Doug Ross (teacher at Friends Central who came to the farm with his family years ago), Mrs. Harrison (daughter has fatigue syndrome), and Bob Smith, who reminded me that he and I started a Fifth Day Meeting at Columbia in 1957. He is retired as headmaster of Sidwell Friends. (Tom Wood says he wants to see Alec one day as headmaster of one of the Friends schools. Μακάρι!). The chief item was whether future trustees and corporation members need to be members of a Meeting. I spoke about Chrysanthi and Mayme, 100% Quakers who never could take out membership because of cultural ties, and this apparently was just what was needed. Friends approved the motion. Saw Asia Bennett, John Jones, Jonathan Collect, and Doug Bennett, who has left Reid and will be vice president of the consortium of academic societies in New York. Our committee report was reproduced in the agenda; it has produced an advisory board for Quaker concerns, as we had hoped. Also saw Ted Benfey.

Train to New York. 46th Street getting a bit boring now, which is encouraging.

To the Museum of Modern Art to see the Frank Lloyd Wright exhibit. Treat Arnold gave me a pass, so I got in free, without waiting on line. As in all retrospective shows, this one showed Wright's evolution from stage to stage—i.e., from building homes for the rich to developing techniques for low-income homes; from advocating private homes to building skyscrapers. I also admired his diversity. He designed garages, warehouses, a gas station, plus Unitarian and Greek Orthodox churches. His “taproot” scheme for skyscrapers, with the floors cantilevered off a central pillar, is intriguing, like giant cacti or palm trees. At the end he wanted to build the “Illinois” one mile high. Guided by Emersonian idealism and organicism, he designed homes with solar heating and with earth berms for insulation. But his social vision in retrospect was not of the best, for he advocated suburban sprawl with each family on one acre and dependent on an automobile. This has had disastrous consequences for cities, of course.

Quick visit to the Met afterwards to see the newly installed impressionists. I liked the old installation better, in one large room. Now everything is contained in separate small rooms, a bit claustrophobic. . . . Met Randy Testa at the airport. He was bumped from our flight but was admitted at the last moment. Also met Jim Strickler there. We sat opposite each other and talked steadily for the whole trip—strange, because previously he's been rather distant. One never knows. He (and lots of others) think of me as solely responsible for Kendal.

Monday, April 25, 1994

Hooray! The Medicare surveyors returned to Kendal today and left after four hours, giving us a perfect score. Not a single deficiency. Jean is overjoyed. So am I, and much relieved. But John Radebaugh called to relate severe problems in medical care.

Lunch with Gene Lyons, who is now changing his mind about the Peace Studies course. He says he won't teach it because I haven't been able to find a younger colleague to join him.

Wednesday, April 27, 1994

Andy MacDowell is helping me with JMGS and the Constantinides prize. I'm behind in everything. Must set up the residential review now at Pendle Hill. Alec sent me the questions used in Jakarta for the school's self-study. Supper with Carol and Charles McLane, whom we hadn't seen for so long. Lots of reminiscences about Jerry and Alec—Jerry's arrival at Athens College when we had left because Chrysanthi's mother was dying, for instance, and how John Lincoln rescued him.

Thursday, April 28, 1994

The big day when William Hardy McNeill came, with his wife Elizabeth, at my invitation for War/Peace Studies. His essay on reasons for change (e.g., fall of the Soviet Union) I'd read earlier. It is brilliant (see journal for April 12), stressing demographics (population increase, and move to cities worldwide) as major factors determining war/peace issues in the future. We started with lunch: Gene Lyons, Michael Mastanduno, Walter Sinnott-Armstrong, Bill, Elizabeth, and me. Talked about the course, mostly, although Bill, a great conversationalist, recounted the farcical story of erecting a statue to commemorate the first atomic pile at Chicago. Bill feels we should recruit a new faculty member trained in Peace Studies. But how? Also that we should reduce the course to 3 or 4 faculty at most. Walter feels we should focus everything on one or two major crises, examining these in a multi-disciplinary way. Gene still won't teach the course without a colleague; nor can the course be approved, I just learned, under the new system unless it has two full-time teachers. . . . They left, and Bill, Elizabeth, and I spent another 1½ hours talking about Modern Greek affairs, mostly about my involvement in the Macedonian mess. . . . Then his talk in 105 Dartmouth, fairly well attended, but almost exclusively by the aged. No students. The talk was pretty much the same as the article, but very well done. Michael Ermarth and Michael Mastanduno, and Marty Sherwin acted as respondents. Then Chrysanthi and Elizabeth supped at Hanover Inn (Chrysanthi having just returned from feeding her 100 homeless in Lebanon) while we went to Marty's for supper, joined by others from the Steering Committee: Rieser, Berthold, Wallis, Rozycki, Jernstedt, Montgomery. What became increasingly clear, again, was the impasse. No one is willing to take on the course with full responsibility. . . . Chrysanthi and Elizabeth were the luckiest. They escaped hearing their husbands expound the same things for the 100th time.

Friday, April 29, 1994

Supper with Dave and Shirley Montgomery and Ben and Gene Moss. Very jolly. Big discussion of pacifism, since Ben and I are pacifists (or were) and Dave is clearly not. Also, Bill McNeill assumes that humans are naturally warlike; indeed, that without war we wouldn't have heroism. Both Ben and I had to conclude that pacifism was irrational, a sort of religious madness expressive of some sort of faith in a "kingdom" not of this world. It cannot be defended very well on political grounds—not, that is, the absolute pacifism that refuses to fight a Hitler as well as in an obviously phony war. Dave concluded that 50% of US wars have been "just."

Boston

Breakfast at the Inn with Dr. and Mrs. Sinis, Phaedon's parents. Both born in Greece, living for 25 years in Baltimore. Liberal. They like Ritsos. This surprised me, since Phaedon, the son, seems conservative. . . . Then to Boston to join Filia Macedon, Popy, and Don Johnson, sleeping at a strange rooming house on Beacon Street, with a creepy fat man as concierge. Filia irrepressible, as usual. Determined to show me the town and how much she knows it. Lunch in an Italian restaurant with a Turkish waiter whom Filia treated very badly. But I had a good talk with Don and about how awful Dick Birnie is: something confirmed far and wide. Worked on JMGS article in the room afterwards, until Filia took us all for supper to the top of a new hotel in Cambridge with a revolving restaurant overlooking the whole of Boston and Cambridge. Obscenely expensive, yet full of young people. . . . Then to Hellenic College for Ανάσταση. Filia and Don arguing; very unpleasant. Hard to stand throughout the service, for 1½ hours, but that was fine. Impassioned bilingual service with the English more frequent than the Greek: to accept Christ's sacrifice for us! Very old priest had the honor of Δεύτε λάβετε φως, a very dignified old man. But who believes? Certainly not the νεολαία. . . . Then to Eva Konstantellou's apartment for μαγειρίτσα και κοκορέτσι. That girl from UNH was there, the one who wasted my time in Rassias's Dana program several summers ago, still complaining about everyone else. George Pilitsis, too, with two sweet girls and a boy. Eva very gracious. To bed at 3:00 a.m.

Sunday, May 1, 1994

Boston

Up early to be organized again by Filia: breakfast at Steve's on Newbury Street, with Takis Metaxas and Stella and baby Δανάη. Takis is obsessed with the baby excessively. Not much to say to him, really, but Filia dominated the conversation, as always. . . . Drove home in driving rain, only to have to go to dinner at Toulas' and Spiros'. Tzatziki, lamb, pita, champagne, all fine, but all accompanied again with Filia's high-decibel monologue. Escaped at 7:30 p.m. We resolved to eat only cornflakes for a week.

Tuesday, May 3, 1994

Jean Brophy asked to meet with Barbara Gilbert and me in my office. John Diffey has written to her to say that her job is in great jeopardy. I spoke with John this morning and he assured me that Jean still has a chance for remediation, despite everything. I conveyed this to Jean. She wants to stay, she says. . . . What a mess. It would be better if she left now. I predict that she'll try, fail, and be asked to leave anyway in a few months. She agreed that revision of personnel policies should be high priority. . . . When I spoke with Diffey again he said he felt he had erred on the side of gentleness all these past months. I sense that he wants her out.

Peace Studies is going down the drain. No one really wants to accept responsibility.

Wednesday, May 4, 1994

Excited visit from Jean Hennessey, who says that the Peace Brigades International seminar I organized for next week should be cancelled because it misrepresents what is happening in Canada between the Inuit Nation and Hydro-Québec. But when I told her that she should come to the seminar and express her view, she refused.

Leander has resigned from Moravian College. Good!

Amherst

Examined 11 students, including a Turkish Cypriot. Such a nice group! Stavros, the tutor, has done videos of people in Greece explaining how to cook, etc., and this is incorporated in a Hypercard program that is much more “user friendly” than our Annotext.

Sunday, May 8, 1994

Alerted that Kinhaven would be on 60 Minutes, we watched eagerly, even though Audrey Logan, Mother, and Sheila Harvey were over for supper (it is Mother’s Day). Leander anticipated that he’d be seen, since the crews had photographed him last summer. In the event, the segment was 99% about Juilliard’s special program for disadvantaged students and 1% about Kinhaven. It showed the sign, called it “the prestigious summer music school,” and showed ½ second of one of the Juilliard students playing under Jerry’s baton. Oh well . . .

Sheila told me that Kate is in a mental hospital again. She was OK so long as she remained under drug therapy, but now she refuses to take drugs. What a tragedy!

Monday, May 9, 1994

Outreach Committee at 8:00 a.m. Joined by Peter Tailer and Bob Burgess, residents. Lafayette so slow and apathetic, as usual. But we are doing some small services. We hope now to bring Chrysanthi’s senior citizens once a year to Kendal for lunch and a “show” à la Woodbrooke.

Walked around Occum Pond with Marty Sherwin discussing War/Peace Studies. The course has failed; I couldn’t find a second teacher to join with Gene Lyons. But out of the blue Marty announces that he’ll be teaching a course on America's nuclear armament. So we'll list that. Also, he wants to develop a minor. Reprieve!

Supper at Kendal and then a delicious concert: Lark Quartet and Bev Web playing Brahms' Piano Quintet, with Lark doing Shostakovich's 1st Quartet to begin the program. I followed the Brahms score and when I came to the 2nd repeat in the 1st movement I lost it. What were they playing? Turns out that Bev forgot he'd already repeated, so went back to the beginning for the 3rd time. The cellist, Astrid Schween, caught on immediately, and signaled the others. Michael Webster, turning pages, "smiled under his mustache." The 1st movement seemed extraordinary long! But what a treat to hear this great piece in these surroundings. I felt good because the whole thing was my idea. Many thanks, of course to Eva Gurstner, the 1st violinist and Leander's old friend from Kinhaven.

Thursday, May 12, 1994

Hosted Mary Loehr, nonviolent activist, at the University Seminar to talk on the confrontation between the Inuit tribe in Canada and Hydro-Québec. I'm saddened because none of the War/Peace Steering Committee come to these seminars. The enterprise is running out of steam.

Friday, May 13, 1994

Jean asked for another meeting in my office with Barbara Gilbert and me. Jean desperately wants to "overcome"—to keep her job. She tried out her self-evaluation on us. Very frank (up to a point). She's trying techniques suggested by the consultant. But will she really change, deep down?

Saturday, May 14, 1994

Terpni

To Kendal to rehearse As You Like It. People seemed very pleased with my "All the world's a stage" speech. It's been so hard to memorize it, but I did. I also do one short scene with Orlando, when Jacques the cynic ridicules Orlando's lovesickness. . . . Then to the farm. Started the Jari without trouble this year. Everything looks fine. It's so beautiful. Saw a large buck on the road driving up. Telephone dead; called the repair department from a pay phone in Wevertown.

Sunday, May 15, 1994

Terpni

Practiced Bizet, which Dan and I will be doing at Kinhaven. We've also been assigned Persichetti's Serenade #8. Serviced and started the John Deere, discovering a much better way to put in the heavy battery, by standing on a step-ladder. Telephone man came, 9:00 a.m. Sunday morning! The line had been struck by lightning. He spliced it: we called Daphne in London. Pruned and fertilized the blueberries. Chrysanthi planted peas. On the way back, discovered that Luigi's, our favorite restaurant, was destroyed by fire. Poor man! Such a hard worker and then everything destroyed in an instant.

Tuesday, May 17, 1994

All day, practically, at Kendal. John Diffey, Alan Hunt, and Don Kidder began at 7:00 a.m. with the Reno junta. Jim Armstrong told me afterwards that it was cordial and constructive. Walter Frank ditto. Long Overseers' meeting with good reports on building issues: the Corporation will pay—our visit to the Directors last month helped. Governance much less clear, needs rethinking to insure greater autonomy here while still retaining a link with the Corporation. I announced what looks like a turn-around on personnel policies: a peer review system, now at least placed under discussion by Loraine Deisinger. We started Jean's self-evaluation but had to discontinue at 11:00 because of Residents Council meeting, which I attended. Same issues; different context. Then lunch with Diffey, Hunt, Kidder, Jean, and Margery Walker. Hunt willing to conceive of a Corporation board without veto power. . . . Next: dress rehearsal for As You Like It. Walter sings beautifully. He was with the Oratorio Society in New York; performed many times in Carnegie Hall. . . . Took Chrysanthi out for supper at Jesse's.

Wednesday, May 18, 1994

As You Like It a great success. I did my speech without nervousness and without forgetting any lines. Ditto for the scene with Orlando. Mary Keeley was vivacious and humorous as Rosalind, Dolly Adams fine as the skeptical Celia. John Radebaugh forgot most of his lines, as did Ed Tyler, but the others did well, with occasional help from the prompter. Jack Belding was splendid as the wrestler. Lou Flaccus, the director, abridger, etc., is so deaf he can't seem to keep track of things, yet it all worked, somehow. Full house. The play is so brilliant: comic, serious, full of startling language. What a nice life these people have at Kendal! . . . An hour later, AMTRAK to Philadelphia.

Thursday, May 19, 1994

Pendle Hill

Here, things begin immediately. Picked up at Wallingford, I heard about Sandy Adams's distress: her relationship failed and she is without a job. Then lunch with Bob McCoy, who wants to maintain a relationship to the Publications Committee but doesn't want to read manuscripts. Then to staff meeting, 1:30 to 3:00. Thankfully, Shirley Dodson came, too. All in all, it was useful and indeed necessary. Chris Ravndal and Sally Palmer were both forthright about my reputation as someone who is convinced that the teachers do not work. I said I wanted to start fresh, and listen, and learn, despite what I said years ago. Also, people remembered my ministry in which they interpreted me to be saying that no one had a right to complain since we're so much better off than Bosnians. Mary Hegelson spoke about trust: the review committee needs to be "trust-worthy." Denny O'Brien was very supportive. So was Kay McGinis, recounting that when I taught here I didn't force my opinion on students. John Anderson stressed the holistic nature of education here. Others stressed that students should be added to the committee. It's clear, alas, that some (Chris R., for instance) are very angry at Dan, who, they are convinced, fails to understand how hard they work. In any case, I think I successfully showed that I am not an ogre out to "get them"; nor do I wish to "Dartmouthize" Pendle Hill. . . . Music with Dan afterwards. We tried the Persichetti that Leander assigned us. It seems fairly trivial, but amusing, and it is deliciously easy. The Bizet is harder, especially to play it up to tempo. Dan hasn't practiced much. More tomorrow.

Telephoned Leander. He may have two good opportunities to play chamber music with National Symphony personnel. He says that the Persichetti is really excellent music: he hopes we'll rise to its demands, and especially the ensemble demands.

Friday, May 20, 1994

Pendle Hill

More people approached me with testimony and also with praise for handling of yesterday's meeting. Irené is utterly disgusted by teachers; says they're all incompetent and are panicked about losing their jobs because they'd never get a job elsewhere. Rebecca told me the teachers think I'm doing this because I want to be dean! And so on and so forth. Good Publications Committee meeting. We accepted two out of four. Executive Board, ice cream, then rehearsal of Bizet and Persichetti with Dan, with Debussy as an extra.

Saturday, May 21, 1994

Pendle Hill

At the Executive Board, Dan gave way on the question of appointing two students to the review committee, thank goodness. From 1:00 to 6:00 the committee in its present form (Shirley Dodson, Nancy Van Zant, Bob Gray, and I) interviewed Peter Crysdale, Bill Taber, Paul Jolly, Fran Taber, and John Anderson. The result: like the five blind men's description of the elephant. Sharp cleavage between administration and teachers/dean. John Anderson denounced Dan as a "hierarch" out for power and control and without vision. Others complained of Dan's style. All, with some prodding, admitted the teachers' demoralization, chiefly because of Dan's campaign against them (as they perceive it). Interestingly, Dan seems to have some of the same defects (or strengths) as does Jean Brophy, although he is much more gifted and experienced. Did we (I?) choose wrongly when we favored him over Asia Bennett? I hope not. . . . Afterwards, supper with the committee and Mary Wood, planning next steps. Then Bizet and Persichetti with Dan, getting better, topped off by Mozart's 40th.

Sunday, May 22, 1994

Pendle Hill

Meeting at Pendle Hill. Yesterday Peter Crysdale ministered beautifully about the spirit bellying out our sails in periods of calm, and Bill Taber prayed beautifully for acceptance of Christ's healing gifts. Today a woman sang a song about love's abiding power. Dan and I then skipped out and drove to Radnor Meeting, where I'd last been, I think, in 1951. Saw George Kramer, pleasantly, and Doug Ross, who ministered lovingly to his daughter, who had just graduated high school. He is giving the commencement address at Friends Central this year. Dorothy Steere ministered, too. She told me that Douglas is sinking fast. And their daughter Helen has cancer, and their son-in-law died. A terrible year. . . . Dan and I went to Roy Rogers (!) for a hamburger and then practiced—more improvement—and I recorded my part for him so he can play against it when he practices. He gave me his essay on teachers' workload to vet, admitting that I was right about certain inflammatory passages I'd noted yesterday. He drove me to 30th Street and I worked on his essay while waiting. Also, over the weekend, I did final corrections for two articles for JMGS, and read a little of Jackson Bate's book on literary influence.

May 25, 1994

Clearness Committee for John Radebaugh, who has applied for membership in the Meeting. I told him that he should be examining us, not vice versa.

May 27, 1994

Met with Mardy High and Perry Curtis to talk about the trip to Ireland next spring. I'll lecture on Joyce, Yeats, and Beckett. He is interested in gardens. We'll do Ireland and Scotland, ending in Edinburgh. This will be ten days off in the middle of our Woodbrooke term.

May 28, 1994

To the farm. Mowed a bit with the Jari. Removed branches from the large pine we took down last year. Planted some wildflower seeds. Planted tomatoes and string beans. Supper with Shapiros and Perrymans celebrating my birthday, ostensibly. Perryman talking about his six horses mostly, and his time in service. Shapiros just back from Bali and of course full of information and enthusiasms.

May 30, 1994

Last class for Greek 13. I played them rebetika. What a disappointing group except, I suppose, for Coumounduros.

May 30, 1994

Kendal. Outreach first. We're trying to give a lunch for non-Kendal seniors à la Woodbrooke. Then I spoke to Charlie Dudley's "Coffee Klatch" on Quakerism. A Mr. Jones then told me he is descended from Gurney and the founder of Earlham, etc. At 2:00 p.m. special Overseers meeting continuing the evaluation of Jean. Afterwards, John Diffey, Barbara Gilbert, and I sat with Jean. She took it well. We're giving her until October 1. In September we'll hold interviews and then decide. I doubt she'll make it. The best would be, probably, if, having learned from this experience and changed and grown, she then were able to start fresh somewhere else. Dinner with Geoffrey Hartman and Comparative Literature colleagues at Montgomery House. He is avuncular. Interestingly, he's turned off "theory." It was a long wait.

June 1, 1994

Coffee with Steve Scher and Ulli. They were in London and kindly brought me playbills, etc. for our trip there later this month.

June 3, 1994

Nice lunch with Ned, after a ride in his newest electric car. He is still grieving, he told me, but he is also seeing another woman already, and has succeeded in his aim of making himself busy. He'll be teaching and living in Boston in the fall.

June 4, 1994

Huge party at the Officers'. Nice to see their children. Talked French with Chucker's wife's mother.

June 5, 1994

Supper at Kendal with Yiayia and Bob Burgess and his wife, who apparently has Alzheimers. Bob cares for her tenderly. She has zero memory. He talked about Mary Dyer, an ancestor of his. He surprised me by expressing a very low opinion of Barbara Gilbert, who he says never consults the other Quakers at Kendal. Afterwards Bev Webster and Franny called Yiayia and wanted to come up to say goodbye to us. Bev brought a collection of musical limericks including "dirty" ones on blue pages. Perfect for Leander. I'll make a xerox.

Finished proofing Ken Boulding's sonnets. Rebecca did a sloppy job; she is really incompetent. So many good poems. Of the 145, I'd say that 20 are truly excellent, and many others, although not great poetry, are nevertheless interesting. For example "To My Desktop," which I copied into this journal on January 2, 1994.

Lunch with Tom Corindia. Lots of gossip about Kendal and the Clinic. The Clinic loses money at Kendal yet values the collaboration nonetheless. I gave Tom a copy of Kazantzakis's book on Knossos, for Niki, who is an avid reader, and was named after Nikos Kazantzakis.

To Terpni

Listened to a cassette of Conrad's The Secret Agent. It's brilliant, so sardonic. Practicing for the four-hand workshop. I've got the Bizet up to speed (but it's still shaky). But Dan telephoned to say that he still cannot play it even up to the slow speed at which I started two weeks ago. Working well on my Oxford lecture. I've got lots of good material from Jackson Bate's book on influence, and a little from T. S. Eliot's "Tradition and the Individual Talent." I hope to make this talk broad, much wider than the usual review of the relation between Modern Greek and Ancient Greek.

Telephoned Bob Brown at Princeton after learning that he had resigned as literary editor. Actually, he had been fired, more or less, because the new regime requires that he make money and attract famous authors. It's just like Simon and Schuster. For shame! He's staying on for two years as editor of the Lockhart series while looking for another job. He says that my advance contract for the Kazantzakis letters is still valid.

Wednesday, June 8, 1994

Moved the large sections of tree trunk of the pine taken down last fall. Mowed a bit. The place looks lovely. Practiced well.

Friday, June 10, 1994

To Kinhaven

To Hanover. Rush rush to collect things in office and home (Alice Buseck showed up), then to Kinhaven just in time for supper. Nice crowd: Kit Van Winkle, 3 or 4 students of Leander's from D.C., another 3 from Bethlehem, including Brenda. Thankfully Dan Seeger arrived at 11:30 p.m. We're sleeping on the top floor of the barn, in the infirmary.

Saturday, June 11, 1994

Kinhaven

Practice with Dan in the concert hall from 8:30 to 9:30 a.m. He doesn't know his parts, alas, but will try. Lesson with Leander on Persichetti, 9:30–10:00. Leander explained the structure of the piece: it is pure architecture. Very helpful in many ways. 10:30–12:30 Dan and I practiced more, both Persichetti and Bizet. Slogging. We'll see. So 3½ hours at the piano on the first morning. We're probably the worst two pianists here, a humbling experience for Herr Direktor und Herr Professor.

Sunday, June 12, 1994

Kinhaven

Dan doesn't know any of the pieces and certainly can't play the Bizet "Merry Go-round," which we consequently are going to drop. Oh well . . . ! We'll try to do "Playing House" somehow, and of course the Persichetti Serenade no. 8, which he can play, more or less. "To this we propose to add Schumann's "Trauer" from "Zwölf vierhändige Klavierstücke" op. 85, the piece played by Nigel Coxe and Sandy at Leander's wedding. I hope I can work this up in two days' time. Lovely meals and company. Spent at least six hours at the piano today, mostly with Dan as he laboriously learns the notes. Nice outing with him last night for ice cream at Friendly's in Londonderry. Lots of good talk, and very little about Pendle Hill, which is the whole idea. Leander gave us a very good lesson yesterday. He analyzed the Persichetti masterfully. Sandy gave a very poor lesson today. She had practically nothing to say. I kept urging her, sort of: "Teach us, Sandy!" She caught the error of timing I was making, but offered no insight at all into the music. This evening, guest artist Nigel Coxe played a recital: brilliant technically and musically, partly because of the intimacy. He spoke extensively about the principles governing the programming of Bach–Haydn–Ravel–Lizst, especially Ravel's conscious use of Haydn and Lizst to structure his own pieces: for example, his "Jeux d'eau" is a direct take-off on Lizst's "Les jeux d'eau à la Villa d' Este." The Haydn sonata in A (Hoboken 16, no. 26), rarely played, was extraordinarily interesting and different, showing Haydn's versatility. Then came Ravel's "Menuet sur le nom d' Haydn," and Ravel's daunting Sonatine, the last movement of which is especially compelling. He also did Ravel's "Noctulles" and "Une Barque sur l'océan" from Miroirs because these were modeled on Lizst's "Études d'execution transcendantes," two of which concluded the concert. In the midst of all this there was a furious rainstorm whose noise made playing difficult. But the rain let up eventually, and then the lights went out. The piano was moved to the edge near the balcony, and several of us sat in the balcony shining down flashlights on the keyboard, a wonderful place to see Coxe's technique. Reception afterwards in candlelight, and with Barbara Lloyd's kerosene lamp.

Kinhaven

Still no power this morning. I washed in the pond. Fourteen trees went down last night over the wires, we heard. But the cooks made coffee on the gas stoves. . . . Better rehearsal afterwards with Dan and then a marvelous lesson from Leander, who is a superb teacher. It looks like we'll attempt the Schumann, Bizet, and Persichetti. God help us!

In the midst of all this I am reading essays submitted for the Chase Peace Prize, and of course having lots of conversations with fellow pianists, including Leander's student Brenda, who revealed her life story at dinner last night.

Nigel Coxe gave a brilliant master class in the afternoon. Students, including some of Leander's, played solo repertoire—Bach, Mozart, Chopin—and in each case Coxe, very gently, first praising certain things well done, arrived at precisely what was lacking in overall conception and interpretation, drawing on his abundant historical knowledge of musical styles, not just on an innate aestheticism. Though lasting three hours, it was fascinating to watch the superlative professional at work.

The rest of the day Dan and I practiced separately or together. I gave up all my individual lessons so we could be instructed together. Leander helped us nicely with a special lesson in the evening.

Tuesday, June 14, 1994

Kinhaven

More practice in the early morning. Dan is still very unpredictable. He can do the pieces by himself but then when he sits down with me he makes serious mistakes. Run-through in the hall at 9:15 a.m. At 10:30, the concert. How nicely everyone played, and how diverse and lovely the repertoire is. Strangely, I wasn't nervous. None of the frozen fingers and sick stomach of childhood recitals. Actually, we did rather well: a few tentative notes but nothing seriously wrong. And by all accounts we played the Persichetti with great sensitivity (thanks to Leander, of course), for we got a rousing ovation, foot-stomping and all. So, it ended well. Four days with seven to eight hours at the piano. Nice long talk afterwards with Leander about Sandy's deficiencies, etc. Then drove back to Terpni with Dan, in convoy, listening to Moby Dick and stopping in Warrensburg for a take-out Chinese dinner. Later, after we had eaten, Alec arrived with Eyi and Chrysanthi. Eyi's smile is infectious. She's a tiny doll. Apparently I was more effusive to Alec and her than to Chrysanthi, who got angry and ruined everything. Oh well . . .

Riparius

Working very long hours, and well, on my talk for Oxford. Also lots of good conversation around the dinner table. Eyi is beginning to join in. Her English is better than last time, but still fairly rudimentary. Lovely to have Dan here today.

Friday, June 17, 1994

Finished the Oxford talk, but it's too long. A deer cropped grass in front of me this afternoon as I worked. Three hours after supper talking to Alec about Kendal. He hopes we can keep the 100% Quaker board. The Corporation has agreed to try my scheme of peer review for disciplinary action.

Saturday, June 18, 1994

Spent all day shortening my talk, finally down to 25 minutes. Huge thunderstorm last night. Got up at 2:00 a.m. to turn off the pump, unplug fax and computer. But a surge tripped the electric-breaker.

Alec's school is in real trouble. They've budgeted for 245 students whereas several years ago they had 320. But he feels that what they offer is excellent.

Sunday, June 19, 1994

Leander arrived from Kinhaven. Very happy about his workshop and talked steadily for four hours. We played my four-hand repertoire together. Very different from playing with Dan! Finished the Oxford talk.

Monday, June 20, 1994

Alec and Leander took me out to breakfast for Father's Day. Very sweet. Worked in the morning. Then drove to Hanover. Supper in Sweet Tomatoes talking about Eyi. Chrysanthi confessed (a) that she is dismayed that, after so much effort on her part to escape the third world, Alec may be marrying someone from that world, (b) that she is dismayed because Eyi is "colored." Well! What I worry about is Eyi's capacity to have children. She seems to have no pelvis or hips; her figure is like an eight-year-old's. . . . Mad rush to do everything and get packed.

Tuesday, June 21, 1994

8:00 to 11:30 a.m. at Kendal. I had to leave, although the meeting went to 12:30. The Quaker hegemony is over. But my peer review scheme may get a trial. Alan Hunt's revised governance guidelines are better than the first draft: more autonomy given to the new Directors, less veto power by the Corporation. Joan Birnbaum is the new president of the Residents Council. No getting round her. She says they don't want Quaker rule any more. But I think they'll agree now to suggest six names from which we pick three, instead of merely appointing the resident members of the future board. . . . To the Dickey Center at 11:30 for the Chase Peace Prize Committee. Shelby Grantham wanted to withhold the prize, but Alan Rozycki disagreed, as did I and also Dan Siegel and Margot de l'Etoile. We all agreed, finally, on everybody's second choice. . . . I'll be receiving mediation training next October from Dan Siegel. . . . Limo to Logan. We're doing feast-fast. I resisted filet mignon on the plane. Good, uneventful flight.

London

Our familiar Sloan Square. Children on the way to school in the morning. Crumpets with Daphne. Long talk about Eyi and Tokyo and her thesis and experience at LSE. She says she's in a good psychological mood to leave London now. Greg found a very attractive bedroom flat in Tokyo. But they may move to Hong Kong after a year. Hope to visit them next December before MLA. . . . Daphne asked me to look at her thesis: "Mythmakers, Mythbreakers: The Media and the Social Construction of Sport—Nancy Kerrigan, Tanya Harding, and the 1994 Olympic Figure Shaking Competition." Alas, it still needs lots of work.

Off to Soho with Chrysanthi—Soho Square, Greek Street, etc.—and then to David Mamet's new play The Cryptogram, a moving psychological study of the emotional destruction of a child owing to his mother's marital difficulties. But, beyond this, a study of meaning, how we invent everything, how "truth" is what we think is true. And still further, a study of human depravity in a godless world—what makes us this way? Of course, on the surface, all of Mamet's very Pinteresque mannerisms with language are present: the repetitions, the talking at cross purposes. Beautifully acted by a fourteen-year-old child actor and by Lindsay Duncan as the mother. . . . Afterwards, nice supper with Daphne and Greg. Photos of their Tokyo apartment. Bit of Wimbledon on TV. . . . Sherri sent the Kendal Overseers' minutes by fax and I was able to correct them by 11:30 p.m. and to fax them back; also my suggestions to John Diffey regarding the draft bylaws. A long, interesting day.

Oxford

Worked on Daphne's thesis in the morning, copyediting it. Walked to the Victoria Coach Station, not far from Sloan Square. To Oxford by coach. We're lodged in Exeter College and were lucky to be assigned to one of the refurbished entries. All modern appointments, including indoor toilet . . . and shower! The floors are wobbly and nothing is at a 90° angle, and the door openings are 5'7" (the building dates from the 1600s) but we are very comfortable. To the Taylor Institute at 5:00 for Mike Keeley's opening address, on nostalgia in Cavafy, Seferis, and Ritsos. Very lovely, with some reminiscences of Trypanis. Saw Nasos Vayenas again, after so many years. Didn't recognize him; he has aged so much. And Peter Levi has had a stroke and looks so aged. Moving ceremony of awards to students writing the best dissertations, by the Hellenic Foundation. One award went to Karen Van Dyck. Long talk with Dimitris Tziovas about the Bien Symposium scheduled for Birmingham for July 4–5, 1995. It seems it is really going to happen . . . in my honor. He asked who could best speak about my work. Meg Alexiou, I should have thought. Bryer came and said hello. He is hugely fat and gross. But sad. Liz has bad cancer, and his mother and father both died within the last months. . . . Supper at Exeter. Long talk with David Holton. He wants me to lecture at Cambridge next spring. Afterwards to a pub with Mike and Richard Clogg and others. Talk about the Bywater and Sotheby Professorship mostly. We hope that Peter Mackridge will get it but preference will go to a Byzantinist. . . . More work on Daphne's thesis until past midnight.

Oxford

Breakfast at Exeter. Eggs fried in grease with wonderful bacon and bread fried in grease. All the wrong things. And the obligatory grilled tomato. Sat next to Pieris but we didn't talk. He's the one whose dissertation I said should fail when I reviewed it for Sydney. Sat in the back during David Holton's and Rosemary Bancroft-Marcus's paper on 17th century Cretan poetry and continued to work on Daphne's thesis, finishing it so that Chrysanthi could take it back this afternoon. My paper came next; seemed well received. "The Anxiety of Influence in Greek and English Poetry." Afterwards, Henry Gifford came up to say hello. He is 81 years old and traveled here from Bristol to hear David Ricks and me. How nice! Caught up on children and careers. He has slowed down now. Very little reviewing any more for the TLS. Nice talk too with Peter Levi, who expressed appreciation of my translation of Ἡ ζωὴ ἐν τάφῳ, as I did for his translation of the gospels into demotic English. He is working on Milton. He agrees with me that Milton was very Quakerly and radical. . . . Delicious lunch at St. Peter's. Woman from Cambridge University Press learned Greek from our books. I told her they were going out of print. She thought maybe Cambridge UP would take them over!!! (Unlikely, I suppose.) . . . Walked Chrysanthi to the bus station. She's returning to be with Daphne. Philip Sherrard gave a good paper on Sikelianos in the afternoon. Also David Ricks on Palamas. . . . Walked Henry Gifford most of the way to the rail station. Telephoned Devon Parini. Jay is in Canada, promoting his Steinbeck biography. Devon is pregnant again, due in October. Also, she just finished her second novel. . . . Off to St. Cross's for supper at 7:15. TLS rep. asked if I'd review Roddy's new history of Modern Greek literature. With pleasure! . . . Supper at St. Cross. Long talk with Karen Van Dyck about family, careers, music, Vermont. Also with Jackie Mackridge, and, again, Mike Keeley, who is flourishing in his retirement. Mary Keeley, after months in a respirator with, she said, 7% probability of recovery, is resurrected. Cancer gone.

Oxford

Final day, with quite a few good papers, especially the one by Karen Van Dyck, and some lively discussion, some of it sparked by me. Lunch with Peter Mackridge, the Keeleys, and Harry Davis and Katerina at Brown's. Nice to talk to Harry, whom we've known for so many decades. He tells me that Paul Morby was shunted aside finally and forced out. . . . Final session chaired by me. At the end, by prearrangement, I asked for thanks and applause for Peter Mackridge and said that I hope he'd be served breakfast, lunch, and supper in bed on Sunday. (Afterwards, I was good-naturedly reprimanded by one of the women for this sexist remark.) One of Roddy's students drove us home. I found the house empty, so went out to a neighborhood restaurant full of loud-mouthed Americans. Read Antigone and the TLS. . . . Afterwards, helped Daphne again with her Introduction.

London

Westminster Meeting. Some fine ministry, especially regarding discernment of our service to the world: not to take on too much, and what we can honestly do, to do well. Afterwards to the National Gallery, concentrating on the marvelous modern collection that we were so rushed seeing on the last visit, but then paying the usual tribute to Rembrandt and El Greco. The place was full of schoolchildren, some copying paintings in their childish ways, others being instructed brilliantly by Gallery staff, on Rembrandt's Balthasar's Feast and Titian's Bacchus and Ariadne. I saw both these paintings in a much fuller way than I could have if I hadn't listened over the children's shoulders. . . . Chrysanthi wanted tea afterwards. We ended up in the wrong place: inefficient, noisy, and overpriced, in the King's Road. £10 for two teas and two tarts. Oh well . . . And the tea was a cup with a teabag and not even extra hot water. . . . Later, however, we had a fine chicken dinner cooked by Daphne, with good wine and a special dessert. Greg explained, very clearly, why the dollar is doing so poorly: essentially because nations buy so many of our products. He also sold all his stocks the day before they decreased 25% in value. Better to invest in bonds now or indeed in CDs, since interest rates are increasing.

Monday, June 27, 1994

Reading Antigone for Alumni College. In the afternoon went to the Courtauld Galleries in Somerset House. What riches! Cézanne's Card Players, van Gogh's self-portrait with bandaged ear, Manet's gorgeous Bar at the Folies-Bergères, and Déjeuner sur l'herbe, Monet's Gare St. Lazarre, Gauguin's Nevermore, and a lovely Modigliani nude. Just one floor of impressionists, but the choices are startling. . . . Met Greg at Spaghetti House in Haymarket. He had been called from Tokyo at 5:00 a.m. and had been in the office since 6:00 a.m. today. Then to Haymarket Theatre to see Tom Stoppard's Arcadia. Saw Mike and Mary Keeley by surprise and John Chioles outside. The play is scintillatingly intellectual. Mostly talk, very Shavian. Its subject? Probably Weltanschauung: the difference between 18th-century rationalism and Newtonian physics (all of which was expressed of course in gardens—visions of Arcadia—and then 19th-century compulsive romanticism based on heart not head, and then 20th-century indeterminacy or, better, chaos theory. Whether all this is adequately converted into characterization and action I cannot tell . . . yet. But the play makes interesting use of time shift, going from 18th to 20th century and then fusing the two, which is surely part of the point: the escape from linearity into synchronicity.

Tuesday, June 28, 1994

Stayed at Sprimont Place all day, reading Jebb's notes to Antigone and finding with pleasant surprise that I can still read some (not all) of the Ancient Greek text. In the evening, to a stupid, yet occasionally amusing play, Dead Funny by Terry Johnson, starring Zoë Wanamaker. Four people are mourning the death of Benny Hill (!). The only really lively scene, for me, was the one in which they repeat Benny's Chinaman routine, where every word, every sentence, is a double entendre. Otherwise, dreadful waste of time . . . and money.

Wednesday, June 29, 1994

London

Read Antigone again, third time, against Jebb's notes and with some of the Greek. I don't quite see my approach yet for the Alumni College lecture, but it will come. . . . Daphne finished her thesis and I gave it one more spot check. . . . To the Barbican in the evening. Met Greg for supper outdoors next to the fountains. Lovely. He went home; we stayed for the Royal Shakespeare Company doing Love's Labour's Lost—pure joy of language and slapstick and delicious British humor, malapropisms and all. It was good to end our stay on this high ground instead of in yesterday's abyss, although I suppose that it's helpful to see vulgar commercial junk in order to appreciate the power of true art. The Royal Shakespeare Company is doing The Tempest next week, but we'll miss it. Next spring, however, while at Woodbrooke, we'll see all the RSC shows, I hope.

London–Hanover

Routine flight home. Zero jet lag owing to feast-fast. I worked in my office until 11:30 p.m. trying to get ready to continue on to the farm tomorrow. Supper with Yiayia at Kendal. Nice to see so many friends there each time I appear.

Friday, July 1, 1994

Hanover–Terpni

Alec and Eyi showed up, on the way to Boston for a wedding and then to visit Tom Wood in the Poconos. On the way to the farm, Chrysanthi was morose and silent. After much prodding she finally burst out with her dismay at Alec's relationship with Eyi: return to third world, to a peasant, to a colored person, to someone with meager education and no apparent skills. What could I say? "Thank God my parents are both dead!" Chrysanthi sighed. She's really suffering. Later, I spoke at length with Leander, who said that he and Deanna spent most of their drive today to Washington talking about Eyi. They share Chrysanthi's dismay. Leander tried to speak frankly to Alec, but Alec was very defensive and touchy. I'm the only one who seems to be taking things more in stride, but I share the others' fears for what will happen in the long run if they get married.

Interestingly, this morning Eyi asked me in Hanover, "Have I gotten darker?" I wanted to say, "You were dark to begin with," but kept silent. Apparently she herself is sensitive about her color. Strange. No, not so strange.

July 7, 1994

Finished reading the 24 submissions for the Elizabeth Constantindes Translation Prize amid lightning, thunder, and a deluge of rain. Played violin-piano with Alec, including Bach's A-minor concerto and the first movement of the Beethoven violin concerto. Planning visit to Tokyo already. Alec spoke today with NiMo about laying cable for him next June.

July 8, 1994

Yasuo is here. Played the Bach double concerto, Holst, Loeillet, Vivaldi, Ibert. Very nice. Eyi is talking more and more, and better and better. Dare I admit that I'm charmed by her? Chrysanthi is still boiling inside.

July 10, 1994

Tom and Nancy Corindia came with their four children: Niki and Emily (the adopted ones) and the twins: Alex and Francis. They brought Mother, too. Lots of fun with the rubber boat in the pond. But when the great moment came to set up their tent, Tom discovered that he'd forgotten the poles. We sat down for meals outdoors, around the picnic table, eleven people in all.

July 12, 1994

To the Hall of Springs for supper with Yiayia, Alec, Eyi, and Chrysanthi. Alec toasted our 39th anniversary. Eyi looked charming in a flowing Indonesian dress. The program included Pastoral Dances: very lovely, especially the duo by Peter Boal and Jenifer Ringer. Then my favorite, Apollo, with Nilas Martins, a blond Danish beauty, as Apollo, looking very much like a Greek god. So moving and exciting owing to Stravinsky's music and Balanchine's utter simplicity. Then Fearful Symmetries with minimalist music and choreography by Peter Martins, too long and unvaried. Unrelenting frenzy becomes tiring.

July 13, 1994

To the Shapiros for supper and then Irv's Indonesian slides and his ninety-minute monologue/lecture. Interesting, sometimes beautiful, but Eyi is right in feeling that too much concentration was on the primitive and ritualist and animistic. Indonesians want to be modern, even Western, as do Greeks, but also to preserve their special culture, but not in this primitive form. The most memorable photos were of the terraced rice fields with their irrigation system, a bit of which I saw outside of Jakarta in 1990.

July 14, 1994

The last three days I've devoted to the journal, bringing everything up to date, getting articles out to readers, corresponding with authors, revising the Style Sheet. Finished today. Will turn now to Alumni College lectures, starting with Antigone. Reading Bernard Knox first.

Up at 6:00 a.m. to burn the brush pile with Alec, Eyi, and Chrysanthi, later with Leander, who arrived last night. After the fire got started we cut down three dead trees that were aesthetically displeasing and burned them as well. Leander in good spirits. His four-hand workshop made a profit of $850 and John Austin already wants him to repeat it several times a year. The Seattle recital, recently cancelled, is now reinstated: Prokofiev, Mozart, Gershwin, and the big Grieg sonata, designed, says Leander, for a non-sophisticated audience. Last night I read Bruno Repp's scientific study of expression in Schumann's Träumerei: how 28 pianists differ in their rendition. When all is said and done, what does this prove? Not much.

Worked from 6:30 to 11:30 on the first subsequent clearing. Showered. Napped. Michael Gouthreau came at Alec's invitation to cut himself some firewood for the winter. . . . The mail delivered Roddy Beaton's Introduction to Modern Greek Literature, which I've been asked to review for the TLS. Finally! (Thanks to Mike Keeley, who was approached first in Oxford, said No, and suggested me. Good friend.)

The Jari broke again, but Dave Whitty had a part and I'll put it back together tomorrow, in time for Greg.

Daphne and Greg arrived at suppertime in a white convertible rented in Montreal, looking very smart and prosperous, and none the worse for the vicissitudes of moving out of their Sloan Square house. We had a gala and quintessentially American meal of sirloin steak cooked outdoors, and blueberry pie (with berries picked on the farm, of course) to celebrate Alec's birthday. Daphne presented me with her thesis, very proudly.

Leisurely breakfast, with the entire family (only Deanna missing). Congratulations on our 39th anniversary. Fixed the Jari. All gathered round and explained to Yiayia that this gathering is chiefly in honor of her forthcoming 90th birthday (January 17, 1995). She said she has been so happy these days to be here surrounded by family, a feeling she does not get at Kendal despite the proximity of Chrysanthi and me. Alec took Greg and Leander to see the view from his ledges. Leander has been practicing Gershwin and Prokofiev for his recital; I practiced my four-hand repertoire. Daphne and Chrysanthi are planning a lamb dinner tonight. . . . I finished Bernard Knox on Antigone, very helpful, and began Cedric Whitman. So much interpretation hinges on the suspect lines 932–1012. . . . Gala dinner at home with Daphne's special potatoes and lamb and homemade bread, and champagne, and a fruit salad inside a watermelon rind carved out to be a basket. Yiayia very pleased, of course. Then Leander and I played my four-hand repertoire. I did everything OK except (of course) the Bizet Merry-Go-Round, where one measure stumped me, as expected. But I can do it if I practice more and more. Leander played Schubert and Chopin afterwards, sightreading.

Monday, July 18, 1994

Another two-hour breakfast with everyone present, as we realize that they'll be disappearing soon. But I booked our tickets to Tokyo for December, and also to DC for Thanksgiving. I'll try to audit Japanese 1 in the fall. . . . The south field is almost entirely mowed. . . . David Holton invited me to lecture at Cambridge next spring. . . . Leander left, reducing us to seven. Off to the Narrows for pizza, followed by soft ice cream in Chestertown. Beginning to feel the reality of departure, with sadness.

Tuesday, July 19, 1994

Flurry of activity in the morning to get everyone packed. Daphne finishing her job vetting Andria's translation of German instructions for a steam boiler! Greg helping Chrysanthi with her jigsaw puzzle. Yiayia is in deep conversation with Eyi. Alec is off to North Creek to deliver garbage, bottles for recycling, etc. Chrysanthi is making sandwiches for everyone. . . . I'm staying here on my own for a day; will go to Hanover tomorrow night.

July 21, 1994

Hanover

Saw Daphne off at Hanover Inn. She flew to Dallis to join Greg. Tomorrow they leave for Tokyo. Went immediately to Janet Flanders Travel in Norwich and paid for our two tickets to Tokyo in December. Then haircut, bank, catching up in the office. Jay Bruce, my new helper for the journal, came in with his manuscripts. Supper with Yiayia and Audrey at Sweet Tomatoes. Alec and Eyi returned to the farm after Daphne left. We all had a "last breakfast" at EBA's.

July 22, 1994

All day at Kendal. Breakfast with the Residents Council. Lynmar spoke briefly. People asked questions, chiefly about the method of choosing council representatives and directors. I defended our position—slate of six from which we choose two—as a compromise. Then to a meeting featuring reports by all department heads, very well done. It was especially good to hear Carol Blanc's, assuring that beginning August 1st there will be no more temporary nurses. Brava! Proceeded to governance issues, cleaning up the proposed new bylaws, which will be minimum standards for all facilities and can be upgraded by Hanover, Oberlin, Ithaca, Longwood, etc. if needed. I urged elimination of the words "vote" and "elect" in the language. Lunch with Tim Campbell and John Diffey. Afternoon session: auditor's report, more on governance, more on the shared services fee: we renewed the old arrangement but only until 31 March, promising further negotiation by September. The new board should be in place by September; also, Jim Armstrong and Mary Schaffner have agreed to join from the residents' community. At the breakfast I said that in effect this is our 10th anniversary: seven years of planning and building plus three of operation. We started as a Quaker-run enterprise but are now, consistent with Quaker principles, becoming all-inclusive and democratic. Interestingly, the Quaker ethos guarantees its own dissolution. Sad, but challenging. . . . Nice supper at Jesse's afterwards with the Directors and Overseers. Don Kidder will be the Philadelphian joining our new board. They've asked me to continue as clerk.

Saturday, July 23, 1994

Burlington

To Burlington for Athos Rassias's wedding. Helene is engaged to an older man, very nice, with two grown children in their 20s. John is, of course, "skeptical." But Helene is radiant. Joined Alec and Eyi at the church. Roman Catholic service, OK but with terrible music. Interlude with Alec and Eyi afterward; then long drive to country club on the lake for a gala dinner. Long talk with Buck about John's future, his fear of aging and retirement. Loud music prevented further conversation, more or less, with the nice young people at our table, including one of my former students. When a Greek dance was played, Chrysanthi ran to the lead, full of κέφι, and I joined. Then we said goodbye to Eyi and Alec, who left for Leander's before returning to Indonesia. Eyi very grateful to me, said her family doesn't talk the way ours does. Chrysanthi not depressed. She's getting used to Alec's absence, it seems. Overnight in a motel.

Sunday, July 24, 1994

Return to the farm leisurely via Champlain ferry and some sightseeing on the New York State side—down the lake. How nice to return to Terpni!

Tuesday, July 26, 1994

Working on my Antigone lecture. I love to write and think. Practicing Debussy for Dan and me. Jean telephoned to say that Lloyd and Paul Lewis have both resigned. End of an era. When I saw John Diffey last week I said, "You look tired." He replied that he'd been having several very difficult problems. Probably this was one of them. My guess is that he fired Paul and that Lloyd resigned in protest. We'll see . . .

Friday, July 29, 1994

To Lake George Opera to see Rossini's "Lady of the Lake" with the Shapiros and Tom Akstens. Tom's miserable situation as an adjunct professor at Sienna College makes me realize vividly how fortunate I have been at Dartmouth. Some members of the orchestra were friends of Leander's either from Kinhaven or Moravian. I talked with Jim Tomba, the percussionist. Seeing so many young musicians, instrumentalists and singers, I recall so vividly the rows of practice rooms at Oberlin Conservatory, with each occupant dreaming of success. But most are in the chorus—if that.

Finished the Antigone lecture, finally. Spent all day revising it and composing an abstract. Jerry Gardner came for supper (Rosine and the children are in France.) In Rosine's absence he is very talkative. Lots about Morris, whom Jerry considers sick. Apparently Morris threatened to kill his children and himself this winter; that's why he was brought out to the mental hospital. But he pays for his full-page ads. Jerry advised him not to print the latest one, and Morris responded with a 13-page letter, by fax, justifying his "persecution." Another man is suing North Creek for allegedly illegally upgrading Waddell Road. Jerry is doing better financially. But he still needs to wait on table twice a week. He brings home an average of $100 in tips each night.

Afterwards, Leander telephoned, obviously in great distress. He went on at length about how both he and Deanna are almost physically sick, can't sleep, etc., owing to Alec's relationship with Eyi. Leander finds Eyi scheming and arrogant, besides being uneducated, untalented, and generally useless! He spoke to Alec briefly—hard to get him alone—and Alec scowled but at least didn't burst into anger. Now Chrysanthi has written a totally frank letter to Alec about her own feelings, mincing no words. She sealed it. Will she actually send it? We'll see . . .

Chrysanthi unsealed the letter this morning. She says she wants to add more. . . . I'm starting to think about my Inaugural Lecture for Alumni College: on interpretation, I suppose. Practicing Debussy on the piano, for Dan. Dan wrote a long response to my Anxiety of Influence lecture. Where does he find the time and energy?! Also sent an even longer self-evaluation of his third year as Executive Secretary that turned out to be much more an evaluation of the teachers than of himself. Meanwhile, the evaluations in questionnaires continue to come in. What a job it will be to arrive at some conclusions! Also, I now have all five sets of votes for the Elizabeth Constantinides prize. No agreement, but I think we can narrow it to four submissions.

Saw a large, unusual bird from my office today, perhaps a mallard, with a red spot on the back of its neck and a kind of aegis or escutcheon on its breast. Also, the other day, a perfect rainbow. I rushed to load film into my camera to photograph it, but by the time I'd done so it was three-quarters gone.

Supper at Hilda Grunblatt's with Dr. Schalita, 85 years old, who told me her life story. Born in the Ukraine in a shtetl—Jewish village. Studied medicine. Privately tutored in English. Learned German and French in school, so had five languages from early on (those three plus Russian and Yiddish). Oh, also Polish, for they moved to Warsaw. When the Germans invaded Poland the family walked three weeks eastward and reached the Ukrainian village. Then the Germans invaded Russia. She, as a physician, was needed. She had job after job, for instance two years on a collective farm outside of Tashkent, where the peasants used to place frogs on abscesses and where she was venerated as a wonder-working saint because she once revived, with ammonia, a man in a malarial coma. But the Germans killed her husband and entire family in the village. Afterwards she went to Paris and got a fellowship to study public health at Johns Hopkins, where she became interested in psychoanalysis and decided to undergo that training subsequently. . . . Then we drove her home and she showed us the magnificent house—a huge room filled with books. She lives with a “companion,” a twenty-year-old girl called Kasha. She told me that in the 1960s she ordered everything available by Kazantzakis and read the whole lot, one after the other, after seeing the films Zorba the Greek and Celui qui doit mourir. Hilda reminded us that it was Kazantzakis who “introduced” Jacques to me. He had read The Last Temptation and practically fell out of his chair when he saw “Riparius, New York” after my name in the afterward, whereupon he sought me out: the beginning of a long, wonderful friendship. We all toasted his memory; he died in 1989.

August 2, 1994

Spoke with Daphne in Tokyo last night, a very good connection. She sounded most enthusiastic. The apartment is beautiful. Things really aren't so expensive if you know where to go. The food is superb. Everything is clean and efficient. Her Japanese seems to work (sometimes).

This morning I watched a spider outside the bathroom window. A bumble bee got caught inextricably in the web. As it struggled, the spider fought with it, sparring like a boxer, trying to get in for the kill, which it finally did. Then it carefully adjusted the web, cutting certain strands, fixing others, in order to transport the bee to another spot. Then it attached itself to the bee and sucked, I suppose, until it itself grew huge: a bloated ball. Then it went to sleep. Hours later it began to move again. And now a baby spider appeared as well, very tiny, and keeping its distance at first until the bloated one encouraged it to come closer and seemed to be teaching it how to draw nourishment from the dead bee, whose carcass was now about half the original size. . . . Finished almost half of my opening lecture for Alumni College. A productive day.

Supper at the Copperfield with Aser and Evelyn Rothstein: our annual meal with them. As always, Aser explained science to me so lucidly, this time what his son is doing in England in a laboratory in Norwich using molecular biology to improve plants. Instead of cross-breeding as in the past, a process that takes a long time because the new seed must grow through the plant's entire life cycle before further experimentation takes place, they can now simply take a gene and place it in the seed. Furthermore, this makes cross-breeding possible. Previously, a rose could only be bred with a different type of rose, a tomato with a different type of tomato, etc. Now, anything goes. A gene from, say, an oak tree that provides resistance to frost can be added to a tomato. Human genes can be used, and vice versa. They have already produced tomatoes that do not go bad so quickly, so they can now be allowed to ripen on the vine instead of being picked green. Now the ripe tomatoes will last through the packing, shipping, and display in stores. As always, all this brings on the terrible inferiority complex that we humanists have, spending our lives on material that, compared to molecular biology, seems so frivolous, marginal, and self-indulgent.

We are eating our own tomatoes already, a beautifully ripe and tasty one every day.

Finished Eagleton's brilliant book The Function of Criticism, the first chapter of which I heard as a stimulating lecture in Melbourne in 1983. A propos of what I felt three days ago listening to Aser Rothstein on molecular biology, Eagleton writes (p. 108), "Today, apart from its marginal role in reproducing the dominant social relations through the academies, [criticism] is almost entirely bereft of . . . a raison d'être. It engages at no significant point with any substantive social interest, and as a form of discourse is almost entirely self-validating and self-perpetuating. It is hard to believe that, in a nuclear age, the publication of yet another study of Robert Herrick is justifiable."

Not unrelated to this is our experience last night viewing La Bohème with the Shapiros at Lake George Opera and discussing afterwards the strange fact that this sentimental work about a situation irrelevant to current reality (since Mimi's TB would have been cured by antibiotics) draws tears whereas the insufferable reality of a Rwanda or a Bosnia does not.

To Hanover. Flat tire in Wevertown. Changed it and luckily found a garage open in Warrensburg. Ended up buying four new tires. Good feeling to have tread again. Supper in that nice pasta restaurant near the monastery east of Rutland. Listened to Lord Jim on the way, read beautifully. But the 2nd half is really disappointing, until we reach Gentleman Brown.

Hanover

Brunch meeting with the Alumni College faculty: Diana Taylor, Laurence Davies (lecturers), Pano Rodis, Joe Medlicott, Randy-Michael Testa, and Don Sheehan (discussion leaders). Planned the last day especially. At 5:00, in 105 Dartmouth, the opening lecture by me on Re-interpretation. I think I wrote this lecture more for myself than for the audience; it's a sort of review of my career. Eagleton's book was a great help. Next came a banquet in Hanover Inn with "remarks" by Mardy High and me.

Hanover

I lectured on Sophocles' Antigone and Diana followed with a lecture on the Argentine "Dirty War" and Gámbaro's Antigóna Furiosa. Diana is a strong lecturer: rational and also engaged. I'm hopeful that she will do well in Peace Studies. My discussion section went well. What a pleasure to have older students with life experiences to bring! One, for example, had been in Vietnam and told me that our presence there was a large factor in what happened in Indonesia in 1965: the suppression of the communists. Suharto and Co. were encouraged to fight the communists because of their knowledge that U.S. policy and practice supported this. Similarly, if we hadn't intervened in Greece not only Greece but also Italy would probably have gone red; if not in Vietnam, Indonesia would have remained red, the Philippines have gone over, etc. Domino theory. It's the first time I heard it make sense. . . . Lunch with Diana afterwards planning strategy for reinstating Peace Studies. I've written Elise the good news. . . . Supper with Yiayia at Kendal. She's looking wonderful.

Received a long fax from Alec, who was responding to Chrysanthi's letter. He announced that he and Eyi had broken up—actually prior to the letter: at JFK on the way home. That's better. Also announced that he told North JIS that he is not interested in the headmastership. He wants to stay one or two more years and then to move on. That's good, too. Chrysanthi and I both appreciated the pain involved in all this (for Eyi as well as Alec, of course). But obviously we're much relieved. Alec brought Eyi to America to get a sense of how it would be to live here with her, and concluded apparently that it just would not work.

Tuesday, August 16, 1994

Davies lectured on The Tempest for 75 minutes, and what he actually said of substance could have been delivered in 20 minutes. I was very disappointed. He's entertaining, though, so people were not distressed. Diana concentrated on a vision of the "savage" by imperialist conquerors, especially Columbus in the Caribbean. Fascinating. At night we saw the BBC video of the The Tempest. Quite good, except for a miscast Ariel with a voice much too deep and very bad at singing. In the discussion section, I concluded that the only way the play seems to work without gross problems is as Shakespeare's valediction to the stage and to art.

Wednesday, August 17, 1994

I lectured on "Heart of Darkness" as an existentialist text. Starting with accounts of how Arthur Dewing treated the story when I arrived at Dartmouth as an instructor. Laurence followed with information on Conrad's family background and comments on the problems raised by Achebe. Better than yesterday but still not sufficiently controlled. He speaks with only the barest outline, no notes, and therefore mis-times. . . . Met with my student assistant for JMGS, Jay Bruce, who again had nothing to deliver. He promises for Friday. . . . Supper again at Kendal with Yiayia and Beatrice, Fanny's daughter, so my father's niece, her daughter and her daughter and son. The daughter is applying to Dartmouth. Sweet, mature girl. As we left, a band was om-pa-pa-ing in the Gathering Room (Willy Black on trombone). Lots of fun. But we went to see Apocalypse Now, which is not fun at all. Chrysanthi left after the opening scene. The film is brilliant in itself, and brilliant as a transposition of "Heart of Darkness" to Vietnam.

Thursday, August 18, 1994

I lectured on "Death in Venice" using my spectacular slide of Dionysus (= Tadzio). Laurence followed with information on Thomas Mann's life and especially the European political situation just before 1912, and a little on homosexuality. Not bad, and well balanced against mine. The discussion, however, was not good. People seemed unable to come to grips with the story, and circled all around it. At night we saw the Visconti film, yet again! It is haunting; and Mahler's music simply invades one and remains.

Friday, August 19, 1994

Diana lectured on the film, satisfactorily, not very deeply, however. Then all seven faculty came on stage and we answered questions that had been submitted in advance in writing, after which there were questions from the floor. That went well. After the break, six pre-chosen students came on stage and summed up. Only 2 or 3 did this well, especially a physician who spoke brilliantly. But the exercise was satisfactory. Again, we threw it open to the full audience. And ended—without the usual “tying up” by the director, which I refused to do as contrary to the spirit of the entire College, which emphasized ongoing process, continual reinterpretation, etc. All to the Bema for a barbecue. Nice talk with some of the students, although I got to know very few of them because we didn't share three meals a day, as on the cruises. Some had been on cruises with me; some had been in class. But I didn't remember them, alas. I trust it went well. Mardy will get evaluations and we'll see. . . . Afternoon mostly in Kiewit getting help with my Powerbook (the fax stopped functioning). Met with Jay Bruce again. He delivered about 60%, promised more by post shortly. . . . Drove back to the farm listening to Joy Luck Club, which I found rather tedious. We abandoned it in the middle. How delicious to return to the farm a week after leaving!

The field outside our front door is like a Turkish carpet: all purple and yellow with wildflowers.

Forgot to record last week that I met with Carol Blanc (director of nursing), Jean, and Mayme to discuss the firing of Joyce Hinsley, everyone's favorite nurse. Carol provided overwhelming documentation showing malpractice: administering medicines not prescribed, failing to administer those prescribed, misrecording doctors' instructions, etc. We counseled termination and will be prepared for the outcry. Too bad that the Peer Review system is not in place yet. . . . Jean also reported the successful hiring of a new Assistant Administrator. On the other hand, Nancy Mitchell wrote again, detailing horrendous alleged malpractice re: her mother (Alzheimer's). So, problems continue. Carol Blanc is strong, but also autocratic and cruel, people say (including Jean); morale problems will not disappear.

I've started right in this morning (after practicing Schubert a little) with work: reading Roddy Beaton's Introduction to Modern Greek Literature for the TLS review. . . . Ambassador Friedman called; wants me to lecture again at the State Department's Foreign Service School.

August 21, 1994

Letter to Tom Wood:

Dear Tom,

I thought you'd be interested to know that Alec broke up with Eyi. He did so at JFK just before they boarded their plane for Indonesia. He had just come from a week with Leander and Deanna in Washington, and Leander had caught him by himself a few times and had very frankly expressed his view, and Deanna's, that this relationship just wasn't right. In addition, Chrysanthi wrote a long letter expressing, for the first time, her own dismay. (Fortunately, that letter reached Alec after the breakup, for he himself confided that, if it had come before, his stubbornness might have impelled him to go in the opposite direction.) In any case, this episode (one of a series, as you know all too well) seems to be concluded. In the same letter, by the way, Alec noted that he had been queried again about applying for the headmastership of North Jakarta International School. He replied that he was not interested: he planned to stay only one or two additional years and then "move on." You can imagine Chrysanthi's pleasure at both pieces of news! But we sense the pain that Alec has gone through—and Eyi, too—and are relieved that he seems so busy at the moment (he says that he's working 15-hour days) that perhaps he doesn't have time to feel the pain. (It will haunt him later, of course.)

His visit with you was very meaningful, as always. I don't know if you conveyed by silences or looks or whatever your own perplexity regarding the relationship. I expect you did or, even if you didn't, that some form of "message" got through to accompany the subsequent messages he got from Leander and Chrysanthi. (I, acting on instructions from my good wife, kept silent. Actually,

I was the only one who went out of his way to be loving and gracious to Eyi, who after all seemed to me very sweet, frightened, and vulnerable.)

That's our news—for now! Best wishes to you both.

Raquette Lake

An all-day excursion with the Shapiros and their friends the Greenwalds first to the Great Camp Sagamore, which I didn't find very interesting architecturally, and then on the Raquette Steamboat ride around the lake peering in at other Great Camps: very pleasant and informative. Most have been preserved, but one, sold to the State, was burned down, as usual. Only the chimney remains.

August 26, 1994

Leander and Deanna are back from Hawaii. Leander enthused about descending to the sea-floor in a glass-sided submarine, flying over volcanoes in a helicopter, and trekking in the rain-forest. A very rich experience. He's an active tourist, like me, wanting to see . . . see . . . see. . . Supper with Mary and Maureen Fitzgerald again. Maureen goes into hospital on Tuesday to get an artificial hip joint. We made this the "Last Supper" and talked easily and well from 6:00 to 9:00, non-stop, especially about nursing. Maureen, from her experience as an RN, understands what's been happening at Kendal. . . . Earlier, I finished a first revision of the "Anxiety of Influence" talk. Peter Mackridge hopes to publish the proceedings of the Oxford Symposium. Previously, I finished the TLS review, which came with much difficulty. I hope it measures up to their standard. 900 words really weren't enough.

Saturday, August 27, 1994

Tourists again, with the Shapiros. We drove to Newcomb, where Irv had arranged with Ken Helms to take us in his horse-drawn carriage in to the "great camp" Santanoni. The horses were Ben and Jerry! Very lazy, so the 4.7 miles took 1½ hours. Chrysanthi and I got out and walked about 1½ miles. Santanoni is much more interesting architecturally than Sagamore, with rustic doors, and a wonderful complex of porches. Also a lovely stairway done in logs in part. All the structures are built of logs, unlike Sagamore. But the place is a mess, the victim of vandalism and neglect, with leaking roofs, etc. There is some effort to keep the buildings from collapsing, at least. We picnicked on the porch overlooking the lake, then had Ben and Jerry drive us out again. Afterwards, indefatigable Irv took me, the only one who hadn't been, to the Adirondack Interpretation Center: disappointing except for the stand of cedars we saw and one 120-year-old white pine. Then to Tahawus, where we walked into the premises of the abandoned National Lead Company mine, the old titanium mine. The huge open pit is now  $\frac{3}{4}$  filled with water. The tailings are everywhere, including one huge, ugly, black mountain of them. Old signs eerily say "Visitors' Parking," etc. The buildings are hacked away in part and seemingly untouched in part. Deserted. Not a soul where 350 workers labored for so many decades. The railway lines are half-buried in undergrowth. . . . Then via North Hudson to Schroon Lake for De Cesare's pizza. Home at 6:30. A full day. Chrysanthi said she was happy to see me willing to "waste" a full day like this, and also previously when we went to Sagamore and Raquette Lake. Preparation for retirement, I suppose.

August 31, 1994

Amazing! We entertained Jim and Joan Morris to pie and coffee after supper! He was rational, but quite sickly. Didn't harp on his "persecution," etc. We talked about children, schools, the blue heron (which likes their children's music). He was very curious about the Waddell Road murder. He told us that people had lived back there in the past; there are cellar holes, an old well, etc. Joan, ironically, is working for En Con in Warrensburg. She's the daughter of a NYC policeman and worked for eleven years in a prison in Dutchess County, in the medical department. She's glad to associate now more with trees and beaver than people. The children are well liked at school and generally the parents think the North Creek School is just grand. She seems to be Catholic and religious (explains the ten children). She reads a story to her youngest at bedtime and they say prayers together. Neither seems very educated, although he is a sort of amateur architect, having designed this house and constructed ten homes previously. They want us to visit. They're worried that the children won't want to settle here or build homes (naturally) although one is talking about building a log cabin. . . . In any case, we broke the ice and found that gossip and innuendo are obviously inadequate to sum up human character.

I am reading Doug Gwyn's fascinating Marxist study of early Quakerism and am copyediting it for Pendle Hill Publications. What a tempestuous time the 1640s, '50s, and '60s were! Those early Quakers were "possessed." He explains much of it as a reaction to economic changes, emerging capitalism, growth of the bourgeoisie, etc. The central idea is the concept of covenant. They had a covenant with Jesus Christ—the Light, the Life—that superseded all worldly contracts.

September 2, 1994

Don and Evelyn Greene for supper along with the Shapiros. Sheepishly, we admitted to the Greens that we had been good neighbors to the Morrises. . . . I'm trying to install a workable turnbuckle on the shed door, which has sagged a bit. Closing up is sad, especially in this χαρά Θεού weather. Tomorrow Chrysanthi will collect all the tomatoes (tonight we feared frost and covered them). Same two deer in our entrance. Stars tonight were spectacular: so bright and crisp, especially the entire Milky Way.

September 7, 1994

Terpni

Hard to leave. I'm so productive here, whereas in Hanover I'm fragmented. But Chrysanthi says she's bored. So we compromised, and will leave two days earlier. . . . The wildflowers I planted near the electric pole are spectacular. I took photos. Must plant more seed next summer. . . . Back in Hanover, stacks of mail. Telephone messages. Office . . .

September 8, 1994

Supper at Kendal with Mother and Dick Jones and his wife, who has Alzheimer's. Dick talked in a non-stop monologue about his illustrious ancestors: founder of Earlham College, etc., and his wife's. She's a Pennington. Tedious but interesting. He had also visited an Adirondack great camp in its heyday.

September 10, 1994

Supper again at Kendal, this time with Charlie and Fran Dudley, much better company than the Joneses. Then Bev & Franny's concert. They played Schumann's "Bilder aus Osten," which ought to have been fun for me, but it was totally dead. When Bev played alone, Chopin's G-minor Ballade and Berceuse, some of the magic came through.

September 11, 1994

All set to go to meeting when Filitsa telephoned in distress. Don Johnson had died yesterday. He chopped wood all morning, then took Popy to climb Mount Cube, got to the top, and had a heart attack on the way down and died with the child, age 11, watching in horror. We drove immediately to Felitsa's home; she was semi-hysterical, but the child was in perfect control. Discovered that Don had a bad heart, a family history of heart failure, and kept postponing a bypass operation. Macho-suicidal? Felitsa is beside herself with guilt for not pressing him to have the operation, and with self-pity for the loss at home (and work). "Oh, bring him back, Peter! Why can't he come back?" Takis Metaxas arrived from Wellesley and we drove together to Orford to fetch back Don's auto. Eerie feeling, stepping into the car he had left fully expecting, of course, to drive home. Finally, Don's daughters arrived. Filia's son was expected shortly, and we were able to leave after four hours there. Poor poor Filia! And they had planned to be married in the spring.

I'm preparing for the Pendle Hill Evaluation Meeting next week. I've been tabulating the results of the questionnaire. Very tedious. . . . John Hennessey, new on the Kendal Board, has already sent in a critique of the bylaws. That's all we need!

Supper with Walter and Miriam. He looks wonderful, and is fully alive in mind and even in body. We're preparing a Festschrift for his 80th, secretly, of course.

September 13, 1994

Cape May Point

Arrived at Cape May for lunch. It's a bit like von Aschenbach's Venice, although apparently wholesome—the tourists are Sophists! The famous mansions are "cute" gingerbread houses done up in garish colors, circa 1860s, 70s, 80s, 90s. I totaled percentages in the Pendle Hill questionnaire while eating lunch. Then to Cape May Point and the PH staff reunion. Spent the afternoon on the beach. Tropical heat. Long walk with Rebecca catching up on Doug Gwyn's book and the Boulding sonnets. Discovered that Gwyn left his parish because, while giving marriage courses to a couple as pastor, he started an affair with the wife! The congregation of course fired him and now the wife is suing the church. Ah! Quakers! Paddled Tom's homemade kayak/guideboat in the lovely calm sea. Others saw dolphins but I didn't. After supper, interviewed Janet Shepherd at length for the Evaluation and was saddened to be told that she already has found that she cannot work with Dan. Dan very apprehensive: why were we talking so much? Shared sleeping quarters with Dan but of course said nothing.

Wednesday, September 14, 1994

Cape May Point–Pendle Hill

Up at 5:30 a.m. to go with Nancy Frommelt, Dan, Tom, Sally Palmer, Bill Wood to see the sunrise from Cape May promenade. Fog alas. But a ball of fire rose eventually out of the mist. Nancy and I walked the whole promenade in deep conversation about her work with gifted children in the summer, about natural law, about the Catholics' reason for opposing abortion. She's a Franciscan nun and feels that the Vatican is justified but also very inept at public relations, for the deep reasons are not known by the general public. She made it real for me by saying, "Suppose Quakers were asked to renounce the Peace Testimony in deference to a greater good?" You'd feel the way Catholics feel about renouncing their absolute devotion to "life." . . . We returned for breakfast, Meeting for Worship, and then a "session" organized by Wendilou O'Brien, quite well done, in which each person's "concern" was rephrased by a group of six. My concern was to breathe true meaning into Quaker phrases that, I fear, have become clichés, especially "the Inner Light." . . . In the morning I also interviewed Rebecca Mays, who had good ideas about PH's problems but, thankfully, did not concentrate on Dan. The retreat adjourned after lunch and I gave a lift back to PH to Chuck Fager, the new secretary for the Issues Program. Interesting man, full of ideas, and aware of his reputation as abrasive and controversial. Dan wants him to "cool it" for the present.

Dan and Vince Buscemi, and I went out with the new British Quaker in Residence for supper at a terrific salad restaurant, followed by good coffee and dessert in a bookstore. Then Dan and I played four-hand piano: Debussy, which gave him trouble, but also the Schubert "Fantaisie," which he actually did rather well, so it was a great pleasure for me, since I can now play the treble part (more or less). We also reviewed "our repertoire": Persichetti, Bizet, Schumann. Very nice indeed! Afterwards, until about 11:00 p.m., when I couldn't stay awake any longer (having started the day at 5:30 a.m. after a poor night's sleep owing to Dan's snoring), I started proofreading the Boulding sonnets, which Eve Beehler gave me. Alas: typos, omissions, etc.—a mess.

Thursday, September 15, 1994

Pendle Hill

Another long day. Other members of the Evaluation Committee arrived except for Bob Gray: Shirley Dodson, Nancy Van Zant, Justin Duvall (the Benedictine abbot), and Elisabeth Dearborn. We interviewed all morning, broke for a quick lunch, interviewed all afternoon, and finished with a working supper. Alas, what we heard again and again is that people cannot work with Dan. Denny O'Brien is looking for another job. The teachers are alienated. We also had some good ideas re: fundamental change. At the end of the interview we caucused, and members felt that the situation with Dan must be addressed immediately—i.e., before we finish our report. My heart sank. We then had supper with Mary Wood and suggested that he be given professional help (as Jean Brophy was). So we'll have an executive session of the Board next Friday. This will be devastating for him, for he really does not understand that he is at fault. How will I face him afterward? Will he consider me a traitor? After this meeting I went to play four hands again, but of course said nothing (although I was tempted to forewarn him). . . . Ended the day with more proofreading of the Boulding poems until I couldn't see straight.

Friday, September 16, 1994

New York City

More Boulding on the train. The sonnets do stand up under repeated perusal. . . . Visit to Japan Tourist Agency and Japan Rail in Rockefeller Center. Long cordial lunch with Grant Thompson at the Yale Club. His new job is fascinating and fulfilling for him. Basically, he is a lobbyist for public libraries. He's very grateful that I introduced him to Charlie Hamlen, for they have become friends. Of John Tallmadge, he said interestingly that he's not as smart as he thinks he is, and talks too much. Neither was a surprise to me. He has worked out a fine modus vivendi with his wife despite his gayness. She has controlled her alcoholism. The children are understanding. It's nice that this friendship with Grant is continuing.

Tomorrow—oh my!—I've got to finish the Boulding and get it quickly back to Eve Beehler, and also to check and edit all our Pendle Hill testimony and send it to Elisabeth Dearborn, who will remove anything that compromises confidentiality. This then goes to Mary Wood prior to the executive session of the Board on Friday. Ugh! In addition, at some point soon the results of the questionnaire need to go to all committee members. We meet again on December 4th to draft our report.

Thinking again about Pendle Hill, I'm wondering if any sexual restrictions remain any more. Doug Gwyn, a pastor, has an affair with the woman he is counseling! Then I heard that a woman in Swarthmore told Dan that Peter Crysdale “violated me 26 times.” (Could she have been totally passive in all this?) Then Bob in the bookstore becomes the lover of Paul Jolly’s wife and Pendle Hill allows her to remain in residence. When does it stop?

Saturday, September 17, 1994

Hanover

Back into the thick of things. Off AMTRAK at 5:30 a.m. Breakfast in diner. 8:05 a.m. addressed Freshmen on the nature of Comparative Literature. 10:00 a.m. with Diana Taylor, explained the nature of Peace Studies to Freshmen. 2:00 p.m. Kendal meeting with JoAnn Birnbaum, Arthur Nieswander, and some fellow Overseers to hear residents’ view of the proposed bylaws. Dick Brokaw very outspoken and “difficult”; but the rest of us tried to negotiate calmly and discovered that we actually agreed on many points, especially on limiting the Corporation’s veto power. So the meeting ended amicably and we’re ready now for Tuesday’s big event.

Afterwards, somehow finished Boulding and sent it by Fed-Ex to Eve Beehler. Then printed out the Pendle Hill testimony and faxed it to Elisabeth Dearborn, who is going to extract the “Contra-Dan” parts for next Friday.

Sunday, September 18, 1994

To Meeting. Greeted by many in a very friendly way after my long absence. Meeting afterwards with Mary Burrough and Philip Major to help plan Dan Seeger’s universalist seminar in November. One woman very picky and obstructive. . . . Lunch with Mother at Kendal. She’s thriving and in good health, remarkably.

Monday, September 19, 1994

Outreach Committee. Lafayette pokes along . . . so slowly. But Peter Tailer is a live wire! We’re planning a luncheon at Kendal for Hanover senior citizens. We’re all apprehensive about losing tax-exempt status, being declared non-charitable. . . . Lunch with Margaret Smythe, who did the MALS thesis last spring on the French translation of Ulysses. She’s off to Florence to teach English to foreigners. . . . Chrysanthi is still in D.C. with Leander. Leander has set up the new Apple Quadra computer and loves it—it’s so fast.

Tuesday, September 20, 1994

Up at 4:30 a.m. to get Chrysanthi at AMTRAK. The sleeper also brought Barbara Parsons, David Jones, and four others from Kendal at Longwood. Breakfast all together at the Polka Dot. Then Overseers: the new phase, without 100% Quakers. New members are Jim Armstrong and Mary Schaffner from the residents, Jim Ashley (lawyer), John Hennessey, and Bill Hamilton (banker, lawyer) from outside. Astrid Dorsey (here with Coleman) introduced Quakerism, mediocrely. The big issue was the bylaws. We started line by line but then Jim Ashley suggested that a committee could be more efficient. It met after lunch and did come to an agreement that seemed acceptable to John Diffey. Sherri will type it up and distribute it to the committee for a last look. I'll collate the responses and then send everything to the Corporation Board, which meets on October 6th. With luck we'll be legal "Directors" next month. . . . At lunch, John, Margery, Barbara, and I met to be updated on Jean's evaluation. We're entering the final phase. Questionnaires are going out soon. A decision is expected in early October. We think her chances are good, but a lot depends on the responses from staff and residents. . . . I also spoke to Margery at length about Pendle Hill. Plus ça change plus c'est la même chose.

Bev Webster telephoned to say that Neil Ratliff died of AIDS. I telephoned Leander and wrote to Jim Atkinson. . . . Filitsa has been in touch. She finds that she has no rights whatever. Don's daughters and ex-wife brought a truck and started emptying out the house last Sunday. Also the office, as though Filitsa didn't exist. She's going to try to establish some rights under the common-law marriage statute, but chances are not good. We've been asked to write a letter stating that we always thought that they were married.

Wednesday, September 21, 1994

Classes started. I lectured on Ulysses and felt exhausted afterwards. Supper at Kendal with Astrid and Coleman Dorsey. Coleman is looking well, but fatter. I of course said nothing about his recent travail. Astrid told me that he still may be sentenced to jail, but she thinks community service more likely. He's already doing that. We toured Kendal and he concluded, rightly, that the Health Center is drab and unimaginative. We need a brilliant decorator. . . . Setting up the Mac Classic I got from Leander. Got some of it to work but not all. It's got a 40 MB hard drive and 4 RAM, a huge increase over the 512 I'd been using.

Thursday, September 22, 1994

Got results of the latest PSA: 5.4, the same as before. Good. It's stable. First Japanese class. Murder! The teachers refuse to speak English. No questions allowed. Lots of Rassias-type drilling. I could cope with that. But at the end, in the review, when the teacher simply showed the photos without using the language, and the students had memorized the whole sequence, effortlessly, my mind was totally blank. Very humbling. Will I carry on to the end? Doubtful. Five days a week, a minimum of one hour a day in the language lab, plus drill at 7:45 a.m. every day. I'll try to do the class and the lab. Attendance required (for the students); tests daily. Shows how lax I was in Greek 13 last spring, talking English, allowing absences.

To Kiewit with the Classic. Lovely people! They fixed everything. . . . L lectured on "Telemachus." The class seems responsible. I assured them that Ulysses is child's play compared to Japanese!

Elisabeth Dearborn's "Contra-Dan" arrived via fax, well done (alas). Approvals of bylaws are arriving; no substantive objections so far. . . . Met with Marty Sherwin and Diana Taylor re: War/Peace Studies. We'll try to get approved as a multi-disciplinary course for the first two years and then hope that the Dickey Center can carry us. Diana reported that Barry Scher told her "the course has a terrible reputation." Diana seems to be turning it into women's studies.

Nice encounter with Chauncey Loomis who, like me, is retiring. He is dismayed that romantic poets are not being taught for two years: no standards any more, no agreement on the canon.

Rushed home to eat, to print out the "Contra-Dan" for tomorrow, to write for Filitsa; then Dick and Allan came for this season's first music: von Weber, terribly rusty. I collapsed on all the difficult sections, not having looked at it for four months. Haydn #1 was better because I'd read it over once.

Off to AMTRAK, where the sleeping car porter greeted me, "Hello, Professor." Tomorrow, when I have to clerk the Executive Board re: the ubiquitous criticism against Dan, will be very difficult. I'm hoping to get them to assign him a "tutor," the way we did with Jean. But it's frightfully expensive.

Friday, September 23, 1994

Pendle Hill

Went over Boulding errors with Rebecca. . . . Long talk with Mary Wood re: strategies for later; another long talk with Ted Brinton, clerk of the Personnel Committee. He's convinced that personality cannot be changed but that systems can be. Both he and Mary value Dan and want to help him. Ted is dubious about the effectiveness of a consultant. The revelations given to the Evaluation Committee surely aren't new. Ted and Mary are already aware, owing to exit interviews with the Tabers, etc. . . . Worked on Doug Gwyn's chapter 8 in spare moments. At the Executive Board we had an executive session in which I explained the complaints. The Board was very supportive of Dan—especially Vince (not Janet Shetter, however). Vince feels that the Board itself failed because it hasn't given clear signals that it is the boss and that Dan is its spokesman. In any case, the annual review with Dan is scheduled for early October, and all this will be taken into account. Particularly sad is Denny's alienation (Denny told me that Dan is untrustworthy, a liar, unethical). . . . Afterwards: to Roadside to play: Debussy (which Dan actually practiced), Ravel, Schubert's "Fantaisie" and Ländler. Only afterwards did he blurt out, "I suppose they pilloried me!" I tried to explain, emphasizing the Board's support. Dan grew very defensive and self-righteous. He defended his practice of writing memos as a hedge against gossip and innuendo. If he can only be made to see that he, too, may be at fault. Much of what he thinks and does derives from his sad experience with the AFSC when, he says, lack of leadership allowed the enterprise to be "stolen from the Quakers." To bed at 1:00 a.m.

Saturday, September 24, 1994

Lovely breakfast with Chris and Janet talking about Natural Law. Bernie Haviland ministered beautifully in Meeting using Isaiah 6 as his text: "For I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips" compared to the unsullied glory of the Lord. The Executive Board considered sexual behavior (rather, misbehavior) at Pendle Hill: harassment, cohabitation and the like. It's a curse (blessing?) to be born in an interesting, transitional age! Long talk afterward with Janet Shepherd and Mary Wood about Dan. I'm hoping that Janet will play a key role as a peacemaker. Also I hope that Dan and Denny will agree to meet with a mediator. Both said Yes, but Denny is very resentful at the moment. . . . Tried the piano in Waysmeet. It probably needs only a tuning. Good talk with Vince: he calls the teachers the “Gang of Four” and is sure that they are manipulating our committee for their own ends. . . . Finished Gwyn chapter 8 at 30th Street Station. . . . Read in the TLS of Crick’s view (not new, of course) that the “soul” is simply billions of neurons giving signals triggered by chemistry.

October 3, 1994

Selen Ünsel is here, recruiting at Dartmouth for Morgan Bank. Loves NYC. Morgan wants her to conduct their Turkish business, based in London.

October 6, 1994

Breakfast at the Inn with Jean and Bob Shaughnessy, the new #2 administrator for health care. He’s stiff, but by all accounts experienced and competent. I urged him to act as mediator in the estrangement between Carol B. and Betty Barnett. . . . Lunch with Irene Kacandes, who is happy in her new post in the German Department. I’m hoping that she can take over the Modern Greek course eventually.

Saturday, October 8, 1994

NYC

To MGSA Executive Committee to present my biennial report on the journal. I said how relieved I was that the Karakasidou/Macedonia mess was over; it had been so time-consuming and discouraging. But I heard later that MGSA itself is still under attack as “anti-Greek” whereas people like Danforth are accusing the journal of refusing to print their anti-Greek articles. In short, we’re being attacked from both directions. . . . In the early afternoon I delivered Daphne’s new 520 Powerbook and accessories to Vaughan Tebbe, who lives on 91st and 3rd Avenue. Sweet girl, very attractive. She has a new job soliciting ads for a men’s fashion magazine. Then I walked to 96th and 3rd for tea with Selen Ünsel and Geoff Watson, former students. Selen lives across the street from a mosque (but doesn’t attend). Her father chanced to call while I was there; he urges us to return to Istanbul. Geoff is in advertising but finds it meaningless and is going to quit. Good for him! Then back to the Yale Club to meet Karen Van Dyck, Gail Holst Warhaft, Martin McKinsey, and the Elizabeth Constantinides Translation Prize committee, minus Meg Alexiou, who chose not to come. In two hours, over beer and cocktails, we chose Mylonas’s translation of Χαρκιανάκης (!) as the winner, with Stathis Gauntlett and Pavlos Andronikos and Nick Kostis among the runners-up. Then off to “Uncle Nick’s” Greek restaurant on 51st and 9th Avenue for a jolly meal. Mission accomplished, provided Meg agrees.

Sunday, October 9, 1994

Leisurely breakfast at the Yale Club with the Sunday Times; then to the Met to see the lovely Origins of Impressionism exhibit. The real hero and leader seems to have been Manet. What the exhibit showed was the role played in artistic development simply by the determination to do something different, and something closer to real life than the salon paintings of the pre-impressionist era. Philippe de Montebello’s cassette guide was very helpful, as always. . . . Then to lunch with Bob Sullivan, a former Dartmouth student, now an editor at Life Magazine, who interviewed me for the December issue’s story (cover story) “Who Was Jesus?” We talked about Kazantzakis’s vision in The Last Temptation, about Scorsese, about my Pendle Hill lecture on Jesus. Sullivan loves Kazantzakis; he had all the novels in first editions, hardback, and brought them for me to sign. I felt very important. What a pleasure to talk meaningfully like this, effortlessly, for two hours, especially over a sumptuous brunch.

October 12, 1994

Dick asked me to play the Rimsky-Korsakov wind quartet at his house: piano, flute, bassoon, clarinet. I managed the 1st movement fairly well, but not the rest. Then we tried the Beethoven—so rusty, alas.

October 13, 1994

Shapiros are here for a visit. They attended my lecture on “Penelope.” Then we had supper with Yiayia at Kendal and a pleasant, relaxed visit afterwards in her apartment. In the afternoon I visited the new provost to talk about continuation of the University Seminars after I retire. He seemed interested. Will any of these things continue? (The composition center will, of course.) Peace Studies is still vulnerable; the committee doesn’t like Diana Taylor’s proposal, says it isn’t truly interdisciplinary.

October 14, 1994

Played Haydn Sonata #3 quite well with Dick and Allan. Practice makes such a difference! I had never even fingered it during all these years of sight-reading.

October 17, 1994

Kendal lunch with a reporter from Newsday writing us up. Jean is in bed with a bad back, admittedly maybe from tension occasioned by tomorrow's Board meeting.

October 18, 1994

Kendal Board, 8:30 a.m. to 12:00 noon. The bylaws still are not settled and people are disgruntled. Trying to get Brent to fund depreciation. Bob Shaughnessy reported well in Jean's absence. In executive session John Diffey explained the options for Jean. We'd hoped to have all results of the evaluation in hand but they have been delayed. Also, we'll want Jean present. So, the difficult part is postponed until November. But at least the Board knows that it will need to decide whether she stays or goes.

Wednesday, October 19, 1994

To D.C

Lectured on The Trial. Skipped English Department meeting and flew to Washington via Boston. Leander picked me up at National Airport. He's in good spirits. Nice reunion with Deanna, proudly displaying new dining room chairs and highboy, very elegant.

Thursday, October 20, 1994

Ambassador Townsend Friedman picked me up at 8:00 a.m. at Leander's. Bad traffic. Took us 1 hour 20 minutes to get to Arlington, so I started ½ hour late. Friedman an easy conversationalist, so we covered Greece, US politics, etc. I lectured on Ο Καπετάν Μιχάλης in the first hour, followed by questions and a break. Then on four poets—Seferis, Ritsos, Cavafy, Elytis—in the 2nd hour. Only a few questions because we'd lost the first half hour, but I hope it was useful. They seemed attentive, at least. Friedman drove me from the Foreign Service School to the Ballston Metro, where Peter and Alice now live on the 26th floor, with a view of all of D.C. Tasteless lunch followed by grand tour of NSF, where Peter is spending this year on a special mission investigating just how the government spends its basic research money. He's right at the top, next to the director and assistant director. Very impressive. Had a good coffee to wash down Alice's lunch and then returned to the 26th floor of "Alta Vista" to play four-hands with Alice. She's better than Dan, maybe. But it was nice. Deanna and Leander came for supper, also tasteless. Then we all went to the Kennedy Center for an interesting concert, at least the first half. It started with Samuel Barber's "Medici's Dance of Vengeance," a ballet score from 1956, scintillating, wonderfully orchestral. Then Alicia de Larrocha performed the Ravel Piano Concerto, which again is wonderfully orchestral but in which the piano seems sometimes to have almost a minor part. The second half was Dvořák's 6th Symphony, which bored us all, including Deanna. 43 minutes, twice as long as the concerto and four times as long as the marvelous Barber. Deanna said the orchestral players were all asleep, too.

Philadelphia

Up at 6:30 a.m. To Bethesda with Leander to his favorite diner for breakfast. Then drove to Pendle Hill. He described the problem with his shoulder, which has no muscle tone around the joint owing to four years' neglect. He's doing physical therapy now and some progress seems evident. Reunion with Dan Seeger, who showed Leander Roadside with all its gadgets. They discussed next June's piano workshop, where Dan will need to be a day late and where Leander will pair him with one of the teachers in my absence. Dan says that things are going better. He had one mediated session with Denny, said Denny still seems grumpy, notes that Denny has never stayed more than two or three years in any one job. So, that's not going too well, but at least they're committed to several more mediation sessions.

Publications Committee rejected the Quaker Moderation pamphlet after all my work. Drat! I tried, but almost everyone was against it. . . . Rebecca rushed me to the airport to return to Lebanon. Drove directly to Pierce's Inn to begin mediation training under Rabbi Daniel Siegel. Chrysanthi, too. Long session tonight on introductory techniques.

Saturday, October 22

Pierce's Inn

Role-playing began. It's fun to be with students, mostly girls; they're so forceful and mature when they're not intimidated in class. Siegel is good except he talks too much, too too much, and doesn't seem to realize that all problems with the schedule were his fault. But we had more role-playing and almost brought one (simulated) mediation to a close. More training in December. I think I could actually try a mediation now, although I might not do it very well. A nice axiom: "A successful person is not one who never fails but one for whom failure means feedback."

Sunday, October 23, 1994

Practiced Haydn's 1st trio. Did Japanese (also on the plane yesterday). Meeting with Popy, Felitsa's daughter, who has been with us all week. Felitsa arrived. Lunch together. She seems very beholden to us and I'm glad we can help. Popy was the ideal guest.

Kendal minutes, which I had to rewrite, as usual. Supper with Yiayia at Kendal, followed by Spaulding to hear Elie Wiesel. Very moving speech, chiefly about the prisoners' early reluctance to remember and then Wiesel's crusade to make everyone remember, thinking how easily the Holocaust could be forgotten especially after all the survivors are dead.

October 25, 1994

I arranged a lunch so that Irene Kacandes could meet the others who are Greek or concerned with things Greek: Ada Cohen, Kathleen Corrigan, Felia Macedon. . . . Then met with David Henry of Maine, who wants to build a CCRC in Portland, using Lloyd Lewis, who is now on his own and competing (!) with Kendal Development Corporation. Kendal Development made Jean cancel David Henry's appointment with Naomi! Imagine! But I spoke with him fully and honestly, and he seemed to appreciate this. Sometimes Quakers are really disgusting.

October 26, 1994

Lunch at Kendal with Richard Jones, who is obsessed with his ancestors and others. His people founded Earlham, Evanston, Illinois, etc. His wife is descended from Isaac Penington, etc. He's inviting a scholar here to talk about Quaker history and wants me to introduce him. . . . Mardy High to the office with suggestions about the Irish tour. I'm now to do an extra lecture on gardens in literature, for example in Milton's Paradise Lost.

October 29–30, 1994

Spent the weekend correcting C. L. 37 papers, 21 of them. Lori, Clive, and baby at Kendal. Supper together. I'm glad I'm not a "modern" father/husband.

October 31, 1994

A student is processing the Pendle Hill questionnaires, getting all the percentages and making graphs of the results, all on the computer. . . .

Daphne and Greg are in New York, he on business and to be an usher in a wedding next Saturday at the St. Regis, very fancy. Daphne's first impression of New York compared to Tokyo: how cheap (!) and how vibrant. She starts work on the Japan Times as soon as she returns. Morgan Binswanger, Robert's son, flew to Jakarta today to set up Hillary Clinton's visit, and he wants to meet Alec.

November 1, 1994

Four-hand piano with Junko Hibya, visiting professor from Keio University, Tokyo. She sight-reads reasonably well but it totally unmusical. We did the Schubert Fantaisie, Persichetti, Bizet, Debussy.

November 2, 1994

Lunch with John Lincoln, who read my lecture on the Antigone and wanted to discuss it prior to beginning an ILEAD course. He thinks that Creon may be the play's true protagonist.

The worst of tragedies. Allan and Claire Munck went off to Florida on holiday and were joined by their children. Two days later their son, Alex, drowned. Claire discovered the body as she walked unsuspectingly along the beech. He was an epileptic and presumably had a seizure in the water.

November 3, 1994

Lunch with Tom Corindia. Talked about the Kendal bylaws problem and Tom recommended a Harvard Business Review article on "Federalism" (what we want) vs. "decentralization" (what the Corporation wants). I'll distribute the article to our trustees.

November 4, 1994

Jean came to the office with the results of her second evaluation. Very mixed, at best. We discussed strategies. I suppose she'll squeak by . . . barely. Sandra Folzer, the coach, is seriously ill with breast cancer, alas.

I visited the Muncks. Both daughters are there. They brought the body back, too. They're stalwarts, but obviously also deeply distressed. They plan to return to Florida after the memorial service on Sunday. Allan can't face going back to work just yet.

Sunday, November 6, 1994

Ministry and Counsel, after Meeting, but I left in order to go with Chrysanthi to Alex Munck's memorial, held in the James's house on Willy Hill. Non-religious. Rather Quakerlike, since people who knew Alex gave testimony to his qualities. Very weepy. But very genuine. I thought how nice it would be if the rest of us could be recalled so warmly, for good humor, creativity, perseverance.

November 8, 1994

Election Day. The Republicans are going to capture both the House and Senate, it seems. It's a repudiation of Clinton, alas. Very strange. We can only hope that the Republicans will anger the populace during the next two years so that in 1996 Clinton can be reelected.

Music again: four hands with Junko.

November 9, 1994

I'm teaching The Magic Mountain again after many years and enjoying it very much. Good class this term. . . . Lunch with Steve Scher. He brought me a video of Britten's Death in Venice. . . . Pano Rodis called. Karen wants primary custody of the girls. He has discovered that she is writing papers for her lover, the Russian student. Pano wonders whether he should try to have her disciplined for this. What a mess! He asked me for the disciplinary regulations.

November 10, 1994

Video on Japan, in Japanese, with subtitles. I actually made out some words: Watashi wa, etc. . . . Supper with Karen Papagapitos, George's wife. Their son Christian is here again, examining the offerings in drama. Karen turns out to be a very successful author of children's books. Lively, interesting woman. She clearly took a shine to Chrysanthi.

Saturday, November 12, 1994

Working on the journal. Also need to analyze the Pendle Hill questionnaire results and send everything off to the committee. Also need to work hard on Japanese because I'll miss two classes next week. . . . Practiced Ravel secondo part, anticipating Dan's arrival next Thursday.

Allan Kelly of Morehouse called yesterday to complain that Rebecca hasn't sent any information for the next catalogue, and his deadline is Monday. Rebecca is really slackening. I called her and of course she had no excuse. Also told her that Redmont is understandably very angry because of the rejection of his PH pamphlet essay on Quaker moderation. I need to write to him.

Grant Thompson wrote, sadly, to say that he's leaving Libraries for the Future on December 31 because their board refused to transfer the office to Washington and he cannot continue to commute. So, once again, he'll be unemployed. But Charlie Hamlen is flourishing. The Tokyo Quartet is donating the entire Beethoven Quartet series to Classical Action.

Learned that Andy Rangell's hands still refuse to function, which means that his career as a pianist is obviously ended. Yet he refuses to accept this as a fait accompli and to try to do something else with his life. Another tragedy in the making.

Leander sent the program for Neil Ratliff's memorial. Dead at 58 from AIDS. What a waste!

November 14, 1994

NYC at NYU

To NYU for Hellenists' Workshop sponsored by Onassis Foundation and the Ίδρυμα Ελληνικού Πολιτισμού. Very fancy. Opened by Brademmas, who quoted me along with Mike Keeley and was very friendly afterwards. Officers of both foundations were present, including Babiniotis and others from Greece. Old friends, too, Anna Farmakidou, for example. Each of us described our program and especially our frustrations and needs. Fancy lunch with one of the foundation officers at each table. I had Ioannou, who was Onassis's chief lawyer, apparently. He was very moved by the fact that I, a non-Greek, spoke Greek. Lots of sympathy from various quarters when I announced that Demotic Greek I and II are going out of print. Gondicas wants me to revise them at Princeton. Afternoon session devoted to examination of chief needs worldwide. Maskaleris repeated his invitation for me to teach at San Francisco State, probably in the spring of 1997. Then went to the Yale Club with Jeff Rusten of Cornell, the computer expert. He has made a keyboard enabling me to type Kadmos exactly as I've been typing my own font, with deadkeys. Bless him! He sat with me for 2½ hours and then went back to his hotel to fix some bugs. Off to Hotel Pierre for fancy reception with hors d'oeuvres. Mike and Mary Keeley were there. She's well, miraculously. Walked Anna Farmakidou back to her hotel (I stayed at the Yale Club).

November 15, 1994

Final session at NYU, deciding priorities. I suggested a computer data bank for Greek texts. Met Rusten at 8:30 a.m. before the session to finish installation of his “Greek keys.” Lunch at Onassis Center on West 10th Street, not as grand as I’d imagined. Then to Patelson’s, to buy four-hand music for Dan and me.

Wednesday, November 16, 1994

Hanover

Arrived 5:00 a.m. Polka Dot diner breakfast. Office at 6:00 a.m. Japanese class at 9:00 a.m., difficult, having missed two days. Nihongo totemo muzakidii! Lecture on The Magic Mountain.

Thursday, November 17, 1994

Met Dan Seeger at 5:00 a.m. Polka Dot again. Showed him Kendal at 6:00 a.m. He attended my Magic Mountain lecture, on Peeperkorn. Four-hand repertoire. Then dinner party with Corindias and Peter and Gerrie Tailer, new friends from Kendal. More four-hand afterward, including the great Schubert “Fantaisie.” And we discovered Mozart’s Fantasies.

Friday, November 18, 1994

The new Peace Studies course designed by Diana Taylor and Lynda Boose was approved by the multidisciplinary committee after scary delays. Hooray! Maybe I’ll be able to salvage Peace Studies after all before I retire. It goes now to the COI.

Dan attended my lecture again, on the second half of chapter 7 of The Magic Mountain: Hysterica Passio, Séance, etc. Good class.

Then at 5:30 we all went to the Meeting House to begin his class: the Seeger workshop in Quaker universalism. First session was on the meaning of universalism. Nicely done by Dan.

Saturday, November 19, 1994

Dan’s second session was on “Christian” Quakerism, but this got short-changed because he detoured to consider “Truth” and “Science” at people’s requests. Less audience participation on the Jesus aspect; Dan talked too much, but talked well. Alas, the Christocentric Friends in the group chose to keep silent. Last session, in the afternoon, was on the future of the Society of Friends, a plea for reconciliation, for appreciation of diverse gifts. Dan’s insights are fine, but he should use the Socratic method more. . . . More music, then a nice supper at Kendal with Mother, then I delivered Dan to the train.

Yesterday, at the dinner party, he gave a full recital of the “Seeger case,” how it started . . . and how it finished. This morning at breakfast he spoke, for the first time to me, about his ex-wife, now very ill.

Sunday, November 20, 1994

After Meeting, Fran Brokaw rose to announce that Peter Bien’s views of Jesus are in Life Magazine, next to Jerry Falwell’s! I’ll buy a copy tomorrow. . . . Interviewed a boy for Haverford. . . . Struggled to finish the résumé of questionnaire questions for Pendle Hill.

Monday, November 21, 1994

Committees for Kendal at Hanover and the Kendal Corporation met over supper. I was clerking. Diffey, Kidder, Don Kramer (lawyer) and Brock from Philadelphia. Bob Metz couldn’t come; his prostate cancer is alive again. We went through the bylaws clauses one by one, the most troublesome being the ones relating to the shared service fee and vetoing by Board members. Twice, at apparent deadlock, Don Kramer came up with new language, quite creatively, and sliced through the Gordian knot. We finished cordially, with apparent agreement.

Tuesday, November 22, 1994

Full Board meeting. All went well until Jim Armstrong reneged on his agreement last night regarding the shared services fee. After ½ hour getting nowhere, Don Kramer again cut through the knot with new language. Result: agreement. The revised bylaws now go back to the Corporation (I adjured Lynmar to try to get approval without further changes) and then to the Pennsylvania Commissioner of Insurance. . . . In executive session, afterwards, we completed Jean’s evaluation. Very mixed results. Clearly some Overseers want her to go. But her virtues are too clear. We agreed that she needs more coaching, and extended the probationary period one year. Probably a pusillanimous compromise. John privately told me that he expects, and hopes, that she’ll want to move on, voluntarily, in a year or two.

I’m struggling now to get the Pendle Hill evaluation materials off to the committee and to copyedit (i.e., rewrite) six articles for the next JMGS. Jeff Rusten has now supplied the Didot font, which will work on Greek Keys the same way as JMGS Kadmos does. Got PH stuff in the mail before leaving for Washington tonight, thanks to James Muiter’s good work in processing the results. But I spent hours and hours analyzing these and trying to make them more “user friendly.”

Wednesday, November 23, 1994

Washington

To Washington via AMTRAK with Yiayia. Nice trip. Brought a wheelchair with us for Yiayia, which helped immensely in Union Station and on the Metro. Long lunch in Au Bon Pain. Metro to Rockville. Met by Deanna. I worked on Leander's computer, copyediting JMGS frantically. Chrysanthi and Deanna prepared the turkey, pies, etc. Yiayia read Pride and Prejudice with great pleasure. Leander returned at 7:00 from Levine, and we all went to a Chinese restaurant. It's so easy and pleasant now to be with Deanna.

Thursday, November 24, 1994, Thanksgiving

Some four-hand duets in the morning. Leander thinks Arensky will be good for Dan; we played it over; also Schubert "Fantaisie," lovely to do against Leander's sensitive secondo interpretation. And we did the two Mozart Fantasies, which are certainly too hard for Dan. . . . Busecks came for the feast together with Susie, just arrived from Oakland. All the posh wedding presents were on display, very festive. But our extended family doesn't have clear rituals for saying thanks. Yiayia tried, valiantly. . . . After the Busecks left, Leander expounded to me his hopes to develop the four-hand institute into a real business, away from Kinhaven (and Jerry), located perhaps in the Adirondacks. I gave ideas and contacts, and of course was warned afterwards by Chrysanthi not to interfere in Leander's life.

Washington

More piano with Leander. Then we all went to Alexandria to the Busecks' 26th floor apartment for lunch, after which Peter took us through the National Science Foundation. He showed the White House directions that he's been responding to and also, alas, the full text of the Republicans' "Contract for America," which isn't all bad, actually, but which wants to dismantle AMTRAK, among other things and to increase military spending and decrease Medicare, etc. . . . Good use of the wheelchair again at Union Station.

Sunday, November 27, 1994

Hanover

Chris Clay, my student, cooked us a Japanese curry rice dinner. Guests: Junko Hibya, Lafayette and Mayme. Lots of talk about Japan.

Monday, November 28, 1994

Lunch with Pocloda, the new acquisitions editor at UPNE. He thinks, contrary to what Tom MacFarland said, that maybe they can reprint Demotic Greek, especially if we do some work toward a revision. He wasn't receptive however either to the Middleton-Bien project or the Birmingham Symposium in my honor. But if Princeton reneges on Kazantzakis letters, he'd be interested in those.

Thomas Hamm, Quaker historian at Earlham, lectured at Kendal on "Rufus Jones and the Transformation of American Quakerism." I introduced him. A very fine survey of splits (Wilburites, Gurneyites, with descendants of both Wilbur and Gurney in the audience, and descendants of Mary Dyer and Isaac Pennington also, and how Jones dreamed of healing the rifts, but failed. He did however transform Eastern Quakerism into a "mystical" and service-oriented religion. Afterwards, a flood of questions.

Breakfast with Tom Hamm at the Inn. It's nice to meet someone who really knows Quaker history. . . . Working frantically on JMGS articles. Hastened to Japanese class; it's been a humbling adventure. I have so little to show and the students have so much, but they work 20 hours a week and I between 6 and 7.

12:00 to 5:00 with Chrysanthi doing mediation stage 2 with Daniel Siegel and the "adult" trainees, mostly young deans. We did two simulation exercises in the first of which I was the co-mediator (very frightening) and in the second the co-disputant. It's a very fine technique. I wish I had used some of the tactics at the Kendal meeting recently. . . . An hour meeting with James Breeden afterwards regarding religious pluralism on campus. He has never been able to get his University Seminar really going because there just isn't much intellectual content when he is involved. . . . Then to Sweet Tomatoes. Met Mrs. Schumann there with Claudia, Petra, and the boys. Helmut died two days ago; his condition was hopeless and the death was a blessing. . . . At the meal Chrysanthi, after warning me to sit down, told the latest: Daphne and Greg are being sent back to London by Goldman Sachs, starting February 1. So the sojourn in Tokyo will be six months instead of two years. Too bad. Daphne won't do two years of Japanese and she'll need to quit her job at Japan Times. But it will be nice to have them in London while we're in Woodbrooke.

November 30, 1994

Last Comparative Literature 37 class. Student mini-lectures, some very interesting. Most worked on Kafka. I did not distribute course evaluations because I don't expect ever to teach the course again. . . . Filia and Popy for supper. Filia wants to buy Donald's house and "develop" the land. We warned against this. Alternatively, since she's being offered $50,000, we advised her to take this sum and unburden herself. Popy, all through the conversation (debate) kept urging her mother not to buy the house but to move into town. Very sensible.

December 1, 1994

Got five of the six JMGS articles in the mail to authors. AMTRAK to Philadelphia.

December 2, 1994

Pendle Hill

AMTRAK an hour and a half late. I arrived at Pendle Hill at 12:40, just in time for lunch meeting. Amazing Publications Committee, unprecedented in that everyone said No to the first manuscript and everyone said Yes to the second. We were finished in an hour. Then Book Committee. We'll be doing a biography of Douglas Steere next, after Doug Gwyn's book and the book on women's journals. . . . Good four-hand piano with Dan after the Executive Board. We tried the Arensky that Leander recommended. Dan likes it.

Saturday, December 3, 1994

Pendle Hill

Long talk with Doug Gwyn, who is writing a new book on pre-Quaker seekers or ranters, comparing them with today's seeking and ranting. I helped him with literary terminology (which he is using) such as "romanticism." Meeting for Worship exceptional because Nancy Frommelt used it to reaffirm, publically, her Franciscan vows, including the vow of celibacy. Very moving. I ministered about Milton and Eve: how "freedom" equals subservience to someone clearly superior, precisely Nancy's condition. . . . After Executive Board I queried Denny about the mediation between him and Dan. Denny says that the whole problem is Dan's, not his, so obviously there's a long way to go. Did some C. L. 37 papers, played again with Dan, did some JMGS copyediting, prepared for tomorrow. Supper with David Saunders, the Quaker in residence, and clerk of the Woodbrooke committee. Will see him at Woodbrooke in the spring.

Sunday, December 4, 1994

Another long, good talk with Doug Gwyn over breakfast. At Meeting, David Saunders ministered à propos of Nancy's vows yesterday, saying that Quakers although less structured and creedal, do have "vows" of a sort, by which he meant the newly revised advices of London Yearly Meeting, which he then read. Very fine. I asked for a copy to take home.

