nor,” continued my friend, “are they pagan survivals in Christianity and at odds with the true spirit of Christianity. On the contrary. Christianity’s unique and central dogma is this: that God became flesh.” “But only at a single moment in history.” “Yes, at a single moment in history, but also in a way that transcends that moment. The saints, for the Orthodox Christian, are a continuous reconfirmation that the divine can reside in the mundane and that spirit can be discovered in the flesh. This is why the saints are venerated. When we think of the entire communion of saints, which stretches across history and from one land to another, giving us feast days all through the year, we can sense the continuity of this divine miracle and can know that the historical incarnation, while historical, is also vital to us today, and living, and meta-historical. This is what the Orthodox worshiper feels when he approaches and venerates the icon. The saints, for him, are living; they are friends; they are close to him; he has his “favorites”; he identifies specific saints with specific occasions or problems. And, most centrally, they reconfirm to him the central Christian fact: the incarnation of God.”

To bed. Konrad on his air mattress, on the floor. He is 6 foot 4 inches and cannot fit into Greek beds. One of our companions, a Greek, couldn’t resist a remark about Procrustes. The officious Greek, the one who had lectured us about Plutarch, kept referring to me as ο γαμπρός της Ελλάδος. Quiet, the lamp turned down. Stifling heat. Someone in the corner tossing continually; the bed squealing at full voice. I kept being bitten, on the ankles, arms, head, but didn’t hear the sound of mosquitoes. Fleas? With this thought, I couldn’t sleep. I think they were mosquitoes, after all.

The gruff servant roused us at 4:00 a.m. so that we could catch the συγκοινωνία. Konrad and I had decided to retrace our tracks and return to Iviron, rather than continuing around the tip of Athos, mainly because to do the latter we would have had to wait until 2:30 in the afternoon, and we did not want to spend any more time at Lavra, which had given us such a poor reception (though really the fault was not the monks’ but simply the fact of too many visitors all at once). I dressed, washed, shaved. Complete darkness, the lamps still burning. Down to the courtyard. The monks had been worshipping since 2:00 a.m. We went past St. Athanasios’s tree to the καθολικόν. How beautiful to enter a church in the darkness! Low chanting from the depths; the only illumination comes from a few candles. Left and right in the shadows, hardly discernible, are the monks, supporting themselves in their στασίδια. Patriarchal figures. Their gorgeous faces, long white beards, dignified habit. They seem to be sleeping with heads bent over and resting on their arms, or lowered. But they cross themselves, and rise, or sit, at the appropriate moments. They seem like wraiths in the obscure, incense-filled church. They are immaterial, all spirit and no flesh, as it were. Their flesh (as Kazantzakis would say) has been transubstantiated into worship.

Here at Athos, more strongly than anywhere or anytime else in my life, I felt the true meaning of the expression “to die to the world.” Strange how words, so often mouthed or read, can suddenly become alive. They are charged with explosive force, but so very rarely do they explode, show forth their meaning, achieve their epiphany. It is so easy to say, furthermore, that we in the world are concerned with what matters and that the monks have fled to a fake paradise, a vast dream-escape. Even now, my mind tells me that this is the case. But at Athos I felt differently, almost in spite of myself, in spite of my “Western liberal’s” social concern, my “advanced views” and all the rest of our comfortable slogans. What I felt, in spite of myself, was that the monks, here, were devoting themselves to “what matters” and that we, in the world, were drowning in inessential details—what the philosophers have always called “vanity.” Perhaps it is merely the colossal simplification of the monk’s life. He has one purpose: to praise God. He does not fret about what he will do on Saturday night, or become angry because he cannot secure good seats at the theater on short notice, or crave an automobile as luxurious as his neighbor’s, or keep remodeling his house and burying himself in further comforts. He is not scheming to raise himself in a social hierarchy, or to obtain a better job, or avoid income tax; he does not worry what he will eat tomorrow, or even if he will eat. He does not have the nuisance of the machines with which we have surrounded our lives, breaking down and leaving us—heaven forbid!—on our own resources. He does not fret about being too cold or too hot, because he knows he will always be too hot in summer and too cold in winter. I became aware, because of the colossal simplification of the monk’s life, of the colossal complication of our own, but a complication that so often is completely petty and indeed vicious. We wallow in insignificant details. We worry, not over large things worth worrying about, but over nothings. We expend our vital energy so uselessly, squandering it. Of course one feels this most strongly upon returning “to the world.” As I stepped into our house—after a lovely, warm greeting, I must admit, children rushing into my arms, Chrysanthi full of kisses and embraces, even Susanna jumping up and down—all too soon the details of everyday life reasserted themselves: Leander whining because he had to put on a sweater, Alec whining because Dr. Altas said he couldn’t go swimming for one more day, until his cold was fully healed. Also, one becomes immediately aware of the real boredom of so much of our lives, the constant search for something to fill up the time (or to hide ourselves from ourselves): “What shall we do now?” “How can we ‘enjoy ourselves’ tonight?” All this is eliminated in the monk’s life. His every moment is directed and meaningful, part of a whole, contributing in one way or another to his purpose, and best of all his purpose is sure, clear, simple, always evident. His views are narrow, his mind closed, but he has a health, a dignity, a happiness that we lack.

Monasticism is not a solution that I could take, alas! Yet I feel that one must strive even in the context of the “world” to eliminate the details that can so easily bury us and keep us from facing ourselves. How to approximate the monk’s single-mindedness, his intense sense of purpose, yet somehow move in accord with the conditions of the modern world: that is the great problem. The monk is not an anachronism, fully. He shows us what we, too, need and must achieve. Insofar as he does this he is relevant to the modern world.

Am I being shamelessly romantic and superficial about these monks? Ο Κύριος Αλέκος tells me that they are all ex-criminals, outcasts, failures. Furthermore, and here he is obviously quite correct, they are reactionary, hierarchical, aristocratic. They do nothing for the people. Christianity, says Alekos, was once, and ought to be still, a revolutionary movement, a people’s movement for liberation from the land of bondage, whether that land be Egypt or Rome. But the so-called Christianity of these monks is a comfortable alliance with the overlords, a selling-out to the status quo. The monks are fat, rich, and secure; they are an arm of the repressive state, the privileged and oppressing class, and always have been, except in the very early days before Christianity became the official state religion. All this is may be true; still, there is a beauty in their lives. We are left with the contradiction—as always.

Thursday, August 10, 1967      Lavra-Iviron-Karyes-Daphne-Saint Paul's
 How nice to walk down the stoney mule track from Lavra to the Tower, at 4:30 a.m.! The sea glassy-dark, merging duskily with the sky. Konrad wanted to plunder the mulberries again, but it was so dark that we couldn't distinguish the ripe from the unripe. Caïque back to Iviron. Then back to Karyes. In the first street we encountered Reinoud! He had had a good night in a monastery nearby. Strange to pass the small street of shops and hear one of the monk-clerks say Οπίστε and try to motion me in. This was very distasteful and out of keeping. But I enjoyed being remembered by the keeper of the next shop, where we had bought Loch's book and some handicraft.

To the one-and-only restaurant. The surly cook-waiter, a layman. I shaved. Simple pleasures: coffee, decent bread, cheese—our first protein! how nice to eat again! At 8:00 the bus left for Daphne. Inside, the icon had an electric bulb instead of an oil lamp with a wick. The light worked only when the ignition was on, but, as Konrad said, that was when we needed the saint's protection! Next to me, Γρηγόριος, with a huge pouch, and a kind of carpetbag to carry his things. When we got out at Daphne, Grigorios nodded with disdain to a factotum waiting there: a tiny, heavy-set man with the stupid, blank expression of a demented mouse. This man shuffled up to Grigorios with an obsequiousness I have never before seen; he bowed, he scraped, he kissed the monk's hand, he backed away, and took up the baggage, which was very light, and could easily have been carried by the owner. In this, we saw another, and far less encouraging, side of the monkish existence: the hierarchy and privilege that doubtlessly exists within the monastery among the various classes of monks themselves, and that manifested itself in an extreme form in the relation between the fat Grigorios and the sniveling factotum. This last, however, must have been an extreme case. Later, as we were waiting for the caïque in the customs shed, I noticed that the other lay servants kept teasing him mercilessly. They took his straw hat, for instance, and threatened to cut out the crown. He, too dull to see that they were just playing, took this with utmost gravity, protesting that the hat cost such-and-such, and scowling and cursing in his impotency. Finally, the others grew tired of their pet monkey and returned the hat.

Beer: another worldly pleasure received with thanks. In the small παντοπωλείον where I went to buy some tinned meat, there was an old monk talking with the παντοπώλης: —Για πού, πατέρα μου, με το καλό; Γιατί φεύγετε; —Με έδιωξαν από το κελλί. So this happens too. The monasteries are short of monks, but not so short that they keep all and sundry. And they must collect some very difficult types indeed. There must be some truth in what every Greek will tell you (Θέμης Άλτας και Θεία Θώδωρα told me this humorously, after I had returned): that the majority of those who become monks are either fugitive criminals or draft dodgers. To this we could add those who are simply down on their luck and give up trying—like Zorbas. To think that any great number have a true religious calling is sheer naïveté, at least so far as those in the monasteries are concerned. Perhaps the hermitages and sketes attract a better sort. There are all kinds of stories à la Boccaccio and Chaucer. Last year two monks fought, and one murdered the other with a knife. Θώδωρα says it is common knowledge that they row across to the island opposite Ouranoupolis, where there are several “cabarets.” As she says, they go lustily, and return exhausted. And Chrysanthi remembers the time when she and Βούλη spent the night in Νέα Ρόδα when they were at the Quaker School. An Athos monk—young, lusty, handsome, with glittering black beard—registered, and immediately the landlady came to the two girls and advised them to lock their door! This is all quite aside from the homosexuality that apparently flourishes on the Holy Mountain. An English boy, Oxford graduate, with whom I traveled on the bus back to Salonika, told me that a friend of his had been propositioned by one of the monks. All this, obviously, is part of the “contradiction” implicit in every human manifestation (I begin to sound like Kierkegaard), and does not invalidate the good part. Indeed, now that conditions are generally better in Greece, the Holy Mountain may not be such a refuge for the down and out, who can just as easily go to work in Germany.

At 11:00 a.m. the caique left for Άγ. Παύλος and Άγ. Άννης. Spectacular views of Σιμόπετρα upon its rock, and of Διονυσίου. Splendid rock-formations: geological strata, veins of marble, caves, faults, monstrous slabs splitting gradually from the cliff and hovering over the sea. The water, as always, clearer than clear.