Then, from 10:00 to 4:00 an exhausting meeting of the Resident Program Evaluation Committee (Elisabeth Dearborn, Nancy Van Zant, Bob Gray, Justin Du Vall, Shirley Dodson). We mapped out the format and much of the content of our report, and assigned as "homework" sections to be written by each and sent to me for collation and final editing. With luck we can conclude with a conference call instead of another meeting. We'll see. . . . Bob Gray drove me to 30th Street and filled in Dan Seeger's background with AFSC. Wallace Collett had campaigned to have him fired at one point.

Between now and next Sunday I need to: send a résumé of our meeting today to the committee members; grade C. L. 37 papers and exams and turn in final grades; finish copyediting articles for the journal (book reviews can perhaps be done in Tokyo); prepare somewhat my MLA talk on religion and literature. Meanwhile, our roof is being replaced. Oh, also need to review Japanese. Strength! But today, in the 10:00 to 4:00 meeting, I continued to be lucid and energetic while all the others wilted, especially after lunch.

December 6, 1994

Chrysanthi and I are finishing the second phase of our mediation training with Daniel Siegel. It's going well. I'm hoping to mediate sometime—e.g., at Kendal.

Trip to Japan

We left Hanover via AMTRAK on Sunday, December 11, 1994, after dining with Yiayia at Kendal. Luckily, it was a feast day in our feast-fast-feast-fast routine. Filia Makedon drove us to the station, where we discovered that the train would be three-quarters of an hour late. Good beginning! The next morning we rose at 6:45 a.m., had breakfast (fasting), and prepared to rush off the train the moment it arrived. It was still about 45 minutes late. But at the end of the East River tunnel, and only a few hundred yards from Penn Station, the engine broke down! So we sat there for a while, and then started moving backwards! Despair. However, by some miracle things righted themselves, the train changed direction, and we made it to the station. Luckily, we caught a bus to 42nd Street and almost immediately a Carey bus to JFK, paying only $4.00 each (senior citizen price).

At Kennedy, where we arrived at 10:30 for the 12:00 noon flight, we found hordes of people, almost all of them oriental, and almost all with mountains of luggage: huge boxes that seemed to contain television sets—or perhaps automobiles! We felt very proud with our one bag each and no checked luggage. Everything went well. The plane left on time, the seats were quite comfortable, the flight attendants kept giving us juice and water, and we were able to break our fast at the second meal, around 2:00 p.m. Japan time (midnight our time). Slept well on the plane. Also copyedited most of the eight book reviews that Eva had sent me for JMGS. We arrived at 4:30 p.m. on Tuesday, December 13th.

At Narita we had a long wait on the line for immigration, but passed quickly through customs, where the officer asked “Is that all the luggage you have?” Daphne was waiting outside the barrier. Lovely reunion. I changed money and then we went to exchange our Japan Rail pass vouchers and get tickets for the train into Tokyo Eki. The airport is not exceptional, although it is immaculately clean. But the subway is a marvel of shiny marble and spotlessness. Although there isn’t a morsel of dirt anywhere, a man was carefully sweeping the stairs. On the platform there are marks exactly where the doors open, and people line up one behind the other awaiting the train. All seats are reserved on this one. We enjoyed the ride, which takes about an hour. At Tokyo Eki, Daphne got us a taxi and conversed expertly in Japanese with the driver, who was in necktie but without white gloves. The backs of his seat and ours were covered in white lace. He opens all doors; the passenger does not. The fare is indicated on a meter. No tips are given.

Daphne and Greg’s apartment is in a quiet neighborhood with small dwellings—very posh, of course. They’re on the third floor of a new building that seems well constructed, with an elevator. Huge living room, light streaming in from two directions, ample kitchen with all modern appliances, three bedrooms (all of which will be occupied soon enough), three baths. In one of the bedrooms, Daphne has her computer set up, and Greg has his huge computer connected to Reuters to get all the latest financial information instantaneously. Greg greeted us warmly, and we had a nice meal prepared by Daphne of rich soup and French bread, wine, apples. Then we heard all about the move back to England. They'll be leaving in mid-January. It's the first time that a transfer really was not voluntary, says Greg. Apparently the boss of his group in London, John, "wasn't working out," so the firm is trying to transfer him to another group and is bringing Greg in as his replacement. Goldman is doing very badly, apparently, with huge losses because of improvident overextension, e.g., in Hong Kong, where an office opened with about 200 highly paid people, costing $200,000,000 a year to run, and not bringing in much in return (although hopes were for huge profits in the future). In any case, there are many people being fired right now, and general gloom in the office. But Greg's group isn't doing too badly. When he leaves here, his position will not be replaced. All the people in his group in New York, London, and Tokyo now know each other well enough so that they can function with fewer hands. Greg much enjoyed his trip to Australia, and especially a very special Greek restaurant in Melbourne! We retired at about 11:00 p.m., feeling quite well owing to the marvelous feast-feast-feast-fast regimen. But neither Chrysanthi nor I slept very much that night.

On Wednesday, Dec. 14th we left early in order to arrive at the Mitsukoshi Department Store in Nihombashi in time for the ceremonial daily opening at 10:00 a.m. Every morning the employees all congregate for a meeting with their supervisors. Then some of the girls—all in spiffy uniforms—come to the front door with the floor manager (a man, of course). One of the girls bows, comes out, and makes a beautiful little speech, first in Japanese, then in reasonably good English, about the store's philosophy, its "corporate image of quality service to its customers," then bows low again and retires behind the doors. At 10:00 a.m. sharp, she and another girl open the doors and invite the customers in, again with low bows. As we entered, the salespeople all welcomed us sweetly. The elevator girl, again smartly dressed in her uniform and little derby hat, cries a litany as the lift rises to the roof-garden: it's all theater, really. The roof-garden has a playground for children, and a florist's with banzai trees for $1000 if one wishes. We went down, floor by floor. There's a theater, a cultural center, an art gallery, and apparently a restaurant on every floor. The art department is particularly attractive, with marvelous ceramics and metal ware priced from $32,000 to around $1200 for small items. We noticed one couple who apparently were interested in buying something; they were being treated to tea and sweets by salesgirls and manager, complete with bows and more bows. Of course the most fun was the food hall in the basement. Samples everywhere—we practically had our lunch, bit by bit, as we passed through. Bento-o (box lunches) were being prepared, as was sushi, tempura (seafood or vegetables dipped in batter and deep-fried in a vegetable-sesame oil), yakitori (chicken on a skewer, grilled over charcoal), cutlets, etc. . . . Afterwards, we continued on this same avenue to the Ginza. The area is very posh, with office buildings out of which smartly dressed executives keep emerging. At one point I saw one of them enter a limousine to the bows—actually, the obeisance—of the lackey who accompanied him. Another sight, more lovely, is of tiny children all in their blue uniforms and little hats, so tiny that they seem like miniature caricatures of children, emerging from school and descending into the subway without adult accompaniment. Tokyo apparently is totally safe, and everything is extraordinarily organized. We returned via subway to Hiro-o and had our first experience of soba noodles in a tiny shop, just eight seats at a counter. There are infinite varieties, but we had ours “plain,” “kake soba” —just boiled noodles in a delicious soy sauce-based soup, with some onions thrown in. You slurp the noodles using chopsticks and then drink the soup from the bowl. Delicious, nutritious, and cheap. On the way back we looked in on a supermarket designed for foreigners but also obviously patronized by Japanese. Everything and anything is available here, but the difference is the help: here, as everywhere else, abundant help, five people where we would have one. At the checkout counters, girls in smart uniforms, each one backed up by a young man in another snappy uniform of a different color, to place your items in bags. Everyone working energetically and pleasantly: Hai! Hai! Hai! . . . Back home in mid-afternoon, I started working on the JMGS book reviews again, on Daphne's new PowerBook 520. Ole Smith's is inflammatory against PASOK, and I had to quench its fire a bit. Others had to be shortened, etc., etc. After supper, Daphne and Greg wanted us to see a Japanese video of a movie about—guess what?—noodles! An entire movie! The opening scene is hilarious: a young man starts slurping his noodles, but next to him is an older man, a sort of Zen master of noodle-eating, who is scandalized. He then instructs the young man. You savor the quality first without tasting. Then you must caress the pork with your chopsticks. Then you taste the tiniest bit of the spice, followed very very slowly with some exploratory noodles. At the proper time, you drink some of the soup. Then you meditate. And so forth. In another scene, some Japanese girls are being instructed on how to eat noodles (i.e., spaghetti) American-style. The crucial thing, says the teacher, is not to make noise. So they try, with disastrous results.

Thursday, December 15th, we were on our own in the morning, as Greg departs every day at 6:30 a.m. for work and Daphne, today, had to leave early for her Japanese lesson. I finished the book reviews, printed them out, and prepared a parcel for Eva Konstantellou, drawing the kanji for United States and the hiragana, laboriously, for “air mail” (kookuubin). Then to Nissekidori by myself—quite an adventure—to find the post office. No luck at first, but I gathered up courage and asked a shop girl, “Kano hen no yuubinkyoku wa, doko desu ka,” and she pointed! The packet of about twenty typewritten pages cost 990 yen! Then came another adventure, to see if we could meet Daphne successfully after her class, at the corner of Roppongidori where the almond shop is: a favorite meeting place in Tokyo, apparently. She was a bit late, so we took in the crowds. I remarked that many Japanese, if you don’t look at their eyes, resemble Greeks, and Chrysanthi agreed. We also noticed how shabbily dressed the crowd was here, compared to the Ginza yesterday. Daphne appeared, having been delayed because, at the Japanese lesson, one of the other students had made her a birthday cake! Hungry, we went to a sushi bar. The chef, in the middle, makes a dozen different kinds of sushi, placing them on dishes that are either yellow, green, blue, or orange, each color costing a different amount: 100 yen, 150, 200, 300. Then there’s a conveyer belt that carries the laden dishes around the bar. You take whatever you want off the belt. When you want seconds, you take another and place that dish over the first one. At the end, you pay according to the pile of dishes and colors at your place. Each person has a dish of shouga (ginger) and a little receptacle with soy sauce. You take some ginger and add it to the sushi, then dip ev-everything in the sauce, and eat. We had mani mono (rice wrapped in seaweed), shrimp, tuna, egg, each more delicious than the other. Chrysanthi struck up a conversation with a talkative Japanese next to her who turned out to work for General Motors. Daphne, who knows the wife of GM's director in Tokyo, mentioned this to the employee, who responded, "You've just spoiled my lunch!" I wondered if GM sells cars in Japan, and he said that there's a lively market in Cadillacs. Of course! We then took the subway to a station where we changed to a JR (Japan Rail) Soba Line train so that we could use our Rail Passes. Our destination was Ryoogoku, to the new Edo-Tokyo Museum, which is right next to the Sumo Stadium. And, lo! on the platform we saw an actual sumo wrestler: they walk around in wooden clogs and in a flowing robe and have a special hairdo, so cannot be easily mistaken. This was a boy of sixteen, perhaps, and actually not very large—sort of like a Dartmouth football player. Perhaps by the time he's 25 he'll weight 300 pounds. The museum is the first interesting building we've seen in Tokyo, which in general is remarkably ugly. This is an enormous cantilevered edifice brilliantly white, with an open plaza beneath, somewhat like the plaza in the Albany governmental complex. Beneath, at the ticket booth, are the inevitable girls in uniform, two or more for what in the U.S. would be one. They saved us 500 yen, because they asked if anyone was over sixty-five. You go up a beautiful red escalator to the top where there are models of Edo-castle and the city's layout when it was first developed by the shoguns. Clearly, this was a feudal society, with an overlord served by vassals in varying degrees. The overlord awarded the highest degree so many bushels of rice, the next degree fewer bushels, etc. In return, they constituted a private army for him. One floor down is the main exhibit hall, huge, with displays about Edo at one end, about Tokyo at the other, and in the middle the Nihonbashi Bridge (actually, "bashi" means bridge), a reconstructed Kabuki theater, and garish floats used in Shinto religious processions. Of particular interest, at least to me, were the scrolls of calligraphic writing. There were two letters, one from the King of Korea to the shogun, the other the shogun's answer to the King of Korea. The former was rather plain, the latter gorgeously embellished with clouds and abstract designs setting off the calligraphy. One-up-man-ship, evidently. Interestingly, this civilization seemed to employ wood almost exclusively as its building material, which accounts for the numerous fires experienced by the city. Their agricultural implements, at least those displayed, were exclusively of wood, and rather primitive. Even the sluices used for water supply were of wood. In the Tokyo end of the hall, the most memorable part of the exhibit, for me, was the video devoted to the Allied bombing of Tokyo. B-52 bombers coming in flocks over the city, then each dropping 50-odd bombs, all of which caused fire and destruction below, so that most of Tokyo was obliterated. There were also gruesome photos of Hiroshima and Nagasaki after the atom bombs. In front of these displays, many Japanese gathered, all in silence, staring. One reason that Tokyo is so ugly, I imagine, is that practically the entire city has been rebuilt since 1945, in a process governed by greed and haste, just like Thessaloniki. There is no sign here (at least that we have seen, so far) of the slow, organic development of a city, the sort of thing that makes London so enchanting. At the end of our tour, exhausted, I bought some ornamental lacquered hashi (chopsticks) and two little prints of ancient scenes. Then we had a delicious coffee ($3.00 each) in the museum restaurant, which again had an abundant supply of waitresses all in smart uniforms. Back on JR; then a long walk home from the station. . . . A fax from Darren Middleton awaited me. Apparently Mercer University Press, Macon, Georgia, is very interested in our proposed anthology of essays on Kazantzakis's religious thought. I have to fill out extensive forms about my publications, honors, jobs, etc., and fax them back. Greg returned and we all went off to a Thai restaurant, walking again. Suddenly, amidst all the ugliness, a Buddhist temple in a large precinct: lovely, serene, soothing. The meal was fun: curry and the inevitable noodles for Chrysanthi (which she didn't like) and rice and dumplings.

Friday, December 16th. Daphne's birthday. But we'll celebrate in the evening, after Lucia arrives. Daphne went off to work at Japan Times early, leaving maps and instructions for Chrysanthi and me to see if we could go out on our own without getting hopelessly lost. We did very well. Up to Aoyama Dori, where the Kinokuniya International Supermarket is. Actually, we were the only Caucasians there; all the other customers were Japanese. Chrysanthi shopped for tonight's birthday supper for Daphne: lots of fun trying to find cranberry sauce and dried apricots, neither of which is in my little Japanese dictionary. But we succeeded. Then we walked a bit further on Aoyama Dori, crossing Omotesando, to the Zenkoo-ji Buddhist shrine. These shrines are identified by the swastika, which is disconcerting, given Hitler's use of same. But, as happened last night, one discovers an oasis of beauty and serenity inside the ugly frenzy of the rest of Tokyo. The gateway houses large statues of four gods, all rather ferocious. The cemetery, like the one last night, is filled with the sticks on which are written the new name given to people after they die. The sanctuary itself, which we could see through its windows, is all gold and splendor, a rococo profusion of ex-votos, as they seemed, or whatever they are. A small Japanese rock-garden was off to one side, and a school with playground in the rear. As we were leaving, we saw several women enter the precinct, approach what looked like a large font in the center, bow with hands clasped in a gesture of prayer, and then do the same in front of the cemetery. On the way back home, we walked through the campus of Aoyama-Gakuin University, obviously an American foundation, presumably Christian, since statues of its American founders are outside what looks like the original building, done in typical American-university style. The library is beautiful, just like ours at home. The campus is landscaped tastefully—another oasis. . . . Home at noon, glad to get out of the biting wind. Spent the afternoon at the computer, preparing my MLA talk for San Diego and then vetting, yet again, one of the articles for JMGS 13, no. 1. At 8:30 p.m. Greg returned with Lucia, who had just arrived from Santa Barbara. Hugs and laughter and, immediately, Christmas carols on the CD player. Then a gala dinner prepared by Chrysanthi: chicken breasts in sour cream, cherry cake, etc., followed by the opening of Daphne's birthday presents, the most spectacular of which was a pair of opal earrings that Greg purchased in Sydney when he was there last month.

Saturday, December 17. Up early; more work on JMGS. At 10:30 we all left for the Heiwajima Antiques Show, meeting downstairs on the way out Daphne's & Greg's neighbor, a Spanish couple—he runs Iberia Airlines here—on their way back to Madrid for the holidays. Very vivacious lady, very sad to see Daphne go. Then subway again and JR again to a rendezvous with Matthew and Patty Goodman. He is the chief of treasury operations at the US Embassy, working very closely with Ambassador Mondale; she is a graduate of the Kennedy School, where she loved Bob Reich's course, and is half-Greek. They, too, are very sorry to be losing Greg and Daphne. We took the monorail out toward Yokohama, along the Tokyo waterfront, an area that is very modern, having been built on fill that extended the land mass into the harbor. Some interesting buildings, not like the horror of central Tokyo. The Antiques Show was in a huge exhibition hall, and we wandered up and down the stalls for a few hours, finally purchasing a Japanese-style silk robe for me (cost 1000 yen = $10.00), a rather nice print, again for $10.00, and a dish showing Mount Fuji, to give to Daphne (again $10.00). Then the Goodmans and we had a noodle lunch (not very good, actually). They'll be at Daphne's party tomorrow. We went next to Hiro-o to the international supermarket where Greg needed to buy champagne for the party tomorrow and Lucia was eager to find an artificial fingernail (!) to replace one of hers that had broken. (She did.) The champagne, turkey, etc. will be delivered before 10:00 p.m. —guaranteed. Afterwards we strolled through a lovely park with a lake filled with ducks and one very strange bird standing on a single leg. Cute mini-children on swings; men fishing; trees trained to go in directions contrary to nature. A lovely serenity. Leaving, we saw a Japanese girl in a miniskirt, confirming what Greg says: that all Japanese women are knock-kneed, owing to the way they have to sit as children. Walking home, talked with Greg about the financial markets. Everyone was expecting China to boom, but that is not happening, or won't for a long time. Already, certain Chinese companies are defaulting on loans, for example. He told a story of a Chinese investor for a company who had bought securities from Goldman in Hong Kong and had not paid for them. When Goldman's employee began to pressure him, he said that if the employee went to the Chinese man's boss, he would kill the Goldman employee! Well, the employee did go to the Chinese man's boss, and the Chinese man turned out to be the one who was killed. This is the way business is done in China, apparently. But Japan is a different story; it is coming out of its recession and is swimming in money, chiefly because of all the bad investments in the United States and Europe. These were liquidated, and the cash is now sitting in bank accounts at 2% interest. But obviously the owners want to invest these billions more advantageously, and that is where Goldman comes in. Indeed, Goldman is the only American bank dealing in derivatives such as options that has been allowed into Japan. The Japanese banks, says Greg, aren't sophisticated enough to handle these securities, which are very complicated. I asked him why derivatives have such a bad name, and he replied that it's because most purchasers don't understand them and the risks involved. In any case, Goldman is now doing very well in Tokyo. At home, in the room where I am typing this, Greg has a special computer rented from Reuters (and paid for by Goldman, of course). On this, at any moment, he gets full financial news: what various currencies are trading at, what the Dow Jones is at, and/or what a particular stock is doing. In addition, with the flick of a button, he gets graphs of performance over, say, the past six months. Another button gives headlines for all news items of the day, either in English or Japanese. If he is interested, still another button gives the complete news story. This is the "information superhighway" with a vengeance. . . . Later, Daphne and Chrysanthi went off to Narita to pick up Alec, while Lucia, Greg, and I went for supper at a nice Indian restaurant where one man, dressed all in white in chef's clothes, acted as waiter, cook, and cashier. A lovely curry and so forth, but the price wasn't so lovely: $76.00 for the three of us. Alec came in on time and arrived in good spirits. So, now we are all here, miraculously, just as planned.

Sunday, December 18th. I had hoped to go to the Tokyo Quaker Meeting in Mita, at the other end of Minato-ku, but Daphne said that if I waited until next Sunday (Christmas), she'd go with me. Around 11:00 a.m. we all left for an outing, heading for the Meiji Jingu (Shrine), but stopping first at the lovely gardens of the Nezu Art Museum, filled with bridges, stone lanterns, statues small and large, carp and huge goldfish in the pond—another oasis in the heart of hectic Tokyo. From here we experienced the full length of Omotesando, a tree-lined avenue that is quite pleasant, and very much of a promenade on a lovely Sunday like this. But the median age in Tokyo seems to be sixteen, judging from these strollers. It is a teenagers' paradise. Daphne—who seems to know every secret of this city—took us around past the Harajuku station to another street which is truly the teenagers' paradise: teeming with girls and boys, some with purple hair, rings in their noses and ears, garish costumes, etc. They were lined up twenty deep in McDonald's. From here, after stopping to make train reservations for tomorrow (all handled efficiently in Japanese by Daphne), we entered the grounds of the, Meiji Jingu. Our first sight (and sound) was a very peculiar one: people on a platform yelling with glee as someone from a crowd of onlookers came up to the platform and pounded something with a huge sledge-hammer.

It looked like the carnival attraction in America whereby strong men can pound a ball high enough to ring a bell. But here the pounding just seemed to be into a lot of dough. Later, Daphne discovered that they were pounding cooked rice to make the New Year's rice cakes, called mochi, whose elasticity represents strength and longevity, and whose whiteness suggests purity. We then passed beneath the first of several impressive gates (tori-i) made of 1500-year-old cypress trees from Taiwan. Approaching the shrine, you are meant first to go to the hand-washing basin, gargle the water there (not drinking from the ladle, but using the ladle to pour water into cupped hands from which you drink—the Japanese are obsessively clean—, and then you are meant to pour some water over your hands. Next, you advance to the enshrined gods (in this case Emperor Meiji and Empress Sho-oken), throw money into the box provided, bow deeply twice, clap your hands twice, and bow deeply once more. We did none of this except drink the water out of ignorance (instead of gargling), but none of the Japanese seemed to do it either. Some tour groups, near the water basin, were blessed (or something) by a girl in a white robe who pronounced some words and then waved a sort of tufted wand over their heads as they bowed. One of the women giggled profusely during the whole ceremony. At the bookstore there was a collection of poems written by the empress, actually quite fine—little 29-syllable verses, of which apparently she wrote tens of thousands and the emperor wrote even more. The Meiji era, 1868-1912, is considered the real beginning of modern Japan. . . . But today's modern Japan was what we were going to see next, after a delicious (and expensive) lunch in a Chinese restaurant on Omotesando. Along a wide boulevard just next to the Meiji Shrine entrance, and adjacent to the Olympic Stadium, each Sunday young people gather to dance to rock music, and rock bands play full blast, one next to the other, with adoring adolescents and pre-adolescents gyrating and pulsating in front of them. All the music is western, of course. Some of the men were dressed in leather, like motorcycle groupies in America, some were tattooed, all had pomaded hair. The dancing was mostly individual, one at a time, something like a jazz musician doing his solo, while the others watched. But sometimes the entire group would spring into frenetic motion. One group was coordinated: a sort of ballet, very obviously rehearsed, with costumes, gestures, some sort of meaning, I suppose. All the dancers were male—nay, macho. Same for the musicians: male singers, too; no women. All this seemed just the venting of energy and repressed creativity, not the decadent drug-laden phenomenon that a similar activity would be in America. Interestingly, there were no policemen in evidence. No need. . . . Back home, the ladies prepared for the big party. Daphne made delicious cheesecake, baklava, kourambiedhes, and kou-lourakia. We all dressed in our best, especially Daphne and Greg. At 7:30 promptly, the guests began arriving in droves, a testimony to the sociability of Greg and Daphne in their short stay here. I met so many, I can't keep them straight, but I do remember some. Matthew and Patty, of course, were nice to see again. Patty wept at the end of the party at the thought that Daphne would be leaving and their lovely friendship made much more difficult. Then there was a lively chap called McGee, I think, a Harvard classmate of Daphne's and a graduate of St. Paul's School who is now, at his tender age, manager of Virgin Airlines in Tokyo. I asked if Virgin was doing well when so many other companies were collapsing, and he said "Yes, very well indeed, because we have a vision of our place. Others, like TWA, are either too big or too small, and do not inspire loyalty in their customers." One flies TWA when there is no better choice, which is exactly right. As for Pan American, he says that the company was destroyed by its top management, which cynically drained it dry for their own financial benefit and then let it wither. Capitalism at its worst. I also had a good talk with Greg's boss, Hiro, a Japanese. Greg told me afterwards that he is one of the most respected traders in Tokyo, known throughout the industry. Also that when Greg was thinking of leaving Goldman, it was Hiro who convinced management to do everything possible to keep Greg. So, obviously, there is loyalty and respect here in both directions. We talked about Goldman's troubles, and Hiro said that it is basically a power struggle, with those partners who have lost out being the ones who have been resigning. Then there were two Japanese ladies who are part of the conversation group that Daphne meets with regularly. More difficult to speak to them, especially since one of them kept trying out my Japanese, which didn't go far, although I managed a few sentences that perhaps were more or less correct (probably less). And a woman who had taught at JIS with Alec and is now here and who told me about a colleague who is applying for my job at Dartmouth—small world. And a lively American woman with a baby, a journalist who has been here for ten years or so. There were others whom I didn't meet or don't remember, probably about twenty people in all. A lively party, with Greg very efficiently passing around the champagne and making everyone happy. Quite clearly, there is a separate social life among expats, evidenced here and in the American Club and other such venues. But the nice thing about this gathering was that Japanese came, too. Not only Hiro and the conversation-ladies, but others from Greg's office, including a rather young lady who apparently is also a crackerjack trader. It's hard to think of these quite normal people handling so many millions of dollars every day.

On Monday, December 19th, we all rose early, walked to the Hiro-o subway station, and arrived at Tokyo Eki for our trip to Kyoto and Hiroshima via Hikari—i.e., super-express, not to be confused with the super-super-express, or with the Kodama, the express, the three types of the famous shinkansen, or bullet train, run by JR. The engine looks like the front of a Boeing 747, the cars are sleek and beautiful, with vending machines and telephones in the lobbies; separate toilets and washrooms; vendors with coffee and other drinks, bento-o, gifts, etc. circulating, women passing along with sacks to collect refuse, etc. Seats in most of the wagons are reserved, although wagons 1-5 are unreserved. You line upon the platform precisely where the door of your wagon will open. There are five seats in a row (four in the green car—i.e., the first class); lots of leg room, lots of recline, good lighting, an almost silent ride, and fused tracks: no clacky-clackety. The drivers are in pilot-like uniforms and carry attaché cases. The cleaning ladies are also in uniform; they invaded the wagons before we entered. Once the train started, the conductor appeared at the end of the car, bowed, and begged our forgiveness for punching tickets. When the vendor comes and sells you a beer or coffee or whatever, he has an electronic mechanism that records the type of item—similar to what's used in libraries or in our supermarkets; presumably this enables him to keep track of what is sold, collected, etc. at the end of the day. Fully computerized vendors, in other words. Also remarkable is the silence in the train. Japanese do not scream; women especially have tiny, birdlike voices, at least in public; men, if they talk, do so in near whispers. Announcements come periodically, first in Japanese, then in Oxford English. They assure you that you are on the train to Kyoto, that the smoking cars are such and such, that the dining car is no. 8, etc. Before each station, they announce: We are now approaching Osaka, where we shall make a brief stop. All this is repeated on the electronic screen at the end of the car, first in Japanese, then in perfect English. Also, as one approaches, the screen shows how many kilometers away the station is: 8, 7, 6, 5, 4, 3, 2, 1, 0. We figured that the train goes about 100 miles an hour. There were no delays, no slowdowns, nothing whatsoever irregular. AMTRAK between White River Junction and New York averages 30 miles an hour and is usually late. . . . Quite soon after leaving Tokyo, we saw Mount Fuji on the right, beautifully snow-covered. It is a perfect volcanic cone, sliced off flat at the top. Perhaps it is sacred to the Japanese, but none of the businessmen in our train seemed the slightest bit interested in it, while we gawked. We arrived in Kyoto around 11:00 a.m. It is like arriving in Thessaloniki after Athens, or Melbourne after Sydney: obviously a provincial town, quieter, pleasanter, nicer looking in many ways, with wide avenues, a lovely river, and—as we were soon to discover—temples, castles, and shrines in abundance: it's a showplace. But our first adventure was getting to the ryokan that Daphne had reserved. We had to go in two taxis, and she gave to one driver the wrong piece of paper, one that contained the address of the bank nearby, rather than of the ryokan itself. So three of us proceeded correctly to the ryokan and worried would we ever see the other three again. Luckily, however, the piece of paper also had the ryokan's telephone number on it, so we soon heard that they had been left at the bank by the taxi driver. Daphne then rescued them. Our first pleasure was our lodging: The Three Sisters Inn Annex, 89 Irie-cho Okazaki, Sakyo-ku, telephone 075 761-6333, FAX 075 761-6335. You enter through a small Japanese garden, with the typical lanterns and stones and shaped trees. The door is the fusuma, or sliding panel. Immediately inside one removes his or her shoes, being careful not to step on the wooden step just inside the door. Our room was two small chambers on the second floor of what obviously was a very old, remodeled structure. Sliding screens papered on one side (the sho-oji) were inside each window, and a fusuma divided the two rooms. In the first was a low table already set with Japanese (i.e., green) tea, with cushions for seats, and a small TV; in the second two western-style chairs. The floors, of course, were covered with tatami (reed mats). Each room had central heat, much appreciated since it was about 40 degrees Fahrenheit outside. Futons were laid out for sleeping, each with an electric mattress! The bath was western style, with tub/shower and a regular WC instead of the Japanese style toilet where one has to squat. Inside the bath were slippers meant only for the bathroom; one never wears them in another room, and one never wears one's other slippers into the bathroom. You immediately feel serene in a room like this, and especially so when we all gathered around the low table for tea. We then went nearby to a raamen-ya, a restaurant specializing in yellow Chinese egg noodles, not to be confused with soba. We had the miso raamen, the style in which the noodles are in a soup made from bean paste. On top were slices of pork (just as in the movie, so we caressed them with the hashi before beginning!) Then began an afternoon of sightseeing. Around the corner from the ryokan is the Heian Shrine, with a huge, garish, orange tori-i. We skipped this and proceeded to the lovely Shoren-in Temple, with huge, gorgeous trees outside, and a lovely garden within the precinct. Of interest are the huge bells in temples. They don't have clappers, the way our bells do. They are struck from the outside with a log suspended horizontally at the proper height. Just a little way beyond is the enormous gatehouse of the Chion-in Temple, with its pagoda-like double roof. The temple itself is much higher, and is also enormous. The buildings date from the early seventeenth century. Here, for the first time, we encountered a temple that was actually in use. Three people were inside, kneeling and bowing in various directions to the accompaniment of a drum being hit by a priest. We think it was a bridal couple, and perhaps the bride's father, doing some sort of prenuptial ritual. Afterwards they lit incense-sticks in the courtyard and placed them in a holder, very much like Greek Orthodox Christians lighting candles and placing them in the Orthodox-type holder. The elaborateness of these temple precincts is impossible to describe; so is the beauty, the architectural harmony. From here we climbed up and up to the Kiyomizu Temple, the most famous of the lot, built in 1633. One is struck first by the brilliant orange pagoda in front of the temple complex. The complex itself is constructed on stilts, each stilt being a huge tree, all knit together with brilliant mortise and tenon construction. You descend a long stairway to a sacred flow of water beneath. The ladles provided to pilgrims to drink from this source were inserted in a machine that sterilized them with infrared rays. How typically Japanese! From here we returned through Mauyama Koen (Park), which is meant to be spectacularly lovely at the time of cherry blossoms. . . . For supper, we all went downtown via bus to a department store whose 7th and 8th floors are occupied exclusively by restaurants, one furnishing each kind of Japanese cuisine. We chose Greg's favorite, the shabushabuya. We were ushered into a private room with a low table, removing our shoes, of course. Fortunately, beneath the table was a depression enabling us to sit comfortably, with knees bent. The waiter lighted a cauldron in the middle, filling it with water, soy sauce, spices, etc. to make a broth. Then he brought plates of raw meat plus vegetables, plus special shabushabu sauce. We cooked our own meal by boiling the meat and vegetables in the broth, which had to be skimmed off periodically into a special dish. I had sake (warm rice-wine); others had beer. At the end, when all this was finished, the waiter brought noodles, which we cooked in the same delicious broth. Back then to the Three Sisters Annex via taxi, and a delicious sleep on the futons.

Tuesday, December 20th. The ryokan serves a Western-style breakfast: lots of coffee, toast, and jam. You eat sitting on a cushion on the floor. Off we went by bus again, this time to Nijo Castle, built 1603–1626 as the shogun's residence. An enormous complex surrounded by a moat and cyclopean walls. Of interest is the so-called nightingale floor, i.e., floors constructed so that anyone walking on them makes a rather pleasant sort of squeak, the idea being that any intruder would be heard. The rooms are divided by sliding panels, as in our ryokan, and the paintings on these are lavish. The floors are covered with tatami mats. A placard informs one that then, as now, there was no furniture. The shogun and his entourage slept on futons that were brought out at night and stored in closets during the day. For eating, a low table and cushions were brought out. In the great audience room, they have mannequins showing the shogun giving an audience to visiting barons. No furniture: all are seated on the floor. Also, there was no heat. And lighting came at night only from candles, but the sliding panels during the day would be opened onto the garden. As for the garden, the most remarkable feature here, as elsewhere, is the pine trees that have been shaped artificially by an elaborate system of constraints, their branches tied down and forced to grow downward and outward. There is also a typical pond with symbolically placed rocks. . . . We ate in a Chinese restaurant adjacent to Kyoto University: nice to see students and teachers lunching leisurely in this way. . . . From here we went to the lovely Golden Pavilion and pond and gardens, a big tourist attraction. It was built in the fifteenth century as the country hideaway of the shogun, but burned down and has been reconstructed. The “gold” is just that: two full storeys covered in gold leaf. From here we went on to something very different indeed, the ascetic garden in the Ryoanji Temple. It is a Zen garden meant for meditation. It consists simply of raked gravel in which about fifteen rocks are inserted, each rock surrounded by just a bit of grass or moss. The whole is encased in a large wall. It was laid out in 1525, so they say. The meaning is anything you desire. One interpretation is that the rocks symbolize the concrete ephemerality of life in a vast sea of eternity (the gravel). . . . Back to the ryokan; some tea; then out to a little restaurant serving okonomiyaki—an omelet or a sort of thick crepe fried on a griddle in front of us until brown and then coated with grated tuna flakes and a pungent sauce. Delicious, as is everything else in Japan.

Wednesday, December 21st. We needed to leave early to catch the shinkansen to Hiroshima, and the Three Sisters were wonderfully obliging, laying out breakfast for us the night before. The courtesies here are remarkable, at least by those who stand to gain from you financially. (We did notice some rude stares in various places, and in one restaurant we really were given a sign that we were unwelcome.) A pre-ordered taxi came precisely on time, again with the driver in white shirt and tie and white gloves. (If a taxi fleet tried this in New York they would probably attract lots of customers.) At the station, waiting, we watched a school excursion: probably three hundred boys and girls of high school age, all in uniform. They congregated in the grand concourse of the station, lining up in perfectly formed rows, and all squatted while the chief teacher gave them instructions over a megaphone. Perfect little robots: it's a bit frightening. Hiroshima has a sparkling new train station in a busy square, and wide avenues with trolley cars and attractive buildings—everything built, of course, since the war. We went directly to the Peace Park, constructed on an island that was ground zero at 8:15 a.m. on August 6, 1945, when “Little Boy” was dropped by the Enola Gay B-29 bomber. The first thing one sees is the A-bomb dome, the shell of a large, domed building that was destroyed by the bomb but whose remains have now been preserved as the symbol of that destruction. It is a stark, terrifying monument, a kind of natural sculpture. Near it are other monuments, for example to Tamiki Hara, a poet who survived the blast but lost his family in it and committed suicide, in 1951. A poem of his is inscribed on the monument: “Engraved in stone long ago, / Lost in the shifting sand, / In the midst of a crumbling world, / The vision of one flower.” Another monument near the dome is “To Those Who Died From the Chuugoku-Shikoku Public Works Office.” Another is to those who died from the “District. Lumber Control Corporation,” another to the “Mobilized Students”—students who had been mobilized to build fire lanes on the island and who were incinerated in the blast. Crossing over onto the island, one sees the Children’s Peace Monument, with a statue of a girl stretching her arms upward and holding a golden crane, conveying hope for a peaceful future. The origin is the story of a junior high school student who died in 1955 of A-bomb disease (leukemia). While in hospital, she folded 1000 paper cranes in the belief that this would bring good luck and save her, which it did not. After her death, her friends campaigned for this monument. Other monuments remind one of the reality of that moment: Monument to the A-bombed Teachers and Students of National Elementary Schools, Monument to the Employees of the Hiroshima Post Office, A-bomb Monument of the Hiroshima Municipal Girls’ High School, and so forth. We proceeded to the Peace Memorial Museum. You start with two videos, one more excruciating than the other, showing the initial effects, the total devastation, the burns, the maimed and burned people committing suicide by jumping into the river, and then—perhaps worse—the strange symptoms that no one understood, developing afterwards: diarrhea, leukemia, mental deficiency of children exposed to radiation while in the womb, all forms of “A-bomb disease.” The exhibits in the museum trace the history of Hiroshima and of the war, even indicating Japan’s aggressiveness first in Korea and Manchuria and then China. In the video, too, the victims do not seem to blame America; on the contrary, several say, “There would have been no bomb if there hadn’t been a war.” The thinking leading up to the decision to use the bomb is illustrated to some degree, including the fact that Kyoto at one point was considered a possible target because the Americans wanted a city that had not already been destroyed by bombing so that we could more clearly measure the destructive capacity of this single bomb! Imagine! This was one of the “attractions” of Hiroshima. One video exhibit shows the Enola Gay actually dropping the bomb and being shaken by the shock waves after the explosion. The museum also depicts vividly the impossibility of helping those who survived. No medical supplies were available; the hospitals had been destroyed; doctors were powerless. As in the video, there is much here about the delayed effects. Finally, the museum shows the development of the Peace Park and Hiroshima's sense that it should be the very center of a worldwide peace movement (an impetus that was opposed by the United States during the Korean War). One exhibit reproduces the hundreds of letters written by the mayor of Hiroshima over the years to nations that persist in testing atomic weapons. Others show the visits by the pope, Mother Teresa, the secretary-general of the United Nations. All-in-all, the museum, the videos, the monuments, and the dome serve to engrave in one's consciousness the enormity of this moment in history. . . . We left the museum somberly, not wishing to talk. This and the Holocaust Museum in Washington are imperatives for everyone, especially for those too young to have their own memories of the Second World War. . . . Walking back to Hiroshima Eki, we bought sandwiches and yakitori for supper on the train. The shinkansen brought us speedily and comfortably back to Tokyo (a coffee purchased from the vendor on the train cost 3000 yen = $3.00, but never mind). From Tokyo Eki we went by subway to Roppongi, which was teeming with activity at 11:00 p.m., and caught a bus along Roppongidori, packed in like sardines with people who had been out on the town. Back home at 11:30 p.m. after a very full, fascinating, and enlightening three days.

Thursday, December 22nd we slept later than usual, had a leisurely breakfast, telephoned Northwest to reconfirm the flight home, and then went out to shop and sight-see in Shibuya, another very busy center, within walking distance of Daphne's home. In front of the station is the bronze statue of the dog Hachiko, who waited in front of the station for ten years for his master's return after the master had died. When the dog died, a statue commemorating his loyalty was placed here, and is now a favorite meeting spot. We went to the food hall of the Tokyu Department Store, another gourmet delight with sample dumplings, yakitori, etc. Japanese cuisine is seemingly endless in variety. And everything is almost neurotically clean. In the bakery, you are supplied with tongs. You then pick up the rolls, sandwiches, loaves of bread, etc. that you want—always with the tongs, never touching anything—and place them on a tray that is also provided. You bring the tray to the checkout girl, who greets you as usual with a sweet litany of politeness. She then picks up her own tongs and places each item in a separate plastic container that she seals with scotch tape. All that then goes into beautiful shopping bags, and off you go home, with no fear of contamination. We also saw, on the way, a group of workmen constructing the inside of a house. Although the place was all cement and plasterboard, when they entered to work they nevertheless removed their shoes. . . . Daphne then took us to Bunkamura, the "Culture Village," a striking building, five years old, all shiny marble, with a lovely atrium, housing a concert hall, art gallery, movie theaters, numerous restaurants and cafés (with waiters in tuxedos, and very fancy prices), an English-language bookstore, and probably much more. As usual, it seems to be combined with a department store! Culture and commerce obviously go together. . . . Daphne went off to work on the night shift at the Japan Times. Chrysanthi cooked chicken stew for supper. Greg returned at 6:30, very tired—he has had to cover for a colleague in New York whose father is in hospital. But tomorrow, the emperor's birthday, the markets are closed and he has a day off. Around 10:00 p.m., however, he was viewing his Reuters computer screen to see the selling price of pounds sterling. Goldman had sold an option to another bank involving £50,000,000, and it was due to expire in two hours—i.e., at 10:00 a.m. New York time, which would be 12 midnight here. The option would be exercised if the price of sterling against the dollar reached 1.55 or higher. It was now 1.482. Goldman had bought £20,000,000 to have in readiness if the option were exercised; they would then still need to buy another £30,000,000 in order to pay the bank its £50,000,000, and of course if the price went up then they would have to pay more than 1.55 and would sell at 1.55, losing money. Greg said there was no need to wait until midnight; we'd find out what happened in the morning.

Friday, December 23rd. Greg was up at 5:00 a.m., answering a telephone call. Then back to bed and up again at 6:30 a.m. when a slew of faxes arrived. At 7:15, when I awoke, I asked what had happened with the option. "It was fine," he answered. "The price never reached 1.55, so the option was not exercised." In other words, Goldman won out on that deal. I then asked about the £20,000,000 that had been purchased in readiness. "Oh, that's all gone. The option I told you about was just one in about fifteen different deals that came to conclusion yesterday.” . . . I, too, received faxes this morning: again from Mardy High regarding the Irish trip, and again all screwed up, saying that there would be twelve lectures, that we would visit pubs associated with literary figures, etc. I remonstrated, as usual. We’ll see what comes out of that sluggish office next. . . . Today is the emperor’s birthday and thus a public holiday. The public is allowed into the palace grounds on this one day and apparently the emperor stands at a window and the people below shout Banzai! So we went. But we arrived at 11:02, and they had closed the gates at 11:00. After lots of confusion owing to my rudimentary Japanese, we finally discovered that the gates would be opened again at 12:30 p.m. but at another gate, so we went there and waited on line for an hour. Precisely at 12:30 the gates did indeed open again. We advanced in the crowd, were divided into a men’s line and a women’s line, were frisked by policemen, and were admitted to the grounds. But we were then brought to a sort of pavilion with men in very formal attire standing behind a long table. It turned out that this was the Register and that we had stood in line for an hour outside and then for another twenty minutes inside simply to be able to sign the enormous register of those sending the emperor birthday greetings! Perhaps the most interesting aspect of all this was the signals of “magnificence” and “empire” and “majesty” that were conveyed by the squads and squads of policemen and policewomen, the extraordinary wealth of the imperial grounds, the hoopla attached to the birthday—even though, of course, the emperor is no longer “divine” and, so far as I know, no longer has any real power. But it is clear that privilege continues here, as in England, and not only for the emperor himself but for his family; his brother occupies a huge estate that we passed on our way to one of the subway stations the other day. As a consolation for our misadventure, we wandered a bit through the extensive palace grounds: a huge expanse in the very middle of Tokyo, the whole surrounded by cyclopean walls and a moat. We’d missed the real fun by two minutes! Tired, we made our way back to Tokyo Eki through a very impressive part of the city—obviously rich and new, with rather nice office buildings—and had a good lunch in the station of (guess what?) noodles, near a group of about twenty well-dressed gentlemen who were shouting and laughing raucously, drinking sake, having the time of their lives. It’s the first time I had seen or heard Japanese being exuberant, noisy, and demonstrative. We'd walked so much by this time, Lucia treated us all to a taxi ride back to Nissekidori. In the evening, Greg treated us to a lavish dinner at the Tokyo American Club, located near Tokyo Tower, which shone resplendent in its many colors, and just behind the Russian Embassy, which seemed like a fortified castle, with high walls, and policemen stationed every 100 feet around the perimeter, so it seemed. The TAC is an ostentatious monstrosity, very posh, with a main building housing restaurants, meeting rooms, and a small library (which contained "my" issue of Life Magazine), and an out-building containing a full-sized bowling alley, squash courts, racket-ball courts, a basketball court, and a gym with workout machines, in which two burly Americans were pumping iron. Ugh! Separating the two buildings is a full-sized outdoor swimming pool. One nice thing about all this was the very obvious presence of Japanese members; indeed, in the dining room more of those present seemed Japanese (or of other foreign nationalities) than American, perhaps because many Americans are away for the Christmas holidays. Greg said that there is a twenty-year waiting period for membership for non-Americans, so eager are people to join. To tell the truth, we all enjoyed being pampered in this way and also—yes, let it be known!—escaping the ever-present Japanese noodles. So, we chose from a menu featuring swordfish, prime ribs, filet mignon, salmon, and other American dishes, preceded by soup and salad, followed by cheese and biscuits, mousse, and petit-fours. I'm glad I didn't see the bill. But it was a relaxed, lengthy, tasty family meal. . . . Returning home, we turned on the TV and found a Japanese symphony orchestra doing the last movement of Beethoven's 9th, with full chorus (all Japanese) and soloists (mixed nationality) and a foreign conductor. Very nice indeed. It was followed by Itzhak Perlman and a hornist and pianist doing the Brahms trio. With these lovely sounds we went to sleep.

Saturday, December 24th. This is a fast day in the feast-fast-feast-fast routine. Luckily, yesterday wasn't. So, breakfast without coffee—a monumental feat for all concerned. It's Chrysanthi's birthday, of course. . . . In the afternoon we all took the chikatetsu (subway) to Asakusa, which is the old Tokyo. Here is the oldest temple in the city, the Sensoji. But what a surprise! Stretching from the tori-i to the temple gate is a shopping frenzy, with stalls on each side, decorations galore for the New Year's season, and thousands of people. As Lucia remarked, "This doesn't seem very holy.” But all this busyness is its own form of worship, I suppose, and not just of Mammon. In any case the tori-i contains huge, ferocious statues of the gods of thunder and wind, while the gate contains equally ferocious statues of the Deva kings, both looking like weightlifting champions. Just before the temple is a sort of brazier with incense steaming out of it. People crowd around this and wave the incense onto their faces. In the temple itself, people throw coins into a huge receptacle, then clasp their hands, bow their heads, and pray or perhaps recite a mantra. At this moment something was actually happening in the inner sanctum: people were gathered, and three or four priests were hurrying back and forth. The temple is dedicated to the Bodhisattva Kannon, the goddess of mercy; her statue is said to be locked within a shrine behind the altar. To the left is a tall pagoda said to contain relics of the Buddha’s bones. The crowds here and the mixture of commercialism and piety remind one that this is Asia, something easy to forget in many parts of Tokyo. But Alec remarked that a similar scene in Jakarta would be chaotic by comparison, and also much richer in smells! . . . Chrysanthi, Daphne, and I returned home via Nissekidori for some shopping; Alec, Greg, and Lucia got off at Ginza to see that sight. . . . Then a video: Steve Martin in “Roxana,” a clever spoof on Cyrano de Bergerac. After a supper of (yes!) noodles (actually spaghetti carbonara prepared by Daphne) we celebrated Chrysanthi’s birthday. She received beautiful pearl earrings, a diamond necklace, a pair of lacquered chopsticks, and a book on Japanese flower arranging. We finished Christmas Eve properly by viewing yet another video, this time The Miracle on 34th Street, which Lucia had brought with her from California for the occasion. It’s an updated version of Dickens’s A Christmas Carol, with exactly the same message: that it’s nice to be nice, especially around Christmastime.

Sunday, December 25th, Christmas. Greg made us all eggs and sausage for breakfast, enjoyed by all until someone remarked that the Japanese had just discovered how to make sausage from sewage! This was an appropriately high-protein breakfast for our feast day (which was only beginning). Then Chrysanthi, Daphne, Alec, and I walked to Hobson’s to catch a bus cross-town for the Quaker Meeting, while Greg stayed home to make his famous “silk pie” and Lucia went off to Trinity Church in Omotesando. The Meeting is in a sort of precinct that originally was part of a Buddhist temple. There is a very large and attractive Meeting House with kitchen and first-day school, and another building, the Tokyo Quaker Center, that we saw afterwards. The Meeting was remarkable. First, of course, we removed our shoes and put on slippers, which are provided. The attenders were both Japanese and Caucasian. It is an unprogrammed meeting, but one in which hymn singing seems routine, as does reading from Scripture. In any case, a woman rose and asked us to sing hymn no. 100 (hymnbooks are at every seat). This turned out to be "Hark the Herald Angels Sing," in Japanese, of course. It's a good way to practice one's hiragana, since one sings syllable by syllable. Then someone else got up and read briefly from Luke, in English. Later, there was an equally brief reading from John, also in English. Ministry, all by Japanese women, was first in Japanese and then in English, with the translation either by someone else or by the same person. One woman spoke movingly of the privations all Japanese had experienced fifty years ago, during and just after the war, when there was practically no food. And she continued by hoping that now, when everything was so plentiful for them, they would remember those in other parts of the world who have no food. Another spoke poetically about walking out in the dark of night recently and hoping that she, too, could see a guiding star, the way the magi had in Bethlehem. At the break of meeting it was announced that the children's pageant would follow. This explains why children were noticeably absent from the worship: they were preparing for their presentation. This was utterly charming and moving. They seemed about middle-school age, all girls. They entered singing carols. Each had a script from which she read, in lovely English, a little playlet about the baby's arrival in Bethlehem, no room at the inn, sleeping in the manger, the magi's visit, the star of Bethlehem. At each part of the story an adult showed a painting to explain where we were. Shopping bags inflated and tied off, with a paper cutout shaped somewhat like a sheep's head, served for the flock of sheep. When this ended, all the benches were pushed back and a sumptuous table was laid for lunch. People seemed to be very comfortable with one another, and comfortable, too, with the mixture of nationalities. We were approached by two Caucasians, a man who works as a counselor for foreign school children, and thus had lots to talk to Alec about, and his girlfriend, who works at the Sony Corporation. They showed us the Quaker Center, a pre-war house that survived not only the Allied bombing but also the great earthquake in the 1920s. It has a cozy living room, a kitchen, and bedrooms upstairs for guests. . . . In the afternoon, back home, we had champagne and opened presents. Among others, Daphne got beautiful earrings, Chrysanthi a blue kimono (purchased by Daphne at the antiques fair), Greg and Alec linen shirts, I a condiment dish to use for my Indonesian spices, Alec a pair of lacquered chopsticks, I a video of Hawking's book on time (from Lucia), etc. In the midst of this, Leander and Deanna telephoned from Hanover, where all is well. . . . Folks played monopoly until about 6:30 p.m., when out came the tiropita appetizer (Daphne having secured fillo through connections at the Embassy), turkey and stuffing, mashed potatoes, cranberry sauce, salad, good wine in huge wedding-present crystal, and the famous silk pie, scandalously delicious. . . . It was a lovely Christmas, somewhat unreal, perhaps, since on the one hand it seems so normal to be living-in Tokyo (mostly because we are with family in a normal sort of home) while on the other hand obviously it is so completely abnormal and strange; yet very real in its fellowship, especially because of Lucia's presence to extend our family in such a meaningful way.

Monday, December 26th. We all got up at 6:00 a.m. to see Alec off. He and Greg will take a taxi together to Tokyo Eki. Alec is headed for Hong Kong, where he'll vacation for three days. We'll see him again at the farm in mid-July. I'm hoping that he'll plant some tomatoes, lettuce, etc. so that we can have a garden. Lucia, Chrysanthi, and I went with Daphne to Tokyo Eki later to take the Narita Express and head for Los Angeles. At the station, we saw a horse-drawn carriage arrive from the palace, very ceremoniously, apparently to pick up some visiting dignitaries. We cheated just a little on our feast-fast routine in order to have one last bowl of noodles at the airport. The trip back was comfortable and uneventful—just ten hours.

Santa Barbara

After a bit of a wait at Los Angeles airport, we were met by a hired driver who had come down from Santa Barbara in Lucia's sleek black Lincoln. He drove us northward to Santa Barbara along the coast road, with the Pacific truly pacific. What I thought were seals turned out to be surfers in their wetsuits. Lucia was greeted exuberantly by her two Pekinese dogs, who never tire, it seems, of retrieving a tennis ball thrown for them into the garden. What a beautiful house, and how different from our Eastern-style homes! No basement; lemon- and orange-trees outside, eucalyptuses, a wall surrounding everything, as in village homes in Greece. We washed and unpacked for an hour or so, and then got back into the Lincoln to see the sights of Santa Barbara, which is very touristy. Main Street full of boutiques; the old Mission (rebuilt after an earthquake) reminding one that all this land was occupied for thousands of years by Indians before the Spanish came; the wharf with its “valet parking” juxtaposed to simple folk fishing. We ate outdoors at the end of the wharf; even Chrysanthi vowed to eschew noodles! I had (of course!) a hamburger, which seemed exceedingly heavy after the sensible Japanese cuisine. We went to the AMTRAK station to buy tickets for tomorrow. The train there looked so dirty, sad, and old compared to the shinkansen! And when I inquired about first-class seats to San Diego the clerk said that his computer was down and I’d have to call an 800 number. Why he couldn’t call the number himself is still a mystery. This was perhaps our best indication of the difference between Japanese super-efficiency and American medium-efficiency. We bought coach seats and are hoping for the best tomorrow. Chrysanthi napped; I read Kissinger’s sensitive account of Nixon’s final days in the White House before his resignation. Then we all went out again to a lovely restaurant called Acacia for a leisurely supper. It was good to see the fabled town of Santa Barbara where Greg spent his high school years, and to watch Lucia distinguishing between the “Santa Barbarians” and the tourists.

San Diego

Actually, AMTRAK left on time and arrived on time in San Diego. The train was mobbed with holiday travelers: people standing in the aisles. Ironically, we each had a Japanese sitting next to us, and when we entered San Diego we saw a big sign: Yakitori. It felt good to be in the know. Part of the way is along the coast, sometimes almost on the beach. The sea on one side and the parched mountains on the other make a memorable passage. But what is really memorable is San Diego itself, beginning with the old Santa Fe railroad station, restored to its original glory. The entire center of the city has been rebuilt, and the architecture is stunning (confirming our opinion about the comparative drabness of Tokyo architecture). We checked in at the Doubletree Hotel in Horton Plaza and went almost immediately to the Hyatt on the waterfront for the MLA/MGSA session, on the diaspora. Irene Kacandes chaired it but had to leave, so I chaired the second half. Speakers were Martin McKinsey, who argued that Cavafy in some of his poems was covertly speaking about his own situation in the Alexandrian diaspora under British rule, Yitzhak Kerem, who spoke about the Jewish diaspora in Greece, which apparently began in the 2nd or 3rd centuries B.C., and Meg's graduate student at Harvard, George Syrimis. Professor Savvas from San Diego State was a lively discussant in the audience. Afterwards, he told me that he teaches The Last Temptation with great success each year, and also that San Diego is paradise: the best climate, etc., etc. He showed us a Greek restaurant, and the McKinseys, Kerem, and Chrysanthi and I had lots of good talk at supper, enjoying Greek salads and kabobs. Kerem is particularly interesting. He works half-time at Jerusalem and half-time at Thessaloniki, billing himself as "historian and filmmaker of Greek and Sephardic Jewry."

Wednesday, December 28, 1994

I participated in the MLA session on Pedagogical Issues in Religion and Literature, speaking about my experiences teaching a course on religion and literature last spring, and reading a summary of one of the student papers. I also suggested that no such course should have a final exam, something that rather embarrassed the other speakers, all of whom did have final exams. Among the others, Samuel Smith of Messiah College, Pennsylvania, turned out to be the most interesting. Son of a Mennonite minister, he is now a Universalist Quaker. His students are mostly fundamentalist Christians, and his challenge is to make them see that fictions are not necessarily subversive of "truth." My students are exactly the opposite: in love with fictions and very suspicious of the Bible. Thus our two presentations complemented one another very nicely. In the audience was Laird Barber. When he came up to say hello, I didn't recognize him at first—he has grown so fat. But the voice and the attitude are the same, and we were very compatible again, after a hiatus of many years. But the real shock was seeing his wife, Dorothy, when we went to their hotel for dinner that evening. She sat on the divan like a rag doll, her head lowered, her hair gone, making her look like a shrunken, bald male about ninety years old. Apparently she had had lung cancer and surgical removal of the better part of one lung, about six years ago. The hair loss is from chemotherapy. Against all expectation, she still smokes. She had only a half sandwich and a glass of juice for supper; Laird ordered room-service for himself and me. Actually, when Dorothy raised her head; as she did occasionally, she was able to be interesting and even (somewhat) animated, although she spoke in a near whisper that was difficult to hear. Our time together was difficult; it was good to leave.

Thursday, December 29, 1994

I went early to a rather good session on Proust, although feeling somewhat strange because I probably will never teach Proust again. Then Chrysanthi and I went to the famous San Diego zoo, despite Chrysanthi's increasing illness (sore throat, pains, general lassitude). But she was a trooper and seemed to enjoy this amazing facility: even better than the Sydney zoo. They have species I never knew existed; they have helpful placards about endangered species (some of which they have successfully bred in captivity); they put on a lively trained-seal show; they have birds in huge aviaries that simulate rain-forests, and beasts in large expanses complete with waterfalls. Afterwards, Chrysanthi went to bed, we had a room-service supper, and I went back to the MLA to the session on the Postmodern Bible, which Laird had alerted me to, and at which I met him again. This was most informative: a group have put together an anthology of postmodern criticism of the biblical texts, using psychological, anthropological, sociological, Marxist, etc. approaches. All young theologians, very lively, and very excited about their enterprise. The book will be published by Yale University Press in January; I've already ordered a copy. Must tell Darren Middleton about this, in connection with our book on Kazantzakis's religious vision. Laird and I had a nice opportunity to talk again with Samuel Smith, whom I encouraged to come to Pendle Hill. Then I went to hear Terry Eagleton on Irish modernism. As always, he was impeccably logical and extremely instructive. Interestingly, he held that the Irish renaissance occurred chiefly because the Ascendancy (i.e., Protestant descendants of the English conquerors) were losing ground politically and socially; thus they shifted their energies to the arts. At the same time, Ireland, being effectively a third-world country, was not hospitable to truly avant-garde manifestations. Thus the Irish writers (with the exception of Joyce, of course, who first of all was not Ascendancy and secondly left Ireland for good at the start of his career) tended to be very conservatively modernist. . . . On the way out, ran into Jay Parini. We went off to a bar and sat for two hours over some beers, catching up on family and profession. He completely revised his biography of John Steinbeck for the American edition, even though the British edition got very good reviews. The movie on Tolstoy is on hold; no one wants to advance the $20,000,000 needed to produce it. Jay is eager for us to visit his farmhouse north of Middlebury; he bought a ruin and has put $300,000 into modernizing it.

Bob Bell had telephoned yesterday, wanting to see me. We had arranged to go to Sea World together, but this had to be changed owing to Chrysanthi's illness. So Bob came to the Convention Center and we sat over coffee for an hour. He feels very much better, having produced a book at last (and indeed one that is about to go into paperback). He said that he had just written a new introduction in which, among other things, he thanked me for introducing him to Joyce. (Michael Groden told me the same thing recently.) He's doing very well indeed at Williams, although Ilona has never felt quite so comfortable there. But they both realize how lucky they are to have tenure, together, in such a small department. . . . Afterwards, Chrysanthi got dressed and we had lunch in the architecturally brilliant shopping mall just behind the hotel, and then went leisurely to the train station. AMTRAK to Los Angeles was again on time (hooray!). Our taxi driver from the station to the airport turned out to be a part-time cantor, graduate of Jewish Theological Seminary in New York—driving a cab, poor guy, to exist. The last day or two I'd been reading Allen Guttman's From Ritual to Record: the Nature of Modern Sports in spare moments, and I finished it on the train. Ray Hall lent it to me, knowing my insistence that sport at Dartmouth is a fetish. The book is moderately interesting, most so when discussing the communist attitude toward sports. For example (p. 69): "Capitalist society is essentially achievement-oriented and competitive and sports present to us the purest model of that society—and that is just what is wrong with sports. What society needs is not greater pressure for more achievement, but freedom from the incessant demands for achievement, from the 'inhuman absurdity . . . of the will to win.' What society needs is not sports but play." Guttman is also interesting on the relation between sports and war, especially on the view that sports "purge" aggressive emotions and therefore make war less likely. On this, Guttman is unequivocal: ". . . the catharsis theory is invalid. There is some evidence to indicate that the players themselves are less aggressive after the game than before the kickoff, an effect which may result mostly from the enormous amount of energy expended during the actual encounter, but there is a rare consensus among psychologists apropos of the alleged catharsis experienced by the spectators" (131). Also interesting is his view that there is "an inverse relationship between the routinization of daily life in modern society and the relevance of sports like soccer, rugby, hockey, and American football. 'In the more advanced industrial societies of our time, compared with societies at an earlier stage of development, occasions for strong excitement openly expressed have become rarer.' Games like football provide Saturnalia-like occasions for the uninhibited expression of emotions which must remain tightly controlled in our ordinary lives. The role of shouting, screaming spectator compensates us for the more restrained roles of parent, employee, and citizen. [A good example: John Punshon, Woodbrooke's Quaker tutor, swearing like a trooper at a Birmingham soccer match.] And, if the excitement becomes excessive, it spills over into riotous behavior. If this hypothesis is correct, we can explain the function of football in American education. Our high schools and, to an even greater degree, our colleges are agencies of socialization dedicated very largely to the nurture of rational behavior. In football's collegiate heyday, from the 1880s to the 1950s, American colleges were institutions which emphasized discipline and social control. Students, drawn mostly from the middle class, were supposed to study. It was also expected, since boys will be boys even when they are Amherst Men, that they would exhibit the exuberance associated with adolescence. Collegiate sports, especially football, provided a regular and socially sanctioned occasion for displays of manly courage, outbursts of drunken revelry, and the release of whatever college rules had been suppressed from Monday through Friday. Furthermore, once the student had graduated, the force of nostalgia conspired . . . to give football its special place among the many versions of the emotional 'time out'" (132-133). Finally, Guttman questions the clichés about team sports: "There does not seem to be any way to avoid the conclusion that a preference for team sports represents an inclination toward cooperation rather than toward . . . autonomy, but we err greatly if we assume that cooperation is always the enemy of individualism" (158). After finishing Guttman, I started June Schlueter's and Enoch Brater's

Approaches to Teaching Beckett's Waiting for Godot, purchased at the MLA. This is full of good ideas and also of good bibliography. Thankfully, its refrain is that Godot cannot be reduced to any formula, any precise meaning. On the contrary, the teacher's burden here (as generally in postmodernism and even to some degree in modernism) is to make students comfortable with multiple, ongoing interpretations instead of a definitive reading.

Our flight home, arriving at Detroit at 6:00 a.m. (3:00 a.m. California time) and at Boston at 9:00 a.m., was routine but hardly comfortable, given seats that barely reclined. But we endured. Fortunately the Mini-Coach ride back to Hanover was without a stop, so in two hours we were home. Thankfully, the weather was fine: clear sky, temperature about 25 degrees (compared to 65 in San Diego). Before entering the house, I encountered a hand-delivered letter from Jean Brophy: She and Dr. McCullough are not speaking to each other, owing to what Dennis sees as an action taken without proper consultation, when Bob Shaughnessy admitted a patient back to the nursing center during the weekend, which isn't supposed to be done. Fifteen minutes later, Dennis telephoned, and I suggested that I act as mediator in this dispute. He agreed. We'll see now what Jean says, and Bob. Inside, we found that the upstairs sink didn't drain, owing presumably to a frozen drain-pipe. I drained the trap, ascertaining that it wasn't clogged. Then I tried to undo it and could not; indeed, in trying to put it back together I probably stripped the threads. Happy homecoming! But our new roof seems all in place, still visible because there is no snow at all, although the driveway is covered with ice. Chrysanthi went to bed in the sewing room. I shopped, picked up a huge carton of mail at the office, dealt with 248 blitz-mail postings (mostly from the Quaker list and therefore immediately disposable), then found a second immense carton of mail when the postman came later in the afternoon. We opened the gifts left for us by Leander and Deanna: a huge bar of chocolate for me with a painting by Monet on one side (Chrysanthi wants us to gaze at it rather than eat it), a video of British humor, a CD of Samuel Barber, a nice blouse, a lovely vase of flowers. Leander telephoned soon afterward. They had a splendid visit, spending lots of time with Yiayia, seeing Audrey (who is doing well after Harl's death), visiting with the Nodas (David has a new girlfriend, a Japanese-American raised in Hawaii) and the Corindias. Deanna's father and stepmother sent us a huge smoked salmon from Seattle. We sent them nothing and must now reciprocate, perhaps with Vermont maple syrup.

More disaster from Kendal. Jean telephoned: a sprinkler went off in the attic, flooding six apartments, including Mary Keeley's! This happened three days after the system was inspected and also, of course, after all the insulation work in the roofs that was meant to guarantee that everything would henceforth be OK. In addition, the appeal board ruled against Kendal. We are not tax-exempt, they declared, because we are not truly charitable, which requires that the charitable activities be available to all segments of the population, broadly. I can hardly argue with them; our so-called charitable activities are infinitesimally minimal. Now we are worse off than before since they also ruled that exemption of the Health Center and Community Center is illegal. Our tax will thus be recalculated, and we expect an increase of about $200,000, wiping out the gains from the retirement of the short-term bonds. Bad! Bad! . . . And Don Kidder wrote to complain about the last set of minutes because they note that Bob Shaughnessy made a pessimistic report (which he did). Don says that we should not include possibly damaging remarks in our minutes, which are public documents. Trouble, too, from Pendle Hill. Rebecca, getting more and more inefficient, forgot that she had promised an author that her manuscript would be reviewed in December. Thus she has not sent the MS with a suggestion that we do our business next week by conference call. Carol McCormack has written me to protest. In any case, the MS is disorganized. Of course, since it is by a woman and about women, Rebecca and others will insist, I'm sure, that organization is a male fetish and shouldn't apply here. I'll argue against, in any case. . . . Luckily, many of the journal authors got material back to me, which I must now process. Less success with the Pendle Hill evaluation people: only Nancy sent her homework so far. . . . Daphne telephoned: lovely to hear her voice again. She noted how empty their apartment now feels. We repeated our thanks for a wonderful visit. . . . Spoke with Mother, who is fine and who much enjoyed Leander and Deanna. Also spoke with Audrey, who said that Harl's last five days were horrendous and that Dennis McCullough was wonderful, as were so many other people at Kendal. . . . Bo-Lennart Eklund has been blitzing me about lecturing in Gothenburg, so I'm already preparing another trip, from Birmingham to Sweden. And Chrysanthi is talking about a visit to Greece with Daphne, probably in June. Tomorrow is the last day of our holiday; teaching starts Wednesday. I feel ready for another vacation.

Tuesday, January 3, 1995

I worked in the office from 9:00 a.m. until 7:00 p.m. today. In the middle, Kristin Lord appeared. I took her to lunch as the best way of getting rid of her eventually. Prepared materials for tomorrow's class. Saw students. Printed out Journal articles. Tried unsuccessfully to reach Fotini Tsalicoglou in Athens, for she hasn't sent back her copyedited article and is holding up the entire issue. Mardy came over with the final version of the Irish trip brochure. Looks delicious. Jean Morcal wants me to submit my MLA paper for a book she's preparing, and yesterday I deleted it from the computer! Daphne and Greg both wrote, separately, to say how much they enjoyed our visit.

Wednesday, January 4, 1995

Another long, distressing day, although a bright spot was the first meeting of English 57, Conrad-Joyce-Beckett, which went well, except that students are begging to be admitted (I had capped it at 50). The bad news is Kendal. The "Junta," Reno & Co., have written to the New Hampshire Commissioner of Insurance that our proposed bylaws are illegal, etc. In other words, they've sabotaged the entire process, not saying a word about this to the Residents Council, which negotiated the bylaws with us. John Diffey is despondent. We were meant to visit the commissioner on January 16 and now don't know what to do. . . . On the brighter side, I initiated mediation between Dennis McCullough and Jean and Bob. So at least they're talking to each other now. But they had only one hour available, so we need to reschedule. Jean is trying to convince me to withdraw, saying that Dennis will try to manipulate one of the Board members. Tomorrow I'll speak to Jim Armstrong and John Hennessey about this. . . . Viewed the new "Heart of Darkness" video at night. Mediocre. Modeled more on "Apocalypse Now" in some ways than on Conrad. . . . Oh, more bad news: the Classics Department wants to eliminate Modern Greek. End of an era.

Thursday, January 5, 1995

Bad again. This has been a terrible week. In the morning I scrambled to get the journal ready to send on Monday. Finally reached Fotini Tsalicoglou in Athens; she mailed her MS only yesterday. Went to the Comp. Lit. Steering Committee and spent the time reading Kendal budget projections while others discussed student thesis proposals. Then to Kendal. We're budgeting $750,000 in back taxes! This wipes out all advantages we thought we had, to reduce negative equity by $750,000. Instead, we hope to reduce it by $300,000, the price being a 4.3% increase in monthly fees. Brent came in with 4.00% and we actually raised it—a reversal of previous procedure, when we've always argued the staff down, not up. Dick Brokaw wants 4.5%, Lafayette 4.0%, and I suggested the compromise. Spoke to John Hennessey about the mediation and was advised to withdraw, seeing as I exercise a certain power over Jean's job in my role as clerk of the Board. I told her and she was much relieved. Shaughnessy, also, is convinced that Dennis is the manipulating one. I am very disappointed, because I think we made real progress in the first hour yesterday. . . . Afterwards, Hennessey came, Armstrong stayed, and we talked about Reno & Co. Armstrong was flabbergasted at the letter to the Commissioner of Insurance since it was totally different in tone from what Reno, over the telephone, had told Jim he was planning to do. Walter Frank in effect apologized to Jim for signing it. A second letter from Reno was more conciliatory, saying that he wants the new Board to be seated even though a, b, & c are wrong. We decided (a) to visit the Commissioner as planned, (b) to try to talk directly with Reno beforehand. I reached home at 5:45 p.m., wolfed supper, and went to Ministry and Counsel at the Meeting House. They want me to compile and edit the State of Society again. Big problems with Susan Stark. No one knows what to do. . . . At Ministry and Counsel, Barbara Gilbert said that she was appalled at how cruelly Bob Shaughnessy treated Dennis at the committee this morning, and when I returned home Tom Corindia telephoned to say the same. He said that Dennis was raising legitimate problems of long standing and that Shaughnessy (also Betty Barnett) was almost abusive, and never admitted any deficiency. Tom calls it the worst crisis he's known at Kendal and threatened that if Dennis resigns or we force him to quit, we'll never get another doctor from the Hitchcock Clinic. . . . I telephoned John Diffey at home to tell him about the Reno developments and also about the Health Center problems. We both concluded that Jean is failing to create an atmosphere of harmony. (Jean's clear "solution" is to fire Dennis, who is beloved by the resident community.) John wants to have an executive session on the 17th to talk more about Jean. . . . By now it was 11:00 p.m. and I still hadn't read over my lecture for tomorrow (on Conrad's stories).

Friday, January 6, 1995

Hanover-Cambridge

I told Jean about the executive session and she complained, "Unfair! You gave me a year!" Back to Diffey. OK, we'll modify it. We'll have her present in the executive session to speak about health care, and will use a committee to report to her in writing about her evaluation. Diffey will confer with Corindia. . . . Scrambled in the office again with the journal and preparing my lecture. Gobbled lunch. . . . But the class is going well. Everyone wants in, and I'm saying No. Also, word is out somehow that this is my last class. Students are begging for independent study with me and I'm trying to escape all this. I spoke a lot today about Hiroshima: its effect on Beckett, etc. . . . We were supposed to go tonight to the big celebration for Walter Arndt—he's getting a medal from the German government—but decided to drive to Cambridge instead because it's supposed to snow all night and tomorrow morning. What a relief to be in the car finally, escaping! . . . Arrived at the Quaker Center, went out for spaghetti, and returned to find a square dance, folk dance, and waltzing in progress. So we joined in all three. What fun! Also, nice to see Andy Towl, who said I'm earning an MBA "on the job" at Kendal and Pendle Hill. Also saw an old acquaintance from Pendle Hill and also Tom Ewell, the former NEYM secretary, who dedicated our Meeting House in 1984.

Saturday, January 7, 1995

Cambridge

Went to Au Bon Pain for a croissant and coffee, and brought some back for Chrysanthi but spilled the coffee right in front of the door of the Quaker Center. Set up my Powerbook and worked on the journal. Had to retype the Books Received sent me by Eva. . . . Then to Church Street for lunch with Tom and Nardi Campion, very eager to hear about Japan, and also about my course, for their grandson is in it. Then to the A.R.T. for a splendid production of Agamemnon. Cassandra was electrifying. When she prophesied in a trance she spoke Aeschylus's Ancient Greek, and this was rendered into English by a "Trojan translator." Alvin Epstein was excellent as leader of the chorus. Marvelous Clytemnestra. Agamemnon was played by a black actor made to look like Idi Amin of Uganda. Lots of anachronisms in the translation, such as "movie stars," "fuck you," and the like—postmodern touches that don't bother me but bothered Nardi. The A.R.T. newsletter has a fine piece on Godot by Scanlon that I must use in class, for it stresses the play's relation to the war (cf. what I was saying about Hiroshima to the class) and also its relation to Geulincx, which I of course stress when I teach the Trilogies. Can't wait to see this Godot. J. Geidt and A. Epstein will play Gogo and Didi. . . . A coffee in Au Bon Pain, more work on the journal, then supper in the German restaurant on the square. Then we went to see the teenage scene: rings in noses and ears, in The Garage. Back to the Quaker Center to read over my lecture on Lord Jim for Monday. . . . The next big job is the Pendle Hill evaluation collection that I really must finish next week.

Sunday, January 8, 1995

Cambridge

Cambridge Meeting. Nice talk and lunch afterward with Andy Towl, who advised me not to use a management consultant for Pendle Hill, saying they do more harm than good. Then back to the A.R.T. to see the remainder of the Oresteia: The Libation Bearers, with Thomas Derah as Orestes, whose eagerness to kill his mother and Aigisthos, followed by his guilt, self-accusation, and remorse, was very well done. Then the final play, with the chorus of Furies orgiastic at times, with Hermes beating a drum as they writhed and chanted. (Hermes arrived on a motorcycle!) Then Athena arrives and settles Orestes' fate in a law court, rather than allowing a continuing blood feud. Twelve members of the audience were brought down to be the jury; the result was six for acquittal, six for conviction. The tie was broken by Athena: acquittal. And the Furies then became Eumenides. All in all, yesterday and today: a unique theatrical opportunity.

Hanover

Sent JMGS 13 (1) by Federal Express to Hopkins. This moment is always a great relief. Interviewed a Lebanon high school senior for Haverford.

Wednesday, January 11, 1995

The first of three candidates for the English Department job that in effect is my replacement: Priya Joshi, a native of India with a Greek boyfriend. She studied Greek with Karen Van Dyck. Charming. Elegant. But I doubt the Department will favor her, primarily because I do!

Thursday, January 12, 1995

Second candidate: Julia Burch. She drove me crazy, for she spoke gobbledegook for 35 minutes, potted sociology full of trendy jargon. When I asked her simple questions about literature afterward she couldn't respond. Dismal. Yet our committee short-listed her over so many others. Interestingly, all three candidates are women, and this one is a pronounced feminist: evidence of Brenda Silver's chairmanship, I suppose. . . . Nice lunch with Jim Armstrong, however, regarding Kendal problems.

Friday, January 13, 1995

Lectured on the early James Joyce. . . . Then to Kendal to hear Bob Reno's complaints about our bylaws. I view him as an evil saboteur. John Hennessey is most tolerant. But Bob Anthony, Reno's closest ally and slated to go to Concord with him to see the Commissioner of Insurance, announced in our meeting that he had changed his mind and would no longer cooperate. Hooray!

Sunday, January 15, 1995

I ministered in Meeting about over-optimism regarding the "beloved community," citing Pendle Hill, Kendal, and the early church as examples of supposed paradises that were really filled with dissention. Others afterwards testified to Kendal as an oasis of love and support, etc., and then Audrey Logan spoke at some length in a way that was nice but also embarrassing to me, of my long devotion to Kendal and my efforts to make it a loving community. . . . Afterwards, our usual lunch with Audrey, Sidney, Mayme, and Lafayette. . . . Supper with Audrey, the Nodas, and Yiayia, whom we hadn't seen since before leaving for Japan. She'll be 90 on Tuesday.

To Concord with Jean, John Hennessey, John Diffey, Don Kramer, Jim Armstrong, and Joan Birnbaum to visit the examiner, Tom Burke, for the NH Commissioner of Insurance. We met for over an hour. Burke clearly is aware of Reno's complaints and considers them serious. He wonders why we aren't more independent. He says that his role as a regulatory agent is to protect the residents. He is going to have the Insurance Department's lawyer investigate. He hopes we can hear in a month. The real problem is legalism. He, quite rightly, assumes the worst and therefore tries to insure that proper statutes are in place to minimize dissension; we assume the best—i.e., that the Corporation will never use its veto power over, for example, amendments we make to the bylaws, or, better, that we and the Corporation will be able to reach amicable agreement obviating use of the veto. We operate on a consensual basis, Quaker-style, he on a legalistic one. And this, of course, is also the way Reno operates. What all this seems to show is that the Quaker style cannot survive in the broader community.

January 17, 1995

Long Overseers meeting, 8:30 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. We approved the '96 budget with 4.3% increase in fees and $50,000 appropriated for charity. This will need to be defended to the residents. Long debate about whether it would be advisable to appeal to the New Hampshire Supreme Court the Tax Appeals ruling denying us charitable status. Debbie Cooper, the lawyer, argued the case very weakly in my opinion, but in the end we decided to go ahead, mostly because an appeal can be withdrawn later on because some other CCRCs may fail to join us. But I don't see how we can win. . . . At lunch John Diffey, Barbara Gilbert, Margery Walker, and I went over John's summary of Jean's evaluation. It's severer than I had expected, in effect saying that she is going to be fired after a year if she doesn't shape up in the area of personal relations. We asked for some slight revisions. We'll need to present it to Jean next month. . . . John Radebaugh resigned owing to medical responsibilities every Tuesday, which means that we'll need a new representative to the Corporation—good, because John is too flighty and scatterbrained, although wonderful in his very special way. I'll be sending suggestions to Alan Hunt. We all tried to impress upon John Diffey the love and respect here for the physician, Dennis McCullough, despite the trouble he has been causing the administration. . . . After lunch, we met with Don Monroe, the assessor, Willi Black, chair of the Selectmen, and Jack Nelson and Cliff Vermilya. They gave us the bad news: a tax bill for $680,578.94!

They said they didn't want just to send it in the mail. How thoughtful! Their evaluation is 40 million; ours is 30 million. We'll talk and perhaps reach a compromise. Also, they in effect promised that if we decided not to go to court again, they'd probably rebate what they might have spent in legal fees. . . . Then to Sanborn to hear the third candidate, a lovely woman with an Indian father and English mother, charming, vivacious, and sophisticated. The department meets tomorrow. I'd be happy with no. 1 or 3, not with no. 2. Supper with the candidate afterwards, plus Brenda, Marty Favor, and Tom Luxon's wife, Ivy Schweitzer. All very pleasant, but the candidate isn't prepared to teach Ulysses. . . . John Diffeey came over to the house at 8:30 p.m. Helene and Mary were there, making bonbonnières with Chrysanthi for Helene's wedding. So sorry we'll miss it. John and I relaxed over brandy.

Speaking of brandy, I'm going to try to "tinker" with Redmont's Quaker moderation essay and desk-top publish it. John Hennessey gave me articles saying that whisky in moderation, like wine, is good for the heart. . . . Received an invitation to go to Australia from Stylianos, for a cultural conference, but it's just when we start at Woodbrooke in April and go to Sweden, so I had to decline. . . . A student from 1971 wrote saying he wants to read Ulysses again. How nice! . . . Daphne called from London. They're having trouble finding an apartment, and the agent is very snobbish and disagreeable. So different from Japan. Also, the man Greg is replacing at Goldman's is still there and is convinced that Greg undermined him, so the office is very tense. Too bad. But that, too, will pass.

January 18, 1995

English Department meeting to vote on the three candidates. I favored #s 1, 3, 2 in that order, and fervently hoped that #2 could be eliminated. The usual rhetoric and division. But #3 was clearly favored and #2 clearly not, by student reps as well as profs. Then #1 was narrowly voted the back-up, with 10 yeas, 5 nays, and 5 abstentions. Matt Rowlinson suggested that such a vote is invalid. Bill Cook, the chair, ruled him out of order, correctly. My hope now is that #3 will turn us down and we'll get #1. Afterwards, several colleagues came up to me to say they appreciated my contribution, which was to stress (a) that personality is a factor as well as what appears in a candidate's dissertation, and (b) that potential for future growth is more important than particular strengths or weaknesses at this moment.

I ministered again in Meeting, this time to suggest that perhaps vicissitudes ought to be considered normal rather than abnormal, in which case St. Paul is wrong to list faith, hope, and love as the chief virtues. The chief virtue is gratitude, for every moment of “abnormality” we are granted.

Dinner with Allan and Claire Munck. Nice that they are entertaining again, after the death of their son, Alex. Other guests were Dr. Hugh Bower and wife, the ones from whom we “stole” Rosemary Chedburn twenty-odd years ago. He is working in the VA Hospital now. He spoke movingly of the post-traumatic stress syndrome cases he has from the Vietnam War and held that the British managed things better in Malaysia, another unjust war.

Conference call for 1¾ hours with the Pendle Hill evaluation committee. Basically, the draft I sent is going to be OK. Members made some very good amendments, however, which I’ll incorporate. Also, Bob Gray did a summary that we’ll all look at and comment upon. Then we’ll have another conference call on February 12, and that should conclude the process.

I’m lecturing on Dubliners and the Portrait this week, and begin Ulysses next Monday. Will this be the last time, ever?

Princeton University Press wrote. There’s a new editor for humanities. Where are my Kazantzakis letters? The contract promised delivery in 1990. I convinced the new editor to extend the contract until June 1997. Will I make it?

Wednesday, January 25, 1995

Music with Dick and Allan. We’re trying to practice the Martinu, starting with the third movement. It went better. . . . Last week Leander’s composition for trombone, trumpet, and piano was performed at Peabody, and he got many nice comments, followed by requests for additional performances, additional pieces, etc. Even a publisher approached him. He asked me about home-publishing and I queried Christian Wolff, who advised against it, saying that it works only when one is already famous.

Daphne telephoned from London. She already has a job—freelancing—to develop a book introducing oriental religions, including Japanese Shinto and Buddhism. She's delighted about the link with Japan.

Traveled last night on the Montrealer, which is due for discontinuance on April 1st. What a shame! Some forces are trying to save it, perhaps even by privatization, but so far the chances seem very slight. Its discontinuance will change my lifestyle considerably.

Talked the other day with both Alan Hunt and Don Kramer (his replacement as general counsel for the Kendal Corporation) regarding my dismay at Debbie Cooper's brief for our appeal to the New Hampshire Supreme Court regarding our charitable status. Kramer on the telephone argued the case much better than she did. But Jean insists on supporting her.

Good four-hand piano with Dan: Arensky, Schubert's "Fantaisie," and "our repertoire": Schubert, Bizet, Persichetti. Also a Mozart sonata. . . . Long lunch with Doug Gwyn about his fine book (I'm almost finished) and his future. . . . At the Executive Committee I gave "dribbles" of the evaluation report, where appropriate, and was helped by certain reactions. I also objected strenuously to the proposed policy on sexual harassment, getting Friends (after a while) to add that the accused "harasser" should also be offered protection. And they want me to write a preamble placing the whole issue in a broader context—e.g., the seven deadly sins (of which lust is the least). . . . Rebecca asked me to vet the blue-lines for my Boulding introduction. I found that the previous mistakes were left uncorrected. What a nuisance! . . . Congenial ice-cream party at Dan's afterwards. Ken Carroll is having a glaucoma operation next week. . . . More piano afterwards.

I ministered in Meeting, saying that St. Paul, when listing faith, hope, and love, left out probably the most important spiritual virtue. I then described our recent presence in Osaka and in the cold of Kyoto, and on the Shinkansen whose tracks were ripped apart by the earthquake, and spoke of the cold we experienced and how we knew we would return to the warm ryokan and the soup and noodles and the future with the electric mattress cover. And how miserable the people in Kobe must have been by contrast, in the cold day and night, not to mention their possessions destroyed and loved ones killed. Our fate, I said, hangs by a thread, and it's a miracle, each day of normalcy and warmth and comfort, that the thread has not been cut, just as it was abruptly cut for the people in Kobe. So, rewriting St. Paul's passage we should say that the great spiritual virtues are faith, hope, love, and gratitude, and the greatest of these is gratitude.

Three hours in 30th Street Station with my computer, revising the Pendle Hill resident program review.

Sunday, January 29, 1995

I was the rapporteur at a called meeting for the State of Society. In worship, the children stayed with us for 45 minutes, beautifully, and one six year old ministered, saying "We're human, which means that we're imperfect." Lunch after with the Nodas, who leave for Germany tomorrow, Sydney Jarvis, Mary Soderberg, and Audrey. Watched the new version of Godot, act 1, so moving: the tenderness of Gogo and Didi vs. Pozzo's tyranny over Lucky. Sheila Harvey gave me an article on Godot written by Larry. She's in love with a man 92 years old. . . . Audrey told us that Beasy Brownell is badmouthing Quakers all over Kendal. Alas, alack. . . . Dinner party at home with Robert and Penny Binswanger, Steve Scher, Ulli Rainer, Dick and Karen Sheldon.

Tuesday, January 31, 1995

Our little group met on the property tax question at Kendal. Very difficult to know what to do, since the appraiser, Don Monroe, uses figures that seem to have no basis in fact. . . . At night, dressed in my purple kimono, I spoke to the Japan Society about my trip, emphasizing Hiroshima.

Tuesday, February 7, 1995

Nice lunch with Ned Perrin, who is already seeing another woman. Supper out with the Lincolns, Armstrongs, and Sheila Harvey with her new 92-year-old boyfriend. She's in love, like an adolescent. Also Lee Huntington.

Wednesday, February 8, 1995

Jean Brophy's support group: John Hennessey, Jim Armstrong, Margery Walker, and myself. We were really very supportive. But John Diffey sees the group more as supervisory and we need to work this out.

Thursday, February 9, 1995

To Dan Connelly to update our wills and the P.A. Bien trust. Trying to put our house in order. . . . Just heard that Ole Smith died, almost instantaneously. Felt a pain, went to the hospital, was discovered to have cancer everywhere, and died less than a week later. . . . And Leander went suddenly deaf in the left ear two days ago.

Friday, February 10, 1995

1½ hour conference call at Kendal re: whether or not to appeal the adverse tax decision. Neil Castaldo, whom we asked for a second opinion, says Yes, do appeal, but be prepared to lose. We meet again next week.

Dear Alec,

Leander has asked me to convey to you some rather bad news, alas. Last week, out of the blue, he became deaf in the left ear. And worse, he has in that ear a very annoying ringing. He has been to several specialists, and both agree that the cause was a virus that he reacted to in a traumatic way. The hearing loss is irreversible, and the ringing, too, will not disappear, although with luck it will diminish, and he will find ways to get used to it (one hopes). The hearing is almost totally gone: he can distinguish only the very lowest frequencies. Unfortunately, the ringing is exacerbated by other sounds, for example by the piano, which makes practicing very painful. He will be going shortly to a sort of rehabilitation center that may teach him some tricks to minimize the distress. Under the circumstances he seems to be bearing up rather well. Deanna has been very supportive, of course, as have we and also his colleagues at the Levine School of Music, and lots of friends. So that helps a bit.

Saturday, February 11, 1995

To Cambridge with Sheila Harvey, who told us all about her love affair with the 92-year-old Dr. Tad. . . . Poor Kate Harvey is still a hopeless schizophrenic who refuses treatment. She has just changed her name legally and is no longer Kate Harvey. Sheila also remembered various meetings with Samuel Beckett and told about his arrangement with Suzanne, who first met him when he was lying in a pool of blood after being stabbed on a Paris street. She needed a “failed man,” Sheila said, and Beckett needed a mother.” . . . Lunch with Jim and Sheila Freeman.

He's on sabbatical in Cambridge, doing well after his cancer, hair growing back, reading lots, writing a new book, trying to market a revised and finished one on liberal education. He said I was too young to retire, that I look 50 years old. Μακάρι!

The A.R.T. Waiting for Godot was very intense, perhaps too much so. Here are my afterthoughts, compressed, to the Campions and Sheila, who were with us:

Dear Sheila, Nardi, and Tom,

Having slept on Waiting for Godot and thought about it a little more, I feel that Jeremy Geidt's Vladimir wasn't sufficiently tender and Alvin Epstein's Estragon was too anguished. The Burgess Meredith-Zero Mostel version is quite different in both respects. So is the version Sheila and we viewed last week. I think the play works better if the anguish is centered in Pozzo in Act 2 after he goes blind. The tenderness is necessary to offset Pozzo's lack of same. All in all, Vladimir and Estragon are meant, I think, to be reconciled to their "existence," although obviously at times they despair. Yesterday's performance showed more of the despair and less of the reconciliation. Missing as well was the music hall aspect: Estragon really should be a fat man who is rather stupid and childish, always sleepy, always hungry. Alvin Epstein was too taut. The two ought to do some music hall routines, as they did deliciously in the video we saw last week, but not at the A.R.T. On the other hand, the A.R.T. production, precisely because it was so anguished and relatively untender, perhaps gained in intensity. It was draining. So what are we to conclude? Perhaps that, just as Gogo and Didi will be repeating this same day over and over, with slight differences such as the leaves on the tree, so we, too, are meant to repeat our experience of Waiting for Godot over and over, with differences in interpretation each time. Thus the next "event" should be a viewing of the Burgess Meredith-Zero Mostel version (which has Alvin Epstein playing Lucky).

At business meeting today, we finished State of Society, we hope. Craig Putnam and Judith Pettingell caused trouble, as always. It's always the same people, predictably. . . . Then, at 2:00 p.m., I had another conference call with the Pendle Hill Resident Program Review Committee. What a nice crew! The best! We finished! Now I just need to print out the report, photocopy it, and send it to Mary Wood. What a job! None of us, if ever asked again, will ever accept.

Sunday, February 19, 1995

New York City

To NYC last night. Met with John Rassias and Dimitri Gondicas to see if we really want to try to revise Demotic Greek 1 and how. The answer seems to be Yes. Dimitri wants me in residence at Princeton, which would be nice.

Peeked into St. Patrick's Cathedral on my way to the hotel to meet John. It was packed, standing room only, and the cardinal was preaching—in a New York accent. But alas I couldn't stay long enough to get even the gist of it. . . . Gave a subway token to a beggar who then grew enthusiastic about my herringbone tweed overcoat and seemed very knowledgeable about such things, poor man. . . . Rediscovered China Peace, now on West 46th Street, much smaller, less attractive in décor, but the food was delicious and the place was full of Chinese. They've kept the old beat-up menu covers from the old premises. . . . Sad conversation with my favorite porter on AMTRAK, the one who always calls me Mr. Ben. He'll lose his job next April 1 unless some miracle gives the Montrealer a reprieve. When we realized that we might not see each other again I wished him well and he said "God bless you."

Monday, February 20, 1995

Lectured on Finnegans Wake and "Joycemusic" today. The last time . . . ? Start Beckett on Wednesday.

Friday, February 24, 1995

Dinner with Ned Perrin and a new girlfriend, Jane: younger, pretty, smart, vivacious, a librarian in Randolph, Vermont. We wish him luck . . . again!

Sunday, February 26, 1995

Mary Wood is enthusiastic about the Pendle Hill evaluation, but I've not heard from Dan and am worried.

Turned the radio on and heard César Franck's Variations Symphonique, which I recognized immediately. One of my favorites when I was a boy. How I used to try to play it on the piano! It still strikes me as particularly joyous.

Am checking galleys for JMGS 13 (1). Wrote a short memorial for Ole Smith, placed just before his article on rebetika music, as follows: "Neohellenists will be saddened by the tragic death of Ole Smith from cancer on 6 February 1995, at the age of 52. Trained in Ancient, Byzantine, and Modern Greek, specializing in the Greek Communist Party, he especially loved Greek popular music, as we see in this article. Undoubtedly he is being sung to his rest in heaven not just by flights of angels but also by his favorite rebetika bands!"

Dinner at Campions with Treat and Molly Arnold. I dropped a hint to Treat that we may want him on the Kendal board, assuring him that Lloyd Lewis is no longer involved. He seemed open to this.

February 27, 1995

Annual medical exam with Dr. Gerber. Everything is fine except that I now have a bilateral hernia. Hemorrhoids getting worse, also prostate, but still nothing to do. He told me that even moderate use of alcohol seems to accelerate loss of short-term memory. Can I go forward with the Redmont pamphlet? . . . Galleys of JMGS 13 (1) sent: two days early. What a relief!

March 1, 1995

We're going to a Mr. Scheier, financial consultant, to try to simplify, now that retirement is approaching. And tomorrow I speak with Social Security about my Medicare card, which I'll get in June after turning 65. Something to look forward to.

March 3, 1995

By plane to Pendle Hill. I was saddened at first because no one I encountered even referred to the Evaluation we submitted, but then Chris Ravndal came up with a big smile and said, "It's great"! And Mary Wood has been very supportive. At Executive Committee each member read a prepared statement reacting to it. Only Vince Buscemi was carping. . . . Four-hand piano with Dan afterwards, until 12:20 a.m.: Arensky, and all our previous repertoire.

March 4, 1995

Pendle Hill

Long breakfast with Doug Gwyn, right through Meeting. He hopes to get the job of Quaker tutor at Woodbrooke. Flew home, needing to urinate desperately for 1½ hours during the flight on a plane with no toilet. Misery. And "my" Montrealer will stop running on April 1.

Sunday, March 5, 1995

Ministry and Counsel. State of Society again, but only minimal changes this time. I ministered on Douglas Steere and Merton. One of the best Meetings we've had. No "personal" messages, thankfully, except Chris Dye at the end who spoke of inner emptiness but in a way that related to all of us and also to the general sense of the worship.

Tuesday, March 7, 1995

Eye doctor. New bifocals. He says I have pressure. Must return. . . . Supper at Kendal followed by "Kendal Players" directed by Lou Flaccus doing "A Potpourri of Robert Frost." I "acted" Warren in "The Death of the Hired Man," with Mary Keeley as my wife. Not a great poem, really, but I liked the part where Warren describes the hired man's (Silvis's) ability to load hay on the rick in such a way that when unloading it he was never trying to lift himself along with the hay, unlike me at the farm. . . . Naomi Hartov has resigned, chiefly because she can't work with Jean. This may be the last straw.

Wednesday, March 8, 1995

Lunch with Jim Armstrong and John Hennessey regarding Jean. Jim thinks she'll have to go. John cautions: don't make Naomi's resignation seem the cause. We planned strategy for next Tuesday. Then I went to my last class in English literature at Dartmouth: the final panel discussion in English 57. I'm glad that students had the ultimate word. I didn't want to make any sort of "occasion" out of this. Only, at the end, Jay Bruce, one of the panelists, said publicly, "This will be the last time you teach Ulysses, won't it?" I nodded, and the class applauded. What really pleases me is the quality of their diaries, which I'm reading now, and their final papers, despite the shock of Beckett.

Thursday, March 9, 1995

War/Peace Steering Committee. Several new members add energy. But Diana Taylor suddenly can't teach the course. (She's been asked to chair Comparative Literature.) So we discussed a possible alternative and scheduled another meeting. What a mess! One needs to be exceedingly patient.

Saturday, March 11, 1995

Lunch with Kate Cohen, who finished her book on Jews in Italy during the war and now can't find a publisher. I said I'd ask Hilda Grunblatt how she published Jacques' holocaust translations. . . . AMTRAK at 10:30 p.m. to Washington, my last round trip on the Montrealer. Our porter, Tommie, will be transferred to Chicago and seems pleased. I asked the café staff what will happen, and they said that five out of twenty will be retained. The rest lose their jobs. The woman at the White River Junction station will transfer to day service on April 1st when the day train starts. She is furious at this decision, saying all the train people opposed it. She predicts that the day train will be so sparsely used that it will be discontinued, and then we'll have nothing.

Sunday, March 12, 1995

Washington

Met Leander, Deanna, Chrysanthi at Silver Spring Metro and we went to a lovely restaurant for brunch. Leander is in good spirits considering. His second visit to the tinnitus institute was encouraging. The two doctors spent three entire hours with him. They want him to try a device for the tinnitus that they say has a 90% success rate. It trains the mind to "live with" the ringing. The process takes about 18 months, during the first 6 or 8 of which there is no change. But if change does occur, then it will remain: the device need not be continued after a year and a half. . . . Leander will give up his Bethlehem students, for the commute is now too difficult. But he is doing fine in Washington so far as teaching is concerned. So, all in all, things could be worse. . . . The ladies went shopping for clothes, and we went to get garden supplies for his lawn and for the farm: sprayer, insecticide, tomato trellises, etc. How nice! Then out to a sushi place for supper, after which Leander played for us the contemporary composition by a Bethlehem composer that he will be premiering soon. Very difficult and disjointed. He says he hears the piano out of tune now, even thought it's perfectly in tune. That's another adjustment he'll need to make, over time.

Monday, March 13, 1995

Washington

Reading English 57 papers. I seem always to get more done when traveling than when at home. AMTRAK back home. Really the last time on the Montrealer.

Tuesday, March 14, 1995

Hanover

Kendal Board. I've got the committee structure going again. Lee Huntington reported. Treat Arnold will be joining the Board. Afterwards, Jean's support group met with her and then in executive session. John Diffey, Margery Walker, Jim Armstrong, John Hennessey, and myself. We decided that Jean has to go. Diffey will urge her to seek another job, with December as the deadline for employment here. Nothing will be said to anyone, at least not yet. This is painful for me, since I have worked so closely with her for six years. But she lacks the "people skills" and seems incapable of transforming her personality. With luck she'll benefit from the coaching she has received and will do better somewhere else, starting fresh, without all the baggage of resentment she cannot get rid of here.

Boston

To Boston College. I conducted a class on Zorba for Dia. Then went on the "T" with Chrysanthi to Massachusetts Avenue and Commonwealth to find the Harvard Club. Ate in an excellent half-oriental restaurant. We're housed in the Haley House, BC's mansion used for guests. I'm still reading term papers for English 57.

Thursday, March 16, 1995

Telephone interview by the BBC Greek Service, 20 minutes, all in Greek, but I managed. Subjects; reception of Kazantzakis, Modern Greek studies in USA. She wants to interview me more after I arrive in the UK. I lectured on Kazantzakis's religious vision. Many priests in the audience, but they didn't seem to be scandalized. Afterwards, the dean of Hellenic College, a priest, came up and said that the Church is quite open to process theology. He was familiar with Hicks' book, etc. . . . Dinner afterwards, with Meg and others. She told me that Elizabeth Jeffries has been chosen to be the professor at Oxford, out of the blue. Felitsa came, too, and instructed all the classicists on CD-roms, etc.

Friday, March 17, 1995

Boston

Met with Peter Allen and Eva Konstantellou regarding JMGS. Peter reported Executive Committee criticism: too many linguistic articles, too specialized, unreadable; strange policy of dual reviews for certain books, not others. We'll try to adjust. Peter is very eager to help encouraging authors to submit, vetting MSS, etc. He might be the next logical editor . . . Picked up Chrysanthi and Mother at Symphony Hall, where they heard Shostakovich's 7th Symphony, the "Leningrad," written during the siege. Stirring, they reported. Off to Cambridge Friends Center, then immediately to the Center for Environmental Studies to hear Michael Macrakis on Greek type. He says the Greeks are their own worst enemies: they want to Latinize the Greek fonts. However, the fact that Didot is used in JMGS is a pleasing development. Maria Herrey was sitting in back of me. Nice to see her again. Next to me was the sister of Αγλαΐα Κάσδαγλη, the "Maria" in our videos done in Birmingham, also Takis Metaxas. . . . Then supper in Porter Square. Then off to Brookline to Filia Macedon's party in her lovely condo on Beacon Street. Mostly computer scientists, but also a retired provost of SUNY Buffalo, and the Greek vice-consul. Filia surrounds herself with friends, including an Indian optometrist met on an airplane.

Saturday, March 18, 1995

Cambridge

Long talk with Hugh Barbour, who is a bit strange, I must say. Finished grading final exams, working in the Quaker Center. Scores ran from 29 to 95. Then lunch with Tom and Nardi Campion and to A.R.T. with them, Mother, and Chrysanthi to see a stirring performance of Henry V, with imaginative treatment of the French on horseback as a sort of ballet, and a hilarious interlude with the dead Falstaff in his coffin and his belly protruding so much that Mistress Quickly cannot get the lid to close.

Monday, March 20, 1995

"Stewardship" Committee with Barb Parsons. We will suggest a goal of raising $1,000,000 between now and the year 2000. Saw Jean in the committee but no chance to talk to her intimately about our message, in effect, that she's going to be fired. . . . Met again with Henry Scheier regarding estate planning. . . . Margery and Alan Walker for supper, to discuss Kendal's transition with Margery. I'll be away for April, May, and June meetings, back—Θεοῦ θέλοντος—for the July meeting. Debbie Cooper's argumentation to the Supreme Court of New Hampshire is rather good, although exaggerated at several points.

Tuesday, March 21, 1995

Met again with Dan Connolly re: updating of wills and trusts, and planning to minimize estate taxes. Both he and Scheier are asking us to divest ourselves of the farm, and to rent our cabin in the future from the children.

March 23, 1995

Lunch with Treat Arnold, who has agreed to join the Kendal trustees, and with Patricia Higgins, who is considering it. I told them the whole history. At length!

March 24, 1995

Finance Committee at Kendal to discuss strategy with the Town. Jim Armstrong was finally told outright by Cliff Vermilya that the Town won't negotiate further because we are appealing to the Supreme Court. The Selectmen consider that we have broken our promise to them to pay taxes.

March 29, 1995

Dear Chris,

Thanks for lending me Harold Bloom's jeremiad The Western Canon. I read the preface, the "Elegy for the Canon," "Joyce's Agon with Shakespeare," "Beckett . . . Joyce . . . Proust . . . Shakespeare," and the "Elegiac Conclusion." I wish I'd had time to read the chapter on Proust, too, and what he has to say about Virginia Woolf. But it doesn't take much to give one a sense of his main points: that aesthetic criticism is in the doghouse owing to various types of criticism that attempt to link literature with something non-literary, whether that be feminism, Christianity, chaos-theory, queer theory, or whatever. Fine. It's good to hear a grumpy, conservative voice like this, a voice quite obviously generated from an angry, even paranoiac soul, crying out in the academic wilderness against all the usurpers. But Bloom's actual discourse on literature—aside from the choice of authors he has included (and therefore, by implication, the choice of authors he has excluded)—does not, in my opinion, further the cause of aesthetic criticism very fruitfully. Aside from anger, the discourse seems governed chiefly by Bloom's old concern: the anxiety of influence. Thus he spends almost all his time in the Joyce section talking about Joyce's competition with Shakespeare and giving us a very meager picture of Joyce's achievement. Sometimes, I admit, he is very provocative, as when he says that the big three of "chaotic"

American literature—Hemingway, Fitzgerald, and Faulkner—all derive from Conrad, but Conrad mixed with Henry James in one case, with Melville in another, etc. That is useful. Also, he's right on when he sees Beckett as deriving from Joyce plus Proust, and then having to find a way to overcome the influence of both. Actually, the chapter on Beckett is quite good (certainly better than the one on Joyce). I was happy to see his emphasis on Murphy, if nothing else. But the real trouble with Bloom is that he is so incorrigibly elitist. He envisages English departments in the future (i.e., the kind of department he would like to belong to) dwindling to the size of Classics departments of the present, and ministering to the select few, whereas the multitudes get their literature through his despised cultural studies, Afro-American studies, and the like. What Bloom entirely suppresses is the fact that many of the current approaches to literature were motivated by an attempt to join the arts once again to politics, religion, morality—i.e., with life in its broadness. Ironically, some of these approaches (e.g., deconstruction) have themselves become elitist, but that should not invalidate the entire phenomenon. All in all, therefore, Bloom's angry book makes me somewhat angry, too, even though I, like him, defend the canon, as you well know, and teach it unashamedly. Apart from all I've said above, I am angered as well by his meandering style and his refusal to document sources. All this derives from a very repugnant arrogance. He sets himself up as an oracle (oracles are allowed to meander) and expects us to bow down like acolytes and be overawed. I am not.

March 30, 1995

Supper at Kendal with Yiayia and Barbara Rice, then four-hand piano with Barbara: my entire repertoire. What a pleasure to play with an expert sight-reader and sensitive musician! . . . In the office, I've been spending full time on the journal, catching up on things that ought to have been done long ago, alas. . . . And we're updating our wills, with new by-pass trusts drawn up expertly by Dan Connelly.

Monday, April 3, 1995

Good meeting with John Rassias planning the revision of Demotic Greek 1. Good to be working with him again. As always, he's full of ideas.

Tuesday, April 4, 1995

War/Peace Steering Committee again. Lynda Boose has redesigned the course, co-teaching with Alexis Jetter, a journalist involved in Vietnam. Members want a sort of faculty symposium, and I convinced David Montgomery to coordinate the seminar to try to make this happen. He plans to bring socialists from New York. . . . Raced to Lebanon to Dan Connolly's office to sign the new wills and trusts. All that's left are the durable powers of attorney for health care. We'll sign those on Thursday. Facing our mortality in this way is very good.

Wednesday, April 5, 1995

Good meeting with Bruce Pipes and Karen Wetterhahn in the Provost's office regarding the future of University Seminars after I retire. To my pleasure, Bruce says that he'll take over, working out of the Provost's office, ideally with a committee including one person from each of the Medical, Thayer, & Tuck schools, and Arts & Sciences. This sounds good. Next year we can collaborate, and my final year he can go alone. Very encouraging. I wish I were doing as well in War/Peace Studies regarding future leadership.

Thursday, April 6, 1995

Helene Rassias to supper with her fiancé, Bill Miles. How nice to see her so happy. I'm so sorry that we'll miss the wedding, but Leander, Deanna, and Yiayia will be there to represent us.

Friday, April 7, 1995

Breakfast with Jean Brophy. She told me that she's actively looking for a job, indeed does not want to stay any longer at Kendal. I said that was best, under the circumstances. If she finds something before December, everything will be fine. She'll announce this "new opportunity" and no one will know that she was fired. If not . . . ? She says she'll refuse to resign; she needs the money. We'll monitor this and see what happens. The important thing is to keep mum. Thus she objected to our planned executive session at the April meeting of the Board; this would be a clear signal of trouble. I'll consult with John Hennessey about this and then call John Diffey.

Lunch with Jack Shepherd, visiting from England. We both lament the persecution of Marty Sherwin and fear for the future of the Dickey Center under Jim Wright as Dean. Too bad. And Jim Breeden has just been fired, too, although in this case maybe there is cause. Jack and Kathy are flourishing in England, although Jack may not choose to stay even if his program is renewed.

Saturday, April 8, 1995

To Meriden for the memorial service for Harlan Logan. Mayme sang a chorale very nicely (considering how badly she sounded last Wednesday when I accompanied her). Governor Peterson gave a lengthy eulogy. Kesaya Noda was charming as she related how frightened she had been, as a child, of this "big man." Dick Eberhart's daughter told how Harlan would play basketball with her daughter even in the advanced stage of his Alzheimer's. I hadn't realized that he had been a Rhodes Scholar among all the other accomplishments in business, athletics, journalism, and, finally, politics. I sat next to Barbara Barnet, who remembers Alec and who has been close to Don Blackmer recently, but is counseling him not to enter Kendal.

Supper at Kendal as guests of Barbara and John Gilbert, to say bon voyage to us. Then to hear Bev Web play Mozart's Sonata in A minor, Schumann's Papillons, and Schubert's Sonata in A minor, opus 42. Not a program I particularly liked, yet the phenomenon of Bev playing a full recital almost every week continues to be stirring, almost miraculous. One sits there in amazement at all this beauty.

Monday, April 10, 1995

Only four days before departure. So much to do. To Fleet Bank for advice on handling my retirement funds (for a fee). Haircut. Income tax forms from Frank Currier. UN lunch at the Inn with a good speaker from South Africa. Sat next to a Kendal resident who defended the non-refundable entry fee as insuring a greater, non-revocable commitment to Kendal as a community. Last meeting with my student Chris Clay, who'll be doing a Comp. Lit. honors thesis next year on Joyce and Japanese modernism. Departing, he embraced me. Strange, sweet boy.

Tuesday, April 11, 1995

Rich Brown at Kiewit is trying to help me get an e-mail connection in England. Very complicated. Today, people met to decide finally whether the Ireland trip will go or not; the enrollment has been disappointing. Yes, it will go. That means I have to write a lecture on gardens and literature. . . . Dickey lunch with Jack Shepherd explaining what he does. . . .