I struck up a conversation with a youngish monk, about 25 or 30 years old. He belonged to the skete of Ἁγ. Ἀβνῆς. He explained the system: a year's noviate before you are officially accepted as a monk. Then, at a certain age, 25 I think, you may be chosen to become a deacon. This is the first step toward the priesthood. At about 30 you may be ordained. "Can anyone become a priest?" "No, not at all. You must have special qualities. Good heart, good mind. The priest has great responsibilities. He gives communion; he confesses the other monks." "Do many advance to the priesthood?" "No. Few. Very few. It is a great honor." "And you?" "I am a deacon now. I will become a priest if I am worthy." I then asked him the question: What will happen to the monasteries? Can they keep going? I received a very strange answer: "No, the entire Holy Mountain will cease to exist in a short time." "You mean that no young monks will come to continue the traditions, none at all?" "No, not that. There will be a great cataclysm, a third world war, and the epicenter will be Greece. It is all written in a prophecy." "Where?" "In a book in the monastery, from the tenth century. It says there will be two great cataclysms, like the first two wars, and then a third and final one. A black cloud, it says, will descend from the north. That is of course Russia. The Russians will invade and occupy Constantinople. At the same time, the Turks will invade and reoccupy Greece, but then there will be a great naval battle and the NATO forces will win. We know this because the book speaks of a force speaking 18 languages. But in the end everything will be destroyed." "And doesn't this make you sad? What you say is terribly pessimistic, yet you don't seem to see it in a pessimistic way." "No, it does not make me sad. Because it will be not only an end, but also a beginning. Like the flood. If only one just person survives, there will be a new beginning." "I think that two will be needed." "And the Holy Mountain will see a new age, with new monasteries, new monks. All will be cleansed." I thought of Kazantzakis's ferocious "Leninism": the world must be burned to ashes, so that a new and more just society can rise out of those ashes. His ferocity and "Leninism" are really much more Biblical and apocalyptic than communist. I also thought how avidly these monks cling to prophecies. Although they claim to flee from the world and from the arguments arising from practical experience, they are eager to find practical "proofs" of the wisdom of the prophets of old. We had another example in Ἁγ. Παύλος, in the library. The βιβλιοθηκάρχης, obviously an educated man (I was told later that he had taken his university degree in economics but had subsequently abandoned the world), showed us a drawing from an ancient book. It was a representation of the apocalypse. Objects dropping from the sky, buildings toppling, people taking refuge in caves. “You see,” he said gleefully, “it is an exact prediction of the bombing raids of the second world war. The only discrepancy is that the bombs are just falling directly out of the sky and not from airplanes. But when I showed this to the German governor of Athos during the occupation, he told me that this was not a discrepancy at all, for the Germans had indeed invented, and were using, rocket-bombs that dropped out of the sky precisely as shown in the old picture.”

Αγίου Παύλου has a stunning location directly beneath the jagged peak of Athos in a cleft that had at one time seen a flood and now is a river-bed of stones. We disembarked with two Greeks, one an agriculturalist, the other a student of mathematics at Athens University, both from Olympia, and both—I at once perceived—very rightist politically: θρήσκοι, καθαρευουσιάνοι, and the rest, the usual complex of conservative expressions. But pleasant chaps and nice companions. They warmed up considerably as the day wore on. There was a monastery servant at the quay. He told us it would be a shame for us to walk up to the monastery since the truck was here and the driver would be coming shortly; he had gone for a swim. Poor Konrad, once again cheated out of an opportunity to hike! We shared our watermelon with our new friends and waited for our leisurely swimmer. But waiting in Greece is always pleasant if you have company. How easily the conversation begins, and rolls on. No hesitation, no embarrassment, no shy withdrawal or haughty standoffishness. It begins with the basic “vital statistics”: where are you from, what do you do, are you married, how many children, how much do you get paid, how is business? Once all this is known, the talk can become more specialized and appropriate to the individuals involved. The agriculturalist immediately began probing the monastery servant on how much wood they cut each year, was it all chestnut, how much did they get per kilo, did the monastery have other sources of income (it gets 200,000 drachmas per year from the state, in payment for some real estate—μετόχιες—that the state expropriated), etc. Then the questioning and answering goes in the other direction. The servant has a grape vine but the grapes are sickly. What kind? Do they have a whitish mold on the tops? Does he spray them? With what? When? How often? Then the servant told, at length, with narrative skill, the legend about how the wife of the sultan, in the fifteenth century, landed here bringing the monastery the gold, frankincense, and myrrh brought by the Magi. But as she climbed toward the monastery she heard a voice out of heaven, the voice of the Virgin Mary, protectress of Athos. The voice told her to halt. She did so, and the monks came down to accept the gifts. There is now a chapel on the spot.

In this way the time passed. Not a word about the weather, or about food, or about “What I saw in Paris last month,” the usual topics of conversation, and these terribly forced, between a group of Americans who do not know each other and even, alas, among groups that do know each other.

In St. Paul’s, we gleaned a better feeling for the actual life of the monks than elsewhere. Also, it was considerably friendlier than the other monasteries, perhaps because fewer people visit it. You enter beneath a long and lovely grape arbor. Outside the gates, as always, are the pavilion and the πεζούλι. A decorative fountain, and beneath the arbor another one with a trough for the mules. Copious water, cold, sweet-tasting, as from my well at the farm. The Πορτάρης greeted us, Καλῶς ὀρίσατε, and shook our hands (the first time we had experienced such a welcome). As usual, we were shown to the αρχοντάρικο, up a flight of stairs. The building is new, built after the old one burned down. Wide hallway, rooms on either side. Victorian atmosphere, very evangelical, as Konrad said. Reminds one of a Salvation Army mission. Texts on the wall: “Love Christ” “Do Unto Others . . .” etc. The sitting room: portraits of various Greek kings, and of two Russian tsars, and in the place of honor two pictures of Metaxas, one a portrait and the other a signed photograph! I kept mum knowing the politics of our two Greek companions. The toilet was delightful: a hole, Turkish style, in a balcony. Through the hole one could stare down the full length of the huge foundations, to the ground below, which had received the offerings of generations of monastery visitors!

We arrived at a bad time. The monks were sleeping. In addition, the previous day and night and that very morning they had celebrated their great feast-day, and were exhausted. Eventually a monk and a lay-servant emerged sleepily from two little cubicles adjoining the sitting room. The lay-servant was coarse looking and rather gruff at first, but only because he was sleepy. The monk later told us that he—the servant—was a garçon, but he had been here many years and by now was “almost a theologian.” How sweet! This monk, the guest-master, was the reverse of the lay-servant: petit, refined, fair-skinned, jolly, a practiced conversationalist. The usual opening questions—what nationality? Protestant or Catholic? What are the Quakers? Do they believe in the divine inspiration of the gospels? “Yes and no,” I stammered. Do they baptize? “No.” I began my lecture on inner baptism, the spirit versus the letter, etc., but didn’t get far. Our guest-master tried to be logical in his illogicality. “All one needs is study,” he kept saying. “One shouldn’t believe blindly; one should investigate, read, think, and determine what is the correct road.” But it soon became apparent that he meant by this: One should read, exclusively, the Fathers of the Eastern Orthodox Church. You will then learn that you cannot be a Christian unless you are baptized. The talk turned to the split with the Catholics. “We must investigate, study, the causes,” said our logical friend, “in order to determine objectively who was at fault. It will then be seen that the Western Church was at fault. This is why we cannot, and must not, be reunited with them. Unless they come to realize their faults and desire to reenter the Orthodox communion. For instance, they will have to accept baptism . . .” “But surely the Catholics have not abandoned baptism,” I objected. “The Quakers have, to be sure, but not the Catholics.” He smiled condescendingly and lovingly at my ignorance. “The Catholics sprinkle,” he said. “That is not baptism.”

Strange, this mixture of conservatism/fundamentalism/punctilio and friendliness in this monastery. They did not permit any flesh to show, except faces and hands. We all had short-sleeved shirts. I had to put on my jacket, despite the heat. The others were provided with long-sleeved shirts, although the one Konrad put on was so small for him that it was not much different from a short-sleeved shirt. He finally remembered that he had his pajamas, and donned the tops. Thus, decently dressed, we were able to emerge into the hallway and enter the church. Vesper service, not as colorful as the one at Iviron, but very beautiful, still. A monk reprimanded me when I crossed my legs in the stall. Our lay-servant reprimanded Konrad when he placed his hands behind his back, an attitude of relaxation in the Greek culture, and thus not permissible.

The stalls, when the seat is in the upper position, are a good compromise. You sit and yet do not sit; you are uncomfortable, and yet it is better than standing. Best of all, you cannot help but look as though you are paying attention.

The church is new, and undecorated. The whole plan of the monastery attests to its function. The entire courtyard is occupied by the church. On three sides, dormitories and the trapeza. In back, a huge wall in the shape of an arc, with crenellations on top, to keep out enemies and also the winds descending from the mountain. A church, with facilities for those serving it—that is the “plan.” It is sparse, economical, very unlike Lavra with its sprawling buildings in every direction.

After the service, the monks went directly to the trapeza. We joined them for their meal. This was the first cenobitic monastery we had visited. It was a fine experience for us to observe the way in which the monks eat, instead of being fed separately, as we were in the idiorhythmic establishments. The meal was already on the tables: individual servings in tin dishes, of fish-in-sauce, wine, bread, feta cheese, and watermelon. The bread was hard and dry, as always, baked in individual loaves about  $\frac{1}{4}$  the size of a normal kilo-loaf. At the head of the room, at a moon-shaped table, sat the abbot with his committee of elders. Near them, standing behind a reading desk, the ἀναγνώστης. Not a word is spoken. We sit down, the ἀναγνώστης begins reading. This time it was the account of how St. Paul founded the monastery. I kept looking around to see at what stage in the meal the monks were, fearing that I would not be able to finish in time. Then, about 15 minutes after we had started, the reader concluded. He went to the abbot, asked forgiveness lest he had read poorly. The chefs (all monks) came from the kitchen and asked forgiveness of the abbot lest they had cooked badly. The abbot gave them all his blessing. A small bell rang once, and all stood up with a single motion and immediately left the hall. Most of the visitors were only half way through their watermelon. The monks, as they passed out, told us to stay and finish, which we did. It was nice, then, to be witness to the commotion that followed: clearing of tables, collecting of uneaten bread and unpoured wine, piling of dishes, all done by monks assigned to these particular duties. The commotion was much more human, somehow, than the meal that had preceded it. But eating, under this system, had taken on a liturgical, ritualistic significance. The meal was not, as it is so often for us, a casual relaxation, nor was it a convenient way to pass the time, for bored and empty people; nor was it the sheer gluttony and “fleshly enjoyment” that it so easily becomes; nor the way of displaying largesse and wealth (I think of the ridiculous Greek custom of taking people out to an expensive restaurant at night, after they have already eaten a large meal at midday) and forcing them to stuff themselves with μεζέδες, ούζο, entrée, salad, wine, and fruit, chiefly as a proof that one is rich enough to pay for it all). Here, the meal is reduced to an elemental significance. It is a necessary refueling, to be accomplished as briefly as possible; and it is an opportunity for silence and learning. It is also a kind of offering. Instead of being extended and desultory, as at our dinner parties, it is concentrated and single-minded: one theme is expounded, briefly, but one hopes that the theme acquires large dimensions because of its relevance to the particular day in the church calendar.

We went off to the library. Educated librarian. The usual guidebook kind of information about the particular treasures. The picture of the end of the world, and the librarian’s exposition of this as a prediction of the second world war. Stories of the educated and well-meaning Germans who governed the mountain during the war. Hitler, we were told, issued a personal decree protecting Athos. The monks seemed to have acquired the knack of dealing with all potentially hostile powers, sultans and Nazis both. The librarian said that he personally had served the German governor when he was tried at Nuremberg by sending a letter attesting to the governor’s decency. It was nice to see that the library had modern books as well as dusty parchments; the Μεγάλη Ελληνική Εγκυκλοπαίδεια, the Eleftheroudakis Lexicon, which is full of articles by Kazantzakis, language dictionaries, works on the classical authors, grammars, a rare book on social psychology, brought by a brother who had studied at Zürich, even a volume on photography. I asked if any original writing now issued from the monastery. Not much, I was told, but some. On the writing desk was a manuscript in progress, a treatise on the Eucharist, by one of the monks, an attempt to show that this divine mystery was at present largely misunderstood by the Greek church. Intellectually, these monks are moths fluttering around the light of Christ in their narrow orbits. How many angels can dance on the head of a pin?