I'm collecting texts for lectures to be given in England and Sweden. . . . Supper at the Nodas with Treat and Molly, Sydney, Roger and Mary—the “gang.” Sushi. Good cheer. But I forgot to wear my kimono.

Thursday, April 13, 1995

Frantic last-minute activity to prepare Kazantzakis letters to take along for translating, and to photocopy them. I've taken 1940–1949. How many will I actually do? Leander telephoned from the Outer Banks. They delivered Alec to the airport yesterday to return to Jakarta. He still sees Eyi. He says that only Indonesian women understand him. He doesn't date Europeans or Americans. He's gone native. And after Jakarta he's thinking of Kuala Lumpur. . . . Leander's news is good. He'll be playing a concert with Ignat Solzhenitsyn in October in Washington: the complete four-hand piano music of Beethoven. What a good opportunity! . . . Just before departure, word from Darren Middleton that Mercer University Press has given us a contract. Darren wants the book ready by September. I suppose that I can work on it at the farm in July and August. One out of the way. Three to go.

To England

Mini-coach to Logan. British Air to Heathrow.

London

Met at Heathrow by Alex, with private car, all arranged through Goldman Sachs. To Roland Gardens, in South Kensington, near the Science Museum. Very nice, large living room, but small kitchen, two smallish bedrooms, one used as Daphne's study, one with a convertible couch. We're occupying Daphne and Greg's bedroom. Lovely welcome. Then off to the Barbican for a matinee of Twelfth Night. Pure joy: Malvolio (Desmond Barrit) especially good, but also Feste, the jester. Emma Fielding fetching as Viola. . . . It seems strange to be with Daphne and Greg in this setting so soon after being with them in Tokyo. . . . I began vetting Meg Alexiou's new book on Language, Myth, and Metaphor, for Cornell University Press. . . . Dinner in an Italian restaurant.

London

To Westminster Meeting. Met a New Zealander who is about to do the term at Woodbrooke. Graduate of Dartmouth (here). Career in NZ navy, then teacher of mathematics. Says he's interested in my Paradise Lost course. . . . In the afternoon, walked with Daphne, Greg, and Chrysanthi to Kensington Gardens via Queensway. Flowers everywhere, resplendent. Roller-skaters, kite-flyers doing all kinds of tricks (I think of the end of Beckett's Murphy). Round Pond, the Serpentine. Then home for a resplendent Easter dinner of roast lamb. Daphne and Greg are taking a wine-tasting course, and we benefited by drinking some excellent French vintages. They taught me how to sniff the bouquet properly, to swirl the wine in the glass, to taste and inhale through the mouth with the wine on the palate. Rituals.

London

Working on Meg's book. Walked with Daphne and Chrysanthi to King's Road, to Marks and Spencer, where they used to live. Bought grape leaves, taramosalata, tzatziki. Lunch with Greg alone. Told him about by-pass trusts, powers of attorney, living wills; he doesn't even have a will. Promises to see about drawing up one. . . . Off to Chelsea Cinema in King's Road to see Alan Bennett's imaginative "The Madness of King George," beautifully acted. Very poignant, especially when the king reads King Lear aloud and senses the correspondence (ungrateful child, madness). . . . More excellent French wine for dinner.

London

I forgot that on Sunday we went to the Serpentine Gallery, just because we were passing it. The "exhibit" was (1) heaps of old clothing that one was invited to take, the point being that most museums invite you not to take; (2) obscene photos of middle-aged men, naked, frontal, proving I suppose how real we are as opposed to the idealization in "other" art; (3) a video of chimpanzees copulating; (4) miscellaneous snapshots and postcards adding up to nothing; (5) swings and stilts that one could play with, proving that museums can be participatory. Such garbage, "the decline of an age," as Kazantzakis used to say.

Today, after working all day on Meg's book, except for a trip on Old Brompton Road to buy croissants, I met Chrysanthi, Greg, and Daphne at Leicester Square, dined in style at the lovely (and very inexpensive) Café Flo in St. Martin's Lane, next to Westminster Meeting: wine, appetizer, steak, veal, sole, dessert, garlic bread, salad, all for £51.00 including tip. Then to see Maggie Smith in Edward Albee's new play Three Tall Women, a sad exploration first of age and then of aging. In Act 1, Maggie Smith plays a 92-year-old who is cranky, incontinent, forgetful, with osteoporosis, etc., who finally has a stroke. In Act 2 the three women actresses play the same person at age 26, 52, and maybe 80, and how much the 26 year old must learn about her future. The 52 year old says that she's at the pinnacle of life because she can look both ways, seeing the rise that took place and the decline that will take place. The 80 year old says that her age is the best because she can hope for an end—oblivion. Maggie Smith was spectacular in Act 3 as the 92-year-old, but Act 2 was more interesting. The total effect was of unmitigated sadness despite the touching humor throughout.

To Birmingham

Finished Meg's book in the morning. Then with Daphne to Euston. Nice to see that British Rail is still pleasant and convenient. Trains to B'ham every half hour. 30% discount for senior citizens. Tea and coffee served en route. Taxi to Woodbrooke. Then chaos. They put us in a third-floor room (#42, former servant's quarters) and we carried up all the luggage. Then they said that was a mistake and we were in #68, Bridge End, over the Quiet Room. So we removed all the luggage and brought it there, only to find that it was being painted. So all the luggage went back to #42. Apologies, etc. Mouse in the room. I plugged in my Style Writer, using an old transformer, and the thing exploded. Obviously, the transformer hadn't worked. So, no printer. Not a good beginning.

Breakfast, Meeting for Worship, then faculty meetings non-stop from 9:30 a.m. until suppertime. Mostly waste. But a chance to get to know the new staff somewhat. Trying to see if I can purchase another Style Writer here. Finally, I ordered one at a huge cost compared to the Kiewit store.

My printer arrived. Immediately printed the schedule for my Paradise Lost course. Pam Lunn advised me: "In your opening presentation, don't give information. Try to enthuse the students." I said I wanted a lectern. "Oh, that's not our style," she said. "You don't want to 'talk down' to the students. Just sit around in a circle and be informal." David Gray is here, to help Anne Thomas with her Swarthmore Lecture, but she, too, has a printer that won't work. Kathy Gray has a 1½ year old child born out of wedlock. She and her "partner" have no plans to marry. "It's advantageous to be single taxwise," David explained.

Chrysanthi and I went by bus to Brum, riding on the top, of course—it's now "smoke free." Ate at Pizza Hut (!) and saw O'Casey's The Plough and the Stars at the Alexandra Theatre. Very moving. Surely one of the great anti-war plays, with exquisite parodies of political rhetoric and a real sense of the "human" dimension of political struggle. Yeats's "Easter 1916" was printed in the program. Nice to meet there, by chance, Brenda, the Woodbrooke secretary, with her Scots husband.

During the day we moved to our new room, #68 in Bridge End. Very small, with the double bed occupying fully half of it and the toilet way down at the other end of the hall. But the view out into the garden is lovely.

Saturday, April 22, 1995

Finally mailed my review of Meg's book. At least that is done. Played the lovely Steinway piano in the Common Room: Grieg, Bach, Schubert impromptus. Met Olga, here from St. Petersburg, where she teaches English. She plans to do my Paradise Lost course. I set my things in my “traditional” carrel in the Quaker library where I wrote several books in the past. Nice to be back.

Tuesday, April 25, 1995

I was “on duty” from 6:30 to 10:00, which meant making announcements at supper, closing the door for Epilogue, preparing the tea for afterwards, and checking the whole huge place to see that all windows were closed, doors locked, electric machines turned off, etc. They’ve had burglaries and are very “prophylactic.” . . . Am progressing with research for my lecture on gardens. Very interesting stuff.

Wednesday, April 26, 1995

My turn to “sell” my Paradise Lost course. I think I succeeded with one or two doubting or fearful souls. . . . Walked around the pond; it’s lovely. The view from our room is spectacular. . . . Rebecca Mays showed up. She’s a candidate for a teaching job here. I walked her to Bourneville to see the school, and helped identify where her daughter could take music lessons. There are seven candidates for two or possibly three places. She’ll know the results on Friday.

To Gothenburg, Radisson Hotel

Up early. Bus to New Street. British Rail to Euston. Tube, Piccadilly Line, to Heathrow. Lunch in McDonald’s. Reading another book on gardens; the subject is now becoming more familiar to me. Met at Göteborg airport by Bo-Lennart Eklund, looking a bit fatter and older than last time. A torrent of Greek ensued. He drove us to our swank hotel on what I call the Champs Elysées of Göteborg, right next to the Art Museum and concert hall and state theater. Lovely two-room suite with two baths. An hour later, to the university to lecture on the re-emergence of Greek prose fiction. Small audience. Half the students are in Athens; another is in Paris. But afterwards there were two, at least, who asked numerous questions, including an older archeologist who doubted the “importation from the West” theory of Beaton and myself. Afterwards, to a nice pub-like Swedish restaurant with venison on the menu. I had “3 kinds of herring” as an appetizer. Delicious. Then filet mignon, not so delicious, served with a huge baked potato, which apparently is a staple here. Of course everywhere are these gorgeous Swedish girls with peaches-and-cream complexions: waitresses especially. The student next to me had studied about the Pontos and Bulgaria and was interested in Stavridakis, so I was able to tell him the whole story about the 1919 mission to the Caucasus, and then the role played by Stavridakis in Zorba. Another student thanked me profusely for Kazantzakis and the Linguistic Revolution, which he had just finished. Life's small pleasures! . . . CNN television in English afterwards in the hotel.

Göteborg

A sumptuous breakfast is included in the room fee: salami, croissants, paté, omelet, bacon, ham, jams, coffee in huge cups. Bo-Lennart picked us up at 10:15 and, with more torrents of Greek, we walked down the Champs Elysées to the pedestrian malls and the huge covered shopping mall, and near the harbor, where the new opera house is, and then back to Västra Hamngaten (meaning South Harbor-Street) to the University. Oh, he also showed us the projected new campus of the university, near our hotel, behind the art museum, very pleasant and open. This time I gave a seminar presentation on anxiety of influence, again with few students but some questions at the end. Is it worth coming so far and getting paid and put in a hotel for three days to lecture to so few? . . . Afterwards we were on our own. Went to the harbor to the new opera house, but it was sold out for tomorrow night. Investigated other possibilities. No concert. But got tickets for Cabaret at the Stats theater. Bo-Lennart picked us up again and we drove to his home nearby for dinner with him and Anita, who has been doing well as an author of children's books. Their son lives nearby. A daughter works as a writer for TV. She lives with an uneducated man who opened a restaurant in Bangkok, but it failed. They have a child but Bo-Lennart and Anita aren't very hopeful that the father will remain visible. They talked about the great economic change in Sweden. Boom in the mid-'80s, now bust with their currency having lost about 30% in value and lots of services being curtailed, but not education, Bo-Lennart says. Delicious meal, starting with reindeer meat in a salad as appetizer, then cod in a cream sauce, ice cream, cake, wine, schnapps. (I forgot that when we checked in to the hotel yesterday they immediately gave me a glass of whisky.) Taxi back to the hotel.

Göteborg

Chrysanthi thought it silly for us to stay an entire extra day, but it turned out quite fine. Another huge breakfast made all the more pleasant by the lovely blonde waitresses. A long walk for shopping in food markets, department stores, sports shops, etc. We bought herring, two kinds, for Daphne. A woman on the street distributing a petition explained that it was an appeal to boycott shops, including food markets, that sell pornography, apparently a huge problem in Sweden where, she said, even children are used for prostitution. Freedom has its price. I left Chrysanthi to shop on her own and returned to the hotel to try to block out my lecture on gardens and literature. I've got a wealth of material, including a terrific TLS review all about tulips, which epitomize the imposition of art upon nature. We went out for a coffee and pastry and then at 6:00 p.m. attended Cabaret—a lively, energetic performance with expert mise en scène and a fine jazz band. It took me almost until the end to realize that Fräulein Sally was Sally Bowles or that the whole thing was an adaptation of Isherwood's Goodbye to Berlin, with the cabaret people suddenly confronted by a Nazi denouncing Jews, communists, social democrats. Isherwood's authorship also explained of course the production's quite obvious homosexual suggestions. Couldn't understand a word of the dialogue, but the music and dance were sufficient to make a pleasant experience. . . . Supper at 9:30 in Pizza Hut, filled with young people, as were all the sidewalk cafés. Göteborg is a completely rational city, with streets at right angles, parks, huge squares, the entire center walkable. A complete city offering culture, a lovely central library, theaters, a symphony orchestra, plentiful public transportation (trams), and it has only 500,000 people. No congestion anywhere. No traffic problem. No parking problem that we could see. Saturday night the avenue was quite littered with discarded paper, cigarette butts, etc. But the next morning everything was spotless, for the street and sidewalks had been wetted down and scrubbed. To all appearances, a very lovely place to live, although I sensed that Anita finds it dull.

Göteborg–London–Birmingham

Smooth flight. Twice as long to go from Heathrow to Woodbrooke as from Sweden to England.

Tuesday, May 2, 1995

Working had on the gardens lecture. Very interesting material. I think of gardens differently now. . . . My first Paradise Lost class. Eight students. It went well. Instead of lecturing, I got them to talk. Did their conceptions of hell, and why Milton doesn't follow them.

To Cambridge

To Cambridge by train. Comfortable except for all the smokers, mostly women as usual. Went directly to David Holton's college: Selwyn. Lecture on Anxiety of Influence. Large audience, including Iacovos Tsalioglou's daughter, who is studying English, and my former student "Cooper" at Dartmouth, who is simply living in Cambridge to be with a girlfriend, and writing, and getting some recognition. Reception afterward. Spoke at length with a woman in the Ίδρυμα Ελληνικού Πολιτισμού here, who liked my lecture and says the foundation's New York office can probably help with the Middleton book. She'll be at Norwich next week. Also spoke at length, in Greek, at ease, with a man who wants to study in America. Nice supper afterwards with David and Ann, Harry David and Katerina Krikos-Davis, and Chrysanthi. Krikos-Davis very down on Meg Alexiou, still. Bryer's wife Liz is dying of cancer.

Thursday, May 4, 1995

Cambridge

Overnight with the Holtons. Accompanied them when they went to vote in the morning. Then Chrysanthi went off alone to walk the town and I spent all morning shortening my Ζωγραφική τέχνη του Πίτσου from one hour to half an hour. As usual, the resulting text is probably superior. Lunch with David in hall. All fellows get seven free meals per week. They sit at high table, with the understanding that one always sits in the next empty seat, alongside whomever may be there, to enhance fellowship and unity. Within earshot of David and me were a mathematician, engineer, theologian, ancient historian, political scientist. How different this is from Dartmouth, where every attempt at a faculty club has failed! What makes the difference? Is it primarily the subsidy, or a different attitude? In any case, this sort of fellowship would seem impossible at Dartmouth at the moment unless it became high priority in the administration, who set an example here by their presence. (At the Selwyn lunch, the Master was further down the table.) Then, of course, they go to a separate room for coffee, newspapers, and further conversation.

Worked on Gardens in the afternoon and then gave my seminar to David's graduate students, entirely in Greek, both the presentation and the questions. Good practice for me. . . . Afterwards met Jack Shepherd and went with him and Chrysanthi to a pub downtown. He's doing beautifully here, and always expresses his gratitude to me for getting him established in Dartmouth, for if that hadn't happened this wouldn't have been happening either. Kathy joined us later. She, too, is flourishing, doing more training in mediation. Jack expects that his grant will be renewed until 1999 but they haven't decided yet whether they should stay. . . . They'll be visiting us in Woodbrooke in June, to examine it as a possible place for Jack to finish some writing. . . . Back to the Holtons' for a nightcap and more good talk until midnight.

Friday, May 5, 1995

To London

Met the Holtons' daughter finally. She's doing A levels in art history. Train to King's Cross. Tube to Daphne's. Went out for lunch nearby. Daphne is doing well on her Eastern Religions book. She asked me to look at part of the Buddhism chapter, which I found charming. I settled in her study with my computer and continued with the gardens lecture. Nice supper at home with Greg. Oh, in the afternoon we took a long walk to Hyde Park and saw the tents, etc. set up for VE day celebrations tomorrow.

Saturday, May 6, 1995

Worked more on Gardens and finished the first draft. Saw the 95-year-old Queen Mother on TV as guest of honor at the VE memorial in Hyde Park with prayers, sermons, Westminster boys choir, veterans with their medals. Very moving. But children know very little. They interviewed one class, and a boy said that Germany had won the war. . . . Off to the Barbican. Lunch outdoors by the fountains; very pleasant on this hot, sunny day. Then a lively production of A Midsummer Night's Dream, pure magic, with Desmond Barrit (Malvolio in the Twelfth Night we saw recently) as a booming Bottom, and Emma Fielding (who was Viola in Twelfth Night) as Hermia. Puck played well but didn't look the part: too old, hairy, and masculine. I think Puck is better played, actually, by a girl, or a boyish man. But what a pleasure this was! The language is so rich; the imagination; the sensitivity. Theseus's words about poetry near the end epitomize Shakespeare's own view of his art. . . . A walk afterwards, a cool drink at home. Then out for spaghetti, and a good night's sleep.

Sunday, May 7, 1995

London-Birmingham

Stopped at Friends House to experience a bit of Britain Yearly Meeting. Fine Meeting in the large meeting room, preparatory to a vigil around Tavistock Square (which we did not go on). The theme seems to be Quaker initiatives for peace and reconciliation à propos on the weekend when the fiftieth anniversary of VE day is being celebrated. Afterwards we met with various old acquaintances from Woodbrooke and Pendle Hill, and had a good talk with Ben Pink Dandelion, who has just been appointed to the Woodbrooke staff. . . . Returned to find a long letter from Dan Seeger including a copy of the eulogy he delivered at his sister's wake, extraordinarily sensitive and eloquent.

Monday, May 8, 1995

At Epilogue, St. Francis's lovely prayer was read. It's perfect for Pendle Hill. I'll send it to Dan (he's just written at length, as I noted above).

Lord, make me an instrument of Thy peace. Where there is hatred, let me sow love; where there is injury, pardon; where there is doubt, faith; where there is despair, hope; where there is sadness, joy; where there is darkness, light. O Divine Master, grant that I may not so much seek to be consoled as to console; not so much to be understood as to understand, not so much to be loved as to love. For it is in giving that we receive, it is in pardoning that we are pardoned, it is in dying that we are born again to eternal life.

Tuesday, May 9, 1995

At breakfast, Anne Thomas told me that both she and Kenneth Boulding, from Liverpool, spoke "broad." When their intelligence was recognized and they were admitted to grammar school, the school authorities offered "elocution lessons" to rid them of their accents and teach them "upper class" English. Otherwise their careers would have been stymied. But Ken said that at Oxford in his college there were only six boys from grammar school and they were shunned by the public school crowd. It was the loneliest time of his life. He still had the wrong accent, didn't dress quite right, hadn't broken the "code."

To Norwich

Train to Norwich, changing at Peterborough. In the buffet at Peterborough, I met an American colonel returned to Norwich for VE day celebrations. He had been a pilot based there, 18 years old, in the war. Seeing his buddies and feeling the warmth and gratitude of the British was overwhelming for him. He told me how heavily all of East Anglia was bombed by the Germans.

At Norwich, I was met by Lela Banaki, and by Christine Wilson from the Centre for Literary Translation. To the university. Met Amy Mims, who talked about her ongoing translation of Ritsos and about Kimon Friar. Went with Lela and her husband, Stathis, a lawyer, on a tour of Norwich center, which is charming, and for coffee. Then with Amy to see Norwich Cathedral, begun in the 11th century. Evensong in progress: three old ladies. One must imagine another age when these cathedrals were full and were the center of all activity in a community, not just religious activity. I keep imagining that this was the cathedral visited in Hartley's The Go-Between but I may be confused (as I am more and more). Then a walk through the cathedral's lovely precincts. . . . Back to the university, and to Lela's apartment. Others gathering: Dimitris Tziovas and Marianne Spanaki (they're now married), very eager about the forthcoming July 4–5 conference in my honor. Fatima Eloeva from St. Petersburg, who translated Ο τελευταίος πειρασμός and thanked me profusely for my critical books on Kazantzakis and my translation. Interesting young woman, of Iranian descent in part. We spoke at length. She says that the Russians, despite all their problems, are free, which makes up for economic chaos. Under communism, they were, as it were, in a concentration camp. Then came Alexis Sola from Barcelona, translator of Συμπόσιον into Catalan. Vivacious. Fluent of course in Greek, as is Fatima (who speaks ten languages, including perfect English). He, too, thanked me for my critical books on Kazantzakis. What a pleasure this is becoming! Then Katerina Anghelaki-Rooke together with Rooke himself, whom I had last seen decades ago. At last, maybe at 9:00 p.m., we left by taxi for a Greek restaurant downtown. This συμπόσιον lasted (for me and a few others) until 1:30 a.m. and for the rest until 4:00 a.m. Good talk with Terry Hale, the director of the British Centre for Literary Translation, a lovely energy subsidized by the European Union and the British Arts Council. Translation is booming in the UK: people are being trained, publishers are interested in bringing out translated texts. . . . Much additional conversation with Fatima, who wondered how I've been able to continue working on Kazantzakis so long. Embarrassing. Some day I hope to graduate. As more and more wine was consumed, Lela's husband, Stathis, started singing raucously, joined by Sola and sometimes by Fatima. Κέφι. We were joined by two technicians with the National Theatre's touring company's production of Joe Orton's play that we saw at the A.R.T. in Cambridge. Nice group. To bed at 2:00 a.m., overfed and full of κουβέντα.

Saturday, May 13, 1995

Norwich

Long breakfast with Patroclus Stavrou (who, last night, protested how he had resisted for two years Eleni's desire to adopt him as her son). I spoke to him about the Middleton book; he says that we should be able to get $500 from Eleni without difficulty. Eleni Cubitt of the Ίδρυμα Ελληνικού Πολιτισμού says that the president, Sakellaridou, reacted favorably to the proposal. . . . The symposium started with Patroclus Stavrou's prolonged summary of everything we already know (he also played a greeting from Eleni, now aged 92). My "Reminiscences of a Translator" went very well; Terry Hale wants to publish it. In the afternoon, Roddy Beaton gave a good paper on the Greek vs. the English Οδύσεια. He also said, in passing, that Kazantzakis studies are undergoing a renewal in Greece, stimulated in large part by my Kazantzakis: Politics of the Spirit. Amazing. On the other hand, the reissue of The Last Temptation, etc., by Faber does not even have my name as translator on the title page. Oh well . . . As I said in my paper, we will be "spiritually" rewarded. . . . Katerina Anghelaki-Rooke gave a brilliant paper on Kazantzakis's Odyssey versus Friar's, saying that Kazantzakis's is the journey of the mind whereas Friar's, because of the nature of English, its paucity of adjectives, etc., is the journey of the body. . . . I stated how happy I was that Friar's contribution is being recognized and I told the audience about the Friar archive and what I discovered there. Then I spoke about Scorsese's film and Fatima spoke about the relation between Greek and Russian in translating The Last Temptation. She wants me to come to St. Petersburg to lecture (in English or Greek) to her students. She sweetly asked to kiss me (French style, on both cheeks) as we parted. I was most appreciative of Terry's effort to arrange such a meaningful conference. As I told him, Kazantzakis had occupied so much of our lives—all of us—and it was very satisfying to be able to reflect a little on that "service." . . . Christine Wilson drove me to the station. She had just seen Joe Losey's film of The Go-Between and she confirmed that this was indeed the "correct" cathedral. Also that Marion and Leo had had tea in a place still in existence and that the hall at which the film had been shot is nearby. . . . Nice reunion with Chrysanthi at Woodbrooke. I returned first, she came later, having just seen Shaw's Pygmalion at the Birmingham Rep, with Daphne and Greg. We exchanged full accounts of our doings: she, Daphne, and Greg went to “Cadbury World” among other things and returned loaded with chocolates.

Sunday, May 14, 1995

Breakfast with Daphne and Greg. Chrysanthi says that Daphne has been depressed, alas: problems of self-worth, which is strange since, unlike many people she is employed in a way that allows her to be creative. They go off to Los Angeles and Pasadena next, for Greg’s father’s birthday. Then we’ll see them in Greece. . . . What I need to do, now, is to concentrate on the journal, for on Wednesday we leave for Glasgow.

To Hospitality Inn,

36 Cambridge Street, Glasgow

B’ham to Glasgow by comfortable train. Four hours. Long walk afterwards to George Square, where the statues are equally divided between poets and soldiers. One of the girls in the reception has a brogue so thick I can’t understand a word.

Glasgow

The group arrived this morning. Perry Curtis from Brown, David Mitchell from the Edinburgh Botanical Gardens, and his wife Kate. The only Dartmouth people are Bob Miller ’44 and Diane Carney, and Jean Vitalis, Billy Vitalis’s mother, and Josephine Buchanan, Billy’s grandmother. All the rest are from Brown University. In the morning we went to Glasgow Botanical Gardens, whose chief greenhouse is the so-called Kibble Palace, with orchids, ferns, etc. Taken around by the director. I liked the Spanish moss, like a woman’s long hair, and the room with all other kinds of mosses. In the afternoon, Chrysanthi and I went to the Transportation Museum: cars, busses, railroad locomotives and private cars, stage coaches, but, best of all, a huge room devoted to shipbuilding: the Clydeside Room. Models of all the ships built there, including the Queen Mary and Queen Elizabeth 1, which we sailed upon, and Queen Elizabeth 2 and Empress of India (sunk by torpedo). So sad that Clydeside is now largely inoperative; only two active shipyards remain, creating oil rigs for the North Sea. Then across to the Art Gallery and Museum, with its splendid Great Hall. There’s a nice Turner (“Modern Italy”) and a Corot (“Mme de . . .”), and a Ribera “St. Peter Repentant,” and a gorgeous Filippino Lippi “Madonna and Child.” Also interesting was the Scottish Room with history, maps, artifacts. James Watt, whose improvement of the steam engine made the industrial revolution possible, lived here. Glasgow prospered chiefly because of trade with America, especially in Virginia tobacco. Dumbarton, just outside of Glasgow, means fortress (Dum) of the Britons. . . . At 5:30 p.m. David Mitchell lectured well on Scottish gardens, dressed in a kilt. Very proud of Scotland as a site for gardens that thrive because of huge rainfall and of climate made temperate by the Gulf Stream. Orientation dinner with all present introducing themselves.

A good first day. Started with the Younger Botanical Gardens. Most spectacular is the avenue of sequoia trees planted in 1872. Gorgeous. The gardens feature rhododendrons and Douglas firs and larches. Very extensive. “Nature,” not “art.” Younger was a baron obsessed with gardening. The property is now run by the Edinburgh Botanical Gardens. Then a delicious salmon lunch at Creggans Inn on Loch Fyne, run by Lord McLane, whose son was there. Then to Crarae Gardens, with Sir Ilay Campbell, younger son of the Duke of Argyll, whose grandmother, Lady Grace Campbell, started the garden. Interestingly, he speaks with an Oxford accent, not a Scots accent. Upper class. David was rather scornful of him as an amateur, but a devoted one. And he’s “very important” on the Forestry Council, National Trust, etc. . . . Lastly, and best of all, to Arduaine Gardens, developed by the Wright Brothers and given to the National Trust in 1992. David was literally ecstatic about these, and justifiably so. On a headland jutting out, southern species are viable because of an effective windbreak of trees, which also prevents the spray from reaching them. So, suddenly, inside a forest, one steps into this paradise of color and shape. . . . On to Oban, where I lectured on “Literature and Gardens” successfully, I believe. David said the lecture was useful to him, giving a new perspective on matters about which he is totally knowledgeable. . . . Comfortable supper and coffee in the hotel.

Saturday, May 20, 1995 Isle of Mull–Oban

To the Isle of Mull by ferry. Gorgeous day: clear, warm, brilliant sun. The harbor of Oban is Greek-like. We started with Duart Castle, seat of the chief of Clan Maclean. It was a ruin, but was restored in this century. A very uncomfortable home. But the logical site for the chief's fiftieth anniversary, when Macleans came from all over. We're wondering if Charles McLane is a Maclean. Interesting to me was the fact that Cromwell's forces attacked here, but the Macleans had already left and the Cromwellian ships were sunk in a storm. We were lucky to see Great Britain's highest mountain, snow-covered, on this clear day: Ben Nevis. Then to Torosay, a "baronial" castle—i.e., built by nouveau riche plutocrats. Not very interesting except for some fine bindings in the library, including a complete Conrad. But the formal gardens are nice, with statuary, even, from Padua no less, a good illustration of my lecture last night. And the formal garden is nicely balanced by a "natural" one. . . . Afterwards to a weaver who demonstrated the machine on which he makes tartan cloth. Very interesting. Finally, back to the ferry slip via a "steam railway" that turned out to be a sort of toy, yet capable of drawing 100 people in Lilliputian wagons: extremely uncomfortable and expensive. But the ferry ride back was lovely. Later, around 7:30 p.m., leaving the hotel, which faces the water, I saw a living Manet painting in front of my eyes: the exact colors of his seaside pictures of Brittany, the sea exactly the same turbulence. . . . Down the quay to a nice restaurant with people from our group. Smoked salmon and whisky. At 10:30 p.m. when we finished, it was still light outside. . . . Wedding in progress at the hotel. Whisky smell. Bride six feet tall. Scottish dancing. Kilts. Jollity.

Oban-Edinburgh, George Hotel

Very long bus ride from Oban to Crathes Castle near Aberdeen. Again, the house isn't very interesting, but the gardens are spectacular. The yews in topiary were planted in 1702. They are gigantic, like entire cottages or walls enclosing formal gardens. The gardens are in four parts, each emphasizing a different color. In the house, one point of interest is the inscriptions on the ceiling rafters, as in Montaigne's tower. One struck me as quintessentially Scottish: "the slothful hand maketh poor but the hand of the diligent maketh rich." . . . Another long bus ride to Edinburgh. Lecture by Perry Curtis in the bus, on how the kilt and tartan are both rather bogus, the kilt invented actually by an English Quaker who devised it to enable his Scottish workers (cutting trees for charcoal for the Quaker's ironworks in England) could work with less encumbrance. . . . On the bus, I prepared my Yeats lecture for tomorrow, renewing my sense of his mastery, and vetted Patrinos's essay for JMGS, sloppy, inconsistent, unprofessional, as usual. I'll need to spend countless hours editing it. . . . George Hotel, very posh. . . . Supper in an Italian restaurant with a loud obnoxious German talking non-stop at the next table; very annoying. Walked the entire length of Princess Street, one of the great streets, with the castle up above like the Athenian acropolis. So much Greek revival architecture in this Georgian city. Memories of Mrs. Macpherson in 1955 when I was courting Chrysanthi, living in the YMCA. We both went to the Firth of Forth Bridge, I seem to remember. Chrysanthi remembers buying, on Princess Street, her first piece of clothing with her own money. Forty years ago!

Edinburgh

To Manderston House, near Duns, south of Edinburgh, near the English border. Duns, we were told, was the birthplace of Duns Scotus. Also, because his views were ridiculed, we have the word "dunce." The house, built early this century in imitation of a Georgian Adam mansion, is lovely, of course, and opulent, including a silver-plated banister. We were guided by the occupant, Lady Palmer, a tall aristocrat, very "simple," a great friend of Diana's who had had Charles and Diana at Manderston for several weeks in an effort to keep the marriage together. For me, the interest was that Palmer is the same Palmer as Huntley and Palmer Biscuits: they were Quakers originally. Her husband is now Lord Palmer of Reading (where the biscuit factory is), but Lady Palmer didn't seem even to know that the ancestors were Quakers. In any case, the firm is now owned by Nabisco. The gardens are lovely, with rhododendrons in bloom, a formal garden in front and an informal one in the rear. But David Mitchell finds them nothing special. Still, they are one more example of great expense and skill in creating a private retreat from evil. . . . At 4:00, went with David to his own venue, the Royal Botanical Gardens of Edinburgh, which are magnificent. Extraordinary rock gardens covering four or five acres, each quadrant concentrating on plants from a distinct part of the world; entire section devoted to China at three or four levels of altitude; sequoias (but smaller than those at Younger because of less rainfall); rhododendrons of course, azaleas in full bloom, everything so spaciouly laid out. Then to the greenhouses for wine and hors d'oeuvres and a tour, glass in hand. So much better than Longwood Gardens or even Kew Gardens because of the space allowed and the helpful labeling. Huge lilies, two meters across; orchids; huge palms; cacti; ferns. David very proud, of course, and justifiably so. . . . Dinner in the magnificent Adam Hall of the George Hotel with Ned and Phyllis Sunderland and Sydney Williams. Phyllis was married earlier to a Serb and we were able to talk about Byzantium. Ned is about to publish a book on church history.

To Dublin, Westbury Hotel

Up early to mail queries to Patrinus. Again, sloppy sloppy sloppy. This issue of JMGS is going to be a bit haphazard because I don't have access to my usual databases. But I'm editing it here as best I can. Forgot to say that yesterday morning I lectured on Yeats after breakfast. A good lecture, if I must say so. But I'm not aware that the people are very much interested (some are). David said afterwards that he found the poems almost impenetrable, despite my efforts. And he has tried Ulysses repeatedly but has never gotten beyond the first two chapters. Of course! All these people need teachers! . . . Flew to Dublin. . . . Westbury Hotel is just off Grafton Street, which was very lively at 3:00 p.m. Bewley's Café was full. We went off with the group for a tour of Trinity College, with a perpetual student named Joseph as guide. He rattled off information about architects, dates, etc., but everything punctuated with anticlimaxes, puns, and denigrations in one-liners that seemed straight out of Oscar Wilde. We were guffawing. Then a drink in the buttery, followed by dinner in Commons, with the Fellows at High Table and our group eating with the students. At 6:40 sharp the beadle locks the doors, all stand with a great scraping of chairs, and a student mounts the rostrum to say grace in Latin. At the end: repeat performance. All rise, grace in Latin, and the Fellows march out—to coffee or port.

Dublin & environs

A long, fine day. I lectured at 8:00 a.m. on Joyce. Then from 9:00 a.m. until 7:00 p.m. we were traveling. First stop: Joyce's tower. Nude men bathing in the 40-Foot, but women are now allowed, too. Then to the lovely formal gardens at Powerscourt at Enniskerry, County Wicklow. The house burned and is a shell, alas, but the gardens are intact, a miniature Versailles, the last formal garden of such extent laid out in Europe, David told us. Only the Japanese garden seemed a little precious and wrong. There is a grotto, knots of flowers, parterres, a fake medieval tower: the works. David went on about the unbelievable expense and labor involved—150 men with wheelbarrows moving huge amounts of earth to make the various levels, flat expanses, gradations, etc. that we see today. Legend records that the garden's designer, an alcoholic, was wheeled around each day in a wheelbarrow as he devoured a bottle of sherry and directed the workmen. . . . Then to the old Abbey of St. Kevin at Glendalough, County Wicklow. In the sixth century this was a great center with students from all over Europe. Now there isn't much left: some eleventh- or twelfth-century buildings, one remarkable one called Kevin's Kitchen, with a stone roof. . . . The surprise and delight for me was our next visit, to Avondale House, the home of Charles Stewart Parnell. Perry gave a long account of Parnell's career and importance, and I reminded folks about "Ivy Day in the Committee Room" and the Christmas dinner scene in the Portrait. The house is "modest" but lovely, with lots of memorabilia: pictures of Kitty O'Shea, love letters, a sketch of Parliament at the time showing Parnell, Davitt, and others (and listing a Sir Sydney Waterlow, baronet). I was very moved by this experience, including a video they showed of Parnell's career. The amazing thing about him is that apparently he was a very poor public speaker, also that he went totally against the interests of his own social class. Perry says he was hounded at the end by fundamentalist Protestants in Britain as much as by Catholics in Ireland over his adultery. . . . We ended this unusual day at Mount Usher, where the azaleas were in their glory. Another superb private garden built around a river. Exotic plus native species, semiformal vs. informal. A gorgeous achievement of green and color and smells and marvelous trees. . . . I also finished editing Eftthimiu: sloppy sloppy.

Dublin

To Trinity to see the Book of Kells again in the Long Library, whose books are rapidly disintegrating. Then to Dublin Castle, which I'd never seen before. Above the gate is the Statue of Justice with her scales, facing inward with her back to the Irish population (!). Interesting to discover that one of the viceroys was Earl Gray, who is immortalized in Earl Gray tea. Lunch in Bewley's: crowded, noisy, and expensive, alas. Then I went to the General Post Office, which has plaques commemorating the rising, plus a statue of Cuchulain, which we read about in Murphy. Dublin in general is unpleasant: chocked with traffic. It's entirely different in feel from Edinburgh. . . . Perry lectured well on Irish history, covering, as he jokingly remarked, six hundred years per minute and ending with the Easter rising: Yeats's poem "Easter 1916." . . . Supper with Jean Vitalis and Josephine Buchanan, then with them to the Gate Theatre in Parnell Square to see Goldsmith's She Stoops to Conquer. Very appropriate for us, since the theatre is Georgian as is the play, and since the setting is a country house, just what we've been visiting. The squire and his wife are "provincial" (she's never been to London) and much is made of their simplicity in contrast to urban sophistication. The director was Jonathan Miller—brilliantly done. Lots of good laughs throughout. Theatre full, every seat; very responsive audience. How nice to see a nation's classic theatre filling a theatre on a Thursday night! One reason may be the price, only £13.

Dublin

Perry lectured on the political situation in Northern Ireland, giving the background, which seems to be chiefly that of economic inequality and exploitation. Then we went to Phoenix Park to the former vice regal lodge, now the home of Ireland's presidents. Here we were very gracefully received by Mary Robinson, the president, and her husband. In her residence there is a portrait of Douglas Hyde by John Yeats, W. B.'s father, the one who is buried in Chestertown. I hadn't realized that Douglas Hyde was a former president—also Healy, the subject of Joyce's Et tu Healy, I believe. . . . On the way to Castletown House in Celbridge, County Kildare, we learned that the prefix Fitz- means "illegitimate son of"! Castletown was built ca. 1722 for William Conolly, a nouveau riche who became Speaker of the Irish House of Commons. It is now under repair and is without its original furniture. I found it very vulgar, a blatant statement: "Look how rich I am!" . . . On to Russborough House, bought by Alfred Beit, the nephew of a South African diamond millionaire, to house his art collection, which I found mediocre except for six Murillos depicting the entire story of the Prodigal Son. . . . Supper in a mediocre Greek restaurant with Sidney Williams. Worked on my Beckett lecture. David Mitchell gave his final lecture, on exotic and native plants of Ireland.

Saturday, May 27, 1995

Dublin

I lectured in the morning on Beckett's Murphy, and seemed to get through to some people. Then we went to the new Irish Writers' Museum in Parnell Square. Very nice indeed. I particularly liked John B. Yeats's portraits of Lady Gregory, AE, and the young William Butler Yeats. There's a fine portrait of Goldsmith, too, by Joshua Reynolds. A special exhibit showed photographs of Irish places mentioned in Beckett's work. And the holograph of "Crazy Jane Meets the Bishop" (sic) is there, written on Coole Park letterhead. . . . Then off to Malahide Castle and gardens, occupied for eight hundred years by the Talbot family, the first one having come over with William the Conqueror in 1066. A lassie with a wonderful brogue took us round the gardens. I remember the Colletia armata Rosea, reputed to be the thorn bush used for our Lord's crown of thorns, as the gardener put it. A lethal plant, with spines instead of leaves. The house has a medieval banqueting hall and paneled room, the other rooms being Georgian. . . . Lunch again in Bewley's, unpleasant, full of smoke and noise. Spent the afternoon working on JMGS. Grand farewell supper at Newman House, on the far side of St. Stephen's Green. On the way there I discovered a nice bust of Joyce on that side of the Green. Newman House used to be University College, where Joyce studied in the physics theatre, the same room in which we feasted. Gerard Manley Hopkins actually died in one of the rooms downstairs, now (not then) the ladies' loo. Lovely dinner in the grand style: salmon hors d'oeuvres, duck, white and red wine, a marvelous sweet, champagne; speeches by Terry, David, and me plus toasts by students.

Sunday, May 28, 1995

Dublin-Birmingham

Chrysanthi greeted me with Happy Birthday and a nice new necktie. Bumpy flight to B'ham. Cards from Daphne and Leander. News that Jean Brophy has resigned and will be leaving in June. Also that Jim Armstrong has done very well in negotiations with the town over tax matters. Plus a long letter from Margery Walker bringing me up to date on everything. Reentry to Woodbrooke somewhat negative. Too much mail, too much indifference on part of students to Paradise Lost. Anne said they mostly slept through the video. But Alan Graham loved Book 6. . . . Long call from Daphne about our nephew Nikos Sphairopoulos, who spent four days with Daphne (uninvited) and turns out to be a boor, very spoiled, very nasty toward his wife. A jerk.

Woodbrooke

I gave my talk on Gardens and Literature, and afterwards Anne Thomas quite rightly said that I shouldn't cite Isaiah in connection with the golden age, since he was looking forward, not backward. Golden Age is a Greek concept, not Hebrew. Quite right, except that Milton fuses the two by having overtones of Isaiah in his Golden Age paradise. Anne also warned me against Bacon, who apparently is now considered a villain by ecologists, as one who recommended raping the earth.

Thursday, June 1, 1995

I ministered in Meeting on our pond, how it liberated the water table. Similarly, the power and goodness of God are hidden and useless until we dig down into them and liberate them to be both beautiful and useful.

Eleni Cubitt telephoned to say that Philip Sherrard just died of cancer. She and Alix MacSweeney wanted me to write an obituary for The Independent, but I said No—not enough information on hand here.

Kristin Lord blitzed me (and this was sent here by the department secretary) obligingly to say that on the Quaker on-line network Gerry Yokstra-Murakami, in Osaka, quoted my "Words . . ." pamphlet at length. Amazing! One never knows.

To Stratford by coach with a Woodbrooke group to see Romeo and Juliet directed by Adrian Noble. Not bad, not good. The Friar was well played. Romeo (as Chrysanthi kept saying) was "too short." Also too frenetic perhaps. But Mercutio was spectacular.

Friday, June 2, 1995

Telephoned John Rassias congratulations for Helene's wedding tomorrow. Too bad we can't be there, but Leander, Deanna, and Mother will represent us. . . . Jack and Kathy Shepherd arrived from Cambridge to spend the weekend. I took Epilogue, reading from Ken Boulding's sonnets. Jack is in trouble because his boss, Gwen Prins, is being hounded out of the university, and justifiably. Jack says that she's a liar, has misused funds, etc. But if Prins goes, Jack's program may also have to go. Thus he and Kathy have no idea where they'll be next year. The weekend here was a chance to escape all this temporarily.

Saturday, June 3, 1995

I was told that my Epilogue last night sent Clare Chamberlain fleeing from the room in tears because she has cancer, like Kenneth, and couldn't take the reminder. And Anne Thomas, it turns out, has cancer of the spine, but not so threatening as Clare's, apparently. I of course, was innocent, as they realized. . . . Went to "Cadbury World" with the Shepherds: a Disneyland sort of exposition of where the cocoa beans grow and how chocolate is made—complete with samples. Jack at meals enjoyed meeting our Ethiopian resident, Gobana Besaye, and it turned out that Kathy had met Zablun Malenge in Kenya already. . . . In the evening we had supper in the B'ham Rep restaurant and saw a good performance of The Importance of Being Ernest—pure froth. So the Shepherds had chocolate and nonsense all day long.

Sunday, June 4, 1995

To Bournville Meeting with the Shepherds. Bill Fraser saw me and rushed over. Thirty years! Afterwards we spoke at length; also with Nancy a bit. They're in a retirement community for teachers in Bournville.

Monday, June 5, 1995

Piano duets with Sylvia, a retired piano teacher. Not a great sight reader, but better than the students I've played with so far. . . . In Bible class, Anne Thomas showed clips from four different Jesus movies, including Scorsese's Last Temptation (the raising of Lazarus, killing of Lazarus by Paul, cleansing of the temple). Despite myself, I found these scenes quite convincing. Later, she screened the entire film. I gave an introduction and then led a discussion afterwards. The audience, all women, found the film interesting but unmoving. "Too macho," one of them concluded.

Tuesday, June 6, 1995

Chrysanthi has been trying to arrange a meeting with our nephew, Nikos Sphairopoulos, and his wife Leanna. They are here for observation at hospitals. Nikos has behaved despicably. First with Daphne in London, now with us: showing no inclination to meet and basically saying No. We'll keep trying. Strange. How to explain this? . . . Staff meeting about Woodbrooke's new building, etc. Also about our complaints as Friends in Residence. Some good will come out of it. . . . PL class, Book VIII. I'm encouraging the class to do something silly for Log Night. Today they met at 6:00 a.m. to read the text together.

Long conference call with the Kendal Board, led by John Hennessey. He convinced Jim Armstrong to serve as interim administrator and we all approved, enthusiastically, choosing him over John Diffey. We'll give him a salary of $100,000 a year, plus a company car, fax machine, cellular phone. I telephoned him afterwards in Maine. He said, "I, like you, Peter, was raised to lead a life of service." Amen. He's giving up his summer in Maine. Would I give up the Adirondacks? He said that Jean's exit was just as we planned, smooth and civilized. He also reported that the Supreme Court has accepted our appeal. Neil Castaldo will now actively seek "friends of the court." Also, it seems that Carol Blanc has gone—at last. . . . Bob Shaughnessy has declared himself a candidate for the administrative post. I'll oppose him vigorously, and Hennessey says he will too.

Martha and Leonard Dart have given me their manuscript on Marjorie Sykes—an anthology of her writings—for an opinion on how to organize it. And Chris Lawson has given me George Smith's essay on Quaker education to vet. Again, I spend my time fixing other people's work (the last two weeks have been solidly spent on JMGS) instead of doing my own work.

Thursday, June 8, 1995

Duets for an hour with Sylvia. Schumann mostly. Then a session with Darts about the Sykes manuscript. Then Susanna Kelber asked me to write a Miltonic pastiche for the Log: a Woodbrooke staff meeting à la Book II. I'll try. Then a morning catching up on old correspondence. I have piles. Then Efthimiou's twenty faxed pages arrived with corrections and changes for her essay, and I spent the result of the afternoon entering them. Yesterday I spent hours at the university checking her bibliography. But finally got on line with the help of Graham Smith, a grungy fellow in a leather jacket, unshaven and apparently unwashed, but jovial and helpful. . . . Then to town with Chrysanthi to buy final rail tickets and go to the theater: an adaptation of Wuthering Heights at the Alexandra. They tried hard, and the script was cleverly done, but the book is so much better. I don't think that Heathcliff can be satisfactorily played by anyone. He's too "mythic" (in the book) and wasn't at all on the stage.

Friday, June 9, 1995

I'm going through a large pile of unanswered letters, some going back to last December—from people like John Tallmadge, Tom Doulis, Outi Maula, Elise Boulding. . . . In the afternoon, the Friends in Residence meet with the Awards Committee of the Council. We had submitted reports earlier, and Chrysanthi, Anne, and I were all critical of our reception and the ignorance we had of what was expected of us. All this was discussed amicably, with promises of reform. I complained also that no one had asked to make use of me above and beyond my teaching of Paradise Lost. Indeed, none of the staff had even invited us to sit down and visit socially and informally. I attributed most of these problems to defective leadership on the part of John Sheldon, a born non-leader. But the real fireworks came after supper when we met with the full Council. In considering our report, no one seemed even to notice my second paragraph, where I say that I was told the students won't buy books and I shouldn't try to do anything very demanding at all, etc., and that they could read Paradise Lost in books borrowed from the library. This Council seemed sleepy and inert. But then Pam Lunn got up and said the paragraph was a misrepresentation of what she had told me, that Woodbrooke can't buy books and then have them on hand if fewer students take the course, that students can't afford books, and the like. The clerk, after an interminable time writing his minute, concluded that my paragraph was the result of a misunderstanding. I objected strenuously to this. The clerk then took another long time and oh, finally someone rose and said that perhaps the minute should reflect my view that the courses needed more rigor, but that was not the "sense of the meeting," so the clerk wrote that my paragraph was the result of "mutual misunderstanding." At this point I didn't want to pursue it further, for this item had taken up the entire agenda so far, so I kept quiet. But I conclude that the clerk was incompetent, making no effort whatsoever to bridge the gap between us. And the Council, with the exception of one who spoke and a few others who told me afterwards that they agreed with me, was simply eager to avoid any trouble. A disgraceful performance. Pam, who is an authoritarian feminist, is no doubt furious. I'll try to see Sheldon soon and see what to do next.

Long, good talk with John Reader, a Council member whom we had known when he and Mary were Friends in Residence at Pendle Hill. He felt that what happened last night was healthy. His account of what is happening in Quaker schools in Britain, however, was frightening. They are directionless, he says, losing pupils, no longer serving a distinct purpose. Part of the problem seems what I call the "fetish of community."

As at Pendle Hill, their expectations are so impossibly high that only anguish results. . . . For supper, Dimitri and Marianna Tziovas came, and we talked steadily from 6:00 p.m. until 11:30. She is very lively, surprisingly. It was a good visit.

Sunday, June 11, 1995

Feeling rather disgusted with Quakers, I did not go to Meeting. Met with John Sheldon after lunch to say that he should mediate between Pam and me. He agreed, telephoned her, and she agreed. We'll meet next Thursday. . . . Then to New Street to meet Nikos and Leanna Sphairopoulos—finally. Actually, they were both very pleasant. Leanna is young and sweet, studying dentistry. He is specializing now in orthopedic surgery for children. We had a lovely meal at a Chinese restaurant and conversed effortlessly for three hours in Greek. I haven't heard their English yet; Leanna says she understands more than she can speak. When we made inquiries at New Street regarding tickets for them, Nikos asked me to do the honors, so probably neither of them is at ease linguistically.

Monday, June 12, 1995

I posted JMGS 13 (2) to Carol. As always, an immense relief. But I still need clarifications from two authors.

Tuesday, June 13, 1995

Attended Janey O'Shea's class on the effect of the Richmond Declaration (1887) and Manchester Conference (1895) on launching the Society of Friends into the twentieth century, effecting a "transmutation" from an obsession with traditional doctrine to (a) openness to new doctrine, e.g., the Higher Criticism, and (b) an emphasis on experience and service—in sum, liberal Quakerism. She presented all of this very well.

Thursday, June 15, 1995

The sequel to Janey's class was a guest lecture by professor Kennedy of Arkansas (he used to play basketball with Bill Clinton) on the Society of Friends from the Manchester Conference through World War I, with emphasis on revitalization of the Peace Testimony by people like Wilfred Littleboy, whom I remember so well. I chaperoned Kennedy and brought him together with Alessandro Falcetta, a student here who is writing an M.A. thesis on Rendel Harris. They both agreed that Harris, although a top scholar, was extremely deficient as a person: arrogant, authoritarian. . . . Met with John Sheldon and Pam Lunn. This went very well. She was pleasant and he was very fair. Both agreed that a system to obtain books, when needed, would be good, and Pam will try to work something out with the Westhill Bookstore. I said how sorry I was that everything had been so escalated last Friday, and we parted friends! . . . Off to Bryer and Liz. Liz, thankfully, was having one of her “good days”—smiling, glad that her hair is coming back after chemotherapy, very open about her expected death, sorrowful mostly only about having to leave her teaching job. Two of the three daughters were there. One, a horticulturalist, I told about our trip and will give her my Gardens and Literature lecture. The other works in drama in London. The third is in video, also in London. Bryer ridiculously eccentric, dressed like a Turkish pasha. Told me that George Savides just died. Said he hated going to Sherrard’s funeral, with the body there in an open casket. Immediately, he showed me a book and asked, “Do you know anything about this awful Quaker?” It was Rendel Harris! His letters to his wife from Armenia while he was distributing aid after the Turkish genocide. Bryer sees him as totally insensitive to Armenian culture and Orthodoxy, arrogant, assuming that the Armenians should learn to do everything in a British manner. I told him about Kennedy’s and Alessandro’s similar opinion. Then Bryer in his haphazard way started to “interview” me; he’s meant to review my relation with Birmingham on July 4th. This was totally unsystematic and wayward. To make matters worse, another guest arrived, a Professor Murphy, with two young boys. “Chaos” was Bryer’s apposite comment. End of interview. Apparently Rendel Harris convinced two spinster ladies to learn Modern Greek so they could go to the monastery at Sinai to look at manuscripts, and the ladies afterwards endowed MG studies at Cambridge. All this adds up, somehow, to a connection between Woodbrooke and Modern Greek. I think (fear) that this is what Bryer is going to say on July 4th.

Friday, June 16, 1995

Lunch with Muriel Poulter at her retirement community, Queen Mother Court, where Bill and Nancy Fraser also live. Very tiny rooms, no facilities to speak of, but of course a lovely garden that puts ours at Kendal to shame. Muriel no longer reviews Pendle Hill pamphlets; I’ll see what happened. . . . Off to B’ham Art Gallery to see Epstein’s Lucifer again and Ford Madox Brown’s wonderful couple emigrating to Australia, also a special show on Gainsborough's Harvest Cart paintings, showing the influence of Dutch landscapists. Then to the library to find depictions of Satan, Sin, and Death for Olga, who is doing a paper on Sin and Death for the Paradise Lost class. Helped by a very knowledgeable librarian, I found many and xeroxed them all for Olga.

Saturday, June 17, 1995

Daphne is probably going to do another book, this time on Native Americans. I sent her the addresses of all our Native American Studies faculty. Alec faxed thanks for the Adirondack furniture book I bought for him last summer at the Blue Mountain Museum and reported that "John Deere is purring" and that Carson Bunker is ready to start digging the trench for the electric cable to Alec's cabin. I wish we were there. . . . Worked today on my book review of Alan Paton: A Biography, without reading very much of the book (!). Ditto a few days ago for the collected stories of William Maxwell. That finishes the backlog of work I brought with me. Of course, I haven't spent any time at all on the Kazantzakis letters (as usual). . . . Arranged for $2500 to be sent to Mercer University Press as one-half subsidy for the Kazantzakis and religion book. UPNE acknowledged finally that they will give an advance contract for the revised Demotic Greek 1. But my Life in the Tomb will be allowed to go out of print. They have ten copies left. I said I'll buy them. . . . Brought back the Diabelli Variations from the B'ham library and tried. I can play about three of them. The rest are too hard to sight-read up to tempo. . . . Paul and Dympna Morby came for supper and we had a lovely reunion. She is very active, journeying to Romania four times a year to help teach English; she works with Roman Catholics there. I thanked Paul for his gift of a book on gardening years ago, and gave him a copy of my Literature of Gardens lecture. He, all excited, said we must come to see his garden. So we are invited for lunch tomorrow.

Sunday, June 18, 1995

The Morbys live now just above Fox Hill Close. His garden is magnificent, a miniature version of the marvels we saw in Scotland, and all created by him within the last ten years, after they moved from Harborne. A walled garden designed to give pleasure all year round, with emphasis not on flowers but on shapes, green, shade, shadow. Dympna served us a feast, the best salmon we've ever had, plus Paul's best vintage Italian wines, first white, then red, strawberries, then cheese and biscuits, and Paul's cappuccino. Then he proudly showed a video of himself at a celebration in Italy making a long speech in fluent Italian about the greatness of the Italian tenor Martinelli, who was being honored, largely because of Paul's efforts. . . . We left, stuffed and (I) maybe a little drunk. Walked to the duck pond, where the boat club people were having races, and mama and papa duck were swimming with five ducklings lined up in perfect formation between them. . . . An hour's rest, then off to supper at Tziovas's. Very different: hard to sustain conversation at first, miserable little house with rooms like cells, awful cooking, no traditions of graciousness or hospitality. But things warmed up gradually. Marianne does have some personality although Dimitris has very little, besides being a good, gentle, honest person—which is enough, after all. Some amusing anecdotes about Bryer. Talk of τα Μακεδονικά. They are sensible about such things.

I have a bad cold. Yesterday I probably had temperature. The first sickness since we left. Chrysanthi departed at noon for London; tomorrow she flies to Greece with Daphne. Spoke to Leander and Alec at Terpni last night. It's 100 degrees Fahrenheit there. Leander's four-hand workshop was a splendid success, he feels, although it just broke even financially. Folks already want to sign up for next year. Dan Seeger came late and left early, but was there for Nigel's recital and other goodies, and had lessons on Arensky. Leander said that Helene's wedding ceremony was "horrible." Unimaginative, soulless, Karen Sheldon "dead." He greatly appreciated his own and also Daphne's, which worked, he feels, because in effect I told Karen what to say. But the reception was lively, with John making a speech and occupying the center of attention (of course). . . . Alec is excited about electricity. NiMo has been consulted. He already has a telephone number. The pathway is selected, and Alec is clearing branches and trees so that Carson Bunker can get through with his backhoe to dig.

Tony and Jean Brown were in to lunch. Tony, now retired, and spending most of his time working with silver, is afflicted with tinnitus in both ears. We talked about this and about Leander. Tony says that when he is concentrating on silver bracelets he almost forgets the sound but that otherwise—e.g., in Quaker Meeting—it's horrible. And he said he could barely hear me talking to him, given the background noise of Woodbrooke lunchtime. . . . Played Telemann and Vivaldi with Keith, a moderately accomplished recorder player. . . . Taught P. L. Book X. Good class but a bit sleepy. Boris said it was good that Adam and Eve made up, for otherwise the epic would have been several books longer. . . . I was on duty as usual (Tuesdays). Timothy did Epilogue: King's College choir singing Thomas Tallis. Over cocoa we had a long talk about the rituality of musical services. Silent Meeting. Then George Smith caught me for another of his monologues. To bed at 11:30 after reading a bit more of Anne Thomas's Swarthmore lecture on creation stories as guides for the journey.

Wednesday, June 21, 1995

After staff meeting, lunch with Marian McNaughton and Val Ferguson. It came out, finally, what the trouble is here, at least according to them. It's the continuation of Chris Lawson as leader (not to mention Christina as librarian). They said that Chris had simply been here too long and had nowhere to go. I asked why the Society of Friends didn't find another position for him, "moving him sideways." They said it had been tried. What a shame! All of us need to learn to divert. Bill Fraser, when I asked him why he didn't stay on another eight years as warden, said, "It wouldn't have been good for Woodbrooke." Amen.

Thursday, June 22, 1995

The first truly gathered Meeting I have experienced here. Alan Graham gave thanks for "little things": the sun rising, letters from friends. George Smith spoke about having to unlearn being harder than having to learn. I ministered on having to unlearn, perhaps, the belief in a God who is perfect, mentioning process theology (Anne invokes it in her Swarthmore Lecture) and the exercise in Anne's class on Monday in which we arraigned Adam and Eve but concluded that they were innocent and God was guilty—i.e., very imperfect. Val Ferguson then ministered about the beauty of loving relations (e.g., letters from friends), mirroring a loving God despite everything.

Alessandro Falcetta said he wanted to meet Bryer re: Rendel Harris. I brought him with me to the university in the afternoon for such a meeting. This apparently proved fruitful; he'll be going to Crosbie Road tomorrow. . . . I gave my "Kazantzakis's Religious Vision" paper to the Brum seminar, last of the academic year, to a packed house. Some good questions afterwards, but nothing really engaged with the problem, except that a British convert to Orthodoxy held, quite legitimately, that Kazantzakis's views are closer to Orthodox religiosity than to Augustinian. Of course! An elderly gentleman whom I later met held forth at length about the problems with Darwinism and I had to divert him in order to allow others to speak. At the reception I was told that he, aged now 86, was a confidant of T. S. Eliot's and Charles Williams's. He started again at length about his own poetry, which Eliot had advised him not to publish. I asked him about C. S. Lewis, and he replied with scorn that he was a charlatan. But he greatly admired L. C. Knights. Rhoads Murphy, the instructor of Ottoman Studies, was there and we talked about Columbia. He knows Austerlitz, who he says now has very bad cancer and is still married to the Finnish wife (who summered in Riparius years ago). Also met some engaging students, and the young Catalan who had been at Norwich, too. Beautiful spread in the university guest center with its splendid garden.

Friday, June 23, 1995

Peter Ricketts saw my name on the Art's Faculty bulletin Board and telephoned, inviting me to supper tomorrow. Long, exhausting talk with Janet Shepherd about Pendle Hill. She's very negative, still, about Dan, saying that he's completely isolated now, invisible, and still micro-managing. She thinks he should be fired. . . . Woodbrooke has filled up with people on a short course for unemployed Quakers. They look very scruffy, poor things. One at lunch, covered with tattoos, was largely inarticulate. He sat next to his mother, who'd gone to school at Ackworth and had read Paradise Lost intact and assured me, "I still have the book." (Take note, Pam Gile.) . . . In the evening, went to the new B'ham Symphony Hall with Michael Wetton, Julia Hick, and Elizabeth Scherrer to hear Brendel's final concert in the Beethoven Sonata series—the last three sonatas. The final one, in particular, is monumental. He played all three with his expected clarity, vigor, and delicacy. Huge fortes, tiny pianissimos, all alive owing to this hall's splendid acoustics. Saw Rhoads Murphy there with his wife Monica. They gave us all a lift home afterwards and I gave them a tour of Woodbrooke.

Saturday, June 24, 1995

Meeting was filled with the unemployed. Janet Shepherd ministered about God as “mender” and I followed her with hopes that he/she/it/they would do lots of mending of the unemployed, who should persevere in the faith that disaster can be opportunity. . . . Spent the morning writing letters to JMGS submitters regarding the fate of their articles. . . . Long leisurely supper with Peter and Monika Ricketts. In the car he told me that he’d been the victim of clinical depression for 2½ years and had to stop work completely. But the condition disappeared as mysteriously as it appeared and he is now fine: retired at age 61 but more active than ever in various scholarly pursuits with medieval French and also in public service. He mentioned Steve Nichols as a 100% rotter and charlatan who publishes always collaboratively so that he can hide behind the others when the gross mistakes of the publications are revealed. We both are amazed that a man with such defects of character and scholarly integrity can have attained such heights in the profession. When I saw that he was a candidate for MLA president this year, I despaired. But he wasn’t voted. He’ll keep trying, of course.

Sunday, June 25, 1995

More letters to JMGS authors, mostly rejections. And I started packing for the return trip. Good! Chrysanthi and I have both had enough this term. How I long for the farm!

Tuesday, June 27, 1995

A spate of letters and more JMGS reviews occupied me most of the morning, but I also helped Olga with her report, making xeroxed enlargements of Sin and Death engravings. And Julia says she wants to do a brief project on freedom in Milton. Goodbyes to the Whiteheads and to Keith, who will be gone before I return, but I’ll see the Whiteheads at Pendle Hill. Last night Alessandro spoke for an hour on Rendel Harris, followed by discussion and comments, mostly from me. He did quite well, although his Italian accent made comprehension difficult at times. Harris among other things seems to have preceded Bernal’s Black Athena in assuming that Africans, especially Egyptians, had a much more developed civilization than we imagine, and passed on much to the Greeks. But of course this was heresy, and he was ignored. . . . Final PL class went well. We finished! The class had gathered at 6:00 a.m. to read Book XII together, with much laughter, waking Val Ferguson. Olga and Julia told me that it was the best class this term—indeed, the only worthwhile one, since the others were so fragmented because of the modules. But I don't expect any recognition or thanks from the likes of a Pam Lunn or a John Sheldon. . . . Ran from class to the bus to New Street. Train to London suffocating, but I worked on Jeter's essay for the Middleton volume—very poor. What can I do? Tried to get tickets for the play on Furtwängler that Harold Pinter directed, but it doesn't open until next week and the theater was locked. Went to Raymond Review instead, lavishly unimaginative, boring. Then tube to Heathrow, long wait for courtesy bus to Novotel Hotel. Slept at midnight, very tired.

Wednesday, June 28

London–Thessaloniki

Up at 5:15 to catch the 6:00 a.m. courtesy bus to Heathrow. Long tedious flight to Thessaloniki, stopping at Turin. Good view of the Alps however. Jagged knife-edges; I imagined crash-landing there. Talked with the man in the next seat, who turned out to be a “Macedonian” from Adelaide on his way to Skopje. He was ignorant of Greek feelings. I told him to speak only English in Greece. Actually, at passport check in the airport I noticed that he was being held up while the officer checked his computer file. Don't know what happened next. George, Vouli, and Chrysanthi were waiting. Vouli went off; I'll see her on Thursday. George pleasant and talkative. We congratulated each other on not looking older and not having gained weight. (His hair is grayer, though.) Greg made a good impression on everyone. George and he spoke broken French a bit. Daphne's Greek, by all accounts, was excellent. She's a good linguist, obviously. George left us at Lola's and Kostas's in Aghia Triadha. We'll go to him tomorrow. We are housed in Nikos's study, very uncomfortably. Nikos locked his bedroom. Chrysanthi very “turned off” by the relatives: all they want to know, she says, is how much Greg earns, how much Leander earns, how was Leander able to buy a home. George says that Tilda is overprotective regarding the surviving twin; a mosquito bite is a major catastrophe. It's always “Μη! Μη!” The cousins haven't even met Nikos's wife, Leanna. Obviously this is not a happy, united family. Probably because of Kostas. He is a bit difficult. Themis and Miranda Altas came in the evening (after I had gone for a delicious swim in the rather choppy gulf: warm, very salty, practically deserted). In the conversation, Kostas related how he used to work with the Germans and how nice some of them were (no doubt true). Themis said the same: they had German and Italian soldiers, 17 years old, quartered in their home. They treated his mother as their mama, and wept when they left. But maybe Kostas's wartime activities rankle George. I did better with Themis when we went to the παραλία for pizza and beer and he was sitting next to me. Even asked him about Slavo-Macedonians around Florina. He said that all these people are Greek, felt themselves Greek, until the Bulgarians exploited them for their own divisive purposes. He also said, interestingly, that his own mother and grandmother, although "pure" Greeks, were bilingual and even trilingual (Greek, Macedonian, Serbian), the grandmother coming from Monastir. Lola added, of course, that Gligorov is really Grigoriou, an ex-Greek communist. All the while, Chrysanthi kept kicking me under the table, to change the subject. . . . Themis is fully retired; they spend lots of time in Michaniona. Theodora has died. Marianna gave up the law and teaches law-related subjects in the lyceum. . . . Slept thanks to ear-plugs in our very noisy room with trucks passing continually outside. But first walked the length of the village. The main part is quite unchanged. The παραλία is improved because cars are no longer permitted. Lovely oleanders (πικνοδάφνη) in bloom everywhere. But the far end is much overbuilt with ugly apartment blocs. Saw the house of Kyria Marianthi and Kyrios Alekos, where we spent two summers and I was famous as "the man who was always writing."

Αγία Τριάδα-Καλαμαριά

Good conversation with Lola and Chrysanthi over a prolonged breakfast, greatly facilitated by Kostas's absence—he goes into town very early each day. Even touched some interesting subjects: superstition, religious fanaticism, AIDS, besides the usual junk. . . . Another lovely swim. I haven't been in the ocean, I think, since Waikiki Beach (which is better than this) in 1983. George came for us and we transferred to Καλαμαριά. Still haven't gotten to Odysseas. He telephoned when I was out. Chrysanthi doesn't want to call back from this phone because Kostas will get angry because of the expense (she says). That's why she never telephoned me at Woodbrooke. . . . The Kalamaria apartment is still beautiful, with vistas on all sides and a large empty area in back that cannot be built upon. But then there is Eftymoula! After three hours of her I felt like screaming. The problem is that her normal conversation is screaming, and that everything needs to be discussed and contradicted interminably. In addition, it is beastly hot. I wish I were back in Birmingham. I had a nice long talk however with Aglaïa Lypourli on the phone. They are leaving town tomorrow and we won't be able to see them. . . . Finally got out of the house at 9:15. Taxi to the American Farm School. Morose taxi driver refused to talk. Huge festival at the School with expensive tickets for dinner and dance. We were given complimentary tickets by Vouli—we and Βουλευταί, as we were told. Saw Κυρά Κούλα, Vouli's housemate. Vouli introduced Chrysanthi to a young woman, and then told her afterwards that this was the grown-up version of one of the babies that Chrysanthi and the students had raised at the Quaker girls' school. The woman knows nothing of this; indeed, she does not know that she was an adopted child. At our table were the Willises: David and Christine (Lansdale). Very nice to see them again. David explained that the School abandoned its African program owing to its sense that development had failed in Africa. With the fall of communism, the School's efforts shifted to Albania and Bulgaria. Bruce is actually engaged in developing the Albanian part. Albania, today, Christina explained, is just where Greece was when Bruce arrived at the Farm School in 1947. (I told her my impression of Indonesia, just like Thessaloniki in 1955.) David favors Farm School tactics. Small is beautiful. Train young farmers and send them back to their villages with better knowledge, as opposed to huge projects funded by The World Bank. Also at the table was David Schuler, USA's vice consul in Thessaloniki, a Dartmouth graduate ('87) and present when I lectured at the State Department. He told me that Ambassador Friedman died recently of a heart attack. Schuler had a tour of duty in Osaka and found a Japanese wife, a lovely woman with whom we had lots to say. He is doing well here; made a "human rights" report for the State Department confirming the existence of people who consider themselves Macedonians! He knew about Karakasidou's troubles and wants to see her. I'll call her tomorrow. His boss, Mimi Hughes, the consul, also was in my State Department class. She was there but we couldn't find her. Also at the table was a pleasant Irish woman who had read Kazantzakis and Joyce and had lots to say about both. So it was an extremely pleasant evening, during part of which we sat under a light rain: so cool. What worried me was Vouli, who seemed depressed. She is retiring in August; says she can't stand grading and correcting student essays any longer (!). But she has nothing to do in place of the School, except to care for her mother, who is failing. She was bitter about certain developments in the School: the encroachment of bureaucracy, mostly; also Draper's tolerance regarding Macedonia (Vouli is a fanatic nationalist on this issue, alas). We got home finally at 2:15 a.m.

Slept late. Showered. Appeared for breakfast to Efthymoula's scream: Είσαι ξυπόλυτος, θέλεις παντόφλες; Όχι, λέει η Χρυσάνθη, θέλει νάνα ξυπόλυτος. Telephoned Dimitris Gounelas. They're leaving for Athens tomorrow, but he'll pass by on his way home this morning. Δημήτρης Ντούτης is away for three weeks. Chrysanthi and I, eager to escape, walked down to the park opposite the house, by the sea. Very pleasant. Had a lemonade (Fanta—i.e., coca-cola), sat, watched children playing hide and go seek. Chrysanthi told me how appreciated Daphne is by her authors and employer; she's an effective editor. A propos, I finished a first look at Constantelos's article for the Middleton volume yesterday. Like Jeter's, it needs massive rewriting. . . . Gounelas came for ten minutes and stayed an hour. He was most encouraging regarding conditions at the university, thanks in large part to EU money and also to competition from places like McGrew's college at Anatolia. Ruth is fine; she's teaching in the Department of English; her eyes are stabilized. He confirmed Tziovas's remarks at Norwich that there is increased interest in Kazantzakis and that his books are now being taught more regularly. Dimitri says that five or six colleagues have asked to read my Politics of the Spirit. Most interestingly, he revealed that the department has several apartments in town that it keeps for visitors. I could come in a year or two for a semester, perhaps teach a course on Kazantzakis, and complete the scholia for the Letters. The department would cover travel, etc. Chrysanthi and I both agreed that we could contemplate a sojourn in Greece provided (a) we were not living with relatives, (b) we did not come in the summer heat. . . . At 3:00 p.m., for lunch, came Andreas and his fiancée, Demetra. Both are lawyers. He hopes to specialize in labor law, she in international business law. She is plain in appearance but has an outgoing personality, is articulate, obviously very smart, and seems kind. Best of all, she is soft-spoken! Our conversation was fine until Efthymoula began her shrieks, always at length. I asked Andreas if he still was interested in the theater. Only to go as audience, he replied. There is an experimental theater here as well as the Κρατικό. Stavros dreams of starting a sort of theatrical school in the far future, and Andreas is already representing his interests for the Odeon. Andreas seems “cured.” George explained to Chrysanthi yesterday that starting in high school he had been a rebel, a very extreme leftist under the first PASOK regime, etc. But like many products of the 1960s he has entered the mainstream although still manifesting his earlier beliefs by doing labor law. . . . As I sit here on the rear balcony at 6:00 p.m. writing this, I suddenly notice that Olympus is visible in front of me! . . . Talked with Daphne on the telephone. She and Greg like Marmara. They hope to go on a boat around the tip of Άγιον Όρος tomorrow. We did that once on a cruise ship, I remember. How beautiful! . . . At 10:00 p.m. Bill McGrew fetched us and we went to a ψαροταβέρνα in Aretsou. Strangely, from start to finish, Bill spoke Greek, as did we, of course. Along the way he mentioned that every time he returns to America he feels more foreign; conversely he feels increasingly Greek, appreciating especially the fact that in Greece one is never alone. On the other hand, the family, such a cohesive force (not always!) means that larger groupings lack power and cohesion. Also, he lamented that cheating—on income tax, on university exams, etc.—is a “way of life” and that most EU money is diverted into private pockets. Nevertheless, things are much better now than when the first PASOK government almost destroyed Anatolia College. His four-year college is not accredited by the Ministry, of course, but it continues to attract students and is beginning to play a role in Greek life willy-nilly. It is barely legal because of certain interpretations of the constitutional prohibition and another law permitting ελεύθερα ιδρύματα. As usual, too much food was ordered, and Bill insisted on paying despite our protestations. Chrysanthi afterward felt that all this was very artificial, not understanding why he is so hospitable always. . . . Returning to George, we looked down on a neighbor, a Sarakatsanos, celebrating the παραμονή of his son’s wedding. . . . I forgot to mention that Bill was very negative about Karakasidou (a graduate of Anatolia College), as well as about American officials like Schuler vis-à-vis the Macedonian question. “They should ingratiate themselves with Greek officials instead of creating enemies, which means that when the time comes for these Americans to be useful for us they cannot be because the Greeks do not trust them.”

Thessaloniki

A long, interesting day. We went into the city in the morning by taxi. Fortunately, it's Saturday and many people are away for the weekend. No traffic. Visited Vouli at 10:00 a.m. She was in better spirits today. She showed me some of the materials used for teaching Greek literature. A section from Zorba is one of the included, authorized, texts. Cute story about the inspector επί χούντας who overlooked the fact that she was teaching Homer's Odyssey in the Kazantzakis-Kakridis translation, although the law then required Homer to be taught in the original. Another story about Stylianos and George Papandreou, Minister of Education and Religion, who confided to Stylianos that he is an American, really, not a Greek. He graduated from Amherst College. . . . At 12:00 noon we left Vouli for our appointment with Mimi Hughes, the American Consul General, in her gorgeous apartment on the third floor of the consular building on Οδός Νίκης, στην παραλία. She told us that this building had been one of the several along the waterfront owned by Salonika Jews, all of whom were killed in the holocaust. The building is in very bad repair and indeed is unsafe. They'd like to leave it, but fear that this will precipitate the discontinuation of the consulate altogether, since the Republican Congress is cutting the State Department's budget drastically. Mimi is a Barnard graduate. She was in the class when I lectured at the State Department for Jim Warren, whom she admired; she said that the course degenerated under Friedman, who really had no qualifications. She told us that she is Jewish and thus feels affinities with the Greek character: the screaming, the constant debating, the focus on the family. But she is very opposed to the politics against FYROM (τα Σκόπια), wishing that the Greeks could be like the Jews, to extend the hand of reconciliation to the enemy, and do business with them. She greatly fears the instability in Bosnia and is afraid that FYROM may not even exist in five years because of pressures from the Kosovo Albanians, etc. Our soldiers there help stabilization, and of course make the Greeks accuse us, as always, of anti-Greek sentiments. She asked me if I knew of Karakasidou's "wonderful article." I explained that I had published it. I must send her a subscription to JMGS. She is trailed everywhere she goes by two policemen who of course report her every movement. Once she saw some representative of the Turkish minority in Thrace and the next day the newspapers screamed in huge headlines that she advocated removing the Patriarchate from Istanbul! Total fabrication, of course. But that's the way things work here. I told her about Bruce Lansdale's graph of foreigners' reactions to Greece. She experienced that initial euphoria but is now falling into the expected disgust. She also noted that by State Department calculations Greece is a number 4 on the scale of danger, with number 1 being the least and number 5 the most dangerous. But she also struck me as fully professional, determined to do her job well, including reports on human rights. She has a large budget to administer, and feels that responsibility acutely. When I explained my own projects and the possibility of returning here to do the scholia for the Kazantzakis letters, she said she'd like to host a dinner party in my honor so that I could meet key people. How nice! She'll be here until July 1997. . . . Next we went to our 2:00 p.m. lunch with Odysseas, Eleni, Toula, Stavros, and their four-year-old daughter, a sweet child, Athinά, much better behaved than Dimitrios's Evi. Η γιαγιά, who is dying, was in the back room but no one suggested that we see her. They have completed a beautiful home in Μεγάλο Χωριό in central Greece, in the mountains, Eleni's birth village, but are afraid to go there with Yiayia because she might die on the way. Conversation was dominated by Stavros, with a litany of difficulties, constant money problems, but at the same time grandiose schemes for future projects and buildings, including a Kinhaven-type summer music camp for which they already bought land in Kassandra. I fear that poor Stavros is not a very good manager, yet somehow they survive. Indeed, they have 600 students enrolled in their two Odea. Poor Toula looks exhausted. I asked her, Κουράζεσαι; and she nodded sadly "Yes." All the better students want her as their piano teacher, so she is overloaded, plus having the lovely child, Αθηνά. Fortunately the family is supportive and cohesive. Αθηνά very obviously has a beautiful relationship with her grandfather, Odysseas, and grandmother, not duplicated, it would seem, in the Evi-George/Efthymoula relationship. The grandparents do lots of babysitting, and this gives them pleasure and diversion from the care of Yiayia. They are saints regarding the latter. No complaints. Eleni even sleeps with Yiayia every night to care for her when she wakes. Yiayia is moribund, doesn't recognize anyone, needs total care, and suffers from the heat. The mystery, for us at least, is Takis, who obviously has no desire to see us, didn't show when invited to meet Daphne and Greg, and probably wasn't even expected today. . . . After a delicious meal of pilaf, fruit, coffee, we went in Stavros's car, the expensive Audi he bought in 1987 and now looks very old, to see the house they're building in Ambelokipoi, far far away, at the opposite end of the city, toward Πέλλα. Nice, narrow, quiet street with somewhat of a village flavor. The οικόπεδο was bought by Stavros's parents long ago. It's narrow, so they have built a huge house four stories high, designed by Takis. Now, as usual, the construction has been abandoned in the middle because Stavros ran out of money. One good thing is that he doesn't borrow, operates on a cash basis. They hope to renew construction and finish within a year. It will be very grand, and will have an apartment for his parents. But the location is unfortunate, even though there is a new ring road that brings Stavros to the city quite quickly. . . . We returned to George's. Tasoula Karakasidou telephoned and I told her about the good feelings of both Mimi Hughes and David Schuler in the Consulate. She says she'd like to visit David. Fortunately she is now working without harassment, at home in Kalamariá, writing her book. She expects to take up her post at CUNY Queens College in the fall unless the financial crisis eliminates it. Again, I realize how fortunate I have been at Dartmouth. Greg Ruf, her husband, has a job at Stony Book, where they'll live. . . . The clarino band arrived downstairs and led the groom and family in a parade to the nearby church—very unusual. George and Efthymoula went to the service. We begged them to go to the reception afterwards (we were invited but demurred after such a full day and no siesta—probably a mistake—for then they decided not to go either). “I may never see you again,” said George. “Even if you come, I may die in the meantime.” True, but I urged us all not to be μοιρολάτρες. Then he wanted to take us for pizza in Panorama but Chrysanthi said we were tired and couldn't we go somewhere closer. So we went part way into town to a pizza place on the main road with the television set blaring, people all around us blowing cigarette smoke in our faces, and deafening scooters accelerating just beyond on the street. Φρίκη! I became depressed and stopped talking (one could hardly be heard over the din). Μίλα, Chrysanthi kept urging me, and I suppose I did a little at the end. But this outing was a distinct failure. Fortunately we returned home for fruit afterwards on their spectacular balcony, with a storybook sunset behind us and a new moon just appearing. That went better. But sleep was difficult with dogs barking at 4:00 a.m., not to mention the ever-present heat and the need to keep doors closed to prevent ρεύματα!

Αγία Τριάδα

Leisurely breakfast on George's balcony, starting with the ceremonial γλυκό. Church service in the background, with the priests and ψάλτες chanting with microphones, outdoors—very nice. George brought us to Lola's. Kostas had a friend on the front porch who turned out, most unlikely, to be an Englishman from Reddich, Birmingham. He'd been 25 years in the British merchant marine, most of it working for Shell on tankers. He had also worked on the Queen Mary and Queen Elizabeth for Cunard. Had good sense to switch to a strong company, exercised stock options, and now in retirement has a nice income, a Greek wife, a flat in Thessaloniki, a summer flat in Aghia Triadha next to Kostas, a flat in London, and his home in Reddich. Six months in Greece, six month in England. Nice story. George found him "pleasant" and so did we. Delicious swim afterwards, with the beach quite full on this hot Sunday, buses from town disgorging people (mostly teenagers) continually. Kostas cooked mashed potatoes, bifteki, and goats' livers in onions: delicious. Siesta. Then to παραλία with Chrysanthi for frappé (ο φραπές ή το φραπέ), long sweet conversation, then another swim, the beach relatively deserted at this late hour (6:30–7:00 p.m.). Sun lower; delicious cool air, finally. I was admirably patient, even Chrysanthi admitted, sitting in the café with a man listening to a blaring portable radio next to us, and six others smoking like chimneys behind us. One needs equanimity. Apparently Greg behaved beautifully under even more difficult conditions, since he couldn't understand the conversation around him. He learned two Greek words, πάρε and φάγε. Everyone complimented us on Daphne's splendid Greek. . . . Will we ever come back? Probably, as I said before, if it's not in the summer and we have our own living space. So, we're going to redeposit our drachmas in the bank here and let them accumulate interest for next time. But right now I am eager to leave. I told Chrysanthi that what made this stay tolerable was the chance to meet several very interesting people. "Not all people are interesting," she responded, and we need to learn to be calm with them. Agreed. But it's difficult. In any case, if all goes well we'll be back at Woodbrooke tomorrow night.

Αγία Τριάδα

Later last night, back to Apostolos's café with Lola and Kostas for τoστ και λουκουμάδες και λεμονάδα, the last now produced by Coca-Cola Co. I'm warming up to Kostas and (I think) vice versa. Lola is hopelessly anti-Turkish; they can't do anything right, all hate Greece, etc. She, and most Greeks, are also pro-Serb in the war there. "We're the only friends the Serbs have." I told her that the general view elsewhere is that the Serbs are the aggressors and villains. The village of Aghia Triadha has collected clothing, food, etc. to send to Serbia, and has an arrangement whereby Serbian casualties come here, to Sun Beach, for rest and recuperation. Lola described seven young men, all with amputated legs, walking on crutches, who were watching the pan-European basketball match the other day in a café and applauding gleefully, instead of lamenting that they could never play basketball or soccer again themselves. I said that they're probably delighted that (a) they're alive, (b) their disability will guarantee that they are never mobilized again into the army. Everything is relative. Another sad sight, part of the volta taking place in front of us, was a father, gray-haired, wheeling his spastic son, aged 30+, in a wheelchair. We all concluded that we should cross ourselves repeatedly and give thanks that we have healthy, normal children (not to mention that they are employed productively in jobs that interest and fulfill them). . . . This morning I am sitting on the balcony in the shade. It's still reasonably cool, with a slight breeze. Chrysanthi, Lola, and Kostas have all gone into Thessaloniki by taxi, Chrysanthi in order to put all our unused drachmas back into the bank and, I hope, to buy some μέλι Ημεττού (όχι εμετού!). I need to think about my "Concluding Remarks" for the Birmingham conference that starts tomorrow. Too bad I didn't bring the Powerbook. . . . Finished my "Concluding Remarks." Dimitris telephoned to transfer a message from John Rassias that Chrysanthi will be teaching in ALPS after all. Too bad. . . . After a quiet morning of work, my last swim. I'm beginning to like this place. . . . Taxi to the airport at 2:00 p.m. Daphne and Greg already there. Also George, Vouli, Lola. We all kidded Greg: πάρε, φάγε, βόλτα, ζέστα. He and Daphne had a marvelous time in Marmara. Took a boat round Mt. Athos, too. Swam in pellucid sea. Ate. Slept. But both said that five days were enough. Greg added that the markets were quiet during his stay in Greece, so it was a good time for him to be away. Good flight to Turino, at least, but there we were stalled for 45 minutes by radar failure in Milan. I feared we'd never get home for the Symposium tomorrow. But we did fly off eventually, thank goodness. I'd arranged for Alix to meet us at the airport. He sped us to Euston and we made the 7:45 by four minutes. Nice to be back in Woodbrooke and in cool weather. And how nice that Daphne has come, too. She, by the way, is now doing a third book, on Native Americans, and is establishing a reputation as a very good editor.

Birmingham

Breakfast with Daphne and Chrysanthi. Fax from Karen Van Dyck congratulating me. Another from Jim Armstrong saying that the Town has refunded over $400,000 overpayment to Kendal. Another from Carol Hamblen about all the graphs in this issue of JMGS. People at Woodbrooke welcomed us warmly (students—not staff), all thinking we had been stranded by Greek shipping and airline strikes. Meeting for Worship. I ministered on the amputees we heard about in Aghia Triadha. . . . To the university. Peter Ricketts there. Also Paul Morby, Stathis Gauntlett, Yannis Vasilikakos, Alf Vincent, Peter Mackridge, Roddy Beaton, Vasos Vayenas, Vangelis Calotychos, Yannis Karavidas, Mihalis Chryssanthopoulos, Meg Alexiou. John Halden opened the Symposium. Dimitris Tziovas then spoke at length about my work on Cavafy, Kazantzakis, and Ritsos, language teaching, MGSA, having clearly done his research well. Very kind! Then came Bryer, who was amusing but irresponsible, going all over the place about me as Quaker (and originally a New York Jew), and castigating Rendel Harris, connecting him (i.e. Quakerism) with the house occupied at Cambridge by Kazantzakis. It was embarrassing, but well meant. Then Meg Alexiou spoke on the “performance” aspect of Greek παραμύθια. This was followed by an actual performance of a paramythi by the autistic people of Oakfields House, including Dimitris Alexiou. So moving! They actually functioned as a group, these people who are so unaware of others. . . . Afterwards, I spoke to the woman who achieved this miracle. She appreciates the high intelligence of the autistics, does not consider them sick or her activity as therapy. Much of what we saw was improvised; they are very adaptable in this. Apparently they can function as a group when doing so “metaphorically” in terms of drama or song. I thought back to the Rudolf Steiner school for Down Syndrome people in Brummen, Holland, where I worked in 1952, and how well the staff succeeded in bringing the best out of the handicapped by using music and drama. . . . Spoke to Dimitris afterward, and he began the usual litany about busses. . . . From here we went to the regular program in this Symposium dedicated to me. I chaired the first session: two papers, one on defining modernism (too theoretical), the other on modernism and Hellenism (not about Modern Greek, really). Fairly good discussion afterwards. . . . Then lunch, thankfully. Sat next to Peter Mackridge. Talked about Sherrard and Savidis and where I should deposit the Kazantzakis letters. Peter says: Gennadion. Not ΕΛΙΑ. . . . First afternoon session quite interesting: Elizabeth Sakellaridou dared to say that some of Kazantzakis's plays have theoretical quality. Vangelis Calotychos then spoke on Galanaki and a Turkish author. After tea, Vayenas on Hellenocentrism as a way of determining who should not be considered γερεά του '30. Stathis Gauntlett very amusing and clever on the «monocotyledons» of Greek modernism, starting by speaking of Peter Bien's polycotyledons! Martha Klironomos not so good on Orthodoxy and secular ideas. Lively discussion regarding Vayenas's terminology and methodology. . . . 6:00 p.m., Yannis Karavidas interviewed me for half an hour for the BBC. The program will be aired here, mostly for Cypriots, and in Cyprus and Australia. Yannis is enduring BBC stringency, but still has a job. . . . Eleni Cubitt told me that John Major won a vote of confidence for the Tories, 218 votes, with only 89 for Redwood. . . . Final session today from 6:30 to 8:30. Mihalis Chryssanthopoulos on self-reflexive short stories, Maria Kakavoulia on interior monologue, Helen Yannakakis on Pentzikis. . . . I've had more than enough for today. Banquet finally at the University Conference Park. Long talk with Eleni Cubitt. I suggested that Cavafy's «Αλεξανδρινοί βασιλείς» would be a perfect commentary on the recent marriage of Prince Pavlos in which τα στέφανα were στέμματα. She will arrange to have it published in a periodical. . . . Home at 11:00 p.m., exhausted.

Birmingham

Up early to add a new section, on modernism, to my "Concluding Remarks" for the conference today. At breakfast, Olga tried to reschedule her Paradise Lost presentation and got into trouble with Pam Lunn. Chrysanthi fears that my mini-epic will offend. Anne Thomas thinks not. . . . The conference today had some very good papers, especially Petros Martinidis's on the architecture of Thessaloniki, if you can call it architecture, governed by greed and speed; and Christopher Robinson's fascinating paper on Kostas Tachtsis's To τρίτο στεφάνι as a "transvestite text," using a gay French author, Tremblay, as his entrée. Interestingly, he claims that the active homosexual partner in Greece is considered "normal"; only the passive one as considered homosexual—i.e., dominance, even in a homosexual relationship, is acceptably masculine. In a long conversation with him at lunch I told him about Fotini Tsalicoglou's JMGS article on AIDS and he added that Greeks believe you can get AIDS only if you're the passive partner—i.e., that the virus travels only in one direction. Another good paper was presented by David Connolly, who has lived in Athens for sixteen years and is active as a translator of Elytis and others. . . . At teatime I went to the Barber Institute to visit Alison Smith, Donald Swann's "partner," whom I had met at Pendle Hill. Surprisingly, she remembered me well. She is deliciously young and fresh and vivacious; Donald was 70 when he died. We sat for an hour over tea and had so much to talk about. She would like to put together materials by and relating to Donald for a Pendle Hill pamphlet. I encouraged her. She'd also like to have a performance of Donald's Greek songs, and I gave her Eleni Cubitt's name. Interestingly, she roomed at Woodbrooke last year and hated it, agreeing with me that the staff is so cold and distant, although she did appreciate John Sheldon's shyness. Donald also set Emily Dickinson poems on death and dying. I told her about the Kenneth Boulding sonnets. And all about my study under Alfred Swan. Alison is in touch with Jane in Haverford. She hopes that I'll telephone her next time we're in London. She's about to leave the Barber Institute, to begin a teaching job in the "university" run by Sotheby's, training dealers, museum curators, etc. . . . The conference's final session, 6:15 p.m. to 7:00 p.m., started with Tziovas's paper on "Mapping Out Greek Literary Modernism" and ended with my "Concluding Remarks." In these I started with distinctions among pre-modernism, modernism, and postmodernism; proceeded to ways in which my experiences at Birmingham led, I hope, to a general effect on the discipline—specifically, the journals BMGS and JMGS, and the Demotic Greek books, videos, etc.; concluded with the thought that we not only study modernism but are modernists in our critical approaches, that modernism's relativity and non-definitiveness are exhilarating. Very nice letter yesterday from Mario Vitti offering congratulations. And today a long letter from Christos Alexiou full of the kindest testimonies of friendship and gratitude, and bringing me up to date on the establishment of an Ἰδρυμα in Greece for autistics. I've been very remiss in not writing him.

Woodbrooke

Typed out my "Concluding Remarks" at the Bien Symposium and sent them to Christos Alexiou, along with a nice letter, to Eleni Cubitt, and to Dimitris Tziovas, in his case along with my ratings for the various speakers at the symposium and also my vetting of Tziovas's draft introduction to the short stories of Hatzis, well done, as always. Took Chrysanthi to New Street with half our luggage and telephoned Daphne from there to give our time of arrival. Back at Woodbrooke and wanting to make another phone call, I discovered to my consternation that letters E to Q in addresses were missing. Rushed back on the bus to New Street. The guard didn't want to let me though, since I wasn't traveling, but I convinced her and, lo and behold! The missing pages were still in the phone booth. The gods looked down smilingly on me today. . . . Practiced duets (Arensky, Schumann) with Lynda and Etsuko for Log Night. Supper: a huge feast. We all circled the buffet table for our moment of silence and it seemed all too likely that we were worshipping the food. Today was a "fast" day in our feast-fast regimen, but I cheated a little when it came to prawns and curry stew, but resisted coffee. Log Night was very jolly. Silly songs and games. A playlet by my class on their 6:00 a.m. reading session for Paradise Lost. I performed my "Great Consult," a fragment of the Woodbrookiad written, it seems, by Rendel Harris. It apparently pleased some—Claire, for instance, and John Sheldon, but I fear that Pam Lunn was not amused. Also did the Arensky duets (opening adagio and closing fugue) with Lynda, satisfactorily, without jitters, but they never called on Etsuko and me for the Schumann. Fond goodbyes to favorite people: Anne Thomas, Michael Wetton, Martha and Leonard Dart, Crispin, the Ethiopian (who hugged me, unexpectedly), the nice Indian, and Eva, the delicious nineteen-year-old Dutch girl, who gave me a lovely kiss (also unexpected), and Alessandro Falcetta, with a Mediterranean embrace, and the two secretaries, Brenda and Rosemary, and Val Ferguson, who hopes to come to Pendle Hill in 1998. I had no desire to say farewell to the staff (except Claire and Linda) and the feeling was mutual, I'm sure. Anne Thomas told me today that they're all Lesbians and had been distant toward her because she's heterosexual (and of working class background). . . . Forgot to say that yesterday they had a ceremony to thank all the Quakers in Residence and gave each of us a little gift. Chrysanthi made a speech saying how lovely Woodbrooke is, etc. I said nothing. . . . Also forgot to add that my Paradise Lost class had an extra session yesterday to hear projects by Julia and Olga. Poor Julia was petrified and almost inarticulate on liberty in Milton, and we all were relieved when she finished; she was shaking visibly. But Olga was splendid on the allegory of Sin and Death, examining all its nuances, including what Milton took from Spenser, then commenting on the various illustrations I found for her, and finally wondering why in some languages Sin is grammatically feminine, death masculine, while in other languages this is reversed. It was a pleasure to hear her. Pam Lunn, her "staff link," arrived late and left early, without commenting, the Lesbian bitch! . . . So, the overall experience at Woodbrooke this time was mixed at best: wonderful, fascinating students, a quite satisfactory teaching experience for me, but clash with some of the staff and general sadness to see Woodbrooke so apparently rudderless, desperately experimenting with three-week modules that ruin the eleven-week courses. I've been debating whether to write a comprehensive letter to someone (Sheldon, or David Saunders, a trustee). I did say it all to Chris Lawson yesterday and he seemed to be listening, and concluded sadly that probably he has been at Woodbrooke too long, but he is only 57 and cannot get a pension unless he continues to age 60.

To London

Lots of luggage. Train to Euston in the morning. In the afternoon, Daphne took us to Hampstead, where she and Greg hope to move. Charming, like Cambridge (Massachusetts) but too far away. We walked on the heath and along the streets and in the town, finally collapsing into chairs at Häagan-Dazs, where I consumed two coffee milk shakes! (The heat was terrible.) We then went for a coffee in Covent Garden, which was swarming with tourists, entertainers, etc. The café boasted that it was here that Boswell first met Dr. Johnson. Then to Chez Flo next to Westminster Quaker Meeting for a nice French dinner. Greg met us there, having come from tennis. Walked again through Covent Garden to the Aldwych to see Tom Stoppard's latest, Indian Ink. I found it slow, not very theatrical, but Daphne said she liked it better than Arcadia. Although the focus is ostensibly on a British poetess who goes out to India in 1930 and dies there, the true subject, I think, is political: the travesty of empire, with arrogant mediocrities ruling a nation that was civilized a thousand years before England. Also, I think it is an updating of Forster's A Passage to India, which is clearly invoked. The most sardonic touch is the "Club," which doesn't allow Indians to enter and in which the British dance 1920s flappers' steps. There is also satire against pedantry: an American professor who is editing the poetess's letters and is pedantic about the scholia. I saw a little of myself! . . . Home by tube, and saw the startling penultimate game in the Wimbledon female final: 5-all in the last set, with 18 deuces before Steffi Graf finally broke Arantxa Sánchez Vicario's serve and then took the final game at love.

London–Hanover

Slept well despite the heat and despite a party next door that went to 4:00 a.m. Kept half-dreaming about all my complaints against Woodbrooke. Probably I should write a letter and unburden myself. . . . Taxi to Heathrow, very convenient, and porter to check-in, saving all the trouble. It's nice to have money. Had customs stamp the VAT refunds. There was an obnoxious American at the desk who was angry because he couldn't post a pre-paid envelope to Ireland. He kept insisting that Ireland was part of the United Kingdom. . . . Routine flight. Chrysanthi said she felt relieved to be in Boston, in America. I had no such feeling, indeed somewhat the opposite. Knowing that I'll now have to resume multiple responsibilities that had been so deliciously absent the last three months. . . . I keep rewriting and revising in my mind the letter I think I need to write to John Sheldon outlining my negative feelings about Woodbrooke, alas. Piles of mail at home and office, of course. We went to Kendal for supper. Mother looking remarkably well, in a nice summer dress. Big hugs from Gerry and Peter Tailer. Dinner with Bev Webster and Franny and the other pianist. Franny confided, "He hasn't had a drop of liquor for four and a half years!" A miracle. Obviously because he is happy and appreciated. Concerts scheduled all four Saturdays in July. I told him about Leander's deafness, also talked about Andy Rangell. Bev concludes it is psychological. . . . Barbara Gilbert came over, delighted to see us. Afterwards, Chrysanthi went to her "of-face”—she has to begin the Rassias ALPS language program tomorrow morning. Nice to be in our own bed again.

Hanover–Riparius

Left my “zapped” Stylewriter at Kiewit hoping that they can repair it. Bought two dozen bagels for the farm (first things first). Replaced the Cross pencil that Chrysanthi ruined in the laundry at Woodbrooke: $47.00. Then to Kendal for a meeting with Jim Armstrong and Margery Walker to set the agenda. Jim has revised the bylaws and I smell trouble. He wants a clause about Roberts Rules! Afterwards, Lee Huntington telephoned to voice her dismay. Jim also wants the full Board to meet only quarterly and a strong executive committee to function in the intervals. Lafayette called to voice his dismay at this. But there are nice things, too, especially the rapprochement with the Town. Willy Black even led singing at Kendal’s fourth anniversary celebration. Margery regretted Jean Brophy’s outburst at the meeting: “You fired me!” but we all concluded that generally we handled her dismissal well. . . . Lunch afterward at Kendal with Margery and Alan Walker and Mother. . . . Gathered mail from office and house and drove to the farm, arriving around 11:00 p.m. Alec had gone to bed. How lovely to be here! The moon is bright and the place looked beautiful.

Terpni

Alec is all excited about his project to bring electric and telephone to his cabin. The trench is dug and lined with sand already. We laid electric and phone cable from the transformer to the house—that is Alec’s responsibility—and began covering them with six inches of sand. Carson Bunker arrived with another load of sand. Sand is heavy. We shovel from the pile to the wheelbarrow, dump the wheelbarrow and then rake or hoe the sand evenly over the cables. I treated myself to a nap in the afternoon. For supper we went to the Narrows and sat for two hours talking. Alec has had his first real difficulties at school. He opposed the chairman of the trustees re: the two-year policy for teachers, and was more or less reprimanded by Michael and Larry, the school’s founders. On the other hand, the accreditation went well; they were certified for three years, and Alec got a $10,000 increase in salary for next year.

Wednesday, July 12, 1995

Terribly hot. 95 degrees. More shoveling of sand into the upper trench, plus, ironically, shoveling of sand out of the lower trench to get rid of some piles that will impede NiMo when they come. Delicious swim. The pond is now at a perfect temperature, warm enough to enter with ease but cool enough to be refreshing. . . . I'm struggling with the mail. It's strewn all over the living room floor and I've filled a thirty-gallon trash can so far with the junk. We cooked delicious steak outdoors, with mashed potatoes, salad, and beer.

Thursday, July 13, 1995

More shoveling. More heat. Another swim. Mail getting slowly sorted. Bills getting paid. Drove with Alec to Lake George diner for supper, after which he continued to Hanover. He told me about more troubles at school. The business manager had ordered trees cut down and Alec, arriving on a Saturday morning and seeing this happening, put a stop to it, leading to a huge argument afterwards. He is quite sure that Michael and Larry will ask him to leave after next year. Good! From what he says, he'll be looking for jobs here as well as abroad, unless, he says, "my personal life changes"—i.e., a woman enters the picture.

I forgot to enter here the conversation I had with Greg in London. He said that an attractive promotion may be possible for him if he stays in London, and he is tempted, provided that Daphne agrees. Also, they are thinking of starting a family and feel that it would be advantageous to have the baby in England rather than New York—better care during and after. So, although the original plan was to return in August 1996, that may change.

Impossibly hot. I'm suffering from it. I read Bill Clinton's speech at Dartmouth's commencement. He has a gift for humor and for depth. I was very touched. . . . Made myself a good supper of lamb chops on the grill.

But I spent the morning writing my letter to John Sheldon. Eight pages. Very frank, even blunt. I'm sending a copy to David Saunders, for Council is ultimately responsible for the spiritual health of the institution, and another copy to David Gray. Let's see what sort of responses I get, if any. Here it is:

Box 32
Riparius, NY 12862, USA
14 July 1995

John Sheldon, Principal
Woodbrooke College
1046 Bristol Road
Birmingham B29 6LJ, England

Dear John Sheldon,

I have debated for a long time whether to write this letter but feel that I must, since its contents have been haunting me and I want to exorcise them and have done. I write not in anger but in sadness for the state of Woodbrooke as I perceive it. Probably what I say will make you angry, but I hope that it makes you sad instead. Please remember that, despite everything, I value Woodbrooke immensely and am sure that it will prosper in the future. I also value all that you and the other staff are doing to provide a suitable program for your students, and I know that many students— if not most— were extremely satisfied last term. Also please remember that Chrysanthi and I have been coming to Woodbrooke at quite regular intervals since 1955 and have seen it function under many wardens and many teachers in the past—so we have some basis for comparison. Unfortunately, our experience last term was distressing in many ways that I shall explain below. I shall be sending copies of this letter to David Saunders, for I feel that Council is ultimately responsible for the spiritual health of the institution, and to David Gray, for I came to Woodbrooke this time and the last time (1985) in order to replace David, and primarily at his initiative.

There is so much to say. I shall probably make something of a mess, but I'll try to place things in logical categories. Where appropriate, I shall make recommendations for better procedures in the future. With luck some of these recommendations will strike you as justified and will be implemented.

Information sent prior to arrival. As you know, Chris Lawson neglected to send Chrysanthi and me information about the duties of Friends in Residence. You pointed out to me that these duties were described in one paragraph of Pam Lunn's letter to me sent in January, a letter also about my teaching. Fine. The problem is that by the time mid-April arrived I had completely forgotten about this letter. Woodbrooke also sent out a very fine packet of information about travel, what clothing to bring, etc., shortly before the start of term. Recommendation: In the future, send to all FIRs just before arrival, in the packet with travel information, a reminder of their duties. In this way, that information will be fresh.

Rooming. We were assigned Room 68 in Bridge End. We gloried each morning in the view from its two windows out onto the marvelous Woodbrooke garden. However, the room is essentially designed for 1 person, not 2. The second bed barely fit, and—most interestingly—there was only one study table and lamp. This is a statement by Woodbrooke that study is not important. Two people are placed in a room with rudimentary study facilities for only one of them. That is not good. Recommendation: When two people are assigned to a room, make sure that the room contains two desks and study lamps.

I happen to suffer, as do many older men, from an enlarged prostate (fortunately benign so far), which means that I need to rise three to five times each night to urinate. No forms were sent prior to arrival asking if I had any physical disabilities that might affect the location of my room. In the event, room 68 is the furthest away from the loo. In 1985 I was in New Wing, in a room directly across from the loo, and that made these nocturnal journeys much easier. When I mentioned, on the first day, that we had been in New Wing previously (in a room with two study tables, by the way), I was curtly told “We have changed all that.” No one inquired, either before arrival or upon arrival, if perhaps I had any special needs. (I realize that all this was complicated by the installation of a telephone—but if inquiry had been made early on, the location of the telephone could possibly have been adjusted.) Recommendation: Send to all students, FIRs, etc., well in advance, a form asking for details of physical disabilities that might affect rooming assignments.

Money. Our agreement with Chris was that neither Chrysanthi nor I would receive honoraria. Fine. We felt that a full term’s room and board, plus all the amenities of Woodbrooke, were more than ample compensation. When we learned, however, that other FIRs (at least some) did receive honoraria, we wondered what sort of policy this was. I spoke to Chris and he agreed that I should receive an honorarium, but that Chrysanthi should not (still strange). So, I finally did receive £294.53—£450 less £155.47 (!) for telephone installation—for my eleven weeks' teaching.

Recommendation: Determine honoraria for FIRs consistent with budgetary constraints, and then pay these honoraria uniformly, not selectively. Regarding the telephone, first of all it was an extraordinarily useful amenity for me throughout the term and really did make a difference. So I am grateful that the installation could be handled so well by Howard. One might question, however, not only the sizable charge for installation (at least compared to a comparable service in America, which costs $45 or about £28 as opposed to £155) but also the policy of charging me for what has become a permanent addition to the Woodbrooke building and, presumably, an attractive amenity for future FIRs or others who might wish a telephone and could occupy that room. Perhaps a 50-50 split of the cost between Woodbrooke and me might have been more appropriate.

Library. The Woodbrooke library is one of the coziest I have ever experienced, and it has quite an interesting and broad collection of books. In the past I wrote two of my own books in it and fully researched a third. I always worked at one of the desks by the window in the Quaker Library, establishing this as my own little study space where I could leave materials. (This was even more important this time since our room, as noted above, had a study table for only one of its occupants.) In the past, Christina Lawson always used to tell me how pleased she was to see me spending so many hours there, as perhaps an example for others. However, to my amazement this time, when I began to set up my desk, she said that I would be in her way when she needed to shelve books behind me. I went ahead nevertheless. She repeated her demurral. I assured her that if she needed to shelve books I would gladly remove myself at that time. During the course of the 11-week term, only once did such shelving occur. So, my first day at Woodbrooke gave me a distressing message: "Please don't use my library on a regular basis in a fashion that facilitates your study needs, for you'll be in my way." (On the other hand, once Christina understood that I really would remove myself without hesitation whenever the need arose, she accepted my presence graciously, and we had fine relations during the term, including lots of business in which I wrote US dollar checks for her to publishers in America and was reimbursed in sterling.)

Books. We had quite enough conversation and debate about the policy of not having students purchase books, except if the books can be ordered from Friends House. I don't need to repeat here my dismay at this policy and the extremely poor signal that it sends out regarding Woodbrooke's seriousness as a centre for study. It is a shame that this issue had to be debated at such length at Council. It might have been better had you anticipated the difficulty and conferred with both Pam and me prior to Council. But that is easy to say in hindsight. Let me merely repeat what we said when the three of us met: Recommendation: that an arrangement be established with Westhill Book Store whereby students may, in the future, purchase books that teachers feel are needed for a course.

Sociability and friendliness. Now we come to the truly distressing part. Both Chrysanthi and I delighted in the student body this term, made close friends, and were continually stimulated and supported by students. We cannot say the same for the staff. Chrysanthi felt alienated half way through the term and was eager to leave. It is indicative that I went to Val Ferguson, not to anyone on the staff, to ask her to try to encourage Chrysanthi, which of course she did. Chrysanthi made a beautiful little speech at the farewell ceremony for FIRs, but that was mostly an expression of her good, loving nature, an attempt to erase the very real problems she felt during the term.

Not only Chrysanthi and I but also some others—students and FIRs—found the staff distant, cold, indifferent, and basically discourteous. I will give some instances:

—I asked you on three separate occasions to play four-hand piano duets with me. You never responded, not even to say that you wished you could but were too busy. After the third time, I felt it humiliating to ask yet again. With what pleasure I remember the duets that Maurice Creasey and I played (including at epilogue). With you there was nothing comparable.

—You never spoke to either Chrysanthi or me during the term, not once (except perhaps for a “Good Morning” in the corridor). When, in the 10th week you did speak to Chrysanthi she reported to me: “Good God, John Sheldon actually spoke to me!” You and I did speak, of course, after the confrontation in Council, but that was a separate, “official” situation initiated by me (which you handled very well).

—Pam Lunn never once spoke to me during term until I wrote the paragraph to Council about the policy of “No books.” One might have thought that the Director of Studies might be interested in the course I was offering, have asked at some point if I needed anything, or how things were going, or if any of the students was having difficulty, etc. Nothing. Zero communication (except—as always—“officially” in one meeting in which we all were there and spoke about specific students). I’m talking about courtesy and sociability, not about official meetings! One of my students, Olga, did a splendid special project on the allegory of Sin and Death in Milton. Pam was Olga’s staff link, so naturally Olga invited her to the presentation in the final week. Pam arrived late, left early, and said nothing. It was disgraceful. If she is angry at me, there is no reason why she should behave with such discourtesy to her link student. Olga deeply resented it.