Sunset, 7:00 p.m. our time, 11:30 monastery time (they are 13 days behind our calendar, 4½ hours ahead of our clocks: that is true divorce from the world). The monks have a few moments' freedom. They gather outside, sit on the πεζούλι, singly or in groups, and talk or watch the sea or stroll back and forth. We approached a heavy-set monk whose robe was opened at the neck, revealing his flannel undershirt. He nervously tried to do himself up, but the robe kept opening. I had noticed him in church at vesper time, also with the undone robe, and continually fanning himself with his hat or with a handkerchief. It was the only time I had ever seen a monk show visible discomfort because of the heat. Now I suddenly put 2 and 2 together: he was the chef, he had come from the kitchen to ask the abbot's blessing after the meal. This explained why he was so hot. He spoke to Konrad in a slow, deliberate English groping for words and opening his mouth wide in order to push out the unfamiliar syllables. "Here is quiet," he said, "here is . . . is . . . ήσυχία . . . πῶς το πήτε εσεῖς . . . ah, yes, calm . . . here is calm. . . I was in Australia, a sailor, in Greek merchant marine." "Why did you become a monk?" "I no like life as sailor. I want peace. Here is peace, here is calm . . ." "Do you find friendship here?" "What?" "Friendship. Φιλία." "Ah, yes, φιλία. Well, yes, φιλία. Yes, a little. Friendship. Ah, yes." Suddenly, without saying goodbye, he rose and strode into the monastery. I had a strong, intense feeling that he was a very unhappy man, even an outcast in the monastic society.

A bell rang. Most of the monks rose and went inside. I went quickly to drink and wash a little at the fountain, after the mules, who were drinking. A monk then asked me where I was from and what products grew there. I said corn (maize), καλαμπόκι; he didn't know what this was—must have entered the monastery before corn was introduced to Greece. A monk banged disagreeably on the door as a final warning and we all slipped inside. The gates closed for the night.

The mattresses were crawling with bedbugs, but luckily Konrad had had the presence of mind to bring along some DDT. Sweet sleep in a room perched upon the rocks and overlooking the sea.

Ouranoupolis-Salonika-Aghia Triadha

Up at 5:00 a.m. Darkness. Konrad had gone down to hear the end of the matins and I joined him. Once again, the eerie sight of monks standing like wraiths in the stalls, heads bowed, crossing themselves, or going forward to kiss the icons. (In the vespers I had seen, for the first time, what in Greek is called να προσκυνήσεις, να κάνεις μετάνοιες; a dipping motion, knees down, hands just touching the floor, three times, accompanied by the sign of the cross, very oriental, like Mohammedans prostrating themselves, forehead touching mother earth.) The service ended. We tried to offer the monks some payment for their hospitality but they refused (the other monasteries had accepted). We said we would give the sum to the poor when we returned home, and they felt this was a fine idea. Δωρεάν, δωρεάν, they kept repeating as we tried to make them accept. (When I returned home I sent a check for $100 to the Friends Meeting, part to go to the AFSC in their name.) The lovely parting words: Στο καλό, στο καλό, αντίο σας, στο καλό.

We descended the rocky path, past the sultan's wife's shrine, to the quay, to find it already crowded with people waiting for the caique. Among others were a troupe of about 10 German boy scouts who had angered us because they had arrived late the night before and had departed immediately the next morning, obviously using the monastery as a free hotel—only. Konrad was particularly bitter against his ex-compatriots. “There is nothing,” he said, “to match the arrogance, and efficacy, of Germans when they join together. Singly they are bearable, but in a group they are repulsive—like Americans!” Full of unchristian malice, we hoped that the caique would leave them all behind, but it didn't. Somehow we all fit. Indeed, a new crowd surged on at the next stop, Διονυσίου, including some familiar faces: the sexy French lads in their tight jeans and cowboy hats; the Salonika gymnasium teacher and his friend, etc. Many were herded into the hold by the exasperated captain. The gunwales were only six inches above the water, but somehow we proceeded.

More talk. Really, how we talked on this trip! Continually, deeply, refreshingly. This time with the friend of the gymnasium teacher, a man about my age, connected with a factory in Salonika and spending his two-week holiday, all of it, on the Holy Mountain. He and his friend had gone around the nose of the peninsula and had climbed up to Καρούλια and St. Anne's, which apparently are spectacular. He had seen icon-painting monks. He had seen hermits. He described with glee how their group approached one of the solitary holy men. All of them were trying to be serious and duly reverent. But the holy man, who was so holy that he could afford to be irreverent, greeting them with laughter, bubbling good humor, and off-color jokes. Fools of god still exist. I was glad to find that my friend, although impressed with what he had seen on the Mountain, was not a rightist. He bemoaned the narrowness of the monks' political and theological views, and had no illusions about their relation to the status quo. Yet, and this was wonderful, the inevitable contradiction did not destroy for him what was good and truly venerable here.

Daphne again. Another wait, now in café seats that had become very familiar to us. Coffee. Biscuits. The customs shed, with a crude sign and a depressing interior. "Have you any icons or rare books?" "No." "Open your backs [sic], please." Perfunctory groping. "Next, please." The captain, who had brought us down from Ouranoupolis, recognized us, and we felt we were in friendly hands. Off we went, surrounded by the German boy scouts, who spent the trip playing cards. More talk, this time with a "pilgrim" who had grown up as a Jehovah's Witness and told me the story of his life, alas! and how and why he had abandoned the J.W.s, mostly because of their authoritarian methods and refusal to allow free opinion. We spoke of the state of the world and were both very pessimistic. Self-interest, hypocrisy, violence, boredom, jealousy, ugliness: these ruled the world. The only consolations, especially for Greeks, were sea and sun, which remained unspoiled, virgin. On this note, I left the Holy Mountain.

Mrs. Loch was leaning out of her window, watching the caique arrive. Jones was still sitting. Various Americans were bathing languidly and effeminately admiring their own babies. I was back in the tearoom, with the dull and proper. The pilgrimage was over. Stupid questions: "How many monasteries did you visit?" Sheila came, with the children. Poor Konrad. "What have you decided?" he asked her straight off, meaning: were they going to continue their holiday or go straight back to England? I didn't catch the answer. Sheila looked very bad; eating herself up with self-pity, her bloodless lips seemed made of acid. I was eager to escape this sad reunion and went down to eat with the Uniate Catholic and a Greek friend of his, who turned out to be an actor in the Κρατικό Θέατρο Βορείας Ελλάδος, and a fascinating chap. Straightway, more good talk. Theater. Cavafy. Poetry. I expounded on the connection between Cavafy's homosexuality, historical view (endless repetition), and metaphysics because my new acquaintance had seen the poetry only as a personal confession. We continued in the bus, for hours, while others were throwing up copiously. Eliot, Beckett, the virtues and vices of Koun's style and the State Theater's. The Uniate also spoke beautifully about Kazantzakis, how much of his vision came directly from Byzantine attitudes and liturgy, how truly Christian he was in spirit, and of how, in Greece and Turkey, for the first time in his life, he had understood that people can truly care for one another. There was also a young Englishman, just out of Oxford, and a student of Byzantium but just in an amateur way, as he was going into advertising. He was rather superficial, but he impressed me by describing his sudden feeling of reverence, almost in spite of himself, when the abbot of Dionysiou, a man renowned for his sanctity, had spoken to him and, in a sense, had confessed him.

August 14, 1967

George, Kostas, Lola, etc., assembled, asked me about Mount Athos. But the only thing they were really interested in was what I was given to eat!

August 25, 1967

Greeks love to philosophize, and Kazantzakis catches the flavor and even the metaphors of their talk. Today, ο Γεώργιος, the milkman, was moaning tons about the government, or τα γεγονότα, as he euphemistically has it. I suggested that time will heal, and he agreed, saying «Βέβαια, από τη βρωμιά έρχεται πάντα η καθαριότητα».

Ο Νικήτας told me that I would appreciate the truth of the slogan that the present government "saved Greece" only if I had experienced what he, and all Greeks, had experienced in 1944, to emerge from their homes after the Germans had left, ready to celebrate the liberation of Greece, and to see on the mountainsides and in the towns instead of the Greek flag, the Red flag!

Thinking of my own “success” at Dartmouth, culminating recently in the Danforth award for Distinguished Teaching, with its lovely grant of $10,000, I could not help but agree with Kazantzakis when he says: «Όλο μυστήριο είναι η επιτυχία ή αποτυχία ενός ανθρώπου. Αρίφνητοι, απροσδιόριστοι συντελεστές συνεργάζονται έξω από τον άνθρωπο και μέσα του, και συχνά η αξία του δεν παίζει το μεγαλύτερο ρόλο.» — Ταξιδεύοντας Ισπανία, Β’ εκ., σ. 61-62.

Excursion to Litchfield with family and my parents. Dr. Johnson’s birth-place. Dad kept insisting that Boswell wrote Pepys’ diary! (And that Johnson was Ben Jonson.) In the square was a van with the letters: S. Johnson Electrical Contractor, also a plaque with the names of various people burnt at the stake under Queen Anne. Best of all, “George Fox the founder of the Society of Friends or Quakers shortly after his release from prison at Derby at the beginning of the winter 1651 stood without shoes on a market day in this market place and denounced the City of Litchfield.” Cathedral very heavy, black, dingy. We lunched at the Swan Hotel and were all in a good mood after Dad told his story about the woman who was asked on her 50th wedding anniversary “In all those years, did you ever think of divorce?” “No, never, not once in all those years. But I thought lots about murder!” Daphne very quiet and cooperative for once.

Last night to Χρήστος Αλεξίου, who teaches Modern Greek here. His wife is the daughter of George Thomson, Professor of Classics. Nepotism. Both Alexiou and Thomson are reputedly Marxists. He told me, interestingly, that the language of the ancient dramatists, even the choruses, was fully intelligible at once to the audiences because the choral sections employed diction and syntax not, it is true, of common speech, nevertheless familiar to everyone because this was the language of religious liturgy. As though the “difficult” parts of contemporary drama were in King James’s English.

The night before to “A Man for All Seasons.” Simple, unpretentious, marvelously powerful. I joined a risqué “cinema club” in order to be able to see Ulysses.

Our last days in Greece were moving and sad, as always. Ο Παππούς έγραψε έπειτα: «Ο αποχαιρετισμός τούτος μας κόστησε πολύ». I remember the evening on the beach with Themis and his Cretan friend who tried, unsuccessfully, to teach me mantinades, then singing in a deep bass voice; our little recital, violin and piano, first for Altases, then for Yiannakoses; tears in Ka. Marianthi's eyes at parting, and in Miranda's. Such warmth! The old man carrying the refrigerator all by himself, on his back, up four flights of stairs; returning the piano to the awful Ka. Χατζή on the 7th floor; last-minute meeting (twice) with Marios; barbecued chicken for George and Efthymoula; Chrysanthi's accident, dropping the sewing machine on her foot, and luckily not breaking any bones; lunches out at Nounios's; last-minute reading of Galatea's poor story about her reunion with Kazantzakis in the University of Thessaloniki's φροντιστήριο.

Through Yugoslavia by train. The rich Greeks going to prep school in England. "My father has a Jaguar!" The Yugoslav shepherd (moron) who masturbated furiously and exhibited himself as the train passed. The boys jumping off the bridge into the shallow river, almost naked. The marvelous "shock" of the Austrian landscape and Alps, after the dryness and poverty of Greece.

Munich. Elizabeth met us. Baggage lost temporarily, then recovered. To New Pinakothèque. Not very impressive, but some nice Matisse and a lovely Van Gogh. The French had it all over the Germans! Changing Daphne in the English Gardens. Taxi to Nymphenburg. Flowers, pools, quiet. Schwäbing. Restaurant. I was brave and had calf's foot. The full cafés. Youth!

Night train to Rotterdam. The new city center, astounding. I felt that it reconfirmed man's abilities. He can do so much that is beautiful and good and functional if he only tries; he can make his cities livable instead of dreary hells. One feels this also in Amsterdam, where we stayed three days. The old houses preserved and modernized, instead of falling into decay. The quite decent "new suburb" that we visited, not really beautiful or inspiring gaiety, yet much better than most. Rijksmuseum is of course extraordinary. The veneers, the play of light and dark. And Rembrandt is only one among many. We also visited a diamond exhibition (and fell prey: I bought Chrysanthi her long-desired ring); took a boat ride through the canals; did the Museum of Modern Art: lovely Van Goghs, but also lots of Klee, Mondrian, and a whole wing full of pop art that delighted the children. The hilarious fat women with huge behinds, made out of plaster of paris.

Night boat from Hoek of Holland to Harwich. Train to Liverpool Street. How bleak England is! Taxi to Euston. Train to Birmingham. The new civic center: another reconfirmation of man's potential and his capabilities for good. Fine house at Fox Hill Close. Rush to get Leander and Alec settled in school. Visit to Mr. Sheen, the headmaster of Kings Norton Grammar School. I started out by calling him Mr. Lewis! Buying Leander's "kit": blazer, emblem, school tie, shirts, gray trousers, black shoes, cleats, jersey. He is delighted, loves to tie the tie. The pressures of conformity! Alec is in Bournville Junior School, a lovely building in Bournville village. We went the first day and observed the moving prayers and hymns that both children like. Their appreciation of discipline matches mine at Deerfield. And yet there is something so sheepish about all these Englishmen, with their queues and innumerable "pleases" and "thank yous." They seem imprisoned in their own propriety. Also, strangely, they seem sexless. The women have no breasts; the men have no thighs and buttocks. All is drab and bleak, the faces as well as the weather. Perhaps it is the sudden contrast with Greece that makes me feel this way; or perhaps it is the industrial Midlands.

It is difficult to start working again. I've been doing so desultorily: reading Kazantzakis's Ισπανία and now his Ιαπωνία-Κίνα.

September 19, 1967

Kazantzakis in Ταξιδεύοντας Ιαπωνία-Κίνα, σελ. 40, puts his finger on the secret of life at Mount Athos or any secluded place: Η ζωή σ' ένα μοναστήρι, σ' ένα βαπόρι, σ' ένα κλειστό απομονωμένο χώρο μπορεί να γίνει αληθινά αβάσταχτη αν δεν είσαι κυριεμένος από ένα μεγάλο πάθος. . . . Αν δεν έχεις ένα σφοδρό πάθος ή αν δεν έχεις νικήσει όλα τα πάθη, περιορισμένος σ' ένα κλειστό χώρο, είσαι χαμένος.

(σελ. 54: the ideal of a Japanese samurai:) Μπροστά στους άλλους να στέκεσαι χαμογελαστός—μπροστά στον εαυτό σου να στέκεσαι αυστηρός—στην ανάγκη να στέκεσαι γενναίος—στην καθημερινή ζωή πρόσχαρος—Όταν σε χειροκροτούν, να στέκεσαι απαθής; όταν σε σφυρίζουν, ασάλευτος.

September 20, 1967

Sometimes we suddenly realize how much our lives resemble a dream, or how difficult it is to separate what is dream from what is reality. Kazantzakis quotes a Chinese poet: Ονειρεύομαι, και βλέπω πως είμαι πεταλούδα. Ξυπνώ, και βλέπω πως είμαι άνθρωπος. Ποιο 'ναι τ' όνειρο; Ο άνθρωπος; Η πεταλούδα; Ίσως μήτε το ένα μήτε το άλλο. Λέω: ξύπιστα· μήπως άραγε πρέπει να πω: μεταμορφώθηκα; (σελ. 209)

Τέσσερα είναι τα μεγάλα πάθη του Κινέζου . . . : τα τυχερά παιχνίδια, η σαρκική ηδονή, το χασίς και το θέατρο. Κι όλα τα πάθη τούτα αναβρύζουν από τη λαχάρα να γλιτώσουμε από την πραγματική ζωή, να δώσουμε φτερούγες στην καθημερινή πεζότητα. Η ζωή του Κινέζου πλαντάει μέσα στην ανάγκη· ποια άλλη χαρά λοιπόν του μένει από το μεθύσι; (σελ. 221) Why only the Chinese?! When I race to the theater or movies at night to escape whining children and ετοιμοθάνατοι γονείς, isn't it the same thing?

Usual depression whenever I'm in prolonged contact with my father. Particularly hard to stomach him after days—months—of reading Kazantzakis! Because he is a perfect example of all that Kazantzakis despises: someone whose “flesh” has dragged the spirit back down into sluggishness, torpor, hypochondria, and materialism. Topics of conversation have been the usual ones: how the hotels were all terrible, what this cost and that cost, how much noise there is everywhere, how tired he was and is—and then: the stock market! Last night I was solemnly informed the prices of all my stocks, all three of them. From memory. He knew exactly what he had paid for them ten-odd years ago, how far they had descended or risen during that time, and where they stood now. I felt like exploding, trying to make him understand that my whole life I had struggled, and am struggling still, to conquer the desire for money and the obsession with present and future security, and rather, like Virginia Woolf, to take advantage of the fact that I am comfortably off, by allowing my mind to go to other things and by not wanting to be more comfortably off. But I didn't have the heart, or perhaps the courage, to express all this. Instead I merely said upon hearing that all my stocks had risen: “Good, now I'll sell the whole lot and be rid of them.” But he didn't catch the full meaning of this, though he did catch the tone of anger. Instead, he said, “Yes, it would be advantageous for you to sell now and reap the profit. On the other hand, you could keep them, continuing to collect the dividends. You sold General Motors at 110, which was good, but it then went to 118, which was better. Also, it went down to 68, at which time it would have been wise for you to buy again.”

Sightseeing with parents and family in rented car. Very pleasant day. In the morning Chrysanthi and Mother went to Marshalls and Snelgrass and bought a lovely pink suit for Chrysanthi, who came home beaming. Then we drove off for Warwick Castle. Paintings: Reubens' two heads of Saints Jerome and Peter, a wonderful Rembrandt portrait, a Reubens portrait subsequently enlarged by Sir Joshua Reynolds; the famous portraits of Henry VIII and of the young Queen Elizabeth I; the “haunted room” with the pictures of the two friends and poets, Fulke Greville and Sir Philip Sidney. Armor, including a suit for a child; the hangman's eerie mask; Oliver Cromwell's death mask, clearly showing the wart over his eye. Unlike most castles, this one looked obviously lived in, and it was pleasant for us to have arrived just as the Earl of Warwick's niece was having her wedding reception: bridesmaids in stunning colors, men in tails, Rolls Royces: the world of Evelyn Waugh. They were to have a discotheque later on, after the ceremony and food. The well-groomed, well-nourished aristocracy, looking very much as though they owned the world. We had lovely sun and enjoyed the gardens, peacocks, and high society.

From there to Kenilworth, and what a difference! Sir Walter Scott, the gothic novel, eerie ruins jutting into the sky, all the romance of Elizabeth and Leicester. Leander and Alec ran joyously through the dungeons, up and down the stairs, along floors where walls had been blown up in the Civil War, up to the parapet, playing cowboys and Indians.

Thence to Coventry, where the shopping precinct, and especially the new Cathedral next to the shell of the old one, are marvels of beauty and functionalism both. Epstein's sculpture of St. Michael is memorable. But of course one sensed the disparity between the great building and the emptiness. Religion itself is what is truly the empty shell in the twentieth century.

Next day, Sunday, to Worcester, where King John is buried in the cathedral. Service, communion, angelic voices of the boys' choir. Again, an empty church. We had a fancy meal in a fancy restaurant, feeling very out of place because of Daphne. Also (I at any rate) because of the senseless and self-indulgent ritual connected with food, not to mention the overeating.

Parents flew to Paris on Monday. I delivered them to the airport, returned the rented car, and went immediately to London by train.

London, National Hotel, Bedford Way

British Museum for odds-and-ends of Kazantzakis materials. I finished in a day and a half, nothing very startling. Good to see Parthenon marbles again: how extraordinary they are, and how nice to be able to put your nose right up to them, even though they belong, I suppose, on the Parthenon itself. Evening: swinging London, the casino, very good striptease with one girl more beautiful than the next.

September 26, 1967

British Museum. At night saw Ralph Richardson in The Merchant of Venice. I never realized what a bad play this is, although the performance was splendid. The first part is stunning; the last half mechanical, unimaginative, and self-contradictory. Shakespeare first arouses sympathy for the Merchant, then does him in fully, and makes him a Jewish monster of revenge, in comparison with the merciful Christians. As though we had two separate plays yoked together by force. . . . Afterwards, more of swinging London.

Wednesday, September 27, 1967

Morning: University of London library looking at Rodney Rooke's bibliography of Kazantzakis; then mummies; then National Gallery from stem to stern: Virgin of the Rocks; the unfinished Michelangelo Virgin that I had so liked previously but that didn't impress me very much now; the marvelous Rembrandt heads of old men and women. And, best of all, the fiery El Grecos, especially Christ chasing the money changers out of the temple, a larger canvas than the one depicting the same scene in the Frick Collection. Lastly, to Chatto & Windus to see Ian Parsons, Norah Smallwood being away on holiday. He received me cordially and had flattering things to say about my L. P. Hartley book although at first he referred to it as my book on E. M. Forster! They had made money on it; Hamish Hamilton had thought them crazy to publish it. As for Kazantzakis, no one knew of him, Parsons doubted that any of his books were even in print, besides Zorba; a publisher must feel he can make ends meet, etc., etc. Eventually I discovered that he thought I had come to ask for an advance, which of course I hadn't. After this was cleared up he became much more cordial, and suggested what I'd hoped he'd suggest—namely, that it would be wiser to work in the first instance through an American publisher, in which case he'd promise to buy 500 sheets, maybe more. He then dictated a letter to Korda to this effect. Marvelous

Chatto have their foot in the Art's Council door. Day Lewis is chairman and Parsons is on the board. We spoke of Eberhart, an old friend of Parsons's from Cambridge days: his sweetness, his complete absence of malice and his monolithic devotion to poetry. Lastly, Parsons informed me that a Herbert West, friend of Eberhart's, had invited him for lunch the next day. I refrained from telling him about West. Let him find out for himself. He also said he'd lunched with L. P. Hartley at the Garrick Club the week before, and that Hartley looked well. I neglected to call him because I still hadn't read The Brickfield and The Betrayal, and it would have been too embarrassing to meet him this way.

Woodbrooke opening. I plan to take Hugh Doncaster's course on Quakerism and Chrysanthi will do Tucker's on the USA and the UN, plus embroidery and crafts. Mrs. Schaeffer, secretary of the Friends World Committee, wants to play violin-piano duets. We start on Thursday.

Finished The Brickfield. Boring  $\frac{3}{4}$  of the way, then suddenly compulsive reading. All about an 18-year-old boy's one and only, first and last, relations with a girl, after which he became a writer, and bachelor. Poor Hartley.

Weekend of 7th and 8th spent at Huddersfield with Konrad and Sheila Elsdon. He is so masculine, jolly, forceful when alone, but the moment he enters the house he puts on an apron, cooks, washes dishes, reads stories to the children, and in general takes orders from his wife. Sheila, however, was in fine spirits, and actually quite pleasant at times. But we didn't do very much. Drove up with Konrad Friday night, sat around all Saturday morning and afternoon until 4:00, when we walked on the moors. Saturday night showed slides of Mount Athos. Sunday morning, Quaker Meeting. Met the remarkable Alice Robson, age 87 and still a vigorous, useful Quaker lady. She spoke beautifully, and Konrad offered a fine prayer. Huddersfield not as bad as Konrad had pictured it to us, but still very grimy. Wolverhampton, which we saw from the train on the way back, was the worst of all the awful Midland towns. What horrors they are! And how decent they could have been, as proved by Cadbury's Bournville.

October 12, 1967

I addressed the International Forum at Woodbrooke: subject: The Greek Coup: Before, During, and After. I tried to show why something was inevitable, and why a military dictatorship is just as much an honest expression of the Greek "essence" as is parliamentary democracy.

October 14, 1967

To Cambridge in a rented car to visit with Richard Dellamora, presently a student at Queens. Then to Robin and Ruth Scroggs—fine dinner, fine conversation. He is very depressed about U.S. foreign policy, and also the specter of Reagan as a presidential candidate. Ruth said something touching while we were alone for a moment: that it has taken her this long to "get to know Robin well enough so that I can feel sufficiently at ease to compose music while he's in the house."