—Neither you nor anyone else ever invited Chrysanthi, me, or Anne Thomas to coffee, much less tea or supper. (Oh, yes, Anne was invited once for coffee—by Leonora Wilson, i.e., not by a regular member of the residential program!). With what pleasure we remember eating Pakistani food with our hands with John Punshon and his wife after visiting their home, or John’s antics at the football match to which he took my son, or the lovely weekend we spent in Wales at David Robson’s home, or the many times in the past we took tea with the Lawsons and their children in their home, or the repeated hospitality of Muriel Poulter, or the visits to Tony Brown and his wife to see Tony’s silversmithing, or the pleasure of having David Gray’s daughter Kathy with us for many weeks one summer in America. This means that you and the other staff related to us exclusively as “business,” in your official time “on duty” (and actually did not relate even then, as I noted above). Would it be such a burden to have a FIR to coffee, to try perhaps to get to know him or her as a human being?

—The two working-class students, George Smith and Brian Perry, were treated miserably. George used to tell me that when he passed certain staff members in the hall they would look right through him as though he did not exist. Brian, I remember, once told me, “I said hello to —, and she cut me dead.” Both George and Brian were “difficult” in some ways, I know, but both were also fascinating human beings (especially Brian, who worked as a manual laborer all his life and then put himself through the Open University and came out with a head full of miscellaneous knowledge). They left Woodbrooke with extremely negative feelings.

—Alison Smith, whom I have known for several years owing to her partnership with the late Donald Swann, and whom I saw at the University towards the end of term, told me that she left Woodbrooke in disgust because of the distance and coldness of staff. And Alison is the most vivacious, pleasant, and easygoing of human beings.

—I thought that Linda, the gardener, might be interested in my lecture on “The Literature of Gardens” and asked her if she’d like a copy. She said Yes and I gave her one. Never did she say a word to me subsequently about it—that she had read it, or regretfully had no time to read it, or whatever. Instead, silence. (On the other hand, I did have some human-human communication in other ways with Linda, although it took many weeks before she opened up a bit. She even confided that she had once spent some time as an agricultural laborer on the island of Crete.)

—John Wyatt, in dinner-table conversation, told me at one point that only one student was registered for autumn term. Later, the number was increased by 100% through the registration of Andrea Useem, a Dartmouth student whom I diverted from Pendle Hill to Woodbrooke, thinking that she would receive better training here for her ultimate purpose, which is to serve in some way in Africa. John handled her application very well, going out of his way to make arrangements for her to study Swahili, etc. But never once did he say to me, "How nice of you to have directed her to us. Thanks." Thank yous do not take much energy, but they are very rare at Woodbrooke.

I mentioned some of these complaints to Chris Lawson in his "official"—always official!—debriefing of me the day before term ended. He replied that staff are impossibly busy. This term John Wyatt was away for a month; you had recruiting to do; you had Yearly Meeting; you had the building plans; some people were planning next year's courses; others were negotiating with Selly Oak Colleges, etc., etc. No excuse! It doesn't take a great deal of time or energy to be courteous to those in residence during term. I was very busy, too, by the way. Maybe busier than some of your staff, since I taught the Paradise Lost course, which involved re-reading the text and also about three hours of preparation for each class; edited and sent off to the printer's an issue of The Journal of Modern Greek Studies, researched and wrote the lecture on gardens and literature, lectured twice in Sweden, twice in Norwich, twice in Cambridge, four times on the 10-day Dartmouth tour of Ireland and Scotland, once at Woodbrooke (on gardens), and twice at the University of Birmingham—all of which required revision, shortening, adaptation to different audiences, etc.; and translated a batch of Kazantzakis letters. But when Chris Lawson asked me to read his son Peter's full-length radio script I did so with pleasure, returning it with oral commentary regarding its strengths and weaknesses. Chris also asked me to read George Smith's essay on Quaker education, which I returned with two pages of detailed commentary and suggestions for revision. Chris also gave me Martha Dart's typescript on Marjorie Sykes' writings for vetting, and I then met with Leonard, Martha, and Chris in order to suggest a complete reordering of the material, which was then done and which, according to Martha, improved the book considerably. In addition, Chris asked me to chaperone Professor Kennedy for two days, which I did with pleasure, introducing him along the way to Alessandro Falcetta, since Kennedy is also interested in Rendel Harris. I was never too busy for these extra duties (and pleasures). Also, I played 4-hand duets on many occasions with two students, accompanied Keith, the module student who played recorder, and traveled to Birmingham Central Library to get some Telemann for us to do together. When Brian Perry needed a poem by John Clare that he couldn't find in the Woodbrooke or Central House libraries, I again traveled to the Birmingham Central Library and spent an hour finding it for him, since the quote he had given me was garbled. Regarding Olga's project on Sin & Death, I spent two hours to no avail at the University of Birmingham library trying to find illustrations and then, on the next day, traveled again downtown to the Birmingham Central Library, where I was successful in returning with about 20 splendid illustrations for her. And I brought Alessandro to the University to meet Professor Anthony Bryer, who is obsessed with Rendel Harris. After this interview, Prof. Bryer invited Alessandro to his home (imagine!), showed him a shelf-full of books relating to Harris, and put him in touch with a don at Oxford and another at Cambridge who could help him. I also wrote a mock epic for Log Night, as you know. I did all these extra tasks with pleasure; I was never too busy. But your staff were too busy to say thank you, to invite a person for a cup of coffee, to inquire about progress in a course, and you couldn't spare half an hour to play 4-hand duets! (I must add that there were two exceptions to all this: Stuart Morton actually took time to communicate with me "unofficially" on several occasions, and so did Clare.)

Recommendation: Train your staff to be more courteous and humane.

Meeting for Worship. I and many others found Meeting for Worship dead for most of the term. It did get better towards the end, thankfully. Again, I blame the staff. No one on staff displayed a gift for ministry, or even ministered at all except very infrequently. The only person who possessed this gift and more than once uplifted our spirits was Val. I realize full well that ministry at Meeting is not everything, that silence is at the center. When I say that Meeting was dead I mean the silence, too. This obviously is not something that can be remedied by "planning." It reflects what I perceive as the general lack of spiritual vitality at Woodbrooke. Recommendation: Try simple courtesy first. Maybe true love will then come more easily, and spread its power into Meeting for Worship.

Modules. This comment is not personal, since my Paradise Lost course was not affected by the modules. Only one module student entered my course— Keith, who had read the poem at the University of Toronto under expert guidance and therefore was able to slip into the course without difficulty. But I faithfully attended Anne Thomas's course on the Bible. Anne is a gifted teacher, very well prepared, a hard worker, articulate, enthusiastic. But her course did not go well, and the reason was the modules. Since, following instructions, she planned the curriculum so that each three-week period would have its own integrity, the power and continuity of the eleven-week course was lost. I spoke to her about this; she is the first to agree. What a shame! Recommendation: If possible, allow eleven-week courses to continue without adjustment for the eleven-week students. Plan module courses as separate entities.

Farewell. I shall relate here my very last interaction with staff, just prior to departing for America on Saturday morning, July 8th, because I think it typifies the problem I have tried to describe above in no. 6. On Friday I asked Helen whether I should deposit my master key in the box by the door before leaving and she said that I should give it directly to her instead, adding, "I'll be on duty Saturday morning." On Saturday I therefore left it for her and she said, very kindly, "Thank you." She performed her duty perfectly. But her duty did not call for her to add, "Have a safe trip" or "Goodbye" or "I hope you had a good stay here" or "I hope we shall see you again someday." Perhaps she did not wish to say these things to me. But civilized society has developed certain courtesies that make life more tolerable; we say things "typically" without necessarily meaning them from our heart. Helen's duty produced the "Thank you" for the key but nothing more. She related to me perfectly as "business." Perhaps she felt that goodbyes had been said at the little ceremony—again "business"—held for all the FIRs a day or so earlier. Yes, they had been said "officially," and well said. But "unofficially" there was nothing. So I went out the door with a businesslike "Thank you" for my key but without any connection whatsoever between one human being and another—and this from the tutor for community! No wonder that Alison Smith left Woodbrooke in disgust and that Chrysanthi, I, George Smith, Brian Perry, and others found the staff distant, cold, indifferent, and basically discourteous. One does not get the feeling at Woodbrooke that each and every one of us is cherished for that of God in him or her. Rather, one gets the feeling that we are there for eleven weeks, need to be serviced in various “official” ways, and will be replaced in short order by another group. So, “Thank you” for the key—full stop!

Conclusion. I worry that Woodbrooke, at a time when so much energy is being spent on issues of future construction, is functioning very poorly in what truly matters: the spiritual and intellectual parts of the overall program. There is much Quakerly talk about community and love. But community and love are precisely what are defective.

As I said at the start, this letter will probably make you angry. It is outspoken and direct. I repeat, however, that I hope it makes you sad, not angry, and that it was written out of sadness not anger. I am sad to see a primary centre of Quakerism in such trouble. But I also repeat my general Quaker optimism that things will get better. If my analysis has helped to specify the nature of some of the problems, and if my recommendations help in the amelioration, I will be very pleased and will feel that my distressing term at Woodbrooke was not so bad after all.

Sincerely,
Peter Bien

Woke at 6:00 a.m. because the electricity failed and then a huge storm followed. A deep hum, almost like an earthquake. Furious gusts of wind. The house shaking (just a bit). Bangs downstairs. Sheets of rain spray over my bed, as though I were on the deck of a ship. I feared the ash tree would come crashing down onto the roof, just above me. At 7:00 Joan Morris telephoned. She said it was a tornado. Fifty trees down in their place, she thought. The road is blocked. Trees on top of their car. But they have lots of food. She got through to NiMo and reported the outage. I can't see any significant damage on our place. Just branches down, not whole trees. Lucky. Alec telephoned at 8:30 from Hanover and said the storm is just starting there. It's now 9:00 a.m.; no electricity yet. But a vehicle just passed on the road, going toward the Morrises', so presumably my part of Waddell Road is clear. . . . Later: I drove out to get the mail. Was barely able to get around and under various trees across Waddell Road. Other trees along the highway hung up on the electric wires. At the P.O. Brenda told me that a family had been killed at the Lake Luzerne campsite when a tree fell on their trailer and crushed them. Then the man who lives in Lou Curth's place on River Road said he watched huge pine trees being lifted out of the ground roots and all and toppled, or other trees being stripped of branches and bark in a circular motion by the cyclone. He, like Morris, has uprooted trees strewn everywhere, but no damage to his home or family. Later I took Alec's Stihl and cleared Waddell Road to the highway, and also his path to his cabin, which had a poplar and an alder across it. Chrysanthi called. Luckily the storm bypassed Hanover. . . . All the Morris children visited (or 7 out of 10) to report that they'd cleared their portion and were able to get round the trees leaning against electric wires. At 6:00 p.m. still no current, which makes the outage twelve hours so far. Weather a bit better: 85 instead of 95. Luckily we have the pond, so I was able to get clean and cool. Probably I should buy an electric generator for such emergencies. I hope our food doesn't spoil. I have not opened the freezer; perhaps that's OK. But the fridge is very warm inside. . . . These days I've felt a considerable lassitude. Is it the heat? Age? Need for a holiday? I think it's mostly the heat. . . . The mail keeps arriving. Fortunately all the stock reports are encouraging—large gains everywhere in this surging market. But what happens next?

To Hanover

Two days after the storm and still no electricity. And last night there was another lightning storm with heavy rain (but no wind) and the restored transformer in Wevertown was hit by lightning. No power yet in Riparius, on River Road, etc. The company claims that they had 200,000 customers without current and that 90% are now with current. We obviously are the remaining 10%. Last night we cooked all the chicken and hamburger that had defrosted in the freezer and made a mess trying to dispose of the "frozen" yoghurt, which was a gluey syrup that spilled all over the floor. We also cooked potatoes and corn in the open fire, drank wine, and were well fed. On Sunday we went to the Chester Diner but they had run out of food. Then to Warrensburg, which didn't seem affected. We ate in the Chinese restaurant and were even able to get some bottled water at the Grand Union. We've been using the kerosene lantern at night. I'm tempted to resurrect the old two-burner kerosene stove we used at first. It's still in the barn, but perhaps filled with mice nests. Why didn't I buy a portable generator all these years?

Spent most of yesterday reading all the material that had accumulated from Kendal, much of it encouraging, and I wrote out a little "ministry" about the rationale for Quaker silence, which I hope to use tomorrow. Also got my office cleaned up, trimming dead branches off the oak and yellow birch and tarring the wounds. Black flies ferocious. But then came a delicious swim.

In Hanover, supper with John Diffey, Jim Armstrong, Andy Burgess, and Ed Flaccus discussing how best to foster Kendal's Quaker character. We agreed that the crucial factor will be who is chosen as the next Executive Director. Andy and Ed will try to draw up a list of areas in which Kendal should be different because it is Quaker. Afterwards to the Hanover Inn for a drink with John Diffey. He confided that he would like to become Executive Director of Kendal at Hanover but it is too early in his career and he still has goals to reach where he is. We discovered that Jean Brophy, when instructing new staff about Quakerism, had Chris Huntington, the Catholic priest, do it, and Chris told them that Quakers call people by their first names! What a travesty! Spoke with Betty Barnett, the new Director of Nursing, who said what a joy it is to work under Jim Armstrong (instead of Jean). John and I agreed that we had gotten rid of Jean very "smoothly." She didn't threaten a lawsuit and she didn't even get, or request, severance pay.

Hanover

Trustees' meeting. Chief problem was Jim Armstrong's desire to include Robert's Rules of Order in the bylaws. I spoke vigorously against this, as did others, but it was Harry Bird who saved the day by saying that when the Rules are used no one ever understands them. So we won on this issue, preserving the Quaker style of business procedure. The other contention was over Jim's wording of the duties of an executive committee, strongly opposed by Lafayette. We agreed to rethink this one. I'll give him alternative wordings and we'll see what happens. . . . Afterwards, Search Committee: John Hennessey, John Diffey, Margery Walker, Loraine Deisinger. Lee Huntington and Joan McKinley absent. Among the applicants are Richard Bewley and John Clancy. I said that Richard is extremely likeable, etc. but not as bright as I would have hoped. Loraine agreed. John Clancy always made a good impression but we wonder why he doesn't seem able to hold a job. So far there are fifty-odd applications of which at least fifteen seem qualified on paper. . . . To the dentist. Red Logan died of cancer, poor man. . . . To the office. Bill Cook passed me. I said a warm hello and he muttered "Hello" and kept on walking. Such are the greetings one receives from one's chairman after a three-month absence. But Pat McKee and Jim Heffernan were very different. . . . Chrysanthi's students put on a play tonight and then Chrysanthi went with them (the two seminarians) to C & A's for pizza and beer, offered free by the restaurant. John Rassias telephoned to say how superb Chrysanthi had been these past ten days. Hardly surprising! . . . Called Alec. . . . Still no electricity.

To Riparius

Drove back, listening to Daniel Defoe's History of the Plague in London. Fascinating. Arrived to find the electricity restored. Alec says it came on at 12:30 p.m. That makes our outage 106 hours. All refrigerated food spoiled, of course. But we escaped very well, luckily. . . . Alec has finished the 6-inch layer of sand in the entire trench. Backbreaking work.

Thursday, July 20, 1995

More shoveling, this time to place a layer of dirt, without rocks, above the sand in Alec's trench, to cushion the rocks that will enter when Carson Bunker fills the trench with his bulldozer. Hard work. I am out of shape, flabby, a bit fat. The pond is a delicious sequel. . . . Perrymans came after supper. I was distressed, as in previous years, by their lack of curiosity. Not a single inquiry regarding our travels or our children or our careers. Instead, endless recital of the accomplishments of their son Arthur, son-in-law Mike, etc. I had to struggle not to fall asleep. Also, the class differences are interesting. They are perfectly content to have Arthur go to Adirondack Community College.

Friday, July 21, 1995

Supper with Fran and Irv Shapiro. What a difference! They wanted to hear all about Japan, about Woodbrooke, about the garden tour, to see our photos, etc. Irv showed his latest paintings, very striking in color (but really deficient in drafting technique, reflecting lack of training). He is self-propelled (as Muriel Poulter says I am) whereas Art Perryman is not; again, he did very little all year, except add to his house and buy more land. Very severe blow-down behind Irv's house. It's amazing that we escaped.

Saturday, July 22, 1995

Serendipity. Don Kurka telephoned: Did I want to go to the ballet with him and Marian Morse? Of course. So off we went to the matinee on the final day. Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 2 (Balanchine), quite traditional, with beautiful alternation of solo dances and corps de ballet to reflect solos and tuttis in the music. Kyra Nichols very engaging; Philip Neal huge and athletic. Then "Ash"—music by Michael Torke, modified minimalist with relentless driving energy, choreographed by Peter Martins, danced by his son Nilas and Wendy Whelan, with lovely costumes: postmodern yet aesthetic. Then a short Balcony Scene from Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet, a love-dance choreographed by Sean Lavery. Finally: Firebird, 50th anniversary of the 1945 revival, using Marc Chagall's 1945 scenery and costumes. Three Chagall paintings as big as the whole stage, in spectacular reds and blues. What a pleasure! Also nice to share with Don Kurka our revulsion against deconstruction. He admits that he is having a blockage: doesn't know what to paint any more. Is discouraged by the postmodern denigration of illusion, the basis of art's enduring power. . . . A swim. Then to North Creek motel restaurant to celebrate Alec's birthday. I gave him an electronic device meant to scare away mice (his roof is infested) plus an anthropological study of Java under the old kings and the Dutch. Tortoras arrived by chance. Their daughter, now an M.D. in Alaska, had, I believe, a brief affair with Alec years ago. . . . I faxed to Daphne the blurb I wrote for Doug Gwyn's book.

Sunday, July 23, 1995

Daphne faxed back very good suggestions for revising the blurb: more "punch," shorter sentences, a "teaser" to hook the reader. The professional at work! . . . Today she and Greg will walk in Camden Town a bit to see if they favor that house (at £450 a week) instead of the one in St. John's Wood at £700 a week. Let's hope so. The third choice is Hampstead, too far away. . . . I revised the blurb and Daphne liked it. She and Greg walked in Camden Town and decided against that house because it fronts the back of a supermarket. . . . To Meadowmount with Irv and Fran and also David Frost, who was with Jane O'Connell. David lost his wife last November. She was blind and had one leg amputated and needed dialysis three times a week, and then had a stroke, so the death was a blessing, in a way. He is still rewriting and ghostwriting biological articles, now especially ones from Japan: he has done 500 so far. Jane is teaching, mostly composition, at Paul Smith's. Meadowmount program was disappointing: all technique in the first half: a brilliant young violinist, age 18, doing the Sibelius Concerto, such terrible music, at least when heard with piano reduction of the orchestral part. But it showed off all possibilities of violinistic technique. Then a twenty-year-old Korean girl played Ysaye's Sonata, again pure show, nothing else, followed by a medley from Carmen, which at least had some familiar melodies. The second half was Brahms's 3rd piano trio, with the piano overpowering the strings and the whole thing jerky and unmusical. But it's still nice to see the concentration and skill (at least technical) of young people.

Tuesday, July 25, 1995

12:50 p.m. Alec has electricity! Everything is happening at once today. Carson Bunker is filling the trench with his bulldozer; the phone company hooked up the line at the pole, but it still needs to be hooked up at the house; the electric company connected ingoing and outgoing wires at the transformer, hooked up to the pole, installed the meter. With beating hearts we watched Alec plug in a lamp. And it lighted! First use: my present of the electric device to scare away mice.

Wednesday, July 26, 1995

Alec was so lucky that all the workmen came yesterday, for today it rained most of the day, hard, and work was impossible. I was in my "office" in the lightning and thunder, reading galley proofs for JMGS 13 (2), a huge job, for this issue is extensive. Also wrote thank-yous to Meg and Bryer and Tziovas. And I keep thinking about Woodbrooke. By now my letter will have reached John Sheldon, David Saunders, and David Gray. Will I get responses?

Friday, July 28, 1995

Chinese dinner with Shapiros and then a splendid production of Rigoletto at the Lake George opera with a very convincing Rigoletto, the tragic figure condemned to make people laugh. But the real hero is Verdi. This was his first truly great opera, and it's easy to see why. . . . Leander's friend and colleague Jim Tombe was again the percussionist. I enjoyed talking with him in the interval.

Saturday, July 29, 1995

Spent all day writing letters to JMGS contributors, bringing the file up to date. Very hot again, but a delicious swim helps. . . . Read Baudelaire's great prose poem in TLS: ¶ Cette vie est un hôpital où chaque malade est possédé du désir de changer de lit. Celui-ci voudrait souffrir en face du poêle, et celui-là croit qu'il guérirait à côté de la fenêtre. Il me semble que je serais bien là où je ne suis pas, et cette question de déménagement en est une que je discute sans cesse avec mon âme. [déménagement = moving one's furniture, house-moving, poêle = stove]

Monday, July 31, 1995

On Saturday while I was flossing, a gold 'on-lay' flew out of my mouth, one of those superb jobs done by the Madison Avenue dentist fifty years ago and admired ever since by all dentists who have looked into my mouth. This morning it was re-glued by a Dr. Berman in Warrensburg who turns out to be a great reader of English literature who studied Joyce and T. S. Eliot at Johns Hopkins but prefers George Eliot. We had a pleasant dental session sharing our literary enthusiasms. . . . Last night, Tom Akstens was here for supper. How nice to discuss Antigone and compare our reactions to Rigoletto. He is still miserably exploited at Siena College but at least has a job, and keeps writing book reviews and articles, including pieces for Adirondack Life on fly-casting, for which he is a professional instructor, and combining this with English literature. . . . Worked some more on Redmont's essay advocating "temperance" (i.e., moderation, not abstinence) among Quakers, regarding wine especially. I'm shortening it and making it more coherent and also more tolerant of the opposing view, with the hope of resubmitting it to the Pendle Hill Publications Committee and finally getting it passed. Since I solicited this at the start, I feel a continuing responsibility. . . . Alec flies tonight at midnight to Seoul and then Jakarta. All signs are that this will be his last year at North JIS.

I keep worrying about the letter I sent to Woodbrooke, and I'm annoyed, and somewhat surprised, that I have not received an answer from any of the three people to whom it was sent.

Tuesday, August 1, 1995

Dan Seeger arrived and we immediately went for a delicious swim. Then to Olmsteadville to supper with Mary and Maureen. Lots of good conversation as always. I tried to give Maureen the "other side" of the Enola Gay controversy. She, having been in the service, of course assumed that the bomb had saved countless American lives and was therefore entirely justified. Afterwards, Dan and I began playing over our "repertoire": Persichetti, Arensky, Schumann, Bizet, Debussy. Also did Bach's Little Preludes and Fugues on the harmonium, with Dan playing the pedal part. We'll save the Schubert Fantasia for tomorrow.

Wednesday, August 2, 1995

I showed Dan my letter to Woodbrooke. I wonder what he really thinks: perhaps that I am a prima donna, or a crank. He told me about Rebecca Mays's affair with Chuck Fager and Chuck's difficulty in extricating himself from her cloying grip. And David Frederick, the fund-raiser, was sexually harassing his secretary. Dan wishes that Denny would leave, so he could select his own management team. Also, he vowed to me that in his last two years he is going to try to reestablish a hierarchical authority so that the present situation, in which mediocrity hires mediocrity, will cease. We played duets again in morning and afternoon. For supper we cooked a delicious sirloin on the fire outside. Chrysanthi left at 7:30 to go folk dancing. When she returned at 9:30 Dan and I were still at table, having talked continuously in the interval and never getting round to desert. Nice! Then we played the Schubert Fantasia, and not badly either, except for the final page.

Thursday, August 3, 1995

Dan left after breakfast, headed to Bath, Maine, to visit Liz Kamphausen and her parents. I returned to my office to work on the Middleton volume. The essays require massive copyediting, and it is slow going. Among other things, I completely rewrote the first three pages of Middleton's introduction, in order to remove the gush and the illogicalities. Let's hope he doesn't resent this.

Friday, August 4, 1995

In the afternoon, to Glens Falls to buy a refrigerator for Alec. It took four hours, but at least we ended with a purchase. . . . Drove up to René's restaurant to see the storm damage. Four large white pines along the road, each one snapped in two about thirty feet up, with the jagged stump remaining. Extraordinary. . . . Supper (last night) with Evelyn and Asa Rothstein, and Shapiros. Their daughter was there; her son was thrilled at Kinhaven when Leander sat in for Brenda in his chamber piece. Asa, although retired, still goes to international conferences, mostly to be honored by his former students and co-workers. . . . Leander arrived after supper, after three days at Cavendish practicing with Ignat. The Grosse Fugue is "impossible," he tells me; their hands get in each other's way. He wants to practice these intertwining parts with me. He is full of admiration for Ignat's intellect, how he analyzes every detail of the music, but not so enthusiastic about his politics, which are ultra-conservative. His career is spectacular: he plays the Brahms piano concerto with the Philadelphia orchestra next month in both Philadelphia and New York, then makes his Carnegie Hall debut. How nice! Leander said that Alexander Solzhenitsyn removed seven hundred cartons of books to Russia, but that hundreds more still remain in Cavendish, which the family hopes will someday become a Solzhenitsyn museum. . . . Leander had a good time with Alec in Washington. He tells us that Alec is now in love with his Indonesian secretary, Emma. That is very complicated. Leander and Deanna arranged a supper with a friend of Alec's, a former teacher at JIS now living in Washington. It was cordial. But Leander concludes that a deeper relationship is out of the question, because Alec requires a woman who has no "agenda" of her own except serving and following Alec. Alas!

Saturday, August 5, 1995

Worked all day on the journal and Middleton. Leander left early for Ithaca, to attend his friend Todd's (the ornithologist) wedding, dressed in a $450 designer suit that he proudly bought for $89.00. . . . We went to Gary and Wendy McGinn's for supper and then to a concert at the Word of Life Inn, together with Marcus's and Katie's piano teacher, a woman who has a music-ED degree from Syracuse University and loves English literature. What an experience! This is another world, another culture. The facility is posh: saunas, swimming pool, restaurant, auditorium, beautiful lounges, tennis courts. People come from far and near to stay in the hotel rooms or cottages at $90.00 a day and be with others of the “saved.” Almost immediately we met Jack Woertzen, the founder. He had a strange looking man in tow and announced to us that this individual had just found Jesus. Hallelujah! Also that Mr. So-and-so, a distinguished man, had found the Lord yesterday. Amen! The concert was a solo “recital” by the founder’s son, Don (or Dan) Woertzen, on a huge Steinway concert grand with a microphone stuck into its soundboard. He started with an adaptation of the Ode to Joy theme from Beethoven’s 9th: hideous; piano with percussion accompaniment. Then he told jokes in a patter—a sacred Victor Borge without the latter’s true wit. Then he expanded on his training, given the Lord’s gift of musicality (!). Obviously he’d had classical training from a teacher who, he enthused, played all 48 Bach preludes and fugues by heart as well as all the Beethoven piano sonatas. But his own playing (essentially by ear) was mechanical. Bang bang! No musicality whatever to sweeten that extraordinary technique and self-assurance. Then he read bloopers from church bulletins—e.g., “Today’s sermon: the meaning of Hell. Come early to hear our choir practice.” Or: “Ceremony today in both the north and south transepts. Babies will be baptized at both ends.” And so forth. Then he played the organ processional (on the piano) that he had written for one of his children’s weddings, very organistic actually, better than the soupy tin-pan-alley piano stuff. Then he played songs he had written, no words, just the music (but the audience knew the words). Then we all sang “He is exalted . . . as head over all,” repeatedly, rising for the last verse. Then he did a sort of skit, getting a non-musician to take a lesson by repeating a note three times, to which Woertzen provided a full accompaniment. Finally, he announced that before his last number (thank God!) he would testify, whereupon he told us his life story: how successful he had been, with home, car, monthly salary, etc., and how at age 40 he realized that none of this meant anything because our lives here mean nothing—the only meaning is after death. Thus in our lives here we must be united with Jesus, who guarantees us “passage” to beatitude—who saves us. (This confirms my own sense that it’s very hard to be a Christian if one does not believe in the afterlife.) Oh, I forgot that earlier he had read a poem of praise, a eulogy, for his father. The father concluded the evening by leading us in prayer. But the prayer consisted of information about all the important people who were coming this next week, including the director's children, etc. What does all this mean? Primarily, I think, "family values." (Therefore homophobia, horror at abortion.) It's a sort of repetition of the primitive church: a refuge in a time of decadence.

Speaking of decadence, Dan Seeger is convinced that we'll become a third-world nation and that the rich will get richer, the poor poorer, that the working class will be marginalized because labor will be done in Indonesia, etc., where it is cheap.

Sunday, August 6, 1995

Finally found George Syrimis in Cyprus. I've never received his galley proofs. Now he tells me that he sent them to Woodbrooke. . . . I'm glad I wrote to John Chioles saying that I should be replaced as editor after one more year—i.e., after I complete my second three-year term.

Wednesday, August 9, 1995

Leander is working hard on the Grosse Fugue for his Washington four-hand concert with Ignat Solzhenitsyn. It's devilishly difficult, mainly because the two players get in each other's way so frequently. Thus Leander has asked me to play the primo (Ignat's part) in those places, and we repeat and repeat until he develops strategies (sotto, sopra, quick release of a note, etc.) to avoid a clash. It's great fun. Incredibly complex music written by Beethoven late in life. . . . We have also read over all the other pieces on the program: Marches, a sonata, two schools of variations. What a pleasure to play with Leander as my partner, and what a contrast with Dan.

Wednesday, August 16, 1995

Finished mowing the south field. That's it for this summer. Και του χρόνου! Off to Hanover. Supper in Lake George diner with Leander, who then returned. Arriving at 12 Ledyard Lane we encountered two skunks on the front lawn. Luckily we didn't startle them and they wandered off.

Hanover

Stewardship meeting, 8:00 a.m. We're gearing up for fundraising, hoping to get $200,000 a year to reach $1,000,000 by 2000 for assistance for monthly and entrance fees. Wayne Broehl and Treat Arnold have joined the committee. I'm going to rewrite the Mission Statement as a Case Statement for the committee. . . . Long meeting afterwards with Jim Armstrong and John Hennessey. The search for the CEO now has seven shortlisted but Bob Shaughnessy is one of these, so the effective number is really six. Richard Bewley and John Clancy are still in the running. Interviews occur next week, after which only two or three will be shortlisted and will come to Kendal for visits. . . . We worried about the tax appeal to the Supreme Court. Bob Reno feels (a) that we'll lose, (b) that the IRS will then attack us. He advises working with legislators for more favorable laws. Neil Castaldo has not produced amici curiae so far, which is worrisome. But John H. still hopes we'll proceed. Jim and I are on the fence. We'll let Debbie Cooper produce our brief and submit it, however. . . . To the dentist afterwards. Red Logan died. I now have Dr. Neal. She says this tooth will need a crown. Cost: $650, and we now have no dental insurance. . . . Had Middleton disks all converted to Mac Word 5.1 so I can now work with them. . . . Got Mother and returned to the farm, thank goodness. Hanover seems so suburban. Dogs bark all night. You can't find a parking place. But it's still marvelously convenient and beautiful.

Friday, August 18, 1995

Leander picked Deanna up at Albany airport last night, stayed over in a motel, and arrived this noon. Deanna looking very fresh and attractive. . . . I ordered Haydn sonatas, which Leander says are best if I want to start learning a solo piece. . . . Spent the morning doing another draft of the Redmont essay on Quaker temperance. Now it goes to him for approval. I'll try to submit it to Pendle Hill's Publication Committee again if Rebecca allows. Also two days ago wrote a review of the new biography of Graham Greene by Norman Sherry, who paints Greene as a malicious hypocrite, anti-Catholic, anti-Semitic, deceptive, a complete sham morally, an ogre. I spoke of Proust on Vinteuil: the separation of the art and the life.

Tuesday, August 22, 1995

Leander, Deanna, and Yiayia left yesterday after a pleasant visit. Yiayia in fine shape, body and spirit, enjoyed the sun, read Thomas Hardy, painted with Chrysanthi (although she says she can't paint any more, prefers playing the violin), and slept soundly in our living room. Deanna one afternoon practiced Brahms' violin concerto and Bach unaccompanied suites in the barn, with the sound wafting across the field to me in my office: very nice. Leander practiced well: Grosse Fugue, other Beethoven four-hand pieces for the October concert with Ignat, plus lots of Czerny and Clementi. And we did all of my four-hand repertoire together plus the new Dello Joio and Stravinsky's five easy pieces, with Leander able to play the hard part, of course. Perfect Stravinsky. And we did a marvelous Ravel "Beauty and the Beast." He suggested Haydn sonatas if I want to start learning solo repertoire, which I do. . . . Last night listened again to Leander's "Prelude and Caper for Brass Trio and Piano," this time with the score, which makes a huge difference. It's sophisticated and playful and, I would think, very difficult to play well. He's a capable composer. I wish he'd do more. Also listened again, with score, to the Grosse Fugue played by the Budapest String Quartet. Such a forbidding piece. I didn't like it at first; it seems to have no soul, to be a hypertrophy of intellect. But I'm getting to like it better as I listen again. The instruments are almost indistinguishable (except the cello) for they keep crossing each other in register (which explains why Leander and Ignat are always in each other's way). . . . Working well and extensively on the Middleton book. Mailed Jeter two days ago and Bak yesterday and am ready to mail Dombrowski today. In quality they are A, B, C+, alas, with Dombrowski's now in forth draft, still very disjointed. But he probably can't do any better. . . . Artemis Leontis sent the sweetest letter in response to my declaration to John Iatrides that I should step down as journal editor after my sixth year (1996). Artemis begs me not to, and says nice things about the journal. Eva Konstantellou telephoned for the same reason. It's nice to be "stroked" like this occasionally. I certainly don't get any strokings from Chrysanthi. . . . Our new mower, a Troy-Bilt, is working well. It took me an entire day to assemble it. Leander cleared out the patch beneath the old carriage shed and now we can look through the remaining trees and see the north field unobstructed. Last night a deer was there, staring back at us. . . . Daphne and Greg have completed their move to Christchurch Street, off King's Road in Chelsea. Sloane Square tube again. Daphne says she loves the street, which is "villagey." The neighbors are friendly and talkative, and the Royal Hospital Gardens are adjacent, a sort of private park for them, not to mention the river and Embankment a block away. She laments that we're not coming at Christmas. But I've already booked our tickets for March. . . . Yesterday saw a tiny spider, no bigger than the head of a pin, paralyze and kill a large ant,  $\frac{3}{8}$ " long at least, and drag it away. . . . Healthwise, my left foot is hurting again and I'm using the protective shield that Dr. Helms made for me. And last week I had pain in my right hip joint for two days. Arthritis? Urination problem a bit worse, too. Otherwise, fine. Lots of energy. Sleep well. Work well.

Friday, August 25, 1995

Finished editing Jerry Gill's essay on Kazantzakis and Kierkegaard: very moving. But I had to add lots of facts—e.g., Kazantzakis's use of Kierkegaard's aesthetic-ethical-religious material in his Odyssey. . . . Redmond replied. He likes my revision of the Quaker moderation essay. Now let's see if we can get it past the PH Publications Committee on the third try.

Saturday, August 26, 1995

Al and Mary Zalon are at the Shapiros. We had supper all together and then all came here and we played Telemann, Bach, and Mozart, not too well, of course, and had Chrysanthi's apple strudel for dessert. Laura and Michael Gouthreau came, too. All very pleasant. . . . Leander and Deanna left early this morning and telephoned from Potomac eight hours later. Leander cleared the area in what used to be the carriage shed; it now looks very nice. We can see out to the north field.

Sunday, August 27, 1995

An interesting day. 8:30 a.m. to 10:00 a.m., worked some more on Gill's essay. 10:00 a.m. to noon, played more Bach, Mozart and Loeillet with Al, much better. The second movement of Mozart's flute concerto is lovely. We did the other concerto in toto also. 1:00 p.m. to 4:30 p.m., took out a rock in the north field; seeded the entire area dug up for Alec's electricity; harrowed it all with the tractor. Shower. 5:00 p.m. to 7:30 p.m. went to Art Perryman's cabin, on the way out stopping to watch a heron sitting on our road very placidly and looking back at us. Art's annual barbecue. Long talk with Jim Smith about possibility for a North Creek library. Met Wayne Schoonmaker, the pastor of their church. He trained in Philadelphia Baptist Bible College. Couldn't really get a conversation going with him, but it was good to meet. Perrymans' daughter Arlene there with husband Michael and infant daughter. Also John Armstrong, whom I mistook for Richard Stewart, which he did not appreciate. Walking back to Art's cabin, saw the devastation from the storm. Terrible. 7:30 to 8:30 p.m. walked down to Alec's beaver pond to see if he had any storm damage. None. What a lovely property he has. Then a good cup of coffee freshly brewed; then a nap on the couch. Then e-mail session; Gill's revised text sent off to Darren; letters sent to Flinders University officials, lamenting decision to eliminate one position in Modern Greek. Poor Leo; he's being besieged.

Friday, September 1, 1995

Leslie English arrived for the weekend with a "serious boyfriend" named Ira. He works for IBM and makes beer and mead (!) as a hobby. Nice man. Very considerate guests. They pitched a tent in the pole barn. We went to Tom Akstens for a luscious supper. A woman friend was there; she's a music impresario, knew about Charlie, etc. Tom has a TV disk and can see 300 channels—in Baker's Mills!

Sunday, September 3, 1995

Finished copyediting Middleton's on Whitehead yesterday. Now I have only Kamperidis's, and to write my own. Today I spent six hours at the computer making a composite list of references for the book. What tedium, but it has to be done. Changed clothes afterwards and finished putting the tractor up for the winter. . . . Alec wrote that he's going to Beijing for a conference, then to Singapore for another. He's in his element. . . . Kendal interviews are finished. The committee meets next week to select the short list. Sherrie told me she wishes they could have Jim Armstrong for ten years. What a relief to have Jean out of there. . . . Mother felt dizzy yesterday and was taken to the nursing area. Our friend Ann Wentworth telephoned, said it was probably a mild stroke but that she is fine now; heart perfect; just tired. How nice she's in Kendal for both her sake and ours.

This poem was in the TLS, 11 August, p. 10, very fine: "A Postmodern Hymn to Obscurity":

In the beginning was the light and the light was life and the light was with life and by light were all things made and the light shone in darkness and the darkness knew it and lectured on it and light died before the uncreating word.
 So darkness lectured on darkness to darkness and the darkness saw that it was good.

—Alasdair Gray

Supper again with Mary and Maureen, who are always good company. I showed Maureen a letter from John Tallmadge, whom she knew as Dean when she was doing her Ph.D. at the Union Institute.

Tuesday, September 5, 1995

The final week, alas. Supper with Perrymans, followed by tour of the new rooms in their house, their son very taciturn, as always. . . . I'm working now on my own essay for the Middleton volume.

Thursday, September 7, 1995

Final supper with the Shapiros. Mrs. Morris, having ignored us all summer, invited us tonight and we said No.

Friday, September 8, 1995

To Hanover

Final rituals: draining water, dismantling my office, and the rest. Back to Hanover. Felitsa is in the house still.

Saturday, September 9, 1995

To Kendal, and supper with Mother, who is tired after her "episode" (probably a minor stroke) but otherwise OK. She had very good treatment and is so happy to be at Kendal.

Today started at 10:00 a.m. at John Hennessey's house. He brought me up to speed re: the Kendal search committee. They have two lead candidates and two back-ups (one of whom is Richard Bewley). Mother will be taking Jack Coleman's ILEAD course on Thomas Hardy. I'll give her my Hardy lecture from the Book of the Month Club cruise.

Long meeting with Jim Armstrong at Kendal followed by John Hennessey. We planned the visits of the two candidates.

Tuesday, September 12, 1995

Holly Parker came. She'll be doing an English Honors with me on Joyce and Kazantzakis, classicism and romanticism. Saw Elaine Gaylor after many years. Also Brock Brower. Met with Dave Montgomery and Gene Lyons to plan War/Peace University Seminars series on socialistic critique of capitalism, Dave's "thing."

Thursday, September 14, 1995

Doctor Brannen tells me that I have cataracts in both eyes, but very minimal so far. Also, the pressure is up again, and my eyesight degenerated considerably in only six months. I need a new prescription. None of this is encouraging, obviously. . . . I did the "reception" for Peace Studies. More students this year than ever before. . . . Conference call on our appeal to the Supreme Court. Neil Castaldo has been unable to secure amici curiae and we are therefore discouraged, although I found Debbie Cooper's brief quite cogent. John Hennessey, who was #1 pro is now #1 con, feeling that the gesture should be made by a group of hospitals, with more clout. And Bob Reno, the old pro at NH law, tells us that we will lose. We agreed to wait until early October, when the Town's brief will be available, before deciding.

Friday, September 15, 1995

Pendle Hill

To Philadelphia via US Air alas, the Montrealer having been discontinued. Pendle Hill so lively and friendly and vital compared to Woodbrooke. The first face I saw was George Smith's, visiting from England, together with the two Friends in Residence who had been at Woodbrooke, too. Played Dello Joio and Ravel with Dan after ice cream. He is still embattled, feeling that he is hampered from leading. And à propos at supper Chris Ravndal went on at length about consensual vs. hierarchical governance. So, nothing has changed. Also, there are only 20 students. And last year, with 30 students, still produced a deficit. The new dean, Margaret Frazier, is aware of all the problems. We had a long talk about my sense that the modular system at Woodbrooke won't work. She has a better version of it, copied from Earlham School of Religion.

Monday, September 18, 1995

The annual lobster dinner at Kendal. Very jolly. Ate with Mother, and John and Barbara Gilbert. Then Chrysanthi and I went to the Harvard-Radcliffe Club to hear Dr. Plume, clinic head, on problems of medical distribution, taking John Diffey along. Plume had been a cub scout in Nardi Campion's troop.

Tuesday, September 19, 1995

Kendal Board. Candidates start coming tomorrow. John Hennessey is very angry because Treat Arnold was accepted into membership last April and hasn't appeared once. . . . Supper at Sweet Tomatoes with Chuck and Trix Officer. The "penultimate supper," as he called it, for he goes into hospital on Thursday for by-pass surgery. Mortality is only 1%, so his chances are splendid . . . yet he's frightened. (We learned all about such things as mortality rates from Dr. Plume last night.)

Wednesday, September 20, 1995

Terry Lowd, our first candidate, is here. Dan, he, and I toured the facility at 4:00 p.m. First time I'd been in the boiler room. Terry is affable, picked up people's names easily, but generally is not very "alive," strangely. I'm surprised that the Search Committee valued him so highly. Long supper at the Inn afterwards.

Thursday, September 21, 1995

Terry Lowd all day at Kendal. We met with him again at 4:30 p.m. He desperately wants the job (he's now unemployed), but Cara told me that he is very low on the staff's list; he seems to be something of a male chauvinist, and one informant told us that he is a womanizer. But he lacks electricity. . . . Stewardship meeting in the morning. Wayne Broehl is with us now. Very eager about fund-raising.

Sunday, September 24, 1995

I gave a class on William Penn at Meeting, swatting it up last week, mostly on the plane to and from Pendle Hill. He seems much more remarkable than I'd ever realized. . . . Felitsa and Sheldons for supper. I toasted καλορίζικο for Felitsa's new house. She slept there for the first time last night.

Monday, September 25, 1995

Lunch with Ned Perrin. He's still grieving for Anne. Taking an antidepressant that causes impotence. But teaching in Environmental Science and hoping to write two books, one "An Almost Perfect Marriage," another on the new electric car he hopes to drive all the way to Colorado. His writings about Anne's death have advertised him as an eligible bachelor; he was approached by a Mrs. Roosevelt, former chief of protocol in the Bush White House, to have lunch in Washington.

The second candidate arrived, Stephen Fleming, head of Friends Homes West, Greensboro, aged 31. What a difference! He knows the business inside-out, is full of electricity and life. But can we get him? He worries about the cultural change living in the North. He kept insisting on calling me Dr. Bien.

Tuesday, September 26, 1995

More with Fleming. Everyone loves him. John H. and Margery Walker will visit Greensboro next week and try to convince him not to pull out. . . . I finally reached Kamperidis in Istanbul, thanks to Selen Ünsal's help with phone numbers. His is the only essay still not ready. He mailed it, he says, last week.

Wednesday, September 27, 1995

Music started. Played Kuhlau trio, very nice, and Haydn and Martinu. Kamperidis's essay arrived. I finished "God's Struggler"!

Thursday, September 28, 1995

Mailed "God's Struggler" to Mercer University Press and to Darren Middleton. Celebrated by eating a hamburger with John Lincoln and Marianne Best at the Inn during a meeting re: ILEAD. . . . Attended James Breeden's farewell ceremony. Very warm testimonials. He was shafted by the provost, it seems. I'm now on the Search Committee for his successor. . . . Dinner at the Indian restaurant with Chrysanthi and Felitsa so Chrysanthi wouldn't have to cook after cooking for 110 homeless people in Lebanon. Then Felitsa took us for strudel and espresso. Very fancy. Then laughed with Benny Hill.

Saturday, September 30, 1995

Trying to catch up. Making more tapes for Demotic Greek. Filling out recommendations for students. Catching up on journal correspondence.

Hoping to clear away some of the piles of papers still on our bedroom floor. Went to Poverty Lane orchard to get apples and see some autumn color.

Sunday, October 1, 1995

Terpni

Magnificent color around Killington: whole mountainsides of red. Farm beautiful. Grass I planted on Alec's trench is growing, although spotty in places. I pruned the fruit trees. We picnicked on the porch. Alvin Millington drove up, hunting partridge and grouse. Says he surveys the property every so often. Walked the logging path to the swamp to see if there was any storm damage. Minimal, although the path needs clearing again. Nap. Nice supper in Whitehall: Italian.

Monday, October 2, 1995

Met with Bruce Pipes. He and the provost's office will take over the university seminars, but he wants me to remain as a partner for the foreseeable future. . . . Wrote a long letter to Δημήτρης Γουνελάς exploring further his invitation for me to teach in Thessaloniki next autumn. Will I get paid? Housing? . . . Long telephone talk with Lloyd Lewis. Asked about Richard Bewley as possible administrator for Kendal. Lloyd says "Beware" because Richard's marriage is strained and he's not predictable. Was offered another job; accepted and then withdrew because his wife refused to move. I also asked Lloyd about the anti-Quaker movement in the Board. Should we abdicate, in effect? Lloyd says No, hang in there. If the Quakers go, Kendal will be just like all the other places, lacking distinctiveness. I must caucus the Quaker element.

Wednesday, October 4, 1995

Kendal trustees met in extraordinary session, with John Diffey and Don Kidder connected by telephone, and we decided to make an offer to Stephen Fleming. Now he and his wife will visit again on Saturday and Sunday to see if new England "culture" is compatible enough. We are preparing a good show. I got Nancy Corindia to chaperone them on Saturday afternoon, for example. We're hoping. If he says No, we've got no one and will need to start all over again.

Thursday, October 5, 1995

Daphne called. She's pregnant. Chrysanthi is already planning to go in June when the baby comes. Well, we may be grandparents yet.

Friday, October 6, 1995

Crisis. Steve Fleming says that he won't come for under $100,000. We offered $82,500. Jim Armstrong, John Hennessey, Margery Walker, and I met for two hours. Margery was totally positive, says $100,000 is appropriate. Jim is now totally negative, saying that Steve is mercenary. But John and I won him round to allow tomorrow's visit to take place. . . . Good music: Kuhlau, Handel, Kaltenborn.

Sunday, October 8, 1995

Steve and Anne Fleming are here. We had a cordial breakfast, toured Lebanon a bit, went to the Methodist church service (which Steve found exactly the same as North Carolina services) and then to the airport, where his plane was cancelled at the last minute and we had to spend an extra $650 to get them home. He says he'll let us know in 48 hours. . . . Supper at Kendal with Mother and Morton and Toby Bien, who are quite nice. She's loud and brassy but a schoolteacher of English who is probably very effective in the classroom. Morton is still totally estranged from his brother Howard, who seems to exist just this side of the law.

Tuesday, October 10, 1995

John Hennessey telephoned. Steve Fleming's verdict is No. The reason, he says, is his wife's uneasiness with leaving her roots in North Carolina. So, we're back to the beginning. We meet tomorrow.

Wednesday, October 11, 1995

Jim Armstrong is very distressed, not sure he wants to serve beyond December 1st, yet we'll never find an Executive Director before then. I talked with Margery and John Diffey. All agree that we must respect Jim's wishes and let him step down if he must. We'll meet again next week when John is here.

Friday, October 13, 1995

Lovely surprise. Knock on my office door and in walks Leon Black and his wife Debra. I told him how often Chrysanthi and I thought of him, wondered how he was doing, followed his downs and ups in the papers, etc. He is flourishing, owner of a company that buys up other companies, effects mergers, improves management, etc., and then reaps the profits when the faltering company succeeds. He is obviously extremely wealthy: just endowed a Shakespeare chair at Dartmouth. He's indulging his love of art by being an art collector, seriously, with agents, etc. Latest specialty: Chinese bronzes. Previously, Mondrian. He lends paintings to museums, works closely with the Museum of Modern Art and will probably be a trustee there next year. They have four children, each in a different private school in New York.

Breakfast at Hanover Inn with Leon and Debra. His mother has remarried; his sister is divorced. He and Debra repeatedly urged us to use their apartment on 78th and Park as headquarters when we're in NYC. They have a separate floor for guests with a private entrance, kitchen, etc. I said I'd love to see his paintings, of course.

Nice letter from Andrea Useem, 2½ days after arriving at Woodbrooke. She is excited by all the Africans there (as I had predicted). I wrote back, asking her to give regards to Stuart Morton and really no one else. I'm still haunted by my estrangement from the staff there. There isn't a day when it doesn't come to mind, alas.

Daphne telephoned. She's beginning to have peculiar appetites; craved broccoli yesterday. Chrysanthi explained that this happens in normal pregnancies.

I spent half the day clearing a pile of papers left on our bedroom floor from the British trip and earlier. Still one more huge pile to go.

An Italian proverb says: Traduttore traditore (translator traitor). Too bad I didn't know this earlier for my translation article for the Arndt festschrift.

Stewardship met the other day. We want Walter Frank to head the Kendal Fund Drive. But the poor man just lost his son to cancer of the throat and is frequently in New York reorganizing the business. But, gallantly, he said he would consider it.

Monday, October 16, 1995

Incredible! John Hennessey telephoned early. Fleming has changed his mind. He said that Anne was weeping all week, convinced they'd made the wrong decision. They went to church yesterday, prayer, etc. So they're coming. (Luckily for them, we had no 2nd choice candidate to fill the job in the interim.) The question now is salary. Steve says he should get $115,000. John Hennessey, Jim Armstrong, John Diffey, and I met for hours, with Margery Walker connected by telephone. We agreed on $105,000 plus a one-time gift of $5000 to ease the move. Steve accepted.

Tuesday, October 17, 1995

Board meeting. John H. explained the salary at great length. After an hour, they approved. I went out and telephoned Steve. He'll tell his staff this afternoon. We called in our management staff, told them, and I wrote a letter to all residents saying that they'd agreed to leave a lifetime in North Carolina to come to our frozen north, and I hoped that the warmth of welcome would compensate for the temperature. Steve told me on the phone that the change had occurred in large part because he found in trying to write to me to justify the earlier No decision that he just couldn't do it, couldn't send the letter. Tomorrow I'll send them a catalogue for thermal underwear, an L. L. Bean catalogue, a copy of my letter to residents, something about Quaker boards, news of our retreat planned for January 15 (Steve will begin work on January 8), a list of houses available from McLaughry realty, business card of Sally Rutter, realtor, a list of Dartmouth rentals. We also agreed, at the Board meeting, to pull out from the Supreme Court appeal, reluctantly. Chose Lake Morey Inn for the retreat, after visiting it yesterday with John Hennessey so that, in the car, we could talk about Steve's salary before meeting with the others.

Wednesday, October 18, 1995

A reply by John Sheldon to my letter sent in July. Totally self-defensive, but at least he doesn't call me an egotist filled with spiritual pride. But he conveniently doesn't remember my repeated requests to play four-hand duets, and dismisses all my other criticisms in one way or another. At the end, however, he expresses friendship and hopes that Chrysanthi and I will return to Woodbrooke soon. That's good. I'll write back, briefly, putting an end, as he wishes, to this controversy, which it makes no sense at all to prolong. . . . Also received a long letter the other day from Anne Thomas, reaffirming her alienation from Woodbrooke. Won't see her tomorrow at Pendle Hill, alas, for she's been rotated off the board. . . . An hour-long telephone interview by Holly Lebowitz, a Cornell student working on Scorsese's film of The Last Temptation. I'm an external advisor for her thesis. . . . This morning, first meeting of the Search Committee for the new Tucker dean. Lee Pelton is the chair.

The provost, Lee Bollinger, surprised everyone by saying that he didn't care whether the new dean reported directly to him or to the president. The sentiment around the table so far seems to favor the service aspect of Tucker rather than a dean's "prophetic" role. I agree, thinking of my early work camp experience and the years when Tucker, with my cooperation, was sending students to international work camps.

Thursday, October 19, 1995

To Philadelphia

Took AMTRAK Vermonter, the new day train replacing the Montrealer, to Philadelphia: 9:30 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. Our car insufferably hot. Electricity failed in the café car. The train goes on Central Vermont tracks to Palmer, Mass., then switches to Conrail to Springfield, going backwards with many delays. It's like Yugoslavia in the 1950s. But we arrived in time to meet new board members at Dan's home, including an interesting black Jamaican, Noel Palmer, from Westbury, NY meeting, and Margaret Hope Bacon. Afterwards, Dan and I played Dello Joio, Ravel, Debussy, Arensky, Bizet, Persichotti—our repertoire, old and new. Not bad, actually, but I need to work much more on the Dello Joio.

Friday, October 20

Pendle Hill

Everyone delighted to see Chrysanthi, of course. I had a long breakfast with Doug Gwyn, discussing possible reviewers for his new book. Then orientation of new board members re: the Publications Committee. Then long meeting with Rebecca, planning agenda, etc. We rejected all three submissions, which pleased me. Afterwards, Yuki Brinton asked about my Tokyo trip and I recounted it as best I could. I'll send her my typed diary. Then another session with Rebecca going over submissions to the book subcommittee. We rejected most without reading them. We hope to do a new biography of Douglas Steere and a reprint of one of his books. After supper we had a book signing for Doug's book with me introducing it by reading my blurb on the back cover. Then David Fredericks jokingly (I hope) said, "I hope the book isn't as dense as Peter Bien's blurb." Then three women gave a dramatic reading from our next book, the Quaker women's nineteenth-century diaries. Then back to Dan's for another go at our repertoire. He told me that Pendle Hill's property tax exemption is being challenged by the Wallingford School Board, and I was able to recite to him the long history of Kendal's similar problem. It turns out that now I'm a sort of expert in such matters.

. . . The Meeting today was very powerful. Dan told me afterwards that he had feared after the departure of Peter Crysdale and Bill Tabor that ministry would suffer. But it hasn't. Today a friend from Kansas raised on a farm spoke well about the importance of manual labor for one's spiritual development.

Pendle Hill—New York

The program this morning was the Resident Program Review. I introduced it together with Shirley Dodson and Bob Gray. I said that there had never been a review, and Dorothy Steere corrected me, but I replied, correctly, that it can no longer be found. Then everyone broke into small groups to determine which of our recommendations they favored, which they found ill advised, etc. I'm not sure that very much came out of this, except strong support for courses of a different length. . . . At the Executive Council the main item was the challenge to our tax status. I repeated much of what I'd said to both Dan and Denny yesterday. . . . Back to 30th Street with Chrysanthi. Yale Club at 4:30. Daphne and Greg in their hotel (Four Seasons, 57th Street) at 5:30. Both looking radiant despite their flight. The hotel a last-minute change because of a mix-up and congestion in NYC hotels because of the 50th anniversary of the UN with over a hundred heads of state in the city, police everywhere, motorcades of huge limousines, and the like. Daphne and Greg just yesterday in London had seen her fetus via ultrasound. Everything normal. It's an inch long! The beating heart was very visible. Daphne is doing well, although her appetite is strange and sometimes she feels tired. Chrysanthi brought her a "pregnancy book" recommended by Nancy Corindia. The baby is due in the first week of June. . . . We ate a real NYC supper in Wolf's Delicatessen on 57th. Greg had pastrami, I had chicken liver, and everyone had pickles and cheesecake. Then to the NY State Theater to see Puccini's Turandot for the first time. Steady music, no real arias except two very famous ones, one by Liù and one by the tenor lead. Daphne in the interval enlightened us all by explaining that the emperor and Turandot are Confucians, and require that everything be done according to elaborate ritual, while the skeptics Ping, Pang, and Pong (!) are Taoists, who resist artificial rituals and feel an affinity with nature. All this Daphne learned from the book on oriental religion that she is editing. I told her that I wish she had written the program notes. We were in the 4th tier in $17.00 seats and surrounded by young people,

New York's opera fans of a tender age. How nice! Daphne and Greg were very tired by this time, understandably. It was 4:00 a.m. by their body clocks.

Daphne and Greg came to the Yale Club for a two-hour, leisurely breakfast. I expanded on my latest thinking, or perplexity, about how to pass the farm on to the children in a way that minimizes taxes and fuss. Just read a book advocating conservation easements and saying that to pass on land via a will is the worst possible way. I'll investigate a limited partnership further. Greg then returned to the hotel's health club to work out, Daphne and Chrysanthi went shopping for maternity clothes, and I went off very excitedly to the Metropolitan Museum to see the Rembrandt and Goya exhibits. The theme of both was authenticity. In Rembrandt's case, which paintings, formerly attributed to him and often signed, were actually done by his students. The exhibit included engravings, etchings, and drawings. These, perhaps even more than the paintings, show the sheer virtuosity of this master, especially the etchings. One of them interested me in particular because of my paper several years ago on the sexuality of Jesus. The etching "Christ Crucified Between Two Thieves" (The Three Crosses), 1653, 2nd state of 5, Met. Catalogue #94A, clearly shows both Christ and one of the thieves with erections. Goya's work is of course totally different. Here, too, etchings were impressive, especially the "Disasters of War" sequence done between 1810 and 1823. How effective this would be in War/Peace Studies, juxtaposed to paintings, like David's, that idealize war and warriors. Plate 69, called "Nada. Ello lo dice" (Nothing. That's what he says) shows a skeleton, victim of the famine following the Napoleonic invasions, and the audio lecture suggested that it is often interpreted as Goya's rejection of the possibility of an afterlife. Useful for Kazantzakis. . . . Forgot to say that Greg last week went to Paris on the train three hours from Waterloo to Gare de Nord. Breakfast on the train, 20 minutes in the tunnel. He had a long lunch with clients and returned in the afternoon. Remarkable. . . . Met Daphne and Chrysanthi at the Yale Club at 3:00. Goodbye to Daphne until Thursday. Then to Penn Station. Goodbye to Chrysanthi until the 28th. Marion Fuson at Pendle Hill told me, "You're at your best when Chrysanthi is with you. You're complete." Amen. . . . To Princeton. They have put me in the Nassau Inn. Very posh. Just had a full roast beef dinner in the Tap Room, where I'm writing these notes. Tomorrow: start work with Dimitri Gondicas & Co. on the revision of Demotic Greek 1.

Princeton, Nassau Inn

Worked with Dimitri, Andromache Karanika, and Kostas Kanakis from 9:30 to 11:30 and again from 4:00 to 5:00. We attacked the agenda I'd prepared earlier, deciding on monotonic vs. polytonic, the sequence of parts in each chapter, how to treat Maria, what aspects of Greek "reality" to include, etc. Tomorrow we'll start actual composition: chapter 1. Dimitri took me to lunch to discuss MGSA and JMGS. The large bibliography project that was commissioned under my presidency has collapsed entirely under Peter Allen's care. Embarrassing. Dimitri hopes that I'll stay on as editor of the journal for another three years. I said I would. Regarding Hopkins' demand for $4000 more in subsidies, I said that Dimitri, John Iatrides, and I should go to Baltimore and meet with Marie Hansen and others when I return to Princeton. Direct meetings are better than letters back and forth. . . . Mike Keeley said hello in the morning. He's off to Australia this morning for a PEN meeting.

Tuesday, October 24, 1995

Princeton

We did the red-blue-black of the scenario of chapter 1, keeping the basic text more or less. Lunch with David Ricks, Dimitri, Stathis Gourgouris. David gave a talk on Kalvos in the afternoon and then about twenty of us went for a banquet at a Chinese restaurant. Nice talk with Bob Fagles, who remembers Jim Armstrong well and says that he could have been a distinguished Homerist if he hadn't gone into administration. Fagles, amazingly, didn't start learning Greek until after completing an English major at Yale. Also had a chance to talk to Alexander Nehemas, who invited me to be a visiting professor at Princeton sometime in the future. How nice! . . . Worked late on the Demotic Greek revision, typing it into the computer, and found a way to print my file at Kinkos at 10:00 p.m.

Hotel DuPont Plaza

Yesterday: good working sessions again. We're still on chapter 1 but it will go faster once we establish the basic template. It's good to have Kanakis, the linguist. Worked again this morning. Then bus to Trenton. I was the only white person. The driver conversed continually with various passengers using his microphone. Another culture! A churchman boarded and collected money for a mother whose son had been killed by a car (so he said). A Puerto Rican boarded later and the driver greeted him with “¿Como estas?” In Trenton, fast-food restaurant in the station, repulsive, slobbering bag lady treated kindly by the black girl behind the counter. . . . Daphne was in the first coach of the 1:57, as previously arranged. She’d had a productive time in New York, even with the “difficult author” who has been so tardy in submitting her chapter for Daphne’s book on eastern religions. But especially regarding photos for the book on Native Americans. And she says that she likes New York City and feels at home there, although growing increasingly fond of London. She’s in good spirits and good health, with no ill effects from the pregnancy so far. We went to the DuPont Plaza Hotel and were joined by Irv and Fran Shapiro for supper. They reported that Ignat’s and Leander’s concert last night was a great success even though Tom Wood did not applaud (Pat Wood did, enthusiastically). Daphne and I went via Metro to Grosvenor Station, then to Strathmore Hall, seeing Ignat first, with warm gloves on his hands, then Leander, also with gloves. Ignat assigned Daphne the job of recording the concert, and seated both of us in the front row, next to Leander’s deaf student, Ben. Oh, upon entering, the first person I saw was Mary, Leander’s student who was at the workshop last year. Then Sylvia, then Dick Sheldon. Ben and I conversed via lip reading and writing. He’s applying to college, wants to include Dartmouth. He says he can hear the music when he has his hearing aids in place, but Leander doubts this. He feels the vibrations, mostly. Two men said something about the Broadwood piano: that it lacks expressive qualities but makes up for that in clarity of definition. Ignat and Leander played with perfect coordination and balance of tone. Very loud, very soft (the piano, after all, is called “forte-piano.” Ignat’s technique is powerful, very clearly defined. The music of the first half was done chronologically starting with Beethoven aged 21. Not great, but always interesting, and a treat because never heard. But the Grosse Fugue, which occupied the second half, was of a different order: magnificent, frightening. Leander introduced it well, saying that Beethoven thought it expressed his anguish at being deaf, at being close to death, but also his ability to be serene notwithstanding. The music in this form, four-hand piano, is fascinating to hear and especially to watch, with all four hands everywhere crisscrossed, one under the other, etc. (as I had experienced when Leander and I did parts at the farm this summer). An extraordinarily moving, meaningful performance. I only wish I could have heard the whole thing repeated. . . . Afterwards Daphne, Ignat, Leander, and Susan (Ignat's girlfriend, a medical student at U of P) went out for supper. Leander and Ignat felt that the audience was very unresponsive, clapping perfunctorily, tepidly. Perhaps. I asked Ignat about his parents. Are they happy in Moscow? Yes, personally, privately, but the situation in Russia in general is chaotic. Ignat full of fun, just like old times. Loves baseball, fast cars, women. What a nice, jovial visit we had! Leander delivered me at 11:30 p.m. to the Metro to catch a train back before the Metro closed, and I missed the last train by 30 seconds, but was able to get a cab, shared with a reporter from Houston who queried the black driver about Mayor Marion Barry, who the driver defended as truly caring for DC's residents. (He was easily reelected after emerging from jail!)

Washington-Hanover

By train, hours and hours, from Washington to Springfield, then bus to White River Junction: 12:15 to 10:30, 10+ hours. Before leaving I finished my report on one of the new batch of Pendle Hill pamphlet submissions, a very badly written essay on a good topic: George Fox's mysticism. I'm also reading more on William Penn, a full biography.

Sunday, October 29, 1995

Ministry and Counsel retreat at the Meeting House, 12:30 to 5:00 p.m. Shirley Waring expects to die in the next two weeks; she has refused further treatment for her cancer. She spoke movingly in Meeting a few weeks ago about this decision and her peacefulness in facing death. At M & C we discussed "eldering" and our role in forming committees to help people in need.

Wednesday, November 1, 1995

I'm working many hours editing Patricia Fann-Bouteneff's JMGS article on Pontic theater to have it ready to give to Stratos Constantinidis tomorrow in Cambridge. As usual, so many things are wrong: inaccurate translation of Greek texts, even. . . . Dana Burch is after me again re: investment of my TIAA/CREF funds. Must plan ahead to minimize estate taxes. It's complicated to have too much money. . . . Tucker search committee met again. Last time we favored the "service" aspect of Tucker; now we heard that the Board of Visitors favors the “prophetic” aspect—that the dean must speak truth to power, sit on the highest councils, have easy access to the president. Jan Tarjan reported on budgets. Jokingly, it seems that we are looking for the Messiah. . . . Sarah Le Sure, my presidential scholar for JMGS, announced that she is leaving school for medical (psychological) reasons. Ugh! She vows to continue helping me from home, but we’ll see. The college plans to discontinue her e-mail privileges and I urged the dean not to. . . . We had music last Monday instead of tonight, and played Kuhlau and Bach quite well, also watched Yoyo Ma on TV on a program on how to practice difficult music. Best advice: always hear every note in your mind before you play it.

To Cambridge

Chrysanthi and I are staying in the posh Charles Hotel. Actually, the room is small and nothing special. Marvelous keynote lectures at the MGSA symposium by Nicos Mouzelis on theory of modernization—rather, theories—and how they apply or fail to apply to Greece. Interestingly, he said that the apophatic way of Orthodoxy is compatible with postmodernism, which tends to undo the differentiations introduced by modernization. Also that Greece has failed in modernization because its democratic procedures developed before industrialization, leading to an elephantiasis of government that now sabotages modernization. . . . Nice to see old friends again: Elizabeth Jeffries from Sydney, Dimiroulis whom I last saw in Adelaide, Anna from Melbourne, Mavrikos whom I knew only via e-mails to Edinburgh and Panorama, Samatas from Crete, whom I published. Also a young man named Chryssostomos who wants to put our ed-articles on the internet. Also Maria Herrey (thank goodness I remembered her name), Karen Van Dyck, Addie Pollis (who was astounded to learn that she had rejected a paper by Mouzikis for JMGS), Greg Nagy. After the reception, went for supper with Stratos Constantinidis to discuss, at length, the forthcoming special issue on Greek theater. I’ll get him to include my latest on Kazantzakis’s Χριστός in his bibliography.

Friday, November 3, 1995

Charles Hotel

Lovely breakfast with Chrysanthi in the hotel, reading the New York Times leisurely. The stock market hit an all-time high yesterday. . . . Lots of stimulation and business at the MGSA symposium, plus a session which I chaired, with Diana Haas speaking on Cavafy's letters. Sarah Kafatos in the audience. Discussion with Eva Konstantellou and Peter Allen re: book reviews in the next issue of JMGS, and with Prof. Kazamias re: a response to the education articles, which he finds very poor if not scandalous. Also talked to Dimitris Dimiroulis regarding financial assistance when I go to Greece, and to Gregory Jusdanis about the symposium planned for Columbus in March. . . . Jim Warren wants the next symposium, in 1997, to celebrate the Truman Doctrine (1947), its 50th anniversary. . . . At 5:30, to the celebration honoring Elise Boulding as World Citizen: very posh. Ray Hall and Gene Lyons there. Elise very happy to see us. She was introduced beautifully by the head of Peace Studies at George Mason University, and then spoke about the next hundred years. She almost broke down when saying at the start that she wished Kenneth could have been present. . . . Back to MGSA: a session on the humanities consisting of a dialogue between Meg Alexiou and Karen Van Dyck, very flabby and boring. Chrysanthi kept nudging me, to keep me from sleeping. . . . Back to the hotel. Started editing, on the computer, Sakellaridou's article.

Saturday, November 4, 1995

Cambridge

Called Jean Brophy last night. She was out. Left a message that she did not answer. Another nice breakfast, reading the NY Times again very leisurely. More copyediting of Sakellaridou. To MGSA: business lunch with the Publications Committee: Dia, Brian Joseph, John Iatrides. We're trying to salvage the bibliography, perhaps by publishing it piecemeal in the journal. This might "save" this project, which I helped negotiate in Washington. We got $35,000 from the Greek government and we have produced nothing. If we publish discrete bibliographies over several years in the journal, at least we'll have something, although not the impressive book that was contemplated. . . . Long talk with Gregory Jusdanis after lunch. Heard Richard Clogg's paper on "privatization" of Hellenic Studies—i.e., proliferation of chairs endowed by governments. Very amusing, and also sad. Long discussion with Jim Warren about why the KKE lost Greece. He says it was Zahariadis's decision to favor a united Macedonia. This lost KKE most of its moderates and reduced them to recruiting Slavo-Macedonians as soldiers. . . . I invited Danny Danforth and Sarah Kafatos to supper with Chrysanthi and me, and we sat for three relaxed hours discussing mutual concerns. Chrysanthi spent most of the day in Filene's basement hunting for bargains, and had lunch in Durgin Park with Nancy Iatrides.

Sunday, November 5, 1995

MGSA business meeting. I suggested the Truman Doctrine as the subject for 1997 (proposed by Jim Warren) since it will be the 50th anniversary. Sad to leave the Charles Hotel, which had become like home. Back in Hanover, met Yasuo and Naoko Takahashi and had supper with them, Nodas, and Mother at Kendal. Naoko will be taking her Ph.D. generals in linguistics in January.

Monday, November 6, 1995

A full day. Tucker search in the morning: interviewing the entire staff, secretaries, etc., all of whom seem to view Tucker as very special. Suddenly I realized that Jack Shepherd would be the perfect dean. Lunch with Jim Freedman talking about his illness (so far so good), Kendal, and Sheba's illness: she's in a mental hospital being treated for depression but she's making good progress. I told Jim about my father at Mt. Sinai. Jim goes twice a week to Boston, has supper with her, and returns. What an awful two years he has had, but at least he finished his book on liberal education. . . . Then went to the Inn to meet Howard Zinn, who was with John Lamperti. Then to Dickey Center to meet Gene Lyons and Leonard Rieser. Then to 13 Carpenter, where I was so relieved to find a full house: every seat taken, even some students present. Zinn spoke with passion and humor about class in American society and our failure to be honest about class inequities. He rambled a bit, but redeemed this by virtue of his concern for justice and economic fairness. Nice to see this really radical thinker. Reminded me a lot of A. J. Muste. Fine University Seminar afterwards at the Inn, with lots of questions, answers, and discussion over dinner.

Tuesday, November 7, 1995

I spoke on William Penn, an expanded version of the talk I gave at the Meeting in September. This time it was at Kendal's coffee klatch, organized by Charlie Dudley. Large audience. Some questions afterwards. . . . Lunch with Jay Bruce, my born-again Christian student, who is so nice. Trying to interest him in Quakerism. Home to interview a boy applying to Haverford.

Thursday, November 9, 1995

Nice supper with Michael Gaylor and Elaine Shamos. Michael, a psychoanalyst who used to head Dartmouth's counseling office, quit to go into private practice (and to earn more money). One of his "patients," he tells me, was Chris Chen, who was so obstreperous and whom I tried to support when he fled Heffernan's class. Gaylor says that Chen has finally found himself and will most likely some day be a distinguished architect. Apparently Chen's problem was immense pressure from an imperious father.

Friday, November 10, 1995

A student videotaped me on Olympia and the Olympic games. I read Kazantzakis's wonderful analysis of the pediments at Olympia, in Αναφορά στον Γκρέκο. . . . Holly Parker, my thesis student, presented her first piece of writing. Quite good. She has remarkable "instincts."

Saturday, November 11, 1995

Met over lunch with John Rassias to get his reaction to our revision of DG1 done at Princeton. He was very helpful. He says he'll meet with me and Chrysanthi on Saturdays to write micrologues, etc.

Sunday, November 12, 1995

Shirley Waring is in the hospital, choosing to die rather than continue medication. I ministered à propos, citing Arafat's comment on TV when asked if he feared assassination, considering what happened to Yitzhak Rabin. He said, "I believe in God and thus I know that each one of us has his destiny. Thus I don't worry." I said that he teaches us in this way that death is not a catastrophe, a negation of everything meaningful, but rather part of the nature of being, just like life. Shirley's case helps us realize this. Facing death, she matured, grew, became a teacher for all of us. . . . Chrysanthi did drills for chapter 1 of the revised DG1. I've been supplementing them and typing them in the computer. . . . Felitsa telephoned: "Let's all go out to Sweet Tomatoes!" This meant Filitsa and her new boyfriend, Otmar Foelsche. We are happy for her, that she has overcome her loneliness. So we all went out to Sweet Tomatoes, together with Yiayia, and had lots of good stories and laughter.

Monday, November 13, 1995

Interesting time at Kendal hearing a presentation of the actuarial report. First time I've been exposed to what actuaries do—very complex and useful. The presenter helped us very much to understand better the consequences of our fee structure. In his life expectancy table I was a bit disappointed to find that I have only 17 more years. Mother at 92 has 5. . . . Afterwards, Jim Armstrong, John Hennessey, and I worried about Steve Fleming's contract, which Debbie Cooper got all wrong because she didn't follow my letter to her. . . . Flew to LaGuardia at night.

Tuesday, November 14, 1995

New York City

To NYC for a gathering sponsored again by the Onassis Foundation and with the presence of the newly reconstituted Ίδρυμα Ελληνικού Πολιτισμού. Papademetriou, the Onassis president, was fairly imperious although he tried to be democratic. We sat for 3½ hours in the morning and two more hours in the afternoon, listening to him explain what the foundation intended to do, and he not really listening to our suggestions, although he kept protesting that he welcomed them. Lunch at table with the former ambassador to Greece, who was quite interesting about November 17 excesses of the State Department, lack of need for the consulate in Salonika (it was saved owing to the Macedonian problem). Brademas spoke about the arts, and I commiserated with him afterwards regarding Gingrich & Co. "The coming of the barbarians!" he commented. Had a chance to talk a bit with Sifakis, Mitsis, Jeff Rusten re: fonts, with Ioannis Kazazis re: my visit to Thessaloniki, with Dia and especially Gondicas re: strategy for grant applications for our revised DG1. We did this afterward in a Greenwich Village coffee shop, with a Greek bookseller joining in. Afterwards, to the Plaza Hotel for a reception, very fancy, obscene. String trio with no one listening. Full meal, in effect, buffet style. Met Fotini Tsalicoglou, Constantine Tsoucalas's "partner" and the author of the essay on AIDS that I published. Talked to Neni Gourgouris about the wisdom of having two children rather than just one. . . . Severe storm. Will I be able to fly tomorrow? Trains are so much better.

Wednesday, November 15, 1995

NYC–Hanover

The storm abated. Actually, the flight was amazingly fast because of tailwinds. Thankfully, no emergencies waiting for me at home, and not even much mail or e-mail.

Thursday, November 16, 1995

Hooray! I introduced Steve and Anne Fleming to the assembled residents at Kendal, saying that we were at a natural point of transition, with all sorts of problems behind us, and now the expectation of accreditation next year. Jim Armstrong spoke briefly, and then Steve spoke, making a good impression. Afterwards, he and Anne stood for an hour on a receiving line, patiently, while everyone shook hands. What a pleasure! I shudder to think of our situation if he had said No. . . . After supper, I served as a judge for Binswanger's students' presentation on the educational problems of San Antonio. They described the mess there quite graphically and recommended solutions, which the judges had to rate for their feasibility. Bins does wonders with his students.

Friday, November 17, 1995

Met with Steve Fleming to brief him on problems—e.g., the services agreement. Then with Dana Burch, who is advising me on better ways to invest. Then with Holly Parker, who is progressing nicely on her thesis. Then out to supper, guests of Jean and Bill Vitalis. She was with us in Scotland and Ireland. He is a director of the Ledyard Bank. Very pleasant.

Monday, November 20, 1995

Tucker search again, this time with students, who gave eloquent testimony regarding the importance of Tucker in their lives. I keep thinking that Jack Shepherd would make a perfect dean. . . . Chris Clay came in to talk about The Waste Land; I used my graduate school notes. Then to a meeting of the Kendal Finance Committee. We hope to refinance the long-term bonds. Afterwards, Jim and Carol Armstrong invited Chrysanthi and me, John Diffey, and Mr. and Mrs. Shaughnessy to dinner at the Panda House. Nice to socialize in a relaxed way with Bob S. and to meet his wife, a Hanover native.

Tuesday, November 21, 1995

To Washington

Kendal board at 8:30 a.m. We agreed to meet bimonthly in 1996. Treat Arnold absent again, and people commented. After lunch, I picked up Yiayia and Chrysanthi and drove to Manchester. Luckily, everything was on time. We arrived at National Airport at 6:30 p.m. Thanks to the wheelchair ordered for Mother, got out to a taxi quickly, and arrived at Kennedy Center at 6:55. Interesting concert: Ned Rorem, two pieces by Virgil Thompson, Debussy's "La Mer" (so modern). The clinker was the Saint Saens violin concerto, which is 5th rate. Rorem full of meta-jazz, saxophone solos, etc. Thompson interesting and lively. The hall only half full. Deanna drove us home and Leander arrived later from Levine. Lovely reunion. We feel very much at home there. Yiayia weathered all this beautifully.

Wednesday, November 22, 1995

Fun! We went to the Men's Warehouse and I bought a suit, blazer, trousers, hat, and gloves. Everything amazingly cheap. Then lunch in a Jewish deli: chopped chicken liver. Yum! Chrysanthi and Deanna busied themselves with pies and preparing the turkey. I did JMGS editing and had a good lesson from Leander on Dello Joio. He showed me how to do octaves with the wrist. Then to a Chinese restaurant, the same one where we had the rehearsal dinner for the wedding. Sad to learn that it's closing on Sunday. The owner explained that his rent had been raised from $10,000 per month to $22,000. Leander rented a video, a comedy, and we relaxed afterwards.

Thursday, November 23, 1995

Thanksgiving turkey with all the trimmings. Lovely. Alec telephoned, just back from Beijing. . . . Another humorous video.

Friday, November 24, 1995

The chair of the search committee of College Park Friends Schools called, hoping that they could interview Alec. He seems to be an attractive candidate, but I fear that his heart is in Indonesia (he's been offered a new contract to stay at North JIS). Deanna went to town to play a Pop's concert: show-tunes, sold out. She's unhappy about infighting in the orchestra and lost another audition for principal second, but is doing a lot of chamber music in DC, including a quartet of David Diamond's at the Holocaust Museum recently where she played first violin. . . . Yet another video with Dustin Hoffman in "Tootsie." Lovely spoof.

Saturday, November 25, 1995

DC to NH

Deanna drove us to National. Good flight, on time. Supper at Kendal with Audrey. Then heard Bev Web do another spectacular program: Appassionata, Debussy Reflets dans l'eau, Ravel Jeux d'eau, Liszt Le Jeux d'eau à la Villa d'Este, Chopin Berceuse, and Scherzo no. 2. He is getting better and better; plays now with power he lacked earlier. Barbara Rice says in the beginning he didn't want to be at Kendal and was taking out his anger on the piano. That's all in the past. Hearing him continues to be an experience of sheer miracle.

Sunday, November 26, 1995

Susan Stark ministered again at Meeting, disconnected but not so lengthy as usual. She gives me the jitters. Nice lunch afterwards with our "gang": Nodas, Audrey, Sydney.

Monday, November 27, 1995

Another Meeting of the Tucker search committee, this time with area clergy including Father John from Aquinas House, who spoke very well, indeed eloquently.

Tuesday, November 28, 1995

Sally Rutter telephoned to announce that Steve and Anne Fleming had secured a house. A rental near the Ray School, with a six-month lease. Perfect.

Went to Sweet Tomatoes and met Trix and Chuck Officer there by accident. Sat together. Chuck played tennis the other day for the first time after his by-pass surgery. He is a "resurrected" man.

November 30, 1995

Long ride on AMTRAK with Chrysanthi to Philadelphia. Worked on the computer, JMGS editing. Played Dello Joio with Dan in the evening.

Friday, December 1, 1995

Pendle Hill

A full day. Peter Crysedale is back on a visit. He ministered in Meeting very well, as always, saying that a "yearning for God" is more important than a "belief" in God. . . . Publications Committee rejected my revision of Redmont's essay on moderation. Actually, the reasons were very convincing, I have to admit, especially Mary Ellen Chijioki's. Now: what to do next? . . . Leander showed up at lunchtime on his way to Bethlehem for concerts, but I had the Book Committee meeting and couldn't join him and Chrysanthi. Ignat, who was in an automobile accident a few days ago, will be OK, but has many broken bones, including a finger and an arm. Pendle Hill board again not very active re: budget short-falls. Denny dominates. Dan seethes. But we played Dello Joio and Ravel again after ice cream. It's sounding better. Good visit with Doug Gwyn at supper.

Saturday, December 2, 1995

Pendle Hill

Board in the morning. After lunch worked on Kamperidis's review of Lorenzatos's Μελέτες. Then to Dan's for practice, after which he, Chrysanthi, and I all drove to Society Hill to go to the movies—Carrington, about Lytton Strachey, Carrington, Mark Gertler, very open about their "abnormal" sexuality, ménage à trois, etc. Dan finds Bloomsbury very decadent, self-absorbed. Hard to disagree. This includes Strachey's conscientious objection. Afterwards, we took Dan out to supper in an Italian restaurant and had long talks about the film, then about his niece, who is being sued by her own father, and inevitably about the teachers at Pendle Hill, who do next to nothing, but prevent Dan from governing effectively. He is partially right, of course, but his paranoia and anger contribute to his ineffectiveness, alas.

Sunday, December 3, 1995

To Princeton

At breakfast, one of the teachers, Nancy Frommelt, the Franciscan nun, said she wished I was living at Pendle Hill. I said that right now I almost felt I was. But Dan told us last night that the teachers resist his bringing in visiting teachers, even David Gray. . . . Good long talk again with Doug Gwyn after Meeting. He will be applying to be a pastor at a Friends Church in Maine. I thought of him for dean of the Tucker Foundation, but he is nowhere as strong a candidate as, say, Jack Shepherd. . . . Yesterday Peter Crysedale was here, and ministered beautifully in Meeting, as I think I noted already. . . . Long pleasant lunch with Nancy Frommelt and Sally Palmer and Mary Wood (who's about to move into Kendal). Then more practice with Dan, who drove us to 30th Street.

Monday, December 4, 1995

Princeton

We're housed very comfortably at Palmer House, a mansion donated to Princeton. Worked again with Dimitri, Kostas, and Andromache, still on chapter 1, verifying what Chrysanthi and I did in the interim. Supper at a restaurant with some other visitors, plus Mike and Mary, Stathis, Neni, Dimitri, Kostas, Andromache.

Tuesday, December 5, 1995

Princeton

We're moving ahead to the scenarios of chapters 2 and 3, not writing them in Greek but specifying what should be in them, and which grammar. Lunch with John and Woody Wilson. John is now Dean of Graduate Studies. They're mildly interested in Kendal (they have a summer home in southern New Hampshire). I hope to give them a tour this summer. Supper with Joan and Tom Wilson (who are definitely coming to Kendal in 2000). Tom is retiring on December 31 after 35 years in practice here. Retiring cold! No more contact with medicine, so he says. I hope that we can put him on our health committee at Kendal.

Wednesday, December 6

Princeton

We have blocked out chapters 3, 4, 5, 6, 7. Sandra Cronk picked us up for lunch with her and her mother. Her School of the Spirit is prospering, and will be located at Pendle Hill next year. I told her about our disappointments at Woodbrooke and about my hope to write something about Quakerism and process philosophy. In the afternoon, Glen Bowersock gave a lecture on the 25 poems that Cavafy never finished, emphasizing the union of sexuality and history. Well done. He was very friendly; wants to take me to lunch next time. Also met Bob Hollander. Ditto. And Peter Brown briefly. Mike Keeley gave me a volume of his Cavafy translations graciously inscribed: "Faithful companion on the great Cavafian voyage, so many years en route." Supper afterwards at Prospect. Sat next to Mrs. Fagles, who is very involved in music management, and we talked easily. Also learned more about Stathis Gourgouris's background. All concerned here feel that Hellenic Studies is supportive and friendly. How nice! Ditto for Comparative Literature here. I compare with English at Dartmouth. Hellenic Studies makes Mike feel part of them although he's emeritus. Will I get the same treatment at Dartmouth? Doubtful.

Kendal at Longwood

Good ideas for future chapters of DG1 as a result of discussion this morning. Then taxi to Trenton. Chrysanthi took the train back home; I went south to Wilmington and then via taxi to Kendal at Longwood for Personnel and Pension Committee clerked by Lynmar Brock. Alan Hunt absent (thankfully). Atmosphere conciliatory. Every suggestion I made for less authoritarian and hierarchical language was accepted without objection. Good discussion of pros and cons of merit pay, with Loraine Deisinger (who made a very good presentation) favoring new systems to link pay to performance. Interesting people there. A hotshot banker from Ithaca; a prominent engineer from Oberlin; a local trustee who thanked me for “Tempted by Happiness”; Dave Hewitt the actuary. (This morning, in Palmer House at breakfast the other guest said “Are you Peter Bien?” He’d been my student in the late 1960s; said I still looked the same. And that my course was one of the very few outside his major, Classics, that he valued and remembers. Nice!) . . . The Kendal meeting went from 2:00 p.m. until 9:30 p.m. with only a break for supper served on the same table. But, interestingly, there was no sense of fatigue or languor. Good clerking, good agenda, real issues. . . . But I couldn’t get to Longwood Gardens.

Wilmington–White River Junction

The train is full. I’m surrounded by chattering women. Horrors. But the computer is a solace; helps concentration. I’m trying to compose a mock epic fragment on “James of the Strong Arms” for January 5th. . . . Finished the day with Felitsa’s housewarming party. . . . Met a doctor from North Carolina (recognized the accent) and talked to him and his wife about Steve and Anne Fleming. They’re already in touch.

Saturday, December 9, 1995

Deanna is pregnant. Thus, Θεού θέλοντος, we’ll have two grandchildren, one in June, another in August. . . . We’re meant to see The Tempest at A.R.T. today but there’s a bad snowstorm and we can’t go.

Sunday, December 10, 1995

I read Boulding sonnets on death at Business Meeting. People appreciated the humor.

Amherst–Cambridge

To Amherst to examine students again. One was a Turk, a very elegant young woman. Chrysanthi complains that I use outmoded language, which of course I do. Stavros, seeing the  $\alpha\lambda\phi\alpha\beta\eta\tau\acute{\alpha}\rho\iota\omicron$  I use, said he had the same one in kindergarten. . . . Drove to Cambridge. Nice supper in the Charles Hotel (which no longer frightens us). Then A.R.T. for The Tempest. Imagination. Compelling, with a very fine Prospero: Paul Freeman, from R.S.C. Ariel is always the most difficult. I think he should be played by a girl or boy, not by a hunk like Benjamin Evett. Derrah was fine as Trinculo, Epstein as the garrulous but honest Gonzalo. My appreciation and understanding of the play was much enhanced by the Alumni College we did two summers ago.

December 14, 1995

Kendal meeting to plan the retreat. Jim Armstrong said that he ruled out Quakerism during the discussion of values! Ugh! But he wants to talk about it privately.

December 15, 1995

Hanover

Chris Clay brought his statement for graduate school admissions. He is a straight A student but can't write, poor chap. . . . Lunch with Diana Taylor, seeking her help in Peace Studies. She feels that Leo Spitzer might be willing to assume leadership, and will ask him, gently. . . . Deanna is depressed (her pregnancy), wants to go home to Daddy and cancel the London trip. Poor Leander. But Chrysanthi gave her a huge pep talk that seems to have helped. . . . I received word from Greece that the University of Thessaloniki will house us for two months in a room, and Chrysanthi said she'll refuse to go; she can't live in one room for two months. What next? . . . Right now we're both in bed most of the day with cough and cold. Very bad.

Saturday, December 16, 1995

I'd given Bev Web the Dello Joio four-hand pieces. Mother called to say that he and Fanny played them tonight, and received the most applause she can remember. . . . I'm revising Constantinidis's Prologue to the theater volume, cursing him: he's omitted all documentation. . . . Spending most of the day in bed, however.

Monday, December 18, 1995

Alec telephoned. He leaves for London tomorrow. In January he'll interview at Sandy Spring Friends School and Friends Community School. Of course he already has an offer to stay on at North JIS. Deanna feels better. She and Leander fly to London tonight. . . . Ignat is in Cavendish, able to drive and also to practice already. Lucky boy. . . . Both Chrysanthi and I are sick, with sore throats, low-grade temperature, fatigue. Lots of naps and reading.

December 21, 1995

We were well enough to go to the Heffernans' cocktail party. Their children are charming: Andrew, an aspiring actor; Virginia, finishing a Ph.D. in literature at Harvard. Champions there, Lincolns, Brock Brower, Rutters. I'm trying to bring Bob Fagles here from Princeton to read from his new Odyssey translation. . . . Leo Spitzer won't lead Peace Studies, but Lynda Boose said she would, and Leo, Marianne Hirsch, and Diana Taylor vowed to act as supporters. Progress! We'll all need to meet now with Gene Lyons to regularize the course. If I can leave Dartmouth with Peace Studies still alive, I'll feel satisfied.

December 24, 1995

Reports from London are not good. Deanna is depressed and neurotic. Stays awake all night, sleeps half the day, refuses to go out, wanted to change her tickets and come back earlier. But Leander, all patience, has convinced her to stay apparently. When Daphne talked about their trip to Paris, Deanna started to cry. Daphne cancelled the tickets. Is all this owing to the pregnancy, or is it more deeply entrenched in her personality? Trouble ahead.

December 25, 1995

Brought Mother here for a nice breakfast and exchange of gifts. Daphne bought me a lovely valise for traveling, after seeing me so encumbered when we went to D.C. together. She's so thoughtful. Then at 5:00 p.m. we had Claire and Allan Munck plus Gerry and Peter Tailer for a lovely warm friendly supper. John and Mary Rassias came at 9:00 for dessert. They, too have no children, nor do the Muncks or Tailers this year.

Wednesday, December 27, 1995

Lots of music. Played duets with Barbara Rice at Kendal for 1½ hours. Then Dick came and we did modern flute/piano music, but ended with Bach. . . . I've recorded my parts for the Dello Joio and have sent them to Dan. Also for the Debussy.

Thursday, December 28, 1995

Supper with Suzanne and Thomas Laaspere. He told me, for the first time, that his real name isn't Laaspere. His family was forced to take this very Estonian name to replace their Germanic one at a time of intense nationalism. Two out of their three children are divorced. We're doing better, so far.

Friday, December 29, 1995

Working on the journal every day, it seems. I haven't done any Kazantzakis letters this term. But we did make some progress on the revision of Demotic Greek 1. Had lunch with John Rassias on this yesterday. He is incensed because Kostas Kanakis replaced subject-possessive-object with nominative-genitive-accusative, and wants Kanakis fired. I'm hoping that Gondicas's diplomatic skills will prevail. . . . Finally received Kazamias's "commentary" on the education articles: 17 pages. Very critical, of course. I toned down the text, working on it from 8:00 a.m. until 2:00 p.m. Then sent it via e-mail to Psacharopoulos, who will reply. Μεγάλος μεπλάς. (But not as bad as Macedonia.) . . . Nice evening with the Corindias. Went to their house at 5:30 and interacted nicely with the four children, who are excited about their train set, jigsaw puzzles, and other Christmas gifts. And Nicky played the piano, as did Emily. What a household! Four balls of energy, two dogs, and a cat. Then the adults escaped to Mrs. Ou's for a leisurely Chinese dinner.

December 31, 1995

Genevieve Williamson's annual New Year's Eve party. Nice to see Louis Cornell again. He's still hoping to establish a music center for ensemble work.

January 1, 1996

Festive lunch at Kendal with Mother and the Tailers. Lobster.

January 3, 1996

Dr. Forst Brown advised Chrysanthi to let him operate on her hand; otherwise the thumb will eventually become limp and unusable, he says. . . . Dinner with Dick Williamson and Georganna. Lots of talk about her training as a psychoanalyst. Lots of music afterwards. But I could hardly play the Fauré I used to do reasonably well years ago. . . . Afternoon meeting again with Dana Burch, financial adviser. He wants me to draw as much money as possible out of TIAA/CREF and let him manage it. Some good ideas, but I'm growing increasingly wary.

Thursday, January 4, 1996

Working still on the journal. I had hoped to start on the letters again, but no luck. Meeting on Peace Studies with Gene Lyons, Mary Jean Green, Barry Scher. Very discouraging. Lynda Boose's course can continue only two years. After that we have to pay our own way. And Gene doesn't want to commit until the new director of Dickey is chosen. . . . Filitsa and Popy and Otmar for supper. Filitsa talks non-stop, which I find wearisome, although basically we both enjoy her. Popy is returning to Texas to her father. Filitsa and Otmar are planning their marriage. How nice for both!

Friday, January 5, 1996

Kendal Finance Committee. We're going to be able to raise fees only 3% it seems. Jim Armstrong, Walter Frank, and I managed to kill a plan to close the Cadbury Dining Room for lunch. Terrible! In the afternoon, we celebrate Jim's interim directorship. With Jim and Carol on stage, we presented "Act I—Board, Act II—Staff, Act III—Residents. In Act I John Hennessey gave Jim a pair of ear-muffs to wear when he drives his tractor. I read my "newly discovered epic" and gave him two books on Homer. Lee Huntington presented the bowl that we bought at Simon Pearce and had engraved with Jim's and Carol's initials. In Act II, lots of well-wishing from staff, ending in a poem in rhymed couplets by Cara. The most spectacular gift: a compressor for inflating tractor tires. (I'm jealous.) Plus a John Deere hat and model. Then the residents did three songs from "My Fair Lady" with new lyrics about Jim, Carol, and Kendal, sung by Edie Gieg and Walter Frank. Lots of hats, and an honorary degree to Carol: Ph.T. ("pushed hubbie through"). The atmosphere was one of joy and emotion. (Sherry Buckman shed tears when Jim praised her work.) I think the entire community was celebrating itself: it's a collection of caring, talented, sophisticated human beings. My epic seemed to be appreciated. It even drew laughs in the right places.

ARMSTRONGIAD

Tell me, Muse, of the man of many wiles, James of the strong arms, lured into exile from seagirt Maine by a hennessey Olympian, to do battle with monsters:
the one-eyed tax assessor in Hanover of the elms, lotus eaters lounging in their long wood, drugged by shared service fees, while Carol of the white arms, his circumspect consort, withered in seagirt Maine, faithful in her abandonment while beset by suitors wooing surreptitiously by FAX and e-mail, for they knew that the Olympians of the Board had vowed to prolong the strongarm's exile month after weary month.

But the man of many wiles, forewarned by Zeus who thunders on high that Sirens were near, took a great wheel of wax and with the sharp bronze cut a little piece off and rubbed it together in his heavy hands, and soon the wax grew softer, and he stopped the ears of his staff but then commanded the Buckman to bind him hand and foot to his throne. Then the Sirens approached and directed their sweet song toward him. "Listen to my singing, honored James," warbled Walter of the Franks. "Hear the honey-sweet voice that issues from our lips, for we know everything about shared service fees, and Antonius of clan Robert knows everything that happens over all the generous earth regarding not-for-profit corporations."

So they sang in sweet utterance. James's heart desired to listen, and all would have been lost if the Buckman had not fastened him with yet more lashings and if his stalwart mates with the wax in their ears—Sir Daniel of the House of Ebbin, and noble Brent of Edgertown—had not persevered in their self-denying silence.

But when Dawn

showed again with rosy fingers, James of the strong arms went down to Hanover of the elms to vie with tax assessors and eclectic anthropi. Their leader rose up as straight and tall as a Cliff, and next to him stood Black Willy. But it was Lord Donald of the Moonrows, a man like murderous Ares himself, who seemed most formidable of all the Hanoverians in build and beauty.

"Come, friends," he said. "Let us ask the stranger to compete with me in assessing—his ridiculous thirty million against my forty-two—for in his build he is no mean man, for lower legs and thighs he has, and both arms're strong above them, and the neck is massive. He may be younger than he looks, for the crush of cares has used him badly, for I say there is no other thing worse than administering Kendal for breaking a man, even though he be a strong one."

So they asked him. And resourceful

James of the many wiles spoke in turn and answered them:

"Why do you urge me on in mockery? Cares are more in my mind than assessments, for I long to return to Maine and to Carol of the white arms and to my letter press and all the sweetness of irresponsibility.”

Whereupon the tax assessor answered him to his face and spoke to him roughly: “Stranger, I see that you are one who grasps for profits. You do not resemble an athlete.” “Now you have stirred up anger deep in the breast within me by this disorderly speaking,” answered James of the strong arms. “Know, then, that build and beauty are not everything. There is a certain kind of man, less noted for beauty, but the gods put comeliness in his words, and they who look upon him are filled with joy, and he speaks to them without faltering. In your case, the appearance is like the immortals yet the mind is worthless.”

He spoke, then grasped a discus bigger and thicker and heavier than ever seen, and addressed the Cliff and Black Willy: “O esteemed anthropi, let my throw determine the assessment.” His comeliness of speech won their assent. He spun and let fly from his ponderous hand. The stone hummed in the air to thirty-five, which pleased the eclectic anthropi, who invited him straightway to their hot tub and a feast of roast moose au jus, while Donald of the Moonrows slunk away in humiliation.

[Here the manuscript breaks off, so we shall never know how James of the strong arms fared with the lotus eaters drugged by shared service fees in their long wood. Fortunately, however, we do have one more fragment, a curious one, perhaps not quite authentic, but in any case clearly the very end of this overly long epic, since James is now back in Maine and about to be reunited with his long-suffering wife.]

When James of the many wiles had slain the suitors by disconnecting FAX and e-mail, Carol of the white arms heard her lady in waiting announce: “He is here; he is in the house.” But circumspect Carol said to her in answer, “This is not true. You know and I know that the Olympians of the Board have vowed to prolong his exile month after weary month.”
Board

Then the companion said to her in answer:

“My child, what sort of word has escaped your teeth’s barrier?”

There is another proof: that scar on his foot.”
 So circumspect Carol wondered, for she had also had a dream that seemed now to be coming true.

Meanwhile, unexpected gods appeared from South of Olympus, Carol’s own patron deities, the Carolinians, and they threw a beautiful mantle and a tunic about him as he came out of the bath, but left the scar carefully exposed, and Anne of the Carolinians made him taller to behold and thicker, and on his head she arranged curling locks that hung down like hyacinthine petals.
 Then he sat opposite his wife, who glimpsed the scar on his foot and relented. And as when the land appears welcome to men who are swimming after Poseidon has smashed their strong-built ship on the open water, and gladly they set foot on shore, escaping the evil, so welcome was her husband.
 Then the gods held back Dawn of the rosy fingers so that circumspect Carol of the white arms could relate her dream:
 “Dear husband of the strong arms, I saw you in my dream as a frog on a lily pad. Then a fairy appeared of the hennessey type and with a swish of his wand transformed you into a prince for nine long and weary months. But then in my dream the fairy returned. With another swish of the wand he transformed you—not back into a frog, but into the goodliest form of all: a RESIDENT!”

And so the two talked into the night.
 She, shining among women, told of all she had endured, and wily James of the strong arms told of all the cares and joys he had inflicted on others.
 Nor did any sleep fall upon her eyes until he had told her everything.

(December 8, 1995, on AMTRAK train 56, Wilmington to White River Junction.)

Lunch earlier today with Andrea Useem, newly back from Woodbrooke, where basically she had a very good experience. Yet she, too, felt that the worship was dead. She’ll be going to Kenya shortly to work with a group of journalists. I’ll try to bring her into contact with Jesse Grun-blatt. . . . Supper afterwards at Sheila’s with Lincolns, Lee Huntington, and the Joyces. I forewarned Lee that I want to resign the clerkship of the Kendal board as of April 1st, a Quakerly thing to do, since administrative control and responsibility should rotate. . . . Then to Filitsa's for dessert and coffee. Otmar's son was there, a freshman at UNH and a veritable Ganymede.

Saturday, January 6, 1996

Long talk with Alec, who is in Maryland. He is not drawn to either school. Friends Community School is too small, too all-demanding, and the salary too meager. Sandy Spring wants him to raise money chiefly; he'd be separated from students. So it's doubtful that he'd accept either offer (if an offer is made). So, back he goes to Indonesia, as expected. . . . Long talk also with Daphne. She says that she's been "moody" in her pregnancy but her "mood" is one of joy and elation. How lovely! She will be going to Hong Kong and Malaysia shortly, following Greg, a final extravaganza before the baby comes.

January 9, 1996

Interesting colloquium on Christian Wolff's music, discussed by the musicians who will be performing it tonight. They appreciate the improvisational element, making them co-composers to a degree instead of slaves to a score. Several, although Americans, now live permanently in Europe. They expanded on the cultural differences that add up to much greater public and private support for the arts. . . . The Wolff concert in the evening was quite excruciating. The pieces are so long, so repetitive, going nowhere, filled with portentous silences. The best was an extravaganza for percussion because the performer was such fun to watch as she "danced" her motions. Bev Web walked out at the intermission. . . . Paul Moravac, who is probably a better composer than Wolff (and who is much admired by Leonard Slatkin) has been terminated at Dartmouth. He told me today that it was owing to Jon Appleton, whom he called a psychopath.

Wednesday, January 10, 1996

Margery Walker, John Hennessey, Jim Armstrong, and I met to hear John's and Jim's complaints about Quaker practices on the Kendal board. Hennessey objects to my saying "Now Friends." We're neither Friends nor even necessarily friends, he says. He wants a chair rather than a clerk because a Quaker clerk really doesn't want to lead whereas a good chair does. And of course they both want voting and a cessation of the silences before and after meetings. The “encounter” was cordial. I think that each side listened to the other. We’ll continue, of course, at the retreat on Monday.

Sunday, January 14, 1996

In Meeting, I ministered on the Quakers vs. non-Quakers on the Kendal board, saying that we feel sometimes like Friends in Pennsylvania or Rhode Island before they abdicated, or even like Saint Francis when displaced by Brother Elias, the quintessential organization man, and usurper of the order (who nevertheless may have saved it). Afterwards, Joan Ashley came up, saying that I had angered her, for she assumed that I was calling Jim Ashley a usurper. . . . I also spoke about the Frenches’ grandson, in a coma in the hospital as a result of complications following brain surgery. Last Friday, David French came to the house to ask about funeral arrangements should those be necessary. Yesterday he asked us to share supper with Tossa and him and the boy’s parents, Jim French and Tak, his Thai wife. We spent a few hours with them, some in the intensive care pediatric unit. What a sad place! Another parent, a Bible church pastor, came to visit his sixteen-year-old daughter who was in danger of having both hands amputated. She’d been taking drugs, passed out, and spent the night outdoors in the extreme cold last week, freezing both hands totally. He was very open about this. And the Frenches seem open to the possible loss of their grandson and are grateful for the good care he is receiving. But if he ever comes out of the coma they don’t know how much brainpower will be left. The father is the French who works in Indonesia but has never met Alec. His Thai wife, not like Eyi, is educated: a lawyer. So sad, all of this.

Lake Morey Inn

Our Kendal Board retreat at Lake Morey Inn, 8:30 a.m. to 8:30 p.m. It went well, with everyone present and participating. We were all very pleased with Steve Fleming, who is “presidential” (at age 31) and articulate, and who knows this business inside-out. The case-histories all elicited good discussion and insight. The queries re: the board expressed our shortcomings. John Hennessey advocated an enhanced Nominating Committee that would also monitor board performance. . . . I’m determined to step down as clerk (Quaker clerks really should not want to lead) and hope that Margery will succeed me. . . . Quaker-non-Quaker dialogue, elicited by one of the case histories, was again cordial. Both sides agreed that voting, if done well, and sense of the meeting, if done well, are very similar. It's when either is done badly that the difficulty begins.

Tuesday, January 16

Kendal Board. Hennessey was openly critical of Lee Huntington's leadership of the Nominating Committee, especially regarding orientation. I asked him afterwards to be tender toward her. But I fear that the damage has been done. Executive Committee met with John Diffey in hope of truly ending the impasse over the shared services fee. The ball is in John's court now.

Wednesday, January 17, 1996

As I expected, Lee sent me a letter of resignation. I wrote back as best I could. Really, John Hennessey is sometimes cruel. . . . Full day at the office, with Holly, Chris, Jay. Then to dinner at the Hanover Inn with Audrey and Chrysanthi and Mother to celebrate Mother's 91st birthday. Then upstairs to the Wheelock Room to the Harvard-Radcliffe Club to hear Jim Freedman talk about liberal education in America. He spoke very well, balancing its achievements against its very real problems. Sheba was there, looking terrible—actually looking like the mental patient she is. I think that Yiayia was really pleased to be part of this nice occasion.

Thursday, January 18, 1996

AMTRAK

Off to Philadelphia. On the train I typed up the minutes for the retreat, wrote a reply to Joan Ashley, and tried to start my obligations for the grammar in Demotic Greek 1. . . . I'm eager to play Dello Joio and Ravel with Dan tonight. I'm finally beginning to learn my part: very very slow, but not hopeless. . . . The other day Dimitris Gounelas sent details about housing in Thessaloniki, not so bad (although not so good, either). Chrysanthi agreed to go.

Played Dello Joio, Debussy, and Ravel with Dan. He still hasn't learned the notes for the Dello Joio. But interpretation is going better. However, I too am still having trouble with the notes, despite all my practicing.

Friday, January 19, 1996

Pendle Hill

Met with Rebecca in the morning. She failed to do the financial report requested by the Board. We went over some figures and she will try to patch something together at the last moment. Exhausting Publications Committee meeting: four manuscripts (we accepted three—a record) plus consideration of our report, plus other business. Mary Ellen Chiji-oke is clearly the strongest and best member now. We agreed to move forward with two reprints of books. . . . Executive Board included consideration of our Resident Program Review. Our advice is not being buried under the carpet, but no concrete action has been decided upon so far even though the budget shortfall is worse than ever. . . . Rebecca presented well, including financial figures (!) displayed on a huge sheet of paper very professionally. Amazing! All done between my final conference with her at 5:50 p.m. and her late entrance to the committee at 7:30. No supper. . . . She stayed until 11:30 at Dan's ice cream party, so we played only for half an hour, both quite tired.

Saturday, January 20, 1996

Pendle Hill

Executive Board went into executive session and Vince pleaded with us to affirm Dan as the CEO, as opposed to the team approach. No action. But people listened. . . . PH's tax exemption is now being appealed by the school board, after the appraisal board decided in our favor. Trouble ahead. . . . Met a lovely couple from Hobart, Australia, the Farrells. She is Bill Oats's daughter and he, Oats's son-in-law, is the headmaster of the Friends school there. . . . After lunch I went to Brinton House to join the extension course on Quaker governance. The leader, Laura, is a 1983 Dartmouth graduate. Nice to see Oliver Rodgers there, plus people on the Sandy Spring board who'd been involved with Alec, and interesting Friends working with AIDS suffers, plus others on the board of Abington Friends School, and a former teacher at Friends Central, and people from 15th Street Meeting in New York. Made me feel that if we moved to Kendal at Longwood I would be able, probably, to fit into a wide-ranging Quaker network filled with good people. There was also a nice AFSC staff person with a very Arab name, and a black woman, fat, eating continually. They had ample handouts for board procedure, and especially for nominating committees and the like, just what I need. Also a literature table filled with relevant pamphlets that I can order for the Kendal board. I spoke to Laura about traveling to Hanover. She's ready and eager. I'm beginning to feel that solving the Quaker-non-Quaker problem should be my next (and probably last) challenge as clerk. . . . To Dan's at 10:00 p.m. We played until 11:30, including Persichetti (still OK) and the great Schubert Fantasia (very scruffy) and the Schumann Träumerei (OK). Then talked and ate ice cream until 12:30 a.m. Dan is still obsessed with the teachers' laziness, in his view. I urged him, again, to expedite two-week (or one-week) modules, citing what we did in Alumni College at Dartmouth in 1993. And I also concurred with his view that the teaching staff should be reduced from 4 to 3 if the budget situation continues dire next year. He would ask Nancy Frommelt to leave first, and Liz Kamphausen (of course) last, because she's the only one who does a full day's work. The problem is that all these teachers, if released, will have a very hard time finding other employment, says Dan. But one needs to be cruel at such times. I told him of my suggestion in the executive session that we go periodically into modified executive session with Dan present and Denny and Margaret absent, so Dan can openly express himself. He still has a low opinion of Denny, even professionally. He resents the fact that he wasn't able to recruit his own top associates. Even Margaret, he says, was not chosen by him but by the Search Committee overruling him. And he regrets that our Residents Review Committee's report stresses the importance of search committees (although he likes the rest of the report). It will be fascinating to see where PH is a year from now. How can it balance its budget without downsizing? Ironically, it's Vince who is pressing this and therefore trying to help Dan. Yet Dan feels that Vince is a pest, abrasive, etc. (not true, I'd say).