Sunday we visited Noel Jones and Cathy and Chris. Chris and Cathy amused us with their repartee when the girl that Chris had thrown over the night before telephoned to ask if she could come to visit Cathy, though she'd do so only if she wouldn't have to meet Chris. Both children had a delicious simplicity and straightforwardness that is rare. Chris passed cigarettes to Ruth Scroggs. Ruth: "No thank you. I only smoke when I'm writing music." Chris: "Oh, that's interesting. Whose brand do you smoke?" Noel produced a copy, translated, of the form all Greek civil servants have to fill out. The most horrendous loyalty oath imaginable. Have you ever been a member of the C.P. or a front organization? Do you know any members? Have you relatives in communist countries? Etc.

Article in the Manchester Guardian describing how the police are treating political prisoners and suspects in the Bouboulinas headquarters in Athens. Exactly the same, even the same building, as the description of Gestapo treatment in Ange Vlachos's Ἦρες ζῶης. The seim anew.

Birmingham-London-Washington, DC

Train in the morning to London. Flight Pan Am London-Washington, DC leaving 2:30 London time and arriving Dulles airport 5:30 Washington time, or really 10:30 London time. My first jet flight, and of course remarkable. Marvelous cloud formations, all different patterns and consistencies. Like cotton stuffed together at times, at others thinned to fine wisps. It was remarkable, of course, to keep flying, and yet for daylight to persist when my watch told me it ought to be getting dark outside. Only at one or two moments, across the Atlantic, did we have clear sky so that we could see the ocean below, unobstructed. And at that height, 32,000 feet, with no clouds or land mass against which our motion could be compared, the plane seemed to be standing still, although it was of course proceeding at 600 mph. I had a sudden "experiential" realization of the fact that I was also whirling around on the earth, yet without any sensation of motion. Taxi from Dulles airport to Annandale, $13.00, the largest taxi fare I've ever paid. Sheila Ballard greeted me with a luscious hug, bless her Irish soul. Geoff was gracious and talkative as always, the boys handsome, sweet, well behaved. Geoff still has his moral sense, even after 14 months in the Army Materiel Command, but he also has picked up a lot of the Army reasoning. For instance, it is a strange sense of morality and public decency that keeps the generals from waging the Vietnam War the way they really would like to. And strangely, the way they suggest would very likely be more "humanitarian" than the ways public morality tolerates. For the public, it is all right to bomb the enemy, even sporting, because our pilot has a good chance of being shot down; but it is not all right to use nerve gas, which would give the entire population of Haiphong, for instance, diarrhea, long enough for us to occupy the city, and would then leave them as healthy as before. Nor is it "morally legitimate" according to the public to dig a half-mile side trench through the jungle, using atomic explosives, after having evacuated everyone—a trench that would make an impassible demarcation line and help greatly to bring about some clarification to the struggle. Geoff reiterated what he told me last time I saw him, about basic U.S. policy. The government feels, apparently, that the Soviet Union has "matured" to a point where they realize that a full-scale war could never be in their own interests, indeed would be suicidal. China is, in this respect, still “primitive” or “youthful.” The government policy is to occupy China in small wars that are just short of total (a new version of Dulles’s “brinkmanship”) for a period of 25 to 40 years, by which time she should have “matured” to the position now occupied by Russia, a maturation that will come only when she carries through her plans for industrialization, improves her standard of living, educates her masses, and in general reaches a stage where she would have more to lose in a total war than to gain.

Geoff hopes to be appointed director of the U.S. Army’s Cold Regions Research Lab eventually, and return to Hanover. Meanwhile, they are leading a strange, but typically American, life. The children go to football practice, Little League, every afternoon directly after school and don’t get home until about 7:00. Then on Saturday morning one has a game, on Saturday afternoon the other. The parents spend their time transporting them to the field. Every Saturday is football day, like it or not. Slaves! Then there is the commuting problem. Geoff rises at 6:00 a.m. in order to get to work at 9:00. In the afternoon it is the same: bumper to bumper for an hour or more. No social life because by the time he comes home he can’t face going across town again to a friend’s or to a movie. Also there is the babysitting problem. No wonder they long to return to Hanover. We had dinner, then talked until midnight, which of course was 5:00 a.m. for my poor body.

Washington,

October 25, 1967

Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert Street, NW

More talk. A shower—how lovely, after so many months. Geoff and I walked for a mile or so, briskly. Edward got “lost” and parents searched frantically, until of course they found him playing tranquilly in the rain under a tree. In the afternoon, Geoff drove me into Washington and we stopped at the Pentagon. Inconceivably huge. 30,000 people work there; the parking lots hold 20,000 cars, most likely. Geoff says that it takes a half hour just to get out of the parking lot when work is over. Do people mind, do they rebel? Most don’t. They welcome this way to spend their time, so they don’t have that much more leisure in which they have to be creative in spending their time. The Pentagon is a whole city: banks, post office, restaurants, shops, and miles and miles of corridors with offices. Chiefs of staff, Secretary of Defense, and all the lower ranges. The nerve center of an armed forces that all in all probably has 5,000,000 people on the payroll.

4:00 p.m. The Shoreham. Deluxe room at $18.00 a day. How lovely! And what an elegant, warm, tasteful hotel, with its gardens out back, its tasteful décor, its unostentatious luxury. At 6:00, group picture, then cocktails. Victor Butterfield; Merriwell Cunningham, who is the president of the Danforth Foundation; members of the selection committee; Joseph Heizberg of the New York Times; reporter from Time Magazine; editor of National Observer; and the ten lucky winners. Margaret Johnson, the administrative secretary, told me a good friend of hers was married to Malcolm Brown, his second wife. He had 3 children by the first, now 2 more. He remembered the foundation-building at Riparius. Is now at Barnard. Fellow from Reed told me they were considering Leonard Rieser for the new president but that Rieser had refused, bless him. A man from Pomona said that their presidential search committee was considering Rieser, Seymour, and Smallwood. We had a fine dinner. Then Cunningham explained the work of the foundation and Victor Butterfield made the rounds, in the style of honorary degrees, with “clever” citations. It was a bit corny. We broke up, and some of us sat in the bar for a while: De Mott from Amherst, who is a real joker, and Greenberg, very “sympathique.” I was exhausted but didn’t sleep very well.

October 26

Washington-Boston-Dublin

Up at 7:00. Breakfast of juice, poached eggs and coffee, for $1.65! At 8:30 we gathered to begin our discussion. Since we were to go to the White House, and since Butterfield in announcing this the night before had said that he would fully understand if some of us preferred not to go (he is a Quaker, they say; everyone went). I suggested that we discuss something relevant to this—namely, why we intellectuals are embarrassed at being patriotic, and in general why we have such an impoverished “community life.” I said that our colleges preach individualism in the grand Protestant manner: individual moral responsibility, individual intellectual inquiry, individual self-fulfillment, etc., without realizing that the individual is a fiction: every person is part of a stream going back into history and forward into the future; and part, also of an environment: family, college, nation, as the case may be. We—that is, the “intellectuals” and “sophisticates” deny this environment; we can do without it: it is our subject to which we give allegiance, and the college is considered almost inanimate, like a chair that can easily be given up for another chair; the same with country: we are ashamed of belonging, and try to act as though we needn't belong at all if we so wished. All this, of course, was exacerbated in my mind because of what I saw and experienced in Greece. I realized how deeply I was an American, and how thankful; I realized, furthermore, that although there are various expressions of the community life that are repugnant to us—namely, fascism and communism—this should lead us to try all the harder to develop a creative and compelling third way, instead of denying that community life matters, or even need exist.

This was discussed, though not, I am afraid, with much continuity or coherence. There was one fellow, Reddich, who spoke in long Germanic sentences, with lengthy subordinations and qualifications, spouting them out as though by compulsion, and discouraging us all, although his articulateness was extraordinary. There was another, De Mott, who had a ready wit; he described colleges like Dartmouth and Amherst as wearing fleece-lined hair shirts, and said he was damned glad that students paid no allegiance to them, and that he, as teacher, considered his first duty to be to disengage the student intellectually from this, and other, unworthy environments.

At 10:30 we loaded into taxis and went to the North Gate of the White House. Police checked our identifications against a list; we entered the presidential office wing and went directly into the Cabinet Room. Bust of Kennedy; portrait of F.D.R. as a young man; plaque on the huge table: "Presented to FDR by Jesse Jones"; French doors leading into the private, and lovely, gardens behind the White House. The chairs each with a plaque indicating a cabinet ministry, and in the center a large chair for the president. We were introduced briefly to John Gardner, secretary of health, education and welfare, who seemed to be an old friend of Victor Butterfield's; then we all sat down—I in the secretary of defense's seat!—to await the president. We were chaperoned by Douglas Cates, presidential assistant with special responsibility for educational problems. Since we had about a half hour to wait, we continued our discussion. Cates asked about the publish-or-perish problem, and were there any "disincentives" for the man who did not publish. I told him I thought his word lovely, but its soft sound shouldn't make us forget that there was indeed a very definite “disincentive”: the fact that you were fired! After a time, Reddich began one of his labyrinthine speeches, in the midst of which, at 11:00 a.m. sharp, in strode Lyndon Johnson. We all leapt to our feet. He sat; we sat. Victor Butterfield made a short introductory comment, saying who we were and why we were being honored, and what the Danforth Foundation was. Then the president spoke, actually for a full half hour, at first from some notes he had on a card, but then much more informally. It was a monologue, completely. I got the feeling that he is used to hearing himself on such occasions, and doesn’t expect any dialogue. He said, really very graciously, how glad he was to meet with us; that he had three engagements that morning: us, a meeting of the security council immediately afterwards, a reception for the president of Mexico. And we were just as important as the security council and the president of Mexico because education was the backbone of a country: nothing, but nothing, was more important. Then he went into old, and rather saccharine stories, which I’m sure are dragged out on all educational occasions—how he owes everything to a certain professor at Texas State Teachers College: if not for him he wouldn’t have done what he’d done; he’d probably be digging ditches instead of having 12 years in the House, 12 in the Senate, 3 as vice president and 3 or so as president. He then expanded on the accomplishments of his administration, in just 3 years, in education. “Eighteen education bills passed,” he kept repeating. “Eighteen.” And more money for education than was spent for the entire U.S. budget in the year—. (How deceptive these statistics are, as they don’t take into account the dollar’s decline in value!) He also regretted that we have to spend so much money on Vietnam; we’d be willing to stop if the other side was, but they’re not, so what can we do? It’s easy to see Vietnam, he continued, but not so easy to see what we’ve been doing more quietly, with the Soviet Union: 3 major treaties in my administration—non-proliferation of atomic weapons, treaty on outer space, and now a consular agreement whereby their people will be spread out over this country and our diplomats over theirs. And then there was Mrs. Johnson, who’d been out helping colleges and had just returned at 1:00 a.m. that night. And if you want to see what a woman can do in the interests of beauty, just take a look at the White House gardens. It was a sad performance though he of course has a certain charm. Fortunately for him, he had to stop. He stood up; we stood up; and he went round the table while each of us in turn introduced himself and shook the president's hand, his left hand, his right had suffered a burn, and he kept it in his pocket. When he came to Prof. Biggers, a Negro from a small, poor college in Houston, the president of the Danforth Federation noted to the president that he—Professor Biggers—was the only Texan among the group. The president said he was especially glad to see him there. At 11:30 the president left and we were shooed out so that the security council could begin. As we were leaving, the garden door opened with a neat click and in came a man meticulously dressed and groomed, as though made of wax. He said "Hello" to us in a clipped voice: it was McNamara. (Geoff told me that McNamara is absolutely brilliant, a mental giant.) We were told later that the initiative for this visit to the White House came from Harold Howe in the department of education.

Back to the Shoreham. Lunch. Walk in the sun. Chat with De Mott in the lovely garden in back of the hotel. He had taught in Birmingham for a year, so we had common experiences and impressions, mostly about the weather. The afternoon discussion centered on direction versus in-direction in teaching. De Mott held that we should deliberately cultivate amateurism, dilettantism, that the student should see the work as meaningful to him before he needs to understand its every nuance, struggle over technical matters, etc. Pretty much the problem of whether classics should be taught in the original language or in translation, applied to all fields. De Mott was of course against the New Criticism. The other side was defended by Greenberg and others. I tried to bridge the two fanaticisms by suggestion that all is true only in a given time and place. In contexts where students venerate the tradition we can go ahead and teach it "professionally"; in contexts, today's for instance, where they are disaffected, we must be amateurish enough to interest them, to show them that the tradition is meaningful to them.

We broke up at 4:00, said cordial goodbyes. Taxi to National Airport. I telephoned my parents, also Ellen DeCesare. Lovely flight to Boston. How different the crowds were at Boston airport. Irish-Americans waiting for Aer Lingus; Italian-Americans; no more of the Washington Anglo-Saxon flavor. Night plane to Shannon & Dublin. No sleep. Sat next to an Irish mine worker returning after 11 years in Canada, to work in copper mines in the west of Ireland.

Statue commemorating the Easter Rebellion. AMDG St. Francis Xavier's Church (Gardner Street), Mother Most Admirable Sodality, Special Retreat. For Men Whose Working Hours Prevent Their Attendance at Parish Retreats. Rev. Joseph Couran, S.J., Retreat Director. The Confession also, each with the priest's name: Father Patrick O'Sullivan, etc. Browne & Nolan, Ltd. printers. Westmoreland Row Station. Merion Square. St. Stephen's Green. Shelburne Hotel. Yeats memorial, an "attribute" by Henry Moore. The school children; the sniggers. How poor Dublin is: beggar women and children; slums; no new housing estates; general drabness and dirt; very depressing. St. Francis Xavier's Church in Gardner Street—wasn't this Father Conmee's? I went to Eccles Street, my heart beating. But number 7 isn't there any more. Numbers 1 to 5 are intact, but 6 and 7 are victims of what looks like a recent fire. Nothing stands but the front doors, with an empty shell behind; and the upper storeys collapsed. Mr. Bloom had to be rather athletic to climb over the railing and drop down to enter through the basement kitchen. It's quite a drop, about 15 feet at least.

Dublin, Central Hotel, Exchequer Street

Saturday. Bus to Dalkey and Joyce's Martello tower, which was closed for the winter, alas. But I saw the Forty-Foot hole in operation: a group of 8 or 9 men in their 50s was swimming with the temperature outside about 55, and me bundled in pullover and scarf. Lovely view from the tower: sea, strand, Howth Head in the distance. On the return trip I got off at Sandymount Strand, which was just as Joyce described it in Proteus: the cockle lake, the pools on the sand, stray couples accompanied by dogs. Quiet, fresh air—a lovely place to meditate. Passed H-E-L-Y-S on Dame Street: a large stationary store. Walked along the quays, past the Customs House, to see the Pigeon House in the distance, and returned along the Grand Canal, one of the four crossed by Mr. Bloom on his way to the cemetery, in Hades. Lots of walking. Dublin looked a lot better today, with sunlight and blue sky. I was the only one with an umbrella and scarf. In the afternoon I bought Chrysanthi a hand-knit sweater and beret. Then off to Phoenix Park, by bus. Lovely park: greens, lakes, swans, flowers. Saw the Wellington Obelisk; the placard thanks Wellington for “saving Europe and Asia.” Big words. To Little Britain Street to see Barney Kiernan’s, but it isn’t there any more. Also Nelson’s Pillar is gone, having been blown up by a bomb in 1966. But I found Belvedere College, which is indeed very impressive and plush, in a fashionable part of the city. As Simon Dedalus said, “Nothing but the best for the Jesuits.” Now to the Abbey Theatre for Brendan Behan’s Borstal Boy, a rollicking adaptation of his autobiography. The actor who played the mature Behan was an amazing likeness, both in looks and in voice. A young actor played the sixteen-year-old Behan, who was sent by the IRA to Liverpool with dynamite, was apprehended, and sentenced to three years in a Borstal. The play shows the pervasive prejudice against the Irish “micks” and “paddies,” but also how Behan’s good spirits, love of song, natural eloquence, and general pluck won over the others. It was well staged, well acted, with ballads, slapstick humor, pathos, and a wonderful rapport between stage and audience. It was of course thrilling to be in the famous Abbey Theatre, even if the building itself is new, the original one having burnt down. Dominating the main foyer, as you enter, is a lovely, huge portrait of W. B. Yeats in middle age, with his youthful face and mop of gray hair, like a patron spirit looking down upon his creation. There is also a portrait of George Russell (AE) by John B. Yeats, the poet’s father. The audience stood and listened to the national anthem before the performance. With Irish independence so relatively recent, and won at such cost, this was a moving experience and not just a formality, at least for me.

Dublin-Birmingham

Sunday. Walked to see George Moore’s house in Ely Place. Then to Quaker Meeting, Eustace Street. Very evangelical spirit: Bible readings, very Christ-centered—the most evangelical of the four Dublin meetings, as I learned later. The members were very friendly, talking to me; and the Lambs invited me to lunch. Harold Lamb, the patriarch, and one of his sons, not Douglas, but the young son, with his three children; wife was home with four-month-old baby. We all went to the Clarence Hotel for a simple and lovely dinner, with an easy flow of talk. Thence to the airport just in time for the 2:45 plane to Birmingham.

Behan in Borsal Boy: Priest to young Brendan: “You can come to confession, son.” Young Brendan: “But I haven’t sinned, Father.” Old Brendan: “Yes, and that means, I suppose, that clean boys don’t have to wash!”

November 3, 1967

To London for meeting in Friends' House about possibility of aiding families of Greek political prisoners. Chairman was the FSC head of the "Europe Committee." Joy Jones and Muriel Lindsay were present, and some others. We concluded that an approach might possibly be made through the new archbishop, who is familiar with Quakers because he visited the Salonika school. Nothing definite decided, however.

After the meeting I rushed to a concert by the Theodorakis ensemble, in Red Lion Square, a lovely corner of London. Met there Peter Cadogan, whom I had seen at the Omonia Hotel on the day of the coup. He is secretary of the Committee of 100 for non-violent direct action, and was organizer of the concert. It was a very emotional evening with a very good audience clapping, snapping fingers, shouting bravos. Theodorakis's music becomes a bit wearisome in such a large dose, however. It was touching that this concert should be going on while he is languishing in prison, and facing a possible death sentence. Also Ritsos, the poet, author of many of the lyrics, is in jail. Awful!

I heard one Greek student, obviously long resident in England, say: "My people are the most lethargic in the world. Why, on the day of the coup there weren't 20 people in Athens, there wasn't even one, to go out to Constitution Square and cry Bravo for democracy." How naïve he is! He should have been there himself, to get a belly full of machine-gun slugs.

November 11, 1967

Drove to Eastwood. There is a small plaque on the house where D. H. Lawrence was born. The house is still occupied as a residence. The street, or rather the neighborhood, with its rows of absolutely unadorned, identical homes, door by door, one room in front, one in back, two upstairs, is the most dismal I have ever seen. We glimpsed into one of the "parlors." Minuscule. Filled to capacity by the usual "suite" of two huge armchairs and a settee. Out back, the kitchen, and the toilet outdoors. A plot of garden. Coal smoke belching from all the chimney pots. The pits are still operating, or at least some of them are. These rows, we were told, are all pit houses—still—that is, owned by the company. Some young men issued from the awful doors, which are of course without bells or ringers of any kind. Burly, black-faced, with huge chests and biceps. Yet the children are sweet tow-headed ragamuffins "killing each other" with toy sub-machineguns. Some of the girls were pretty, with nice legs: well fed. Yet what a childhood! What an awful awful place in which to grow up, with the fathers going off every morning to chop at the coal, returning filthy, and on Fridays spending their pay to get drunk—certainly they were justified—and then beating their wives.

Lawrence's "chapel" was down the street, as dismal as all the rest. His sense of being trapped, of being a sensitive "freak" in an alien environment, must have been overwhelming. And it is certainly shallow and heartless of anyone to condemn Lawrence for his sensitivity or need to rebel, or his fervent hatred of mines, slag heaps, and mine owners. By comparison, Joyce, in Dublin, was living in a modern Athens, the cultural center of the world. His "professional sensitivity" may seem to us a bit precious and affected, perhaps, his rebellion overdone, even psychopathic, but not Lawrence's. He was fighting, almost physically, biologically, for his right to live as a "human" instead of a "mole."

We drove to one of the pit heads, which of course is much more mechanized than it could have been in Lawrence's day, with huge elevators, loading devices, storehouses, etc. Unfortunately nothing was in operation, as it was Sunday.

Back on the M1. Tea in the Motorway service area, which made us feel we were in America, and also sense the very real attraction of certain American ways: the newness, clean lines, spaciousness, large windows, and of course the efficient heating.

A full day ended with a musicale at Woodbrooke. Blanche Schaeffer and I played the first two movements of Schubert's 1st Sonatina, in A major. What a splendid piece, and so simple to play, really. There were songs in Dutch, Finnish, Hindi, German, English, Swedish, and Camarons. Choir; recorder group; John Kaye singing the executioner's song from the Mikado, and the Camaroon students, the one who is a minister, and a colleague of his, also a Presbyterian, got us all singing a jazzy song that meant Thank Thee, Lord. The same rhythms and flavor as the gospel music of the American south. They also got us all dancing spasmodically and jerkily in a dozen different kinds of twists. To conclude, the choir group sang a hymn in divine harmony.

What a gift to be able to entertain oneself wholesomely in this way. I remember this from the Woodbrooke of 1955 also; none of the freshness has been lost over the years. The place seems to attract resourceful, concerned, talented and above all wholesome people. The Dartmouth student drinking himself into a lonely stupor on a Saturday night is a sad comparison.

“The rule of ethics [is] that one could only wish for oneself to be good and for other people to be happy.” —L. P. Hartley, The Betrayal (London), p. 81.

Spoke to the Ελληνικός Κύκλος of the University of Birmingham Classics Department on Kazantzakis and demotic. Nice group. They actually give a B.A. in Modern Greek, and all classics students are required to take a term of Modern Greek. Those who wish can spend time at the University of Thessaloniki. All this because of the drive of Professor George Thomson, the father-in-law of Χρήστος Αλεξίου. The Reader, Willets, was also very much for the “continuity of Greek language and civilization.” The evening was “Greek” and relaxed. Dinner at the house of the department secretary, a young girl with a three-year-old boy, separated from husband. Too much food; nice wine; all the officers of the Κύκλος there; talk about Athos, Byzantium, Kazantzakis, the Pattakos régime. At the talk itself, ρετσίνα. No hurry to begin. Afterwards, long discussion (argument?) about Kazantzakis’s virtues and defects, with the usual responses, especially by the Greeks present: that his characters aren’t believable; that he retreats to metaphysics instead of confronting “reality.” Humorous incident on the way home. The girl-student who drove me (Judith Herrin) was short of cash and hadn’t filled her gas tank. So we ran out of petrol half way home; all then pushed the car (luckily a Morris Minor) to the nearest station, which of course was closed. I returned on the bus.

Later saw Willets, Alexiou, etc. again when Father Peter Levi, S.J. (!) spoke in the university’s Byzantine series. What a bizarre Jesuit. In dog collar, lecturer’s gown, and a bright green pullover. Very homosexual, I felt. But brilliant, and able to converse easily in δημοτική. The Jesuits send him to Greece every winter for 4 or 5 months because his health is too delicate for the English climate. And in his Jesuit college at Oxford, Campion Hall, he has no duties, no students. He is just maintained: to write, think, worship.

Also heard Rev. Κάλλιστος Timothy Ware in the same series. He’s English to the bone, a convert to Orthodoxy, and now a παπάς with beard, hairdo, and all. He spoke well on St. Gregory Palamas and St. Symeon the New Theologian, but had none of the charming eccentricity of Peter Levi, who spoke of the church on Poros as a haystack of ice cream, dressed in 300 white petticoats.