Steve Fleming called to say that our first case of Peer Review will take place this week, most likely. It involves a housekeeper who, it seems, was having an affair with the husband of her supervisor, and accuses the supervisor of firing her out of revenge. The supervisor lists numerous "crimes": insubordination toward residents, and the like. We're all apprehensive to see how the Peer Review works.

January 25, 1996

The Peer Review took place. The committee met for two hours with the "accused," then deliberated without her for less than 30 minutes and reaffirmed her termination. Steve is much relieved. . . . I've been rehearsing Lou Flaccus's latest "production": a reading of selected scenes from the Odyssey. I play Polyphemos. Poor Lou is "out of it," deaf as a doornail, and with most peculiar ideas about the Odyssey that all of us have to refuse to follow. . . . Jim Sheridan, who plays Odysseus, is writing a book on Kendal's history. I've put together an archive for him going from the start (1985) to 1991, with more to come. As I went through this myself, I was amazed at how much I did during those years. Luckily I kept copies of most of my important speeches, etc., so there is a good record.

January 26, 1996

Good music last night: Kuhlau and Martinu. . . . Gondicas and Andromache Karanika wrote scenarios for chapters 2 and 3 of Demotic Greek 1, true to their promises. Chrysanthi and I are modifying them slightly in the case of no. 2 and more massively for no. 3, and I'm working on the grammar. Perhaps we'll actually complete this project. Gondicas had good talks in Greece with two cartoonists who will furnish sketches. . . . Nice dinner at a Chinese restaurant with our Quaker "gang": Nodas, Audrey, Arnolds, Soderbergs, Sydney Jarvis.

Saturday, January 27, 1996

I acted as a coach for Daniel Siegel's latest mediation workshop. All the techniques came back vividly, and I did a successful simulated mediation in a case of sexual harassment. . . . We have Ava Orphanoudakis here for the weekend, because she was grieving at the loss of her grandmother and her dog (poisoned) in Crete. We had a good supper with Yiayia and then heard Bev Web do another extraordinary concert: all Chopin—Sonata opus 58 in B minor (huge), 3 preludes, 3 études including the one I studied in Boston when I was at Harvard, 2 nocturnes, and then the huge Scherzo no. 2 in B flat minor. He gets better and better. What a treat to be in the presence of genius time and time again. . . . Yesterday, met with Lynda Boose, Diana Taylor, and Marianne Hirsch to try to revive Peace Studies. They seem eager. And a meeting previously with the dean, Mary Jean Green, was quite encouraging.

February 3, 1996

I played the Cyclops Polyphemos in Lou Flaccus's production of "Scenes from the Odyssey" at Kendal. Miscast, of course, since I hardly have the voice or the build for this barbarous giant. But I growled and groaned a bit. The whole affair, with excerpts from Cyclops, Sirens, Nausicaa, Circe, and the Phaiacians, was very nice indeed.

February 8, 1996

Chrysanthi went into hospital for arthroplasty performed by Dr. Forst Brown, on the left thumb. Her thumb bones now are all out of line because of stretched tendons and lack of cartilage. He sliced a bit of good tendon out of the arm and reconnected the misplaced bone to bring it into line. He also relieved her carpal tunnel problem, a pinched nerve causing pain. He said the operation, lasting two hours, went well. But Chrysanthi is very groggy and a bit nauseous from the intravenous. . . . Visited the Frenches' grandson again. Still in a coma, although he has half-opened his eyes and seems occasionally to hear speech. Jim French is back at work in the Philippines. The mother, poor thing, is in the hospital all day long, week after week. . . . Visited with Alice and Peter Buseck, who are here for a few days. His lab was the first to discover in nature a third allotrope of carbon just discovered.

February 9, 1996

Chrysanthi still very low this morning. But she'll feel better after the I.V. is discontinued. And yes, at 4:00 p.m. she was transformed. Smiling, walking a bit, feeling hungry. They're keeping her an extra day in hospital. . . . Lee Huntington left frozen soup, as did Audrey. Greg and Daphne sent flowers.

Saturday, February 10, 1996

To Felitsa's in the morning to act as witness for her marriage to Otmar Foelsche, a civil ceremony performed by Paul Young. Chrysanthi much missed, of course. Jolly lunch afterwards at the Norwich Inn. Brought Chrysanthi home afterwards, her hand in a bulky bandage and her whole arm in a sling to keep the hand above the heart. She's taking a drug for pain.

February 13, 1996

Barbara Gerstner in the Provost's office is going to take over the University Seminars. Good choice, since she's familiar with them and believes in them. And Lynda Boose will lead War/Peace Studies. Her Vietnam course has 60 students enrolled and 30 on the waiting list. . . . Friends are delivering frozen soups and whole meals to help Chrysanthi. Tomorrow the Muncks will come for supper before music and we'll have Chinese take-out. I'm washing the dishes now, of course.

Tuesday, February 20, 1996

Voted for Clinton in the primary. Took Chrysanthi to Frost Brown again. She's much better, taking Tylenol instead of the drug. Brown said everything is fine. The big bandage came off and was replaced by a cast, much lighter, which allows the four fingers to protrude and even the first joint of the thumb. Fingers are no longer numb, a good sign. . . . Supper at Mrs. Ou's with John and Dolly Radebaugh, Chrysanthi, and Yiayia. Then to the Hop for a student production of a play about the plight of grape pickers poisoned by pesticides. The Radebaughs worked three years with César Chávez as he attempted to unionize the workers. They got $20 a week subsistence pay. Saints! The play brought back distressing memories to them, especially of the airplanes spraying lethal chemicals. The actors were all in Diana Taylor's Spanish class.

Wednesday, February 21, 1996

Department meeting. We voted tenure for Melissa Zeiger, finally. I hope that this will be my last meeting of this sort. They are horrible.

Thursday, February 22, 1996

Took Chris Clay and Holly Parker to lunch at the Inn. Saw Ann Forbes there; she's here for a lecture. I feel so warmly toward her, perhaps I even embarrassed her. Chris has just been accepted to Yale graduate school to do Japanese with a full scholarship for five years plus membership in an academic honor society. He's very happy. Holly wrote a splendid thesis for me on Kazantzakis and Joyce, romantic and classical, but both giving ultimate allegiance to silence. She's hoping either to teach at Andover or to be hired by Simon and Schuster. . . . Jason Demos, doing an independent study with me on Kazantzakis, wrote another very fine paper in Greek, totally lucid.

Saturday, February 24, 1996

Cambridge

To Cambridge for A.R.T. Lunch at Henrietta's Table in the Charles Hotel with Tom and Nardi Champion and their grandson Peter, whom I had in class last year. He's discouraged by the anti-intellectuality of Dartmouth, poor lad. We saw a stirring performance of Tartuffe. Alvin Epstein acted better than I've ever seen him before. Tom Derrah as a convincing Orgon. Ms. Gilsig charming as Mariane. Lots of delicious anachronizing including quite obvious connections between Tartuffe and religious hypocrites today. A treat.

To NYC

Flew to LaGuardia. Luggage at Yale Club. Bus to Metropolitan Museum for the Pergamon exhibit. Sections of the Telephos Frieze. I see now why art historians used to dismiss the Hellenistic period as inferior. These sculptures lack the magic of the Parthenon frieze. Perhaps because in some cases they're unfinished. That was the most interesting part: to see an arm, for example, that was still too thick and that clearly hadn't received its final smoothing by the artist. Most interesting of all was the model of the Great Altar at Pergamon, with good placards explaining everything there, not to mention the story of Telephos, Herakles's son. Afterwards: to the Seasonal Pleasures of Japanese Art, much more moving actually. It is so delicate and spiritual. The Greek art is all of "this world." I took the brochure for Chris Clay, for it speaks of timelessness, something that he is wrestling with in his thesis. Then to the Guggenheim for the exhibit on Abstractionism, which was really the highlight of the day for me (although I should note that on my way out of the Met I paid my respects to Rembrandt's self-portrait). "Abstraction in the Twentieth Century: Total Risk, Freedom, Discipline." Of course the building itself is probably the most extraordinary part of any exhibit at the Guggenheim. All in all, I think I understood abstraction in the arts better than ever before owing to the placards and exhibits here. Clear statements by the artists themselves are very helpful. For example: "I want to express my feelings rather than illustrate them" (Jackson Pollock). A central tenet of expressionism is to create equivalents for feelings rather than copying them or outside reality (which can best be done by photography). Or: "Abstract art is like music. Let it wash over you without worrying about meaning." "Breaking down form" (Agnes Martin). Interesting how "spiritual" some of abstractionism is. "The idea is to express nothingness, the immaterial; thus liberating the spirit." (I remember the Zen garden in Kyoto.) An artist I'd never known but now like very much is Ellsworth Kelly. His "Dark Blue Curve" is wonderfully soothing, immaterial, spiritual. His "Broadway," a large red square inside a slightly larger white square, but slightly skewed, is fascinating.

“In my work,” he wrote, “it is impossible to separate the edges from the mass and color.” Another interesting artist on display is Robert Ryman, a practitioner of monochrome painting. Canvas after canvas, all white, the accomplishment being his range of expression although operating within such strict limits. He wrote, “The white just happened because it’s a paint and it doesn’t interfere.”

Princeton

Working again with Gondicas and Andromache. Kostas isn’t going to stay with us, it seems. We went over chapter 2 meticulously, fixing my Greek and simplifying my grammar, mostly.

Tuesday, February 27, 1996

Richard Martin, a classicist interested in Modern Greek, met with us yesterday afternoon. He had vetted Lesson 1 and had some good suggestions for a few additional drills. He promised to look at future chapters. . . . This morning I tried to print out some pages in the Classics computer lab, where Mache gave me access, but without success. Incompatibility of their system 7 and my system 8, it seems. . . . Lunch at Prospect with Bob Hollander, now chair of Comparative Literature here. He has Princeton alumni who did Dante with him return at reunion times to do a canto together, and suggested I try to do the same with alums who did Joyce’s Ulysses with me. Nice idea. . . . Nicos Mouzelis appeared at Joseph Henry House. Said he likes it here because Princeton students work (whereas neither students nor teachers at LSE work, he says). He also surprised me by saying that his Greek is rusty; he can’t spell, is not sure of idioms, etc., and has someone help him with his articles for To Βήμα. . . . Nice supper with Elizabeth Prodrinou. Poor thing, she’s one of the many scholars who subsist on one-year jobs, post-doc fellowships, and the like, and never know where they’ll be the following September. She has a friend, Alex Kyrou, who studies post-World War II relief efforts, and was fascinated to hear about the Quakers in Macedonia and the Quaker Girls’ School.

Princeton

Lunch with Mary Murrell, the new literature editor at Princeton University Press. Very pleasant; young; encouraging. She seems flexible about the date of delivery for the Kazantzakis letters. “Everyone is late!” she assured me. Her version of change at PUP is much more encouraging (naturally) than Bob Brown's. Lippincott is strengthening the scientific and economic sections, because those books make money and can subsidize humanities books, which don't. She was curious about the Karakasidou mess, and I tried to explain the historical background making Greeks so over-sensitive. She reported that Danforth's book on Macedonia is selling well and, so far, has not provoked any hysteria. Then, somehow, we got onto the subject of CCRCs, Kendal, etc.

Supper with Glen Bowersock at the Institute for Advanced Study. Very grand. Huge place for over 200 scholars, of whom only 20 (including Glen) are permanent. Tremendously stimulating, he says. The meal: white and red wine of choice, Scotch beforehand, salmon soufflés, steak au poivre, crêpes Suzettes. We talked for three hours, easily, about common friends (Trypanis, Savidis, Vryonis, Meg), about translation (of Cavafy, of Kazantzakis), about the gospels as "novels" (he calls them "proto-novels"; but his Sather lectures, just published, argue that the gospels stimulated the emergence of the Greek novel in the late first century A.D. and early second century. He didn't know my article about the role of Forster and Auden in Cavafy's career; I'll send it. He was very interested in my work on L. P. Hartley, and on how I got involved in Kazantzakis. He expressed his great admiration for Christian Wolff and also for Holly, who apparently was a brilliant student at Harvard. All in all a very easygoing, friendly evening that I hadn't expected, since Glen is, by reputation, so "formidable."

To Pendle Hill

A morning session with Kostas Kanakis. Clarification on terminology. Dimitri, Mache, and I planned out grammar and story-line for lessons 5, 6, 7, and a bit of 8. In the afternoon, worked on the scenario for lesson 4. Then to Pendle Hill. It took four hours via bus to Trenton, and SEPTA. Visited with Dan. He had actually practiced. Dello Joio and Debussy are sounding much better. Only the Ravel is still very ragged. At 10:00 p.m. a Buddhist monk arrived, dressed in the yellow robe. An American. Tan (= Tuan = Lord) Jeff! He can sleep only in an environment where no women are present and cannot receive food from women. He retired straightway, and Dan and I talked over a cup of tea.

Friday, March 1, 1996

Pendle Hill

Another PH breakfast. Sat with Vince Buscemi and a student who turned out to be a Dominican sister. She described her life and the work of the nuns: teaching, nursing, helping AIDS sufferers. But there are no newcomers. None. She realizes that drastic changes need to be made or the order will die out. . . . Meeting for Worship. Margaret Fraser ministered about Woodbrooke's financial plight (Council meets there tomorrow) and PH's own. Dan ministered about his conviction that PH, despite everything, has a vital something to offer. Shaking hands afterward, I was greeted by Jack Hunter. We talked quickly, for he was late for a meeting of the Friends Council on Education. He is now teaching, not deaning, at Westtown, and very happy. Children are all doing fine. He and Ruth, after he retires in a few years, will move back to their house in Woodstock and will rejoin Hanover Meeting. He had a heart attack a year ago but is doing well, watching his diet, exercising, reducing weight after angioplasty. What a nice, and unexpected reunion! I told him, of course, of Alec's "affair" with Sandy Spring School. . . . Then came a message that Rebecca was home ill and wouldn't be able to come to the Book Committee meeting. So I had to telephone her and get briefed, and find manuscripts in her mailbox and faxes on her desk in order to run the meeting. But it went well. . . . Afterwards, lunch with Doug Gwyn, joined by Chuck Fager, Doug still has no prospects for next year, but Woodbrooke offered him a friend-in-residence position for spring term 1997. . . . At 2:30 I went down to the barn to watch Tan Jeff's meditation class, the students having come over from Swarthmore, some sitting in lotus position. One breathes, and concentrates on various areas of the body in order to dissipate tensions there. Tan Jeff, an Oberlin graduate, looked very peaceful as he meditated, very Buddha-like.

Pendle Hill-Washington

The board approved reduction of staff by two positions and the unlucky people were named. Though sad, this is in my opinion a very healthy move, and I said so. They are being given a very generous and humane "separation package." Afterwards, we met at Roadside with Dan alone (not Denny or Margaret), as Vince and I had wished. This worked perfectly, for Dan poured out all his frustration at being inhibited from leadership. We agreed to have such sessions regularly, thereby affirming his position as "boss." . . . Max Carter invited me to Guilford next autumn as “distinguished Quaker visitor.” Strange! Afterwards, Dan and I relaxed with music. What a tonic! He drove me to 30th Street. AMTRAK to Union Station. Met Leander at Grosvenor station of the Metro. Nice supper at a Japanese restaurant, but I failed to see that they had soba! Leander’s career is flourishing. He is now the pianist in a trio that is under management, and he’ll be performing with a singer at a gala put on by the Levine School. The negative is Deanna’s continued dismay at the orchestra under Slatkin. She would like to audition for Boston again, but for Leander to move again, just when things are going so well and have to start all over again from zero is too cruel. So they’ll stay put at least for now, especially with the baby coming. Leander is still very negative about Jerry Bidlack and wishes that he could shift his piano workshop somewhere else. But where? He has thought of Pendle Hill, but PH has no pianos. When Deanna got home (at about 11:30 p.m.) they showed me a sonogram of the baby, 3 mm long. A dark blur inside a gray blur. Stayed up until 1:00 a.m., talking.

Potomac, MD

Bagels and lox for breakfast. Leander gave me a very good lesson on the Dello Joio. Too bad Dan couldn’t have been here, too. Then to Kennedy Center to see the RSC (on tour) do A Midsummer Night’s Dream, the same production (the “umbrella” production) we saw last spring at the Barbican, with the wonderful Desmond Barritt as Bottom and Alex Jennings, who has a delicious voice, as Theseus and Oberon. As in London, so here, the performance was pure froth, an exercise in human imagination. Only Puck, the hardest character to realize, was unconvincing. Hippolyta/Titania was played by the same actress, Lindsay Duncan, whom we saw in Cryptogram, though one would never know it, she was so different in the two plays—the mark of a good actor. . . . Then we went to a splendid Vietnamese restaurant in Rockville, my first experience with this delicious cuisine and very handsome people. (We were killing them not too long ago.) More lesson when we returned: very helpful with the Debussy and the Ravel.

Monday, March 4, 1996

Washington

To the State Department’s Foreign Service School. I lectured on “Learning about Greek Politics through Poetry.” The school was closed for five weeks owing to the government shutdown. Everyone there is headed for Athens, no one for Thessaloniki. . . . Flew home, making my first use of the US Air club in both National Airport and Logan. . . . Chrysanthi very loving and excited upon my return. Her hand is much better. Supper at Kendal with Yiayia, to say goodbye before we leave for London. She's fine, but says she's always wanting to sleep. Soon the permanent sleep will come to relieve her. . . . Piles of mail. Galleys to JMGS but no galleys yet from Mercer University Press.

Tuesday, March 5, 1996

Hanover

Delivered our income tax materials to Frank Currier. That's a relief. Authorized Corey Smith to sell Con State Bank and buy Motorola and Tennessee Bank. Lectured at the Engineering School on Science and Poetry; only four students this time, but several were quite lively for a change. Saw Jay Bevan re: JMGS, Mary Beth Duncan re: a testimonial to the Quaker UN office, Holly Parker, who needs a letter to Fred Hills at Simon and Schuster, and then Iason Demos for an hour's tutorial on Ο Χριστός ξανασταυρώνεται and Ο τελευταίος πειρασμός. He's a good reader, very perceptive, and I enjoy conversing with him for a full hour each time in Greek. But what an exhausting day, especially because this is a fast day in our feast-fast regimen. . . . Finished copyediting Zachariadis's article and typed a clean copy of our work at Princeton to send to Dimitri.

Feast day, thankfully. Scrambled eggs and toast for breakfast. Lunch with Steve Fleming at Kendal. He wants to turn a studio apartment into a guest apartment. Says no one wants this apartment; everyone wants at least one bedroom. Rushed back to Sanborn to confer with Jim Hefernan on Holly's thesis. He wanted A minus but agreed to award an A with honors, thankfully. Back to Kendal for joint meeting of the Executive Committee and the Nominating Committee. Lots of questions. Should we increase the Board to 15 to make 3 residents legal? Or reduce the residents to 2? Should Lafayette or Mary Schaffner, or both, go off? We're hoping to attract a senior administrator at Dartmouth, and maybe Cliff Vermilye. . . . Then Executive Committee. The wine problem is on the agenda, alas. John Hennessey kept quizzing me about our Quaker position. I said that it's a part of the testimony of simplicity. That didn't convince him in the slightest. Actually, it's hard to be rational about such things. We're also increasingly aware that John Diffey is getting squeezed in Philadelphia, between the need to be solvent and the need to satisfy people like us, who don't want to pay $500,000 a year. The meeting lasted until 7:20 p.m. I got home just as Dick and Allan were arriving for music. Wolfed some supper and then played Dello Joio and Haydn. Dick noted that we used to "scream" when he suggested Dello Joio and even Martinu. No longer. We now greet these gifted composers as a challenge.

Scrambled to read Demos's last paper and enter his grade (A), to pack, go through piles of office mail, eat our "fast" lunch (broth and lettuce) and get to the MiniCoach by 1:00 p.m. It's snowing, of course. . . . Thankfully, I joined the US Air club two months ago. Used it in D.C. and Logan last weekend, Now used the B.A. club—they have reciprocity—and were very comfortable as we waited from 4:30 until 11:30 to see if the flight would leave. I worked on the computer, finishing my report on Dom-browski's book, and then correcting JMGS galleys. Chrysanthi read a novel. The flight was cancelled. This snow brought Boston's total this winter to a record. BA bussed us to the Holiday Inn in Brockport. Got to sleep at 1:30 a.m.

Friday, March 8, 1996

Boston

Awake at 9:30. Full breakfast of eggs, sausage, bacon, potatoes. We decided to break our fast. Telephoned Daphne. Comfortable morning. Chrysanthi poolside reading the paper, and using the exercise machines. I back to the computer, vetting JMGS and trying to answer John Hennessey's objection to my view of Quaker leadership. BA pays for all this and even gave me a telephone card to make free calls. But at 11:30 a.m. it was still snowing. . . . Again at Logan from 3:00 p.m. At 10:30 p.m. we still hadn't gone. But it has stopped snowing. The problem now is the congestion at the airport. They don't have a gate for the plane, so far. I wrote a long letter to John Hennessey (at the hotel) responding to the Pendle Hill pamphlet on Quaker leadership. At the airport, a long letter to Christos Alexiou, in Greek, a letter to Rebecca Mays pointing out more proofreading lapses (!), and then I worked for six hours, rather well, on Gounaris's article on Macedonian historiography. Thank goodness for the BA lounge and the computer. Otherwise this delay would have been exceedingly dismal. We finally boarded at 12:30 a.m. and took off at 1:30 a.m. All told, a 34-hour delay.

London, 32 Christchurch Street

Arrived at 12:30 British time. No lines or congestion at this hour. We were out of immigration and customs in five minutes. Trusty Alex, waiting, drove us to Christchurch Street with lots of conversation, especially about the Irish problem. Daphne not looking as big as I had expected. Their house is small, obviously redesigned from what was probably originally a 2-up 2-down. Very cosy, with a small walled garden out back and an outdoor terrace on the second floor. We washed and then went off to the Tate Gallery to see the Cézanne exhibit, Daphne thoughtfully having secured tickets. It was a marvelous retrospective, showing aspects of Cezanne's art that are rarely exhibited. Usually one sees the famous landscapes, of Mont-Sainte-Victoire for example, the still lifes, and the Card Players. But there is so much more that is entirely different, for example the superb Lac d'Anney, permanently in the Courtauld Gallery, which a critic has called a painting of stupefying beauty. When you step back, the water glistens and you want to jump in. I also liked his very late The Garden at Les Lauves (Phillips Collection, Washington, DC): a mass of blotches suggesting the color and even the shape of a garden. And the portraits are remarkable: of his artist friends, of peasants, of his wife.

Sunday, March 10, 1996

Leisurely lunch at a nearby restaurant. I was daring: had steak and kidney pie. Lovely except for all the smokers. Then walked in gardens of the Royal Hospital, and the adjacent park, which is beautiful, and just right for Daphne with the forthcoming baby. The so-called Hospital is actually a residence for pensioners who were in the army. They dress in distinctive uniforms and are very talkative, it seems. Buds everywhere. Crocuses and snowdrops in bloom, and even a daffodil or two. On the Chelsea Embankment is an unusual statue of a boy and a dolphin, with the boy miraculously flying through the air as though weightless. In the park we watched bungee divers across the river. They dive off a huge crane and have an elastic attached to their ankles. They fall, then bounce up again, then fall, then bounce up. What a way to get thrills on a Sunday afternoon! . . . Daphne's two books done with Duncan Baird, one on the Old and New Testaments, the other on Asian religions, are spectacularly beautiful. Printed in China. . . . I spent time copyediting Zahariadis again and Gounaris for tomorrow's meeting with Mazower.

Monday, March 11, 1996

Finished Gounaris and Zahariadis and printed them. Met Mark Mazower at Covent Garden tube station and went to a splendid Turkish restaurant called Sofra. He is well established at the University of Sussex. Like me, he does research in Greek but teaches something else: European history. He'll write a short introduction for the Macedonia issue of JMGS and says he'd be happy to join the editorial board if asked. He was very interested in my account of the Quaker girls' school, since he's doing something sponsored in part by Amnesty International regarding succor for children, especially orphans, in Greece after the world war and civil war. I suggested that he interview Vouli or Chrysanthi. . . . Quickly back to Chelsea (discovered that the Clintons named their daughter Chelsea because they were walking here when they discovered that Hillary was pregnant); then to King's College for a seminar on Leo III (was he or wasn't he an iconclast?) by David Haldon. Nice to witness such a truly professional performance in both the paper proper and the questions. He answered me brilliantly when I asked if he thought Orthodox today who do obeisance to icons worship the archetype behind the visage, or are they heretics believing in more than one God, in effect? He said that our God is economics but how many people understand its essence. Similarly, how many in medieval times understood the theory of icons? Nice to see Rowena Loverance, who gave me a big kiss on the lips (!) and Roddy Beaton, and Judith Herrin (more kisses, but on the cheeks, French—or Greek—style). Arranged for lunches. . . . To Piccadilly to see Tennessee Williams's The Glass Menagerie again. Good performance, not brilliant. But the play is very sound, with its interesting mix of realism and a kind of transcendentalism, plus its suggestion that the only solution to the excruciating boredom of the characters is war! . . . No supper; a Cadbury chocolate bar sufficed.

Tuesday, March 12, 1996

Working now on Roudometof's JMGS article. . . . Bought Cadbury's chocolate as a gift for Steve and Anne Fleming. Also bought an adapter to use in Greece with my British Style-Writer (thinking ahead). . . . In the evening, met Greg at a Spanish restaurant opposite the Young Vic theatre. Lovely meal of hors d'oeuvres, chicken livers, mussels, paella. Then to the New Vic to see a brilliant translation/adaptation by Martin Crimp of Molière's Misanthrope, splendidly acted by Ken Scott as Alceste and the American Elizabeth McGovern as Jennifer. Done in rhymed couplets with outrageous, scintillating rhymes and brilliant reference to twentieth-century affairs while hinting all the same at the seventeenth-century venue in Louis XIV's court. The Young Vic is a theatre in the round, very intimate, and very cheap. A stimulating funny-sad intellectual-emotional treat.

Met Rowena Loverance at the British Museum and had a long lunch nearby at the Konaki Greek restaurant. She's doing well in the education department of the B.M., although she lost out on a promotion she'd hoped to obtain because the position became redundant. But the Education Department is going to expand into space surrounding the Reading Room, and will offer electronic devices, CD Roms, on various subjects. She made the first of these, on Byzantine art. I'm hoping that she can advise us on our DG1 CD Rom when the time comes. We talked about Woodbrooke. She has just joined the Council and hopes to join the committee, and was interested in my experience. I told her everything, and also a little about Anne Thomas, but withheld Anne's distress at all the Lesbians there for fear that Rowena might be one, too. Woodbrooke's condition is desperate. They are reducing staff. Chris and Christine Lawson will take early retirement this June. Claire will leave and not be replaced in hosuekeeping. Stuart Morton will no longer teach and will concentrate on fundraising. The administrative team will be only 2 instead of 4: John Sheldon and Helen Rowlands, with Helen in charge of the academic program (!). Rowena expressed her distress at the appointment of John Sheldon as principal over Janet Scott, a qualified academic who was thought to be "too academic." The "PC" position is that what matters is bonding, not intellectual challenge. The Yearly Meeting seems to want this. Woodbrooke is complying, but the irony is that it has not become attractive therefore to YM members. At Council, Rowena and Val Ferguson (they're good friends of long standing) tried to favor the more seriously academic option on one issue, but were unsuccessful. Rowena quite sensibly says that Woodbcrooke's troubles are really the YM's troubles in concentrated form—real lack of direction.

The only thing uniting Friends, she says, is silence, not pregnant worshipful silence, but vacant silence. Any talk of God is frowned upon. (She may speak to our condition. I really must pursue this and write a PH pamphlet on the subject.)

Rushed by taxi in heavy traffic to the Haymarket Theatre to meet Chrysanthi for a matinee of Oscar Wilde's An Ideal Husband. How different from last night, and from The Glass Menagerie. But similar in the superb acting. I never knew that Wilde could write serious (while also funny) theatre, very like Shaw. It is about integrity in government and, more deeply, similar to Molière's Misanthrope, about the defects, the inhumanity, of an uncompromising position. So the moral is, I suppose, that we all have some sort of skeleton in the closet, and that love should not be restricted to those who are pure but should be granted to those who are impure and imperfect. Of course the play is old fashioned in its treatment of women: the wife's highest duty is to foster the husband's career. Chrysanthi found that distressing, of course. . . . Nice dinner at home with Daphne and Greg. This morning, the furniture that Daphne bought in Hong Kong arrived. A lovely desk, a chest for blankets, and a low, round Chinese piece used for wedding cakes. All very decorative.

A busy day. I was out from 7:45 a.m. until 7:30 p.m. Went first to the BBC at Bush House. Breakfast with Yannis Karavidas, still very fat, who then interviewed me in the studio upstairs on JMGS, Kazantzakis letters, Kazantzakis and religion, and Demotic Greek 1. Will be broadcast to Greece tonight and here in the UK on Sunday. Then to Foyle's to look for music for Dick, Allan, and me; found two modern pieces. They also had Ned Rorem's trio, but it was £20 and I resisted. Then to the Penn Club just to pass  $\frac{3}{4}$  of an hour reading JMGS galleys. It's very shabby still, but maybe the people are nice. Then to King's to meet Roddy Beaton. Splendid lunch across the street in Aldwych. He has revised two older books and made some progress on the biography of Seferis. He's teaching The Last Temptation in English for the first time and likes my translation. Then rushed by taxi to the Barbican to meet Chrysanthi to see the Abbey Theatre production of Frank McGuinness's Observe the Sons of Ulster Marching Towards the Somme. Eight men, all enlisted to fight in WWI, all Ulster Protestants. The play, brilliant technically, managed to use this to give insight into the hatred today between Protestants and Catholics in Ireland. But primarily it is a brilliant examination of the psychology of warfare, especially in a situation in which the soldiers know they are going to die for nothing, a cause that is meaningless to them, and the only thing that keeps them going is camaraderie (just like Vietnam). If I were still going to teach my Comp. Lit. course again I'd love to use this play. Of course the most remarkable thing is that McGuinness, the author, is an Eire Catholic. . . . Chrysanthi went back to Chelsea and I to Soho to meet Judith Herrin for coffee and pastry. She is happy to be back in London with her husband, of course, but misses Princeton and feels very pressed here by administrative duties at the Centre for Hellenic Studies, Gordon Square. She's half-time at King's. Not much time to write. But one is lucky these days to have a job at all. We hope to visit more, and en famille, if I return to London. These old Birmingham acquaintanceships are gratifyingly deep, it seems. Bought apple tarts for all of us in Sloan Square on the way home. Delicious, leisurely supper, followed by Greg's favorite relaxation, watching tennis on TV. Finally, began to look over my lecture for tomorrow, shortening it. . . . Learned that Greg's income last year was just under \$500,000. Obscene.

Oxford

To Oxford from Paddington. At the plenary session of the Greek Weekend Philip Carrabot played a tape of George Papandreou harranguing the crowds and I swear he sounded just like Harry Kleen. Philip also played a tape of Papadopoulos making his famous surgery and plaster cast speech. Very eerie. Dimitris Tziovas spoke about trends in the '60s in literature. Long talk with Dimitris afterwards about the publication of the papers on modernism delivered last July in my honor. Bryer's one on me will not be included, thank God. It's all being published in Greg Nagy's series in Boston. Elizabeth Jeffries was in the plenary session; she's been here only one month. In the next session I gave my Kazantzakis and Religion lecture to a large audience, and there actually were some questions. . . . At supper, sat with Dimitris Gounelas. He clarified the situation at Salonika next year. I'll actually be collaborating in a course jointly taught by the two of us. He'll do Pentzakis probably and we can both concentrate on philosophical and theological approaches. Won't start until the end of November. I could stay four weeks; no need for more. He'll continue with the course after I leave. No lectures, no texts, just discussion. I should specify the curriculum ahead of time, however, for we may need to photocopy texts. There will probably be eight students. I think I'll do the religious approach, starting with Κωμωδία, including Ασκητική and perhaps Zorba (Saint Zorba!). The class will meet for either two hours or three hours, once a week. Easy!

Oxford-London

Chrysanthi took the 9:15 back to London. I went to Blackwell's Music Shop and bought some more trios for Dick, Allan, and me. Then to 47 Wellington Square again. A good session on Πεντζίκης and Τσίρκας led by D. Gounelas. Good to get some sense of what he'll be doing in the class next fall. We spent 1½ hours analyzing just a few pages of text, mostly Pentzikis, whom he sees as θρησκευόμενος. Interestingly, Thessaloniki becomes a major symbol, like Joyce's Dublin. Next, Roddy Beaton led a class on modern versions of the Odyssey theme: Ιθάκη, Ο γυρισμός του ξενιτεμένου, Η απόγνωση της Πηνελόπης. I had never paid attention to the date of the Seferis poem, 1938, when S. returned to a Greece ruled by Metaxas and WWII was looming. Nor had I noticed the date of Ritsos's Penelope, 1968, I think, written on Lesbos. So Odysseus, the bully, is in a way the colonels, politically. After this, we all went to lunch again at St. Cross College. Marianna Spanaki says she'll use our revised DG1 next year in class if we wish. . . . Back to 32 Christchurch Street by 4:00. Greg watching Rugby on TV, the girls out shopping, looking for baby furniture. Doug Gwyn telephoned. He's visiting his British girlfriend. . . . Thinking again of Oxford, it was lovely to see the students performing, especially in Roddy's class, which was done in the Socratic method. . . . Birthday dinner for Greg: lamb and trimmings. . . . Finished copyediting Roudometof on Macedonia.

London

Jack and Kathy Shepherd came up from Cambridge. All six of us had lunch in an Italian restaurant, sitting next to the famous captain of the British rugby team, whom we saw on TV yesterday. Jack and Kathy are happy because the Pew Foundation has renewed their grant, so they are fine for another 3½ years. I'll try to send Mary Beth Dunham to Jack as an intern next year. We walked afterwards in the Royal Hospital gardens and I brought Jack up to date on mediation at Dartmouth and Peace Studies, and explained what's happening on the Kendal Board. He sees it as a play for power by John Hennessey and Jim Armstrong. It's not just, or primarily, dissatisfaction with procedures. . . . They left around 3:30, and an hour later I went to Covent Garden to meet Doug Gwyn, who is here to visit Caroline Jones. It was fun to meet her because she trained as an actress. She explained the rigorous training: 12 hours a day for two years. Now she's doing Quaker theatre as a form of conflict resolution and will be spending five weeks in Belfast in the summer working with Protestant and Catholic children. But first she'll return to Pendle Hill. Doug still has no sense of how he'll support himself after PH ends in May. I'm hoping that PH will keep him in some capacity for a year so that he can finish his book on the Seekers. . . . Final supper with Daphne and Greg. Chrysanthi will be back in June, and I'll hope to stop on my way to Glasgow later in the summer. And again on our way to Greece in October.

Hanover

Back to piles of mail and also to Kendal Board meeting at 8:30 a.m. A very distressing meeting, with Quaker members on one side and non-Quakers, especially Jim Armstrong, on the other. The issue was whether our line item for charitableness should be a "reserve" fund. Jim reported that the Finance Committee was opposed (although they really weren't very united). Margery made an eloquent speech in favor. I said that the matter was so basic that we should discuss it but not make a decision. Jim wouldn't hear of that: the committee had made a recommendation. I spoke of the "tyranny of committees." Jim said he felt a vote was in order. I said I felt that silence was in order. Finally, so that we could do something, we decided to approve the recommendation only for this fiscal year, implying that this was not a definitive decision on policy. Jim kept insisting that we cannot tax the residents—he being a resident, of course, and having a clear conflict of interest. But the real controversy was much more basic: between a Quaker (theocratic) vision of governance according to certain principles even if residents disagree and a secular, democratic system governed by rationality and efficiency. Jim could not abide having the decision postponed. . . . I felt that all the coherence established over 4½ years had been smashed. . . . Steve Fleming, more "realistic," counseled that things cannot be the same now that the Board is no longer 100% Quaker, and that both sides must learn to adjust. Of course! But still, it hurts.

Sunday, March 24, 1996

Chrysanthi took Yiayia out for a drive, and she had another seizure: intense dizziness, loss of color, cold sweat, and then vomiting. But she felt better afterwards. Very scary.

Monday, March 25, 1996

Long talk with Steve about the board situation, and later with Laura Melly, Margery, and also Don Kidder. Jim Armstrong has offered an olive branch to Margery, apparently. She and Alan invited us to Groton tomorrow.

Tuesday, March 26, 1996

Groton, Vermont

The Walkers' dream-house on Groton Lake, designed by Alan. Lovely. Long lunch discussing what to do. Helped by John Diffey on the telephone. Apparently everyone knows that Kendal at Hanover's board is divided, owing to my participation in Laura Melly's workshop, and my ministry in Hanover Meeting, and my talk with Lloyd Lewis. John says all this could inhibit "sales"! I'm too naïve, as Chrysanthi keeps telling me. Margery suggested some revisions of our "Position Paper" (as did L. Melly) to make it speak more easily to non-Quakers. An interesting article in The Economist makes me see John Hennessey and Jim Armstrong as representing "Enlightenment Values" (logic, efficiency, science) and we Quakers medieval ones.

To Columbus, Ohio

Spoke with Dr. Gerber. My PSA has gone up again; it's now over 7. So he wants me now to have a biopsy. The prostate will either be benign or have a low-grade cancer or a high-grade cancer. If high-grade, then the prostate must come out. If low-grade, we'll need to talk. In any case, Gerber is sanguine. It's early, and should be curable. Amen.

Flew to Columbus, Ohio. Very unpleasant. Next to a woman who didn't stop talking for an hour. Taxi driver in Columbus an Ethiopian. Couldn't understand me when I said I was going to "Victorian Bed and Breakfast." Couldn't find the street. Finally we asked someone and arrived. A Victorian mansion, occupied by an eccentric English lady. Seven dogs in her living room. Her husband drove me to the "annex," another Victorian mansion filled with beautiful antiques. The husband said, "My wife arranges things. I would do it differently." One other symposiast was there, a Peter Murphy from Melbourne. We had lots to talk about. . . . Supper take-out from Kentucky Friend Chicken. . . . I'm reading galleys for the Middleton book—slow. . . . Dimitri and Mache finally sent the scenario for Lesson 4 of Demotic Greek 1, quite nice, with the mother a physician and the father washing the dishes. . . . Last Wednesday I taught the first class of Greek 13, doing three Cavafy poems. What joy! It occurred to me, especially after last Tuesday, "Why am I squandering my life as a trustee of Kendal? What I do best and enjoy most is teaching literature. And this is my last class at Dartmouth." . . . E-mail from Leander, who is very excited about the trio that he has been asked to join. It will have a good series in D.C. Little by little he is reaching the "big time." He and Deanna played last night at Crosslands. He spoke to Clayton Farraday, who predicted that Alec will never return to the US except in the summers. What a shame that he didn't take the headmastership of Sandy Spring Friends School.

Saturday, March 30, 1996

Columbus, Ohio

Breakfast with Tom Gallant, the historian from Florida. He turns out to be a New Hampshire native, half French and half Native American. Nice man. Vassilis and Artemis and Gregory arrived while I was still in my bathrobe and seemed extraordinarily surprised to see Peter Bien without a necktie. The symposium was held on the third floor, a large room filled, as is the rest of the house, with bibelots. I gave a talk on "Why Kazantzakis's books are out of print." Nice group; interesting papers. One symposiast is the book review editor of To Βήμα, Mitropoulos. After a long day, we all went off to a splendid restaurant and had a four-hour meal. I sat next to Stratos and had a good chance to know him better. He is alone in the world—parents dead, only sibling killed in an auto accident in Greece, no extended family in Greece. He stays in hotels when he goes. But he is married to an American from Iowa who has a family there. Sad. Gregory's wife came; she has Quaker connections and taught in a Friends school. She has just published a novel with Faber and Faber. Long talk earlier with Gail Holst-Warhaft.

Sunday, March 31, 1996

The symposium continued until noon. One of the participants thanked me privately for "defusing" things. To the airport with Gail; lots of talk. But I did some more galleys on the plane. Directly from Lebanon airport to Kit and Keith Van Winkle's for supper with Mr. and Mrs. Shin and Alex Ogle, the flutist. They'd just done a concert: flute and piano. Mr. Shin told me his life story, more or less. He is now counseling Japanese, Korean, and Chinese students in prep schools in Massachusetts, Vermont, and New Hampshire. Ogle is a Harvard drop-out. Started flute seriously only after leaving Harvard. Kit is excited about her new piano. She's already sent in her tuition for Leander's workshop. . . . Leander and Deanna arrived quite late.

April 1, 1996

We had a jolly joint birthday party for Leander and Helene Rassias, both 40 years old, with her husband, Bill Miles, just turned 50. John and Mary came later and Leander promised John that he would practice his arpeggios!

Tuesday, April 2, 1996

To Kendal with Leander and Deanna for supper with Yiayia. I left early to go to Dick's to play the Mozart and Beethoven Quintets with his group. Willy Black on bassoon. When I told Leander with dismay that I wouldn't be able to play my part decently, he said, "Don't worry, the others won't either," and he was right. After the others left, Dick and I continued with Satie and Fauré.

Wednesday, April 3, 1996

A birthday party for Edward Bradley, turned 60. He had a heart attack a few weeks ago, but seems to be doing better—on strict diet. Douglas Marshall and wife were there, from St. Paul's School. . . . Took Barbara Will out for lunch. She turns out to be a violinist—attended Greenwood. Nice to get to know one of my younger colleagues at last. . . . Department meeting. Peter Saccio wants to move the Composition Center out to get more office space. I spoke against. Motion tabled until next week. I think that it will fail.

Thursday, April 4, 1996

Leander and Deanna off to the White Mountains for a little private holiday in a resort. Kendal meetings on accreditation, then Executive Committee. Margery and I had revised our "Position Paper" with advice from Laura Melly and using some of Warren Witte's language, to make it less defensive. Jim Armstrong and John Hennessey are still opposed to opening the question at the next board meeting. Steve Agrees. They want to do it at a retreat, or in committee, over time. Jim clearly knows that he acted badly at the last meeting. Too aggressive. We're making progress, but always on their terms, not ours. . . . Tom and Nardy Campion for supper. They want to go to Greece on an Elder Hostel and sought advice.

Friday, April 5, 1996

Leander and Deanna are back after two days of gourmet meals and a view of Mount Washington from their bedroom window. Leander gave me a very good lesson on the Ravel and also on the Debussy. Supper at Kendal.

Saturday, April 6, 1996

Tom and Nancy Corindia here for supper with Leander and Deanna, plus Yiayia. Chrysanthi made Easter lamb.

Sunday, April 7, 1996

I'm back on the trustees of Hanover Meeting. We met this morning. Good Meeting afterwards. Again, Chris Dye ministered well. Leander and Deanna left at noon; had a terrible trip because of snow, sleet, and miserable traffic around New York City.

Wednesday, April 10, 1996

Leander called yesterday, very enthusiastic about the workbench I bought him for his birthday. . . . Department meeting defeated the motion to send the Composition Center elsewhere. Hooray!

Thursday, April 11, 1996

To the clinic for prostate biopsy by Dr. Rous. In two weeks I'll get a report. Cancer or no cancer. I'm very relaxed about the whole thing, but the nurse said that my blood pressure was up before the procedure. Bumped into Peter French and his wife in the hospital. Their boy is the same: motionless but with open eyes and able to "track" the motion of someone's hand. Poor people! Peter quit his job in Indonesia and will be looking here. . . . Chrysanthi and I went out to Sweet Tomatoes to "celebrate" my biopsy.

Friday, April 12, 1996

Working steadily to try to prepare for Princeton. Made some progress on the grammar for chapter 5.

Sunday, April 14, 1996

New York–Princeton

Nice visit to the Museum of Modern Art, after many years. Special Brancusi show, strategically placed just after some monumental Rodin sculptures. Brancusi revolted against Rodin's dominance and style, opting for the petite and abstract. His "expressions" of fish, roosters, birds in space, etc., are so clean and simple. . . . Also nice to see a large piece by David Smith called "Australia," and of course Monet's water lilies, and the model of the Lever House, which is, like Brancusi's sculptures, so "clean" and simple.

Read a Cornell student's thesis. I've been advising her. Holly Lebowitz's "Archetypal Man, Archetypal God: A Jungian Analysis of The Last Temptation of Christ"—the film, not the book. Very detailed on Scorsese's effects and intentions, but the Jungian part often seems stretched. . . . Before leaving this morning, I wrote a short reply to John Wyatt at Woodbrooke, consoling him (he was fired). Long talk with Anne Thomas last night. She reports that John Sheldon is still bad-mouthing me.

Monday, April 15, 1996

Princeton

Right to work again with Dimitri Gondicas and (later) with Andromache Karanika. They go over my grammar and rewrite large parts of it. . . . I'd booked lunch with Bob Brown at Princeton University Press, and once again he didn't show up. (Later he telephoned to say he'd had a crisis with taxes: today is the last day.) Saw Mary Mullen again; she asked about the Letters, of course.

Tuesday, April 16, 1996

Princeton

I'm extraordinarily comfortable in lovely room 36 at Palmer House, with windows across two entire walls. Lunch today with Dimitri, catching up on appointments: e.g., Calotychos got the job at NYU over Sifakis's objections. Long, pleasant supper with Amy Mims, who is translating more of Ritsos. Although American, she has no family or roots here and says she belongs in Greece.

Wednesday, April 17, 1996

Princeton

Good lunch with Nicos Mouzelis, a natural intellectual who turned out to be very interested, as a sociologist, in Quakerism. I'm sending him Howard Brinton's Friends for 300 Years. And, he agreed to come on the Editorial Board of JMGs, as has Mark Mazower, two strong additions. . . . We were meant to have a talk today by Kostas Kazazis, to whom I had sent our chapters 1 to 4 for vetting, but his back collapsed and the visit was canceled. . . . I went off to supper by myself at 6:45 when we finished, feeling guilty later that I hadn't asked Mache. Will do so next time.

Thursday, April 18, 1996

Princeton–Pendle Hill

Lunch with Bob Fagles, who'll be coming to Dartmouth at my invitation next October to read from his new translation of the Odyssey. A charming man, devoted pedagogue. If we were all like him, how good our universities would be! . . . Met Claire Myones on Nassau Street as I was waiting for the bus; talked about Dimitris's growing exhaustion. He needs to learn to say No and relax. . . . Bus 606 to Trenton instantaneously places one in a different world: a black world, lower class. Ditto for Trenton rail station and SEPTA train to Philadelphia (as opposed to AMTRAK).

At Pendle Hill, thrust again instantaneously into a different world. To begin: meeting with Dan, Rebecca, Chuck Fager, Barbara Parsons, and Margaret Fraser regarding Rebecca's concerns about Chuck's publications (complicated by the fact that they had a brief affair and now Chuck won't communicate with her except via writing). We ironed out the troubles, one by one. Then I and Barb Parsons left. I went to Dan's to practice Ravel; the others remained to see if the exclusively non-verbal communication between Rebecca and Chuck can be ended. (Rebecca wants to have supper with me in May, outside of Pendle Hill, presumably to talk about all this.) Finally Dan came, fed up with Rebecca, and thankfully we got to Ravel, Debussy, and Dello Joio. Our hands get in each other's way, and we're trying to fix that. We've switched parts in the Ravel, at Leander's suggestion, and I'm still struggling to play the notes of the second part. I can learn things, but it takes so very long.

Friday, April 19, 1996

Pendle Hill

A busy day. Early morning, attempt to finish my homework: reading two pamphlet submissions and reporting on a book submission and reading applications for the Cadbury Fellowship. Agenda setting with Kathleen Flanagan (subbing for Rebecca,, who's at QUIP in Greensboro). Publication Committee at 12:30. Accepted the pamphlet I wanted, and rejected the one I didn't want. Good! Books at 3:00. Liz Kamphausen very opposed to Kashatus's book on Quaker education, seemingly because he uses sexist language (she says). Doug Gwyn is very positive. Emily Conlon opposed because it has long footnotes. Jeannette Reid in favor. Deadlock. We turned to five other manuscripts that need to be vetted. Finally, in the last five minutes, thanks to Doug, we managed to approve, and Liz agreed to “stand aside.” Good Quaker process. . . . Ran to the library for Cadbury Fellowship Committee. Most applicants easily eliminated. Two left, one favored by Anne Thomas and one who is currently here. Kenneth Carroll, who of course dominates (because he gave the money) favors the one here, but Anne’s favorite will probably come anyway, in another capacity. Everyone seems positive about our choice. . . . Dessert and coffee with Sally Palmer and Bob and Pat Lyon. Bob very aged. General Board meeting: a shout—“Peter!” It was Lloyd Lewis. We sat together and whispered to each other as much as possible. How nice to see him again. As he said, he’s a “failure at retirement”—i.e., working harder than ever. . . . The presentation was by a Quaker who was a TV anchor for news, speaking about integrity, how on several occasions her integrity got her fired. . . . Thankfully, finished this long day with four-hand piano with Dan, our “repertoire” again: getting better. Plus Mozart’s 40th, the first movement went very well, the third and fourth less well. (Skipped the adagio.) . . . Stayed up until 12:30 finishing minutes for Publications and Books and printing them on the Stylewriter that I’ve carried with me owing to Princeton needs. Started reading TLS review of a new book by Conor Cruise O’Brien on the contemporary distrust of enlightenment values, but fell deliciously asleep.

Saturday, April 20, 1996

Pendle Hill–Hanover

Pendle Hill students are apprehensive regarding the rumor that the residential program will be “abandoned.” First board session: Denny and Margaret spoke well about plans for change. Then we broke into small groups. General Board members apprehensive about a supposed challenge to “community.” One said that the last thing she would want at Pendle Hill is a service project, since she does that all the time and comes to Pendle Hill for contemplation. People resented not being consulted in advance, and being part of a rush to act. Etc., etc. We aired most of this in the Executive Board meeting that followed. Nevertheless, we’ll probably be asked to make fundamental changes at the May meeting. . . . After lunch, I finished a report on a book submission, very engaging, on the proper use of money.

Worked all day again on Demotic Greek 1. Slow. Supper at Mrs. Ou's with Steve and Anne Fleming. Off duty, he's more childish than on duty. Also very eager about money, it seems. Complained about John Diffey's salary and the excessive salaries of corporate heads. But he makes $105,000 a year at age 31. (However, Greg Tebbe makes $500,000!)

Tuesday, April 23, 1996

Spoke with Dr. Rous regarding the prostate biopsy. I have cancer. He says it's "slow"—no rush to do anything. I'll go in to talk to him at length next week. And Chrysanthi has the flu and 102 temperature. But spring is here. The lilacs are filled with buds.

Thursday, April 25, 1996

Just received Adrian Wright's biography of L. P. Hartley, by post from Blackwell's. He has made good use of Hartley's letters to me, including the one where Hartley said "You and I are of the elite." Pictures and descriptions of Avondale, of servants, etc. bring back vivid memories. He even records that I was invited to Avondale. There is also much of course about Fletton Tower, which was sold last year after Hartley's sister's death. Good to see that everyone else, not just I, sensed Hartley's decline as a writer. The later books were even rejected by Hamish Hamilton. Poor Hartley died a hopeless alcoholic.

May 10, 1996

Lots of anguish about the operation. Rous scheduled me for June 14: radical prostatectomy. Jim Freedman wants me to go to his doctor at Mass General. Various people warned against Rous, including Athos Rassias, now an anesthesiologist, and a doctor contacted by Tom Corindia, and, most rigorously, Diana Taylor's husband, an internist. All extolled Dr. Heaney. So I switched. Heaney gave me a good exam and seems more flexible. I'm now scheduled for June 7th. Have taken a leave of absence from the Kendal board, a big relief. Canceled Leander's four-hand workshop, alas. Canceled Chrysanthi's trip to London. Canceled all boards, meeting in Ithaca, etc. Still hope to sit on Middleton's Ph.D. oral in Glasgow on August 1st but that, too, is doubtful. And the farm? Many people have been nice. John Rassias telephones almost daily. John Iatrides wrote a heartfelt letter. Still haven't told Mother. That's the hardest. . . . but I'm going to Athens, still, to give the Kimon Friar lecture on May 22nd.

May 16, 1996

To Pendle Hill. Good practice with Dan: Debussy, Ravel, Dello Joio, and Mozart's 40th for good measure. I won't be able to join him at the workshop; the operation is that same day, but Leander will partner him. He has practiced and is doing much better. After a few tries we were able to do all the pieces reasonably well without faltering. . . . Talked late into the night, mostly about his retirement plans (or lack of plans) after he leaves PH in four years. Oh, Liz came and we played our program for her as audience and then had a cream tea.

May 17, 1996

A full day at Pendle Hill. Breakfast with Ben Pink Dandelion, here from Woodbrooke for the Issues program. He says that the three redundancies (John Wyatt, Claire Chamberlain, Stuart Morton) have been good, giving the new management team a sense of solidarity and mission. But where and how they'll get students remains a problem. . . . At Meeting, I ministered toward the end about death, mentioning my own life-threatening disease and developing a belief in death as fulfillment in the natural world, since the promise of an afterlife is no longer meaningful. Many people apparently heard this message, as they told me later. It was a difficult one to give. . . . Book Committee afterward. Rebecca tried to sabotage our decision to accept Kashatus's on education, but Doug and I persisted, and we compromised, maintaining the promise provided he can obtain \$3000 in subsidy. . . . Publications Committee went quickly for a change: two rejections and one return for substantial revision. . . . Then Rebecca and I went to hear Paul Anderson, an evangelical Friends pastor and professor of New Testament at George Fox College in Oregon. Very sweet, engaging man, apparently quite tolerant of liberals. His views make sense: on sexuality, "Just say No," celibacy until marriage, much better than AIDS or teenage pregnancy. But the basic premise is unacceptable to me—namely, that the Bible says so-and-so and the Bible is the inspired word of God. Some of the PH students spoke, mostly about their own Lesbianism, and why should this be thought sinful. Actually, one spoke so beautifully, so clearly from the heart, that her words, to me, seemed the Word of God much more than St. Paul regarding the horrors of homosexuality. . . . Then out to Media Inn with Rebecca for an intimate supper. I had assumed that her purpose was personal, but she spent  $\frac{9}{10}$  of the time talking about staff-board relations, the threat of change, the resentment of decisions being handed down from on high. Only at the very end did she want me to know (which I'd already known but of course did not say) that she had been "going out" with Chuck Fager, that this relationship had soured, and that its past history obviously colored her current difficulties with his publishing program. Fine! . . . Executive Board grappled with yet another deficit budget. Vince and I seemed more worried about it than the other trustees. Plans are clearly under way to terminate one of the core teachers, evidently Nancy Frommelt, but all this is secret so far. They want to wait until the students leave. There will be big trouble if this is done—a different kind of trouble if it's not done. Afterwards, Dan and I talked about all this at length, after some more good practice. Nice to see Oliver Rodgers at the meeting.

Executive Board in the morning followed by lunch with Dan in which he expanded, again, on his difficulty in working with Denny (although the relationship in some ways is better than it had been). Anne Moore was nice to me. . . . Then off to Temple University for the "Kazantzakis Festival." Greeted at the door by a woman who said, "You don't recognize me?" I didn't. She turned out to be the Greek neighbor in Sunnyside in 1956 who was so close to Chrysanthi and who once came to the farm when I was building the kitchen wing and installing the light in the ceiling. Reunion after more than 3 years. Morton Levitt was there to introduce me. Kostas Myrsiadis gave an initial presentation on the reception of Kazantzakis's Odyssey. I gave my "Kazantzakis's Long Apprenticeship to Christian Themes" as a kind of rehearsal for Athens next week. Most of it was OK, but some (about monism and dualism) still a bit dense. Supper afterwards with Kyriakos and his wife in a hotel on City Line Avenue and then tea in their home in Bryn Mawr. He is a sociologist, ferociously intelligent, very intellectually curious. He has long been an adviser of Kenneth Boulding. I'll send him the sonnets. He thinks that Nicos Mouzelis, although gifted, is plowing over old fields, writing about theories that are already passé. They have a lovely sweet child about 6 years old. What a gift! They want to meet Chrysanthi. . . . Back to Roadside. More practice on repertoire, followed by a Bach toc-cata and fugue, root beer floats, and more talk until midnight. How nice to have this easy relationship with Dan!

Protein-rich breakfast at Philadelphia airport (this is my Feast Day in the feast-fast regimen). Flew to Boston to join Lee Pelton and others interviewing candidates for the Tucker deanship. Interesting experience. We had all kinds, from an ex-cook who had started the Collis Café, to an ex-college president. Many ordained ministers who had chosen not to have parishes. After each candidate, the committee caucused. At first I thought that it would always be the two women in the group against the men, but the results were sometimes more diverse. More tomorrow. . . . Joe O'Connell drove me to Harvard Square. He is an oncologist in the Medical School but now in charge of service projects and ethical education. Supper with Meg Alexiou. I told her about my cancer, of course, and she told me about her resolve to quit Harvard in no more than three years, to be able to return to England and be with Michael Hendys in Kent and closer to Dimitri. Good fellowship.

Monday, May 20, 1996

Interviewing again from 8:00 a.m. until 5:00 p.m. We narrowed the field to six out of twelve. I convinced them to bring the head of the Ethical Culture Society to Hanover next week to interview also. I was the only one who knew of the Ethical Culture Society's importance. Memories of Algernon Black, and my father's involvement there, and square dancing there on Friday nights! At the end, I drew Lee Pelton aside and told him about my cancer. He was very moved. It is fascinating to see the different way, and degree, that different people respond to my news. . . . Then to Logan Airport. Soup (this is "fast" day). Flight to London.

London–Athens

Telephoned Daphne from Gatwick. No baby yet. Arrived at Athens at 3:00 p.m., Greek time. Met at airport by Mather Gennett and Panayotis, the driver. On the way, I asked about the Kaisariani Monastery. Is it really within walking distance of the new university (as we say it is in Demotic Greek 1)? It is. We passed by it. Then to Deree. Fifteen minutes with President Bailey, who has been there for twenty years and has added buildings, students, programs. Gennett talks obsessively about rare books, prices, collecting. They installed me in the VIP apartment, a palace, huge and beautiful, overlooking half of Athens. At 7:00, a drink with the dean, Bob Boughner, a roly-poly classicist who seems to have arrived here by accident and one of whose major qualifications was that he is not a Greek-American. Then Panagotis reappeared with a van to take Boughner, me, Gennett, and wife to Mets for supper, and to meet Christos Alexiou and Eri. All this worked perfectly. Christos and I, old friends as always, both marveling at how the passage of time seems to evaporate, so that we take up exactly where we had left off so many years before. And my feast-fast worked amazingly well. I felt perfectly normal, and only began to feel tired around 11:00 p.m., Greek time (= 4:00 p.m. USA time). Evi is strange; she talks so slowly. But I'm happy for Christos that he has her, and of course their daughter, Aspasia Maria. . . . Long telephone call with Dia Philippides earlier in the day. We'll see each other tomorrow.

Athens

By taxi downtown. Long circuitous trip. American Express Bank. Discussed converting our account to Greek Treasury Notes or bonds, to avoid charges and tax. But I didn't want to make the decision in a rush. Met Christos at 11:00 a.m. at Govostis's bookshop on Asklepiou. Most of the old university is all torn up for a Metro station. Met Γκοβόστης himself. Then walked to Monastiraki, to Christos's office for the Greek Autistic Society. For the first time I'd learned all that he has accomplished in three years. Remarkable. Now he hopes to get money from AHEPA. With luck in five years they'll have six homes for autistic people and a center for administration and research in Halandri. His secretary is a sweet woman who is the parent of one autistic child and one normal one. . . . Then a horrible taxi ride, 45 minutes, to Kolonaki. Streets blocked off, traffic diverted, bumper to bumper. But the cab was air-conditioned. Reached Dia's at 1:40. Wim Bakker was there, also Dia's mother, and the old Greek servant who had been with the family for thirty years. Full lunch, very pleasant, with good fellowship. It's still a bit hard to see Wim in this situation, after knowing him married in Holland to his first wife, with their children. But this happens all the time nowadays. . . . Then quickly to Christos's to see the child. And I explained PSA to him and urged him to have exams, because he has some symptoms: gets up four or five times at night to urinate. . . . Taxi back to my palace in Aghia Paraskevi; arrived at 5:30 p.m. Wash. Nap. Little work on the computer, typing in Demotic Greek changes and editing Iatrides's book review of Sfikas. Then Boughner walked me to Deree. Introductions: new people, old friends, e-mail acquaintances. Don Nielsen. Byron Raizis. John Zervos (Athens Center). Mike and Mary Keeley. John Chiolis. And of course, inevitably, Patroklos Stavrou. Also Iacovos Tsalicoglou, whom I didn't recognize at first, to my embarrassment. He brought me his sister's new novel. Nice introduction by the college's vice president and dean. My lecture went well, very well, from all accounts. Nielsen told me afterwards that it came from the heart as well as the mind since, I suppose, the subject in part was a theory of death—death as the Paraclete, the Comforter. I opened it to questions afterward, and there were good ones, but then Stavrou stood up and started to declaim at great length about the re-publication of Kazantzakis's works. Luckily I diverted to other questioners. Afterwards, a full supper for fifty people. Bed at 12:30 a.m.

Athens–New York–Boston–Hanover

Worked on the computer a bit in the morning. Another driver delivered me to the airport. Worked some more on the computer, typing in changes for DG1. Departure delayed an hour because of busy skies owing to a soccer match in Italy yesterday. Long—too long—flight to New York: 10½ hours owing to headwinds. But they showed Sense and Sensibility, and that was a treat. The language and the faces are so beautiful. . . . I spent time editing the Residential Life Section of the Kendal self-study, abysmally written, alas, and needing a great many changes. . . . Spoke Greek continually all these days, except when at Deree, without difficulty. Indeed, I was pleased that various officials, at the bank and airport, answered me in Greek now instead of in English, as they always used to do.

May 28, 1996

Christina Sloane Tebbe born, 7.1 lbs., today in London, on my birthday. Also, luncheon by Comparative Literature with some nice words and a present: a new translation of Dante's "Inferno." Chris Wolff comforting about my illness. Supper at Kendal with Yiayia, Audrey, and Ray Hall.

June 1, 1996

Terpni

Lovely day at the farm. Started the John Deere, Jari, Troy-Bilt. Supper with Shapiros.

June 2, 1996

Terpni

Cleaned up around the office, hoping to work there this summer. Saw Perrymans at the new ice cream place next to Riverside Station. . . . Nice letter from Ignat on my return, wishing me well. And telephone call from Ned. . . . Many phone calls these days to Daphne, who was pampered in the clinic, taught how to hold, bathe, clean, and nurse the baby. She and Greg are back home now. Vaughan will be coming soon to help. A friend brought them lasagna for supper. We still have not heard Christina Sloane's voice.

Thursday, June 6, 1996

A day spent at home preparing for tomorrow. Horrible stuff to drink to produce diarrhea to clean out the entire system. No solid foods. Yesterday, good lunch with Ned, and then music with Dick and Allan. So, normalcy up to the last minute, more or less. As I told Ned, I have not been depressed, and I've slept every night normally. Occasionally, to be sure, my mind was obsessed with the fear that the cancer has spread to the lymphatic system. But only occasionally. It's interesting how people have reacted. Darrel Mansell, for instance, has been remarkably solicitous, contrary to expectation. Even Peter Saccio has been nice. On the other hand, John Diffey, whom I'd have expected to call or visit, was totally absent. No word. But generally people have been most kind, and first and foremost John Rassias, who has telephoned me every day for two weeks to say "All is light! Everything will be golden!"

Friday, June 7, 1996

Hitchcock Hospital

At the Admitting Office at 6:00 a.m. Into the OR by 7:30. As they wheeled me in they gave me a sedative, and the next I knew someone was telling me "It's all finished." Remarkable. Dr. Heaney said that everything went extremely well. No bleeding. None of the blood I had donated was even used. The lymph nodes seemed OK; there were no hard spots. But we won't know for certain until the news comes back from the pathology lab in about a week. Heaney will call me. So I'm still not off the hook. Generally, however, everything looks good. And they even repaired the bilateral hernia. Chrysanthi was here most of the day, most relieved. They walked me from bed to chair but I was dizzy and my legs felt like rubber. When I got into the chair I vomited profusely, and then felt better. Tried reading TLS but couldn't. Slept fitfully, not because of pain—there was none—but because I really wasn't tired.

Saturday, June 8, 1996

Hitchcock Hospital

Much improved. Walked with no difficulty. Ate a full breakfast. Still no pain by late morning even though the epidural was discontinued. Chrysanthi telephoned lots of people last night—Dick, Allan, Bins, Sheila, Lucia, and more this morning. Alec called from Jakarta and started crying when he heard the good news. Leander called from Kinhaven. Daphne reached me at the hospital.

Sunday, June 9, 1996

Return

Dr. Cozzolino removed the drain this morning and told me I could go home. The nurse gave me a bag of tricks and full instructions about medications, the catheter, etc. So at 11:00 a.m. I was home. Ate, napped, used the computer, checked e-mail, telephoned Margery Walker and Tom Corindia. The Nodas came while I was napping. Afterwards Alice called from Kinhaven, and Steve Fleming, then Jim Freedman at the end of his long day conducting Dartmouth's graduation (how nice that it didn't rain). And Mother came for supper. I still have not moved my bowels; that is a worry. Maybe tomorrow. Lots of rumbling in the stomach, for sure. Am taking pain medication for the incision. Reading TLSs, nothing more serious at the moment. Bernard Redmont called (not knowing I was sick) about his pamphlet on "Quaker Moderation." I must produce that in camera-ready form this summer and have done.

Monday, June 10, 1996

Everything worse today. Digestive system not working. Incessant rumbling in stomach and intestines dancing inside me, with severe cramps. Called Dr. Cozzolino. He told me to take milk of magnesia. Soon afterwards I passed gas for the first time, a good sign. Diarrhea, amber colored, showing that the awful bowel prep from Thursday was still inside me. Visiting nurse came, very nice. Says my incision is doing very well indeed. Lungs, pulse, blood pressure all fine. Another problem is passage of blood and other liquid around the catheter through the penis, with considerable discomfort. Cozzolino said this is caused by bladder spasms and is "normal." Lots of flowers and telephone calls. People really do care, it seems. 4:00 to 6:00 p.m., participated in Tucker Search Committee meeting via speaker phone.

Tuesday, June 11, 1996

Stomach rumbles continued but without pain. But Tuesday night, three times, I passed large squirts of urine from outside the catheter. Worried, telephoned Cozzolino, who again said this is OK, so long as the catheter itself isn't blocked, which it isn't.

Wednesday, June 12, 1996

Visiting nurse again. Said that the squirts of urine are a good sign—the bladder is actively opposing the catheter, wants it out, i.e., is strong and responsive, which bodes well for continence later, as opposed to a passive bladder that doesn't react. So, you never know. Still no solid bowel movement. But she told me to discontinue the codeine, which is constipating, and to hope for something normal by tomorrow. Otherwise, I'm feeling quite well. Dick Williamson came and we talked for an hour.

Thursday, June 13, 1996

Last night: first solid stool. This morning two more. Digestive system seems to be working again. E-mail from David Jaspers in Glasgow. I told him that in all likelihood I'll be able to be there for the viva on August 1st. . . . Nice appreciative note from Holly Parker.

Friday, June 14, 1969

Long visit from John Rassias, another from Dick Williamson yesterday. Today Allan Munck telephoned, and also the nice Greek-American psychiatrist who was operated on by Rous. Went out this morning for the first time, with the leg bag, to the hospital to have clips removed. Saw Dr. Heaney briefly. Catheter removal scheduled for June 25—Tuesday week. But no report yet from pathology. . . . Went to my room (331) to say thanks again to the nurses. Steve there. Left a note for Mac. In the Atrium, saw Edward Bradley and Sheila Harvey. Edward looking very thin, doing rehabilitation exercises after heart surgery. Sheila showed off her wedding ring.

Filia Macedon gave us a cassette of old-time καντάδες, wonderful to hear Chrysanthi singing along and dancing. We even danced a little, sedately. Songs like Τα πράσινα μάτια. . . . Called Eleanor Fletcher to say I'd most likely be going to Glasgow but to book me as an invalid requiring a wheelchair, in order to have help with luggage.

6:30 p.m. Hooray! Dr. Heaney telephoned with good news. The pathologists' report shows that the cancer was wholly confined to the prostate. Maybe I have cheated fate. I now need to measure PSA periodically. Heaney says that if I go five years with PSA at zero, the likelihood of a recurrence is minuscule. If anything happens, it's likely to happen within five years, but that, too, he feels, is not probable. Hooray!

Friday, June 21, 1996

I'm sending the following letter out to all the good people who have wished me well.

Ἐγεία καὶ νοῦς ἐσθλὰ τῷ βίῳ δύο.

(“Health and intellect are life’s two blessings.”)

—Menander

Yes, health and intellect are life’s two blessings. But when one becomes ill with cancer one realizes that love and friendship ought to be added. For me, it was (almost!) worth getting sick in order to experience the inflowing of concern, care, and good wishes from so many quarters. First the hospital room and then our home received vase after vase of flowers; hot soup appeared on the doorstep; the telephone rang off the hook. John Rassias called every day for two weeks prior to the operation, finding me even in Philadelphia and Boston, to say only one thing: “All is light. Light! Light!” Jim Freedman shared his own anguish at the onset of cancer and his relief at its control, in many conversations. Dick Williamson and Allan Munck came round to the hospital and home. But the true hero in all this was Chrysanthi, who canceled plans to be in London for the entire month of June with our daughter Daphne and our first grandchild, Christina Sloane Tebbe, born on May 28 (my birthday!) in order to care for me, who, according to our children’s predictions, was bound to be an “impossible patient” (really, I wasn’t so bad). In any case a thousand thanks to you and all the others who were kind enough to inquire, telephone, send flowers or cards, visit, or pray.

I can now report (1) that the operation itself went very well, not requiring transfusions of the blood I had previously donated for myself, and sparing one set of the nerves that govern sexual potency (in addition, as a special bonus, the surgeon repaired a bilateral hernia), (2) that the pathologist’s report, received after a week of anxious waiting, confirmed that no metastasis had occurred to adjoining lymph nodes or other tissues, and furthermore that the cancer was wholly confined within the prostate gland itself, inside the capsule. Very good news indeed! Of course, there is always a chance of a recurrence; I will need to monitor the situation on a regular basis. But I have been told that if no recurrence occurs in the first four or five years, the likelihood after that is virtually zero.

A thousand thanks to medical science in the abstract for advancing so quickly—if all this had happened even eight or nine years ago, I would probably not have been diagnosed early enough for a cure. And then a thousand thanks to medical science in particular: to Dr. Paul Gerber, my primary physician, for tracking my condition and acting with alacrity; to the anesthesiologists who were so humanely professional; to Dr. John Heaney, a surgeon esteemed by his colleagues for both technical skill and human warmth (a native of Dublin and graduate of Trinity College—in my first interview with him I brought along a photo of me and a Dartmouth Alumni College group being greeted by Mary Robinson, the president of Ireland, in order to establish my credentials!); to the two urological residents, Dr. Samuel Hakim, who performed most of the operation, and Dr. David Cozzolino, who seemed on duty day and night (when did he sleep?) and was always prompt to reassure me regarding various forms of post-surgical distress; to Laura Stempkowski, the nurse practitioner, who gave expert instructions for exercises to help overcome incontinence; and to the splendid nurses on Floor 3, especially Steve and Mac. How fortunate we are to have the Dartmouth-Hitchcock Medical Center in our back yard!

The procedure I underwent is called radical prostatectomy—good Greek, as many of my colleagues will know, for “slicing out of the [entire] prostate.” One must wonder what imaginative or whimsical anatomist named this little beast the “prostate,” meaning in Greek “one who stands in front” (ο προστάτης) or, by extension, a “protector.” Yes, it does stand in front of the bladder and, yes, it does protect the sperm, I suppose, for the prostate secretes a milky, alkaline fluid into the urethra at the time of emission of semen, thereby enhancing the sperm’s journey to the egg, since semen is acidic and sperm needs a relatively alkaline medium in which to be optimally mobile. But when our little friend does his job of protection for thirty years or so and reaches middle age, he tends to grow fat, and then one of God's mistakes (remember: "God" for Kazantzakis, and me, equals evolution) is revealed, for the fat little protector squeezes the poor urethra, which unfortunately runs right through his middle. And then the otherwise miraculous machine that is our body finds itself retaining urine—the first telltale symptom of what one hopes is merely "benign prostatic hyperplasia" (BPH).

It is churlish, I realize, to criticize "God" for such a mistake, since it seems that in His original "plan" we were meant to be sexually active from about age 15 to age 45 perhaps, and to die soon afterwards—in which case very few men suffered from prostate disease. However, in the revised plan imposed by technology and medical science the little gland not only reaches middle age and beyond, not only grows fat in an innocent way that merely makes you go to the toilet five to seven times a night, but also becomes a prime site for carcinoma (καρκίνωμα, already meaning "a malignant tumor" in Hippocrates; Latinized as cancer; both from the Indo-European root kar- meaning "hard"). And that's what happened to me.

Many of my male friends, apprehensive about their own condition, have asked about the details; thus I am emboldened to recite some of them here. How does one determine when BPH turns into prostatic carcinoma? First, your physician performs a digital rectal examination, attempting to feel abnormalities in the prostate. Since only one side can be felt, this is half-effective at best, but it can pick up hardness, asymmetry, or—heaven forbid—a lump that has pushed through the prostatic capsule (skin). Secondly, you have your blood tested every four or six months for prostatic specific antigen (PSA), a protein produced by prostatic cells. A score of 4 or below is meant to be normal. A higher score may or may not indicate cancer, but a continuous rise (which happened to me) is clearly a danger sign. My scores went like this:

May 1992:	6.5	February 1994:	5.4
September 1992:	5.6	March 1995:	5.8
January 1993:	5.5	September 1995:	6.2
May 1993:	5.7	March 1996:	7.6

My primary-care physician, Dr. Paul Gerber, feeling nothing suspicious in the digital exam (a finding confirmed by a urologist to whom I was sent just in case), interpreted the first seven of these scores to mean that the condition was still benign. This finding was accompanied by gallows' humor: "In any case, you're much more likely to die of many other causes before prostate cancer gets you." Dr. Gerber, although clearly a believer in "watchful waiting" rather than overreacting, nevertheless reacted speedily when the March 1996 reading showed 7.6, a significant jump over the previous reading, and the culmination of a steady rise for the past year. I was sent immediately for transrectal ultrasonography, which visualized some cancerous spots in the gland and directed Dr. Stephen Rous where to pinch little bits of tissue for analysis under a microscope. This procedure, called "biopsy," confirmed that the prostate was cancerous in one of its lobes, but apparently clear in the other.

The biopsy took place on April 12. On April 23 I went to Dr. Rous's office. "You have cancer," he pronounced without any circumlocution. Things could be worse, of course: it was only in one lobe (apparently), and the Gleason score was 6 on a scale of 1 to 10 (a Gleason score of 2 to 4 indicates a low-grade cancer, 5 to 7 and intermediate-grade cancer, 8 to 10 a high-grade aggressive cancer most likely to be untreatable and deadly). Since an intermediate-grade cancer can go either way, behaving like a low-grade one or, eventually, a high-grade one, obviously the best bet was to think about proper treatment.

For me at least (and also for my physicians), this eliminated the option of "watchful waiting," which I considered a stupid gamble—if not sheer suicide. The remaining choice—between radiation and surgery—also became clear, owing to my general good health, relatively long life expectancy (given my parents' history), and reasonably young age (66). But this last sentence makes a long, quite agonizing story deceptively short, and simple.

When you go to a doctor and he says, "You have cancer," your life turns upside-down even if the cancer is only intermediate grade and even if it is potentially curable, as prostate cancer is. The disease is still cancer. The next two or three weeks after April 23 were hideous, although I neither went into depression nor became incapable of working. (I even traveled to Greece for two days to lecture, with ghoulish appropriateness, on Kazantzakis's postmodern conversion of the "Comforter" (ο Παράκλητος) from the Holy Spirit to Death.) Suddenly, however, I was confronted with the very real possibility that a planned retirement likely to give fifteen fruitful years, a period in which four books (at a minimum) would be brought to completion, might never happen. "If the cancer has spread to the lymph nodes, it is incurable," the urologist informed me, "but we can probably keep you alive for up to ten years." Thank you very much! So the specter became not only one of relatively imminent death but also another of prolonged therapy usurping one's time and energy. I began to feel like Kafka's Herr K., whose "trial" displaces all other interests. Would the cancer be confined to the prostate or metastasized to the lymph or other tissues? Was it not at that very moment pushing its way through the capsule (although I was assured that intermediate-grade cancers are likely to be slow)? John Milton's lazar house of maladies shown to Adam as a foretaste of what his Fall will cause, previously to me just a perfect quotation for doctors' offices, now became frighteningly real:

Immediately a place

Before his eyes appeared, sad, noisome, dark,
 A Lazar house it seemed, wherein were laid Numbers of all diseased, all maladies
 Of ghastly spasm, or racking torture, qualms
 Of heart-sick agony, all feverous kinds,
 Convulsions, epilepsies, fierce catarrhs,
 Intestine stone and ulcer, colic pangs,
 Demoniac frenzy, moping melancholy
 And moon-struck madness, pining atrophy,
 Marasmus, and wide-wasting pestilence,
 Dropsies, and asthmas, and joint-racking rheums.
 Dire was the tossing, deep the groans. Despair
 Tended the sick busiest from couch to couch;
 And over them triumphant Death his dart

Shook, but delayed to strike, though oft invoked
 With vows, as their chief good, and final hope.

(Paradise Lost XI.477–93)

When I passed children playing in the schoolyard near our home, or adults walking animatedly up and down Main Street, I wondered what right they had to be so healthy. Health, previously assumed—consciously or unconsciously taken for granted—became the obsessive desideratum, surpassing even intellect.

But one's life also turns upside-down in certain ways that are positive. You acknowledge that dying, especially at age 66 or thereabouts following a marvelously full and rewarding life, is hardly a cosmic catastrophe. Indeed, you feel relieved that those four books hanging over you may not need to be completed after all. How nice to be delivered from responsibility in this way (since no one will accuse you of laziness)! Furthermore, you acknowledge that your service on boards of trustees, committees, and the like, although meaningful, is hardly definitive for your own being, and that you are anything but indispensable for the groups concerned. We all do our bit, to be sure, but someone else can always do just as well if not better. What a positive pleasure to say to a group, "Give me a leave of absence, please" or "Allow me to resign under the circumstances"! One is able to "shirk" without being accused of shirking—which is almost fun. What all this adds up to, perhaps, is the enhancement of what one is rather than what one does (although the latter surely conditions the former). Put another way, it adds up to the knowledge that relationships (especially with family and close friends) are more important than accomplishments. Is it worth becoming seriously ill to gain such knowledge? I said earlier that it was almost worth getting sick to experience the inflowing of concern, care, and good wishes from so many quarters. No one would wish illness upon himself in order to reap such benefits. But when illness does come, it is important to realize that benefits may come as well. Jim Freedman says that his cancer made him a better man. I hope that when all this is over I will be able to say the same.

Is it admissible to believe, as Kazantzakis does, that one has "cheated fate" in a case like this? I fear the arrogance of such a belief, for we all know that Charon will wrestle with us again and again, on this threshing floor or that one, until he wins. Nevertheless, and even at the price of arrogance, I feel right now like James Joyce's Leopold Bloom in Ulysses (6.995–96, 1003–05) when he ascends from Hades. Like Odysseus—like me—he has been allowed to visit the underworld and then to return. This is what he thinks: “Back to the world again. Enough of this place. . . . Plenty to see and hear and feel yet. Feel live warm beings near you. . . . They are not going to get me this innings. Warm beds: warm fullblooded life.”

Once again, thank you for your concern. May all of us be blessed throughout our lives with health, intellect, friendship, and love.

Sincerely,
Peter Bien

I strapped on the leg bag this morning and went to Meeting. The hour seemed very long indeed and I was uncomfortable but managed to last to the end. The discomfort comes from congestion of some sort in the testicles because the lymphatic drainage system was removed in the operation. Difficult to sit. This is supposed to get better.

For the first time since the operation sixteen days ago I felt like reading something serious instead of just TLS, The Economist, etc. So I started Ian Barbour's Religion in an Age of Science, on process theology, useful for Middleton's viva and also, I'm hoping, for my talk at Kendal on July 16, for Barbour says that the definition of the Kingdom is “Community” (pp. 219, 221).

Tuesday, June 25, 1996

The catheter came out today and I'm wearing my first diaper since infancy. Let's see what happens. Actually, the catheter had almost become part of my body, like a natural appendage. But I'll learn not to miss it.

Wednesday, June 26, 1996

The first night went very well. No “accidents.” I think that, contrary to all expectation, I am already entirely continent.

Thursday, June 27, 1996

No, I'm not. Lots of dripping, mostly at night and later in the day.

Friday, June 28, 1996

Jim Warren, after receiving my letter, wrote me a poem, a parody of Athanasios Diakos:

Για, δες καιρό που διάλεξε ο Πετρομπέης να νικήσει που παλεβήσει με το Χάροντα και τον πλακώσει στο αλώνι.

Saturday, June 29, 1996

More responses to my letter. A touching encomium from Dave Montgomery. And best of all, this lovely, thoughtful reply from Leander:

June 26, 1996

Dear Dad,

Thanks for your exhaustive and moving letter, much more than a letter actually. Informative, spiritual, “necessary” reading for all who are close to you. I know that people will appreciate receiving it.

You write that James Freedman feels the confrontation with cancer left him a better man, and that you hope to experience the same. I can’t imagine that you won’t. On a much smaller scale, and obviously minus the threat of termination, I had similar findings following loss of hearing and permanent tinnitus. It made me more sensitive to others, their respective plights and crosses to bear, as well as gave me a much enlightened perspective on my own existence, my own “whole picture,” if you like. Previously large concerns or problems seemed dwarfish in the aftermath; certain fears and difficulties, both personal and professional, were allayed; I felt a comparative calm and sense of control. Most importantly, perhaps, I discovered who my true friends were. I have a profound belief that your ordeal will leave you changed, and emotionally healthier, wealthier and wiser.

It seems your trial has given you much to reflect upon, most remarkably a wake-up call as to the comparative value of life’s riches. The meaningful closing of your letter indicated to me that you have been struck by a simple revelation: that friendship and the demonstrative interaction with and support of a loving network of individuals outweigh the benefits of workaholicism, and that productivity can be put into perspective, whereby it is not a solitary signature of success, but functions more beneficially in partnership with, and is only equal to, accomplishments as a friend, father, husband, and human being.

I hope things continue to go smoothly. Take it easy.

Love,
Leander

Laura called from urology to tell me that my PSA, tested on June 25, was 0.3. Very good indeed for so soon after the operation. . . . Incontinence is present, but better than expected. Sometimes I go most of the day with just one diaper. As predicted, best times (driest times) are in bed at night (although I'm still waking frequently to urinate) or sitting. Worst times are after rising from a seat, or sneezing, or blowing my nose.

The big event at Kendal. In the morning I transferred the clerkship (now called the chairpersonship) to Margery Walker after serving for seven years. In my valedictory I recited Jacques' Seven Ages of Man speech, to describe basically why Kendal exists, and reminisced about key events from the start (Lloyd Lewis and I talking at Pendle Hill in the autumn of 1984) to the groundbreaking ceremony. Margery then said some very nice things about my service. At the meeting's end, I read a testimonial for Lafayette Noda, who is leaving the board after ten years, and Margery read one for Lee Huntington. Then both Lee and Lafayette spoke, and both stressed the need to maintain Quaker values and practices. Amen! It was lovely to welcome as new members to the board Gordon Browne, Cliff Vermilye, and Lynda Fowler. Then, a splendiferous outdoor barbecue under a tent, complete with balloons and an om-pa-pa band, to celebrate Kendal's fifth anniversary. I sat with Mother and Alec, who came to Hanover last night. Steve spoke, and John Diffey, and then I was the keynote speaker at the end. I started by saying that for some of us this was not the 5th anniversary but the 11th and then turned to the "religious" genesis of Kendal at Hanover: how it was conceived as a religious service in conformity to the Quaker view of the "nature of being" (God) not as monarchical but as relational, characterized by participation and interaction, so that the "kingdom" (misnamed) is really a community. I quoted Jim Strickler's maxim, "the major disease of older people is loneliness" and said that the purpose of Kendal was to mitigate that through community. Afterwards, Margery again spoke about my service in flattering terms, indeed embarrassing ones, and Steve presented me with a fancy bronze plaque commemorating that service. All very nice! What a contrast to my Kinhaven service, which ended with silence and Jerry Bidlack's enmity (understandable, I suppose, since I campaigned to get him to relinquish leadership and retire). Jean Brophy was present; we had a pleasant few words and a hug. She is thriving in her job, she says—was just promoted. Good to hear.

Afterwards, Alec and I went in his truck to Kiewit to pick up the $1600 worth of fancy computer equipment that Dartmouth is giving its professors. I'll now have 500 megabytes of external memory instead of 20, 16 RAM instead of 8, a CD-Rom slot, ability to access the worldwide web, very fast response, a color monitor. The idea was to enable Dartmouth professors to keep up with Dartmouth students! . . . A nap (still useful in my recovery period) and then off in our Buick and Alec's truck to the farm.

Our 41st anniversary. I gave Chrysanthi a folding umbrella, traveling alarm, and clothing organizer, in anticipation of lots of traveling to see multiple grandchildren. She and Alec walked me out to the north field to show me my present: two cherry trees that Chrysanthi bought earlier this summer and Alec had planted. How nice! We look forward to cherry pies. . . . Alec has finished all the mowing and raking. What a worker! We tried to plan his addition for a bathroom; he has begun to cut new logs for it. He now has electricity and a telephone. . . . At 5:00, left to Hall of Springs, Saratoga, for a sumptuous buffet. Then to ballet, opening with "Swan Lake," which was extraordinarily moving, especially the pas de deux by Wendy Whelen and Nilas Martins at the end of Part I, to a violin solo, one of Balanchine's great achievements. Next, "Calcium Light Night," with music by Charles Ives, was a total contrast, with the choreography by Peter Martins, being a sort of parody of what we'd just seen, but clever and athletic, not ugly. Only two dancers, both superb: Edward Liang and Cara Copeland. Charles Wuorinen's "Reliquary," conducted by the composer, I found rather boring. But the final ballet, Tchaikovsky's "Suite No. 3," again by Balanchine, was sumptuous and varied, with Damian Woetzel giving a bravura performance in Part 4. A lovely evening, celebrating our 41st anniversary.

Hanover

To Hitchcock Clinic for a routine check-up with Dr. Heaney. All is well. He verified that the two hernias are repaired. Incontinence is minimal and should improve in three to four months as scar tissue dissolves and tissues gain their normal flexibility. Leakage occurs when I rise from a seated position simply because of gravity. I'm managing now on one pad a day, no more diapers, and need no protection at all while sleeping, although I wake in order to urinate two to five times nightly. This, too, should improve; indeed one night I woke only once. . . . Chrysanthi and I had a lovely supper, outdoors in Lake George on the way back; felt like Greece. . . . Alec left the farm today at midday, headed for Leander's. He left a lovely note saying how much he loves this place. No wonder! Next year he hopes to start an addition to his cabin to provide for a bathroom and perhaps kitchen and an extra bedroom. . . . He refurbished our ladder to the sleeping loft, removing (at long last) the random boards I'd nailed to two log-ends in 1951 and replacing them with thin logs glued with dowels to the two log-ends. What a difference! We can now go up and down with bare feet easily, and the appearance is suitably rustic: just right for an Adirondack cabin.

Spent most of the day catching up with mail and finishing the galley proofs for JMGS 14/2, which I'll mail tomorrow to Hopkins. For once, everyone—all authors, Peter Allen, Sarah LaSure, and Eva Konstantellou—responded in time. Also started experimenting with some of the four-hand repertoire Leander has suggested for Dan and me: Brahms waltzes, Mozart D-major sonata (not, alas the F-major, which is exquisite but beyond us), a Beethoven march in C major. He also recommends von Weber but I had to send for the music from Patelson's. . . . Wrapped the lower trunks of the two new cherry trees, to help them get through the winter. . . . The John Deere is "asleep." Alec did this before he left, to save me the exertion. (But Dr. Heaney said that I could lift anything I wanted, thus foiling Chrysanthi's attempts to "protect" me from all such exertions); indeed, he said: "Live your normal life" and I really am feeling normal now, in the 7th week after surgery, except for incontinence and impotence. Orgasms are still possible, but without any emission, for there is no more semen. . . . In late afternoon, my students Jay Bruce and Chris Clay arrived. I gave them the full tour, including the logging road and the path to Alec's wetlands. And we had a leisurely supper. Very pleasant. Jay will be going to Oxford in September to study theology, and Chris to Yale to continue in Japanese studies.

Went to Staples in Queensbury to buy a new fax machine to replace my ailing one. Very high-tech, with built-in answering machine. . . . In the afternoon unfortunately heard that my mother fell yesterday in the Gathering Room. Today an X-ray revealed that she had fractured her hip. She's in the emergency room at Hitchcock. So we drove back to Hanover. Saw Mother after the operation. She was alert.

Thursday, July 25, 1996

Spoke to her surgeon, Dr. Murphy, who showed me the before and after X-rays. He placed three large screws in the bone. Mother will need twelve weeks of recuperation, with minimal weight on the broken hip. Sad. I hope she won't need to forgo the Odyssey course.

Friday, July 26, 1996

Fax from Athens informing me that I've been awarded an Onassis Foundation grant. Round trip airfare for Chrysanthi and me; one month in a hotel, with breakfast; and about $1500 in cash. Hooray! Now I can truly say that I never go to Greece unless someone else pays for it. . . . Driving to visit Mother in the evening, I noticed a warning light on the dashboard. We stopped at the Co-op service station. The alternator had died. So now we have no car. No chance of having it fixed until Monday. So we're "tourists" in Hanover.

Saturday, July 27, 1996

Mother transferred to Kendal's health center. We called a taxi to visit her, waiting for it while sitting in the lovely chairs on the porch of the Hanover Inn, the first time either of us had done that in our 35 years in Hanover. Mother looking terrible. Said she'd had a nightmare. Didn't know where she was; very distressed. Turned on the Olympics on TV to let her focus on something else. Chrysanthi stayed with her while I went to hear Bev Web play: Beethoven's Pathétique and Opus 31 no. 3 (which I used to play), Schumann's Papillons (not my favorite), and then the extraordinary Chopin Fantasia Opus 49 in F minor, which he played brilliantly. Andrey Logan, who has been a saint since Mother's fall, drove us home.

Sunday, July 28, 1996

Called Dimitris Gounelas to confirm dates for arrival and departure in Greece. He said they all may be on strike.

Monday, July 29, 1996

Car fixed; new alternator. So we drove back to the farm. Watered the new cherry trees. Went through piles of mail. Finished (sort of) chapter 4 of Demotic Greek 1, to send chapters 1 to 4 to Dimitri and Andromache tomorrow.

London–Glasgow

Arrived Heathrow 6:30 a.m. Alex there to drive Chrysanthi to Christchurch Street. I continued to Glasgow. Met by David Jasper at the airport. Young Englishman, very genial and talkative. He took me to the university. Met Professor Newlands, the theologian who will be co-examiner tomorrow. Lunch together. Very genial. We both agreed that Middleton's thesis, though weak, should pass with "minor revisions." Then David drove me to his home, about 15 miles south of Glasgow. Nap. Tea. Lots of talk, about theology, literature, theology and literature, children, Darren. Then drove to see the upper Clyde. Very picturesque and rural. Then splendid Indian restaurant in the village of Hamilton. Then home to Scotch whiskey and more talk next to the fire, with a Beethoven quartet playing in the background. David extraordinarily friendly and hospitable. Thankfully I experienced zero jet lag. Went to bed at midnight, not even tired. But did overdo my "pad" and ended with wet pants after supper. Oh well . . .

Thursday, August 1, 1996

Glasgow–London

To the university. Met Darren, finally, and his lively wife. Coffee. Met the professor of English who will host the Dartmouth foreign study group. At 10:00 a.m. the Middleton viva, with me as eternal examiner, Newlands as co-examiner, John Riches as chairman (non-participating), and David sitting on the side, also non-participating. Riches turns out to have been Paul Anderson's supervisor (Anderson: the evangelical Quaker who defended the anti-homosexual position at Pendle Hill). Small world. I spent about 35 minutes detailing some problems with the thesis, including a misunderstanding of the Apollonian category in Nietzsche, which he confused with the category of the Socratic, but also tried to indicate the great successes of the dissertation. Newlands did the same. After an hour, Darren left. We reaffirmed our previous opinion that he should pass but should do the revisions suggested (more or less). He returned. Congratulations all around! Then Darren and wife and I went out for a ceremonial lunch, discussing their future (he'll finish at Rhodes next June, she's beginning at Princeton Seminary this September). Thank goodness, I stayed dry through all this. Taxi to airport. Returned to London.

London

A full, interesting day. First to the National Gallery to see the Degas exhibit, concentrating on his final years when he went beyond impressionism and indeed became a sort of link between impressionism and post-impressionism. Most striking are the soothing pastel colors in portraits, depictions of dancers and female nudes, plus the audacity to paint nudes in awkward positions. A video showed his technique of using tracing paper so that he could re-do a particular composition many times. Most enjoyable, as being in the proximity of genius always is. . . . I should mention of course that last night and this morning I saw our first grandchild, Christina Sloane Tebbe. The house is transformed, filled everywhere with baby paraphernalia. Christina is a placid baby, now nine weeks old, with big eyes and an expressive face. Holding her, I was amazed at her warmth. Daphne is a very caring, loving mother and Greg dutifully plays his role. . . . After Degas, walked down the Strand to King's and met Roddy Beaton and Mark Mazower for lunch. We went again to the Sofra Turkish restaurant. Very nice. Roddy is writing a biography of Seferis and recently returned from Ismir and environs, trying to get some sense of Seferis's birthplace. Mark is very ambitious, writing a history of welfare governments of Europe, and what happened. A huge subject. He told me about a woman in London who went out in the 1950s to Salonika and took pictures of the girls' school. I'll try to contact her. . . . Then to the Penn Club for a rest and more reading of Sallie McFague, also of newspaper accounts of the unrest in Indonesia. . . . Then to the Barbican to see Julius Caesar in a strong production with a wonderfully imperious Caesar (Christopher Benjamin), a scheming Cassius (Julian Glover), and of course a complicated Brutus (John Nettles), all beautifully directed by Peter Hall. An extraordinary treat, as one expects from the RSC. And eerily relevant to what's happening now in Indonesia, but I hope not fully relevant—i.e., not the full consequences of civil war. The two great speeches, the funeral orations of Brutus and then of Mark Antony, were beautifully done.

London

A girl from Croatia who wants to study sign language in America came to me for advice. She's been helping Daphne and other Americans but the British won't renew her visa after November. I'll try to send her relevant information after I return. . . . Long walk with Christina in the pram, Daphne, Greg, and Chrysanthi down King's Road, teeming with young people on this beautiful Saturday morning. . . . Reading McFague's The Body of God, still. It gives a good overview of postmodern thinking. Also started work, on Daphne's computer, copyediting Anastasopoulou's article for the next JMGS—tedious. . . . Went with Greg and Daphne to a matinee of Neil Simon's The Odd Couple with Tony Randall and Jack Klugman. Very funny, beautifully acted, but of course totally un-memorable. What a contrast with yesterday's Julius Caesar.

London

A lazy morning. After lunch, walked with Christina in the Royal Hospital Gardens. Then to Portland Place to visit Nancy Crawshaw, a professional photographer who had gone out to Greece in 1946–47 in the midst of the civil war and had photographed, among other things, the Quaker school. I'm quite sure that Chrysanthi, looking quite fat, is in one of the photos. Some were published in the Times Educational Supplement, which I can get, some in Quaker brochures, which I hope I can get. Crawshaw would like to leave the photos to Quakers but hasn't found anyone so far who is interested. I said I'd make inquiries at Friends House, starting with Stuart Morton. Perhaps Ben Pink Dandelion can help, too. . . . On the way home, looked at the Sloane Club, which is affiliated with the Yale Club in New York. Very modest facilities compared to the Yale Club, but they assuredly do a very nice tea. . . . Salmon dinner cooked by Chrysanthi, and then Christina's bath. Daphne got me marmalade and digestive biscuits as a going-away present.

London–Riparius

Driven to Healthrow by Alex's wife, very talkative. At Philadelphia, I put Chrysanthi on SEPTA to go to 30th Street Station and then to Washington via AMTRAK. I flew back to Albany and drove home, stopping at the Montcalm for a good dinner. To bed at 10:30 p.m. our time, equals 3:30 a.m. London time. At 12:30 midnight the telephone rang, and Leander announced the birth of a daughter, Sophia May Bien, by Caesarian. Spoke briefly to Deanna, who seemed in good spirits, and to Chrysanthi. Deanna's waters had broken yesterday, but the doctors couldn't induce her contractions; thus the need for the Caesarian. But she seems fine and the baby looks normal and healthy. So we now have two granddaughters born about nine weeks apart.

Thursday, August 8, 1996

Dick Williamson telephoned with the shocking news that Georganna died, of ovarian cancer. All the symptoms she's been having for two years, diagnosed as stomach spasms, apparently were related to this other, deadly disease. And suddenly she is dead. I helped him arrange for a memorial at the Quaker Meeting House on Monday. He said he didn't want the Norwich Congregational Church because the minister would say something about God. But the Quakers are OK, apparently. Poor Dick! What a blow!

Allison Clarkson invited me to dinner with her family. Her uncle and aunt were there: Dr. and Mrs. Hudnut, whose son went to Dartmouth. Also her parents, Clarkson (English) and wife, and assorted aunts. They're all very rich and accomplished. Mostly Episcopalian, although Hudnut comes from a line of Methodist ministers. She and Oliver Goodenough, her husband, bought an old farmhouse barn across the road from the Windhover Lake and compound. The table we ate off (in the refurbished barn) came from Fox Lair, the great camp that was given to the State and burned. Oliver, a lawyer, specializes in property transfer to children, so I hope to consult with him regarding Terpni. . . . I'm enjoying cooking, and actually was disappointed I'd been invited out, although I enjoyed the company.

Friday, August 9, 1996

Leander called. He wants me to see the baby, who cries and cries. Chrysanthi wants a holiday in NYC after she leaves. So I'll go down on the 21st or 22nd and we'll return to NYC on the 23rd and see the Picasso exhibit at MoMA and then the Homer exhibit at the Met.

Although I've enjoyed preparing dinners I've hardly had a chance. Sunday August 11 to Mary and Maureen Fitzgerald for dinner. Tuesday to Tom Akstens, Wednesday to Perrymans, Thursday to Rothsteins (with Shapiros), and next Sunday with Jerry and Simon Gardner to share pizza in Schroon Lake. Art Perryman advised me not to rush into logging with Gregory May, who showed me an impressive stand of oak in the woods in back of my office. But I'll wait until Alec is here next summer. Also, Chris, ever practical, suggested I wait until retirement, for tax advantages and also perhaps the lowering of the capital gains tax. The oaks are gorgeous. Straight and tall. . . . Aser Rothstein is still involved in amazing science, which he explains so well. He and a colleague have found a way to "humanize" plastic and animal prostheses by coating them with a human protein that gives the elasticity they lack. That's only one of two schemes he is working on now in his "retirement." . . . Tom Akstens will be married in January to a graphic designer who will hope to survive professionally in Bakers Mills. He has turned vegetarian. We supped on mushrooms and squash.

But last Monday, unexpectedly, I had to go to Hanover for the memorial service held at the Quaker Meeting House, thanks to my intervention, for Georganna, Dick Williamson's "partner." She died of ovarian cancer last week. For two years she had thought she had stomach spasms and was being "treated" with diet, whereas all along it was this deadly cancer. Again, how fortunate I have been, by contrast. The service was genuine and real. Nothing artificial. Dick broke down and wept; so did her children. But people from the psychoanalytic institute in Boston spoke well about her expertise and compassion, and Bill Pence was eloquent about her gifts as a graphic designer. So, what a tragedy! Just as she was about to finish her psychoanalytic training! And just as Dick was beginning his retirement. Sad! At least they'd had fifteen years together, whereas Ned and Anne had had only five.

Pizza supper at DeCesare's with Jerry Gardner, like me a temporary bachelor. He'd just finished his exams at Adirondack Community College for undergraduate science courses to enable him to study to be a physician's assistant (he sold the North Creek newspaper to Sue Goodspeed and is much relieved). We both agreed that living alone, especially when temporary, is not at all distressing. Indeed, it's rather nice to be able to make decisions without consulting anyone else.

Tuesday, August 20, 1996

Drove to Hanover last night. Stopped for a hamburger at The Loft on routes 9 and 189, and the owner recognized me immediately. How we used to love going there because of the smile of his wife, but she left him long ago. He perseveres, cooking hamburgers and onion rings. . . . Lunch today at Kendal with the three new trustees: Gordon Browne, Cliff Vermilye, and Lynda Fowler, head of Rockefeller Center, on the concluding afternoon of their orientation. John Hennessey explained the new Governance Committee. Then Cara took us through the kitchen, first time for me as well as them. They do 700 meals a day in an extremely cramped space. . . . Then I visited with Mother, who is in good spirits. Her X-ray is on the 27th. If the pins have worked, she should be able to return to her apartment. . . . Then back to Kendal for Quaker orientation. I spoke and then Gordon Browne did, movingly, about silence, no voting, and pacifism. Cliff afterwards said it was the best orientation he had experienced after serving on many boards. Thanks to Steve for setting it up. Margery and I with Gordon hope to give Quaker orientation to residents, nurses, and other staff this year. I questioned Gordon about his arrangements for his farm, regarding transfer to the children. They have created a not-for-profit corporation, just like Warder Cadbury's at Camp Backlog in Indian Lake, and Gordon says it works extremely well. . . . Then to Rassias to meet Ava and Stelios Orphanoudakis and their daughters, visiting from Crete and looking at colleges. Stelios's career is fascinating. He is once a week in Athens for a high-level committee, is director of the Research Institute in Iraklio, is professor at the university, and is deeply involved in the E.U. He'll set me up with privileges on Forth net so that I can have e-mail in Greece. And one of his colleagues may be able to help Christos.

Wednesday, August 21, 1996

To Washington

To Albany in the afternoon to fly to Washington to see Sophia. Leander is exhilarated at his new adventure of fatherhood, despite the baby's reluctance, so far, to sleep at night, and its vociferous crying. He was in the OR during the Caesarian, and the baby, “wrenched untimely from the womb,” was placed immediately in his arms. Fathers, these days, obviously need to be much braver than we were, forty-odd years ago. The Caesarian of course saves the mother the pains of labor, so it isn’t all bad. Also, the baby is saved the constriction of the birth canal and the obstetrician’s forceps. . . . Nice reunion with Chrysanthi when we reached the house. Sophia has a lovely round face but lacks the big round eyes of Christina. We can’t quite tell so far whether she’ll have “oriental eyes” or not. In any case, she has no hare lip, which is a blessing. Deanna is very subdued and undemonstrative, perhaps owing to Chrysanthi’s outgoing behavior, singing and talking to the baby, walking with it. Leander will most likely be the more demonstrative of the two parents. Deanna is nursing, yet the baby seems to need more nourishment, and they’ve supplemented the nursing with formula, just like Daphne. The miracle, and perplexity, of birth, once again, is all too evident. These creatures emerge able to suck, digest, evacuate, sneeze, belch, yawn, grasp, and scream, but that’s all. Their digestive system is operative, their sympathetic nervous system (heartbeat, breathing) is operative, yet they are so totally helpless otherwise. And then the brain develops, the bones develop, the muscles grow strong, and they can become a Beethoven! . . . Chrysanthi fed us; Deanna never cooks, it seems. We watched some TV, and retired in the basement to be out of ear-contact with Sophia upstairs.

Potomac

A leisurely day. I’ve been vetting the now-completed accreditation self-study for Kendal. Still much to change. Leander and I read over the Brahms four-hand waltzes, opus 39, and selected which to work up with Dan; also chose a von Weber march and a Schubert march to combine with the Beethoven march in C major (which may be too hard for us). Leander’s concert schedule for spring 1997 is awesome, including Kennedy Center, Little Carnegie, Corcoran Gallery, Strathmore Hall, with flute, violin, tenor, and viola. We took a long drive and he asked about wills, life insurance, pension, college fund for Sophia, also worries about gall bladder and prostate owing to family history. I’ll call TIAA/CREF to see if he can join. He grilled hamburgers on the new patio in their very attractive back yard—again Deanna contributed nothing—and we feasted. They bathed the baby; she hates water, it seems, screamed the whole time. Again, Chrysanthi and I slept in the basement in order to have some peace.

To NYC

Metro to Union Station. Croissants at Au Bon Pain. AMTRAK to New York. Traffic, noise, oppressive heat. Yale Club a haven. I napped while Chrysanthi shopped at Daffy's, hunting for bargains. Walked to MoMA, stopping at Barnes and Noble to buy some "cloth books" and "board books" for Christina. At MoMA, the marvelous exhibition "Picasso and Portraiture: Representation and Transformation." Chrysanthi doesn't like him because of his cruelty, she says—having read Ariadne Stassinopoulos's biography—toward all the women in his life. But these women were true Egerias, stimulating him to do "portraits" that represented more his own feelings, positive or negative, than the appearance or feelings of the subject. Well-known paintings—e.g., the woman who is "exploded" and whose mouth is like a vice plus saw—now fall into the evolution of his love-life: this image being his revenge on a woman no longer in favor. Indeed, the mouth is interpreted as a destructive vagina ready to bite and saw. Quite remarkable is his diversity of styles. He could paint realistically and abstractly, cubistically and surrealistically, all in the same period. . . . Returned to the Yale Club for a mediocre meal, but in pleasant surroundings, on the 22nd floor. Then to see "Master Class," based on Maria Callas's master classes at Juilliard. A bravura performance by Patti LuPone as Callas, winning a standing ovation. The play mesmerizing at every moment: how Callas, totally egotistical, yet totally devoted to her art, annihilated the poor students while at the same time truly diagnosing their failings and truly suggesting ways to improve. This brilliant play by Terrence McNally has everything: drama, psychological depth, festival, grand music, intellectual truth. Callas ended with an encomium on art itself, without which we would all be poor. Amen!

New York-Terpni

Breakfast with the New York Times at the Yale Club, always a treat. (Shirred eggs.) Bus to the Met, half price for senior citizens. The Winslow Homer show is so different from the Picasso, but complementary. Homer painted nature and other people; Picasso painted himself disguised as other people. Homer was a brilliant watercolorist, self-taught, apparently. Lots of Adirondack paintings; he was headquartered near us in Minerva. A mid-19th century painting includes a hay rake exactly like the ones we still buy from Braley Noxon. Another scene shows the typical log cabin and clearing before the tree stumps have been removed: they stand like a rash on the landscape. His anger at unethical hunters is evident, how they'd drive deer into the lakes and slaughter them, how they'd take only the rack and the hide, for money. Also lovely scenes of one-room schoolhouses, boys playing "snap the whip" in recess. Also sensitivity to the new role of women as teachers and factory hands, leaving the farms for the mills. And the fierce depiction of angry seas on the Maine coast. And the sculptures of British fishwives, especially the one walking with her redheaded baby into a gale. We were there until almost noon, but then quickly went through the Toulouse Lautrec exhibit, very minor compared to either Picasso or Homer (but his career lasted only ten years). Finely, early Greek art, nicely reinstalled on the first floor: the Cycladic harp-players and "modern" women are so memorable. . . . AM-TRAK up the beautiful Hudson to Albany. Scenes from the tracks show why painters formed the Hudson River School to record these beauties. . . . Taxi to the airport to retrieve our car. Supper in the Montcalm, just like old times. And home to the serenity of Terpni, the polar opposite of Times Square.

Sunday, August 25, 1996

Warder Cadbury had invited us to Meeting for Worship at Camp Back Log, but it was too much of a trip, seeing we'd not even unpacked, so we didn't go. Finished CCRC accreditation vetting and wrote ten letters, catching up, including a long one to Christos about Stelios's colleague who might help the autistic society. And a reply to George Goodwin, who wrote kindly after attending the Kinhaven Board's celebration for John Austin, saying that people had been asking for me. . . . Shapiros for supper, very jolly.

Monday, August 26, 1996

Supper along Schroon Lake with Wendy and Gary McGinn and their children Marcus and Katie. Always very pleasant. The children are maturing nicely. Marcus is no longer surly: quite a transformation. But poor Gary is trapped in his job at Murphy's. He'd love to leave and have something more creative and challenging but there are so few opportunities here, and he is almost 50 years old. He applied to be caretaker of a camp in Speculator and was short-listed but not chosen. Katie played a hymn well enough on the piano and Wendy sang, on key but with a strident voice. I told them all about the Greek civil war, Truman Doctrine, Odysseas in Russia. They seemed very interested but perhaps suspected me of communist or at least leftist/liberal tendencies. . . . Spent the day reading Rhea Galanaki's novel The Life of Ismail Ferik Pasha about a Cretan boy who was led away to Constantinople, who converted to Islam and became Egypt's Minister of War and leader of the Egyptian army dispatched to quell the Cretan rising of 1866–68. Fascinating subject, but not told very compellingly.

Thursday, August 29, 1996

Nice visit with Al and Mary Zalon at the Shapiros over a sumptuous lunch of lox and capers and goat cheese. They have a deer hound, about four feet high, almost as big as a young deer, that runs almost as fast as a deer in an ungainly gait and is almost human in its playfulness. Very friendly (Al and Mary, not to mention the dog), repeatedly invited us to their home in Mt. Vernon. Next year if they come for a longer stay we'll play flute and piano again, as has been our habit. . . . Working on lesson 6 of Demotic Greek 1. I invented a word for computer science: κομπιουτερολογία, but Felitsa tells me it is, strangely, επιστήμη της πληροφορικής. Chrysanthi is doing the drills. Lots and lots of work, proceeding very slowly. . . . Also put the Troy-Bilt mower "to sleep" for the winter.

Saturday, August 31, 1996

To Brant Lake Camp for the 80th anniversary celebration. Wine and hors d'oeuvres on the waterfront (much expanded), a grand banquet in the dining hall, ending, of course, with baked Alaska, and then entertainment in the Clubhouse, with Bob Gersten singing Raus mit Kraus à la Arthur Freund. Lots of pictures, including one of me as a junior counselor in 1946, age 16, with curly hair. Met Bobby Bronsteen and his wife, Chuck Dorf (who was managing editor of the Brant Lake Mirror when I was editor), Vince Starace, aged 88, and looking like a character in a Pirandello play, Peter Schweitzer, Bob Reich's aunt (!), and of course Bob and Libby Gersten, Karen (Gerstenzang) Meltzer, Richard Gersten and wife. The camp is flourishing, full up with 320 children each paying $6000. Lots of dramatics still, and a good pianist, but no more extended trips for fear of liability. Karen, who is trip counselor, says she still consults my files with meticulous accounts of the trips I organized at age 17–18. Amazing! I don't remember making files. At the dinner, everyone came to the mike and said a few words of thanks or reminiscence. I'm glad that Chrysanthi had a taste of this phase of my life. It was raucous in the dining room. And we all sang a Brant Lake song at the end of the Clubhouse entertainment. A nostalgia trip.

Sunday, September 1, 1996

Peter Schweitzer came for a late breakfast, driving his immense Mercedes limousine. Very vivacious and friendly. Was sorry I sold the Schweitzer stock but glad I've kept most of the Kimberly Clark. Told me that his rabbi, whom I saw last night at BLC, gets paid $125,000 a year plus benefits. That's Scarsdale. . . . A shingle fell off the cabin roof, strangely, and I went up on the extension ladder and replaced it, right at the very top. Glad I can still do such things. . . . After supper, nice three-hour visit with Art and Chris Perryman, talking about not-for-profit corporations, limited partnerships, etc., for transfer of land, about logging, and about religion. His more-or-less fundamentalist faith is hard for me to take, but at its basis is really just a sense of awe and wonder and gratitude for the miracle of the created universe, and that is fine. He told stories, too, of some of his actions as a State trooper, as for example when he once arrested the supervisor of the Town of Thurman for harassing a woman. And the daughter of their fundamentalist minister is with child out of wedlock. I said that Jesus would have been compassionate, and Art agreed. Interestingly, we also talked at length about Paradise Lost, Milton's emphasis on the felix culpa and the necessity of choosing. Art, à propos, is against home schooling and even parochial schooling, because the children are too protected: Milton's "cloistered virtue."

September 3, 1996

Lake Placid

A nice outing to Lake Placid to confer with a lawyer, Timothy Smith, about a better arrangement for our farm. He suggests a partnership rather than a not-for-profit corporation. He was joined by a young lawyer who just passed the bar, Amy Smith, who turned out to be from North Creek, a neighbor of the Grunblatts. We'll await Smith's proposal in writing.

September 4, 1996

Dr. Heaney wants me to volunteer to take part in an experiment in drug therapy for prostate cancer, two years long, involving the need for bone scans and perhaps some side effects (unless I get the placebo, which goes to 50% of the volunteers). I'm not very inclined, so far. . . . Bill Hans, a forester, came at my invitation. He is going to do a full survey of our timber. . . . Supper at Shapiros with David Frost and his new woman, Joan, who turns out to have been a classmate of mine in 7th and 8th grades at p.s. 69 in Jackson Heights. She remembered the name Peter Bien instantly. She said that all the Jackson Heights students thought we'd all arrived from Europe. (It was only Sunnyside!) . . . Working morning and afternoon on Demotic Greek revision, trying to catch up to have chapters 1 through 8 ready for Dimitri and Mache when I go to Princeton on September 23. In the evening, vetting Tziovas's volume from the modernism conference in my honor. Alas, many red marks. . . . Leander told us that Sophia slept six hours last night and five the night before. Wonderful! But she cries most of the day.

Sunday, September 8, 1996

Breakfast at the Copperfield with Maureen and Mary as a farewell. And had a nice evening with the Perrymans two days ago. Closing very easy this year, since we never opened the guesthouse and Alec did the John Deere.

Monday, September 9, 1996

Terpni-Hanover

An appraiser came. I shut off water last night. Nice to wash at the well and use the outhouse, as in olden times. The new appraisal is needed for the gifting we want to complete to the children. Left at 11:00 a.m. and drove to Hanover, sadly. Chrysanthi immediately went to the Senior Center for a meeting. She's now more involved than I am.

Thursday, September 12, 1996

Returning to Hanover is like returning to a huge city. So much to do. Many people to see. The farm simplifies life deliciously. Today I saw Frank Currier about tax implications of the gifting.

Friday, September 13, 1996

Allan Munck had an acute gall bladder attack plus operation, much simpler than mine. No incision; everything done through three tiny holes, via television. Visited him. He's doing well. Lunch with Dana Burch, who is combining Wall Street and Union Theological Seminary, as he had hoped. He seems to consider me a sort of guru. . . . Dick Williamson came for supper, and we played Mozart. He seems much more cheerful than the last time we visited.

Monday, September 16, 1996

A "Kendal day." Interviewed by John Hennessey and Mary Schaffner in the morning regarding our opinion on the future of the Stewardship Committee. I'm still in favor of taxing residents for charity but we need to do it with their knowledge and approval, not covertly. Then lunch with Mother in the café. She is walking much better now, and much faster. Then a grand supper at the Hanover Inn for all trustees and spouses. Sat with Gordon Browne, who regaled me with stories about Quaker crooks.

Tuesday, September 17, 1996

Kendal board, my first without being clerk. Margery Walker chaired very well. How relaxing to be "on the sidelines"! John Diffey finally inquired about my health and I decided not to consider him a "false friend" any longer. . . . Eye exam: pressure better—i.e., less threat of glaucoma. . . . Supper at Sweet Tomatoes with John and Mary Lincoln.

Wednesday, September 18, 1996

Back to Kendal to talk to residents about the accreditation self-study, now completed. My job was to explain my role as editor. I did this with humor, judging from audience reaction, as opposed to the weighty seriousness of the other speakers. Even Beasie Brownell, long a critic of Quaker leadership, came up afterwards to say a good word.

Thursday, September 19, 1996

Nice lunch with Randy Testa, who is sure that the Education Department will now be left alone. Robert Binswanger has resigned as chair, and his nemesis, Andrew Garrod, is the new chair. We'll see what happens. . . . US Air to Philadelphia. Good piano session with Dan, who did practice the 1st four Brahms waltzes but not much else. He likes them and also the three marches. Afterwards, he took me to a fabulous ice cream place for a stupendous milkshake. Fun!

Saturday, September 20, 1996

Pendle Hill–New York City

The board of course discussed Nancy Frommelt's dismissal. But it has to be. She greeted me yesterday with a big smile but I'm told that she is very sad. I ministered in Meeting about the miracle of childbirth and the human organism, which almost convinces one that a Maker planned it all; yet scientists tell us it was all trial and error. What to believe? It doesn't matter. Perhaps the "plan" was for trial and error. What matters is simply awe and appreciation for our presence on earth and the miracle of life. This sparked other ministries, including a very fine statement of thanks to the Lord Jesus for all this. A gathered meeting. How nice! . . . After trustees and an executive session with Dan, I drove to New York with Vince Buscemi. Easy conversation for 2½ hours, making the time pass. He fears he is going to have prostate cancer. . . . Met Gail and Karen at the Yale Club; we had an easy time giving the translation prize to David Connelly. Then to Greek Print reception. Saw Peter Papas of the Ίδρυμα Ελληνικού Πολιτισμού, which he says is functioning again. But the Onassis Foundation and NYU have divorced. The academic program will now be on its own in the university, which is better. . . . Then to a nice Greek restaurant with Gail, Karen, and also Laurie Hart, who teaches at Haverford. They told me about MGSA Executive Committee's reluctance to continue Peter Allen as JMGS associate editor. I hope he doesn't conclude that I betrayed him. I didn't. I had no idea that this would happen.

Sunday, September 22, 1996

New York City

Leisurely breakfast at the Yale Club with the New York Times. Then to Greek Print. Mike Keeley and I shared the podium with Karen Van Dyck, talking about translation. I got lots of laughs for my ὀρτσα story. . . . Worked on DG1 in the Yale Club library. Supper in "China Peace," which is getting worse. Then drove to Princeton. I'm housed handsomely in the Nassau Inn this time. Palmer House is full.

Monday, September 23, 1996

Princeton

Dimitri deconstructs my grammar, but we maintain good humor and the collaboration remains viable. Mache is the one mostly responsible for the scenarios in first draft. She set me up with a computer printer in the Classics Department, thanks to Richard Martin's agreement. (I brought my Style Writer but it arrived broken from the trip in the valise.) . . . Supper with Betsy Middleton, Darren's wife, studying now at Princeton Seminary: theology and social work. Sweet girl.

Tuesday, September 24, 1996

Princeton

Worked 9:30–11:30 a.m., 2:30–4:30 p.m. as usual. Lunch at Prospect with Dimitri and Nehamas, who renewed his invitation for me to come to Princeton for a semester in 1999–2000. Good! Met Mrs. Goheen and conveyed greetings from Jim Armstrong.

Wednesday, September 25, 1996

Princeton

Hellenic Studies dinner. Met Roudometof and Kyrou, etc. Evi, Dimitri's "partner," told me that she had breast cancer and now has another tumor. Lots of good talk with Mike Keeley. We both confessed that in retirement we have more money than before, and hardly know what to do with it. He hopes to give a nice donation to the American Farm School.

Thursday, September 26, 1996

Princeton–Hanover

We worked on the revision for chapter 7. Did 5 and 6 previously. Mache wrote the scenario for chapter 9. There will be 12 chapters plus an epilogue. Thus the end is coming in sight. But every time we look at older material we add, change, subtract. . . . Drove to Philadelphia airport. . . . Allan and Dick came for supper and music.

Friday, September 27, 1996

Nice visit from Leslie English, who yearns to return someday to Greece but is tied to her job as journal editor.

Saturday, September 28, 1996

Bob Bell came from Williamstown and we had a long lunch together. His daughter's operation for curvature of the spine has been postponed but the condition is still very worrisome. He exults in good teaching and feels he doesn't need to produce more scholarship. His book on Joyce's humor proved that he can do it. So he runs a program helping new faculty at Williams acquire better teaching skills. Would that we had something comparable at Dartmouth! . . . We talked also about our childhood, growing up as the sons of physicians.

Monday, September 30, 1996

Long breakfast at Lou's with Scott Brown, the new dean of the Tucker Foundation. He wanted my sense of priorities established by the committee. Luckily I had my committee notes, which I was able to give him. What a challenge he faces! And what a peach of a job! Interestingly, on the same day, I received a warm, flattering letter from Jan Tarjan about my illness, with no mention of her failure to be appointed dean. I responded with my “prostate letter” and kind words about the wonderful service she gives to students. . . . Met Jim Freedman on the street. He’s still getting very encouraging reports from his lab tests and is approaching the two-year mark after the operation. He said that my letter is “circulating.” He kept it and gives copies to other people as needed; so does Jim Wright.

Tuesday, October 1, 1996

To urology for my three-month checkup. PSA is again 0.01. “Welcome, my healthy friend!” was Dr. Heaney’s greetings. My next exam is in six months. After that one year. . . . Took Chrysanthi to the Hanover Inn to catch a limo to Logan to fly, business class, thanks to the Onassis Foundation, to London.

Wednesday, October 2, 1996

To Kendal for celebratory breakfast for everyone who worked on the accreditation self-study. As editor, I received a “certificate” on which practically every word was (deliberately) misspelled. How nice! Plus an elaborately wrapped pencil one inch long.

The new appraisal for the farm arrived, surprisingly giving the sale value as only $65,000. Alec’s cabin is excluded. The acreage is put at $300 per acre only. Fine! All the better for gifting. . . . Lunch with Daphne Psacharopoulos, daughter of George. She’s just arrived at Tuck School. Tells me that Tuck students do gratis consulting; could be used at Kendal. . . . Met with Iason Demos, back from his term at Thessaloniki and wanting to do a comparative literature thesis on different approaches to modernism in Greece and England, using Theotokas’s Ελεύθερο πνεύμα. An article in the Birmingham symposium papers that I’m currently editing is very helpful. . . . Bob and Lynne Fagles arrived. At Jim Tatum’s “Mediterranean Studies” university seminar he read from his translator’s “Afterword” to the new Odyssey plus some good passages from both the Iliad and the Odyssey. He appreciated the diversity of faculty present, including music professors, medievalists, etc. . . . I left before supper, to play music with Dick and Allan: von Weber, Kuhlau, Max Reger, Fauré.

Thursday, October 3, 1996

I introduced Fagles to a packed 105 Dartmouth audience, including Mother: her first outing. Thankfully, Dartmouth Hall now has a ramp and an elevator. I read Pope, Butler, Lattimore, Fitzgerald, Cook, and Fagles on VI 125, where Odysseus, the “first gentleman of Europe,” covers himself before appearing before Nausicaa. Lots of fun! Fagles is the only one who calls a spade a spade: “Private parts.” He read brilliantly: the proem, Cyclops, slaying of suitors, reconciliation with Penelope. It was a treat. Afterwards, reception in the Faculty Lounge: a good chance for David Millstone to talk with Bob. Then at 7:00 we gathered at the Norwich Inn: Armstrongs, Fagles, Lincolns, Campions, Bill Scott and me, for a lovely three-hour dinner with easy, good conversation and excellent food. Everyone left totally relaxed.

Friday, October 4, 1996

Picked up my absentee ballot for the November election. Took the Fagles to Kendal and gave them the tour. Then to Comparative Literature lunch with faculty and students; he spoke well about translation. Then goodbye. A successful visit. . . . Supper at Muncks with Dick.

Saturday, October 5, 1996

Supper with Audrey and Mother at Kendal. For the first time (that I knew), Bev Web faltered. He started the Valse Brilliante opus 42 (which I used to play), quite obviously had trouble remembering it, faked, repeated, and then gave up. Franny prompted in a stage whisper, “Play the Berceuse,” and he did, perfectly. The rest was the 3rd Ballade, 2 nocturnes, and Scherzos 1 and 2. Let’s hope that he can keep playing and that he dies suddenly, without a period in which he can no longer play.

Sunday, October 6, 1996

Flew to Greensboro, NC to Guilford College, where I was J. M. Ward Distinguished Quaker Visitor (!). Max Carter in charge. My first lecture was in New Garden Friends Meeting, a large complex designed by Mather Lippincott. I did my “Words, Wordlessness, and the Word” lecture, the same given when I was Quaker visitor at Haverford. How nice to have another chance! There were good questions and then a period of worship.

Monday, October 7, 1996

Greensboro, NC

Breakfast at 7:00 a.m. with Don and Britte McNemar. Don is the new president of Guilford. How nice to visit with them again and think back to good times at Dartmouth. His formal inauguration is this Friday, and he has invited Leonard Rieser to be the speaker. Leonard hired him at Dartmouth and elevated him to the associate deanship. Then Don accompanied me to "The Hut," Max's headquarters, for morning worship, a 15-minute Quaker Meeting held each morning with several students in attendance. Then to Max's class, "Jesus at 2000." They had just read The Last Temptation and some had seen the movie. One student was assigned to report on the final three chapters and did so very poorly and minimally. I tried to explain the "ladder of love" there, how Jesus goes from aesthetic to ethical and then finally to eschatological. Apparently there are some evangelical Quakers in the group who, of course, are scandalized by Kazantzakis, but they didn't speak. They keep journals that Max reads each week, and voice their dismay there. Max's program is exemplary, and obviously very meaningful for the 40-odd students in it. Too bad that Haverford cannot have something similar, but money is needed, and Max has an endowment. . . . Free after lunch, I worked in the library, reading Jسدانى's publications for a promotion review. . . . Then a formal dinner in my honor at the McNemars, with one of the Quaker Studies students, now dressed in a tuxedo, acting as caterer. Mel Kaiser was there, Judy and Cyril Harvey, a man who graduated Dartmouth and brought the Aegis to show me my photo in 1966, another who said he'd taken my Joyce and Kazantzakis course in 1968. I had to "say a few words," as did Don and also Britte. . . . Then back to New Garden Meeting for my second lecture, on Kazantzakis's religious development, how he needed to develop "metaChristianity" consistent with evolutionary theory and Bergsonian vitalism. Again, good questions afterward. I think it went well. . . . Back at the Guest House, watched a TV program on Dole and Clinton, very interesting: their differences and similarities, and something on the role of Dole's Methodism vs. Clinton's Baptist allegiance. Last Sunday, of course, I watched their debate. More dignified than in previous elections. Dole was quite good, but his meanness was also evident. He provoked Clinton repeatedly, and Clinton never hit back, but controlled his temper perfectly; indeed, became sweeter each time this happened.

Tuesday, October 8, 1996

Worship at The Hut, breakfast with Max and students. Lunch ditto. Then to Friends Homes to meet the director, Wilson Sheldon, Steve Fleming's mentor. I tried to be apologetic about "stealing" Steve from him, but he already feels that Steve needed to extend himself in a different environment. Friends Homes is very unattractive physically but also much cheaper than Kendal. But then we drove to the clone, Friends Homes West, where Steve was director. This is exceedingly attractive, not only the buildings but the grounds, and I see how unimaginative the landscape gardening at Kendal is. Friends Homes West has beautiful enclosed gardens; that's what we need. . . . Fourth discussion with Quaker students at the Hut; quick supper; 6:00 to 7:00 p.m. radio interview conducted by two very nice students, one of whom is also going to write an article for the newspaper. . . . Then my last lecture, billed as "Jesus and Sexuality" but really about the figurative vs. the literal. Again, how nice to have a second opportunity to deliver something done previously only once, at Pendle Hill. Large audience, many of the same people who'd been at the previous lecture—a good sign. Good questions afterwards.

Wednesday, October 9, 1996

Greensboro

Worship and breakfast. Then Max's class again: a good interchange with one of the evangelical students regarding "God's word" in the bible, truth vs. myth, what precisely I believe (I told her), whether this could be called Christian, etc. Fun! . . . Lunch with faculty. Airport. Home. A lovely visit, well planned and executed by Max Carter.

Thursday, October 10, 1996

Hanover

No rest. Kendal personnel committee. I'm the new clerk. New members are Cliff Vermilye and Gordon Browne, both with extensive experience in personnel matters. Continuing members are Patricia Higgins and Mary Schaffner. Steve Fleming attends, and Laura Hooley is the staff person in charge. We're moving toward merit pay of some sort. Steve and Laura will come back with a definite plan. . . . Afterwards, Gordon said that he has identified two Quakers who could be excellent trustees. One is the warden of Woolman Hill. Added to my suggestions—Jack Coleman, Leonard Cadwallader—that makes four. Gordon spoke very highly of Cadwallader, whom he had actually hired as business manager of the Farm and Wilderness camps.

Friday, October 11, 1996

Alice and Peter Buseck are here to celebrate Alice's 60th birthday. We supped at Kendal with Yiayia, Clive, Lori, and little Rachel, who's a beauty.

Saturday, October 12, 1996

Susie Buseck arrived, also David and Linda, and we supped this night at the Panda House and then all went to the Busecks' bed and breakfast place in Etna for birthday cake and coffee. Susie and David are lovely people.

Sunday, October 13, 1996

Final Buseck day. Supper at Kendal buffet, everyone plus Lori's two Peace Corps friends from South Royalton, an interesting couple: he's trying to make a go as a vegetable gardener.

Wednesday, October 16, 1996

Xeroxing Kazantzakis letters, those with illegible words and those I still haven't translated. . . . Allan and Dick came for our last music session until December. Did Beethoven, a modern composer named Ward, Martinu. . . . Then watched Clinton–Dole debate. The same old rhetoric, repetition, formulae. But reality does break through occasionally.

To London

Frantic xeroxing in the morning, and typing of DG1 plans to mail to Dimitri and anxious waiting for the minicoach, due at 12:30, finally arrived at 1:20. During the trip to Boston I copyedited Michael Macrakis's "Introduction to the Proceedings of the Symposium on Greek Type Faces." At Logan, huge line waiting to check in at BA economy class, but I went directly to Business Class. No wait. Then to the BA lounge where we'd spent two days in March. Finished Macrakis, mailed it. Resumed work on DG1 revisions on the computer. Fast, good flight. Business class a dream: large seat, reclining, foot rest, better food, great service: "May I hang up your suit-jacket, sir?" And a steward who looked familiar and greeted me, "Nice to see you again, Mr. Bien." How can we ever fly tourist class again after this?

Christchurch Street

Christina is beautiful, with very distinctive features. She took to me very easily. (Sophia, in new photos, looks very Chinese.) Daphne is a relaxed, demonstrative mother, like Chrysanthi. Greg described his new job; he'll interact now with the wider Goldman Sachs interests as they affect his group. Said that the last four people in this job all moved upward, two with partnerships. This now seems to be his aspiration. Chrysanthi and I had a lovely reunion, exchanging news. I went off to buy ballet tickets at the Royal Opera House. Walked around Covent Garden a bit watching street magicians, then went to the Giacometti exhibit at the Royal Academy, and understood for the first time the power of his elongated, squashed sculptures, where human heads seem to emerge out of molten lava. A great talent, but nowhere as inventive or diverse as, say, Picasso. . . . Pleasant supper afterwards at home. Watched Christina being bathed; she is so placid, loves the water. She holds her head up now, eats from a spoon, drinks water from a specially designed cup, sometimes holds her milk bottle, "talks" in the morning upon waking, cries very seldom.

Saturday, October 19, 1996

To the Barbican to see As You Like It, directed by Steven Pimlott. Pure magic from the opening moment to the end. Jacques' "7 ages" speech was rendered better than I've ever heard it before, by John Woodvine, and Touchstone, the fool, was mercurial as played by David Tennant. But of course the major role was Rosalind, done effectively by Niamh Cusack, although Rachel Joyce's Celia was everywhere as good. (Interesting how many of the performers have Irish names.) Phebe, the peasant, was perfect. All in all, a huge "poem" about love in all its guises, including of course the homosexual, between Orlando (not one of the strongest performances, played by Liam Cunningham) and Rosalind disguised as Ganymede (!). . . . O to be in London long enough to see the rest of the repertoire: Macbeth. . . . Chrysanthi and I resolved to come periodically for a week. We'll stay at the Penn Club, now that Daphne and Greg will be returning to New York. . . . Afterwards, Daphne and Greg returned to relieve their babysitter, and Chrysanthi and I, at her request, walked a bit through Trafalgar Square, Leicester Square, and Covent Garden, to get a renewed feel of the city. Musicians in Covent Garden playing Buxtehude's Chaconne, singers doing Porgy and Bess. Tried to find the Turkish restaurant, without success. Ended up very well, however, in Le Palais du Jardin in Long Acre, for a fine supper. Chrysanthi surprised me by saying she's truly looking forward to the sojourn in Greece, her vacation, after the onslaught of two babies plus Lucia Tebbe over Christmas, then teaching. I said I have no desire any longer to teach, although I do like to lecture the way I did at Guilford or in New York at the Greece in Print event.

Sunday, October 20, 1996

Met Jim Warren and his wife, Marge, at Victoria & Albert Museum and went out for lunch. She "knew me" because she had learned Greek from our book and tapes at Barnard under Dorothy Gregory. Jim is separated now from the State Department but is preparing a book of source documents for the civil war period. He told me that the determining event in the civil war was Zachariadis's declaration that if the communists won they would separate off Greek Macedonia and create an autonomous Macedonia. The Greek national army, hitherto dispirited, suddenly gained morale. Desertions from the rebels increased; the tide turned. So, it was morale just as much, or more, than firepower and materiel that really made the difference. What drove Zachariadis to such a mistake? Jim said that his total mentality from early training was "international" rather than Greek. His thoughts were for the future of international communism and that's what lost him the war. . . . Walked home in time to wish Greg bon voyage as he left for New York City to look for an apartment among other things.

Worked on lesson 6 of DG1 in the morning. Then went to the Hayward Gallery on South Bank (near Waterloo) to see the Mapplethorpe photos. His technique and imagination are marvelous, and I suppose that on balance it's art rather than pornography, but the subject matter is very raw: huge erections, behinds, anal penetration, and the like. But also some haunting portraits and photos of orchids and lilies. Interesting to see young women viewing all this with equanimity, no titters or snickers. Mapplethorpe died of AIDS (of course) and left this legacy of gay liberation. . . . Then to Foyle's to buy chamber music and books needed for the Salonica course. . . . Then tea in Leicester Square watching the tourists. Then National Gallery to see Rubens's landscapes, not my style, but his powers of observation were remarkable. Then walked to King's to hear Michael Jeffreys' talk on Solomos as "process" rather than "product," with a computer program showing four different edited versions of a single poem. The point is to stop believing in the virtue of a "definitive text" and to appreciate the multiplicity of versions. Nice reunion with him, Judith Herrin, Roddy Beaton, David Ricks and some others who knew me but whose names I don't know. Afterwards, supper in the Sofra with Roddy and Michael, who brought me up to date on Stylianos (he and the department have been reconciled, excluding Alf Vincent) and on the situation in Melbourne—which is being attacked in part because no one, except Stathis to a minimal degree, publishes. . . . Jim Warren came, too. He spoke very highly of Mimi Hughes, the Consul General in Thessaloniki, and asked me to try to help the consul, David Schuler, whose morale is low; he's at the stage where everything the Greeks do is annoying.

Tuesday, October 22, 1996

Lunched with Stuart Morton at Friends House. He commutes daily from Birmingham. He is in charge of all service programs in Africa and Asia. We talked about Woodbrooke, of course, and Outi. He was guarded, but he indicated that the decisions regarding redundancy came down from high with no discussion and no recourse. John Wyatt is still unemployed. Clare Chamberlain went to live with one of her children. Stuart spoke to one of the librarians on my behalf regarding Nancy Crawshaw's photos of the Salonika Quaker school, which I'd like to see deposited at Friends House rather than Princeton. Then I spoke to the librarian personally although he isn't in charge of photos. He was most encouraging. I wrote to Nancy Crawshaw à propos. . . . In the evening went to Covent Garden with Chrysanthi to the Royal Ballet, an all-Ravel program, starting with "La Valse," which I love so much. Choreography by Frederick Ashton, so different from Balanchine, and thus refreshing. Next was a gorgeous pas de deux by Darcy Bussell and Adam Cooper to Ravel's "Pavane pour une infant défunte": pure serenity. Then a humorous "La fin de jour" with the dancers in Edwardian bathing suits. Finally Ashton's "Daphnis and Chloë," which I'd never seen. Chloë, danced by Sarah Wildor, was so supple. A full-scale "story ballet," totally effective.

Wednesday, October 23, 1996

Almost finished with DG lesson 6, which I'll send to Dimitri tomorrow along with lesson 5. I've been writing drill after drill. . . . In the afternoon, matinee of Uncle Vanya with Daphne and Chrysanthi. New translation, much more active, indeed violent, than productions I'd seen previously. Derek Jacobi a mercurial Vanya. Imogen Stubb fetching as the professor's young wife. Frances Barber superb as Sonya, the old maid, and Trevor Eve fine as the doctor. Directed by Bill Bryden. We were in the fifth row and could appreciate the facial expressions, the tears on Jacobi's face. Actors and characters seemed to merge. And what a remarkable play, so well paced, with intensity and slackness perfectly balanced. . . . Supper afterwards in the Sofra: fine Turkish food. . . . Today Christina impressed us all by sitting up and keeping her balance at least for thirty seconds.

I'm apprehensive about the move to Greece tomorrow, but trust that our customary adaptability will not fail us. . . . Worked on Demotic Greek all day. Then to the National Theatre to meet Rowena Loverance and see Oedipus Rex and Oedipus at Colonus. Quick supper at the National. Rowena will be coming to see the Byzantine exhibit at the Met in New York next March. I quizzed her about Woodbrooke but she didn't seem to know much, or wouldn't say. The Oedipus plays used a new translation by Ranjit Bolt employing rhymed couplets, which struck me as wrong, especially as some used feminine rhymes and were almost ludicrous. But on balance the productions were very rich—hardly surprising since Peter Hall was the director and Alan Howard played Oedipus in both. All actors had masks fitting over the entire head like a huge helmet, but the diction was very clear. In the Tyrannos the choruses were spoken, which I found disappointing; but in the Colonus they were sung or half-sung: much better. Scenery, lighting, costumes—marvelous. Tyrannos was heavy, too long, and I did not find my emotions being “purged,” as Aristotle says. What came through was Oedipus's obsession with knowing—knowing evil (like Adam and Eve). Knowledge turned him into a sinner with a huge price to pay, again like Adam and Eve. The most memorable aspect of this evening was the brilliant idea of placing the Colonus together with the Tyrannos (perhaps the Antigone could be added, too). I had never seen the Colonus. It is so beautiful and tender, peaceful, like the calm ending of Paradise Lost. The historical aspect is interesting. Done in 406 at a very bad time for Athens, it affirms Athens's continued importance, culturally if not politically. What a treat! What a nice way to end our stay in London!

London–Thessaloniki

Alex picked us up at 5:45 a.m. Warm goodbye to Daphne and Christina, and also to Alex, but with hopes to see him again. BA flight to Thessaloniki via Stuttgart. Very few passengers. We were the only ones in Business Class after Stuttgart. The pilot came out. Long talk. He went directly from A-levels to BA training school, he told me. Invited me into the cockpit. From there, looking out the pilot's window, the plane didn't seem to be moving at all. He showed me the screen with a line showing the way to their destination: they navigate by that, staying on the line. (What happens if the computers malfunction? Don't ask!) Dimitri Gounelas met us, drove us to the university apartments, presented us a potted plant. Our apartment (the only one with a private bath) had been given elsewhere—mix-up! Dimitri was chagrined. But we're in a large third-floor room with view of the sea. Bathroom in the hall, shared by others. Kitchen ditto. We're promised "our" room on Monday. Immediately to the university. Showed me the office of Γεώργιος Κεχαγιόγλου, which I'll occupy. Excellent! Meal. Then straight to the Βαφοπούλειο for a symposium on Salonica prose writers, Peter Mackridge speaking as we entered. Afterwards, huge hug from him and kisses, Greek style. Panayiotis Moullas spoke very well, insisting that we should read texts and not concentrate on an author's lovelife! Various authors spoke, very eloquently. So, just a few hours after arrival, we were thrust into Salonica's intellectual life. Pleased to find that I understood just about everything, without strain. Spoke to Kehayioglou afterwards, and Aglaïa Lipourli came up with a big hug. And Moullas thanked me for the favorable review I wrote of one of his books a long time ago: good memory.

Breakfast with Peter Mackridge at the Metropolitan Hotel. I'm hoping that he'll come to America for the MGSA Princeton symposium in 1999. He says that he has very few students at Oxford, but Elizabeth Jeffreys has even fewer. Most go to King's or Birmingham. We looked at hotels. The Queen Olga is cheap but the room is too small, and Vouli says it's used by couples who want one-night sex. The place is full of naval officers, here for the October 28th parade. Very nice for the girls! We took a long promenade on the beautiful seafront, directly in front of our room. I'm working on chapter 7 of DG1, typing in the changes we made in Princeton and writing new drills. . . . Friday night, went to Odysseas and Eleni at Kolokotroni 11. Their Yiayia is permanently bedridden and needs constant care, but they managed to bring her to the village this summer, traveling by taxi at great expense. This morning we walked down Σαρανταπόρου to see the old house there, miraculously still standing, occupied by Boy Scouts. Chrysanthi didn't seem particularly moved. Fortunately, neither of us lives in the past. And we peeked into the Aghia Triadha church where we were married. Again, very little emotion. We live in the present. . . . To George and Efthymoula for lunch. Joined by Andreas and his nice wife, Dimitra, and their baby, George. Both are lawyers without much work, but they say that each year things do improve. George and I had a long conversation, chiefly about our children and the good relation between Deanna and Chrysanthi, her mother-in-law, and our friendship with Lucia. George of course hasn't been so lucky. And he told me that his prostate cancer returned after twenty years' remission. He has elected not to treat it. I didn't want to press. Efthymoula was as repulsive as ever. She assured us that something was true: something about Aristotle Onassis, because "all the periodicals said it"! . . . We discovered a McDonald's nearby, for an evening snack.

Breakfast in "Evan's Delicious": coffee and tyropita. Worked on lesson 7. Scared silly when I blew all the fuses by stupidly using a surge protector rated only for 110 watts. But the computer was unharmed and I was able to restore the current because actually the system is modern enough not to use fuses. Walked to Vouli's. Her mother is quite spry. Talked about Stylianos. He seems to think I'm angry at him. Must write. Vouli said he withdrew from the competition for archbishop of America because he disagreed with the Patriarch's decision to split off South America and the Caribbean. Who knows? Vouli wants us to go on a two-day excursion to Pelion, but we really don't want to. . . . Finished Tolstoy's "The Death of Ivan Ilych." I see why Dimitri has assigned it to go with Kazantzakis's Κωμωδία, since it shows the agony of a man who becomes notably ill and is convinced that there is no afterlife and also that he never committed anything that deserved punishment. In short, his suffering is meaningless, absurd. The interesting difference between Kazantzakis and Tolstoy in this regard is that Kazantzakis grappled with the theme at the very start of his career, Tolstoy near the end. . . . French fries, a chocolate milkshake and chicken burger at McDonald's, watching children play.

Όχι day

Huge parade. Odysseas, Vouli, her mother, George and Efthymoula joined us to watch from the balcony. The first part very moving. Red Cross ladies came first, then various locals dressed in village costumes, then Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts, gymnasium and lyceum students, university students—i.e., civilians. Then the military: tanks galore, missile carriers, planes zooming overhead, helicopters floating by, infantry, including women, the navy in their beautiful uniforms, the officers with swords, the air corps, the mountain corps with skis. . . . George mentioned yesterday that he had been twice imprisoned during the war, once by the Germans, who stood him against a wall in a mock execution (which he of course did not know was mock). How did he feel viewing all this? And Odysseas, the ex-communist αντάρτης? Best not ask. . . . In the midst of it all, we were given the keys to our room on the first floor, the one with the private bath. Much smaller, with no view, and with dogs and pigeons directly beyond the balcony. Oh well . . . We moved. . . . Then to Kostas and Lola for lunch. Their street is now only for pedestrians; very nice. I find Kostas hard to understand, but got enough to take part in the conversation. Lola has been rejuvenated by becoming a grandmother. As she said, all one needs, really, is not to think primarily of oneself. They worried about me—always writing. I explained the fact that work, for me, is pleasure, mostly. How fortunate! . . . Back home to finish lesson 7 while Chrysanthi went back to George's at Kalamariá for coffee.

Tuesday, October 29, 1996

Our first "business day." To American Express Bank. Typical scene: one employee screaming at another. We need to realize that these rages are not so drastic as they seem. (?) Then bought bus cards: 12 tickets available apparently only in one location, which we discovered without too much trouble. Then to the university. Kehayioglou very accommodating.

Showed me the secrets of fax and telephone. The secretary is Γεωργία Χρίση. Tried e-mail but it doesn't work. Dimitri Gounelas and Ruth took us back home to Panorama. Very village-like. He knows everyone. Fun buying bread, fish, etc. They have a spectacular house with fields in back and a view of Χορτιάτη. Tastefully done, with Greek handicrafts. Dimitri cooked the fish. Ruth's eyesight is so-so. Very little central vision left, only peripheral. Every so often the bleeding resumes in the retina and she loses more. But she's still functioning. Their nine-year-old boy, Francis, came in from school. Speaks English with a lovely New Zealand accent. Then Αγγέλικα, fifteen years old, came in. She's a flutist and has gone to summer music camp. They all seemed to be interested in my description of Kinhaven. Ruth said that Angelica rarely sits with adults but she did this time.

Wednesday, October 30, 1996

Working on my Nikiforos Fokas chapter in Politics of the Spirit, volume 2. I like it, will use it for the course here. Bought Λυμπεράκη Τα ψάθινα καπέλα for Chrysanthi. In the evening, went to the university to hear Linda Pratt (University of Nebraska) lecture on how and why postmodernism makes us see modernism differently. She concentrated on American poets: Pound, Eliot, Williams, Stevens. Interesting, but I objected in the discussion to her emphasis on the link between modernism and fascism, saying that one really needs to include Joyce and Woolf in the picture. Also, in saying that postmodernism leaves us with nothing (except a healthy deconstruction), she never mentioned Beckett, another regrettable omission. Afterwards, Vouli took us to a nice coffee bar off Πλατεία Ναυαρίνο for κρεατόπιτα and cappuccino.

Peter Allen faxed me, very upset by the vote of the MGSA Executive to terminate him as associate editor of JMGS, and rightfully so. At least he's clear that I am innocent in this regrettable affair. In the afternoon Chrysanthi and I went to the τεχνολογικό πάρκο behind the American Farm School, the FORTHNET office, to try to get my e-mail to work. Frenetic young man there talking on two telephones at once while typing on a computer at the same time. We stayed two hours while he came and went; he gave me software and told me to go to a Macintosh place in town. In the evening, back to Βαφοπούλειο for another symposium, this time on Εμείς κι οι άλλοι, a good subject. Marianna Tziouva was one of the speakers; she flashed me a huge smile when I entered (late) in the middle of an interesting talk by Τζίνα Πολίτη. Μιχάλης Χρυσανθόπουλος presided. Nice to encounter old familiar faces. Ο Παναγιώτης Μουλλάς, in the question period, once again complained—γκρίνιασε, είπε ο ίδιος—that the whole discussion was off base. Γκρινιάζει πολύ εύγλωττα. Afterwards, supper with Vouli and Chrysanthi in Καμένη Γωνιά, with talk about the degeneration of the Greek language, according to Vouli. Then, with Chrysanthi, an ice cream and a good cup of coffee. Ah, life's small pleasures! . . . Before this, I went to the Macintosh place. Chris, another frenetic, again talking on two telephones at once, screaming at people, etc. I left the computer.

Friday, November 1, 1996

Back to the Macintosh place. They said I don't have enough memory. I deleted lots of programs. They'll try again. . . . Trying to reserve a hotel for John and Mary Rassias. Makedonia Palace full because of two medical seminars and a film festival. Got a room in the Electra Palace.

Saturday, November 2, 1996

Finished my Nikiforos Fokas essay. Back to the Βαφοπούλειο for the last day of the conference on Εμείς και οι άλλοι. Ο Κεχαγιόγλου delivered an eloquent paper on Greek expressionists but was challenged by Gina Politi on a proper definition of expressionism. Intellectual life here is very intense . . . and articulate. The auditorium was full, every seat taken. Spoke to Kokolis, who lost his wife recently. Dimitris told me that our first class will be on Tuesday, at last. Farinou read from Bakhtin on the centrality (!) of marginality, and jokingly concluded that η Θεσσαλονίκη, αν και η πολιτιστική πρωτεύουσα της Ευρώπης, είναι στο περιθώριο. . . . Lunch with Chrysanthi in Goodies, a club sandwich and a "chicky" (chicken) sandwich. . . . In the evening, walked all the way to Vouli's for supper with George and Charlotte Draper and Vouli's friend who is the academic director at Anatolia College. Will try to arrange for John Rassias to do a workshop there in the future; they'd like that. Talked about Nancy Crawshaw (Charlotte would like the photos to come here), Mr. and Mrs. House, Demotic Greek 1, from which Charlotte studied, their new two-year-old junior college. Κυρά Κούλα είπε, «Πάχυνες, Πήτερ». Walked all the way back again on the παραλία and had a final milkshake at McDonald's.

Sunday, November 3, 1996

Catching up on mail from home. Watched a church service on TV. I find it antipathetic. Out at 11:00 a.m. for a coffee with Chrysanthi and κουλούρια, which we ate on a bench in the sunlight on the παραλία. Approached by two Jehovah's Witnesses who asked, Did we know why the world has problems? No. Well, here's the answer—and they gave us The Watchtower in Greek. The answer, interestingly, is that religion has failed. Catholics kill Catholics, Protestants kill Protestants, whereas Christ was a pacifist. Hooray for them!

Forgot to note last Friday that we went to the theater: Πειραματική Σκηνή της Τέχνης at the Θέατρο Αμαλία, for Chekhov's Οι τρεις αδελφές (Three Sisters). Acted with vigor, pathos, humor, not as good as London (of course), but very professional. However, it was all action, with very little of Chekhov's pauses, silences, languor. The central character is the doctor (cf. Chekhov himself) who, no matter what happens, concludes that it doesn't make any difference. Complete cynicism vis-à-vis life's joys and tragedies.

This noon we ate with Odysseas and Eleni. Chrysanthi encouraged them to speak about Tashkent and the war and their participation in the Αντίσταση, which they did, willingly, at great length. Regarding Russia today, Odysseas's conclusion is Καλά να πάθουν. Under Communism everyone was fed and housed and had a job. Now, greed and chaos. Gorbachev is the arch villain in his eyes. His account went into detail about how well he and the other Greek refugees were treated.

Went to a lecture on postmodernism and teaching, Derrida, etc. Pretty old hat: how a text has many meanings. But delivered with passion. Afterwards, κρεατόπιτα with Vouli and Chrysanthi at Vouli's favorite place off the Πλατεία Ναυαρίνο. Long talk with Κοκόλης, who lost his wife to cancer but is grateful that he loves his profession and is energized by students. How fortunate we are! Toula paid us a visit. She says that things are hard at the Odeon because the general economy is so weak. Parents don't have money for music lessons, or enroll their children and then don't pay. . . . George had an emergency: total blockage of urine.

A doctor came to the house and inserted a catheter and relieved him. He assumes that his prostate, which was removed a long time ago, has grown back. Is that possible?

Tuesday, November 5, 1996

My first class. Eleven students: ten girls and one boy. Dimitris and I did nothing but organize—who is assigned, what, when. Everything in Greek, of course, but I didn't have any trouble. . . . Message from Ann Wainwright at Kendal that Mother had another small stroke but healed quickly and perfectly. No emergency. . . . To Αριστοτέλους to a nice ουζερί with Zisis and Ritsa. She had a by-pass several months ago and looks very old but says she's fine in body but not in psychology. He is retired, and full of Freemasonry (Τεκτονισμός), which seems to be very liberal here. I tried to explain Quakerism to them, with difficulty.

Wednesday, November 6, 1996

Spoke to Ann Wainwright. Mother is fine. Spoke to Mother. She's a bit confused, asked if I were calling from England. But then seemed perfectly fine. I fear that she may never return to the apartment, however. Ann says that Mother would accept this calmly. I only hope that she remains well in body and mind through Christmas, when all the children and grandchildren will be in Hanover. . . . Clinton reelected, but the Republicans retained both houses of Congress, alas. Yet New Hampshire elected a democratic governor and senator: amazing! . . . To the new Byzantine Museum, a nice building but still empty, for a lecture on Mount Athos, with slides of some of the treasures that will be shown in the Museum's inaugural exhibition. . . . Then to the Βαφοπούλειο for a very fine lecture by Μίμης Λυπουρλής on an ancient text called «Ομήρου και Ησιόδου αγών». He read the ancient Greek, then a translation of each section, and spoke eloquently about our need to know texts above and beyond the standard ones. In this one, the poetic "contest" between Hesiod and Homer was won by Hesiod because the king decreed that poetry about food and farming is more important and wholesome than poetry about war, even if it's inferior as verse. How nice! . . . This morning, I walked to the Αλεξάνδρειο Οδείο and played through my entire four-hand repertoire with Toula. She's not a perfect sight-reader but with one run-through she can play everything well enough. What a pleasure for me! She said that she doesn't give four-hand pieces to the students because she has no way of obtaining the scores. I must send her some basic pieces: Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Bizet.

Thursday, November 7, 1996

Working on my Μακρά μαθητεία lecture: very slow, but it's good άσκηση for my Greek. Went to a symposium on women poets to hear Katerina Anghelaki-Rooke, but they had changed the program. Another poetess read, and I understood essentially nothing. Then I met Katerina by accident outside. She says that Mrs. Kazantzakis is like a mummy, and she doesn't want to visit her again.

Friday, November 8, 1996

My first "office hours" (ώρες συνεργασίες) at the university. Both students came who are slated to report on Tuesday, one on Κωμωδία, the other on Νικηφόρος Φωκάς. We had an hour and a half's really good tutorial covering the texts, life, their reactions, their pleasure at first exposure to philosophy. What a pleasure! I felt that I was offering something at last. After all, the university is housing us, giving me a splendid office, a fax, a xerox, telephone, and so far I've worked a total of only 3½ hours. And Έφη Τσιούτσιου at the Onassis Foundation, when I told her I'd booked the Achilleus Hotel (cost 11600) said, Κύριε καθηγητά, να πάτε σε καλύτερο ξενοδοχείο! The Foundation will pay everything. I said we were simple people without fancy needs but that I'd ask Chrysanthi, που κάνει κουμάντο. And of course Chrysanthi said, "Let's go to the fancy hotel." . . . Long conversation with Leander by telephone. They're fine. Sophia sleeps through the night, has a huge appetite, is gaining weight. Thursday is Leander's shift; Deanna has morning rehearsal and evening concert. They're looking for a nanny. So far none of the applicants speaks a word of English. Leander gloated over the new car they bought: a four-wheel-drive Subaru. He wants to go to the farm with Alec and me over Christmas. . . . Μακρά μαθητεία even slower now because I'm adding material on Νικηφόρος Φωκάς, panentheism, etc. . . . Chrysanthi and I had a nice lunch in the Πλατεία Ναυαρίνο and walked all the way home. At night, went out for τσιτ in a place with a blond woman in high boots and (I'm sure) no brassiere, sitting alone, smoking and drinking, a prostitute maybe, while four very virile men in their 40s sat opposite, mustachioed Greek types. When another joined them, his neighbor kissed him and stroked his hair. Strange. Afterwards we walked again on the παραλία, which is a blessing for us. . . . Finished

Saturday, November 9, 1996

Working on Η μακρά μαθητεία του Καζαντζάκη σε χριστιανικά θέματα. Very slow. Toula, Stavros, and Αθηνούλα came at 9:00 and took us to a ψαροταβέρνα in Καλαμαριά. Octopus, squid, μπακαλιάρος, all very nice. Long discussion with Stavros about materialism vs. idealism. He declares himself άθεος, materialist, Marxist. I tried to explain that spirit equals energy, and that human affairs, contrary to the Marxist view, are often determined by "spiritual" rather than purely economic factors. The child is very sweet.

Sunday, November 10, 1996

To George's for lunch. Tilda there with daughter, and Dimitris. Tilda very cordial, smiling, eager to converse. Nice change from our previous impressions. George worried he may have cancer; he'll go for a urological exam on Tuesday. Efthymoula didn't scream and pontificate as much as usual. . . . In the evening, Dimitris and Ruth picked us up and we all went to Mimis and Aglaïa Lypourlis. Their living room is filled to bursting with bibelots and bric-a-brac, as before. Very lively conversation, especially with Mimis, about George Thompson, ancient Greek pronunciation, our children, the joys of retirement.

Monday, November 11, 1996

John and Mary Rassias arrived and installed themselves at the Macedonia Palace in a room facing the παραλία and sea. I had office hours from 4 to 6. The two students assigned to Zorba came; they didn't have much to say, but we talked for an hour and I think I gave them some direction. Then to the hotel. Walked with John and Mary. John puffing. Back to university to hear Moullas lecture on Βιζυηνός, very logically: a good introduction, stressing that he wasn't ηθογράφος and avoided the romantic nostalgia for the village that was current in the nineteenth century. That's why he is so σύγχρονος. Afterwards to Ναυαρίνο for supper. John wanted σκορδαλιά. No luck.

Tuesday, November 12, 1996

With John and Mary to Μονή Βλατάδων. A Syrian priest very kindly opened the church for us. They have students from twenty different countries, mostly from the Soviet bloc and the Arab world. They all do a full year of Greek at the university before beginning the theological course. Lunch with the Rassias in the upper town. Siesta. Work. Then supper at—finally—a good restaurant in our neighborhood: οι Λύκοι, where John got his σκορδαλιά and we all had omelets.

Wednesday, November 13, 1996

To the Farm School. Caught the end of the πανηγύρι for St. Chrystostomos, with boys dancing, then girls dancing, all in costumes, the boys very martial, the girls very feminine. Beautiful. How nice to see a line dance in which everyone is coordinated, in time, melting individuality into the whole. Then, by prearrangement, Joann Ryding, head of public relations, introduced us to the English teachers. Chrysanthi ran into two graduates of the girls' school who remembered her as energetic, with the big γαλάζια μάτια. We're trying to plan a workshop at the school for the Rassias method of language teaching. After a tour of the farm—one huge pig, a pregnant cow, John Deere tractors—lunch with the head of English at the new college, plus dean of the college. Afterwards, John put us all in a semicircle and did a demonstration class in Chinese! Stop, start, turn. Tzing! Fun. . . . I also found Christine Willis, who said that Pinewood needs help in language teaching—would we go to see Peter Baiter, the headmaster? So we did this next. He is interested in cooperating in order to improve instruction in both Greek and English (in Greek they use our book). Christine said she thinks he'll be stepping down. I thought of Alec as the next headmaster. . . . In the evening, George, Lola, Efthymoula, and Odysseas all came to us to visit, and I brought over the Rassias to meet them. George began speaking French very apologetically. I had briefed John and Mary on some of the very complicated family history.

Thursday, November 14, 1996

Chrysanthi took John and Mary to the Archeological Museum; I worked on Kioukias's article for JMGS, which, as usual, needs Englishing. Lunch all together in Navarino Square. John had skordalia and vakalaro (cod), which his mother used to make. To my office for telephoning and faxing. Steve Fleming faxed me that the self-evaluation for Kendal was one of the best that the commission had ever seen. The accreditation team gave us an A+. I faxed him back with hearty congratulations. . . . In the evening, went to the Θεάτρο Αμαλία for a production of Catherine Anne's Tita-Lou, translated from the French. Just two actresses plus a voice-over. The Lou of Λυδία Φωτοπούλου was stunning and brilliant, with all emotions, the whole spectrum. And how amazingly clear and clipped her Greek is! The Tita of Έφη Σταμούλη was adequate (she played Masha in the Chekhov, also adequately). The play is about two very close sisters who leave Britain for the first time to go to Palermo tracing their late father's life; there they live through togetherness and estrangement, sickness and health, sisterly love and the desire for a man's love. The play ends with the voice-over declaring: Υπάρχει . . . η θλίψη των αντρών. . . Μια θλίψη που δεν αγγίζει τις γυναίκες. Μια θλίψη . . . που αναδύεται από μια πολύ μακρινή αδυναμία. . . Την αρνημένη αδυναμία. Τη βλέπω παντού αυτή τη θλίψη. . . Βλέπω στους άντρες . . . μια θλίψη που δεν αγγίζει τις γυναίκες. . . . Afterwards, a final tea and dessert with the Rassiases in "Wolves," back to their hotel, and adieu for a week until we meet again in Crete. John will be going all over Turkey to do four workshops. He hopes to return to Thessaloniki to do the workshop here with us if I get invited in 1997 to one of the celebrations for the 40th anniversary of Kazantzakis's death. We'll see . . .

Friday, November 15, 1996

Still working on Kioukias's JMGS submission. . . . Office hours today were very busy. The two students doing Zorba didn't come, alas, but I was besieged by students wanting to study in America, including one who aspires to do a Ph.D. in Modern Greek. I told her about Harvard, Ohio State, Princeton, and NYU. Another was from Anatolia; she came with her mother. She wants to go to Dartmouth, is a fanatic rock climber. She wants me to interview her. Another is here on a Fulbright from America. . . . Walked in the evening all the way to Aristotelous to meet Ξενοφών Κοκόλης at Tottis's. Two and a half hours of good talk and food. He is a leftist, very devoted to teaching and publishing (gave me all his recent books); says he's been reading Bien for years, never goes to department meetings, has recovered from loss of his wife to cancer eight months ago. He was unable to work for three to four months afterwards. Very negative about Greek education, based on memorization and non-participation. Then the graduates go out into the high schools and do the same: φαύλος κύκλος. After decades of service he is earning now only 400,000 a month, which means about $20,000 a year. But of course he insisted on paying for our meal! . . . Walked all the way back again with Chrysanthi, she dressed only in a suit jacket and pullover. It's about 60 degrees here. Just heard from Dartmouth that it's 10 degrees Fahrenheit there.

Saturday, November 16, 1996

Finished Huis Clos. L'Étranger is perplexing; Huis Clos is all too straightforward. As Garcin declares at the very end: "Pas besoin de gril: l'enfer, c'est les Autres." Yes, it certainly could be. Interesting that Sartre chose as the only man in the play a pacifist who was shot because he was a conscientious objector. . . . Supper at the home of Λίνα Στέφα in her swanky apartment at Μεγ. Αλεξάνδρου 13. Guests: Vouli, Bill McGrew, and I. N. Kazazis, professor of classics and head of the Τμήμα της Φιλολογίας; the man who OK'd our residence here, and whom I'd met at NYU in his capacity as board member of the Ίδρυμα Ελληνικού Πολιτισμού. Talked with Bill about a Rassias workshop; he's agreeable. Kazazis is very interesting and excited regarding the Κέντρο Ελληνικής Γλώσσας, which now has all the fiches from the Georgacas dictionary and expects to produce a definitive Greek-English dictionary σιγά-σιγά. Home at 1:30 a.m.

Sunday, November 17, 1996

Today is the anniversary of the Πολυτεχνείο and trouble is expected from anarchists, especially around the American embassy in Athens and the consulate here. Up at 7:00 a.m. John Rassias telephoned from Athens; insomniac again. I did the contents page and survival Greek, telephoning for DG to mail to Gondicas, who has supplied nothing all this time. We took Odysseas and Eleni out to the Λύκουσ and successfully managed to pay. Very cordial. In the evening, George and Efthymoula came and we went to a pizza place in a new shopping mall in Kalamaria, very nice, and again I managed to pay. Also, we managed to explain to them the origin and meaning of our Thanksgiving holiday. Efthymoula was more supportable, conversing instead of dictating, although when we got into the car to return home and I started to buckle my seat belt, she screamed from the back seat "Don't use it!" but then corrected herself: "Oh, οι Αμερικανοί το χρησιμοποιούν." Greeks never, even though it's a criminal offense to be without the belt.

A tiring day. Thrice to the university. In the morning because Γεωργία Φαρίνου wanted to talk. She has made no progress on her study of Kazantzakis as autobiographer. The usual complaints: teaching, administration (she's chair of the τομέας this year). Too bad, because her work could be valuable. I called Doutis, to try to ease her way to a Fulbright. . . . Took the wrong bus at lunchtime and ended up walking to the Λύκουσ to meet Chrysanthi. All sweaty. Then back to the university for ώρες συνεργασίες, but no one came. Then to the Εταιρεία Μακεδονικών Σπουδών for a lecture that Vouli wanted us to hear, on archeology in Turkestan. Very poor. 90% travelogue, 10% archeology. But interesting regarding the sense that people have there that they are descendants of Alexander the Great. . . . To Vouli's with Chrysanthi and Lina Skoufa for a light supper. Then walked all the way home.

Athens

Class at 10:00 on Zorba. The two girls did very well. I'd worried because they didn't come to office hours yesterday, but what we had done last Friday obviously was sufficient. They organized well, touching the work from aesthetic, political, ethical, and philosophical perspectives. Good discussion afterwards. But, poor things, they have no hope of being appointed to teaching positions enabling them to use their training. . . . Flew to Athens. Taxi to Hotel St. George Lycavettos, where the Onassis Foundation has placed us. Fifth floor room with breathtaking view of the entire city, Acropolis in the center, sea and Salamis in the background. . . . We immediately walked to Σύνταγμα. McDonald's and Steer's have replaced the Greek cafés there. Great barriers everywhere for subway construction. Noise. Traffic. But some lovely pedestrian oases near Kolonaki Square. Went down Panepistimiou to Omonoia. "Our" loukoumades shop is still there: miraculous. But the Hotel Omonoia, where I was locked in on 21 April 1967, seems to be defunct. To Πλατεία Βικτωρίας to see Christos and Eri. Dinner. Lots of plans for an issue of Θέματα λογοτεχνίας dedicated to Ritsos, perhaps together with an MGSA symposium, in 1999, the 30th anniversary of our first symposium, 1969, and the 90th anniversary of Ritsos's birth. Christos's work for autistic children is progressing. He has some chance of help from AHEPA. But the description by Έρη of life in the Department of Modern Greek at the University of Athens was harrowing. Mediocre senior professors block the appointment of anyone with more than mediocre talents. Professors still read from their books, which students are forced to buy. Everything is based on memorization rather than discussion. A sad story. Things are much better at Thessaloniki, it seems. Finally, we all pored over the illegible words in the Kazantzakis letters, and Christos and Eri deciphered most of them, although not all. They also helped here and there, identifying an expression as a quote from Ερωτόκριτος, for example. Back to the hotel very late, very tired.

Athens

A Russian Neohellenist, Viktor Sokolink, had telephoned me yesterday, and we met for breakfast. He is also an Onassis Foundation fellow. Christos showed me last night that Sokolink has an article on Ritsos in Θέματα λογοτεχνίας. His chief interest has been on the use of myth in Ritsos, especially in Τέταρτη Διάσταση, and he had benefitted evidently from my work on Φιλοκτήτης. Very cordial, extended conversation. I'll send him offprints when we return. . . . We went to the great αρχοντικό of the Onassis Foundation to meet Έφη Τσιούτσιου in the flesh. A very fleshy lady, with broad smile (Chrysanthi says that no one smiles in Greece). She took us on a tour: Onassis's Monte Carlo office reestablished exactly as it was; his books (many in English), art works (mostly Greek), Maria Callas's piano, portraits of Onassis, his son Alexander (who died in a plane crash), his daughter Christina (who probably committed suicide), Jackie Onassis, Maria Callas, first wife, etc. Ostentatious wealth everywhere. I recognized one of the trustees (he'd been in NYU) and he told me that he'd just returned from NYC where the Foundation donated $1,500,000 to the Metropolitan Museum of Art for a Greek library. The endowment is over four billion. That means about 800 million income at 5%. . . . Walked through Πλάκα. Beautiful nineteenth-century villas. Suddenly I hear "Peter!" It's Άθαν Αθανασόπουλος, director of the Εταιρεία Ελληνικής Γλώσσας, located just under the Acropolis. So, we had another tour. They're producing a computerized data base of all Greek texts from the 5th century A.D. (when the Ancient Greek θησαυρός stopped) to today. All the Byzantine fathers, medieval writers, folksongs, etc. I asked him about Kazazis's similar institute in Thessaloniki and he was very negative. Yet another case of duplication of effort instead of collaboration. . . . On to the Acropolis. Teaming with Greek schoolchildren. Most of the external scaffolding of the Parthenon is gone, although some scaffolding does remain in the interior. One cannot walk on the building or even quite up to it, as in the old days; yet one can now, once again, see the corrections for optical deception (οφθαλμική απάτη). Lots of familiar objects in the museum: the man carrying a sheep; reconstruction of the pediments; the real Caryatids (except for the one in the British Museum). . . . To the Grande Bretagne for a wash and a short rest. Then to Café Dola, now called Café Φίλων, Skoufa and Lykavitou, to meet Katerina Anghelaki-Rooke. Her στέκι. She had an ouzo, I a φραπέ. Talked about Patroklos Stavrou, whom she hates. He and Ανεμογιάννης are not on speaking terms. Πάντα τα ίδια! Stavrou wants to make another Kazantzakis Museum in Athens. Katerina hopes that the Museum in Βαρβάροι can be shifted to Iraklio so that more people can go to it. She'll try to organize a celebration for the 40th anniversary of Kazantzakis's death, in 1997, in Aegina, and wants me to come. Then we did our "job," looking at illegible words, the ones that had stumped Christos and Eri. Katerina solved a few additional mysteries, but 5 or 6 still remain. . . . Nice lunch in the hotel: μουσακάς, hot and fresh. Siesta. Then to Ιπποκράτους to see a rollicking production of Goldoni, based on confusion because of two brothers who are identical twins, although one is smart, the other βλάκας, both played by the same very talented actor. Finally, of course, the mystery is solved, and everyone gets married and lives happily ever after.

Athens-Iraklio

Long breakfast again with Viktor Sokolink, including his wife this time, who doesn't speak Greek; she has a little English (he has none). So we spoke Greek and he translated into Russian. They want us to come to Moscow; we want them to come to America, perhaps to Princeton if we have the Ritsos symposium. . . . Welcomed at Iraklio airport, now called "Nikos Kazantzakis" airport, by John and Ava holding a sign: "Peter and Chris." Drove to Ava's new house, lovely, next to a huge olive grove and about 1/8 mile from Stelios's office at the Institute of Computer Science. Ψηλορείτης in the distance, banana tree, olives, apricots, peaches, grapes in the garden. Beautiful yellow Labrador dog called Chloe. Daughters enjoy watching television for hours, slumped on the couch. Alas! Went to the Institute, walking with John, to meet Stelios and the "famous Maria Vita," his secretary, who turned out to be a sexy siren with dyed blonde hair and tight pants. Stelios took us on a tour of the entire Institute, of which Computer Science is just one part. Saw their robot, trained to detect and thus avoid obstacles owing to “senses” provided by sonar and infra-red. Saw the laser labs. Talked to director of the lab experimenting with modes of communication for the handicapped, and told him about Kendal, with hope that we might be a laboratory for them at some point. But their cooperation, understandably, is with EU countries first. Stelios explained how likely they are to get 85% funding from the EU, which means that they really have to meet European standards, are continually inspected, do many projects in collaboration with similar institutes in the other EU countries. Wonderful! Europe may be slow to achieve monetary union, but it is already “united” in other ways, such as these. Very impressive projects, people, and building. . . . Back to their home for a leisurely supper of fish soup.

Iraklio

To the Institute to collect my travel reimbursement from Maria “V.” Then Ava drove us all to Μυρτιά to see the Kazantzakis Museum, opened especially for us thanks to a telephone call I made earlier to Τίτিকা Σακλαμπάνη. I was very moved: the collection is so rich, especially in the early works that I’ll be talking about tonight. And, of course, in its record of theatrical productions. But probably the museum would be visited more frequently if it were in town. Yet the curator said that they had 1000 people in October—busloads of Germans, etc. . . . At 7:00 p.m. I gave my lecture at the Institute: Η μακρά μαθητεία του Καζαντζάκη σε χριστιανικά θέματα. Stelios introduced me very kindly, recounting how supportive the Bien and Rassias families had been when he arrived at Dartmouth, then introduced John, saying that John would now display the results of his teaching method: the Greek he had mastered in four days! So John spoke, in very nice Greek, about my translation of St. Francis that he had so appreciated, about our collaboration on Demotic Greek 1, etc. It was very moving. The talk went well. I relaxed quite quickly, which meant that the Greek flowed better. In the question period I didn’t have any difficulty at all understanding or answering. Afterwards, people came up: Vouli’s niece, George Kallinis, whose article on Λεμονοδάσος I’ll be publishing, the chair of the Φιλοσοφική Σχολή at Rethymo, and one of the professors there in Modern Greek, hoping I’d come there next time. Indeed, I think that we’ve already arranged for November 1–2 next year, when they’ll hold a celebration for the 40th anniversary of Kazantzakis's death. We can coordinate this with a Rassias workshop in Iraklio and a previous Kazantzakis symposium on Aegina, plus a Rassias workshop in Thessaloniki, with luck. Another man said that he'd been present, age 17, at Kazantzakis's funeral. Another said that he'd had the same questioning about the μεταθανάτια ζωή. There was a nice American woman married to a Greek scientist, a nice Greek who'd grown up like Kazantzakis very religious, and wanted to convert all the neighbors. (And previously, Stelios had helped me find the right Greek expressions for "fusion reaction" and "process theology.") Then a group of a dozen or so went to a taverna in Iraklio for supper, with lots of easy, pleasant conversation. . . . Returning late to Stelios's home, we nevertheless watched his video about the robot, then said goodbye to John and Mary, who will be leaving at 6:15 a.m. tomorrow morning.

Saturday, November 23

Iraklio-Thessaloniki

Leisurely breakfast outdoors on the terrace with Psiloritis in the background. Pancakes with maple syrup. Then to town. Stelios and I to Demosthenes Stefanidis, behind the museum. His father's brother was Χαρίλαος Στεφανίδης, Kazantzakis's boyhood friend. Lots of stories about the eccentric Harilaos, whose pharmacy was a sort of salon for the writers and artists of the time, so much so that it went bankrupt as a pharmacy. The present Stefanidis took over Harilaos's papers, all thrown into trunks, and discovered letters from Kazantzakis, among others. The whole archive is now in neat notebooks labeled from the 1740s to the present. His Kazantzakis notebook is rich, starting with a long letter from 1902. He promised to send me xeroxes. A whole series was published in the periodical Δέντρο, which he lent me to make my own xeroxes and return to him. So . . . more letters! He, like me, wonders where to deposit his archive. Stelios may be able to arrange for a computerized index produced at the Institute. . . . We found Chrysanthi and Ava at a café teeming with νεολαία, very lovely on this fresh, sunny, warm Saturday morning. Then to a seaside restaurant (people were swimming) for fish eaten whole (head, bones, and all), to the airport, and fond good-byes. A good visit! . . . Entering our room at Μεγάλου Αλεξάνδρου 29 felt like returning home. Then to τους Λύκους for an omelet and across the street to Steer's for a decent cup of coffee.

Sunday, November 24, 1996

All day: family. Odysseas and Eleni fetched us at 10:30 a.m. Off by taxi to Goodies, where son Τάκης was holding a birthday party for his daughter. Thirty children, at least, upstairs in Goodies' special room, with slides, seesaws, etc., and two women directing the kids in games, dancing and the like. Afterwards, each received a special carton with a hamburger, fries, and soda. Yum! Energy. Thirty kids jumping and screaming, while their parents sat outside poisoning the air with cigarette smoke. Takis smiling, taking photos, again not spending much time with us, but I learned at least that he's working on a sewage system and other infrastructure in Halkidiki. Toula came briefly and we arranged to play duets again on Wednesday. We extricated ourselves finally around 12 noon despite Odysseas's protests. At 2:00, to Dimitris and Tilda for lunch. Their daughter, at first silent, gradually opened up and then wouldn't stop talking, about her toy doggie who urinated on the carpet και έκανε κακά, etc. Nice that she finally feels at ease with us. Tilda and Dimitri very easygoing. She expressed her profound gratitude to Daphne for the hospitality in London when their child was dying of cancer. Dimitri told me that she is only half-Jewish (father, not mother) and always wanted to escape the ghetto. She converted to Orthodoxy before the marriage and wears a cross prominently around her neck. . . . Siesta. Then to George and Efthymoula, joined by Dimitris and Tilda and the daughter. George's prostate grew back, so he was told. He has PSA of 2.0. I advised going to a second urologist for another opinion. This one advises another operation, which George refuses to have. Civilized conversation with Efthymoula. Yes, it is possible. The daughter again very talkative and friendly. George said it had never happened before. . . . Telephoned Daphne. They leave London on Wednesday, for good.

Monday, November 25, 1996

Wind and rain all night. 50 degrees this morning when I went out to buy bread. The bread seller very philosophical: να μη παραπονούμαστε, είχαμε τόσο ωραίο καιρό. . . . In the office from 4:00 to 7:30. Interviewed two Anatolia College students who want to come to Dartmouth, and then met with the pair who are doing Christ Recrucified tomorrow. How alert and smart they are! . . . Then Ritsa and Zisis took us out again, to a ψαροταβέρνα in Depot. When I tried to pay, Zisis of course refused, saying, Μη νοιάζεσαι για υλικά πράγματα. Nice.

Tuesday, November 26, 1996

Walked to work. Another very good, lively class, with excellent reports and good discussion afterwards. Long talk with Dimitris afterwards. He has vetted my lecture, which he says is σαφές και δυνατό. Walked to Aristotelous to meet Δημήτρης Ντούτης for lunch with three other Fulbrighters. (Chrysanthi went off to the American Farm School to make fifty apple pies for Thanksgiving.) One Fulbrighter is a water engineer, working on anti-pollution. Says that the Thermaic Gulf will be clean next year when the new treatment plant is opened. Now only 40% of sewage is treated. Next year 100% will be treated. The remaining problem is pollution from agriculture. Fertilizers enter the water table and reach the sea eventually. That's much harder to control, obviously. He cited the Hudson River as a shining example of anti-pollution success, and I was happy to report that I spend summers in Riparius. . . . Worked some more on the lecture, incorporating Gounelas's corrections and smoothing out some of the sentences. Then returned to Pelagidis's article for JMGS. Thank goodness no one invited us out tonight. We went to Steer's and had a club sandwich. A new resident here is a heavy smoker and the whole place is polluted. But we'll be leaving in six days.

Wednesday, November 27, 1996

A busy day. Went to the Odeon at 12:30 and played through my four-hand repertoire with Toula. Did all four pieces of the Della Joio, not just the first and last. Then at 5:00 to ERT3 opposite the Γαλλικό Ινστιτούτο, to be interviewed on TV on Kazantzakis by the well-known journalist Βολονάκης, who was well prepared and somewhat provocative. It will be screened tomorrow; thus I was astute enough to speak about the lecture I gave "last night." . . . Walked to the university in pouring rain; drenched. Lectured in the σπουδαστήριο. Full. Lots of students. Afterwards few questions but Μουλλάς asked about Nietzsche and Tolstoy, Dimitri about Buddhism, Elsie about the word θρησκοληψία. The audience seemed attentive while I was speaking, at least. Then out for the obligatory dinner with Φαρίνου, τους Λυπουρλίδες, Κυρία Χασιώτης, Δημ. Φραντζή and others I didn't know. Home at 1:00 a.m.

Thursday, November 28, 1996

Worked all day on a review of Karen Van Dyck's work for her tenure decision at Columbia. I tried my best, but I doubt that she'll get it, poor thing. . . . To the Farm School with Vouli for Η Μέρα των Ευχαριστιών, Thanksgiving. Turkey dinner for 250 people. Saw Mimi Hughes, the consul general. Sat with David Schuler, the consul, a Dartmouth grad, and his Japanese wife, whom we had met in 1990. Christine Willis is interested in Alec for Pinewood. We'll talk further. The students sang hymns (I thought I was back in Deerfield) and did square dancing and Greek dancing.

Friday, November 29, 1996

Long talk with Xenophon Kokolis in the office. He's writing an article on the poems of Αναγνωστάκης that refer to Christ. Very moving poems, which he read aloud to me, all of them copied out in his own hand. He does this in order to internalize texts he admires. Anagnostakis is a communist, of course, yet the poems are sensitive exploitations of Christian materials. I am hoping that the essay will be published by JMGS. . . . Afterwards, full office hours again. And I collected 114000 drachmas for my talk on Wednesday. Amazing! In the evening, Farinou and her husband Stavros picked us up. Then they picked up Moullas, and we went to a restaurant in Depot run by a former student of Stavros's (in pharmacology). Superb food. Good talk. Moullas invited me to the Βιζυηνός congress in March. How can I write something on Vizyinos?

Saturday, November 30, 1996

Rain. Bought τσουρέκι for breakfast. Started to pack. Finished copyediting Pelagidis on the economy—the first time I understood some basic concepts concerning deficits, supply-side economics, etc. Then started to catch up on correspondence. Doorbell rang. It was Odysseas, unshaven and distraught. Stavros had a severe heart attack last night and is in intensive care! He may die. Poor Toula. She'll lose husband, father, and business associate all at once. . . . Chrysanthi was at Lola's saying goodbye. Then we went to George and Efthymoula for Andreas's name day. Δήμητρα very nice: simple, smart, down to earth. Their baby never cries. Andreas has written a play and has translated a story by E. A. Poe, "Fall of the House of Usher," to be published. We said our goodbyes. . . . Back home, Christine Willis called to learn more about Alec. Pinewood will be advertising for an assistant headmaster. . . . Dimitri and Ruth picked us up and we all went to Elizabeth (Elsie) Sakellaridou for yet another δείπνο. (The poem by Sikelianos that Kokolis examined is Δείπνος—Last Supper—and the same title is used by Anagnostakis.)

Sunday, December 1, 1996

Amazingly, a day without a δείπνο. Chrysanthi went to church with Lola in the morning. To the Wolves for lunch. Long siesta. Reading Ασκητική. At night, τoστ, καφέ and a long walk on the παραλία. Heard that farmers plan to block the road to the airport as a sort of strike. Will we be able to depart on Tuesday? Big worry. . . . Kazantzakis in Ασκητική (σελ. 88) has this good advice for scholars: Πολέμα στο κρανίο, σκότωσε τις ιδέες, δημιουργά καινούριες. Ο Θεός κρύβεται μέσα σε κάθε ιδέα όπως μέσα σε σάρκα. Σύντριψε την ιδέα, λευτέρωσε τον! Δώσε του μιαν άλλη ιδέα, πιο απλόχωρη, να κατοικήσει.

Monday, December 2, 1996

The farmers are striking, blocking major roads with their tractors. Apparently it will be difficult or impossible to get to the airport tomorrow. At first we decided to leave early in the morning for our 4:00 p.m. flight. I went to the university, held my ώρες συνεργασίες, told the student I'd have to miss her presentation, left thank you notes to Kehayoglou for the office, to Dimitri and to Γεωργία Χρήση, the secretary. But when I went back home Vouli called a taxi driver she knows: the man who in the summer runs the hotel in Μαρμαρά where Daphne and Greg stayed. He said he knows the back roads and we shouldn't worry. So I changed plans about tomorrow's class. George and Charlotte Draper took us out, with Vouli. Charlotte said that they'd be retiring in three years and that Alec should think about applying for the headmastership. Also that of Pinewood if and when Peter Baiter leaves. But she doesn't think he should apply for the assistant headmastership of Pinewood. Interesting. Draper had no previous connection with agriculture; apparently that is not required.

Thessaloniki–London.

To class. Reports on Ασκητική and Toda-Raba. Farewells. I think that the term went well. Too bad I cannot stay to continue with Pentzikis. Dimitris drove me home. The taxi was already there, all loaded. We left at 12:30—both cars. By-passed the road block and approached the airport from the other direction. Lucky because they say that tomorrow that route will be blockaded also. But we arrived easily. . . . Comfortable flight, again business class. Worked on the computer: Doumanis's and Pappas's article on Castellorizo. Novotel near Heathrow. Lovely shower. Watched a soccer game on TV. Chrysanthi and I both agree that the entire Greek experience now seems like a dream, a pleasant one. . . . In class, I defended my view that Kazantzakis's Σιγή is not nihilistic, but is an apophatic expression of the ultimate inadequacy of all talk.

Wednesday, December 4, 1996

London–Boston–Hanover

Again, the luxury of business class. BA hostesses all smiles and service, compared to scowling Olympic ones. Boston amazingly warm, 60 degrees, no different from Salonica. Minibus home with three annoying Germans talking the whole time. Their language gives me the creeps. Our house immaculate: Felitsa took care to have Zdenka come in and vacuum. Out to Panda for supper. Chinese food again! Unpacked everything, but left all papers and books on the floor, where they will doubtlessly stay for weeks.

Thursday, December 5, 1996

Philadelphia

Off on AMTRAK to Philadelphia, custom class, very comfortable. Began work on Ollier's article on Valaoritis. Awful! Incomprehensible English, incoherent paragraphs, elementary mistakes everywhere. Can I salvage it? Arrived in time to play four-hands with Dan. He practiced the marches (more or less) but still fumbles terribly in the Brahms. Too bad. His problem now is that staff meeting doesn't want him to clerk, nor does it want rotating clerks each time. It wants to have a steady clerk that it chooses. Dan of course sees this as a threat to his leadership. . . . More of the same.

Friday, December 6, 1996

Pendle Hill

Publications Committee. I read the three submissions on the train yesterday and supported all three. The committee rejected two of the three. Afterwards, Book Committee. We've got our plate full this year. For the next publication we had hoped to have the authorized biography of Douglas Steere, but the writer has a bloc and can't seem to finish it. Nice breakfast with David and Margaret Gray. He called Stuart Morton a saint, and is glad, as I am, that he is now in Friends House. David had counseled him to leave Woodbrooke long ago. He said Claire Chamberlain is much better off now, relieved to be "redundant." The one problem is John Wyatt, still unemployed and probably unemployable.

Philadelphia–Hanover

Train to Springfield, OK. Then bus in a snowstorm. Trees and electric wires down across the road. Driver had to back up, turn around, use alternative routes. Arrived finally at the White River Junction bus station at midnight. Closed. I called a taxi but had to wait in the cold for  $\frac{3}{4}$  hour. A policeman said he'd help if he saw one. Finally one came, but along the way the policeman stopped the driver and asked, "Did you pick up that old man at the bus station?" I felt like Zorba when they called him παππούλης. But the driver kindly offered, "You don't look old." Chrysanthi was waiting up, worried and sick, of course.

Sunday, December 8, 1996

Daphne and Christina arrived Friday night, also in the snowstorm. Their plane circled Logan for two hours before landing, and she missed the 5:15 minibus, caught the 8:15, and arrived at 11:00 p.m. But the baby slept the whole way. Christina is beautiful, blond, sits up, sleeps all night, smiles just a bit, puts her "dummy" (pacifier) in her mouth the right way. She came to me without fear. We all went to Kendal for lunch. Christina in a high chair and admired by everyone. Mother very chipper and walking quite normally. . . . Working still on Ollier, slow going. . . . Called John Iatrides re: the Peter Allen mess. I'll write to the Executive Committee asking that he be reinstated and suggesting that the committee might like to designate a second associate editor (presumably a woman). John surmises that Chioles and Keeley determined to get rid of Allen out of fear that he would end up as editor owing to my illness last spring.

Wednesday, December 11, 1996

Amherst

To Amherst to examine Demotic Greek students again. Stavros has videos that we'll see in January and perhaps can use for the new DG book. Afterwards, Christmas shopping in the Deerfield candle company, a festival complete with (mechanical) German oom-pa-pa bands. . . .

Daphne went off to New York to start setting up their apartment, leaving Christina with us.

Thursday, December 12, 1996

Dimitri Gondicas has sent sample drawings for our book done by an Athenian artist. I don't like them. Need to show them to John when he returns from Turkey. . . . Finished Ollier, thank God!

Saturday, December 14, 1996

Cambridge

Daphne returned yesterday. Thus Chrysanthi and I were able to go to Cambridge to see Six Characters in Search of an Author at the A.R.T. What a brilliant, stimulating play! The "characters" are "real" because "eternal" whereas the players are unreal because subject to contingency. Very Platonic. Brustein's adaptation is very funny, with lots of topical in-jokes. Totally successful intellectual theater. Geidt excellent as the "senior actor." At the very end, I had a terrific nose-bleed, and ended up stretched out on a bench with people giving us tissues and advising me to pinch the bridge of the nose, which worked, eventually. . . . For lunch, we indulged in the delightful fare of Henrietta's Table in the Charles Hotel: shrimp, oysters, paté, eggs Benedict. . . . Once home, John called. Back from Turkey. The Patriarch received them warmly, remembering Veronica, who had tended a previous patriarch when Bartholomew was his assistant. . . . Pirandello's introduction to Six Characters is a perfect gloss on Kazantzakis's Κωμωδία—Τραγωδία: "life is a very sad piece of buffoonery, because we have in us . . . the need to fool ourselves continuously by the spontaneous creation of a reality . . . that from time to time reveals itself to be vain and illusory. Whoever understands the game can no longer fool himself, but if you cannot fool yourself you can no longer derive any enjoyment or pleasure from life."

Friday, December 20, 1996

Greg arrived from NYC. We were all interested to see if Christina would remember him, for he'd been away from her for two weeks. She warmed up to him quickly. . . . Alec arrived from Indonesia, looking fine. He revealed that he has a new girlfriend, an Indonesian, of course, but at least she's not employed by the school.

Sunday, December 22, 1996

Alec and I went to Meeting at Kendal, combined with Hanover Monthly Meeting. Very moving ministry by residents concerning their gratitude to us. I ministered saying the gratitude was equal from us to them, for their faith in us and also for their values that have made a loving community possible. Alec also ministered, recalling the Meeting's effect on him as a child, especially Henry Williams and Elizabeth Ballard. . . . Afterwards, we all had lunch with Yiayia, including Christina.

Monday, December 23, 1996

Bought a new car: a Buick Century, one step up from the Skylark. Very unexciting stylistically, but "solid," and proper for a respectable bourgeois.

Tuesday, December 24, 1996

Lucia Tebbe arrived from Santa Barbara. Leander, Deanna, and Sophia arrived from Maryland. Sophia is so small compared to Christina, very inert, or so it seems. She looks Eurasian already. Daphne and Greg cooked a nice supper for us.

Wednesday, December 25, 1996

A long, pleasant day. Bacon and eggs for breakfast. Opening of presents—many! Visit by the Rassiases, including Veronica, who has an extraordinary personality. Discussion with Alec, Leander, and Daphne regarding a "Terpni Partnership." Daphne is willing to be the treasurer, paying the bills. Expenses relevant to an individual's house will be borne by that individual; expenses relevant to the general upkeep will be charged to the Partnership. I hope to establish a fund to cover taxes and insurance. . . . Turkey dinner. Interval to laugh over Steve Martin's film "Planes, Trains, and Automobiles," then Christmas pudding, apple pie, champagne, and decaf coffee. Very nice indeed.

Saturday, December 28, 1996

To Audrey Logan's for pizza lunch with the Nodas, including Kesaya and David and David's Japanese-American "partner," who works for the Time-Warner foundation, judging grant proposals. Supper with Yiayia; then Bev Web's concert, all Chopin. Nocturnes and études beautiful, fantasy and scherzo full of memory lapses, ditto for the Grand Waltz Brillante, although he got further with it this time than last time. He is 88 and failing, but the old magic is still there on occasion. I hope that he'll drop dead one day, perhaps while playing (indeed we all feared that he would fall every time he rose so unsteadily from the piano bench). If he is forced to stop playing and is still alive, I think he will die from despair.

Terpni

Up at 6:00 a.m. Off to the farm with Alec and Leander in Leander's new Subaru. Breakfast at the Woodstock Inn. Arriving at 11:00 a.m. we looked for a possible site for Leander and Deanna's house on the upper fields, and found two possibilities. Then a contractor, Roger Anderson, came, to plan with Alec for Alec's cellar hole, septic tank, and dry well. Alec was pleased. He'll do it as soon as the frost is out of the ground, and everything will be ready when Alec arrives in June. Art Perryman drove up. Then we returned to his house to look at brochures for log kits, which he had in abundance. Back in Hanover, Chrysanthi objected to both sites we described, saying that the house should be at the edge of our north field. But that may be too swampy. We'll look again next summer. In any case, they may not have enough money to build. . . . A few days ago I sent off final instructions to Tim Smith in Lake Placid regarding the Partnership, and spoke to Frank Currier about tax consequences. The children agree. And Daphne will be the secretary-treasurer paying bills and keeping records. . . . Invitation from Moullas to speak at the Vizyinos conference in Thrace in March. I'd like to do this, but what can I say about Vizyinos? Perhaps a comparison with Thomas Hardy—two fin de siècle pessimists.

January 1, 1997

Yiayia played Scot Joplin rags (!) at Kendal at a lovely festivity, a little orchestra, plus lots of refreshments. We all went and of course Christina (mostly) and Sophia were the main attractions. Both infants seemed enthralled.

January 2, 1997

Drove Alec to Cambridge very comfortably in our new Buick. Greeted at Quaker Center by Anna Jones's daughter. Fine dinner at Giannino's; then to A.R.T. to see Ibsen's The Wild Duck, well acted by Will LeBow as Ekdal, and of course Jeremy Geidt as his father. The bitter satire against "integrity" is all too obvious, as is the symbolism of the wild duck, explained ad nauseam in the program notes and also in the text itself. But what a brave play for its time: a slashing of all pieties. Its mode: sardonic.

January 3, 1997

To Logan with Alec. Breakfast. Fond goodbyes. He flew off to Tokyo, Singapore, Jakarta. At 9:00 I had an hour-long conference call with Margery Walker, John Hennessey, and Jim Armstrong re: Steve Fleming's 1997 salary. We decided on $110,000 and better life insurance plus a bonus of $7500. Not bad, but he deserves our support, and we need to keep him here for a while. He is already being approached by other CCRCs.

Sunday, January 5, 1997

Heard yesterday that John Lincoln is in intensive care following an operation for “torn aorta.” Very serious. He might have died. Long talk with Mary. So far so good, she says. . . . Greg, Daphne, and Christina left in early morning in their new Toyota station wagon. We’ll miss them, and especially Christina, who’s a charmer. With luck we’ll be able to visit them now and then in New York. It was so good to have Daphne and Christina here for a full month, and Greg for about ten days.

Friday, January 10, 1997

Dinner with John and Mary. John has elevated PSA and is slated for a biopsy later this month. He’s joining the club. . . . Greg got three tickets last week and took three days of aggravation to register their car. What a beginning! And he finds the colleagues at Goldman all crassly money-mad. They have vowed to leave Manhattan for the suburbs. . . . I was strong enough to say No to Panayotis Moullas’s invitation to come to Greece in March for the Viziynos conference. I would have needed to set everything else aside between now and then to prepare something and this just wasn’t a good idea, for time must be spent on Demotic Greek 1 (!) and on the Kazantzakis letters. But we all still hope to return to Greece next November, I for the Kazantzakis conference in Xaviá, John and Chrysanthi for language workshops in Thessaloniki and Iraklio.

Saturday, January 11, 1997

Saw the film of Twelfth Night. The stage is so much better. It lets one imagine. Cinema does the imagining for one.

Our Christmas greetings, sent out last month:

In 1996 the Bien family added two lovely young ladies: Christina Sloane Tebbe, born in London on May 28, and Sophia May Bien, born in Maryland on August 5.

We had the pleasure of having them with us over the holidays together with their parents—Daphne and Greg, Leander and Deanna—plus Alec, here briefly from Indonesia, plus Lucia Tebbe, here from Santa Barbara, plus great-grandmother Harriet Bien, whose 92nd birthday is approaching. What a miracle a child is: so utterly helpless, yet so unexpectedly expressive even at a few months of age, able to convey feelings of joy, curiosity, repulsion, shyness, hunger, pain, fatigue, and boredom. We enjoy the child's curiosity most of all: how those big eyes grow even bigger, shifting from right to left to follow a new toy or a new adult face! And the little steps forward that are really so momentous: the ability to control the head, the ability to sit up without losing balance, manipulating the pacifier so that the right end goes into the mouth, the first smile, the first giggle, the first experiments with standing straight with locked knees. Of course. more is to come: teeth, a word or two, thought.

How amazing to think that these almost helpless bodies can mature into a concert pianist or a champion tennis player!

What a year this has been: The two grandchildren, our first, were balanced negatively by much too much illness. Chrysanthi needed an operation to correct painful arthritis in her hand; Harriet fell and broke her hip, requiring surgery and a 12-week recuperation (happily at Kendal); and Peter was diagnosed with prostate cancer in March, subjected to prostatectomy in June, and then to three weeks with a catheter, but seems to have come out of it all with very good prospects for the future. Enough!

Peter has retired from teaching at Dartmouth after 36 years in order to complete various writing projects. God's Struggler: Religion in the Writings of Nikos Kazantzakis (edited with Darren Middleton) was published in May. A thorough revision of Demotic Greek 1 is in progress, in collaboration with Dimitris Gondicas and Andromache Karanika at Princeton plus Chrysanthi Bien and John Rassias at Dartmouth. The projected "Selected Letters of Nikos Kazantzakis" is about 2/3 done. And volume 2 of Kazantzakis: Politics the Spirit is more or less finished in first draft, awaiting polishing and elaboration. A future project may be "Process Theology and Quakerism." The freedom of retirement made possible a stimulating six weeks in Thessaloniki in the autumn, teaching a graduate seminar in the university there.

Chrysanthi, besides being an extraordinary grandmother, continues as head of the Hanover Senior Center and as Senior Lecturer in Dartmouth's Department of Classics. She vows never to retire!

We wish you and yours a peaceful, healthy, and productive 1997.

Thursday, January 16, 1997

At Princeton since Monday. We've got the scenarios now for the whole book. Went over drills, etc. of chapter 8. John and I don't like the illustrations Dimitri found. We'll try Rix Jennings again. . . . Train to NYC. Time to go up to 81st and West End to visit Daphne, and Christina, in the new apartment. Christina gave me a big smile. Nice street; the apartment is pleasant but hardly worth the $4000 per month they're paying. Daphne is feeling more at home, gradually. Greg was shocked by the gross avidity of his colleagues at Goldman; in England that yearning is more "muted." . . . Long train & bus ride back. The bus driver let me sit in the warm bus until Chrysanthi arrived. Very kind.

Friday, January 17, 1997

To Kendal to meet with Warren Witte, who will be the facilitator at our retreat in March devoted to Quaker values. Gordon Browne noted, pessimistically, that many organizations founded by Friends have been taken over by non-Quakers. That might happen here. Witte is very impressive.

Sunday, January 19, 1997

Monty Brower came to visit. He graduated in 1981. Luce Fellow on a Hong Kong newspaper for two years, then on a California newspaper for one year, and on People Magazine for seven years. Almost went to divinity school. Now is an M.D. doing a residency in psychiatry. Married, and a convert to Roman Catholicism.

Monday, January 20, 1997

Working on the journal, Demotic Greek 1 revision, and an article on Kazantzakis translations. Bought 50 boxes to use to pack up the books in my office. Queasy feeling. Every book was a part of my life—now going into storage. . . . Nice lunch with Robert Binswanger and Joe Medlicott.

Bins is now persona non grata in the Education Department owing to Andrew Garrod's animosity.

Tuesday, January 21, 1997

Kendal Board. How nice not to be clerk! We raised the monthly fee only by 2.5% and the entry fees by 0%. I visited Dartmouth's Personnel Office to learn more about retirement benefits. I printed up new business cards and letterheads saying emeritus! It's a new adventure. . . . Emily Cope Harrison visited. She was my student at Harvard in 1983. Now she's applying to Dartmouth Medical School.

Wednesday, January 22, 1997

Advice from John Rassias about our book—to put Survival Greek at the end, for example. Lunch with Ned. He's interested in Kendal, mildly. . . . Took Redmont's Quaker moderation text to Jeanne Childs for formatting, finally. Folks at Kendal will be debating abstinence vs. moderation next week. . . . Dick for supper. He wants me to read a book called "Caring." We disagreed about Conrad's Secret Agent; he kept insisting that Verloc feels himself a hero whereas I think the point is just the opposite.

Thursday, January 23, 1997

To Pendle Hill

All day on AMTRAK. Worked on book reviews for the journal. Piano with Dan when I arrived. He still hasn't learned the notes for the Brahms.

Friday, January 24, 1997

Pendle Hill

Solid committee meeting 10:30 to 5:00! Rebecca getting increasingly sloppy. Actually forgot pamphlet #5 this year. #6 six weeks late. But the biography of Douglas Steere has arrived. We rejected all three pamphlets at Publications Committee but accepted the Steere book after each of us read a chapter. It's "adequate," barely. . . . After ice cream, more piano. We played a lovely Haydn symphony.

Saturday, January 25, 1997

The Board had lunch with Dan. More about his inability to govern because of Denny and Margaret, who think that they're equal to him. This gets tiresome. Afterwards, finished the Haydn symphony. Thot, Dan's foster son, telephoned. His apartment was burglarized, all his wife's jewelry stolen. . . . In Meeting today, fine ministry, especially about theodicy: the problem of evil. Why does God permit such evil? "Why don't you do something, Lord?" complains a believer. And God answers, "I did do something: I created you!"

Sunday, January 26, 1997

I reported the theodicy ministry in Meeting today. Then we went for our customary lunch with the Nodas, Sydney, Mary. Cherry pie.

Monday, January 27, 1997

John Lincoln on the telephone. Let's go to Sweet Tomatoes tonight. So we did: his first supper out after his terrible episode of a torn aorta. He was on display. So many people came over to say a kind word.

Tuesday, January 28, 1997

I was supposed to go to David Millstone's class in Norwich primary school to be a storyteller for Odysseus in the Iliad. Prepared at the last minute. Rather apprehensive. But it snowed enough last night and this morning to have school canceled, so I never went. Much relief!

Wednesday, January 29, 1997

Cello-piano with Allan: Mendelssohn, Beethoven. He wants to do the Schumann next time. . . . Last night Dr. Judy Tyson came for supper. Old friend from the 1960s. She's a lapsed Quaker by her own admission, but now very contented as an obstetrician/gynecologist. . . . Sent off my essay for the book on Greek translation. . . . John Rassias may have prostate cancer. We had him and Mary for dinner to cheer him up. This fear, he now tells me, accounted for his fatigue in Thessaloniki in November.

Friday, January 31, 1997

Leonard and Rosemary Rieser to supper at Kendal with Mother, followed by a tour. He seemed interested.

Sunday, February 2, 1997

I did a class in Quaker testimonies at the Meeting House. Quite a large audience. I used Fox and Barclay. Tim and Phoebe McCosker for supper. They're going to Greece to see potters. Suddenly they became affable and friendly, after years of "looking the other way."

Monday, February 3, 1997

Chrysanthi had "the ladies" for supper and I went alone to Panda House. But in came Tom and Nardi Campion and we sat together, very pleasantly.

Tuesday, February 4, 1997

Lunch with Rabbi Daniel Siegel, who has resigned. I worried about mediation, which he directs (and which I brought to Dartmouth). He assured me that it will continue.

Thursday, February 6, 1997

Chrysanthi went to New York on the train to visit Daphne. Yasuo Takahashi came here. We ate at the Indian restaurant and then played Schubert sonatinas, violin and piano, very nicely plus some Japanese music he brought. He's a good sight-reader. What a pleasure! He is having a difficult time. Wants to leave the Olympus Company and somehow stay in the United States, ideally as a scientist concerned with care of the aging. That's why he's here, to visit Kendal tomorrow.

Friday, February 7, 1997

Yasuo went off to Kendal with me for breakfast and spent the day. I went to the Norwich school to be a storyteller in David Millstone's class on the Odyssey. I did Odysseus as we see him in the Iliad. Beautiful children with big eyes, listening attentively. They know the story, all the characters. Wonderful! . . . Supper at Kendal with Yasuo and Mother. Home. More violin-piano.

Saturday, February 8, 1997

Campions invited me to lunch and to watch with them the video about Andrew Carnegie and the awful Henry Clay Frick. How can I ever enjoy the Frick Museum again? Campions said I cheered them up.

Sunday, February 9, 1997

Business Meeting on the State of Society, with me as recorder, as in past years. It gets easier and easier. Lunch afterwards, as usual, with Nodas, Sydney, Mary Soderberg, Audrey at De & Ro's, where they know I always order cherry pie.

Monday, February 10, 1997

Kate Cohen here for a reading from her new book. We had lunch. She's going to marry Adam finally, after 8 years. She's still young and radiant. Wants me to come to the wedding. . . . The reading was lovely, with pastries and coffee. Very cozy.

Tuesday, February 11, 1997

Went to David Millstone's class again to hear Willem Lange finish the story: homecoming, slaughter of the suitors. But he omitted the bed! Too bad.

Thursday, February 13, 1997

Good meeting with representative from TIAA/CREF re: retirement options. I transferred $50,000 from CREF into TIAA. Should have more than enough without touching the remainder in CREF, which is about $900,000. . . . Tom and Joan Wilson arrived for their Kendal admissions interviews and we had supper there with Mother and Robert and Penny Binswanger—the three classmates from Deerfield 1948. Afterwards I asked Tom why they chose Kendal at Hanover over other CCRCs they had looked at, and he answered, “You!” “Well,” I said, “I chose Haverford because of you.” So, 45 years later my compliment is being returned. They will, I'm sure, nudge us to activate our own admission process. It will be a bit strange if we enter while Mother is still alive. Two generations at Kendal.

Friday, February 14, 1997

John and Mary again for dinner. His prostate biopsy was negative and he is much relieved. We planned a bit of holiday together next October before the Salonica workshops.

Thursday, February 20, 1997

The Classics Department honored Chrysanthi and me by inviting Meg Alexiou to lecture, all coordinated by Jim Tatum. Jerry Rutter said nice words about both of us. And Meg, before starting her lecture, did the same, referring to our shared experiences of pleasure and pain. Then she gave a truly excellent, even magisterial, lecture on Greek prose: ancient, medieval, and modern. What a pleasure, especially compared to Bill Scott's very mediocre lecture yesterday afternoon on “the Gospel of Odysseus”—i.e., the moral teaching of the Odyssey, a splendid topic not very well covered, alas. But he did better at breakfast this morning, speaking to about 80 students, the Presidential Scholars, more informally about the Odyssey, myth, and the Greek gods. The best point was the following: the Greek gods are like a mafia family living in the next apartment from yours on Park Avenue. You're glad they're there, because they offer a certain protection. On the other hand, you suspect the most disreputable goings-on in their apartment. But you're always nice to them when you meet in the elevator. . . . Returning to Meg and our own celebration, the lecture was followed by a reception in Reed Hall and then a very nice supper in the Norwich Inn with Tatum, the Wolffs, Irene Kacandes, Kathleen Corrigan, Meg, and us. . . . Meg is on the retirement track at Harvard, going to be half-time now and planning to leave in three years. She's selling her house and looking forward to living with Michael in Kent by the Channel, in the house once occupied by Wellington. We both felt how lovely and appropriate was this gesture of hers, especially remembering that I delivered the eulogy for her in Birmingham when she was about to leave there to go to Harvard. In any case, it's nice to feel appreciated once in a while.

Friday, February 21, 1997

Boston–Frankfort

To Boston via air, then US Air to Frankfort. I was in economy class surrounded by 25 teenagers going to Germany for a week. Miraculously, the attendant came down and said I should transfer to Business Class because of my priority gold status with US Air. How nice! So, I was pampered (there were only five in Business Class) and even slept a bit.

Saturday, February 22, 1997

Frankfort–Thessaloniki

Arrived in Thessaloniki at 1:00 p.m. Met by travel agent for the Υπουργείο. Taxi to the Macedonia Palace Hotel in our old neighborhood. I never dreamed I'd be in this extraordinarily expensive hotel, and now everything is paid for. Upon entering, I saw—what a coincidence!—Dimitris Yiannakos, there with two business colleagues. «Η Θεσσαλονίκη είναι σαν χωριό», είπε. Just in time for the first επίσημο φαγητό, with the υπουργός, ο κ. Βενιζέλος, as host. He spoke briefly and well. Nice to see old friends: Stathis Gauntlet, Anna from Melbourne, John Burke, Dimitris Tziovas, Mario Vitti, Bertrand Bouvier (whom I didn't recognize at first), Dimadis, others from Sydney and Adelaide who remembered me but I did not remember them. . . . At 5:30-ish the 2nd session began (I missed the first in the morning), mostly individuals voicing their problems and complaints. Αργυρίου, president of the European Association, was quite impressive. Also Dimadis, who invited me to lecture in Berlin. . . . They all were taken to a restaurant but I went instead to Odysseas and Eleni to deliver the face cream for Eleni and a pile of xeroxed four-hand piano music for Toula. Telephoned Lola, Toula—we'll meet tomorrow—and George. Very good meeting with Odysseas and Eleni; they both came downstairs; Yiayia had gone to sleep. We had μπουγάτσα.

Sunday, February 23, 1997

Thessaloniki

More of the same, except that Maronitis came and added a strong voice. But he said that they don't like American Neohellenists here because they (the Americans) scorn Greek scholarship. Obviously he was generalizing from Lambropoulos, which is hardly fair.

For lunch I took Toula and Stavros to "The Wolves" and treated them. "Our" waiter wasn't there, but the παιδί was, and I left a large tip. Stavros is recovered from his heart attack, but Toula and he are both frightened: another one could come at any time and perhaps be fatal. And their other problems continue, mostly economic. Poor Toula seemed very depressed. What a shame! Such good, creative people ought to be liberated to enjoy life. They of course asked much about Leander and dream of seeing him again. But when?

George called, and then actually came at 8:00 but didn't find me (I was in the telephone booth calling him). When I spoke to him afterwards and offered to hop on the bus and come there, he said No, and καληνύχτα. Strange. He told me yesterday that he still has severe medical problems and probably is depressed. So I went with the group for dinner at To Μύλο, an old industrial area that now has clubs and restaurants. Huge amounts of good food, as always. Sat with Mario Vitti and Jerry Augustinos, and Papacosma.

Thessaloniki

Wind-up of the symposium. Our group met over breakfast to plan our presentation: Neni Panourgia, Vangelis Calotychos, Victor Papacosma, Karen Van Dyke, Jerry Augustinos, and I. In the event, it was decided that Argyriou, head of MGSA-Europe, would speak for all of us. At the lunch, I sat again with Mario Vitti, who said he'd heard that I'd become a Morman!! I tried to explain that Quakers and Mormons were not the same thing. Bertrand Bouvier said he's coming to New York next week to see the Byzantine exhibit, and I offered him hospitality at the Yale Club, in fond memory of the hospitality he gave me in Geneva in 1987 when he rescued us from that awful hotel. . . . Afterwards, I went to the university to meet with our class. Dimitri brought champagne. All the girls came except one, and the one boy didn't come. Lots of laughter, kisses, good exchange both serious and frivolous for two hours. Περίμενα να σας ξαναδώ μόνο στη μην-υπάρχουσα μεταθανάτια ζωή, τους είπα, αλλά να με! . . . Afterwards, Dimitri drove me to his lovely home in Panorama, first picking up his son at Anatolia College's new library, which is stunning. Big smile and hug from Ruth when I arrived. Τσίπουρο και φέτα, και κουβέντα. Alas, big problems in the department, the Μουλλάς faction against the Κεχαγιόγλου faction, and Ruth's eyes had a further setback and their daughter went through a period of anorexia. . . . I'm hoping that Dimitri will write an essay on Kazantzakis for the special issue of JMGS I'd like to publish. Also hoping he may do something on Ritsos and be invited for the 1999 MGSA symposium at Princeton. . . . Arrived back at the hotel at 10:30 p.m. to find a message from George. He'd come again at 8:30 and of course had not found me. Oh well . . . No appointment.

Thessaloniki–Munich– Philadelphia–Lebanon

Tuesday, February 25, 1997

Off at 6:30 a.m. by pre-paid taxi with Jerry Augustinos. Good conversation with him the whole way to Munich (two hours) and waiting for his flight to Atlanta. . . . Back on tourist class for the flight to Philadelphia. I'm very spoiled. But next to me was a nice German man, a bookseller headed to California to spend two weeks in a Zen-Buddhist center. We talked about Lawrence Durrell, Nietzsche, Schopenhauer, Henry Miller, Kazantzakis. But I also worked well with my trusty laptop on this nine-hour flight. Arrived at Philadelphia in time for the 4:30 to Lebanon but it was full, so I sat in the US Air lounge copyediting Vlahoutsikou's essay on mothers-in-law and daughters-in-law. Supper in the Marriott; very nice. But I was understandably tired. By the time I got the 9:30 p.m. flight to Lebanon it was the equivalent of 4:30 a.m. Greek time, and I awoke this morning at 6:00 a.m.

Wednesday, February 26, 1997

Hanover

To Kendal at 10:00 a.m. for Residents Council meeting. I didn't realize that at this session the results of the wine ballot would be announced. Actually 2½ times as many people said they preferred no wine as those who said they preferred wine. But about 70 were on the fence, saying they didn't care and wouldn't mind a six-month trial. Jack Morehead, current president, ran the meeting rather autocratically, insisting that none of this came from the council and that the council had no position on the issue (even though some members tried to get him to open discussion regarding a position). All he opened was whether or not the ballot results should be forwarded to the trustees. Here the council voted strongly in favor, so it will be in our laps at the May meeting. I fear the worst. Already I've gotten a half dozen impassioned letters bemoaning the divisiveness caused. . . . At 5:15, to the War/Peace seminar/dinner for a very fine presentation on El Salvador. . . . Then music with Dick and Allan, although I was feeling quite groggy from jet lag. Afterwards, Dick poured out his chagrin at the psychoanalytical school's decision to award Georganna a posthumous degree, very much against his wishes. He is debating whether to go or not. . . . A nightcap of a new Benny Hill video got me guffawing.

Thursday, February 27, 1997

The President of Hellenic College, Rev. Alciviadis Calivas, drove to Hanover with George Pilitsis to consult with John Rassias and me regarding the poor results for Greek instruction at Hellenic and especially at Holy Cross Seminary. They're producing priests who don't understand the Greek that they mouth. We agreed to go to Hellenic in May to facilitate a "retreat" with the faculty. What is really needed, of course, is an evaluation visit, but the president feels that that will be too threatening. . . . Supper with them, then work in my Baker Library study, trying to get my new computer to work properly. Then Benny Hill.

Friday, February 28, 1997

Advisory/Executive Committee at Kendal. Lunch at 12:30, and we didn't end until 4:00. Main business: preparing the March 18 retreat on Quakerism. Had Warren Witte on the speakerphone. John Hennessey has prepared a splendid paper summarizing Quaker values as he understands them, taking a great amount from my attempts earlier to do the same. . . . Discussion also of the refinancing. I'll be going to the "closing" dinner in New York City on Monday since I'll be close by, in Princeton. Walter Frank is going to take Steve and Brent through the Stock Exchange on Tuesday, for he'll be closing it to celebrate his 60th anniversary of entering the exchange, but I can't go. . . . Did income tax materials and delivered them to Frank Currier. Drove to Lee Huntington's in Norwich. She has scores of Bill Huntington's books on war/peace issues and thought I'd know how to dispose of them. I didn't. . . . Supper with Mother at Kendal. Our Croatian friend, Zdenka Tot, has begun to work there as a waitress.

Saturday, March 1, 1997

Cambridge

To Cambridge by bus. Saw Büchner's Woyzeck at the A.R.T. with Thomas Derrah superb in the title role and Will LeBow diabolical as the sadistic doctor. An amazing play written by this 22-year-old genius after he did Danton's Death (which Jim Clancy produced as his début at Dartmouth). Episodic and highly poetic, but also "guttural," done most imaginatively via stage business, music, song, stark contrasts. Yet it all hangs together in a postmodern sort of way. To the Charles Hotel afterwards for tea. Saw Mrs. Emlen there and also Georganna's daughter, just about to go upstairs for the psychoanalytic graduation where Georganna will be receiving the posthumous degree. I learned that Dick decided after all not to come. . . . Finally read Holly Parker's essay on Kazantzakis's Odysseas and Joyce's Bloom, which I think is now good enough to publish in the special Kazantzakis issue of JMGs I hope to put together in 1998. Several people I spoke to in Thessaloniki expect to contribute as well. . . . To Meg's house for supper with her, Dia Philippides, and Wim Bakker, and Dia's mother, in her 90s. Meg had been drinking; could smell the whisky on her breath. But she was nevertheless in control, and everything went well. Lovely dinner: roast lamb with all the trimmings. Wim and Dia in good form. Dia's mother a remarkable, aristocratic woman but now frail, with severe hearing loss. "Don't get old," she kept telling us. Meg has sold her house. Starting next year she'll be only half time, and in three years she'll finish. . . . I spoke to Wim about the Dutch in Indonesia. "Money, money, and only money," was his verdict.

Cambridge

Cambridge Meeting, every seat taken. Someone ministered about music, wishing that Friends had music. And I ministered afterwards about our experience of the power of music in the Moravian Church: how their music equals our silence and visa versa. Nice to see Paul Mangelsdorf, Andy Towl, Warren, Kesaya, and several people who came up afterwards, including a young woman who said she had gone to Meeting while she was a Dartmouth student and now was a steady attender. . . .

Brunch in the Charles Hotel, hardly in keeping with Quaker simplicity, I fear. Then to the A.R.T. again to see The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari, a multimedia parody of the Grand Guignol starring Alvin Epstein as a very suave Dr. Caligari. Lots of “stagecraft,” and some interesting (and uninteresting) music. But overall disappointing because the script was so pedestrian. If only it had been in rhymed iambic pentameters as good as those in Love’s Labour’s Lost! . . . Filitsa and Otmar were in the theater, so Chrysanthi got a lift home with them instead of taking the bus. I caught an earlier plane to Philadelphia and drove to Princeton in an Avis car: a Buick Century. Arrived 9:00 p.m. in the lovely room 36 of Palmer House.