Two trips to London for the Europe Committee of FSC, trying to send relief workers to Greece. Alun Davies, the very capable chairman; Joy Jones, Muriel Lindsay, a woman named Baker who remembered me from Haverford (I hadn't the foggiest idea who she was); she even remembered that I was planning to "retire" to my farm in the Adirondacks. On the first trip (November 3rd) I stayed for the Theodorakis singers and met the Executive Secretary of the Committee of 100, who had been in the Omonia Hotel with me on the day of the coup. Afterwards, cabaret, very good

All through term, I played chamber music with Blanche Schaeffer, a very indifferent violinist, but capable and energetic director of Friends World Committee. How I wish I could speak French decently, to communicate with her mother! We did Bach, Mozart, and performed (!) the first Schubert Sonata (B-flat) at a Woodbrooke musicale. Towards the end of term I did a Sammartini piece with Patt Hibbs, an oboist. We also tried a very difficult Hindemith piece, with a modicum of success. She is a strange, vibrant, intense creature; looks exactly like the anemic long-necked woman in the pre-Raphaelite paintings in the Birmingham museum.

Saw a fine production of Pier Gynt at the Birmingham Rep. Very much like Kazantzakis's plays: metaphysical, a cry for freedom from the bourgeois. Fantasy fused with reality. But Ibsen got, and gets, performed. Poor Kazantzakis!

December 4-5, 1967

Lovely excursion to Oxford. Pretext: the Danforth dinner. We stayed in luxury at the Randolph Hotel, the boys baby-sitting while Chrysanthi and I ate: sherry, hors d'oeuvres, plaice, roast duckling, sweet, liqueurs, coffee. Sumptuous. They toasted the queen, lugubriously. No one toasted President Johnson, for fear that too few would deign to rise. I sat next to a gorgeous blond, about 22, recent graduate of Mt. Holyoke, reading English lit at Oxford. How young girls exhilarate me! Beauty! The only disappointment—no, not really a disappointment—was that who should we meet there but the Lanhams, she, not he, being the holder of a Danforth fellowship. I disliked him intensely at Dartmouth and he perhaps me, but here, as so often happens, we were "old friends." It was only later on, when he got Merriwell Cunningham and us together for drinks, and monopolized the conversation in his whining Brooklynese voice, that I confirmed my earlier dislike. What a thoroughly unpleasant creature!

Earlier, we visited Muriel Lindsay and John Garrard. The time with Muriel, strangely, was rather stiff, though she certainly did her best, and was very smiling and warm. I think it was Chrysanthi who maintained the reserve, which is rare. Had a pleasant tea with Garrard in his little home south of Oxford. His wife is Vietnamese, from Saigon, obviously very well placed. Her brother-in-law is presently a cabinet minister. I asked her if she favored the American presence, and she replied, "Of course I do. The Americans are all we've got. If they leave, 'we' [meaning of course her class] all get killed." "So," I said, "it's really desperation. You know that your days are numbered, and you're using us to postpone the doom that is practically unavoidable." "Yes, it's desperation," she agreed. Garrard surprised me with his anti-British feeling, since he's British himself. "Oh, but they're so inefficient," he kept moaning. Yet he liked his Merton College atmosphere, dining in; high table; sitting next to great scholars and all the rest of the lovely inefficiency.

Oxford gorgeous, nicer than Cambridge because it's more grouped, clustered, and gives a more genuine medieval feeling. But this is balanced with a sparkling modern shopping street: all plate glass and chrome; a bit of Americana where it's needed, as long as it doesn't one day predominate.

Tuesday morning we walked to Blackwell's, the Sheldonian, the great library. Then went for lunch with George Hill. Found him married. Hadn't seen him since 1959 when he had just commissioned my translation of Ο τελευταίος πειρασμός. Now the one-man operation is a "two-man" one; his wife is a cultivated German Jewess, extremely pleasant and gracious in a plump sort of way. He: all hospitality. The books are all doing well, especially Zorba, which of course was helped by the film. He rejected Antonakes's dissertation as too "dissertationish." Told me the same stories as last time: How the Swedes changed the Agha's boyfriend to a girl in Ο Χριστός ξανασταυρώνεται, and how, when he submitted the manuscript of Friar's Odyssey translation to Bowra and T. S. Eliot, he received a flourishing euphony from Bowra—the greatest work of the 20th century—and from Eliot one word: “unreadable.” I made propaganda for my work-in-progress, although I’d rather have Chatto do it.

The great surprise “plunder” from this visit was a typescript of Mme Kazantzakis’s letters/biography in Amy Mims’s translation. I had written to Mims seeking a copy, had received no reply, and here, unexpectedly at Cassirer’s, was a duplicate carbon copy that he simply handed to me to keep.

We also caught a glimpse of Angus Lindsay, who came to us at the Randolph. He’s about 19, six feet tall, and very gentle and sweet. Wants to come to the U.S. for six months before entering university next fall. Muriel came too, and our second visit with her had the true warmth and glow, making up for the strange chill of the first.

Returned through Stratford. How lovely the countryside between Stratford and Oxford, and how different from the Midlands. Dragged the children to the various sites, after dark. Culture or die!

As soon as we reached home, I rushed out again to go to the Ελληνικός Κύκλος to hear Litterdale lecture on Μακρυγιάννης, whom he has translated. He made him out very neurasthenic, pathological, seeing him from an Englishman’s point of view. Subsequently, Alexiou read me aloud from the preface to the Memoirs, and here Makriyannis, far from seeming an oriental maniac, reminded me of the Augustan men of the eighteenth century. Enlightenment, so symmetrical and polished was his style: full of balance, antithesis—a beautiful prose. And he taught himself to read and write, just so he could embark on the book. A remarkable man.

Litterdale’s wife, a beautiful Ελληνίδα. We talked. She was born in Σιδερόκαστρον but came early to Salonika. Before long, I’d discovered that she’d worked at the Quaker School, and knew Chrysanthi at least by name. I told her that we’d just that instant come from visiting Muriel Lindsay, expecting her to be delighted and inquisitive, which she wasn’t—and this perplexed me. When I returned home I understood why. Chrysanthi remembered her. She worked as Lindsay’s translator the final year of his tenure at the School, and he fell in love with her, much to the chagrin and embarrassment, no doubt, of all the goodly Quakers in Friends’ House. No wonder she wasn’t enthusiastic about having news from Mrs. Lindsay!

December 10, 1967

We performed again at Woodbrooke. Leander played “Darktown Strutter’s Ball” and “St. Louis Blues.” Alec and Leander did a violin-piano duo; Chrysanthi sang Μανούλα μου, to which we all danced the κλέφτικο, myself included. On a previous occasion the boys had also done Theodorakis’s Όταν θα πας στον ουρανό. We concluded with Chrysanthi and Alec dancing to the Zorba music played by Leander. All this was for the annual Christmas party given by Woodbrooke for the old and infirm of the neighborhood. A very heartwarming event, although (the rest of) the entertainment wasn’t very stirring.

December 12, 1967

Goodbyes at Woodbrooke. The Warden, to whom I hadn’t said more than two words the entire term, surprised me by the warmth of his farewell and good wishes, and his remark, “It’s nice for us to have a family like yours, one that really holds together. Don’t see that very often.” Blanche Schaeffer sent Daphne a birthday card that we found on the boat, and the Woodbrookers a joint card for all of us.

Memories: Hugh’s good lectures and discussions, where I played devil’s advocate. John Kaye the retired schoolmaster and amateur actor-director. John Mawston, who after two weeks was engaged to be married to Helen, who had gone off to Algeria, and was increasingly melancholy afterwards. The strangely ugly but lovable Molly Porter. Rachel from Dublin. Ruth Brand, lummucking around like an awkward male, yet ravishingly beautiful if she’d only take care of herself. Eric Tucker with his strange accent, always worried about getting speakers for his forum; very cold and unapproachable. Our tutor, Muriel Poulter, smiling old maid who lectured on St. John’s gospel and British churches. Jesse, who couldn’t stop talking. Denys, the retired jeweler, living on his coupons on Majorca, and full of Hellenic verve. Mary the social worker, being very “advanced,” able to talk about sea, etc., but what did she practice, poor thing, as she slowly was passing from youth into old maid-dom.

December 13, 1967

London

Lovely walk along the Thames, in front of the Royal Festival Hall. While we were waiting for the boat train we saw a headline about Constantine’s counter-coup in Greece. Very excited. But all our predictions turned out wrong.

December 14–19, 1967

SS Queen Elizabeth

Smooth crossing. Even Chrysanthi attended all meals but one. I read practically all of Mme Kazantzakis's letters/biography in typescript: an extraordinary document that shows Kazantzakis as an entirely different man that one would suppose from other accounts: as loving and lovable, very attracted to some, very warm and solicitous. And how he can write!

I went to the cinema every day. Each and every film was about war and violence: medieval knights slaughtering each other like gladiators; modern crime, sadism.

December 19, 1967

20 E. 74th Street

Home. Dad recovering well after the gall bladder operation. Bought a new car. In the evening, we received a call from Bubbles. Sidney had fallen, and she couldn't lift him. Dad and I hastened downstairs. He was on the floor, in a half-extended, half-crouching position his head elevated, resting on a low stool. He looks 95 years old, is just a living skeleton, the result of his cancer, which is literally starving him to death. No flesh, no muscles, no strength. "I'm like a dying horse," he said to my father as he lay there, unable to rise. We lifted him gently. When I placed my hands beneath his armpits there was no flesh, just skeleton covered by a film. It was impossible to grasp him without causing him pain. As we were maneuvering, trying to devise the best way to raise him (we decided to do it in two stages: first to seat him on the stool, and from there to lift him upright), my father made small talk to divert him. We had just called Alice in Arizona and Dad mentioned how pleasant these calls were, but how deceptive the time—or how easily, and expensively, it elapsed. The last call had cost $9.00. Sidney, still on the floor, looked up and said, "You know, Adolph, somewhere in the Talmud there's a prayer: Dean God, forgive me for the pleasures I denied myself." We placed him in bed, and his noble wife spent ten minutes adjusting his helpless body so it could be comfortable. He wanted to urinate "if the gentlemen don't mind," but was too weak to void anything. "Have you ever been so weak?" he asked my father. Poor man, he has never been told of the cancer, and believes he will get well. Finally Bubbles gave him some codeine, and he slept. This has been going on for a year. She is a saint, full of good cheer, patience, indulgence. She told Dad on one occasion, "I am a fortunate woman: first for having had such a fine life with this wonderful man, and second for being able to see him out of life, and to help his passage in any way I can.”

Hanover

Drove to Hanover. No lights on car, except front headlights, but it was just a fuse. How beautiful New Hampshire and Vermont are! How nice to return to such scenery! No snow. Warm. I was able to get the storm windows on, and to rake the leaves.

December 23, 1967

We have been warmly received by friends, the Williamsons and the Rasiases especially. The Taylors stopped in. Chrysanthi is going to teach Modern Greek in my stead, using John Rasiias's Peace Corps techniques.

December 25, 1967

Music and carol singing at the Vances. Bill Vance and Alec on violin, Leander on piano, Bennet Vance on 'cello. Ehrmann was there with his grown sons, one of whom is an assistant director-trainee in Hollywood, and very desirous of letting everyone know. I found him obnoxious. Afterwards, turkey at Williamsons'. Lowell Schwartz was there with his new wife.

On Sunday: Meeting. Nice to return to that home also. I spoke about Jesus' sense of being a son to an ever-meaningful Father, combining what I'd learned from Muriel Poulter and from Lossky's book about emptying: κένωσις.

December 27, 1967

Lunch at the Barclay Joneses' in South Pomfret. Their son and daughter were there, with spouses and children. The house is more modest than I had expected.

December 30, 1967

Kazantzakis to Börje Knös, July 10, 1955 (in Eleni's book, typescript p. 704): "At present you too are resting in the country. What does 'rest' mean for us? It means: We are working at what we want, and not what external necessity demands."

Kazantzakis on Naples: ¶ . . . Everywhere a filth royale, glowing in the sun. The people spit, piss wherever they happen to be, shove not their fingers but their entire hands into colossal nostrils of infinite elasticity. (Επιστολές προς τη Γαλάτεια.)

¶ Sadness. How brightly the big eyes shine, all fire in the midst of rags and laziness. This spirit is all wasted. For lack of use, it evaporates in flamboyant improvisation, jovial ballads, futile exhilaration. . . . “Why should we think?” one pale, magnificent youth said to me. “All’s in vain in the presence of so much beauty.” Here thinking would break the harmony. The people of the north think in order to protect themselves: for their own self-preservation, to replace the ugly world around them with the world their own brains invent. Here, thought is superfluous. —In Eleni’s letters.

January 18, 1968

Good Meeting this morning. Elizabeth Ballard, who is a poet at heart, spoke of the difference between the fingers in a musical composition and the spirit. With our spirit we hear it one way; with our fingers we play it another—and inferior—way. To concentrate on getting our fingers right seems to neglect and impede the spirit, until we realize that only through the fingers can the spirit of the music be realized.

I spoke also, of my melancholy since returning to the U.S. Like Virginia Woolf I meet this by observing: by observing my own despondency. Maybe all this is simply the entry into middle age. When you are young you are necessarily self-centered; you want to assert yourself sexually, then to get a good job, be admired, be secure, etc.—all in terms of personal assertion and fulfillment. Perhaps middle age begins when this process concludes. Now is the time to expand our awareness to society. The focus should no longer be: what am I doing to utilize my potential, etc., but rather: how does my personal solution fit into the larger picture, into the context of society, and ultimately of God. So, I concluded, perhaps it was the insufficiency of groups that has been causing my melancholy, an insufficiency that is particularly galling as I enter middle age and try to see myself in a context larger than the personal one. Many are discouraged by the U.S.: how can this be a meaningful context for us any longer? And Dartmouth? Only the Quaker group functions spiritually, drawing out the best in the individual.

I don't want to meet the problem by retreating to five-finger exercises, burying the problem in busyness. One is buoyed up, of course, by the little joys: a baby's smile, a lovely sun, a student with his arm around a coed's waist; but this isn't enough, especially when you feel that all meaningful groups have been undermined and made irrelevant. Something I read yesterday, however, in Teilhard, has given me encouragement. He says that the very turning inward to self that is at the root of our modern isolation—that is, the very increase in self-consciousness that has come with the Renaissance and Reformation is a necessary stage in evolution, leading back to valid groups and indeed to the first time in history when men have consciously been able to think in terms of one world. Even the materialism, especially cars, planes, televisions, is a collaborator in this process, making for a degree of psychic intercourse and interpenetration never before possible or conceivable. Hence the finger-exercises, so to speak, although seeming at first to deaden the music, will eventually produce the spiritual result that is desirable, and our present obsession with self, a kind of societal youth, will lead to a meaningful sense of the group, and the hump of middle age will be crossed.

Teilhard also says that love is simply the affinity of one body for another, so that one molecule can be said to be in love with another when it joins with the latter to form an aggregate. In this sense, also, all the various forms of love: heterosexual, homosexual, friendship, filial, paternal, maternal, are also subsumed. Like dogs, we are attracted to each other. And this, even in its most sordid manifestations, is that wonderful thing: love.

January 21, 1968

We received word that Δημοσθένης Προύσαλης died. Strange, I felt nothing and Chrysanthi didn't seem to either. We have entered the downward curve, when we must now begin listing the deaths of people we have known or loved, until someone lists ours.

March 11, 1968

Absurd world. Paul Buseck was on one of his business trips. He left his hotel in Dallas, Texas, went to the parking lot to get his car, and was buried under a building that collapsed on top of him.

May, 1968

Modern Greek symposium at the University of Maryland. Μιτσάκης, Friar, Keeley, Λαούρδας, and others. Met Tom Doulis, Andonis Decavalles. Reunion with Ευρώ and with Sarah Niles Kafatos. My embarrassment in thinking that Ευρώ was Sarah. If a young girl ever did fall for me (as I in my ignorance thought perhaps Sarah had), I would be helpless. The revolutionary students, wanting to kill in order to oust the junta. Met Ambassador Palamas. Exhilarating three days. At the end, we founded the Modern Greek Studies Association.

Summer (Terpni), 1968

Lots of haying. Wrote essay on Kazantzakis and politics for Panichas's anthology. Also completed chapter on Kazantzakis and demotic. Fine visits from Williamsons, Ballards, Carlsons. Also Richard and Aina Taylor with two mothers-in-law. Trout all died at once. Hedgehogs: trapping, hitting them over the head with a baseball bat. Two lambs, which I slaughtered together with Bill Heid. Shingled side of house with Jeff Amory, who stopped just before returning to Hong Kong. New neighbors: Ralph and Milly Morrell (Sibler's place). Alas, they are "developing it." Sibler's many visits, with Ora, and his new girlfriend and the nice Italian lady d'un certain âge. Coleen estranged. She wanted to visit, too, but we had to warn her off, lest she meet Carl. Visit from Dr. Barnard on her way to a California home for the aged. Leslie now married and radiant. Visit from Carmans. He's built another home. Visit even from Rabbi Green, who presented me with a little book he published in Israel, in Hebrew. Vanity. Parents, with Alice's children. Unusual problems. Alice caught in Prague the day the Russians invaded. Got out to Frankfort after three days.

September, 1968

Lovely visit from Peter Gardner and his second wife, Mary Helen (Maitch). Our friendship still very warm. They both were enthused by Hannover, making me realize how fine it is to live here. I submitted Peter's name as a candidate for the assistant director of Hopkins Center, but nothing came of it.

Fall term, 1968

Work on "Negro Committee" and COP regarding ROTC problem. Chairmanship of Comparative Literature. Wellek's visit.

November 8, 1968

To Montreal with Rogers and Soong Elliott. First time Chrysanthi and I had been off alone in how long! Eat eat eat. French food, Chinese food, Brittany food. Hot baths. Sleep. Croissants leisurely in Aux Delice's on Ste. Catherine Street. All this made possible, of course, by our having the au pair girl, Rosemary Chedburn, for the year.

November 15–16, 1968

To Cambridge (Massachusetts). Lunch with Keeleys, Prof. and Mrs. Cedric Whitman, and George Seferis and his wife. Tour of the Greek collection at Houghton and Widener libraries. Mrs. Paul Buck, the curator, wide-eyed Philhellene, Ο Κύριος Σταύρος, ο υπουργός from Cyprus, who got a little drunk toward midnight and started dancing ridiculously. The “group” all there: Νικολόπουλος, Ευρώ, Keeley, Decavalles. Seferis’s reading splendid. Keeley read in English, then Seferis in Greek. I liked especially “The King of Asine,” and “Helen” (very appropriate for Vietnam), and a little poem about art, roughly: “As the wind-blown tree retains the shape imposed on it by the wind, after the wind has left, so words retain the shape imposed on them by the soul of the writer, after he has left.” I felt the desolation of realizing how I am wasting my life in frivolities. Only art matters. Only creativity. Michael and Ellen Antonakes were there. He shared this feeling. (How he glows when he dances!) Party afterwards at the home of the Damascos. Met Vrettos, novelist who admired my Greco. Also had long conference with Προυσής, who offered detailed corrections and suggestions for my Kazantzakis and demotic chapter, showing how I tend to generalize from insufficient evidence. Breakfast next morning with Bob and Ilona Bell. He, too, is so nice. There are many fine people in my life. Deo gratias! Seferis’s humor, a kind of defense.

Talking for several hours today with Peter Sorlien. I realized how wrong I was in giving Stephen Cox an E last term. No, I had known this before, but I suddenly realized something else, perhaps because I'd just finished lecturing on Under Western Eyes—namely, that the bond of trust established between Cox and myself, or rather Cox's trust in me, was more important than the fact that Cox infringed the rules, did not fulfill requirements, etc. I upheld one group of values but in the process betrayed something else that was more vital. Sorlien also suddenly illuminated the problem of grades for me. The whole system is based on the ingrained American need for producing something. The student takes the course so that it may "produce" something—namely, the grade. He cannot take the course in and for itself because American life doesn't value anything in and for itself. Athletics must produce a prize; study must produce a published article, and so forth. This whole syndrome also accounts for the taciturnity of students in class. Because they are worried about what their performance will produce and because they view the teacher as someone with power over them, not as a fellow-explorer in learning, they are circumspect, preferring to remain silent rather than take the chance of saying something silly. Nor do they enjoy talk for its own sake, intellectual exchange for its own sake, wit for its own sake. The question remains, of course, what to do about this. The revolutionists, somewhat naïvely and irresponsibly, say: Destroy the system. But they do not say what we are to replace it with, and do not explain why people will act any better under a new system. And surely it is folly to expect that the educational system, especially on the college level, can be changed unless the systems in high school and grade school are also changed, and ultimately the entire system of the country itself.

My own thinking at present, as expressed most recently in my chapel talk on values, is that we must somehow convince the present system to support something that is, in a sense, its own negation but at the same time its flower, and proof of its “bigness.” In other words, we must convince a system based on productivity to support a remnant, a leaven that rejects productivity, just as we must convince a system based on violence to support a remnant that rejects violence. Somehow, the system must come to view these “useless,” “parasitic,” “irresponsible” remnants as necessary for the system’s spiritual health, like the salt that keeps the meat from rotting—just as the feudal system viewed the monasteries. The great danger, of course, is that the system in so doing will “out-smart” itself, and in supposedly tolerating these remnants will really use them as a kind of front to hide things that need hiding. Thus the toleration and recognition, I suppose, must always be precarious, must always seem to be a threat to the system; otherwise the use of the remnant as a front will be almost inevitable.

Jonathan Mirsky, who was a witness at the Spock trial, told me that the judge was 86 years old, born the same year as FDR. Jonathan, from the witness box, could see that the old man had a hot water bottle under each foot, and that as soon as he seated himself he surreptitiously undid his garters, whereupon his socks crumpled down around his ankles. In the interval, two fresh hot water bottles were brought.

¶ The Modern Greek language can be said to have suffered a stroke. Vowels, the full oi’s and ei’s of classical days, have been eclipsed to a waning, whining ee. Obsessive jumbling of consonants in the dark speech of a brilliant, impaired mind. A crime committed in the name of Grimm’s Law. —James Merrill, in The (Diblos) Notebook, p. 94.

Attended meeting of the SDS group in Parkhurst last night. About 200 students crowded into the hallway of Parkhurst Hall, which they had “occupied” all day long. Looking at them, I had an epiphany: they were adults, not boys. Finally, they were doing something that was real. They were attempting to move mountains, and ready to take the consequences for failure. In another epiphany I saw them as like the guerrilla bands gathered in the Greek mountains. The same quiet dignity yoked with an incipient ferocity and even brutality. The same ritualistic postures: music, camaraderie, free sex, equality of male and female, respect for the other so long as he made sense and displayed παλικαριά.

Their meeting was conducted on a plane higher than that of the faculty meeting. The chairman was better. (They rotate leadership, which, as in Quakerism, produces many good leaders.) They spoke to the point, without wasting time. When someone began to say something irrelevant to the motion on the floor, he was shouted down. In many things, especially minor questions, there was a splendid efficiency. "I'll hear one speaker pro and one speaker con," said the chairman. After the two speakers, the vote was taken.

One thing I conclude after all this is that we have prolonged our educational process unduly. These men are playing silly games when they should be in the world making true use of all their energy, wit, and moral fervor. We scream that they are immature, but it is we, through a huge systematic conspiracy of coddling and overprotection, who have forced them to grow up immature.