Princeton

Heard Nancy Ševčenko give a seminar on a single illustration in a Byzantine manuscript, showing the donor with a halo, just as big as the Παναγιά, contrariwise to the Byzantine convention of the donor being represented (unless an emperor) as infinitely small compared to the donee (Christ or Virgin). A mystery, but no evidence to explain it. . . . Work with Dimitri and Mache is going well. We’re correcting the grammar for Lesson 10, which I’m doing piece by piece, and have now begun to go over Lesson 1 again, finding many changes still necessary. The designer came, but with problems—couldn’t print from my fonts. But we found the “printer font” in my extensions folder, so he should be able to print now.

Princeton–Pendle Hill

Nice long lunch with Mache, who is a sensible girl. Her mother’s family comes from Καλαμπάκα, below the Meteora monasteries, with which, she said, they never had any contact. . . . Drove to Pendle Hill. Good practice with Dan; he had learned numbers 1 to 6 of the Brahms waltzes much better than before. Talked over tea until 11:30 p.m., about Pendle Hill’s obsession with the “nature of community.” We both feel that it’s best discovered when one isn’t trying.

Friday, March 7, 1997

Pendle Hill

Spent the whole day in front of my computer, entering the changes in Lesson 1. Eye strain. Then Executive Committee. We laid down the Issues Program for lack of funds (but Dan is hoping to see Chuck Fager leave). We hope to revive it in some fashion eventually.

Saturday, March 8, 1997 Pendle Hill–New York City–Pendle Hill
 Was planning to practice with Dan and then go to a movie and have supper together, but his mother fell ill and he had to leave for Medford Leas. So I took the train to New York to visit Daphne, Greg, and Christina, who has begun to crawl. She also turns off light switches. Daphne and Greg have decided to stay in Manhattan and are looking at condominiums there rather than houses in the suburbs. Very wise. . . . Played a bit with Dan on my return. I think that we should attempt more of the Brahms waltzes and maybe forget the three marches.

Sunday, March 9, 1997
 Went to Middletown Meeting, where Shirley Dodson worships. Old Meeting House with a century-old cemetery. Facing bench. Mr. Stratton from the Kendal board greeted me with a smile; he'd been very distant at Kendal meetings. . . . Worked on Demotic Greek 1 for a few hours, then drove to Kendal at Longwood to play Mendelssohn, Fauré, and Bruch with Oliver Rodgers, followed by supper there. Immediately saw Mary Morrison, Janet Shepherd, Yuki Brinton, Bob and Mary Metz.

Monday, March 10, 1997 Pendle Hill
 Full-day board retreat at Brinton House. Morning spent on the mission statement. I drafted one attempt. Small groups came up with two others. Now Shirley and I are meant to collate them and emerge with something satisfactory. Afternoon spent on five-year plan and priorities. I stressed: (a) a theology for the 21st century, (b) a Quaker ministry to capitalism. . . . Long wait at the airport. Home finally at 11:30 p.m.

Wednesday, March 12, 1997 Hanover
 PSA test. Here's hoping! Supper with Dick Williamson, then flute and piano. Then he stayed until 10:30. Since Georganna died his whole personality has changed, for the better. He is now open and conversational.

Thursday, March 13, 1997
 Finally! Completed Redmont's essay on Quaker moderation. Fifty copies made at my expense. I'll now advertise in Friends Journal.

Friday, March 14, 1997
 Met Dana Burch. He gave me a xerox of George Soros's article on capitalism: brilliant, attacking its major premise that individual self-interest is somehow best for the collective good. Soros demolishes this view. He stresses that all assertions of truth, including this one, are dangerous, the only “infallible” truth being that we are all fallible! The article encourages me to believe that we truly can have a Quaker testimony on capitalism. Must send a copy to Dan Seeger, and to Greg. . . . Daphne telephoned, very excited, to say that the British government has granted Christina citizenship. She’ll be able to work in any of the EU countries. . . . Chrysanthi is babysitting in Potomac while Deanna is touring with the National Symphony. She’s doing well, but Sophia won’t let herself be changed by Chrysanthi so far.

Saturday, March 15, 1997

Retreat at Hanover Meeting. I stayed for the morning session, which was well done. We were asked to write down what events or people in our lives enhanced our spirituality. I thought of the farm first, because it shows me that I am a minor part of a huge continuum into which I must fit . . . temporarily. I thought of Douglas Steere and Dave Ritchie and Donald Harrington as persons. And of books, especially Ulysses, Paradise Lost, Zorba, and Beckett. To the question “Where are you going spiritually?” I answered: toward aging and death, accepting freely what necessity demands; toward dematerialization and divestment; toward leaving a memory behind of good cheer; toward serenity (one hopes); toward eternity, which calls us home unto itself.

Sunday, March 16, 1997

Ministered in Meeting about Soros’s article. Lunch at Dee and Ro’s with “the gang”: Nodas, Audrey, Sydney, Soderbergs. Cherry pie. . . . Supper with Mother at Kendal with Lucile Smith: very lively. All recognize that Beveridge Webster is weakening. . . . Mary Fitzgerald telephoned from North Creek. Long conversation about the new library there, our grandchildren, Alec’s new girlfriend.

Thursday, March 20, 1997

To Kendal with Ned Perrin. Gave him the tour. He’s going to put in his $1000. How nice if he decides to come! . . . Booked for two lectures in October in England, at King’s and at Brum. Working on Ο Καπετάν Μιχάλης for Brum.

Friday, March 21, 1997

To Gerber for my annual exam. Blood pressure better than ever. 6 to 10 pounds overweight. PSA zero!! Lafayette and Mayme had me to supper with Kate Read and her husband. A Japanese banquet.

Sunday, March 23, 1997

Yale Club

To NYC by train yesterday, comfortably in custom class, working well with the computer on Demotic Greek and Kapetan Mihalis. To Daphne and Greg's for supper: Chinese takeout. I walked all the way from the Yale Club. Christina already asleep. Her parents hadn't slept for three nights with the child teething. They're trying to secure a co-op apartment nearby, but three other families have put in competitive bids. . . . To the Met this morning to see the Byzantine exhibit, which I found extraordinarily moving because it seemed to show an entire society dedicated to the gentleness of Christ. (But surely the truth was more complicated and diverse.) Marvelous mosaics, enamels, gold work, coins, glass, plates—i.e., both the sacred and the secular civilizations. In addition, on this day there was a festival for children conducted by the museum's education department: demonstration of Greek dances, instruction in mosaic, with the children given tesserae and glue; practice in Byzantine chant, and two youngsters crowned as emperor and empress; an icon painter at work; a wood carver at work. And then when I left I found Fifth Avenue roped off for the Greek Independence Day parade, for later. . . . Walked to Carnegie Hall for the National Symphony concert conducted by Slatkin. Deanna very much in evidence in the second violin section. All-American program: Ives' "Unanswered Question" and "Central Park in the Dark." Not much fun to listen to, yet noteworthy for having been composed in 1908 in a postmodern style, with different bands coexisting in cacophony. Next: Leonard Bernstein's "Serenade" with Shlomo Mintz as violin soloist. Mediocre uninteresting music performed without much aplomb. I noticed that Deanna didn't applaud Mintz at the end. Saw Daphne and Greg in the intermission; they were in the balcony—Greg's first visit to Carnegie Hall. The second half was why we all came (full house, almost): Corigliano's First Symphony, dedicated to friends who had died from AIDS. It begins with all the strings "wailing" and lamenting: union A on open strings. This and other effects brought tears to one's eyes. Huge fortissimos followed by sudden pianissimos. The orchestra splendid; much expanded percussion section; harp, two pianos (one offstage). A particularly moving effect was the offstage piano playing Albéniz's "Tango," a favorite of the pianist friend who died. I was at full attention from start to finish (plus at full nose bleed), and much appreciative of Slatkin's bravery in programming this sort of concert. At the end Corigliano himself came out for bows amid many bravos. . . . Afterwards, backstage to find Deanna, but she had already escaped, and I found her, Leander, and Sophia down the street in the Meridien Hotel. Deanna very apprehensive that the baby would not remember her after her two-week absence. . . . Then found Chrysanthi at the Yale Club, after her two weeks' babysitting in Potomac. We had a splendid dinner at Café Un-Deux-Trois (44th Street) and then visited Daphne and Greg. A full day.

Monday, March 24, 1997

To Daphne's for lunch with Leander, Deanna, Sophia. Then James McBride came with his daughter Azure and son Jordan, ages 4 and 3. He's finally making money. Income of $21,000 last year, and he even has a cleaning lady! The book on his mother is on the bestseller list, and he has a $25,000 advance to ghostwrite the autobiography of a famous jazz musician. . . . I forgot to mention, à propos of artistic success, that Leander played at Kennedy Center on Saturday night, Schubert lieder, and was very pleased despite the singer's decision to change the entire program three days before the concert. An earlier recital with a flutist at Strathmore Hall was much less satisfying, since the flutist couldn't count. His next is at Crosslands with Deanna: Kreutzer Sonata. How I wish I could go! . . . Walked with Leander, Daphne, and families to West 72 to see the apartment house where Bernstein used to live, Leander enjoying his old haunts when he was at Manhattan School and used to come down for "the best hamburger" in New York and a papaya milkshake and a 50-cent hot dog. Supper at the Yale Club with Chrysanthi, then to visit Leander at the hotel; he came down and we went for dessert and coffee nearby and he showed us an amazing 24-hour Korean food mart with gourmet dishes all for take-out.

Tuesday, March 25, 1997

Leander's 41st birthday, and their anniversary is tomorrow. Chrysanthi and I walked up Madison Avenue and went to the fascinating Sony education exhibit in the Telephone Building on 56th: robots, demos of ultrasound, endoscopy, the evolution of communication technology. Filled with children, who have many advantages living in NYC. Back to Yale Club for a leisurely lunch with Daphne, who says that she never eats a decent meal any more. She's hoping that they'll manage to secure an apartment in the next week or so. I'm embarrassed to ask how much it costs. They're paying $4000 a month rent now. . . . Goodbyes until Friday, when they'll all drive to Hanover. Lucky seat in AMTRAK again, with a wall plug for the computer. All the comforts of home.

April 1, 1997

The Hale-Bopp comet was beautiful again tonight: a huge light in the sky, with its tail extending backwards and out.

April 2, 1997

Saw Dr. Heaney. Everything fine except, of course, potency. They showed me videos of three "remedies": a vacuum pump, a suppository inserted into the urethra, and injections into the side of the penis. Repugnant, all of them. Spoke later with Bob McGrath on the street, who says there's now a potency pill, not yet approved. But he's managed to get some, and assures me that they work. I'm skeptical. The saints went through all sorts of deprivations in order to escape libido. Perhaps I should consider this situation as escape, too. . . . Good meeting with John Rassias planning our April 29 retreat at Hellenic College.

April 3, 1997

To Quechee with Chrysanthi to buy a present at Simon Pearce's for Kathy Harp, the English Department secretary who is leaving after ten years. We treated ourselves to a lovely lunch overlooking the waterfall. . . . In the evening, War/Peace Seminar given by a Palestinian Dartmouth alumnus now working for a peace organization. He painted the Israelis as horrible barbarians using torture, intimidation, etc. against the Palestinians. Strange how the media obscure this side of the story.

April 4, 1997

Met with Lynda Boose, Dave Montgomery, and John Lamperti to discuss the future of War/Peace Studies. Lynda, quite rightly, wants to reform the committee, adding younger members and activists. John has been very energetic as seminar chair this year, and Lynda's course in Vietnam has been a great success. So . . . we seem to be surviving. . . .

Supper at Audrey's with Jim Atkinson and his new wife. He is still working on Machiavelli, and I'm still working on Kazantzakis!

April 6, 1997

Dinner at Kendal with Mother and Polly Bunting-Smith, former president of Radcliffe. She's all excited about a "posh party" next week for "Nate" Pusey's 90th birthday. I interested her in Ken Boulding's sonnets and will send her a copy.

April 7, 1997

Christian Wolff telephoned, very distressed that his son Tico was only wait-listed at Haverford, and hoping that I would write a letter. I interviewed him, and wrote to Haverford's director of admissions that they were shooting themselves in the foot to prevent a family like the Wolffs becoming part of the Haverford community. We'll see what happens.

April 8, 1997

Holiday Inn, Brookline

Chrysanthi wants to reinstate herself as a Greek citizen and get a Greek passport, only so that Alec can also get one. He's been told in Jakarta that whoever has a Greek mother is a Greek. So we telephoned the consulate in Boston and were told that they would issue one and we should come. So we drove to Boston the previous day, installed ourselves pleasantly in the Holiday Inn in Brookline, had a delicious meal in a Thai restaurant, and went to see West Side Story, which Chrysanthi says we saw on Broadway in the late 1950s. A good show, good cast, marvelous Jerome Robbins choreography, the song in Act 2 addressed to the policeman and justifying the gang's behavior because of parental deprivation is scintillating; the whole thing skirts Romeo and Juliet interestingly, without mimicking it.

April 9, 1997

Boston

We arrived at the consulate at its opening hour, 9:00 a.m., but of course it wasn't open. Greek time! The secretaries showed up at 9:15. We filled out the application in a waiting room filled with incessantly chattering Greeks, φαφλουτάδες, as Chrysanthi said. One woman came in exclaiming Μπούρσι! ("It's cold" in Turkish.) To make a 2½ hour story short, in the end they refused to issue the passport, saying that we needed a Greek ταυτότητα or equivalent obtainable in Thessaloniki. I'll write to our lawyer relatives, Andreas and Dimitra Giannakos, to see what to do next. Alec's desire is to be able to work without question in EU countries, and also to function better in places (e.g., China) where an American passport is a detriment.

April 11, 1997

Hanover

Nicole Laundry at Kiewit got my new computer to work, finally, and showed me how to access and print the pictures that Rix Jennings is sending electronically. Wonderful! And Chrysanthi and I saw the worldwide web page for the North Jakarta International School, with a nice picture of Alec.

April 12, 1997

Packed up more books in the office. This is now becoming somewhat demoralizing, added to Don Sheehan's abuses of my hospitality—he's got his wife in there, dog, and son, besides himself. I packed up favorite reference materials: OED, foreign language dictionaries, Oxford Companion to English Literature, Dictionary of Slang, etc. Will I now stop functioning as a scholar? Must find a way to shelve some of these books again. . . . Supper at Kendal with Mother and Joan Williams, the Unitarian minister. She turns out to be a great fan of Kazantzakis, was telling me all about Saviors of God and Report to Greco before Chrysanthi let out the secret of my involvement. . . . Saw Wayne Broehl on the way out. He has been in his Kendal apartment for three weeks and is very pleased. . . . Then to Rassias to hear about John's meeting in New York with Archbishop Spyridon regarding the commission. It went well. John said, "No clergy on the commission, please," and the Archbishop replied, "Good idea!" Amazing. Also, John told him of the Church's opposition to ας τις σαχλαμάρες in our first edition, and Spyridon laughed and said how ridiculous this was. So, we're into a new era, it seems. He knew already about our scheduled appearance at Hellenic College on April 29. Obviously we need to be a success there. His dream is for Greek Americans to know something about Greek culture, besides the language. Amen! What's ticklish for us, obviously, is our authorship of Demotic Greek 1 and Ο ιπτάμενος θάλαμος—ideal, we think, for the program. But we can't "sell" our books in our capacity as consultants/commission members.

Sunday, April 13, 1997

Wilmington

To Wilmington. Hotel DuPont, the best hotel I've ever experienced. Supper with Tom Clark, doing well after by-pass and stroke. Delivered my "Deree" lecture on Kazantzakis. Mary Hoxie Jones came, and Don Pease's father, and Yuki Brinton. Lots of good questions.

Tuesday, April 15, 1997

Fleet Bank Trust Department with Mother and Chrysanthi to meet the new fund manager. The trust is over $1 million. Lunch with Tom Corindia at the Inn. He is elated because the hospital was given good grades by the government investigator whereas other hospitals have been fined millions. To an auditing firm to see Marie McGee, with Bruce Koloseike, our Meeting's treasurer, I as president of the trustees. We want the Meeting audited for the first time.

Wednesday, April 16, 1997

Kendal Board via conference call. The news: Steve has resigned in order to accept the C.O.O. position at Presbyterian Homes in North Carolina. Of course he had to say Yes, bringing him back to Greensboro as head of a multi-facility organization. But so soon! We had hoped to keep him for five years. Now he'll leave on July 15, one and a half years after starting here. . . . In the afternoon, met with John Hennessey and Margery Walker. Margery has already selected a new search committee. . . . Said warm goodbye to Ann Wainwright, who is moving south to be with a child. Kendal will miss her.

Thursday, April 17, 1997

To Pendle Hill

With Chrysanthi via AMTRAK to Philadelphia. Arrived at Pendle Hill at 8:30 p.m. Went to Dan's to practice. We're doing only the Brahms now. It's getting better.

Friday, April 18, 1997

Pendle Hill

Meetings from 9:15 a.m. until 5:45 p.m. with hardly a break. First Cadbury Scholarship: awarded to my first choice. Ken Carroll more pliable than previously. Then Pubs: accepted two manuscripts but rejected one by George Peck (as Rebecca confided to me before the meeting). Then Books. After supper, celebration with the full board for Kashatus's book on Penn's view of education, with the author dressed as Penn and doing an impersonation; very impressive. . . . Then more piano with Dan.

Saturday, April 19, 1997

Pendle Hill

Larry Ingle is here. We talked at length. He would be a good one for the board. Dorothy Steere ministered at Meeting about waiting, and then a gathered meeting followed. I was thinking about the Greek word περιμένω, which means both “to wait” and “to expect.” In the board meeting, I introduced the new mission statement along with Shirley Dodson. We then broke into small groups that were very useful. I fear we’ll need to tinker some more with the mission statement. Nice meeting with Lloyd Lewis over supper. He is developing a community in Tucson, Arizona, that is linked to the university. We lamented together the loss of Quaker identity at Kendal at Hanover.

Sunday, April 20, 1997

Pendle Hill

Off to the Barnes Collection in the morning with a group of Pendle Hillers. What a smorgasbord! El Grecos next to Cézannes, Tintoretos, etc. Wonderful Cézannes, Matisse, Renoirs. . . . Then to Longwood Gardens. Tulips, orchids, an organ concert (bad music). . . . Later, drove to Princeton.

Monday, April 21, 1997

Princeton

Worked with Dimitri, Mache, and Chrysanthi on lessons 8, 9, and 10. Lunch with Mache, who is getting married in August. Supper with John C. Baker in Hightstown, at the Meadow Lakes retirement community. He is 101, in good shape mentally and physically, although I thought his legs were going to cave in at one moment. Still obsessed with Jean Monnet, his quintessential hero. Reading widely—e.g., the new biography of Lincoln. I’d been apprehensive, but actually the encounter was pleasant. We talked from 5:30 until 8:00, had a tour, ate supper. All very “natural.”

Tuesday, April 22, 1997

Supper at Mike and Mary Keeley’s, with Dimitri and Evi. Mike wants me to explore reprinting some of my books. Gave good advice regarding the Rassis consortium—e.g., don’t ask Brademas! Evi is interesting. From a wealthy Greek industrialist family in Egypt; knew the Cavafys, etc.; educated in Switzerland. She’s a psychoanalyst who maintains practices in Athens, New York, and Princeton.

Wednesday, April 23, 1997

Met with Alivizatos, who wants a special issue of JMGS on constitutional law. . . . Talk in the afternoon by Vassilis Lambropoulos. Excellent. As I told him afterward, he was “at his best.” He was very complimentary regarding my work, as was Stathis Gourgouris, who has done wonderful translations of songs by Yannis Patilis. Nice to see Bob Fagles and Lynn. Relaxed dinner afterwards. They’ve established a very cozy atmosphere.

Sunday, April 27, 1997

Lunch with Mother, very genial. I convened the annual meeting of the Incorporated Trustees of the Meeting. Dick Brokaw wants to give us $10,000 in memory of Channy. . . . Spring weather. I put on the screen doors; put the snow scraper away for the year. . . . To Rassias for dinner. Greek Easter. Lamb.

Tuesday, April 29, 1997

Boston

To Hellenic College in Brookline with John Rassias, by car. Planned our strategy on the way down and also caught up on the Demotic Greek 1 revision. Greeted by the president, Father Calivas, and by Eva, George, and Father John Chryssavgis, who has come from Australia and is close to Stylianos. Also the dean who heard me lecture last year at Boston College. In the morning, John did his usual talk and demonstration, teaching them “forward,” “back,” “turn” in Chinese. Lots of laughs and fun. After lunch, he showed the video of Chinese learning the same words in Greek. Then I facilitated a “retreat” on prerequisites for effective teaching. They broke into groups of four, then came back into plenary session and each group reported. Then I MC’d a general discussion. All went well. . . . John then improvised with more demonstrations (unplanned) almost ruining the rest of our plans. But I salvaged an abbreviated form of “Should Greek be preserved?” The dean was eloquent about the Church’s very serious dilemma in this regard. . . . All in all, people seemed pleased. We had a full dinner, and then left. And they paid us twice what I had asked, $500 each instead of $250! Back at 9:30 p.m., very tired.

Wednesday, April 30, 1997

Arranged for my retirement insurance. Supper with Dick at Mrs. Ou’s. Music: Bach, Mozart.

Thursday, May 1, 1997

I lectured to ILEAD at Kendal on late treatments of the Odyssey theme, especially Joyce's and Kazantzakis's. Full house. I emphasized Joyce, of course, but spoke about the centripetal and centrifugal Odysseus, the classical and romantic mentalities. And read Cavafy's Ιθάκη. Afterwards, formal dinner at the Norwich Inn, hosted by John Lincoln, who is brave in trying to act normal despite the speech impediment caused by two strokes (he introduced me at Kendal, and gave a toast at the dinner). Others: Champions, Armstrongs, Mother, Chris Lincoln and wife (whom he met at the American Farm School, so I suppose I am responsible for their marriage, since I sent him there). . . . Had lunch earlier at Kendal with Mother and Alice, visiting here for a day. . . . Very happy about British election results. Watched BBC until 2:00 a.m.

Friday, May 2, 1997

Did my annual class at Thayer School, reading poetry about technology. Really, the anti-technology poets are unfair; they ought to sing the marvels of science and technology, not just the ugliness. . . . Supper at Hanover Inn with Ned. The Champions had urged me to contact him because he is back in depression, so much so that he dropped his class in mid-stream, just couldn't continue. But he was in a good mood tonight: talkative and lively. . . . Returned to find a message from Caroline De Cesare that she can't find Ellen. . . . I contacted state police.

Saturday, May 3, 1997

Ellen is still missing, it seems. I drove to Tunbridge and found the house locked, all the curtains drawn. Went to neighbors, hillbillies, one very drunk at 2:00 p.m., and abusive, but others were more civil. They didn't even know who Ellen and Don were. . . . Returned to find a message from Caroline that she had finally reached Ellen. The trouble had been only the telephone. Hit by lightning. It seemed to ring when you called but didn't sound in the house. Thus she concluded that Ellen wasn't home to answer. Everything's OK. . . . At 10:30 p.m., picked Chrysanthi up from White River. She'd been at Daphne's since last Thursday. Christina is now walking (if she holds on to a chair). Daphne signed the papers for the apartment on 84th Street. Now they still need to get a mortgage and be accepted by the co-op committee.

Sunday, May 4, 1997

Elise at Meeting spoke movingly of her new life without Kenneth, and of slowing down at age 77.

Monday, May 5, 1997

Supper with Beth Landsman at Kendal and Barbara Rice, to try to set up a Webster fund for continuing concerts at Kendal. I'm to draft the letter of purpose. The point is to get Bev to play less frequently and to shift his energies to welcoming and coaching others. He is failing as a pianist, alas. Very tricky business, but we're hoping it will work.

May 9, 1997

Amherst

Spent the day with Chrysanthi examining students of Greek language, as usual, and saw the CD-Rom prepared by Stavros Siokos. Possibly we'll use it as part of our instructional package. Afterwards, visited George and Ellen Goodwin. George's first words as I entered: "Well, you failed and I failed in one thing, to get rid of Jerry Bidlack!" Yes. Their children, interestingly, are not doing "well" by the world's standards: Will is a carpenter (but a good one, so what's wrong with that?); three are unmarried. Strange. Such terrific parents. . . . Then to Atkins' Farms for a luscious cherry pie.

Tuesday, May 13, 1997

Scott Brown and others discussing the future of mediation at Dartmouth. The main problem seems to be the paucity of actual cases to mediate. Afterwards, stopped to see Jan Tarjan, who unburdened herself to me: that Scott thinks everything she's doing is wrong. Low morale. He insists that Tucker is a failure (she says) because it doesn't reach "hard core" students. I was dismayed, since I was so involved in bringing Scott and since I've always felt so close to Jan. What a shame! I'll try to speak to Peter Gilbert à propos (Scott's supervisor). . . . Town Meeting. We voted against a zoning variance that would allow another CCRC in Hanover.

Wednesday, May 14, 1997

To Washington

Flew to National Airport. Leander met me and we had a leisurely supper together. He's full of his daughter, his fatherhood. How nice! Warm greeting from Deanna. She has a very bad relationship with her own father and stepmother, so it's doubly important that Chrysanthi and I fill those roles for her or try to.

Thursday, May 15, 1997

Washington

Lectured for Jim Miller at the State Department. Went well. One of the group will be going to Thessaloniki in September to replace David Schuler, and another, who was absent today, to replace Mimi Hughes. Miller wants me back next year, he says. Went with him on the State Department bus to the Metro to get to the National Gallery, but arrived at 5:00 p.m. just as it was closing. Main impression of Washington, coming from New Hampshire: how many people there are! Supper at home. Deanna made shrimp risotto, her specialty. First time I've ever experienced Deanna cooking. Sophia crawled (forwards): a milestone. Then we all went to Starbuck's for coffee and to an ice cream parlor for a sundae. Fun. Talked to Leander about his hearing. He actually does hear in the left ear, but not high tones. And the tinnitus is only minimally annoying, he says. So, could be worse. . . . I had a good lesson afterwards on the Brahms waltzes.

Pendle Hill

To Pendle Hill via Metroliner and Avis car. At Publications Committee the essay on George Fox's concept of light, one that I felt so drawn to owing to my own interest in the subject, was trashed by Larry Ingle as partisan (Bensonite) and full of errors, etc. We debated at length and finally decided to try to get it back in revised form with some of the partisanship muted and the errors removed. If we publish it, then I could write a companion piece tracing the meaning of light before Fox. Don Sheehan, à propos, gave me Grosseteste's treatise on light to read, and this refers to passages in St. Basil, etc. It's a broad subject. Grosseteste makes it clear that light equals a unified principle of creativity before the creation of sun and moon, the physical manifestations of light, and is therefore easily equated (as in Fox) with the eternal Christ before the historical Christ. I might bring in the material I use in my lecture on Beckett's Unnamable: the pre-reflexive cogito, as an analogy. . . . Practiced with Dan after the ritual ice cream following the Board meeting. He still doesn't know the notes. But he promises (still) that he'll learn them.

New York City

Drove to Princeton. Left my valise at Mrs. Hurley's. New Jersey Transit to New York. Christina now rises effortlessly to upright position without holding onto anything, and walks. Also pushes her cart with great glee. Also says "Boom" (more or less) when she falls down. Daphne, Greg, Christina, and I walked across Central Park to 84th and Lexington to see the building where they bought a co-op. Very nice street. Then back to a street fair on Columbus Avenue. Daphne is in touch again with Duncan Baird publishers and may begin part-time work for them. This is fine.

I'm reading Jay Parini's new novel, Benjamin's Passage, about Walter Benjamin's flight from the Nazis across the Pyrenees to Spain and his death there. Quite gripping. I don't want it to end. The only problem is the book's failure to convince me that Benjamin ever wrote anything especially worthwhile.

Wednesday, May 21, 1997

Princeton

Working well with Dimitri and Mache. We're revising lessons 2, 3, 4, and 5, which will need to be sent out to various schools in August. And I spent many hours going through the large collection of Mitropoulos cartoons and xeroxing those that we might use.

Thursday, May 22, 1997

Princeton-Hanover

Mache took me to lunch with a Cypriot who admires my work and loves Kazantzakis, whom he says is very much read in Cyprus because of his revolutionary ardor. . . . Home at 7:30 p.m. Out to Jesse's with Chrysanthi for a leisurely supper catching up on our several adventures.

Saturday, May 24, 1997

Cambridge

Splendid performance at the A.R.T. of Shaw's Man and Superman, with appropriate music from Mozart's Don Giovanni. Stirring. Jeremy Geidt at this best as Mendoza and the Devil. Kristin Flanders as a fiery Ann/Ana. Jack Willis perfectly cast as Hector Malone, Sr. Shaw's mixture of the comic and the serious was most effective. But what really is memorable is the play's abiding relevance to contemporary problems even now, almost a century after its composition. How nice to be exposed to good theater.

Sunday, May 25, 1997

To the farm. The house is in good shape, but full of dead flies, as usual. Alec's is full of shavings caused by ants in the ceiling; otherwise clean. I assembled our new Mantis tiller and used it in the garden. It dealt heroically with our tangle of roots, and needed to be untangled itself repeatedly. But in the end it did its job admirably. . . . Supper with Fran and Irv. Lots of description of their trip to South Africa and Victoria Falls.

Monday, May 26, 1997

I tried to start the John Deere but couldn't. Obviously the battery was at fault. It wouldn't take the charge. . . . Hummingbird in the barn. Red fox last night at the Shapiros'. . . Home. Call from BBC saying that the Church in Greece is trying to have all of Kazantzakis's texts removed from schools because of his "atheism." Could I comment? But it was too late. Plus ça change plus c'est la même chose.

Tuesday, May 27, 1997

Supper with the Rassiases. I helped John with the letter he wrote explaining the commission. He asked me to invite John Iatrides to serve. I called John, who said he'd be provocative because of his Protestantism. But he'll speak to Van Coufoudakis.

Wednesday, May 28, 1997

Elliotts, Laasperes, and Yiayia, and Claire Munck for supper for my birthday. Chrysanthi gave me a hummingbird feeder. Sent off final decisions for my pension.

Thursday, May 29, 1997

Department dinner for Chauncey Loomis and me: completing the circle, as he said. Ned Perrin spoke about me, reading testimonials (from my department file) by Bob Horton, Douglas Steere, and Bill Tindall. People were gracious, more than expected. I gave a talk that seemed to be well received, as follows:

FISH DINNER TALK, DEPARTMENT OF ENGLISH

May 29, 1997

Subjects:

1. Accidental factors in a career.
2. Growth.

3. Gratitude.
4. Does any of it matter?

ACCIDENTAL FACTORS

Initial hiring

Arthur Jensen, Marjorie Nicholson

eat with fork and spoon

John Finch's telephone call for "Dr. Bien"

Father - Doctor - visited Thursday – chauffeur

Chrysanthi: "He doesn't live here. But his chauffeur brings him every Thursday."

Kazantzakis

At Columbia, 1956: Greek Passion given by a friend while I was reading Aldous Huxley, etc.

In Greece, 1957: a shelf of untranslated novels, etc. The Last Temptation.

In England, 1958: George Hill, K's publisher, instructed by Mrs. Kaz. to reject translations not made directly from Greek. Whereupon, I submitted a chapter of The Last Temptation—precisely at the right time.

[Digression: "getting stuck in Kazantzakis"]

Kendal

The accident of serving on a Philadelphia board of trustees with Lloyd Lewis, CEO of the Kendal Corporation. He wanted to clone Kendal in New England. I wanted a retirement home for my parents. The result: Kendal at Hanover.

GROWTH

George Bernard Shaw in "The Revolutionist's Handbook" in Man and Superman: "A fool's brain digests . . . art into pedantry. Hence university education."

Our job: to avoid becoming pedants. How: by growing, refusing to get stuck in a given approach.

My training at Columbia: New criticism—Brooks & Warren.

So: textual analysis, supposedly as a contemporary would have understood the text. For Milton: Basil Willey's The Seventeenth-Century Background.

That's fine: but nothing is fine if it becomes a fetish.

Growth (or at least variety) came, sometimes because of some happy accidents:

Team-teaching English 59 with Brenda Silver (too bad that team-teaching is now so limited). Feminist perspective. Ideological criticism.

Invitation by Chauncey to lecture on Faulkner's The Sound and the Fury at a time when, owing to Kazantzakis, I was interested in Kierkegaard. Religion and lit.: Most recent book, in collaboration with a theologian.

Humanities 1-2 and English 17 (survey course): the importance of intertextuality both within a culture and across cultures.

Comparative Literature: Joyce-Proust-Mann-Kafka.
Modernism in Europe in relation to WWI.

The need to fit the whole of Ulysses into a course: reduction of survey course to three authors, with a new approach: the examination of an author's total career rather than just a single work.

And, last but not at all least:

Composition—especially English 2-3 and the Composition Center, using techniques usually confined to the instruction of foreign languages.

Why might this potpourri of involvements and approaches help to keep one from becoming a pedant? The dictionary defines a pedant as "One who exhibits one's learning or scholarship ostentatiously."

By changing,

by growing,

by experimenting,

by climbing out sometimes precariously on thin branches—by, in effect, being a bit of an amateur (a "lover" as well as a non-professional), one avoids becoming totally fixed in a given approach, and therefore is less likely to have the self-assurance that can lead so easily to pedantry.

This leads to my third subject:

GRATITUDE

I'm grateful to a department that allowed—and I hope will continue to allow—eccentric careers like mine, like Chauncey's, like Ned's.

In my case, it meant honoring translation in the tenure decision, something that is rarely done.

It meant accepting a colleague whose research and other scholarly activity (societies, periodicals, symposia) came to be almost exclusively in Greek literature and culture, although sometimes with a comparative approach that involved British literature.

It meant lending me out, without excessive grumbling, to teach each and every year in Comparative Literature, and often enough in Classics.

I'm also grateful to a department that has always refused to separate composition off from literary study.

To me—and I hope to many of you—composition (although always a chore in part) has been a great challenge, and actually a sort of (masochistic) pleasure. If nothing else, the need to teach composition probably engenders humility in us and therefore fights against the arrogance that leads to pedantry.

And I'm grateful to a department that has maintained a mentoring system that at times—perhaps often—is truly what it is meant to be, and not just a system of policing or evaluating for promotion or tenure. In my case, since Harry Schultz was my mentor, the system worked perfectly.

Finally:

DOES ANY OF IT REALLY MATTER?

It's well and good to talk about a career, and growth, and gratitude. But when all is said and done, does what we do make any difference? We place ourselves ostentatiously in a position to be judged by students, by colleagues, by reviewers. Why? Certainly not for the money! Is it for the praise that sometimes comes? Is it for gratification?

I hope not. Praise and gratification are far too fickle. And the more we crave them the less likely are they to arrive.

My own view is that the academic profession needs to be self-justifying—in other words, not deemed worthwhile because of any by-product, effect, or success, certainly not by any measurable, quantifiable by-product, effect, or success. Yes, I do sometimes feel (or hope) that what I do and you do “is not just a random event among billions of other random . . . events that will pass away without a trace, but that it is an integral component or link . . . in a great and mysterious order of Being, an order in which everything has a place.”<sup>1</sup> But perhaps that non-quantifiable, transcendental hope, too, should be resisted. On the other hand, because it’s hard to persevere in a totally meaningless void, I subscribe to the “philosophy of ‘as-if;’” which says that although I may fear that nothing we do really matters, I act as if it did matter. A propos, here’s a short poem by a Greek poet, Yannis Patilis<sup>2</sup>:

Why should I write these poems?
 Why not walk to the newspaper stand,
 Or gaze at the flowerpots on the window,
 Or drink some water?
 Why not leave my self
 In this chair,
     Forgotten
     And unjudged?

No, I do not choose to be unjudged. I act as if some of it, at least, does matter. I choose—and I hope that each one of us will choose—to be self-judged.

Saturday, May 31, 1997

Supper with Yiayia and Audrey. Yiayia is increasingly confused; everyone has noticed. Also she’s lonely. Betty Conrad asked if she could help. Chrysanthi thinks to ask Ellen Baber to visit periodically. . . . Afterwards, Bev Web played: All four Chopin Ballades! Shaky and tentative in the G-minor (the one I’d played) but then better and better. And he concluded with two études including Opus 10, no. 5, the “Black Key Étude.”

What a pleasure to have him play so well. . . . For the Webster Performance Fund we collected $17,000 overnight. I telephoned Bea Tauss in New York to see how to get through to his former pupils at Juilliard.

Saturday, June 1, 1997

Meeting at Kendal. I ministered on the nature of silence: the “Word” before words. Then to Sheldons for brunch. And I asked them to listen to my Brahms waltzes. . . . Then to the office, which now is almost completely empty. (And Study 702 in Baker ridiculously full.) Peter Saccio stopped by and was very friendly, contrary to his stance for the past twenty years or so.

To Kinhaven

Dr. Dresser, the endodontist, tells me that I need root canal work on tooth 31. We’ve scheduled it for August. Kit Van Winkle picked me up at the dentist’s and we drove together to Kinhaven, talking all the way. Nice to see people from the first workshop: Bruno Repp, Sue Mullen, and of course Sandy Dennis and Nigel Coxe. Also Mrs. Shin. But Dan Seeger telephoned earlier to say that he cannot come because his mother had another stroke this morning. Too bad, after all our practicing and planning. But, on the other hand, perhaps this is better, since I’ll have Leander as my secondo.

Saturday, June 7, 1997

Kinhaven

Mrs. Shin did a master class, very instructive. And I had coaching from her this morning. Showed me how to lift my wrist, caress the notes, get forte from the arm rather than the fingers. But she refused to allow Nigel to witness her class. Insecurity. She seems perfectly lively and content despite her husband’s recent death. Told me that Northfield–Mt. Herman is still a mess. They accept anyone who can pay (so she says).

Sunday, June 8, 1997

Kinhaven

Coaching from Nigel today. He worked mostly on phrasing, portamentos, getting a different tone quality by flattening the fingers. After supper he played a spectacular concert: fantasias by Haydn, Brahms, Beethoven (Moonlight Sonata). He has absolute control. Played 3rd movement of the Moonlight with Dionysiac frenzy (under perfect—shall we say “Apollonian”?—control).

Monday, June 9, 1997

Kinhaven

Coaching today from Leander. He stresses the harm in over-expressive playing of Brahms. All my ritards, rubati, etc. are gone (unless marked by Brahms himself in the score). Even before this lesson, I could sense the harm done by Kit Van Winkle to her Beethoven sonata in yesterday's master class with Nigel, a brilliant display of diagnostic ability, pep, and sensibility. Interesting how he often makes his point about Schubert or Beethoven or Brahms by hearing the piano music as though it were string music. "You need vibrato here!"

Tuesday, June 10, 1997

Kinhaven

The big day. Leander and I had a run-through in the hall directly after breakfast. Not good. I made errors in places I'd always gotten right before. Then he suggested one more run-through in the barn, this time strictly at half speed. And lo! The performance went well. No mistakes (although Leander told me afterwards that I started the first waltz before he was properly seated on the bench). I didn't have any debilitating nervousness; no ice cold hands, although clearly I was "stressed" in some way, perhaps beneficially. In any case, various people came up afterwards (including Nigel) to say how beautifully I'd played the Brahms. Surely Leander's secondo was part of the success.

Drove back home with Kit to learn from Chrysanthi that Yiayia had had another small stroke two days ago and Chrysanthi had wisely refrained from telephoning. What happened was this: She went out of her apartment dressed only in her bra. Someone saw her, brought her to the clinic. There she was incoherent. They put her to bed. And an hour later she was fine, with full memory of all that had happened, and no impairment. Our question now is whether she should stay in the health center at least until we return in September. We all had supper together (including Leander).

Wednesday, June 11, 1997

Hanover

At breakfast they sat Mother at the same table with two of the zombies that need to be fed. She has resolved now to return to her apartment. Can't blame her. We've had conferences with Donna, the social worker, and the charge nurse, who'll be on the lookout if something else happens. . . . Alec arrived in time to sup at Kendal with Yiayia and us. Then he helped us with his truck to remove the last two items from my office: computer table and four-drawer file cabinet. That's it. Finito. Empty.

Thursday, June 12, 1997

Lunch with Steve Scher, just returned from Austria. He's doing the introduction to Sally Pinkas's recital of Schubert songs in July. I hope to attend. . . . John Hennessey personally delivered the Kendal search committee's dossier on the two applicants whom they've chosen to be finalists. Miraculously, both are Quakers: Len Cadwallader (whom I recommended) and Warren Witte (whom I had recommended earlier to facilitate our retreat). I was extraordinarily pleased. Either would be splendid. But how to choose between them?

Friday, June 13, 1997

To Terpni

To the farm, finally. The past two summers we didn't arrive until late July, in 1996 because of my prostate operation, in 1995 because we were at Woodbrooke. How nice to be "on time" in 1997. We unloaded, ate lunch, and got back into the car to drive to Hudson Falls to get a new battery for the John Deere, plus plants, plus $100 worth of food. Unloaded, got back in the car, drove to North Creek to eat in Smith's Restaurant. Huge turkey dinner, most of which we brought home for tomorrow, together with a blueberry pie.

Saturday, June 14, 1997

Gorgeous weather. Alec arrived early from Hanover. Worked all day: mowing, opening shutters, vacuuming, pruning the lilac, watering the tomatoes. Very tired after supper. But Art Perryman visited unexpectedly and we enjoyed his company for a few hours. His son Arthur graduates on June 28 and will go to Adirondack Community College, saving $$$ . Art did practically no painting this year. But they bought yet another piece of land, adjacent to Antler Lake.

Sunday, June 15, 1997

Again, worked outdoors all day. Roger Anderson, Alec's contractor, came with "Alex," who runs the backhoe. Plans for septic tank, etc. We also discovered strategies for Alec's addition, whether to begin the first log directly on the cellar floor or on the lip left in the foundation to be covered with a facing of fieldstone to hide the cinder blocks. I voted for the former. Alec's new cellar has a poured concrete slab for its floor—the first cellar floor on our property that isn't dirt. We're coming up in the world! . . . Shapiros for supper. Very jolly. Irv told no fewer than three separate jokes about violists. They guffawed at the Mitropoulos cartoons I've used for Lessons 1 through 4 of the new Demotic Greek 1. . . . John Rassias telephoned from Logan Airport, on his way to Estonia (!) to say that the new DG should be copyrighted jointly by him and me, to protect our use of formatting ideas from his French book. . . . Hour and a half conference call with the Kendal board to decide to bring Witte and Cadwallader to Kendal for visits. Some members feared that neither candidate had run organizations of sufficient scale. I emphasized the "spiritual" qualities we need at Kendal. We decided to bring them.

Monday, June 16, 1997

Another conference call, this time with the Executive/Advisory Committee of Kendal, to decide how to handle the interim between Steve's departure on July 15 and the arrival of our new CEO, probably not until September or October. After going around in circles, we decided on Brent Edgerton. This will be difficult for Bob Shaugnassy, who is nominally #2. But the staff all seem to like and respect Brent whereas their feelings are different with regard to Bob.

Friday, June 20, 1997

Hanover

Back to Hanover to interview Len Cadwallader at breakfast at the Hanover Inn, together with John Hennessey, Patricia Higgins, Treat Arnold. Nothing spectacular, but OK. How can one tell, really? Probably best by the record, which of course is good.

Riparius

Piano tuner, Z. Skorko, is here: a starved intellectual. Polish immigrant criticizing American anti-intellectualism ("no poetry") but admitting that when he visits Poland everyone considers him a foreigner. Caught in a no-man's land between two worlds. He is convinced that English is a language suitable only for business. I told him about Shakespeare, and Joseph Conrad. Conrad's English, he insists, was vivified by Polish. (French, more likely.) But the piano is in fine shape. I'm struggling to master the three waltzes in Brahms's opus 39 that I omitted at Kinhaven, especially the one in seven sharps. C# major, very difficult for me, but I'm getting it slowly. Of course it has to be played molto vivace.

Alec's cabin is rising. He has most of the walls up. As before, he seems incapable of planning the whole thing, but goes one step at a time. Septic and dry well are now installed. Arthur Perryman is helping him, and he had Bill, a fellow teacher in Jakarta, here for a day—a good worker. . . . As for me, I'm struggling with bad English for the next issue of JMGS, but am also attempting to till the garden, which is a maze of spaghetti-like roots that get tangled in my new Mantis tiller. However, one treatment, laboriously, ought to suffice for the future—i.e., next time will be easier. I also broke the Troy Bilt mower because I had failed to adjust and lubricate the knives.

Wednesday, June 25, 1997

Irving telephoned saying a good violinist was playing at Meadowmount and did we want to go. So we went. What a treat! The violinist was James Ehner, a 22-year-old Canadian master. Such tone! Such sensitivity! Such technique! But equally remarkable was the pianist: Eduard Laurel, a Manhattan School grad. We sat in the first row and could see everything clearly. They played Schubert's Fantasy in C, Bartok's Sonata no. 2, Sarasate's Spanish Dance (electrifying), Kreisler pieces (schmaltz), and Wieniawski's Variations on an Original Theme. Then, as an encore, the violinist sat down at the piano and played a four-hand piece with professional speed and dexterity. What a phenomenon!

Daphne called. Christina is saying "Pip," "dove," "boom" when she falls, and "dada." How does an infant become an Ehner or a Laurel?

Monday, June 30, 1997

Terpni

The Kendal Board met with me and some others connected by telephone. They chose Leonard Cadwallader, director of the Farm and Wilderness Camps, as the next Executive Director of Kendal. Since I nominated him originally, I am very pleased. The runner-up was Warren Witte, also good but clearly a second choice after Len. So, we'll continue with Quaker leadership.

Leander is here, looking at log home kits for his future home here, which we'll build in our north field. . . . Alec's cabin addition has its four walls completed. He is ready now to do the tie beams and then the roof rafters.

Thursday, July 3, 1997

A large deer, a buck with small antlers, about ten feet from me in my office. Very calm. He looked at me, listening with his huge ears, and I looked at him. He stomped his foot the way a horse does, and raised his white tail. Finally he moved off a bit to the center of the field and then turned to look at me again as I stood very stationary next to my table. . . . Visit from Al Zalan and Mary yesterday. We played Bach on flute and organ. Very nice.

Saturday, July 12, 1997

Alec and Monica disappeared for three hours to climb up to the ledge on Alec's land, and at supper afterwards announced that they are engaged. Obviously Alec had prepared this event, because he had already purchased a ring (thanks to Daphne, who kept mum all the while). It's a good match. We are pleased. But Chrysanthi says she won't go to Jakarta for the wedding.

July 15, 1997

Hanover

To Hanover last night. Heard Steve Scher talk about Schubert's lieder setting Goethe poems, very instructive, and actually better than the concert that followed. . . . Today, Kendal board approved the Webster Performance Fund, approved a 50% refundable entry fee (designed so that people won't choose it!), and said goodbye to Steve. In the ceremony afterwards, I read the following sonnet I'd composed for him:

A SONNET FOR MY FRIEND MR. STEPHEN P. FLEMING ON HIS DEPARTURE FROM KENDAL
(with apologies to John Milton)

Steve, whose tenure here was far too short
With only one New Hampshire chill endured,
No time for Anne and Brooke to be inured,
No ease to savor friends or home just bought,
Your eighteen months as Kendal's leader ought to serve as just an interim abjured, instructing Carolinans to be cured
Of ice, snow, frost, and horrors of that sort.
But how ripe with meaning that short time was,
What guidance given, genial friendships made!
Accreditation came, our apogee,
As one-and-thirty climbed to thirty-three. Yet now, alas, your presence starts to fade.
Presbyterians' gain is Quakers' loss.

July 16, 1997

Terpni

To SPAC. Dinner in the Hall of Springs with Yiayia, Alec, and Monica. Then scintillating ballet: “Apollo” (my favorite) with a golden-haired Dane looking very much like Apollo; a Hindemith/Balanchine ballet that I didn’t like very much; then a spectacular pas de deux (Tchaikovsky/Balanchine) danced by Damian Woetzel, who was cheered afterward by all the teenage girls who are his students; finally Jerome Robbins’s clever “The Concert,” a spoof on ballet, with everything done (deliberately) wrong.

Thursday, July 17, 1997

Sent volume 15 #2 of JMGS to Hopkins. What a relief! . . . Our 50th Deerfield reunion will be next June and I was asked to write a one-page biography for the Yearbook.

STATEMENT BY PETER BIEN

FOR THE 50TH REUNION YEARBOOK

Although I spent only my senior year at Deerfield, that year made a significant difference in my life. The major reason was Richard Warren Hatch, my English teacher. I came from a medical family that expected me to pursue a scientific career. All my orientation had been in that direction until I arrived at Deerfield and was awakened by Dick Hatch to the magic of words and literature. That I went on to concentrate in American History and Literature at Harvard, in English (and music) at Haverford, and then to do a Ph.D. in English and Comparative Literature at Columbia indicates what happened. This was followed by a very happy 36 years at Dartmouth College teaching mainly Joyce, Woolf, Conrad, Lawrence, Beckett, and other stars of high Modernism (plus a little Milton, Shakespeare, Sophocles, Homer, Mann, Proust, Kafka, and Kazantzakis).

The other area in which I was awakened during that year at Deerfield may seem strange to most of my classmates. It was religion. My strenuously anticlerical family considered religion mere superstition, if not worse. At Deerfield I learned otherwise. After a bit of experimentation, I settled on Quakerism as the most appropriate home for my own blend of liberalism and mysticism—a choice that led quite directly to my marriage to Chrysanthi Yiannakou, a native of Greece, who had been working in a school established there by British Quakers after the war.

Deerfield's greatest deficiency for me was in music. In 1947–48 it offered no way for a student to continue piano lessons or to expand musical knowledge. Sometimes an enforced break of this sort leads one to abandon an instrument for good, but in my case it did not. I have delighted in weekly chamber music sessions for the past 40 years. And now, in retirement, I am actually practicing! In addition, I'm pleased to have raised one son who is a professional pianist and another who is a music educator.

Deerfield's monosexual student body in those days was also a deficiency. However, despite initial awkwardness with the opposite sex, I am blessed with a stable, enriching marriage of 42 years that led to three lovely children. Our pianist-son has a good career as a performer, composer, and teacher; our music educator is now the assistant headmaster of an international school in Indonesia; our daughter has worked as an editor for Simon & Schuster in New York and Duncan Baird in London. All are married; thankfully none is divorced. My marriage also led to Modern Greek literature and language as the major foci of my scholarship. I began as a translator (mostly of Nikos Kazantzakis, including his controversial The Last Temptation of Christ), went on to write literary criticism in this field and to co-author a language textbook, and have served for many years as editor of the Journal of Modern Greek Studies.

A very important part of our life as a family has been the 120-acre abandoned Adirondack farm that I purchased in 1950 for $10 an acre. I built a log cabin using balsam poles from our forest for the walls and fieldstone for the foundation and chimney; a son has recently built his own log cabin 700 feet away in the same manner. Most of my books were written in an Adirondack-style lean-to under a huge yellow birch tree. The farm, which we call "Terpni" (Greek for "pleasant," and also the name of my wife's native village), has been a tonic for all of us, putting us in touch with nature—sky, stars, snakes, deer, vegetable crops, the forest, the ledges, lightning, thunder, frogs, turtles, fireflies—and teaching us to live with self-reliance and simplicity. For this, and for so much else (e.g., surviving cancer) in these 50 years since Deerfield, I am profoundly grateful.

Saturday, July 19, 1997

Daphne, Greg, and Christina arrived from New York. So we are now seven. Yiayia and Chrysanthi are sleeping at the Alp Horn Motel at Loon Lake; I'm in the Guest House, Alec and Monica in Alec's cabin, and Daphne, Greg, and Christina in our cabin. We all fit around the kitchen table, somehow, and have jolly good meals, mostly watching Christina (who eats and eats) at breakfast and lunch (we have supper at 8:00 p.m., after she is asleep). Christina is indomitably active, investigating everything, moving constantly (when she is not eating). She loves the swing I hung from the large cherry tree in front of the barn. She also loves a large ball we inflated (left over from one of our children's infancy).

Sunday, July 20, 1997

A beautiful day. Greg helped Alec split wood for the fireplace; then mounted the John Deere and mowed  $\frac{3}{4}$  of our large south field, while I did the "embroidery" with the Troy-Bilt mower. Last night we had thick juicy hamburgers for supper and tonight a lovely steak, cooked outdoors to perfection (by me). Red meat: what a treat! Daphne is eager to move into the Co-op they bought on East 84th Street, after renovations (they were accepted recently by the co-op committee: two men, both Harvard grads). They are happy for Alec, as are we.

Monday, July 21, 1997

Alec and Monica left, after breakfast, driving Yiayia back to Hanover. Tearful goodbye with Chrysanthi. "You're so far away," she sobbed. "At least I'm not alone now," Alec sobbed back. They plan to marry there, probably in April, and then to have a reception here next summer. Yiayia did well. She moves with more difficulty now and is severely limited by her deafness in participating in conversations, but still enjoys a good book. She was chuckling at The Catcher in the Rye. Daphne's family left after lunch. We remained, exhausted. I took Chrysanthi for supper at the Copperfield, to relax.

Tuesday, July 22, 1997

Trying to get back to a normal routine again before Leander and family arrive in early August. Practiced Mozart this morning. Assigned Chrysanthi sentences to write for DG1. Started preparing my “Melissa” lecture for Xaviá in November. Finished sending out all JMGS submissions to reviewers. . . . To the ballet again: Slavonic Dances, surprisingly traditional for a 1997 ballet, and lovely. Then a surprise: “The Steadfast Tin Soldier” plus Bizet’s “Jeux d’Enfants,” including the “Berceuse” that I did four-hand with Dan. Damian Woetzel again, this time as a love-sick tin soldier with jerky, stiff movements. Charming. “Allegro Brillante” was lifeless, although by Balanchine. But the final dance to four Brandenburg concertos, choreographed brilliantly by Jerome Robbins, again in classical style, was exceptional in its congruence with the music.

Sunday, July 27, 1997

Very excited to have already received two replies from the Bev Web students I wrote concerning our Performance Fund. Both will contribute and both are interested in coming to Kendal to perform. One is William Black, who taught Leander at Oberlin briefly. . . . Last night to Lake George Opera to hear Verdi’s Otello for the first time. What exceptional music! Iago was fine but both Otello and Desdemona were weak, straining, Otello overacting. I’d like to see it again with first-rate principals. . . . This morning, drove to Indian Lake, invited by Warder Cadbury to Meeting for Worship at Camp Backlog. Tom Brown was there, also David Borton, and 30 other family members including the sixth generation following Tom Brown’s grandfather, who bought the place in 1910. Meeting in “The Focus,” a tent faced by the backlog and fire. Messages mostly about Camp Backlog, rather disappointing. Soup and bread for lunch. Everyone very cordial of course. Judy Cadbury gave us a loquacious tour. And I had a long tête-à-tête with Warder about retirement, Adirondacks, etc. We were taken there in the boat, but we walked out through state land on the 1¼ mile trail. Very hot. Stopped in Speculator on the way home for ice cream and a malted to cool off.

Saturday, August 2, 1997

Finished translating my twenty-minute talk on “Melissa” into Greek. Chrysanthi checked each day’s work—took me all week. How nice to have good dictionaries finally: the Oxford Learner’s and Kriaras’s. In the afternoon went to Tom Akstens’s reception for his marriage to Susanne, a graphic designer. Hordes of people at his place in Bakers Mills—very strange. Among them a former student of mine who told me that my class convinced him to major in English. He is now a full professor at Siena, a colleague of Tom's. Tom and Susanne live of course in Don Kurka's former house. Don arrived, too. I don't understand how he can bear to visit the place. We had him to supper a few days ago. He is retired but is still actively painting, and he spent a memorable two months in an artists' retreat in Montana run by, and populated almost exclusively by, Lesbians (with mustaches and hair on their legs). . . . Started reading John Banville's The Untouchable, a novel about a British spy who is exposed. Scintillating opening.

Sunday, August 3, 1997

Working on Demotic Greek 1 again, filling in missing parts. It's endless. . . . Mowed Alec's land through to the other side of the power line. Full of raspberries in perfect ripeness. . . . Alec and Monica have returned to Jakarta after a week with Leander & Co. that went well.

Monday, August 4, 1997

Evelyn and Don Green for supper. Nice to know that Don worries about all the "improvement" in North Creek, but he says that the supervisor and business community see only the lowering of taxes and don't look further. (Doubtful, however, if taxes will be lowered.) Don is also convinced that Eliot Monter is laundering dirty money via the Copperfield. That's what Art Perryman thinks, too.

Wednesday, August 6, 1997

To Glens Falls to the opera. Benjamin Britten's Midsummer Night's Dream done very well indeed. Britten's music is so brilliant, although not immediately ingratiating. Our 2nd trip to Glens Falls in a few days, since the car battery went dead last week and we had to go to a dealership to have it replaced under warranty. Afterwards, shopping in the amazing supermarket the Price Chopper (I bought double Gloucester cheese) and supper at the Montcalm including their famous seafood bisque. Like old times.

Thursday, August 7, 1997

This morning a young deer raced full speed along the forest's edge just outside my office, then turned around and raced back again, hoofs pounding on the grass. Beautiful sight. . . . Mowed the east field to look nice for Leander & Co. and broke the mower. But Bud Rodick had the parts, amazingly. . . . Took down the dying cherry tree in front of the old barn. . . . Finished all I could do at present for Demotic Greek 1, ready to mail lessons 1–8 to Liappos, Spanaki, Pilitsis, and U-Mass. . . . Eva called. Everyone at Hellenic College is shocked. She's looking for . . . another job. Among those fired was the progressive dean who spoke so well when John and I were there. The archbishop seems to be an autocrat. Clash of two cultures: American democratic vs. Byzantine autocratic, alas.

Hanover

Root canal operation; went well. No pain afterwards. I even had lunch (soup) two hours later, with Michael Mastanduno, new head of the Dickey Center, regarding War/Peace Studies. He is (correctly) worried that Lynda Boose will put all her friends on the Steering Committee and no one else.

Tuesday, August 19, 1997

Hanover

Prolonged, interesting meeting of the Kendal Personnel Committee, which I clerk. We're going to introduce a system of merit pay, and also an "earned time" system combining sick leave, vacation, personal days. . . . Returned to the farm and then dinner at Morse's with Don Kurka plus his elusive wife and charming daughter (who imports Italian vases) and her two lovely children ages 3 and 7—good ages, for they talk.

Wednesday, August 10, 1997

Terpni

Leander, Deanna, and Sophia left. All is set for Leander's house to be built this fall and winter by Pinky O'Dell, in the north field. . . . In the afternoon I seeded around Alec's cabin and then harrowed, and got the harrow stuck behind the house and spent two hours squeezing it between the house and a tree. And the harrow is now broken. But a big rain is expected tomorrow, so the seeds will probably germinate. I also built a huge bookcase a few days ago in the room connecting the living room and kitchen, with thoughts of bringing here some of our Hanover books. In fact we've already brought a long shelf of art books. Also, I brought filing boxes and have now separated all our music here into categories and placed the boxes in the new bookcase. . . . The volume from the Birmingham symposium in my honor arrived, a festschrift for Peter Bien: very nice. . . . Dia and Wim vetted my Melissa Greek. Lots of changes. And they suggest a plot summary at the start. . . . Thinking also of closing up. Only two weeks left.

August 30, 1997

Chrysanthi painted the kitchen floor yellow, and today I finished the three-day job of painting the porch blue. And then I began a new table, a larger one, for the kitchen, given our increased extended family. It's fun to be doing carpentry again. . . . I may take piano lessons; Leander says I should. Called Sally Pinkas, who recommended the #2 person at Dartmouth, Gregory Haynes. . . . Finished the review of Banville's The Untouchable, reading every word of it: such a good book. Started the new biography of Lawrence Durrell immediately, also for review. Very poor, so far. Alix MacSweeney called from London; she wants me to review Gourgouris's Green Nation for TLS. How nice! And Mary Murrell at Princeton University Press agreed to a new date for the Kazantzakis letters: June 1999. Μακάρι! . . . Gregory Maniatis called from Odyssey Magazine. They'll run my Kazantzakis piece next issue. He wants me to do an overview of Modern Greek studies in America. We'll see. . . . I want to write a "ballad" for Lafayette and Mayme's 80th wedding celebration, using the Russian for "yes" (da) so that I can play with No and Da.

Saturday, September 13, 1997

Supper with Mother and Audrey. Mother will be giving up her apartment next week and moving permanently to Barclay 30, where she feels much more comfortable, sleeps well, and has more contact with people. . . . First intercourse, fifteen months and one week after my operation. They told me that potency sometimes comes back in a year and a half. Well, this is only a year and a quarter, but it's still about ½ potency. . . . Am enjoying my 7th floor study in the library, a good place to work. Bought a cellular telephone so that I can have some communication from the study and elsewhere outside of home now that I lost my office telephone.

September 15, 1997

Dinner with Lynmar Brock, new chair of the Kendal Corporation. We were all frank about residents' dim view of the Corporation and need for better PR.

September 16, 1997

Kendal Board. I presented the new recommendations from the Personnel Committee for Earned Time and Merit Pay. The Board accepted both, but suggested that "merit" be called "performance." Later, we finalized Yiayia's transfer to Barclay (Assisted Living). We'll have 30 days to vacate apartment 301. Mother seems at peace with the decision; indeed, she initiated it.

Sunday, September 21, 1997

New York

Flew to Philadelphia on Friday. Book Committee. Board. Music with Dan. He wants us to perform the Brahms, etc. at Log Night, winter term. Maybe he'll practice. Saturday p.m. to New York. Supper with Daphne, Greg, and Christina, whose vocabulary grows and grows. Daphne is preoccupied with the new home. So it goes. Yiayia vacates, the grandchildren occupy. . . . Today, met for lunch at Dock's (where Rob Sullivan interviewed me for Life Magazine) with Robert Roberson of Harwood Academic Press, who wants to reprint some of my translations and essays. Μακάρι. All this thanks to Mike Keeley. . . . Then to NYU for Greece in Print. Heard Olga Broumas recite a moving poem about disinterring her father's bones. Great surprise: Burt Pike was there, looking well, although he, too, had a radical prostatectomy. Also spoke with Stathis Gourgouris, whose book Dream Nation I am now reading for a TLS review. First chapter almost impenetrable. He told me that he wrote it for a specialized audience—obviously not one to which I belong.

September 22, 1997

Hanover

Chrysanthi spent all weekend helping Yiayia to move, and we both spent today packing books, china, etc. So many belongings, even in that small apartment. . . . The Dartmouth Alumni Magazine has an article about me by Rob Sullivan (of Life Magazine) remembering that I graded his paper in my Kazantzakis and Joyce class a "C." Dimitri Mitropoulos wants me to write book reviews for To Βήμα. Supper with Yiayia. Afterwards, I tried the organ. I'll need to practice to play hymns at the service I conduct next month. What a thrill!

September 27, 1997

I gave a speech at Kendal inaugurating the Webster Performance Series.

“Terpni,” Riparius, New York

September 2–5, 1997

Kesaya and David orchestrated an elaborate tribute for their parents: 150 people from Europe, California, Hanover, etc., including primary school chums, relatives, professional colleagues. Huge lunch on the top floor of the Palmer House. David read a beautiful toast. Then various people spoke, sang, or recited. Mine drew many laughs and vociferous No's and Da's. There was lots of kidding about Mayme's vociferousness and Lafayette's habitual silence. . . . Earlier, I saw the young Picasso exhibit at the Museum of Fine Arts: a feast. At age 12 Picasso was accomplished and at age 16 he was producing paintings that looked like old masters. The exhibit showed him breaking from “academic art” under the influence of fauves, impressionism (slightly) in his blue period and his pink period, up to age 25, after which he entered his cubist period. Lots of visual jokes. Lots of bawdiness and self-deprecation. It’s hard to see here the monster that Chrysanthi saw after reading a biography.

NYC–Princeton

Drove to NYC last evening. While Deanna is on tour in Europe, Chrysanthi is in Maryland, babysitting; she was very worried I’d fall asleep at the wheel. I didn’t, although I’d risen at 5:30 a.m. yesterday. This morning to the Met to see the exhibit of the extraordinary collection amassed by Degas. High points for me were the El Greco “Saint Ildefonso,” the provocative “Gypsy with Cigarette” by Manet, and the Bellelli Family by Degas himself. I bought a print of Degas dancers for Daphne’s new apartment. Then to Daphne’s. Lunch there. Christina full of pep, and glad to see Pappou. Her vocabulary is expanding daily—no, momentarily. She now says “elevator,” for instance. We walked across the park to the new apartment on East 84th Street. It’s being painted now. It’s an unpretentious building, none of the awful glitz of their West End Avenue rental. They’ll be very “homey” when they get it finished, with, I hope, lots of paintings and books including the Costigan and Schweitzer that Yiayia couldn’t hang when she moved to the Assisted Living room. . . . Then to the swings in Central Park: Christina is insatiable. And she climbed some shallow steps, up and then down, first time she’d done that. . . . We parted at 72nd Street. On Fifth Avenue the Polish parade: music, costumes, fun. But no fun driving to Princeton. It took me 1 hour 50 minutes to get to New Jersey. Tried the Lincoln Tunnel first; stayed in line  $\frac{3}{4}$  of an hour and gave up. Went to the Holland Tunnel; stayed in line another hour. By the time I reached the NJ turnpike, imperious need to urinate. When I finally got to a rest-stop, couldn’t control and had an “accident.” Still! Listened to Samuel Pepys’ diary on tape through all this waiting, thank goodness. How vivid is his account of the restoration of the king in 1660. Interesting that he was professionally associated with Sir William Penn, and he mentions “the Penn boy”!

Mike Keeley telephoned before I left Hanover. Wants to suggest me as an American Farm School trustee. I’d like that very much, if it happens.

John Rassias met me last Friday. He still objects to my grammatical and etymological notes in the revised DG1. We compromised. They'll stay but be shifted to the end of the chapter if Dimitri Gondicas agrees.

Monday, October 6, 1997

Princeton

A full day. Work on lesson 5 with Dimitri and Mache. Long lunch with Dimitri discussing how to get more funding for the book—from Coufoudakis. Hopeless in Greece because Babiniotis is everywhere and on every board, and our book competes with his. Nice hour with Mache in the afternoon. She is radiant, now newly married, and about to start her Ph.D. dissertation on "Female Voices in Homer." Also spent an hour with a young Austrian scholar now living in Berlin, a feminist, very engaging. I'm hoping that she'll submit to the journal. Then a two-hour supper with non-stop conversation in Greek with Mario and Alexandra Vitti. How nice! When Mario and I met last May in Thessaloniki after 30 years we said we'd need to do better next time. But who could know that a second meeting would come only months later. He advised me to publish my catalogue of Kazantzakis letters before the actual letters, and to speak to Philippides about it when I'm in Crete. He has the lowest opinion of Patroklos Stavrou. Their grandson has leukemia but seems to be in remission at least for now. Sad. Mario's archives are here in Princeton. Hundreds of letters from Elytis, unpublished poems, etc., etc. Mario says: "Never give archives. If you do, the recipient won't value them. Sell them for the highest possible price. Then they'll be cared for." Dimitri tells me that the English lady's photographs are all here now: huge boxes filled with them. Eventually we'll find the ones of the Quaker school, with luck.

Tuesday, October 7, 1997

Princeton

Mario's archive includes six letters from Kazantzakis. I ordered them photocopied. He also has valuable materials from Elytis, including Elytis's self-criticism of early poems. . . . Long meeting with a Greek lady working in Limerick, Ireland, specializing in Turkish studies. She wants a copy of my Christopher lecture since it will deal with Ireland. . . . Supper in a Chinese restaurant with the Vittis, Mike, and Mary, Nehamas, Dimitri and Evi, and the two visitors, the one from Limerick and the Austrian living in Berlin. . . . We finished lesson 5, third revision.

Wednesday, October 8, 1997

Princeton

Mache brought her mother to meet us. Newly arrived from Volos. Very young looking. Dimitri told me that Mache's parents are "simple": father a policeman, mother a seamstress. They sacrificed everything to advance their daughter's career, and it worked. . . . Started lesson 6. Long talk with Mario in the afternoon. Then supper with Mike, Mario, and Alexandra in an Italian restaurant, with Mike and me sharing the bill. Mario full of anecdotes about Elytis, etc. . . . Mike wants me to join the American Farm School board of trustees.

Thursday, October 9, 1997

North Potomac, Maryland

Train to Washington. Chrysanthi is doing well with Sophia, who at least sleeps all night. Leander fine. Excited about his house: cellar finished, electric line in, septic to be done on Monday. At 6:30 Steve (from the Workshop) came with a flutist and did a run-through of a concert they'll be giving: Copland, Schumann, Prokofiev. Of course I knew the Copland and Prokofiev, having played them (hacked at them) with Dick. Nice to hear them played up to tempo and with all the notes.

Friday, October 10, 1997

Washington-homeward

To the State Department. Did my talk again for Jim Miller's class. It went OK, I think. Train back to Philadelphia. Then by car through lots of traffic, as far as Meriden, Connecticut. Stayed in a motel.

Saturday, October 11, 1997

Marvelous color on Interstate 91 returning home. Finished listening to Pepys' diary, which "saved" me on this trip. "Up and to Whitehall . . ." How lovely he is switching into Spanish/French when he records anything sexual. And how sad that he abandoned the diary owing to oncoming blindness. . . . Supper with Yiayia, who is in splendid form and enjoying her new quarters.

Sunday, October 12, 1997

I led the non-denominational service at Kendal, preaching on "Why God Is Silent" and playing the organ for the hymns. But I left out part of the service, including one hymn and the Lord's Prayer. Maybe just as well, since it says "Hallowed be thy name" and the gist of my sermon was that God cannot have a name. He is the "Unnamable." Nice lunch afterward with Joan Williams, who runs the services, and Mother. Bev

Webster and Franny telephoned later in great distress because they had forgotten to come.

Monday, October 13, 1997

I am increasingly frantic, trying to prepare for the trip. Now Alexis Kalokairinos in Iraklio wants me to give a public lecture there in Greek. Lots of additional preparation I had not bargained for.

Wednesday, October 15, 1997

David Buseck is here. Lunch with him and Mother at Kendal. He is a nice young man, a very active scientist working in computer technology. . . . Supper with Dick at the Indian restaurant. Then music with Dick and Allan. Very good tonight. We did a Bach sonata and all three Handel trios, but I played badly. Amazing how lack of practice depletes one. Then a long talk about entering Kendal, with Allan, and trying to convince Dick that it isn't lunacy. Dick is very opinionated on the subject. . . . Picked up Chrysanthi from the AMTRAK bus.

October 16, 1997

Adrian Murry, the student who has been formatting our DG1, failed to show up for my appointment with him. Irresponsible. But Adrienne Wilson, the very pretty girl who is my Presidential Scholar on the journal, is always on time, and does good work, but not always as much as I'd hoped.

October 17, 1997

To Boston

Nelson Kasfir had me to lunch to relate the long sad story of his partner's mother at Kendal. He says they're thinking of taking Kendal to court. I offered mediation. . . . By plane to Logan. Chrysanthi threatened beforehand that she would vomit on the flight, but of course she found it very comfortable in actual fact. Overnight in Ramada Inn paid for by E-Z travel, which so messed up our travel arrangements. Delicious supper there.

October 18, 1997

Boston-London

Up and to British Air at 5:45 a.m. (cf. Pepys). Flight overbooked, but being early we got our seats. Very comfortable trip. Good movie. I worked on the computer, typing in passages from Gourgouris's book. . . . Overnight at The Excelsior at Heathrow, again at E-Z travel's expense. Luxury hotel.

Sunday, October 19, 1997

London

A long, pleasant day. Up at 5:30 a.m., back to Heathrow. Saw Chrysanthi off on a flight to Thessaloniki. To Euston. Bought tickets for Oxford and Birmingham. To the Penn Club. Breakfast. A friendly place. Sat at table with a man called Ira Nadel who teaches Joyce in America. We talked and talked until 11:00 a.m. How nice! Then to the Royal Academy exhibit of contemporary British art: "Sensation." Interesting, disturbing, ostentatiously ugly. There was an installation of flies in a huge bra showing them reproducing and then being zapped electronically—life and death. Another statue of executed men horribly castrated. More interesting was the public: lots of young girls taking it all in placidly. Then to the National Gallery to see the Rembrandt on loan, "the Blinding of Samson," gruesomely detailed, an early Rembrandt in the style of Rubens. Then to Odeon Haymarket to see the film "Wilde," very moving: how Wilde—married with two children—was sort of sucked into homosexuality by various young men, especially the neurotic Lord Alfred Douglas. The downfall very pathetic. Lots of explicit gory sex, not enough on his plays and witticisms, although some of it comes through. . . . Then back to the National Gallery to see the wonderful Van Goghs and Cézannes, especially, and more Rembrandt, especially the "Woman Bathing in a Stream," 1654. . . . Then across Hungerford Bridge to Queens Elizabeth Hall to see the Moscow State Opera Company's production of Tchaikovsky's "The Queen of Spades" (text by Pushkin), marvelously sung and played by virtuoso performers: soprano, contralto, tenor, baritone. Sat next to a man who had sold me his extra ticket; we enjoyed sharing our enthusiasm. Back to Bloomsbury by tube. To Garfunkels for a pudding. To bed at 11:30 p.m.

Monday, October 20, 1997

Penn Club breakfast. Sat with "Steve," who teaches Elizabethan literature in Kentucky, and a British young lady who lives in the Penn Club and is researching a book on TB but hasn't read The Magic Mountain. Again, lively conversation with very friendly people. The atmosphere here is like that at Pendle Hill. And talked about "Wilde" with two others who had seen it. . . . Lunch in Knightsbridge with Robert Robertson at a fancy Chinese restaurant: Mrs. Chow's. He wants to do my translations of "The Moonlight Sonata" and "Philoctetes" with a recording plus essays and maybe Sophocles's Philoctetes. Let's hope. Later, he came to hear me lecture on Νικηφόρος Φωκάς at King's. Went well, I think. I felt in good form. Alix MacSweeney was there, too. I told her about my feelings re: Gourgouris's book. She advises writing a short review, about 700 words. My Dartmouth student Iason Demos was there. We'll have supper on Friday. Roddy and I had a leisurely supper afterwards in the Waldorf Café in Aldwych. He's just as far behind in his Seferis biography as I am in my Kazantzakis letters.

Tuesday, October 21, 1997

Another nice breakfast with Steve May (Georgetown College, Kentucky), who turned out to have a son who graduated from Haverford and another from Oberlin, and Ira Nadel (University of British Columbia), who saw Stoppard's The Invention of Love last night. It's a perfect play for academics—like Travesties. Full of Greek and Latin allusions. Indeed, there's an Ancient Greek couplet in it that he asked me to translate, and I couldn't, except for odd words. . . . Read over my Καπετάν Μιχάλης lecture and reading notes on the novel. Then to lunch with Rowena Loverance and Alix MacSweeney at "The Old Amalfi" restaurant in Southampton Row. I'd bought the new Greek grammar by Mackridge, Holton, and Warburton and recommended Kostas Kazazis to Alix to review it. Also bought the Stoppard play. Alix was able to translate the couplet quite well. Rowena, who continues on Woodbrooke Council, tells me an outside commission will be reporting on what should be done. She confessed that John Sheldon and Helen Rowlands were the wrong appointments (hooray!). They think that Helen will become clerk of Britain Yearly Meeting, which is a way to get rid of her. But no way of getting rid of John yet. What a shame! Afterwards Rowena took me back to the B.M. and showed a sample of the interactive computer program that will be installed in the round Reading Room: what Steve May was cursing at breakfast. Rowena is one of the chief architects. It will display beautifully everything in the Museum, most of which cannot be seen because it's in storage, or can be seen only imperfectly: front, not back. Each object is accompanied by full data, explanation, cross references to other materials, and bibliography of relevant books (which will be available in the Reading Room). Very user-friendly. They'll work on it for three more years. Opening of the new room will be in 2000 or 2001. The only catch is that so far they have no money for staff for the room once it opens. . . . To King's for Roddy's class on Καπετάν Μιχάλης, mostly second year undergraduates. A good group, with some fine questions and discussion after my talk. . . . Walked across the bridge to Olivier Theatre for Ibsen's An Enemy of the People starring the magnificent Ian McKellen as Dr Tomas Stockmann. What a strong, totally contemporary play—about truth and integrity vs. the expediency of those in power. Of particular interest to me is the play's relevance to Kazantzakis, for he treats the same theme exactly in Ο Χριστός ξανασταυρώνεται and in some of the plays. If only he had had Ibsen's theatrical skill to make this theme stirring on the stage!

Wednesday, October 22, 1997

Oxford

Lunch at Magdalen with Oliver Taplan, who is on the Onassis committee for judging the new drama prizes and also now sets up the new translation series of Greek plays for Oxford University Press. Euripides Hera-kles is assigned to Tom Sleight (poet) and Christian Wolff (scholar). How nice! . . . Then to New College to meet Jay Bruce, who is doing well in his second B.A., this one in theology, but faces financial problems next year. I hope to help him re: a Reynolds. . . . To Blackwell's Music Shop for new trios. . . . Then to Peter Mackridge in 47 Wellington Square, and my lecture on Καπετάν Μιχάλης. Small audience. But Elizabeth and Michael Jeffreys were there, as was the recent British ambassador to Greece, a pleasant man with whom I spoke at some length afterwards. Supper with Peter and the Jeffreys. Lots of talk about Stathis Gauntlett, Leo Papademetre, Alf Vincent, Paul Tuffin, Anna Hatzinikolaou, John Burke, the general crisis in Melbourne and Adelaide especially. Michael will retire in about three years and return to England. They're hoping that daughter Catherine, now a law student in Sydney, will agree to return also. Michael is still very negative about Stylianos for bearing grudges so long. Told me that John Chryssavgis had broken with Stylianos before coming to Hellenic College. . . . Back to Peter and Jackie's home: cognac, talk, sleep.

Birmingham

By rail to B'ham. To the University. Saw Dimitris Tziovas. Bryer's on a cruise. John Holden said hello but won't be at my lecture; it's his birthday. . . . Bus to Woodbrooke. Easy, warm reunion with Alessandro Falcetta. I'm hoping that he'll come to Haverford/Pendle Hill to complete his work on Rendel Harris. Lunch with Alessandro and Ben Pink Dandelion, who was forthright about the Woodbrooke situation. They have some good ideas for the future, but need time to overcome the general perception outside that they're a basket case. John Sheldon came over, very friendly. Asked me for coffee afterwards. Also saw the gardener, and Wilson, the short-course coordinator, who was friendly. Met Mary-Jo Clogg, Richard's wife. I'd been at their home 25 or 30 years ago. She's the new librarian. Telephoned Richard, who promised to send in his JMGS report—finally. At coffee, David Saunders, who tried to be civil and friendly but obviously wasn't. But the Bursar said a nice Hello, remembering me. Also Brenda, the secretary. Then another hour with Alessandro. Back to the university. My talk had a larger audience than yesterday's, including Rhoads Murphy, the Ottomanist, and Katerina Davis, and of course Marianna Spanaki, who told me afterwards that she very much likes the grammar in DG1. Hooray! Tziovas, earlier, had promised a surprise. When Χρήστος Αλεξίου walked in, I realized what it was. How nice! Afterwards, quite a good discussion. . . . Then to a Chinese restaurant, but without Christos, who went to see Dimitri. He's trying to find a way to place Pavlos in a British institution. At supper I heard the shocking news that Victor S. had died of a heart attack in his 50s. What a shame! Katerina asserted that Seferis's Ἐξί νύχτες στην Ακρόπολη is a roman-à-clef about Kazantzakis-Sikelianos (composite) and Panait Istrati. Nice to see Harry Davis, although as always all he seems capable of saying is that university life (and students) gets worse each year. Earlier I'd spoken as well to Peter Ricketts on the telephone. He's doing well, very active, lecturing internationally. But I was distressed to hear that Paul Morby hadn't come to my lecture because he is too severely ill. . . . Late train back to London, arriving at midnight.

Friday, October 24, 1997

Lunch with Jack and Kathy Shepherd. He'll be returning to Dartmouth to lead the Kenya program for Environmental Studies and to teach, probably, in the summer. But they're thinking of maintaining their primary domicile in England, which means that Jack won't be as useful in Peace Studies as I had thought, unless we can convince him to spend an additional term in Hanover. . . . Finished typing out key passages from Gourgouris's Dream Nation to use in my TLS review and also, I expect, in the Christopher lecture. Mailed this and other accumulations back to Dartmouth. . . . To the Strand to meet Judith Herrin for tea. She's just back from Istanbul. Very cordial, friendly hour together. I told her all about the mess at Hellenic College when she inquired about Archbishop Spyridon. She has experienced the Archbishop of Alexandria, who she says is young and simple and eager to have the Church “reach out.” But converts tend to “reach in,” and are very conservative. . . . Then met Iason Demos, my student at Dartmouth, now studying at King’s. Walked across the bridge to the Old Vic to get my ticket, then had supper. It turns out that his father is a semi-professional photographer in Athens, connected with a photo archive that can supply photos on any and all subjects. This may be just what we need for the revised DG1. . . . To the Old Vic for Waiting for Godot with Ben Kingsley as Gogo and Alan Howard as Didi. A very fine Godot. Interestingly, these two leads were played neither as clowns nor even as tramps. And Gogo had none of the Zero Mostel flavor but on the contrary was caustic, mean, incisive—perfectly suited to Ben Kingsley’s craggy face. Pozzo (Denis Quilley) and Lucky (Greg Hicks) also fine. It’s such a sad-sad play. Yet also a play about endurance. The refrain of the Trilogy, “I can’t go on, I’ll go on,” is repeated frequently, explicitly & implicitly. Alan Howard gave a bravura performance complete with Irish accent. And he’s going to be Lear tomorrow afternoon!

Saturday, October 25, 1997

So sorry I’ll be leaving tomorrow. This week has been so rich. Final breakfast with our “daily seminar”: Ira Nadel (University of British Columbia) and Steve May (Georgetown College, Kentucky) and Jack and Kathleen Shepherd. . . . Midmorning met with Mark Mazower, who is separated from his wife, alas, and living at a different address, which explains why he never responded to JMGS articles sent for vetting. Apparently the estranged wife won’t forward the mail. . . . Telephoned Chrysanthi chez Vouli; she advised me to bring a coat, since it’s so cold in Greece. So I went to Marks & Spenser and got a nice raincoat that would have been useful the last few days, since it’s so cold here, too. . . . To the Old Vic to see Alan Howard in King Lear. Amazing that he, transformed, played this old king after doing Didi yesterday. And yesterday’s Pozzo was Gloucester, and yesterday’s Lucky was Edmund, very villainous. Yet the play was not entirely satisfactory. I’m not sure why. Somehow the poetry didn’t come through. I’m spoiled by Devlin’s marvelous Lear that I saw at the Brattle Theater while I was an undergraduate at Harvard, and the recording that keeps it current. Alan Howard has a wonderful voice, capable of modulation, but he was much less vehement than Devlin. But Edmund, also Edgar, were both convincing, as were the three daughters. The scenery was nil: nothing, just a stool here and there, and stocks for Kent. Actually, the play accelerated nicely toward the end, when everyone was dying. And the storm was very well done. . . . Then two hours walking around Leicester Square, mobbed on this Saturday night, and eating just sparingly because I'm so overstuffed that food sickens me. Then to see Edward Albee's A Delicate Balance. Interesting how disappointing and uninteresting it was to see a set with elaborate scenery, and civilized people sitting on couches and slaying each other with "civilized" dialogue. I'm spoiled by Godot, Lear, even An Enemy of the People, all of which are "experimental theater" compared to this well-made play. But Maggie Smith was of course hilarious as the alcoholic sister and the other actors were fine. It's typical Albee, I suppose, showing the deadness of a "respectable" family full of the spiritual dead.

To Greece

Up at 4:45 a.m. to catch the Air Bus at Russell Square, very convenient. In the plane, the steward asked me to change seats to free up my seat for a baby, and he gave me five bottles of champagne as recompense. Chrysanthi and Vouli at the airport. Warm reunion. We installed ourselves at the Metropolitan Hotel in a very nice room. Chrysanthi was relieved and delighted to have a "place of my own" after boarding with Lola for the past week. Odysseas came and visited for a while. Then George picked us up and we went to Andreas and Demetra's apartment in Kalamaria to say Χρόνια πολλά (St. Demetrios's name day). Andreas still strange but at least civil. Cute baby. An interesting friend who "works in petroleum" explained to me what happened to Esso-Pappas (bought out by the government) and what is being done about pollution in the Thermaic Gulf. Andreas had gone with Chrysanthi to try to get the required document for her passport. Now they need her naturalization papers. He is confident that he'll have success once we send a copy. George wants us to pay him. I offered but Andreas refused. George and I talked about our prostates. He is taking a medicine and seems to be better. He bought a new car and is very proud to show off its electronic marvels.

Monday, October 27, 1997

Walked all the way, on the παραλία, to the λημάνι to confirm Olympic tickets. Saw nice gentrification of some streets in the old warehouse district, streets that had remained from the old Salonica, with two-story buildings and cobblestones, now boutiques, fancy cafés, etc. Visited two fine bookstores on Αριστοτέλους searching for Θεατρικό έργο του Ν. Καζαντζάκη by Παπαχατζάκης because it has an extended section on Μέλισσα, and found it miraculously. Also found a cassette version of Ritsos reading, to help in finding where to obtain permission for Robert Robertson's venture. Then to the Byzantine Museum, but found an immense line there and gave up. The guard advised coming at 8:00 a.m. tomorrow. Walked to "The Wolves" and had a nice lunch. Το παιδί is still there, but now with γένια. . . . Siesta. Then George and Dimitris picked us up and we went to see Dimitris's glass balustrade in the new theater for the Κρατικό Θέατρο Βορείας Ελλάδος, built next to the abandoned Catholic monastery at the other end of the city, next to the Παύλος Μελάς military camp (where George was imprisoned). A magnificent building designed by a Japanese architect and financed chiefly by EU funds. Dimitris supervised the selection and purchase of the glass, which of course has to be totally safe and strong, and is. Otherwise he goes to prison, he says. Σιγά-σιγά the city is recovering from what I call the "rape" (βιασμός) that ruined it in the 1960s–1970s. Even the little park constructed in front of our last year's apartment is now finished and quite nice, complete with a display of contemporary sculpture. Back to Dimitris's apartment for Χρόνια πολλά, cognac, sweets, coffee. Tilda pleasant, the child absorbed as always with her Barbie dolls.

Tuesday, October 28, 1997, Όχι day

To the Byzantine Museum for the Άγιον Όρος exhibit: very full and beautiful. Daily life (including a wine barrel as big as a small room), topography, manuscripts from the tenth century onward, Byzantine music, silver bindings for the Τυπικόν, frescoes, icons galore, ψηφιδωτά, all with church singing low in the background. Some of the painting is gorgeous. A real treat. . . . Back to the hotel. I'm working on my Iraklio lecture, trying to shorten it. The translation by Αγγελάκη-Rooke of my Columbia pamphlet is superb, so I don't need to "fix" that, merely to reduce it to 50% or less! . . . Lunch at Odysseas's and Eleni's with Toula, Stavros, and Anthoula. Toula looking young and fresh; last May she was very stressed out and showed it. A summer's holiday in Χαλκιδική helped her immensely. They bought twenty stremmata (about 4½ acres) in Halkidiki and hope to start a Greek Kinhaven, if they can get the EU interested enough to underwrite it. They questioned me (again) about Kinhaven and I explained as best I could about its finances, philosophy, etc. I doubt they'll ever succeed. Stavros isn't experienced enough or sufficiently self-directed; also he continues to smoke, thus surely will have health problems again (last year he had a heart attack). . . . Supper with Dimitri and Ruth Gounelas at their home in Panorama. The great fire of this past summer came close but never really threatened them. Both children were there: Frankiskos, who continues at Athens College and will probably study computer science later on, and Angelica, whom they sent to a "liberal" boarding school in England, near Wells, where she seems happy enough. (This is a week's break in mid-term.) She is doing a two-year A-level course in English, French, and Italian, with hope of entering a British university. The fee, even for EU citizens, is £18,000 a year, but she got financial aid. . . . Dimitri exceedingly warm and friendly (as always). He promises me an article on Kazantzakis for JMGS, on Χριστός και Βούδας (the two plays). Ruth is organizing a big conference of the European Society of English Studies. Another friend came also, a Cypriot scholar who'd been at the B'ham symposium in my honor and had delivered a paper, but of course (!) I didn't remember her. She said that she'd watched me at the conference as I sat at the back of the hall and she observed that I dozed off now and then. Yes. We spoke about Maronitis, whom everyone dislikes. ("If you have Maronitis as a friend you don't need an enemy!") and also about Κριαράς, who still comes to the department at age 93 and is still directing the huge Byzantine dictionary project, which has reached the letter π. Dimitri says that Kriaras memorizes ten lines of poetry daily as an exercise to keep his mind in shape and his memory intact. What a good idea! But I, at 67, far from 93, find it almost impossible to memorize either verse or music. Maybe I should set myself five bars of music a day and see what happens. Probably I'll improve. . . . Back to the hotel at 1:00 a.m.

Wednesday, October 29, 1997

Finally shortened my Iraklio lecture to about 45 minutes and rehearsed it. Then to LYRA recording company on Τσιμισκή, where luckily I got full information about where to apply for copyright permission for the Ritsos recording. Then to Vouli's for a long, huge lunch with—how nice!—Bruce and Tad Lansdale, and Mrs. Stefa, plus of course Vouli's mother and Κυρά Κούλα. Tad looking wonderful, Bruce beginning to look like an old gaffer but still with a young, strong voice, and lots of projects. They're off in a few days to Nepal. He always reminds me of our first meeting, when Charles Lindsay was so appalled at Chrysanthi's "American." Talked a little about the search to replace Draper. Bruce stressed a candidate's perception of the "spirit" of the School, and the "nature" of Greeks—naturally. Said that when he announced his forthcoming retirement, Greeks on the board assumed that one of his children (or, rather, sons) would succeed. Such is the νοοτροπία. Actually, one son was remotely interested, but only for five to ten years, not for the expected forty, like his father. So he didn't apply. All our conversation around the dinner table was in Greek of course, but we lapsed into English when just the four of us were alone in their car on the way back to the hotel. We have repeated invitations to Metamorphosis. They told us of one of their sons who sort of "dropped out," although educated, worked as an orderly for four or five years in a nursing home, but now, fifteen years later, has "found himself." Also spoke of Christina, who converted to Orthodoxy and had to be baptized by full immersion (wearing a bathing suit and a smock). I said nothing about being approached to serve on the board. . . . Then, after a short siesta, to Lola's and Kostas's to pay respects. Couldn't stay long enough to eat the cheese pita that was baking, because we had concert tickets, so we walked to the Αίθουσα Τελετής του παν/μίου for one of the events connected with the Πολιτιστική Προτεύουσα, a concert by the Royal Scottish National Orchestra. Excellent. The best was "Four Sea Interludes" from Peter Grimes by Britten: brilliant, exciting music splendidly performed under the baton of Alexander Lazarev. Then a concerto for percussion and orchestra by James MacMillan, performed with gusto by a female soloist, Evelyn Glennie, who ran from marimba to xylophone to drums to chimes to gong. A circus. Forgot the music, absorbed in this circus. Then Silelius's 5th Symphony, not so much fun as the first two pieces. And a rousing encore of a Scottish dance. Walked back to the hotel, stopping at Goody's for a "clap sandwich" (club) and French fries.

American Farm School

Decided to leave the hotel today instead of tomorrow and go to the American Farm School, where John and Mary Rassias are already installed. Emotional goodbye to Odysseas and Eleni—tears and entreaties to stay for lunch. But we said No. Lunch at The Wolves. Vouli drove us to Cincinnati Hall, a very comfortable guesthouse. Nice reunion with John and Mary, catching up on all sorts of news, including John's breakfast at Blair House with Vice President Gore (whom he says is a wooden dummy) and Patriarch Bartholomew. Archbishop Spyridon showed some anxiety owing to John's failure so far to start the Commission, a good sign: he really wants it to happen. . . . Drinks at Charlotte and George Drapers' with Vouli. Then to a tavern in Θέρμη and a jolly meal with lots of talk, I mostly with Charlotte about the Princeton archive with its photos of the Quaker School, and about their plans after they leave the Farm School a year and a half from now.

Farm School–Athens–Χανιά.

Huge breakfast in Cincinnati Hall with an English lady here from Bahrain applying for a job here with the EU. John, Mary, and Chrysanthi off to Θεσ/νίκη to bank and museums. I worked on Μέλισσα in our comfortable room, gazing out at the sea. Of course what used to be a view unobstructed by a single building now has the περιφεριακό (ring road), factories, car stores, apartment houses, etc., but the sea is still visible above all this. . . . Chrysanthi and the Rassias are off to town. I was driven to the airport with George and Charlotte Draper. Zetta Farinou was there. Old times! In Athens, I found Dimitris Tziovas and Marianna Spanaki at the airport. All together to Χανιά, bus into town, long walk through the modern business section—which is very attractive, as is the airport—to the Ομαλός hotel (which I've been calling the Ανόμαλος). Then out to a tavern for a long supper and much talk. Στράτος Κωνσταντινίδης also; then to a ζαχαροπλαστείο for coffee. To bed at 1:00 a.m.

Saturday, November 1, 1997

Χανιά

I'm beginning to think about the Christopher lecture, which will be conceived and written by some miracle. This morning I thought of beginning with Milocz's remark to me about both capitalism and socialism being a way to "cheat" death and fate. But what cuts across both political extremes is nationalism, the strongest replacement of religion—the “idea” in defense of which one is expected to be willing to die. What made nationalism possible (see Benedict Anderson on this) and what also undermines religion, is “history”—i.e. the view of the evolution of events, of progress, replacing the “steady state” of the pre-historical view. All this could serve, perhaps, as an introduction to “Inventing Greece” (and Ireland, and America). Examples could be Korais, Θάνος Βλέκας, Παπαρρηγόπουλος, Καζαντζάκης, Σεφέρης, the development of a “myth”: ελληνικότητα. No matter if the myth is altered, for any myth is the sum of all its varieties. What the myth does is to provide a meta-temporal rationale for life and death, a meaning for our otherwise futile and meaningless existence. Today this is provided most strongly by nationalism.

Off at 10:00 a.m. for the beginning of our Kazantzakis symposium. Rain, cold. The view from my hotel window is the central bus station. And this is supposed to be Crete’s most picturesque town! The symposium: in the Δημαρχείο, a handsome building. Display of Kazantzakis holdings in the Δημοτική Βιβλιοθήκη Χανίων: first editions of the plays, newspaper clippings, the new editions in brown covers issued by Patroklos Stavrou, some of my books. Very impressive. The symposium is quite mixed. Ο Φάνης Κακριδής spoke very well about the παιδικό μυθιστόρημα. A woman was original and helpful regarding Kazantzakis’s early aestheticism in Όρις και Κρίνο, etc. A schoolteacher was extremely good on Kazantzakis’s dreams, showing us manuscript versions of dreams that Kazantzakis wrote down as such and then used in his novels. At the start, the 86-year-old bishop of Χανιά spoke well, assuring us that the Church had never excommunicated Kazantzakis. And Emmanuel Kriaras, in a paper read in his absence, remembered hearing Kazantzakis and Istrati at the Alhambra in 1928. I think that my paper on “Melissa” went well; at least the audience seemed attentive. I stumbled on a few words (as always) but basically managed to make my Greek κατανοητά, I hope. We were dined at a restaurant for lunch, and again at a tavern for supper. Too much food! Throughout, an elderly couple have taken me in tow. I have no idea who they are, but they’ve been very attentive. And Αλέξης Καλοκαιρινός showed up—head of the museum in Iraklio—and gave me the poster and invitation for my Monday night lecture.

Sunday, November 2, 1997

Χανιά–Ηράκλειο

Walked to the harbor. Rain, wind, wild sea, but still very picturesque: the old Venetian buildings, and even a mosque preserved (minus the minaret). The symposium resumed with some good papers, particularly Tziovas's on Ο Καπετάν Μιχάλης. I chaired the final session, and didn't feel embarrassed doing it in Greek. Afterwards, I skipped the final lunch (at Θερσό) in order to catch a lift with the Kalokairinos family (wife, son, daughter), with a stop for a brizola on the way. Good κουβέντα. He has already invited me back in August 1998 to talk about Ο Καπετάν Μιχάλης in relation to the ξεσηκωμούς—they'll be celebrating the 100th anniversary of the rising of 1898. He delivered me directly to Stelios's door. Nice reunion. Stelios just back from Australia; photos of Stylianos looking quite relaxed. Then to the airport, a little apprehensive because the heads of state of all the Balkan countries arrived today for a conference and police are everywhere. But everything was normal. Then Chrysanthi, John, Mary, Stelios, and Natalie and Joseph Ventura went to a παραδοσιακό Κρητικό εστιατόριο for more food. John and Chrysanthi feel that the workshop at the Farm School was a great success. They've been invited back for next year already. Too bad that George Draper had to miss it. . . . Afterwards κουβέντα και τσάι chez Stelios, and bed.

Monday, November 3, 1997

Ηράκλειο

All of us to the Medical School (very handsome building) for the start of the workshop. Mary and I walked back (Stelios is off to Athens for a day for a committee). Returned for lunch and to help with one of the groups practicing the "method." I did this from 2:15 until 5:00, very engaged with these teachers, mostly female, who were trying to master John's techniques. Lots of laughs; good attitude. Walked back to Stelios's. Alexis Kalokairinos picked me up. Drove downtown to the Επιμελητήριο (Chamber of Commerce) building, for the lecture. Fine hall, 300 people, full. Tziovas and Marianna came, as did Roddy Beaton, Titika Sachlamani, Stephanidis couple that gave me letters last year. Nice. Very warm welcome. The talk went well. I had rehearsed it earlier, and didn't stumble over Greek words. John Rassias sat in the front row and recorded. It was quite short (40 minutes plus or minus), which allowed lots of time for questions. Luckily I understood them (mostly) and was able to answer adequately, I think, in Greek. "Was Kazantzakis an atheist?" "What can you say about his treatment of women?" "You spoke of his defects. What are they, precisely?" . . . Afterwards, scores of people came up to say thanks and shake hands. And a young man said that he was reluctant to ask a question from the floor owing to his age. He wanted an explanation of Kazantzakis's doctrine of "freedom." . . . Afterwards, all to a tavern for traditional Cretan food. And "home" at 10:30 p.m., ridiculously early for Greece. Very tired.

Tuesday, November 4, 1997

Ηράκλειο

Up at 7:00. John needs two hours to wake up. Clear sky. Sun. Warmth, first time since we arrived. Fed the cat. Ψηλορείτης visible in the distance. Natalie took John and Chrysanthi to the Medical School for the workshop. Alexis came at 9:30 for me. Downtown to the Ιστορικό Μουσείο, which is now twice as big as I remember it: the old Kalokairinos mansion plus annex. Alexis gave me an exhaustive tour of the newest exhibit: the history of Iraklio under Arabs, Venetians, Turks. Plus a huge model of the town in 1669 with a slide show and splendid lighting that highlight specific buildings, portions of the battlements, etc. Then he drove me to the Physics building of the university to visit Mr. Trahanas, director of the University Press. He seems interested in publishing a translation of my Kazantzakis: Politics of the Spirit, which I summarized for him. He also wants to do an anthology of articles on Kazantzakis with suggestions from me regarding specific titles. . . . Then to the Medical School. Lunch with John and the workshop group. Then I was pressed again into service, again to monitor practice sessions for substitution drills. At 8:30, to a restaurant for the final dinner with some of the students. Long conversation with one of them about Kazantzakis and other literary subjects. Very pleasant. Hugs and kisses at the end and wishes for all of us to return. Also very nice comments about my lecture. . . . Home. More talk with Stelios, John, and Mary until 1:00 a.m.

Wednesday, November 5, 1997     Iraklio–Athena, London Hotel, Glyfada

Telephoned Nikos Alivizatos to confirm our lunch today. Stelios drove me to the airport. Police everywhere. The Turkish prime minister was about to leave in his private Lear jet. Red carpet. Limousines, TV, etc. A very helpful taxi driver from the Athens airport told us to go to a cheaper hotel (which was cheap but . . . rudimentary), waited, drove us into town. Work on Metro everywhere. Went first to LYRA office to ask about Ρitsos άδεια. I have to send a letter to the company's director. Then to Alivisatos's office. He looked very distressed. Told me that at a department meeting that morning one of his colleagues suddenly dropped dead. Turns out that Alivisatos is related to Theotokas. He showed me pictures of his grandfather, a lawyer in Istanbul, and (I think) uncle of Theotokas. He gave me a volume by Theotokas. His wife came. He took us to a very fancy restaurant on Ακαδημίας. Good, easy conversation about the status of conscientious objectors now in Greece, and my experience in America, and the case that he took to the International Court in Straßburg to try to get Greece to act more justly toward religious minorities, especially Jehovah's Witnesses, who refuse to salute the flag and thus feel that their children should be excused from compulsory attendance at patriotic parades. He won a Pyrrhic victory because the Straßburg court ruled that Greek courts must accept such cases (they had previously refused), but when the case went to the Greek court the ruling was that parades have no military content (!) and thus children cannot be excused. As for the new law on COs, it was passed in the Βουλή but still needs directives to be applied. So he is not sure what will happen. In any case, things are moving in the right direction. Interestingly, those who opposed the CO law in the Βουλή argued that Greece is not part of Europe (!) and that Greek exceptionalism, its Oriental roots, direct that it operate differently from the West. We talked also about the forthcoming JMGS issue for which Alivisatos will be the sub-editor. It seems that it will happen. . . . Then to the Grande Bretagne for a little rest. Telephoned Christos. Walked to his office in Οδός Αθηνάς. He went on at length about his attempts to place Παύλος in England and how hopeless the situation continues to be in Greece. A mother of an autistic child committed suicide, another attempted the same. He keeps trying. We took the subway (Piraeus to Kifissia) to Victoria Square. Έρη very friendly. Ασπασία-Μαρία a diminutive adult; speaks beautifully. They bought the apartment upstairs on the sixth floor and will henceforth have twice as much space. And Christos will finally have an office at home. He telephoned Έρη Πίτσου for me about an άδεια for the Sonata-Philoctetes volume. I spoke to Eri, who said that she remembered me and seemed very pleased by the project. She controls translation rights but will need to ask her lawyer and Κέδρος about rights to print the Greek text. Fine. Heard more about the χάλια at the Τμήμα Φιλολογίας. Greek clientelism seems to operate in the university just as elsewhere. Classes are now 200 to 400, all lectures, with many students absent. Teachers of course do not know their students. . . . Christos wants to print my lecture on Ο Καπετάν Μιχάλης, having it translated first. That's good, since I'll need a translation, probably, for next August in Ηράκλειο.

Thursday, November 6, 1997

Athens–London–Boston

Up at 4:45 a.m. Taxi to East Terminal. Moment of panic when I couldn't find my passport. But I found it. . . . BA flight delayed because a plane ran off the runway at Heathrow. And yesterday in Greece there was an earthquake. And Alivizatos's colleague dropped dead. So . . . And, as I jokingly tell people, I need to "invent Greece" between now and November 14. Βοήθεια! Home at 11:00 p.m. our time = 6:00 a.m. Greek time.

Thursday, November 13, 1997

Cambridge

Finished "Inventing Greece" yesterday and read it aloud this morning: 51 minutes. I had to skimp on the last phase, modernism, barely mentioning the Seferis poem I had hoped to elucidate. Also, I couldn't do anything but mention Θάνος Βλέκας. . . . Talked to Daphne, who is happily in the new apartment. Christina calls me Pouppa instead of Pappou. Drove to Cambridge, listening to Katherine Graham's fascinating autobiography. We reached the presidency of JFK. Watergate and Fritz Beebe are still to come. . . . Luxurious suite in the Charles Hotel, paid for by Harvard. Nice dinner with five or six graduate students.

Friday, November 14, 1997

Cambridge

Worked during the morning in our luxurious suite writing a TLS review of Gourgouris's Dream Nation, whose language is so repulsive. How to say this and still be kind is the problem. Lunch with Caroline Higbe, a Harvard faculty member who is a candidate for a job in classics at Dartmouth. Tea with Meg, who is looking forward to returning to England but who worries that they'll not be able to afford placing Pavlos in a home there at £50,000 a year. Terrible weather: snow, sleet, wind, cold. Will anyone come to my lecture? But Boylston Hall was adequately full. My former student Peter Wilson came. How nice! And Eri, Christos's wife, was there of course, and Jenny Mastoraki, and Lily and Michael Macrakis and Dennis Siotis and Greg Nagy, and Takis and Stella Metaxas. I think it went well. People didn't get angry, in any case, when I said that I know the Church exists in Greece but I wonder whether Christianity can exist when the spiritual power is subordinated to the secular. In the question period I elaborated on the CO situation in the USA and elsewhere, where spiritual “truth” overrides the state’s demands (although of course by permission of the state). Reception afterwards in Barber Hall, the refashioned Freshman Union. Long talk there with Eva Constantelou, who says the situation at Hellenic College is worse and worse. Then, hungry, a roast beef sandwich at Au Bon Pain. And home to our suite, where Chrysanthi says she’d like to spend a full month.

Cambridge

The Symposium was excellent, chiefly because scholarly presentations alternated with poets reading. Eri spoke well in splendid English. Mastoraki mesmerized the audience. Meg asked Manolis Savidis and me to sum up at the end. I stressed the excellent collaboration of scholars and authors. Then a festive dinner in a noisy restaurant. Sat opposite Greg Nagy and had a chance to converse pleasantly. They’ll be looking soon for a successor to Meg.

To Hanover

One final huge breakfast at the hotel, then home listening to the rest of Katherine Graham’s story, involving Fritz Beebe, Watergate, her husband’s suicide. What tenacity she had! . . . At home: Greg, Daphne, and Christina, who arrived last night. Christina is 300% energy: climbing, investigating, talking talking talking. And such big smiles. When we swing her or do anything nice she says, repeatedly, “more, please.”

Tuesday, November 18, 1997

Kendal Board. John Diffey convinced the Kendal Fund to award $5000 to our Webster Fund. Hooray! We concentrated on growth. How much, how far, would the Corporation go? I had lunch with Andy Rangell and Bev and Franny. Andy is playing again, although he still hasn’t regained full power and endurance in his hands. He is also trying to write and illustrate children’s books, and showed me a prototype. . . . Fleet Bank called. Mother hasn’t paid her Visa bill for four months. Then I discovered that she also hadn’t paid Kendal bills, phone bills, Medigap insurance, etc. Nor had she deposited checks. In sum, she had stopped functioning financially. Visa had an $80 penalty. Medigap insurance had been canceled, phone was about to be discontinued. I had to scramble to put everything back in order and I’ll henceforth need to take charge.

Alice is here, too, and helped find Mother's checkbook. But when she offered to help from Arizona I said No because her own efficiency in such matters is so very bad. . . . On top of this I said I'd be the Quaker Meeting's next treasurer. Bruce Koloseike walked me through some of the procedure and I'm now regretting this decision. So much! So complicated!

Sunday, November 23, 1997

Greg came again on Friday. Today they all left for New York, where their kitchen is being rebuilt. They'll need to eat out for a month. They took Mother's Costigan and the beautiful Schweitzer watercolor and the Sikeliotis dancers and one of Mother's best oils. How nice! . . . I'm trying to learn the 3rd movement of the Mozart F major four-hand sonata. Very very difficult.

November 27, 1997, Thanksgiving

Last night Dick came for supper with his new girlfriend, Susan Monahan, who looks about 50 years old and is married but estranged (and still living in the same house with husband) and mother of several grown children including a disturbed apparently non-functional boy. Chrysanthi described her as "frightened." She hardly talked, except when spoken to. Poor Dick! . . . Another sad case is Ellen DeCesare Baber, who has finally left Don Stewart to set up her own domicile in a condo bought with profits on the stock market. Chrysanthi says that every time she visits Ellen or talks on the telephone with her, she weeps, especially because her two girls seem so unsupportive and selfish at this difficult time. Ellen lost her job, lost her relationship—in effect has lost her children. What's left? Chrysanthi fears she might kill herself. . . . But we had a jolly Thanksgiving dinner at the Nodas, together with Yiayia (who forgot her hearing aid and glasses and told the man next to her at table that her husband died six months ago). Nodas' Japanese friends were there: a gentleman with whom they went to primary school in Livingston, his daughter (Kyo, whom I knew from the Pendle Hill board) and her three children. Plus Kesaya. The old gentleman turns out to have played the same role for Medford Leas as I played for Kendal at Hanover. Medford Leas is extremely viable, with millions in the bank, a huge waiting list, etc.

To NYC

Overnight at the Harvard Club, all crimson carpet and walnut paneling, but I like my own Yale Club better (it was full today). To the Guggenheim to see the Rauschenberg retrospective. A feast of ugliness and, I suppose, cleverness, justified (in the accompanying brochure) by R's reconnection of art with real life in reaction against abstract impressionism. Yes, real life is there: bathtubs and cardboard shipping cartons, and the like. Also, he smashes old-fashioned sentimentality, for instance by covering over David's backside (he's on horseback) with generous smudges. . . . Then to Daphne's new apartment, 125 East 84th, still very much unfurnished; everything in boxes; the kitchen under construction. But Christina remembered Pouppea sweetly. Graham Tebbe was there, looking well (but again unemployed), and Greg's stepmother Karyn, who seemed much more real this time (compared to her part in the wedding). We went by taxi to 9th Avenue and "Little 12th Street," in the meat-packing district: lofts, wide cobbled streets, very close to Jane Street (Greenwich Village), to a restaurant now very fashionable. Joined by Vaughan, looking very much like Lucia, with the same mannerisms and facial expressions. We've concluded that Christina looks just like Graham. Also joined by Vaughan's boyfriend Nick, who works in Hollywood selling low-budget independent films to foreign distributors, chiefly in South America. Apparently they're going to get married, although he hasn't proposed yet. V. has quit her job at "Time Out" and will move to Los Angeles to be with him. Also there was Philip, Karyn's son and his recent bride, who assistant-teaches English as a MA student in Arlington. They're doing Dickens' Great Expectations: how unimaginative! But also The Merchant of Venice. She seems nice. Philip, who majored in jazz drumming at New England Conservatory, is now working in computers! . . . Afterwards to 46th but I'm not affected any more; probably better that way.

Sunday, November 30, 1997

New York City-Princeton

Meager breakfast in the Harvard Club, which charged me $168 for overnight. A rip-off. Then to Daphne's and with Greg, Christina, Graham, and Vaughan to a Greek-run coffee shop on Third Avenue for breakfast. The owner was delighted by my and Daphne's Greek, of course. More chance to talk to Graham, since last night was so noisy. But he is not a great conversationalist, like his son. . . . I said my goodbyes and went off to MoMA to see the impressive Schiele exhibit. I'd remembered some of his work from my visit to Vienna, but this retrospective of his remarkable thirteen-year career (he died at age 28 from Asiatic flu) showed a tormented soul, very much like Kafka, emblematic of pre- and post-WWI modernism. Raw sexuality, celebration of ugliness, yet all subjected to exquisite constraints of design. Another exhibit, of Castiglioni's utilitarian design (silverware, lamps, furniture) was also nice, but of course without the real power of the Schiele. Also made a quick trip through the permanent collection, so very familiar to me: those lovely Cézannes, Picassos, Matisses, and more contemporary stuff: rocks or automobile tires, and the like. . . . Bus to Princeton. I'm in the apartment in Palmer Square this time. Too hot, but very convenient. Went to the WaWa store near the Dinkey to stock up for breakfasts. Working on the Mihalis article on the computer. Spoke to Chrysanthi. She says I should be stern with Mache for neglecting the micrologues. Also with John Rassias for neglecting his contributions. Again, I'm doing the book almost single-handedly. . . . Before leaving Hanover I was able to send Christos about half of my Kapetan Mihalis article with all the documentation added, and also all the quotes changed back to the original Greek, a slow, laborious chore. Also finished copyediting Chryssavgis's on Sherrard. Started reading Middleton's newest piece on Kazantzakis and process theology—a pleasure.

Monday, December 1, 1997

Princeton

Mache very embarrassed that she had failed to do any of the micrologues. So she had two ready and promised two more for tomorrow. . . . Lunch with Dimitri catching up on “who's in, who's out.” Supper with (Mache's) Seraphim Sepheriadis, a young political scientist, graduate of Anatolia College who then got a B.A. at Swarthmore College and a Ph.D. at Columbia. He laments the state of scholarly life in Greece, saying that there is no cooperation.

Tuesday, December 2, 1997

Lunch with Mache. Supper at the new Thai restaurant where I accidentally met Bob Hollander, wife and son, and joined them for a pleasant visit and meal. He recalled teaching with Jeff Hart at Columbia, and noted how gifted Dinesh D'Souza was as a student. . . . I'm struggling to keep up with the typing and the extensive revisions we're making. Finished Lesson 6 yesterday; now working on Lesson 7.

Friday, December 5, 1997

Pendle Hill

Played Brahms last night with Dan. He's doing much better. We're even getting the variation in seven sharps. Also did Della Joio and Debussy. That will be our program during Festival Week in March. . . . Today at Publication Committee Emma Lapsansky spoke about "hallowing our diminishments." I thought of Marjorie Hope Bacon's schizophrenia, manias, and paranoias in the CPS mental hospital she describes so well in her book, and of Meg's autistic boys, and of the Alzheimers patients—John Corindia and others at Kendal—and of the Down Syndrome people in Holland when I was there for the Quaker International Voluntary Service.

Saturday, December 6, 1997

Pendle Hill

I ministered in Meeting on hallowing our diminishments, citing King Lear's "pure unaccommodated man—poor forked animal—off off with your lendings," also E. M. Forster's passage in which the Christians cannot accept wasps in heaven. Are we made in God's image because we are whole and intelligent (ο Λόγος) or are we diminished creatures also made in God's image? Perhaps one sometimes should worship a diminished God. . . . Nice visit with Doug Gwyn, who has published a collection of his essays and is still working on the book about the Seekers. . . . Chuck Fager wants me to participate, perhaps co-edit, a Festschrift for Dan. I almost spilled the beans when talking with Dan, but not quite. But we probably can't have PH publish it, because Chuck cannot work with Rebecca. (Rebecca of course wants to try to work with him!) . . . Returning to Hanover, I learned that Franny Webster had a stroke but Bev played tonight despite this, all Chopin, beautifully. And Audrey fell and broke her hip. We must hallow our diminishments.

Saturday, December 20, 1997

Cambridge

Splendid performance of The Bacchae at A.R.T., with an especially good treatment of the chorus. Michael Keane was just right as an effeminate Dionysus, and Ben Evett as Pentheus; the two messengers especially fine. It occurred to me afterwards that already in ancient Greece there was pressure against "Europe"—i.e., enlightenment, individuality, etc., and for "Asia"—i.e., communality (via dance), instinct, παραφροσύνη. Cf. Kazantzakis's Zorba, which of course incorporates Dionysus (via Nietzsche). I was emboldened to send in a précis to the European Modern Greek Society symposium committee for the Berlin symposium next year on Greece between East and West. Euripides–Dragoumis–Lorenzatos–Kazantzakis.

Tuesday, December 23, 1997

Finished “Kazantzakis and Film,” my talk for the Toronto MLA, using diary entries from 1964 (shooting of Zorba outside Xavιά), 1989 interview with Paul Schrader, and my New York Times Op-ed piece. Fun to dip back into old diaries that, I must admit, are quite fascinating.

Wednesday, December 24, 1997

I said “Happy Birthday!” to Chrysanthi and she replied, “I doubt that I’ll have many more.” I assured her that she’d live to 96. We’ll see. . . . Leander, Deanna, and Sophia arrived. Sophia is so diametrically different from Christina: silent, frightened, stand-offish, but not all the time.

Thursday, December 25, 1997, Christmas

Nice turkey dinner with Yiayia and others after distributing presents. Leander gave me Knowlson’s biography of Beckett. Very thoughtful. I gave him The Cambridge Companion to Schubert. Also very thoughtful. John and Mary, Helene and Bill came over later. John is interested in my use of journals (commonplace books) in class. I had to leave at 7:00 to go to Kendal to introduce the third of our Webster Performance concerts. Michael Webster, clarinet, and his wife Leone Buyse (rhymes with “spicy”), flute, piccolo, alto flute. A beautiful program beautifully played. Her flute is heavenly, as is his clarinet (if a clarinet can be heavenly). They took turns accompanying each other on the piano, and spoke helpfully about each piece before performing it—the perfect technique for Kendal. The program mixed modern with traditional: a contemporary “canon” followed by Bach’s “Siciliana.” Chopin’s only piece for flute, “Variations on a Theme by Rossini,” was scintillating. They ended with Fauré, Debussy, and Lutoslawski—very fine. Afterwards, conversation about the future of Bev and Franny: perhaps two rooms in Assisted Living with an upright piano and their cat. Bev kept telling me how often he thinks of me and talks about me. How nice to have made this friend! . . . And Michael and Leone say they’ll perform again on December 25, 1998.

Friday, December 26, 1997

Riparius

Up early. To the farm with Leander. Breakfast in the Woodstock Inn, very grand. We arrived at 11:30 and Pinky O'Dell and his son Adam were waiting for us in Leander's new house, complete on the outside except for the screening on the porch, and quite advanced on the inside: all sheetrock in, room dividers, doors, electric, basic plumbing. Leander had many details to decide—for example, whether to have a “peninsula” or an “island” in the kitchen, to have the yellow pine flooring V-grooved or straight at the ends of the boards, pine paneling on the drywall in the bathroom. Pinky says that he can do everything that Alec wants on his cabin, and he cautioned us to keep this work hush-hush because the cabin is totally contrary to code! He also says he can move our guest-house to firmer ground and place it on proper piers (unlike mine, which the frost has headed all out of line). So, we had a very useful time, and a pleasant one. Warm weather, sunshine, not much snow. Leander's camp warm as toast with just one baseboard operating. . . . Afterwards, to Murphy's for extra keys, more decisions about kitchen cabinets, and a consultation with John Armstrong. Then a very late lunch at “The Chicken,” a ridiculously huge (and good) hamburger. On the way home, Leander said that Deanna refuses to do any more recitals; the one in January at Kendal at Longwood will be her last. She has also dropped all chamber music. She just saws away in the orchestra, practicing in rehearsals. All this because (a) of the baby, (b) she “peaked” so young, and now has no incentive or drive to improve or diversify. Nor does she seem to feel the need to share her gift with others. What a shame! So gifted and yet so uncreative! Leander thinks that things may change when their child (or children) goes/go to school, but the likelihood is that they will not, alas.

December 27, 1997

Hanover-Philadelphia

To Yiayia's storage bin. Leander and Deanna are very happy to take a Thomas Hart Benton lithograph (what a treasure) but quite uninterested in the couch. Maybe they'll take the bookcase and some chairs, later. . . . Dick Williamson visited. Afterwards, both Leander and Deanna remarked, “He looked so sad.” They are perceptive. Georganna's untimely death has devastated him. . . . I edited Roddy Beaton's “Commentary” on Jusdanis's et al.'s “Whither the Neohellenic?” (which Roddy writes as “W(h)ither . . .”). This has infuriated Jusdanis, who'll be writing a commentary on the commentary. I'm feeling more and more inclined to relieve myself of the journal, rather than continuing to have people angry with me, as Ricks and Jusdanis have been recently. . . . Off to Manchester Airport for a (delayed) flight to Philadelphia. There it's snowing. Made the Toronto flight because it, too, was delayed. Then we sat on the runway for an hour waiting to be de-iced. Luckily I was next to an interesting young woman who was a trained Montessori teacher, so we had a good conversation, and I spent time also editing Roudometov's piece for JMGS. Arrived at the Toronto Hilton at midnight, very tired.

Toronto

Yesterday, in the airport customs, the officer asked me what I was planning to do in Canada. "Go to the MLA." "Are you giving a talk?" "Yes." "Are you getting paid for the talk?" Ha ha ha! I assured him of the contrary. Went to Quaker Meeting today, walking a long way along University Avenue in this beautiful city. To my surprise, I was greeted by Keith Maddock, who had entered my Paradise Lost module at Woodbrooke part way through. Very nice to find old acquaintances unexpectedly. In addition he gave me a sensitive account of the "jury trial" of Eve that my students had presented at the end of the term, showing his appreciation of the girl with nose rings. I inquired about Terry Gardner, who must have worked with Friends in the Vietnam period, but no one knew of him. Then I telephoned the Terry Gardner listed in the phone book, but he said that he was the wrong one, and that the guy who teaches at the University of Toronto has an unlisted number. Too bad. On my way back, I stopped at the museum to see an exhibit on whales, full of parents with children. Fascinating. Very interactive. . . . Then to our Greek seminar on film. Nice to see old friends including Gonda and Vangelis and of course Stratos and Martin McKenzie and wife. I gave my paper on the three Kazantzakis films. Not much reaction. No questions except Martin's on Panaït Istrati. Disappointing. Some of the other papers were quite interesting, especially the one on Greek soap-operas. Afterwards, we all went to a restaurant on George Street for a leisurely supper. I returned through the huge Eaton shopping mall, and then walked toward the lake to see Union Station. The whole city center is new or refurbished: wide avenues, glitter, a sense of cleanliness, although a few miserable-looking homeless are on the streets.

Toronto

To the Royal York Hotel to see Michael Groden's computer project on Ulysses, and who was in the room but my Penn Club chum, Ira Nadel—a very nice encounter. Groden's project is spectacular; he hopes to involve some of us as consultants. I was pleased owing to the fact that he first read Ulysses under me at Dartmouth, and also because he emphasized Bob Bell's study on Joyce's humor, Bob having also first read Ulysses under me at Dartmouth. . . . Then to a good session on Beckett and Proust, chaired by James Knowlson, whose book Leander gave me for Christmas. He is a cancer survivor; we share that. We dined together at Sheila Harvey's some years ago. Good papers on Beckett's Proust essay, on A + C in Molloy (elucidated by the Proust essay) and on Beckett's and Proust's treatment of photographs. A speaker recalled Marcel's chagrin as he sees (what is like a photo of) his aged grandmother, who while still alive seems as though dead. I'm beginning to feel that way about my own mother, who seems to me now more and more like a living corpse as she ages. . . . Martin and Karen McKinsey then took me to lunch in an Irish pub with leisurely conversation about Greek and Irish literature. He hopes to apply to the fellowship program at Princeton. He gave me a booklet of his own poems, all based on Greek themes. . . . Back to the Royal York to hear Josna Rege, my replacement at Dartmouth, talk on black British writers. She is articulate and lucid. . . . Dinner at a Thai restaurant with Dick Dellamora, who has strong memories of our farm, children, house. He's "out" as a gay person, and has written a will leaving his estate to Dartmouth for use by Gay and Lesbian Studies. Of course he has no children. At 10:30 another man joined us by prearrangement apparently, and when I returned to the hotel at 11:00 they went off together. Hmm . . .

Tuesday, December 30, 1997

Breakfast meeting at the Royal York with Phyllis Franklin, MLA president, and about 30 other teachers all of whom, like me, had received teaching awards. The subject: What can the MLA do to enhance teaching? I suggested working with graduate schools that produce Ph.D.s, to incorporate some teacher training in their programs. . . . It's snowing lightly. I returned to the Hilton underground, via the P.A.T.H. What a livable city! Worked more on Roudometov's essay; had a chopped liver sandwich in a Montreal deli. Then to the second session of our Greek/

MLA seminar, with Gonda Van Steen giving a good paper and Stratos another, and a lovely young lady showing clips from a Greek film, a very anti-Junta adaptation of Lysistrata. Fun. Taxi to the airport with Gonda and Stratos. Lots of talk with Gonda while waiting for our planes. She's doing well at Tuscon. Canadian bacon for supper, very different from what one gets here. Home at midnight to find a hysterical Chrysanthi, who had forgotten that I'd be so late and was frantically trying to find what had happened, calling police, various airlines, the Rassiases, the Hilton in Toronto. She calmed down, eventually. I should have telephoned, obviously.

Wednesday, December 31, 1997

Hanover

Chrysanthi fully calm. Leander, Deanna, and Sophia left, their car full of Sophia's paraphernalia. My Sony tape-deck has been returned and fixed. . . . The sewer backed up again. Called a man to "roto" it out again. Reality! Yesterday started Jim Sheridan's history of Kendal at Hanover, which he asked me to check for errors, omissions, etc. There are some, of course. But all in all it's a valuable, readable record. And I'm grateful to him for stressing the Quaker component. Must finish it today. Must get ready for the move to Pendle Hill. Must prepare in advance for April's course in Ulysses for ILEAD. Must read Tom Doulis's translation of Thanos Vlekas. Must finish this issue of the Journal. Too much! . . . Annual party at Genevieve's. Nice talk with Leonard, who has left the employ of the Solzhenitsyns and will also quit the bookstore, to go to Nepal.

Thursday, January 1, 1998

Annual New Year's breakfast at the Nodas', with their neighbors, including the pretty girl who does all the publicity at the Co-op, and Quaker friends.

January 3, 1998

To Cambridge. Lunch with Filitsa and Otmar in the Charles Hotel. Then Peter Pan & Wendy at the A.R.T. Terrible. Total waste of time: five hours' driving.

January 7, 1998

Met with Sara Zuniga, whom I think I'll hire as my presidential scholar for next year. What a relief! She's a Spanish beauty.

January 8, 1998

To Philadelphia

Drove in heavy rain to Pendle Hill, Eight hours on Interstate 91. Convoys of electric company trucks heading north to help with people who were hit by the ice storms. Millions are without electricity. But Hanover was spared.

January 9, 1998

Pendle Hill

Getting settled in our “luxurious” apartment, Firbank 26: living room, our own toilet (!), efficiency kitchen, hall, and two bedrooms, the second of which I’m transforming into an office. And I rented an electronic keyboard in Hanover; that’s going in the office, too. All the comforts of home! Shopping at Radio Shack in Springfield Mall to buy telephone, answering machine, good coffee. Our phone was installed and I’ve set up the fax. . . . Welcoming tea at Dan’s. He gave a short talk and read Cavafy’s “The City,” a “grim” poem. Why? . . . Heard that John Rassias is in the hospital. Teaching a class, he had sudden difficulty in breathing and was rushed to the emergency room. No diagnosis yet. He’s on oxygen and IVs. Telephoned him. He could hardly speak. . . . Met with Rebecca regarding the proposal for a publication endowment to be inserted in the preliminary prospectus for the capital campaign.

Sunday, January 11, 1998

Pendle Hill

Went with Dan to Burlington Meeting, about a 30-minute drive into farm country. Old Meeting House with wonderful paneling, including panels that open and close to shut off the Meeting space from a larger space. Met Ted Brinton there. A strong meeting with “flavor.” Afterwards, we all went to an Italian restaurant, and then Dan and I practiced our Brahms, Debussy, and Dello Joio. He still doesn’t know the notes.

Monday, January 12, 1998

Rebecca and I finished the draft of our proposal: part for books, part for pamphlets. . . . Meeting regarding consultants; we identified ourselves to the new students. More shopping. It’s nice to have our car here. Practiced again with Dan. . . . I’ve been doing “post pots” after dinner but am now assigned for the rest of the term to post pots after breakfast. So I bought rubber gloves, since I work with the disinfectant. Our team is Dan, Liz, and I. . . . Went to Swarthmore to get a library card and use their bibliographic databank for JMGS needs. The computer was down.

Tuesday, January 13, 1998

An hour and a half with Jennifer Elam, the Cadbury Scholar doing a project on mystical experiences and mental illness. She has numerous testimonies from people who (a) had direct experience of God, (b) were committed to mental hospital for psychosis. I'm trying to help her organize all this in order to write it up in what some day should be a very good book. . . . During supper, to the "Men's Group," trays in the Reading Room. Very meaningful. One, Mel, is going into hospital on Thursday for a serious operation. We talked about making a will. Another has a son in prison. A third is at odds with his parents. A fourth, Dan Cook, is gay and has AIDS. And at Christmas his father gave him a stone earring for his pierced left ear. Amazing. Another is a family physician: David, 4th generation MD, broken marriage, decided to stop practicing and is trying to see what to do next. Another, Greg, going blind, is in love with Margaret Fraser and in a great dilemma since she is being attracted by another school to take a much better-paying job, but in a location where he does not want to go. And she said she'll turn down the job for his sake, which of course he doesn't want, either. I commented, perhaps cruelly, that the Roman Catholic tradition of celibacy for those in religious vocation (which Margaret clearly is) perhaps makes sense. Most of these men now see Pendle Hill as their most comfortable "home." That speaks well for PH but of course is sad for them, since they'll need to leave sooner or later.

Wednesday, January 14, 1998

Lots of Quakers and other people here with FWCC and AFSC. Saw David Atwood, who taught at Woodbrooke when we were there, and Van Ferguson. Nice. Yesterday I ministered in Meeting. Someone from this group ministered about religious vocation, the call, and following it. I then spoke about St. John Climacus and the wonderful icon of the ladder, showing that those who follow the call need to renew their vow repeatedly; otherwise they fall off the ladder at the next step as they "ascend." . . . Over lunch, I met with those who would like to have some help with writing. To my dismay there were eight! I'll meet with them individually and then occasionally call the full group together. . . . At 5:00 met Dan and drove together (with Chrysanthi, of course) to Kennett Square. Supper in a Chinese restaurant talking to Dan about theology. Then to Kendal at Longwood for Leander and Deanna's concert, with me as page turner. A lovely program: a late Schumann sonata, then a 90-second Ravel interlude for piano solo, then a late Mozart sonata. Turning pages was a bit nerve-wracking, but I managed. Ferociously difficult piano parts, which Leander played deliciously. In the Ravel, which he did from memory, he had a memory blank after the first two notes but then started again (no one noticed) and went through to the end beautifully. He really hasn't memorized anything for fifteen years, since he always plays ensemble. And Deanna played beautifully, too, although from my position as page turner I had to concentrate on the piano part. Ignat came and we had a nice reunion. He inquired sincerely about my cancer and said how much my "prostate letter" meant to him. Also nice to see Mary Hoxie Jones, Mary Morrison, Janet Shepherd, Dorothy and Oliver Rodgers, Mary and Bob Metz, Clayton Farraday, Yuki Brinton, and Rebecca and Anna Mays, who came to hear Leander. They'll repeat the concert at the Presbyterian church where they were married, and at another venue in D.C., but Deanna doesn't want any more recitals at a distance. . . . Dropped Dan off and drove the 60 miles to Princeton, to Palmer House.

Dimitri accomplished wonders this Christmas in Athens. John Demos will furnish photos from his archive for free. Maniatis (Odyssey Magazine) will help with formatting and printing. Mitropoulos the cartoonist will draw special cartoons for us. . . . We finished Lesson 8's revision and started Lesson 9. Chrysanthi left after lunch to go to Daphne in New York.

NYC

Train to New York yesterday. Christina is sick: diarrhea and vomiting all Thursday night, less vomiting today but still some diarrhea. Daphne and Greg up all night Thursday and then Greg had to go to work downtown and directly to London last night for an important presentation today. To top things off, this morning Christina somehow got her finger stuck between the side railing of the crib and the headboard. I had to break the railing to release her. Bleeding, a cut, screams. . . . Escaped to go to the Village to meet Burt Pike for lunch. His huge apartment on Charlton Street is lovely. Daphne's is still totally unready: packing cases, minimal furniture—like camping out. No kitchen. Eating on paper plates from take-out food brought in three times a day. Some day it will be like Burt's, I hope. We went to Caffé Dante on MacDougal Street for a light lunch. He is still very active in teaching and administration and writing. Told me to my surprise that Thomas Mann, like Kazantzakis, had been neglected by scholarship for a period and is now regaining interest. I mentioned my ages-old essay on the séance scene in Der Zauberberg, perhaps all that's been said by someone else. . . . Met Chrysanthi and Daphne at Minetta Lane Theater, off 6th Avenue near Bleeker, to see "Gross Indecency: the Three Trials of Oscar Wilde." Very imaginatively presented with Edward Hibbert as a superb Wilde. Everything taken from the existing documents, including De Profundis. The only deficiency was the portrayal of Bosie, nothing of his tantrums and self-centeredness so evident in the film "Wilde" that I saw in London. But this treatment added the important dimension of what was implicitly on trial besides sodomy—namely, aestheticism—totally lacking in the film, which overdid the purely sexual element. This show also presented interesting biographical elements in An Ideal Husband, which was playing in London when the trials began (until it was closed down after Wilde was indicted). The show ended, brilliantly, with the whole cast reciting, choral-like, Wilde's poem "The House of Judgment." . . . Afterwards, Daphne and Chrysanthi went back to relieve the babysitter. I toured the Village a little. It's its own very special world. Then went to the Yale Club library to try to find Wilde's poem. They have the books but they're all in the librarian's office, locked over the weekend. Drank a Manhattan and felt tipsy afterwards. All these days I've been scouring the New York Times for its articles on Indonesia and especially Suharto, who seems, with his family, a case of almost pathological greed. To think that the machinations of a single family could topple the economy of such a huge nation! But obviously there were other factors. We worry much about Alec's wedding, scheduled only a few days after the next election. All predictions are for violence against the Chinese-Indonesian minority—i.e., Monica and family. And Alec wonders how many students will show up for school on Monday, since part of the ex-pat community seems to be pulling out.

New York–Pendle Hill

Went to Meeting at Earl's Hall, Columbia. About 30 people, 3 blacks, all ages, including many in their late 20s or 30s. Good ministry. After Meeting they have a custom called “Afterward” when Friends who want to speak about issues or perhaps were “almost” about to minister, can stand and talk. Good, but time-consuming. When newcomers’ time came, I stood and said that I was probably a co-founder of the Meeting. I told how three of us around 1956ff. formed the first Meeting at Columbia. Fifth day at lunchtime. One was Robert Lawrence Smith, who later became the headmaster of Sidwell Friends School. The third was in the registrar’s office, I think. After Meeting, their archivist caught me and begged for any more information I could provide. I remember that an engineering professor, Victor Paschis, now deceased, took the leadership afterwards and shifted the Meeting to first day. The woman introduced herself as Chris Dye’s cousin and said that he spoke often to her about me, very warmly. How nice! . . . Cab back to 84th. Greg had just arrived from London. Christina still subdued, but clearly on the mend. This morning Daphne insisted on my dismantling the offending crib, which she placed in the garbage. Yesterday she bought a new crib. Nice to have money. We felt best to leave immediately. Had delicious bagel and lox on Lexington. Subway to Port Authority Terminal, where I’m now writing this as we await the bus to Princeton.

Pendle Hill

In Meeting this morning, one of the students, Jerry, rose with sobs and blurted out something like this: “I try to bring God to Meeting and God doesn’t come. Meeting is nothing if we don’t bring God. Pendle Hill is nothing if we don’t bring God. O God, why don’t you come? God, help me!” And sat down with audible sobs. Later someone else read a psalm that speaks of God’s presence. I kept thinking of the view that God is the one who needs help from us. If we don’t reach out to others, God is diminished. If we don’t overcome egotism and inertia, God is diminished.

Yesterday, found Wilde’s “The House of Judgment” at Swarthmore. It is so strong. I’ll read it in Epilogue on Monday.

Chrysanthi asked yesterday, “Why are we here?” It occurred to me that it’s a good preview of life at Kendal. Certainly we’re entirely comfortable in our two-bedroom apartment—a good sign.

John Rassias is out of hospital now, but still weak. Let’s hope he will regain sufficient strength to start the Archbishop’s Commission in March, as scheduled. . . . Nancy Corindia is back in the hospital, debilitated by depression. Poor Tom! . . . Went to Lloyd Lee Wilson’s short course on Gospel Order: the Thursday night “demonstration” for the full community. No preparation at all. But the students spoke, hesitatingly, after a while. Mostly about gratitude, bonding, feeling good about Pendle Hill as a whole, and about Wilson. (Afterwards, Janeal told me that all this was totally contrary to what had happened in the course, where they’d been very “turned off” by Wilson.)

In Meeting, Wilson ministered, saying that we’re meant to be a leaven in society and that the leaven, as in the bread, needs to be “consumed.” This moved me to minister using Oscar Wilde’s prose poem that I’d read yesterday, “The Master.” A man is weeping and someone questions him. “I reached love, I cured a blind man, I raised a man from the dead, I was compassionate to the prostitute, I cleansed the temple . . .” “Why, then, are you weeping?” “They didn’t crucify me!” . . . Later, I heard that this had preoccupied the short course people in their final meeting. I wonder if they connected it with what Wilson said about the leaven. . . . Book Committee. Doug Gwyn and I, thank goodness, once again prevailed over Liz Kamphausen, this time to get a Yes for Paul Lacey’s book on education. We also accepted Margaret Hope Bacon’s on her experiences serving in a mental hospital where her husband was assigned as a CO. Beautifully written. . . . In the Board in the evening, Dan surprised me by telling everyone that I was naturally gregarious. Rebecca and I presented the review for publications. Afterwards, Henry Freeman, the consultant for fund raising, said how moved he was by my “passionate” attachment to Pendle Hill publications. . . . A new board member, Gay Berger, is clerk of the Kendal at Hudson board, so we had lots to exchange. After ice cream, music with Dan. We are gradually improving the Dello Joio.

Saturday, January 24, 1998

In the board’s executive session I raised the question of Dan’s retirement two and a half years from now. We should begin looking, discretely, for a successor. . . . More practice with him after lunch. What a lovely tonic music is after a full day of meetings. . . . For supper, a Greek meal at Margaret Fraser’s, cooked by Chrysanthi, complete with ouzo & retsina, avrolemono, pilaf, stifado, loukoumadhes. A man played guitar and sang folksongs. Then the Pendle Hill cook, who is from Costa Rica (and says that Amos’s Rara Avis is well known) sang impassioned songs beautifully. Very jolly. Nice to talk to Greg, Margaret's boyfriend, who is going blind and seems very serene nonetheless.

Sunday, January 25, 1998

Pots with Liz. Discovered that she's a Bryn Mawr grad. To Kendal for Meeting. 100+ people. Very good ministry, sparked by Jack Shepherd on the 139th Psalm. Mary Hoxie Jones said it was her father's birthday; he would have been 135. She told anecdotes, including one about his visit to the Gestapo in 1938 to try to help the Jews. They received him courteously, then left the room and kept the AFSC delegation waiting in silence. They returned after a time and said that they'd do what was requested (of course they did nothing). Lunch with her and Bob and Mary Metz afterwards. Then to Oliver and Dorothy Rodgers' to play music. Oliver is still busy on his project to discover the mathematical secrets of good violin tone, but his viola playing has deteriorated, alas. Still, we had nice Mendelssohn, Mozart, and Telemann.

Tuesday, January 27, 1998

Working with Jennifer Elam on her writing. She's the Cadbury Scholar, studying the relation between mystical religious experience and mental illness. Also with Charlie Randall, who has written some fine poems, and Marti Matthews, ditto. Last night I read Wilde's "The House of Judgment" at Epilogue (very few present) and today used it in ministry, emphasizing our need to be able to imagine the kingdom. This seems to have spoken to the condition of some, judging from comments afterwards. . . . More rehearsing with Dan. Then watched Clinton's State of the Union address on TV. He was dignified and well received despite all the accusations of adultery.

Thursday, January 29, 1998

Liz's tea on The Last Temptation was so crowded that we had to move to the library. Good discussion on the first assignment (pp. 1-65). All the right questions were asked. I had to restrain myself, not to explain everything at the start. My own re-reading has been pleasurable. I like the "thrust" I gave the English. But I'm also picking out a few typos and infelicities. The book jacket says: "200,000 copies sold." Oh, if only I had royalties!

Friday, January 30, 1998

A lovely supper in a Thai restaurant with Liz, Dan, and Chrysanthi. . . . Danny Danforth has submitted a “commentary” on Lambropoulos’s attack on ethnography, and I solicited a reply from Lambropoulos. This issue of JMGS should be lively.

Saturday, January 31, 1998

Daphne, Greg, and Christina arrived, the baby healthy and effusive now, with a big smile and a sense of humor. They slept in Brinton 21, and we had the whole of Brinton House to ourselves after the baby slept. Discussed application to nursery school. Daphne has already discovered that various schools seem to attract rich ladies in diamonds. At 4:00 Dan gave us a marvelous and unexpected “cream tea”: scones, clotted cream, jam, and really good Earl Grey in his parents’ silver tea-service. Reminiscent of the cream tea we had with Daphne and Greg in Chelsea two years ago. Dan recounted his contact with George Soros, who’d been helped by British Friends and gave money to AFSC for a time. Dan told me that Gregory looks like Gregory Peck. And what a beautiful baby and mother. Wow! What a family!

Sunday, February 1, 1998

Went with Daphne, Greg, and Christina to Longwood Gardens—lovely, as always. They left, before PH lunch, after buying sandwiches, coffee, and French fries at Springfield Mall. In the afternoon, Chrysanthi and I went to the Brandywine Museum to see the exhibit of N.C. Wyeth, Andrew Wyeth, and Jamie Wyeth, all illustrators, which is very different from true artists. Very disappointing, but the river is lovely. And so were landscapes of the Brandywine valley by other American artists, mostly nineteenth century. . . . Music with Dan after supper.

Tuesday, February 3, 1998

Long lunch with Kathryn Damiano, who had read my pamphlet on silence and wanted to talk to me about it. She is here to do “spiritual nurturing” and believes that silence—unbusyness—is a central part. She also helps people, especially older folks, cope with diminishment. We could perhaps bring her to Kendal.

Wednesday, February 4, 1998

I've been given a consultee, Laura Sherwin, who is here to direct the two youth programs in the summer. But she is just out of college (Earlham), inexperienced, and is frightened, indeed almost in panic. Also, she doesn't get paid, although she gets room and board. I fear for the program. She also feels uncomfortable being in community. In sum, everything is wrong. How can I help her?

Thursday, February 5, 1998

Talked to Denny O'Brien and Anne Butterheim about Laura. They're going to start her full-time stint now (with salary) and reduce her to half-time later. She's overjoyed. . . . Went to staff meeting. They discussed Dan's proposal for an extra hard look at tenure considerations in the fifth year. I told them how brevity of tenure was connected in the past with low salaries that made people leave of their own accord. But then they could get jobs elsewhere; now it's much harder. . . . At 5:00, Liz's meeting re: The Last Temptation. Another good discussion, much aided by Dan and also by Chris Ravndal's knowledge of the Bible. I explained the change from Son of the Carpenter to Son of Man. . . . After supper, to town (South Street) with Caroline Jones, Christopher Miller, and Annie Milman. We were supposed to go to a café that was to hold a poetry reading. It was closed. So we went to another café, had dessert and coffee, and listened to Caroline's and Chris's poems anyway. Very nice.

Friday, February 6, 1998

To town again for inoculations for Indonesia. Caught 45 minutes in traffic standstill owing to an accident, but arrived only one minute late. Very helpful nurse in Travel Medicine department of U. of P. hospital. We got hepatitis A, polio, and tetanus/diphtheria. . . . Then to Temple University for luncheon for Van Coufoudakis. But his plane was delayed, so we ate without him. Nice to see some old friends again. Van came eventually and gave a splendid talk on Cyprus, answering many questions afterwards. He told me he has horrendous problems at home (he's Dean of Faculty) because of his Provost. . . . Home quickly; a coffee in the Mall. Supper at Tom Jeniks's table, his 50th birthday: pot roast and cheesecake.

Saturday, February 7, 1998

To town yet again. To the Philadelphia Museum of Art. They have five Cézannes and some Manets. Also lots of Duchamps including the "Nude Descending Staircase,” and some Brancusi, including his lovely “Fish.” But Cy Twombly’s “Fifty Days at Iliam,” supposedly inspired by the Iliad, was revolting. . . . Put Chrysanthi on AMTRAK to go to Washington to babysit for Sophia for a week while Deanna is on tour with the orchestra. . . . Long tutorial again with Jennifer Elam, helping her set up chapters for her book. Ditto with Marti Matthews yesterday. And met Harvey Gilman, here (with his male “spouse”) to lead a course on Outreach. I spoke in Meeting yesterday about Cupitt and about Tillich’s Courage to Be, saying that now we need the courage to be without a supernatural personal God. Gilman rose afterwards and invoked Erich Fromm’s book The Courage to Be Imperfect saying that we imperfect creatures do need a friendly palpable God and cannot be always satisfied with Tillich’s God behind God. . . . Tonight, at Margaret’s party (Greg’s birthday), I had a chance to talk further with Harvey and also with Lisa Sutton, who seems very moved by The Last Temptation.

Sunday, February 8, 1998

To Swarthmore Meeting. They sing hymns before silent worship, not to my liking. The Meeting was poor: too much “ministry,” none of it religious, all of it moral. Nice however to see Paul Mangelsdorf and Mary Ellen Chijioki afterwards. Yet in the coffee hour not a single person came up to me to say Hello. That’s a failing of many Meetings, although I hope we do better in Hanover. . . . Drove to Princeton in the afternoon; nicely installed in Palmer House Room 36. Finished Don Cupitt’s After God: The Future of Religion, a wonderfully stimulating book, and one that greatly encourages us to believe that process theology and (liberal) Quakerism are right for today’s post-Darwinian world. He advocates the “philosophy of as-if.” God does not exist (except as a human construct) but we can still act as if he (she) existed, ordering our lives as though in response to “eternal” considerations. There is lots of Nietzsche behind all this and lots of Kierkegaard (the how rather than the what); they are our modern gurus. He also sees—provocatively—God and Mammon changing places, with God inspiring people to be divisive and violent and hateful, while Mammon, incarnated in international corporations, inspires people to cooperate across ethnic and linguistic and religious barriers! Mammon “wants peace and stability, progress and universal prosperity. By contrast, God (especially in the Middle East) appears to have become a Moloch who demands ignorance, poverty, and war”

(p. 122). . . . However, “To believe in God is to live as if under the eye of God, and to assess oneself and one’s world as from the standpoint of eternity” (p. 83). Amen.

Sunday, February 15, 1998

To Lia Bien Friedman’s daughter’s and son-in-law’s home in Bryn Mawr, where about fourteen were gathered, all cousins of sorts—Lia’s other daughter and husband and children, and her son and wife and children. Lia is Eddie Bien’s widow. We were reminded that Eddie died in Jakarta. Very jolly, extroverted lot. Older children in Germantown Friends School. Both husbands are physicians. Jonathan, the Bien son, is a banker, now unemployed (he worked for the Japanese bank that collapsed). They put on a sumptuous brunch: bagels and lox, etc. . . . Afterwards, went to Haverford College library—how lovely!—to get copies of the Kierkegaard anthology for my course.

Monday, February 16, 1998

Went with Liz’s class to the Quaker Collection in Swarthmore to see the original manuscript of Woolman’s Journal and travel diary. Very moving. Beautiful handwriting. Mary Ellen showed clear evidence of his change of style in the revision. Then we saw some scattered pages of George Fox’s very bad handwriting, almost indecipherable. They think he was dyslectic. . . . Met an interesting man, Ray Trethewey, from Sacramento. He knows Tsakopoulos. His mission, and work, is to convince cities to plant trees: the urban forest. He was evangelical in his conviction about the importance of this work. Another person, a pitch-black lady, is teaching a course on Islam this week. She’s jolly, with a beautiful smile. . . . At men’s group tonight we discussed sexuality. I confided what had happened after my operation. David talked about celibacy vs. promiscuity after a divorce. Mark recounted his affaire here—how satisfying it was. Tom grew hot about Pendle Hill’s “hypocrisy” in sexual matters and said that he thinks that Dan Seeger is a closeted gay and therefore so up tight about cohabitation. Mel told about his recent attraction to one of the ladies here. All very confidential. David asked me afterwards how I’ll argue when the trustees meet on Friday to develop a cohabitation policy. I said I’d probably be on the far left, certainly compared to Dan and probably also to Shirley. We’ll see . . .

Saturday, February 21, 1998

NYC

To Daphne's after washing pots with Dan following breakfast. Daphne announced that she's pregnant again. Due in September. I went to the Yale Club library, finished this week's assignment in The Last Temptation. What a good novel! I really like my English! Then I began the Benjy section of The Sound and the Fury, now very easy for me, and scintillating. I was so absorbed that I forgot the time and had to race back to Daphne's in a cab. To a French restaurant on 79th Street. Prix fixe dinner for $25 (cheap in New York). Very festive and special. Then to Lincoln Center to see O'Neill's Ah Wilderness, a splendid play about a rebellious teenager (O'Neill) reading Oscar Wilde, Ibsen, Nietzsche, in an up-tight upper middle class household in Connecticut ca. 1906. The ending is a bit disappointing (love conquers all difficulties), but all the rest is stirring drama. Very well acted and superbly directed. A treat.

Sunday, February 22, 1998

Bagels and lox for breakfast. Then with Christina to the zoo. She talks so fluently, repeating every word one says, even "elephant." And she understands everything. . . . The 84th Street apartment is still not ready, but it's getting close. Daphne hopes to have her kitchen by next Wednesday. After lunch, a quick tour of the Met with Chrysanthi: costumes (Gianni Verache) and impressionists, especially gorgeous Manets. Train back to Pendle Hill, Chrysanthi staying with Daphne until Wednesday. Two hours' practice with Dan. Continuing with the Benjy section of Faulkner.

Thursday, February 26, 1998

Chrysanthi cooked a Greek meal for the whole Pendle Hill community. I went out and bought tarama and dolmadhes for everyone, all most appreciated, and baklava. Then I introduced Zorba and we showed the film, followed by discussion. People seemed to like the film, although inevitably some of the women found it sexist.

Friday, February 27, 1998

My consultee Laura Sherman is a "sad sack." So agonized, so self-destructive. What a shame to see this in a 23-year-old. I feel helpless. She needs a magician, or maybe a trained psychoanalyst. . . . At lunch, accidentally met a professor at Ohio University, where John Baker's $1.3 million is apparently being squandered. This professor confirmed what I'd heard, alas.

Saturday, February 28, 1998

Drove to Gap, Intercourse, and Paradise on the way to Millersville to sup with Jack Monger. Intercourse very touristy. Tawdry stuff, although we liked the shoe-fly-pie and the fudge. Saw lots of Amish in buggies, children walking wearing their distinctive hats. Dinner with Jack, Marie, his new "partner" it seems, after Carol McCormack's death last year, and another couple (nice husband, φαφλατού wife) was lovely. Jack sculpts in wood very imaginatively. Showed us his "gallery," indoors and out.

Sunday, March 1, 1998

Walk around Jack's garden, very British. Then to Lancaster Meeting. 9:00 a.m. book discussion on Norman Mailer's The Gospel According to the Son, told by Jesus in first person. People read it out loud, by turn, and sometimes commented. Meeting for Worship began with a woman in a wheelchair (stroke victim) emoting in self-pity for twenty minutes, breaking repeatedly into tears and then recovering. But the remaining ministry was sane and fine. A large Meeting with lots of children, not afraid to talk about Jesus. . . . I gave the forum, my subject being Kierkegaard's aesthetic-ethical-religious. I called it "How to Be Happy." The emotive woman, who really needs to learn how to be happy, kept calling out "Hear! Hear!" Afterwards, numerous questions. Jack said that it sounded like poetry and gave us three small sculptures. . . . Drove to Princeton, stopping at a railroad museum on the way. At 8:00 met with two sweet post-docs, both women, both historians, over a beer in the Nassau Inn, where we're staying in an overheated room.

Monday, March 2, 1998

Princeton

Finished revising Lesson 11 with Dimitri and Mache. Then drove to Hightstown to Meadow Lakes to visit John C. Baker, age 102. He actually seemed stronger and healthier than when we last saw him at 101. Straight, lean, with perfect long- and short-term memory, good appetite. A bit hard of hearing and of sight, and very garrulous. But his long lucubrations always made sense (if you waited long enough). We stayed from 5:00 until 8:00, including supper. He greatly appreciates Dartmouth's Peace Studies program and also the materials I sent him recently. He will give us another $25,000, hoping we'll match it. (I was expecting more. Too bad!) Nice (and very long) stories about Andy Towl, President Lowell of Harvard, etc.

Thursday, March 5, 1998

Bethesda, Maryland

Drove to Bethesda with Dan Seeger and Chrysanthi to hear Leander and Ignat's all-Schubert concert at Strathmore Hall. Nice to see Randy Testa there, also Leander's student Steve, who turned pages. At 8:00 p.m. Leander and Ignat still had not arrived. They came at 8:10. It turned out that Leander had been on the toilet for an hour with diarrhea. But the concert went well, despite some page-turning confusion and Leander's forgetting one repeat. Long Schubert fantasias (not the great F minor one, however), with every repeat taken. The final group, six marches, was the best. But by this time the piano had gone out of tune. (Fortepiano, rebuilt Schubert-era instrument.) They played with energy, excellent ensemble, and great attention to dynamics. But Schubert is really not equal to Beethoven. . . . Afterwards, to Fridays on Rockville Pike for Ignat to have supper and us to have snacks. Dan and Ignat squaring off about contemporary music. Ignat hasn't done any CDs because the industry is in crisis, he says: decreasing sales, emphasis on the old war-horses, which he doesn't want to do. (He wants to do the Diabelli Variations or the Goldberg Variations, bless him!) . . . Chrysanthi went home with Leander; Dan and I drove to our motel in Laurel, Maryland. To bed at 1:30 a.m.

Friday, March 6, 1998

Breakfast at McDonald's, very tasty. Drove back to Pendle Hill in two hours with good conversation about Tuot, Dan's foster son, a Cambodian Buddhist, and his Cambodian Christian wife, and their jobs, and mother, and adjustment to the United States. . . . Consultation with Laura Sherwin at 1:30; she's still agonized with self-doubt. Spoke to Daphne. She has lost the baby! It just stopped growing at seven weeks. A blessing, says the doctor, since obviously there was a genetic defect. Daphne will have a D & C tomorrow. Given this development, she decided that she could, after all, go to Indonesia, but now she finds that the flights are all booked. She's on the waiting list. . . . Book Committee at 3:30. Board after supper. Then the usual ice cream, only Dan invited everyone to listen to us play #6 of the Brahms, the most difficult one, and we both made a horrible mess of it. . . . Letter from Andreas Yiannakos, who finally unearthed Chrysanthi's birth certificate and baptismal certificate from Terpni, birth listed of course as 10 May 1927 instead of 24 December 1933 because the Germans had to make her six years older in order to keep her in prison "legally." But the name is given as Γιαννακούδη instead of Γιαννακού. So that's the end of our long attempt to reestablish her as a Greek national, since Andreas says that we'd need to go to court in Serres to change the name back, at great expense, etc. This is surely something that Chrysanthi does not want to do, or to be reminded of.

Sunday, March 8, 1998

Leander, Deanna, and Sophia drove up from North Potomac, bringing Chrysanthi back. Sophia is so inert, especially compared to Christina. Very little life in her, very little vocabulary. Strange, since Leander is so demonstrative. Leander looked at the piano in Waysmeet and recommended buying a new one instead of trying to rehabilitate this one. Then he gave Dan and me a two-hour lesson, concentrating on the Brahms and Debussy. He's a splendid teacher. Details! Details!

My course in Faulkner and Kierkegaard started at supper. Good group, including a Presbyterian minister, Tim Gardner, who is a hospital chaplain in D.C. and is from an old Southern family. Bobbi Kelly is in the course, too. Peter Folger, my student at Harvard in 1983, is in, as is David Harris, Dartmouth Quaker student, now a pathologist in the South. I started with my mini-lecture "How to Be Happy," summarizing the Kierkegaardian aesthetic, ethical, and religious modes. Then we discussed Benjy.

Thursday, March 12, 1998

NYC

The course is going well. We finished Dilsey yesterday, spending the whole class on her and not getting to the Kierkegaardian religious mode. Chrysanthi and I rose at 6:00 a.m. and were in New York by 9:00. Breakfast at the Yale Club with John Rassias and "Dino," the postmaster of Norwich and a member of John's Commission. Chrysanthi to Daphne's. Good briefing by John of concerns regarding the Commission. Dino very nice; went through Greek school himself and learned nothing. . . . Then to Daphne's. Christina in fine mood. Their kitchen is finished, long and narrow but well designed, functional. The little office is also finished. . . . To the Archdiocese on 79th Street at 12:30. They told us that the Archbishop would be late because he had been in D.C. at the White House having breakfast with President Clinton. I chatted pleasantly with Vasos Papagapitos over glasses of champagne and hors d'oeuvres of shrimp—very grand. Then Spyridon entered. We all stood up. He's very young, tall statuesque in his robes, not fat (yet). Doesn't smile much; seems to have the weight of the world on his shoulders. He spoke well about the Commission's charge, also about Clinton's very professional handling of the morning's agenda, which was to issue a proclamation supporting March 25th. Said that Iakovos had done nothing to support education and thus he hopes to change previous policy. Said he'd heard about me from people at Hellenic College, probably Fr. Chryssavgis. Said he aims to "turn Hellenic College around." We then had a nice lunch served by waiters in tuxedos. Following this, Spyridon disappeared (lunch was preceded by the Lord's prayer in English) and a grace in Greek, and followed of course, monastery style, by the Archbishop rising and offering another prayer. We continued with a business meeting of the Commission, with John explaining how it would work. The Archdiocese's Director of Education expanded on the setup: how many schools, teachers, students, the textbooks used (mostly Loisos), the training of teachers, in Thessaloniki, he says. . . . Left at 3:30 with Dimitri Gondicas. Taxi to Penn Station. Met Chrysanthi there. Got back to Pendle Hill just in time for the evening session of my course, open to the entire community. Margaret Frasier came, and Liz Kamphausen, and several students. Afterwards, one of them came up and said I was a "master teacher"! Bobbi Kelly said the course was a perfect combination on "content" and "affect"—since this session and tomorrow's are devoted to how the students' personal lives interact with either Faulkner's material or Kierkegaard's, or both.

Final session of the course. They asked to continue over lunch. I think it was a success. Great fatigue afterwards. I guess I was sustained by adrenalin. But after supper I had to introduce the Scorsese film of The Last Temptation, screened at Davis House. I actually liked it. It didn't seem too long (it's 2¾ hours). I must revise my derogatory remarks. Good question period afterwards.

Haircut. Dr. Gerber said he preferred Dow Jones to Paula Jones! Out for supper with Evelyn Siegel's brother, Nick Schefer, and his wife Anne, a Freudian psychologist. Beautiful home next to a stream. I told Anne about Laura Sherwin and she felt sure that she could be helped by therapy; gave me a brochure that I'll pass on to Laura. Lots in common. She majored in music at Bryn Mawr. We both had Goodale. I told her about Swann, whom she did not have. It was good to unwind with Scotch and wine and a good dinner, after my course. . . . Earlier today Dan and I played a run-through for Liz and Chrysanthi. It went fairly well.

To Hanover

Last real practice with Dan. It's going better and better. Lovely talk on the telephone with Selen Ünsal, who'll tell her parents in Istanbul about Alec and Monica's visit. Also, she knows trustees and the president of Robert College, which interests Alec, I think. Dan drove in his car, I in mine, to 30th Street, where I parked. Then Dan delivered me to the airport, a lifesaver. I'm bringing a huge valise home to ease our congestion in the car when we return on March 31 (God willing). . . . There was a squirrel in our house last week. Mary Rassias called; thought an earthquake had hit it. Lamps overturned, all bibelots scattered, and it ate through the quilted window shade in the bedroom. Mary left doors and windows open, and it apparently exited after about three days' captivity. With luck a cleaning lady set things right by yesterday.

Hanover

The house is fine, except for the quilted shade by my desk—eaten through. And one Ritsos stone carving seems to be missing. But entering it after such a long absence, I felt that we are so much better off in three rooms, as at Pendle Hill. The accumulated junk in the house—no, not junk, of course, but yet it all is so unnecessary. Depresses me. Huge box of mail awaiting, plus another huge box at the office. To Mother. Found her sitting outside of the dining room, next to Richard Eberhart, holding hands. Afterwards, she told me, "He has a crush on me." "Do you like that?" I asked. "No." "Does he annoy you?" "No, he doesn't annoy me." Ate lunch with Mother (Richard always sits by himself). Hard to make conversation, but we did exchange maybe twenty sentences. She's still quite corpus mentis, remembers people, etc. Afterwards, I gathered together her IRS documents (in the pile of unopened mail) and took everything to Frank Currier along with my tax documents and also, for the first time, those of the Terpni Partnership. Its income, about $2000, was nicely balanced by its expenses, about $2300, so there will be no tax to pay.

Hanover

To Lyme Inn for Kendal Board retreat. Going in, I felt that my time on the Board should end, that I'm losing interest. But the presentations in the morning and discussion in the afternoon were so interesting, I wonder if I shouldn't stay on. A dilemma. John Diffey presented a new "Shared Services" fee plan, very poorly written, and totally unsatisfactory to us. He had egg all over his face, since he wasn't even very familiar with the document (written, it seems, by Bill Yost). So, we got nowhere on this issue. But we did have some good ideas regarding possible charitable outreach by Kendal. . . . Flew to New York late. Overnight in the Yale Club. The "retreat" was disappointing because only half of it (the morning) was really a retreat; the rest was business.

NYC

Lunch at the Harvard Club with "T" Jewett, who in effect was interviewing me, I suppose, for a position on the American Farm School Board of Trustees. It was a cordial encounter and the result was positive; she said she'd put me up for a vote at the May meeting. The October meeting will be in Greece. I told her I was interested in, and somewhat experienced in, board functioning. She intimated that they have difficulty: old timers who run the show. We'll see . . .

Pendle Hill

A busy day. At 11:30 I read my "How to Be Happy" paper to a large audience—the three Kierkegaardian modes. People seemed very interested and appreciative. Then at 3:30 Dan and I performed! Brahms, Debussy, Dello Joio, and Schumann's "Träumerei" as an encore. I was very nervous, shaking more in the foot than the hand (at least). Played some of the waltzes well enough, but lost my place in the one with the triplets and had to "invent." But all in all it was "acceptable" (for amateurs), I suppose. The piece in seven sharps brought gasps and Bravi. . . . At 7:30 a lovely "Meeting for Learning" with everyone in a large circle in the candlelit barn, worship-sharing mode. I felt very privileged to be part of this community.

Friday, March 20, 1998

Packing. Saying goodbyes. Washing pots with Dan. A good Meeting for Worship. At night, "Log Night," including a skit about my yellow gloves, which were transmogrified into a huge bow-tie. Laughter all around.

Philadelphia–New York–London

Dan drove us to the airport. Bad start. Plane delayed. Confusion. All other flights booked. Then they wanted to send us to JFK by limousine, with little chance of arriving in time. Finally the plane arrived. We got to JFK too late for the 7:50 Air France flight. Air France couldn't rebook us until Wednesday. Luckily, I called American Airlines, responsible for the delay, and they booked us free of charge to Paris via London. Then there was the question of our suitcase, booked to go on Air France. The Air France office was due to close at 9:00. No bag. Then luckily they advanced the closing to 9:30. At about 9:15 they found our suitcase. More vicissitudes to get to the American terminal. Still more exchanging our Air France ticket for an AA ticket. But we flew successfully to Heathrow.

Jakarta, Indonesia

Sunday: Heathrow to Charles de Gaulle. How nice to find our valise again. Then Air France to Jakarta via Singapore, 16 hours. Singapore airport is so beautiful, with indoor gardens. Alec and Monica and Leander met us at the Jakarta airport, new since I was here in 1990, and quite beautiful. Also a new road. We drove to the Omni Batavia Hotel, built by the Dutch, newly restored and quite resplendent. An arrow on the ceiling of our room points toward Mecca, so Muslims will be able to orient themselves correctly when they pray. Monica radiant and beautiful. Alec evidently very excited about the forthcoming events. Yesterday he and Leander spent a day at the beach, a five-hour trip across the island, to the south coast: the Indian Ocean, over scary roads, through villages with scores of men just squatting by the roadside, idle and unemployed, with that oriental inertia and placidity that one sees (or at least used to see) also in Greece. A lovely dinner at the hotel, and amazingly cheap: about $25 for all five of us, including drinks, soup, hors d'oeuvres, entrée, dessert, coffee. And an orchestra came over and played at our table: popular songs requested by Monica and Alec. We spoke about Rev. Haskin and the sort of marriage counseling they'd received. I asked Monica if she and her parents had spoken frankly about the likelihood that she will leave Indonesia. They had. Like Chrysanthi's parents, they will be happy if their daughter is happy. How nice! . . . We unpacked, showered (it's between 90 and 95 here), watched CNN on television, and slept at 11:00 p.m. without feeling any appreciable jet lag, thanks to "feast-fast."

Jakarta

Sumptuous breakfast at the hotel. Then Alec's driver, Rico, picked us up. Long ride on the ring road to NJIS. Meeting with Michael Doughty, headmaster, and Larry Balli, the school's founder, plus lots of other teachers, secretaries, etc. "Alec's mother and father!" or, more properly, "Mr. Bien's mother and father." Students in their uniforms: blue shirts and khaki pants. All races, colors, shapes, sizes. Visited various classes. They seem to use the progressive method mostly, with students working in teams and teachers circulating. Only once did we see the traditional method, with the teacher "lecturing" in ESC class about the definite article, and it seemed sterile and fruitless. Alec appears to know each and every student by name, and many parents. One parent came to the office and presented him with two gold wedding rings. . . . Michael and Larry took us out to lunch at a nearby mall, very fancy, with the business manager and the chair of the board. Explained their fear that in June they may lose 200 students, which will mean breaking teachers' contracts. Already they are not replacing teachers who decide to leave. However, Larry especially says he believes in this country. It has every resource, immense wealth, potentiality. He just bought a car at a ridiculously low price and is building a house similarly. They hope to build a new school on adjacent land, a school for Indonesians, especially those who are returning from abroad. Of course the government has to change its present policy. The prohibition against Indonesians attending the foreign international schools derives, apparently, from the government's fear that 80% of the places will be taken by the Chinese-Indonesian minority. Larry says they'd have to impose quotas and give scholarships to lower this enrollment to about 50% (the Chinese are only 5% of the population). In any case, if the school gets built, Larry says that Alec would be the ideal headmaster. So, obviously, some plans are already being developed to bring Alec and Monica back. . . . After lunch, we circulated to various schoolrooms participating in the science Olympics—projects in which teams of students competed, for example to build the tallest tower with toothpicks and jellybeans (teaching them triangulation and not to eat the jellybeans). Best of all, we went to a class learning gamelan and were invited to participate. So, for  $\frac{3}{4}$  of an hour we banged the proper chimes on one for the gamelan instruments, guided by a native instructor. Whereas our music (and life) has a beginning, middle, and end, the gamelan music seems to go nowhere, perhaps round and round, repeating and repeating and repeating, until (in a way) exhausted. It was fascinating to do this with the instructor showing what to strike, and how many repetitions. . . . School ended at 3:00, and eventually Alec took us to his apartment nearby, a new complex with tennis courts, a pool, fitness center, air conditioning—very nice. Leander was there, working on his composition. He'd had diarrhea and vomiting last night, owing to mussels eaten at the hotel. But now seemed better. At 6:00 we left for downtown, a long ride with crazy traffic—cars and trucks of all sizes, motorcycles darting in and out. No traffic lights, no lanes. But we managed. Finally arrived at the World Trade Center, very new, posh, and Western. Monica came with her mother, young and chic, but doesn't speak English. Up to 18th floor to the fancy Athletic Club, all paneling and ostentatious wealth, with a view of the whole city. We were guests of an Indian family with two boys in the school, a 3rd grader and a 6th grader. The father is in the export business, exporting to Africa. He had been in Kobe, Japan, for 15 years; left a few months before the earthquake. They like Jakarta very much and idolize Alec, whom they say sets the entire tone of the school, filling it with love. After drinks, we all drove to the Hotel Sahid Jaya, where I'd eaten on my 1990 trip, again to the 18th floor, to the Shah Jahan Indian restaurant. Gorgeous décor, waiters in traditional dress, etc. Our host ordered a huge dinner of traditional appetizers, then chicken and lamb curry, drinks made with yoghurt, etc., and ending with a chocolate cake with writing in confectionary: "Well came [sic] to Professor and Mrs. Bien"! Hugs and kisses all around, multiple thank yous. Back to the hotel at 10:30, stuffed and very tired.

Jakarta

Slept quite normally last night, whereas the night before we were both awake at 1:00 a.m. and restless from then until 7:00. Last night just like home; jet lag is over. . . . Rico the faithful driver picked us up. First stop: maritime museum, very dilapidated, in a huge warehouse-type building constructed I think by the Dutch. Models of boats, photos of the old Batavia. Actual canoes, maps, stuffed fish. Pictures of the slave or quasi-slave labor employed by the Dutch: the clove trade and nutmeg trade (these were the “Spice Islands”). Various reminders of the Dutch East India Company, here from the 1600s until 1945. They had a monopoly on tea until around 1815; all British tea had to be purchased at their auctions in London. What have they left here? Canals, and bitterness. . . . Then Rico drove us out along the quay where dozens of small ships were moored, all loaded with sawn lumber. In each case, scores of men, like coolies, were unloading the boards two at a time carried on their shoulder, with padding beneath, over boards serving as precarious gangplanks, and placing them in trucks. And this in the 95-degree heat and sunlight of mid-morning. Poor souls! No fork-lift trucks here. . . . Then downtown to the National Museum, a Greek-style building very poorly maintained, but filled with Buddhas, Shivas, rich textile, pottery, etc. Most interesting are the models of village-style houses, ungainly monstrous birdlike things on stilts. The museum was filled with schoolchildren in uniform, a group of which tried out their English on us and then insisted that we pose with them for a photo. Beautiful, smiling faces. The artifacts are primitive; none of the glory of the old Greek art or the delicacy of the Japanese. . . . Back to the hotel. Chrysanthi went off shopping with “Mary” for the school. I spent the afternoon in the hotel, after a sumptuous lunch. I’m reading galley proofs for JMGS 16/1. And yesterday an e-mail from a contributor reached me here (!), sent by Ann Fenton in the English Department. . . . Alec came and we went downtown again to a sumptuous hotel for the March 25th reception hosted by the Greek ambassador. On the receiving line, parents of a student in NJIS, very familiar. Lots of good food. Another world. People of all nations, very sophisticated, in the midst of squalor. Met the Consul General, who’s been in Indonesia since 1940. I asked why. He told me, “When Mussolini invaded, I decided it was a good time to leave.” So he avoided the το έπος της Αλβανίας, την Κατοχή, civil war, and Junta, but was interned here for two years by the Japanese, a horrible experience, he told us. . . . Then to Café Batavia for supper with Monica, very fancy. Western-type restaurant two blocks from the hotel. Walked back, crossing the fetid canal, reeking of sewage. A world of contrasts. Oh, in the Café Batavia, a birthday cake for Leander. But he has diarrhea, so wasn’t too interested.

Thursday, March 26, 1998

Leander is now at the hotel. Leisurely breakfast. He told us that Mary Watt asked him to lead the chamber workshop. Temptation, if it weren't for his old nemesis, Jerry Bidlack. He hopes that Ignat will join the faculty of the piano workshop. . . . With Alec, across the city to a village-like neighborhood and, unbelievably, a store specializing in pearls. Chrysanthi bought a string of cultured pearls for herself and another for Daphne. Total price, with the clasps, about $40! . . . Lunch at the Hilton Hotel on the way back. Another gorgeous spot, full of palm trees, like Hawaii. But back at the hotel, after calling Air France to confirm our return flights, I discovered that I was missing the tickets for AFO06, Paris to New York. They must have been taken by mistake in New York or Paris. Desperation. Telephone to Air France office. Faxes to them of the tickets in our possession plus the itinerary issued by the travel agent. The lady will tel-ex NYC and try to get authorization to reissue the tickets. What a mess! I must be losing my hold. I'm ordinarily so careful about such things. . . . Also, we discovered that Alec had the wrong information about the Busecks' arrival yesterday. Rico waited for them in the airport for four hours. And we cancelled one trip today to the tea plantations, not knowing when they'd come. Now we learned that there is no plane from Seoul on Wednesday. They were meant to arrive today, all along. So, another driver is there waiting for them. And we went off to NJIS to see the school's talent show. "Not much talent," as Leander remarked later. 90% of the participants were girls, dancing—mostly rock and roll—but one little girl, the daughter of an Australian teacher, did ballet. Some comedy skits, very poor violin playing, mediocre piano, etc. And one tiny tot, in kindergarten, I think, belted out a song from a Broadway musical. Cute children. Most embarrassing was the staff person who sang a song about Jesus. She's a born-again fanatic and insensitive to the multi-religious nature of the school. Alec says that her contract was not renewed. When reprimanded for proselytizing in school, she told Alec, "Who should I listen to, you or God?" Afterwards, Larry Belli introduced me to an Indonesian gentleman married to a Spaniard, whose three boys opened the program with a rock band. Poor parents, if they practice at home! The man is in the Assembly and is one of the negotiators with the IMF. I suggested to Larry and to next year's principal designate that they ask the Indonesian staff, also, to perform, applying Quaker principles of equality. . . . Afterwards, we gathered Alec's belongings from his apartment, including the wedding certificate, and all returned to the hotel, where we found the Busecks, newly arrived from Korea. Long supper, and bed, with continued worry about my lost tickets. (Earlier, I'd asked the Hanover travel agency to fax its copies of the missing tickets.)

Friday, March 27, 1998

Good news from Air France. They'd agreed to restore my ticket for a $75 penalty per person. Rico drove everyone first to the Air France office, where Alec and I met "Ya-ya," the woman who had helped me, and secured, thankfully, the missing coupons. Then to the church where we'll rehearse later, and across the way to a huge department store whose fourth floor is devoted exclusively to Indonesian handicrafts: batik, leather, wicker, woodcarvings, silver work. I bought a wood carving of Hindu gods, a little jewelry box for Chrysanthi in silver filigree, and a batik tie for myself to wear tonight. Ridiculously cheap prices. The tie, for example, cost about $6.00. A quick meal in the food hall in the basement, like Union Station, with fast food stalls of all kinds, bursting with people. Then back to the church. Rev. Haskin is a lively 70-year-old. Met Monica's father, wiry, very Chinese-looking; brother Edwin, who is art director for an advertising firm; sister Fiona, in 9th grade, and an uncle. It's frustrating not being able to talk to Monica's parents, but Edwin has very good English. Also present was "Bob," leader of the brass band that will perform. Leander tried out his Ravel, his own piece, "Pastiche," and is very unhappy about the lousy un-tuned piano. Haskin put us through an hour and a half's exhaustive rehearsal, with pelting rain outside. Let's hope it doesn't rain tomorrow. Finally, back to the hotel driven by Rico in one of the NJIS vans. Along the way, Monica told us that workers in the Eveready Battery factory here earn just over $1.00 a day. . . . Exhausted, probably from nerves mostly, napped. Then dressed for the rehearsal dinner. About 30-40 people in a private dining room in the hotel. Chinese food, elegantly served. Our group: Chrysanthi, me, Alec, Leander, Alice and Peter Buseck. Their group: grandmother, Mrs. Dewi, 7 siblings with spouses and some with children, Fiona, Edwin, father and mother, some of father's relatives, an aunt from Melbourne, someone from Borneo, Alec's friend, an American who is now principal of the Pakistan School in Jakarta, Dr. Haskin and wife. I sat between Haskin and Monica's uncle Lukas Widjajanto, who deals in laboratory instruments and chemicals and has traveled to the US. On Haskin's other side, another uncle, Goenedi Hadiwidjaja, a stock broker, very interested in the fact that Greg works for Goldman Sachs. Haskin delivered a long grace in Indonesian. Leander made a good speech, translated by Haskin. I, jokingly, remarked at one point that the translation seemed twice as long as the original. He spoke of the high-rise office blocs and hotel in Jakarta as representing know-how and sophistication, whereas the poorer sections represent stability, endurance, acceptance, and he praised Monica for embodying both virtues. Afterwards he told me that he had planned nothing; it was all improvised on the spot. I felt relieved that, although having made speeches and lectures all my working life, I didn't need to do so any more. Uncle Lukas also spoke at some length, translated by Alec. Haskin told me his "history": how he and his wife came here in 1962, I believe, after finishing a D.D. and being ordained into the Presbyterian ministry. Ever since he has enjoyed being "a big fish in a small pond." Now they're thinking of retiring back to America. I told them about the CCRC concept and promised to send full information after I return to Hanover. Monica was beautiful in a fancy silk gown and scarf. All in all, a relaxed, pleasant occasion, with enough interchange despite the linguistic barriers. But in the room afterwards Chrysanthi was obviously in a bad mood and I finally got her to voice her disturbance: "All those Chinese!" Yes, it would be nice if, as with Greg's mother and family, we could have better connections with in-laws in Leander's case, and now in Alec's. But the important thing, obviously is not that at all, but the long-term compatibility and happiness of the couple. . . . At 11:00 p.m. we men went to the bar for a beer, and then wearily to bed.

Saturday, March 28, 1998, Alec's wedding

At breakfast, Monica's father sat with us for a bit, and we learned, with Alec as translator, that the family has been in Indonesia for 14 generations. Yet they're still considered an alien minority, and there has been no intermarriage. Alec reminded us that the cleavage is more Christian–Moslem than Chinese–Indonesian. Some of the family are thinking of emigrating, but the father is conservatively attached to Pentalongon and determined to stay, regardless. Alec said that they have no insurance. If their drug store is burned down or looted, they'll be ruined. Already there was an attempt at arson, but the father was present and able to control the fire in time. Now, out of fear, they no longer sleep in the same building as the store, leaving the business all the more vulnerable to harm. . . . This was a long, exhausting, meaningful day. After lunch we all paraded to Monica's room, where she was with her parents and family. Alec knocked ceremoniously three times and the door opened, accepting the groom. There was Monica, resplendent in her wedding dress, train, and veil. Then the large wedding party was transported, again by NJIS vans, driven by Rico and another, to the church. In the vestibule, the civil ceremony took place. Alec and Monica sitting at a table, with Leander on one side and Edwin on the other, facing a woman judge. She orated at length, had them sign various papers, had us sign them, too, and after half an hour or so pronounced them man and wife by civil law. By this time, the church had begun to fill up. I helped arrange the certificate on its table; we had to paste it down with masking tape to overcome its curl. Right on time, at 4:00 p.m., the service began, with us parading down the aisle and sitting in the first row. A full brass ensemble then played a rousing wedding march for Monica on her father's arm. The service was excellent, about one and a half hour long, partly because everything had to be said in two languages. A student choir from the Christian university sang beautiful anthems. Leander played Ravel, and then a "Pastiche" specifically composed for the wedding. There was a Quaker silence, admirably introduced by Rev. Haskin. I ministered on the meeting of east and west, doing vs. being, music that goes somewhere vs. music (e.g. gamelan) that seems to struggle to no nowhere, creating a steady-state. It's silly, I concluded, to think that Monica will display the Eastern qualities, Alec the Western. Each of us combines east and west, just as we combine male and female, in varying proportions. Yet this is a meeting of east and west. Let's hope that Alec and Monica, each of whom, when alone, is incomplete (as all of us are) will combine to form a completeness of east and west. . . . One of the most moving moments in the ceremony was the "Honoring of Parents." Alec and Monica first embraced her father and mother, then Chrysanthi and me, with plentiful tears flowing. At the end of the ceremony, with the brass sounding the wedding march again, all the principals had to stand in a receiving line at the back of the church, shaking the hand of everyone who exited (after signing the Quaker certificate). Along came Marianna Kotopo, our old acquaintance from Woodbrooke. And of course many NJIS teachers whom we knew, and that Indian who had hosted us, and Michael Doughty and Larry Belli, and Alec's old roommate, Andy, from 1990, with his Indonesian wife. Rev. Haskin, afterward, told me that this was the best wedding he'd conducted in his entire thirty-odd years in Jakarta. Why? I wonder. Maybe because of the music, and/or his respect for Alec. . . . Rico drove us back to the hotel. A quick wash, and then to the ballroom. Hordes of people, about 500, I believe. More photos—photos—photos. Alec, Monica, Chrysanthi, I, and Monica's parents on the dais for the opening toast. Then cutting the cake. Then a toast by Leander. Then food. The people rushed to the tables. Alec had invited all the NJIS staff: drivers, cafeteria workers and the like among others. I got engaged in so many conversations, when I finally got a place all the food was gone: only a little rice left. But I had a beer. More singing from the college choir, very secular now. At around 10:00 o'clock everyone had left. A great festivity, filled with gentle, graceful people. Too bad that Daphne couldn't have come. . . . Finally, very tired, back to the room: to pack for tomorrow, and sleep.

Singapore

Up at 5:45 a.m. Everyone down for early breakfast. Rico drove us all again to the airport: Leander, Alec, Monica, her parents, two uncles. Hugs, goodbyes. Will we ever see them again? Unlikely. But Edwin, Monica's brother, says he'll come in July. . . . Routine flight to Singapore. Taxi to Raffles Hotel, the famous place that hosted Conrad, Kipling, etc. We decided to walk a bit. But the heat and sun were oppressive, so we took refuge in a huge air-conditioned mall. Singapore is antiseptically clean. We saw a street cleaner removing two little twigs from the gutter with a pair of calipers. But there is a certain sterility in all this modern perfection. At 3:00 we returned to Raffles, drenched in sweat. Jasmyn Chelich was waiting for us. She's a great talker, about her psychological counseling, about Singapore's history and politics, about joint acquaintances from Woodbrooke. At 4:00 we went to the famous Raffles tearoom for high tea, and were joined by Jennifer Lien, a Dartmouth grad who is now a journalist in Singapore. Wonderful spread of savories and sweets, all elegantly served. Jennifer is flourishing—just received an award for "best younger journalist of the year." Her specialty is electronics, especially computing. Afterwards, Jasmyn took us to the Anglican cathedral where her father had been head deacon. A service was just finishing. Nice to see the cathedral so full and lively. She introduced us to her friends the bishop and archbishop in their regalia. All Chinese, of course. Then she left us and Jennifer took us in the modern, immaculate subway to Orchard Road, the chief shopping street. Spectacularly beautiful because lined with native trees. Teeming rain began, but Jennifer knew a place to get a taxi without going outdoors. Long queue, but finally we were returned to the airport. Leander took a shower; I was led thoroughly through this airport that caters to one's every need. Boarded Air France 257 at 10:00 p.m., very very tired.

Paris–New York–Philadelphia

Routine flights. Enough time in Charles de Gaulle Airport to have a good croissant and real French coffee and to buy Chrysanthi some face cream. Also leisurely switch at JFK to American Eagle. What a difference from the trip from Philadelphia. Went to visit Dan after supper. Hospitable as always, he offered tea, and cheese and crackers. Long description of our adventures. He also gave me the video from our performance. Nice to see others at Pendle Hill, too. Everyone very welcoming.

Tuesday, March 31, 1998

Pendle Hill–Hanover

Slept well. Amazingly, no jet lag. Drove home in eight hours, delivering the electronic piano upon arrival. Supper in Murphy's, full of students, very noisy. Piles of mail again. Met Erica Thrall in Sanborn. I'm still "Professor Bien" to one or two students. Not for long, though.

Wednesday, April 1, 1998

Lunch with John. He's planning the Commission's first meeting in Boston at the end of May. . . . My proposal for a Berlin conference next October was accepted. Should I go? Not clear. But it's a chance to see Berlin, I suppose. . . . Supper with Mother, who looked well, was at her best mentally: well aware of the wedding. Lots of people greeted us merrily at Kendal.

Thursday, April 2, 1998

I started my ILEAD class on Ulysses. Class overbooked. Includes Tom and Nardi Champion, Leonard Kent, Dr. Barrett, Mrs. Broehl. We did introduction and Telemachus, right on schedule. I had to explain laboriously what Joyce means by asserting that we are all usurped, existentially.

Friday, April 3, 1998

To Providence, Marriott Hotel

Drove to Providence for the "Consortium of Language Teaching and Learning" conference. Again in a hotel! This is rather pleasant. Peter Patrikis, head of the Consortium, is very effective as a discussion leader. He's a Harvard Ph.D. in comparative literature who couldn't get a teaching job and luckily found this. People from Columbia, Brown, Chicago, Cornell, Queens, Princeton, and Dartmouth. Each described what we do. Then a lavish dinner. Good to have a chance to talk more with Dimitri Gondicas.

Saturday, April 4, 1998

Providence

Another full day of discussion about resources for teaching Greek. I stressed the need for a web site. Another lavish dinner. Kazazis and I talked at length. This ultra-humorous man is (as is often the case) a very sad man. Disastrous first marriage. Two daughters, one of whom refuses to speak to him. He considers himself a failure. Sad.

Sunday, April 5, 1998

Providence-Hanover

Easy drive home. We're worried about an obvious leak in the drain pipe from the upstairs toilet.

Monday, April 6, 1998

My annual physical with Dr. Gerber. Very healthy, except for cholesterol. He wants me to consider taking pills that may cause hepatitis. . . . Plumbers here to fix the pipe, which needs to be replaced. Luckily, it's accessible from outside on the back porch. . . . Trying to get permission from Kedros for Ricks's essay on Sachtouris. He got angry at me (again) and I felt (again) that I ought really to give up the journal. Enough is enough. And Dan Seeger called, urging me to complete the sexuality queries, needed for the Pendle Hill personnel committee Friday week. And Lewis Owens needs a recommendation. And Dia needs an update for her census. And Dartmouth wants me to write to a Cypriot student who has been accepted. And the Arsenault family telephoned from Johnsbury: Cara is accepted to Dartmouth and can't decide between it and Middlebury. They're coming next week. I need to arrange classes for her, etc. And Susan Kogan pulled out from the May 9 Webster concert, the bitch! And I've secured a performance of a ragtime band at Kendal in June, thanks to the Hop. And . . . and . . . Telephoned Christos in Athens: Where is the translation of my Καπετάν Μιχάλης essay? He said it was mailed επείγων, but so far it has not come.

Wednesday, April 8, 1998

Resumed music with Dick and Allan. Mozart, Bach, Bridges, Haydn. Last night John came and we wrote the Commission questionnaire and one Μια ματιά for the Greek book.

Thursday, April 9, 1998

Second ILEAD class. We did Nestor and Proteus. A long time, again, talking about usurpation.

Saturday, April 11, 1998

Daphne, Greg, and Christina are here. Greg flies off to Hong Kong tomorrow. We went to Helene Rassias's pre-baptism party for her son Matthew, age two months and so tiny. What a miracle that she was able to bring this child to term, thanks to in-vitro fertilization.

Western–Eastern. Very strong meeting for worship. One ministry spoke of Christ's despair at Eli Eli lama sabachthani. I ministered, saying that this constitutes a necessary precursor to the reaffirmation that came with Τετέλεσται. Sophistry, perhaps. But how “authentic” it is that the Gospel includes the cry of despair, and in Aramaic? Sarah Putnam, our clerk, was so moved by the Meeting that she could barely speak afterwards when she needed to make announcements. She extended a warm welcome to me (Chrysanthi stayed at home, cooking lamb for our Easter dinner). The Muncks came for dinner and Dick Williamson and his lady friend from New Jersey, Susan (who is strange), and of course the Tebbes, including Christina, who behaved well.

John Hennessey and Margery Walker took me to lunch to discuss whether or not I'd continue on the Kendal board. I decided to end my service, after about fifteen years. So my last meeting will be in June. If I'm elected to the American Farm School board I'll want to do that with vigor, but not be overloaded. And I believe in Quaker rotation of responsibility. . . . The Arsenault family is here from Johnsbury. Cara has been accepted in Dartmouth and Middlebury and is trying to decide. Gene, the father, is the banker, a native, son of the electrician who died so tragically in his burning truck. Never went to college. The wife is an import, more sophisticated. Gene surprised me by saying how grateful he is for the “flatlanders” who have settled in North Creek and that they never would have had all the present development without these newcomers. We had the family to dinner. I’ve set up various meetings, classes, etc., for Cara.

Tuesday, April 14, 1998

An American Farm School trustee telephoned. Barbara Barnes (ex Putney School head) recommended Alec to them for headmaster. So we faxed Alec to send his résumé. The trustee is going to arrange an interview with George Draper and a Greek trustee when Alec is in Thessaloniki on April 20th. What a pleasure it would be if he got this job! . . . Worked with John for several hours improving the questionnaire that the Commission will send out to teachers, students, and parents. . . . To Kendal to have supper with Beveridge, Franny, Michael Webster, and Mother. Bev looks terrible. His left eye is inflamed. Franny’s stroke has destroyed her memory. Michael has cleaned out their apartment. They’re both in the health center. So sad.

Wednesday, April 15, 1998

Met with Lynda Boose and Leonard Rieser to try to understand how to deal with Michael Mastanduno, head of the Dickey Center, regarding the War/Peace endowment. Leonard suggested that I ask John Baker to write a letter stating his expectation that the endowment be used for courses, for curricular development, precisely what Mastanduno refuses to do. Nice to see Leonard again. He says that we all must have supper together.

April 16, 1998

To Pendle Hill

Taught ILEAD (Calypso, Lotus Eaters, Hades) and rushed to Manchester Airport. At Pendle Hill, immediately to Dan’s to play Schubert, Mozart, and Samuel Barber. I felt truly “at home,” entering Pendle Hill again. Nice to see so many familiar faces and be greeted so warmly by various people.

Pendle Hill

I’m writing this in the Springfield Mall, eating ice cream at the end of a long, busy day. Good talk with David at breakfast. He said that the offering on gossip has been interpreted by several women as anti-feminist. Alas, alack! . . . Cadbury Scholarship Committee at 10:30. We chose Patricia Loring, an easy choice over the two others. . . . Publication Committee 12:00 to 3:00. We chose one of the three: Lucy Medner's on Quakers and death, reworked the third time. In some free time I wrote a letter to Daniel Carson vetting his new play, which is still pretty weak (poor fellow), but I couldn't say that, and tried to encourage him. Supper with Glen Hinson, author of the Steere biography, and Nancy Strong. Book signing afterward. Then we all drove to the Quadrangle to honor Dorothy Steere and Douglas's memory. Dan spoke, then I reminisced about Douglas's tough grading of my Kierkegaard paper, his cell groups, the breakfast that Alec attended, Alec's help in taking them to the Quadrangle, and Dorothy making all the decisions. Then I read from "On Listening to Another" as an example of Douglas's best style, which combined anecdote with abstraction. Hinson spoke at length about writing the biography. Mary Hoxie Jones reminisced. And Dorothy spoke well about their life together. All this was then completed by a song, a round, with words honoring Dorothy. A very moving exercise.

More piano with Dan last night. "Our" Schubert and Barber, which is meant to go very fast, alas, and then some more Schubert, sight-reading. Long leisurely supper last night with Caroline Jones and Doug Gwyn, in the middle of which Jan Greene presented me with yellow rubber gloves, to replace those "purloined" last term in order to be converted into a bowtie. . . . This morning in Meeting I ministered again, beginning with Larry Ingle's projected book on Nixon as Quaker, then recounting the extraordinary egotism of Lyndon Johnson when I was at the White House, and contrasting this self-importance with the atmosphere of Quaker Meeting, where we hope to "be moved" rather than to move, and to sense our infinitesimal role as pawns in the great chess game played by God. This was then taken up by Marti Matthews, who spoke of the humility of Pope John XXIII, and by Chris Ravndal, who spoke of the less hierarchical and egotistical role of teachers in the Pendle Hill style "meeting for learning." A good, centered Meeting. . . . Then drove Larry Ingle to the airport and continued on to Princeton. I'm in Room 40 at Palmer House, way in the back, with toilet in the hall, but I view the huge, very green lawn out the window. To Joseph Henry House for Greek Easter: lamb and goat on the spit, wine, potatoes, tar-amosalata, etc. The Fagles were there, and Mike and Mary, and Tasoula Karakasidou, and 50 to 75 others. Spoke at length with Mike about Alec's candidacy for the American Farm School directorship. Apparently this search is still wide open, since the two top candidates they produced in phase one of the search are not acceptable to everyone. Alec's interview with George Draper should be tomorrow. Fingers crossed.

Dimitri and I went over lessons 11 and 12 yet again. Δεν έχει τελειωμό! Mike Keeley is very solicitous regarding Alec; wants to be kept up to date so that he can report accurately to the AFS board when it meets in May.

Wednesday, April 22, 1998

David Ricks and Mike Keeley read various translations of Cavafy poems, with commentary. Very effectively. But I wish they'd read mine of "31 B.C. in Alexandria."

Hanover

Alec reports that he is not interested in the AFS headmastership because it will involve him in fundraising and dealing with trustees, not in day-to-day contact with students or with involvement in curriculum—the aspects that he fancies. So that's the end of that. . . . I gave the inaugural lecture for the Dartmouth Hellenic Society, repeating my "Inventing Greece." Debate afterwards about the virtues or evils of nationalism. Not a word, strangely, about what I said regarding the Church.

Friday, April 24, 1998

Howard Wriggins, former US Ambassador to Sri Lanka, and his wife Sally took me out to supper in order to talk about enhancing the Quaker influence and consciousness at Kendal. I said that Admissions is the key. We hope next to speak to Leonard Cadwallader.

Sunday, April 26, 1998

Chrysanthi and I took Zdenka Tot out to dinner. She now owns a car, and is about to get her Green Card. Sends money every month to her family in Croatia—cash.

Wednesday, April 29, 1998

Michael Groden came to Dartmouth to demonstrate his “Hypertext” Ulysses, a marvelous concoction via computer, enabling each and every person now to access photos, to hear songs, to listen to Ulysses as read by Irish voices, etc. Many came from my ILEAD class.

Thursday, April 30, 1998

Groden attended my ILEAD class. I did “Joyce Music” plus Flanders and Swann. The students had much trouble with Ulysses being both linear and cyclic. How can Bloom be different at the end of the day (asking Molly to get him breakfast) yet at the same time be “everyman” who is going to be born again into another Typical Day on the morrow? I explained that complication is what Joyce hopes we will accept.

Saturday, May 2, 1998

To Cambridge, driving Ellen Baber there to see her daughter. Chrysanthi and I went to Robert Brustein’s play Nobody Dies on Friday, about Lee Strasberg, his family (dysfunctional), and Marilyn Monroe. Really about the curse of celebrity. Alvin Epstein played Strasberg; I’ve never seen Epstein act better. The role was perfect for him and he for the role. And what a good, “well-made” play, showing me how poor Daniel Carson’s latest effort is. The gift of the play was that Strasberg, although a selfish ogre, is never presented as a cardboard devil; one sees the “human” side, and inevitably sympathizes to a degree, despite everything. Good theater: what a pleasure! . . . Supper in the Riverside Grill in Enfield, the first time in 25 years, and it’s still the same.

Sunday, May 3, 1998

In Meeting I ministered about the contradiction of linearity and cyclicity in Joyce, combining it with Isaiah Berlin’s differentiation between relativism and pluralism. Quakers are accused of being relativistic, believing in everything and therefore in nothing “absolute.” But why can’t many absolutes coexist plurally and in contradiction? My hope is that we are pluralists rather than relativists. . . . Finance Committee afterwards. I’m to be the new treasurer, starting now.

Hanover

An interesting day. Breakfast at the Hanover Inn with Jennifer Lien, who was so nice to us in Singapore. She’s doing a series of articles on chip manufacturers in Silicon Valley, but is beginning to feel somewhat trapped by her eight-year commitment to the Singapore newspaper. She has five years to go. . . . Lunch with Elizabeth Mazzocco, Stavros, Chrysanthi, and John, after which they demonstrated their laserdisc for Modern Greek. Surprisingly, John liked it, as did we. We're hoping to be able to incorporate it in our new Demotic Greek package as a supplement. . . . Then worked on my lecture in Greek on Ο Καπετάν Μιχάλης for Sweden. Also on an essay by someone else on Joyce's use of Modern Greek; I was asked to check the Greek. Then sat for an hour in Kiewit while Randy Spydell tried, so far unsuccessfully, to make the Scusi work on my computer. He promises to get it working tomorrow. On the way home, a long talk on the street with Peter Cosgrove and a shorter one with Rogers Elliott, and then a free ice cream cone at Ben and Jerry's. They do this once a year, and had issued over 2000 cones already today.

NYC

American Farm School board meeting at their offices, Broadway and 26th Street. Finally met Patty Chamberlin, who was so patient with me when we had such trouble with tickets last October. Since I won't be voted a board member until tomorrow, I simply sat in as a guest at the committee meetings. George and Charlotte Draper expressed pleasure at meeting Alec and Monica. The capital campaign chairwoman, Mimi Lowry, is a dynamo; she supervised a successful campaign netting almost $7 million. But the school strikes me as very vulnerable. If they didn't get an almost $2 million subsidy from the E.U. they'd be in a mess. The dean of the new college, Vangelis Vergos, reported on successful placement of its students as interns, because they know English, computers, etc. better than Greeks graduating from the state universities. There was talk of adding a fishery component. Much complaint about George Draper's budget, which obscured important information. (Mike told me at Princeton that Bruce Lansdale was almost incapable of fiscal management, although very capable of raising money.) All in all, the trustees seem capable. They range from a rather young AFS graduate to a very elderly head of finance who appears to be a retired CEO of some large corporation. Also John C., a British agriculturalist married to a Greek. The chair ran a good meeting: Mr. Thomas, from Cincinnati. We joked about everyone except him being east of the Hudson. I assured him that I was one and a half miles west, at Riparius. All in all, a friendly lot, apparently pleased to have me join them. Mike Keeley wasn't there because he and the search committee were interviewing candidates for the headmastership. Saw him afterwards at the cocktail party at the Harvard Club, which Chrysanthi attended with me. I said I'd probably be most interested in the college and also perhaps in editing the centennial books that are proposed. I'm not sure that I'm very excited about this new service—less so than my Quaker services and Kendal. (A propos, Dan Seeger called yesterday to see if I might be willing to serve as clerk of the Pendle Hill executive committee if I'm asked. Well, I suppose so.) The AFS's next meeting will be at the School, in October, for three days.

Spent an hour or so with Christina; she is a dynamo. Never walks, always runs. And for the first time she said, "Mommy, pee," sat on the toilet, dribbled a bit, and flushed the toilet. After the cocktails, returned to 84th Street for supper. Greg, supposed to go to Carolina to play golf, called from Newark to report cancellation of his flight, so he joined us, too, for supper. The apartment is beginning to look "civilized" now. The dining room set and the living room furniture arrive next week. I'm waiting for paintings on the walls . . . and a piano.

Up at 5:45 a.m. but really since 2:00 a.m. because of the infuriating siren of a car whose burglary device somehow got turned on. I flew back to Manchester while Chrysanthi took the train back. Went to Brenda and Everett Marder's in Quechee for lunch. Brenda will need a good translator for Stewards of the Soil, and perhaps I can help her through my contacts: Christos Alexiou and/or people in Θεσ/vikη. She also needs to find a way to republish this and, together, the second volume, which will take the story from 1950 to the centenary (2004). I suggested publication by advance subscription. Everett hopes to retire from his law practice in about two years and then set himself up as a legal consultant in Greece while Brenda is in residence at the Farm School. . . . Just time to collect mail in Hanover. Off to Kendal for the "gala concert" celebrating Beveridge Webster's 90th birthday. Nice dinner beforehand with the three pianists who came: his former students Andy Rangell, Monica Jakúć, and Bill Black, and the committee (Barbara Rice, Sally Pinkas, Fred and Connie Landmann, Sandy Sanderson), and Wendy Ardizzone, Bev's daughter, and her husband. Michael Webster couldn't come but he wrote a nice paragraph that I was able to quote in my opening remarks, in which I said that I hoped we could bring the Fund up to $50,000, and concluded by saying that the music tonight would establish both a link with the past, because the three pianists had studied with Bev at Juilliard, and a link with the future: our Bev. Webster Performance Fund's enhancement. Each pianist spoke about memories of Bev, very warmly. Andy played Haydn and Albéniz, not very well, alas. Monica did three Debussy preludes from Book 2, including the spectacular Feux d'artifice, all "fireworks." Bill did Chopin's 4th Ballade very competently. But, strangely, none had the magic of Bev Webster and the je ne sais quoi. Afterwards, birthday cake and punch. Many nice comments. And a large birthday card with the program printed on it and beneath the signatures of all present, more than a hundred. It was really very nice. I feel that he has added such a spiritual dimension. There isn't enough that we can do in recognition. And he's still a punster. Andy remembered two examples: (1) "One memory loss is a lapse. Two memory losses are a relapse. Three are a collapse." And, when Franny was given a scholarship at Oberlin because she played half a dozen instruments and also sang, Bev called it a "band-aid."

Andy spent the night with us. His hands are better, almost. He'd like to do a full program in Hanover, perhaps as a benefit for AFSC. He showed us his latest children's book, with charming illustrations and a very cute text about a boy who has extraordinary powers of hearing. And he is thinking of another about a creative spider who spins all sorts of beautiful forms into its webs but never catches any flies in them: the creative, impoverished artist.

Nice to see David French at Meeting after a long absence. . . . Worse news from Indonesia with more and more riots, also violence against Chinese-Indonesian shop-owners. I sent an e-mail to Alec but he hasn't responded yet.

Göteborg, Quality Panorama Hotel,

031 767 70 70, www.panorama.se

Arrived at Göteborg via Philadelphia and Paris. Bo-Lennart's wife, Anita, poor thing, had a stroke and wasn't able to appear. She continues to be unstable: dizzy, etc. This has slowed down her writing career, which was very successful (books for children and young people). I lectured on “Reminiscences of a Translator from Modern Greek” to his students, undergrads and grads, about 20 people. Not much discussion afterwards but it wasn’t entirely dead either. Afterwards, supper with Bo-Lennart, one older student, a Cypriot-Greek, and two younger ones, all women, a Swede and a Greek-Swede, charming people. Conversation exclusively in Greek. Walked back to the hotel. What a civilized city: every sidewalk has two lanes, one for pedestrians, the other for bicycles, clearly marked. The main streets have trams. No congestion, no pollution, no traffic jams. Trees and parks everywhere.

Göteborg–Stockholm

The hotel breakfast puts ours to shame. Ten different kinds of bread. Cold cereals galore, with apricots, raisins, and yogurt. Eggs, bacon, sausages. Fine marmalades, Liver pate, salami, ham. Juices, different kinds of coffee. The hotel is full. Sat with two Germans attending a business conference on chemicals. Asked about the euro, etc. The older man worries about lack of border controls allowing all kinds of undesirables to enter Germany, where they steal, etc. The younger one had faith that such problems would be solved, and realized that the old national separations no longer make sense economically. . . . Flew to Stockholm. They don’t even assign seats in the plane; there are always enough, it seems. A land of myriad lakes below, and forests, and very few people. Even Stockholm, which does have an occasional line of cars waiting for a red light to change, is uncongested. My hotel room looks out on a park and right now I’m watching four beautiful blonde girls about 14 years old practicing gymnastics. After Eva Hedin left me here I walked to the Strindberg Museum, which is housed in the flat he was occupying when he died, and retains the original furniture. There are some splendid portraits of him, too, looking very fierce and “artsy.” Walked further downtown, to various shopping streets, one of which, in front of the Concert Hall, has a splendid large statue of a gun whose barrel is twisted pretzel-like, obviously making it inoperative as a gun. And in the mouth of the barrel are flowers. . . . The lecture was much more fun here than in Göteborg because there were many good questions afterwards about Kazantzakis’s theatrical career in general, although none about Nikiforos Fokas in particular, because of course they hadn’t read it. A nice man in the front row is a theater person and doing an essay on Kazantzakis’s drama, so he knew Capodistrias, Buddha, Melissa, etc., also Sodom and Gomorrhah, which he says is heavily influenced by H θυσία του Αβραάμ. Nice dinner afterwards in a Greek restaurant with Eva Hedin, this man (a Swede), Eva Bronman, another Swede, and a lively Greek lady from Cephalonia.

Stockholm

A long, interesting day. Eva, Eva, and Mimi came at 10:00 a.m. after I'd had breakfast, again with Germans opposed to the euro and with a nice Austrian from Vienna less opposed. We went off to the new Museum of Modern Art, at my suggestion. Such a lovely building, on an island, in the majestic harbor of this city. A small collection, quite representative of abstract impressionism, the latest installations, plus an odd Matisse, Picasso, Mondrian. Each room has a sort of square window that frames the outdoors, converting it, too, into a work of art. Several rooms exhibit Swedish artists, mostly derivative: cubists, impressionists, etc. It was lovely to see groups of Swedish school children. One was gathered round a half-abstract, half-realistic statue of a nude woman. When the guide brought the children around to her back, one of the boys, about seven years old, shouted "rummpa": rump! . . . Afterwards we walked to the National Museum to have lunch in the Atrium restaurant. Fried fish, vegetables, potatoes, wine. Lovely. And of course good conversation throughout. Then in the car again to the king's deer park, set aside as a recreational area, where we had coffee and strudel in the sunshine, surrounded by tulips. . . . All this was lovely, to see this beautiful city on such a perfectly sunny day, with everyone out, enjoying the first earnest of summer. But then we got hopelessly caught in traffic—which I thought didn't exist in under-populated Sweden. Got to the hotel at 5:00. Left again at 5:30, this time in a taxi and again got stuck in traffic, in part because someone had shot someone else, and a street was filled with police. (I thought that crime didn't exist in Sweden.) Reached the university at 6:05—not bad. Then couldn't find the lecture room. Then almost got stuck in the elevator. But was able to start my lecture on Ο Καπετάν Μιχάλης at 6:09. My Greek felt awkward to me, alas. At the end, Anna, a lecturer who does Greek here, said rather vehemently that in effect my interpretation is entirely wrong: a rationalizing interpretation imposed on a work dedicated to surpassing rationalism. She sees Mihalis as a paradigmatic Dionysian figure, a κουζουλός, just what Crete needs. I know that Mihalis actually says this in the book. But that doesn't mean that we are convinced. We went back and forth, I being somewhat limited by my Greek, but finally I suggested that the whole fun of literary criticism is to have multiple, even conflicting, interpretations. Afterwards, she came up with a big smile and hugged me. . . . Jan drove us home—the man interested in Kazantzakis's theater, this time mercifully without traffic. I dined alone in a Chinese restaurant and went to bed early, since Eva is coming to meet me tomorrow at 6:00 a.m.

Stockholm–Philadelphia

Eva showed at 5:50 a.m. We had a leisurely breakfast at the airport. She seemed genuinely pleased about my visit, including the nice day of sightseeing yesterday. Routine flights: Stockholm–Amsterdam, Amsterdam–Philadelphia. At Pendle Hill, supper with Rebecca and with Marcia Prager, a rabbi who is teaching a joint course with Rebecca on the Hebrew and Christian Bible. Big hug from Mrs. Barnes. Happy to learn that Suzi Morrison was hired by Friends Central School to teach English, indeed hired by every school to which she applied, but she chose Friends Central. Off to Roadside for a committee meeting on cohabitation policy: Mary Ward, Dan, Shirley Dodson, and me, Ted Brinton absent. Generally they agreed with my approach using queries instead of rules. But the queries were modified somewhat, placed in a different order, and pruned. I'll type up a clean copy tomorrow for presentation to the board.

Pendle Hill

The Times this morning reported total chaos in Jakarta, with mobs burning, looting, and killing, especially in the Chinese enclave in North Jakarta, precisely where Alec is, but also downtown where the big hotels are—i.e., where Monica works. But the international companies have shut their doors and are trying to evacuate their personnel. Yet the road to the airport is impassible because mobs stop and destroy vehicles on it. Alec's school must obviously be shut, since students cannot be transported across the city. The violence is aimed (a) at ethnic Chinese, which means Monica's parents, of course, and the Suharto family holdings. I haven't been able to come in touch with Alec yet because I don't have my e-mail capacity here. Will try to get through by telephone. The State Department has advised all Americans to leave. But Alec is no longer alone; he is married to a Chinese-Indonesian, and Monica will obviously be worried about her family. How dramatic that all this is happening only two weeks after our happy time there for the wedding!

NYC

To New York by AMTRAK after Pendle Hill board in the morning. Stayed overnight in Daphne's apartment (they're in London). To the Princeton Club for a long, leisurely supper with my Bronx High School of Science comrades: Arthur Kaledin, Freddy Mann (and young wife), and Philip Oppenheim. Gene Girden couldn't come. Norman Mack chose not to. Alan Schleifstein has changed his name and couldn't be located. All these people look young, vigorous, and prosperous. But Arthur is lame, walks with crutches but gets around very well. He's a retired MIT professor of history, yet still teaching some courses, and working on a book on Tocqueville. Fred is a retired advertising executive who seems to have made lots of money; they had the Pfizer account. Seems to have been married more than once—older children but now a young wife. Poor Arthur was divorced by his wife after 42 years of marriage and now lives alone in Cambridge. Buzz Oppenheim is a retired schoolteacher. We were all very compatible, talking about the present as well as the past. But it's interesting how vivid some of the past memories are. Arthur, for example, remembered "Adolph and Harriet," and the fact that my father drove us every day to Queens Plaza subway station. Also lots of memories about tennis where I, as happened at Brant Lake Camp, seem to have left behind a conviction of excellence (!). I told them that the best thing I ever did was to leave Bronx Science because at Deerfield I was encouraged to devote myself to literature (by Mr. Hatch, especially), something that never happened at Bronx Science. And I told Arthur that equally good for me was the change from Harvard to Haverford, because this led me to Quakerism, and Quakerism to Chrysanthi, and Chrysanthi to Greek literature. Arthur said he agrees that Harvard in our day "had no soul." He hopes that Chrysanthi and I will visit him in Cambridge.

Boston

More news from Alec and Monica. They now have tickets to leave tomorrow, arriving in D.C. on Wednesday. Let's hope. I asked if Monica was reconciled to leaving. Alec said she was sad, because she had planned originally to have a week at home with her family, but that her parents supported her early departure under the changed circumstances of all the violence and political chaos of last week. Good! Let's hope, however, that she doesn't become homesick once she's here. Chinking a log cabin, going to the ballet, etc. will all seem rather frivolous compared to the momentous events in Indonesia, not to mention the danger to her family.

I drove to Hellenic College in the afternoon for the first hearing of the Rassias Commission. Fellow Commissioners were John, Peter Patrikis, Sol Gittleman (provost of Tufts), Demosthenes (the Norwich postmaster), and a Greek professor from MIT: Nikos. Good audience. Lots of teachers, some parents, the priest in charge of education in the Boston area. Various people spoke at length, and with passion, about the massive problems they face, chiefly lack of support by parents, who use the Greek schools chiefly for cheap babysitting; indifference on the part of the students (and even on the part of seminarians in Holy Cross), grossly inadequate pay, lack of benefits, inadequate teaching materials, inadequate or non-existent teacher-training, etc., etc. A huge lament. They seem to have faith that the Commission will do some good, stressing that actual results are what are needed, not just a fancy report (of course!). What surprised me was the total lack of resentment or anger toward us. I had assumed that we would be threatening and that teachers would proclaim their expertise. Quite the opposite. They viewed us with gratitude and hope, after proclaiming their failures.

Princeton

Slept last night in the airport hotel. Got up at 4:50 a.m. to catch a 6:00 a.m. flight to Philadelphia. Arrived at Joseph Henry House, ready to work, at 9:35, only five minutes late. A productive morning, correcting lesson 5. Lunch with Gonda Van Steen, who is visiting. She's doing well in her new job at Tucson. Felt very sleepy during our afternoon work session, but stayed awake. Then napped from 6:00 to 8:00, and had a hamburger at the Nassau Inn bar. Trying to hear the latest news about Indonesia. A huge demonstration is scheduled for tomorrow.

Wednesday, May 20, 1998

The demonstration was called off, for fear of bloodshed. What's next is anybody's guess. . . . Worked well with Dimitri and Mache, entering all the corrections through lesson 9.

Thursday, May 21, 1998

Miracle: at 11:00 p.m. last night—that would be May 21 in Jakarta—I heard that Suharto had stepped down voluntarily and that Habibie, the vice-president, became president. So, a nonviolent revolution, or at least the beginning of one, since Habibie is a Suharto crony and not trusted. But this is a tremendous change. The students are jubilant. . . . Good class on Ithaca and Penelope with my ILEAD students. But Molly does puzzle them. Why doesn't she have children, they ask. . . . After supper, Bruce Koloseike came to instruct me in the use of "Quicken" for the Meeting's treasury. It's an amazing piece of software.

Friday, May 22, 1998

Breakfast meeting at Dirt Cowboy with Sally Pinkas, Connie and Fred Landmann, Lisa Mayer, Barbara (the pianist), Sam Samuelson, and Sue ?, planning next season's Webster concerts. I'll try to book Nigel Coxe. Bev Web is probably finished, has terrible incontinence. Barbara says he always stinks. What a shame! . . . Can I possibly learn the Dvořák pieces and Barber in time for Leander's workshop? A real challenge. . . . Rick Taylor, General Maxwell Taylor's son, whom I haven't seen since 1948, telephoned to see if I was going to the Deerfield reunion. How nice of him! I remember my visit to his family when his father was commandant at West Point—quite an adventure for a seventeen-year-old.

Cambridge

To the A.R.T. for Molière's The Imaginary Invalid, freely updated of course. It was pure pleasure, starting with a chorus of nurses in full uniforms (but with miniskirts) doing a sensual dance, Argon farting throughout, lots of fun about enemas, extravagant songs about health imitating Elvis Presley, Frank Sinatra, etc., and outrageously inflated rhetoric pronounced by the undesirable suitor, Thomas Diafoirus. Even "Viagra" made it into the script, as well as the ultimate curse: may he roast in an HMO!

Princeton

Working with Dimitri, looking at other MG texts to get ideas for ours. Yesterday, coffee with Mike Keeley, who astonished me by telling how the Farm School lost $25,000 trying to arrange for the Hyatt Corporation to buy Farm School land and build a hotel . . . and casino! The deal fell through; venture capital lost. . . . Tonight to Hightstown to sup with John Baker. He has a new scheme. Will give us $50,000 if we name the War/Peace Endowment the Jean Monnet Fund. A good idea, actually, since Dartmouth gave Monnet an honorary degree in 1961 and since the W/P money is in the Dickey Endowment for International Understanding, precisely right for Monnet. Also, other money might come our way after this change. So now I need to talk to Mastanduno, Boose, Jim Wright, Jim Freedman, etc. in order to get back to Baker. Involved also is our common friend Andy Towl, who is in touch with the Monnet professor in the Harvard Law School. Of course, it was Towl who brought Elise Boulding, Leonard Rieser, and me to John and Elizabeth Baker. Baker kept saying how good we'd been to him (we thought he'd been good to us). Dartmouth apparently was the first institution to make the Bakers feel that their peace efforts might work.

Thursday, May 28, 1998

My last ILEAD class. A very fine concluding discussion. One student even said that the role of Homer's Athena is played by language—a brilliant insight. All in all, the students seem satisfied and grateful. They asked when I'd be teaching another ILEAD class and I said I hoped I'd be strong enough to say No. . . . Dick came for supper, bringing a bottle of wine for my birthday, which is also Christina's. We played Mozart afterwards.

Riparius

Up early. Breakfast at the Woodstock Inn. Arrived at the farm around 11:00 a.m. to see Leander's completed house, really very nice, and of course Alec and Monica. Pinky is putting in Alec's bathroom, and will be doing the kitchen next week. We started planting the garden after lunch, using the Mantis tiller I bought last year. Around 3:00 p.m. a storm, heavy rain, and loss of electricity. We were supposed to eat at Shapiros' but they couldn't cook, so we all went to the new Italian restaurant in North Creek and had ravioli and spaghetti, huge portions, most of which we took home, hoping our current would be restored. It wasn't.

Saturday, May 30, 1998

Still no current. I set up my office, got the tractor running, repaired the flush mechanism on the toilet. Nice interlude in the morning. We all went down to Riparius for a coffee at the Caboose. Alec and Monica recounted some of their adventures in Greece, and the train ride from Thessaloniki to Istanbul. . . . Off to the Narrows with the Shapiros for pizza. Still no current when we returned at 9:30. But NiMo promises restoration tomorrow. We did fine all day, filling the toilet from the old well when needed and cooking hamburgers on the fire outside.

Sunday, May 31, 1998

The electric came on at 3:30 a.m. after a 36-hour outage. Well, not so bad as the 104-hour outage after the hurricane a few years ago.

Hanover

Nice supper at Sweet Tomatoes with Leonard and Rosemarie Rieser. He is still advancing and retarding the Atomic Clock at the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists in Chicago: alas it was retarded recently owing to India's and Pakistan's atomic tests. I'm hoping that he and Michael Mastranduno will visit John Baker sometime in Hightstown; perhaps there will be something in Baker's will for War/Peace Studies. I've written him that Dartmouth is willing and happy to change the endowment's name to honor Jean Monnet. We're waiting for Baker himself to specify the exact title.

June 4, 1998

Saw Kate Porter (now Kate Porter Burke) at a meeting at the Tucker Foundation to discuss criteria for a new chaplain. She and Alec used to play clarinet-violin sonatas. She's now chief student dean, a very sweet lady. I'm hoping that she and Alec will visit when Alec and Monica come next week.

Riparius

We decided spontaneously yesterday to have another weekend at the farm. Good weather. Leander and Deanna arrived with Sophia, to enjoy their new house. Sophia already points to it and says "Thofia howz." Leander gave me a good lesson on the Bizet and Barber.

Deerfield

To Deerfield for my 50th reunion. Housed in Rosenwald Dorm. Rosie was there, repeating the story of how he promised the dorm on the condition that it be occupied only by girls (Deerfield was still all boys). The trustees voted co-education the next year. Saw Laird Barber in the dorm and had a long chat in his room. His wife is desperately ill, a house-bound invalid, alas. Probably if she died it would be a blessing for all concerned. At the reception and dinner tonight I saw Bob and Penny Binswanger of course (Bob organized the reunion). He wants to speak to Alec and help him in his job search. Sat at dinner between Bob Johnston and his wife. I hadn't seen him since 1951, probably. He's a lawyer, chief counsel for Squib for years but left because of disagreement with a new management team. Now in private practice near Princeton. Most recently helped preserve 400 acres of forest that the Institute of Advanced Study wanted to sell and environmentalists wanted to save. Wants me to call him when I'm in Princeton, to have supper. Said he had contact with no one from Deerfield and sent his own children to public school on principle. The others I'd hoped to see didn't show: Tom Wilson, Howie Burnett, Steve Baran, although Steve Baran sent greetings via Charlie Drinkle. The saddest part was the reading of the necrology: Dick Aldrich, Eric Verrill (class president), Tom Moore, and about 20 others. It's good to be alive! Some of our masters were there, too: Mr. Walbridge, master of Manning House, where I lived; Mr. Sutor, Mr. Bohrer. Amazing! The new headmaster, Eric Widmer, spoke, preceded by his very lively Indian (East Indian) wife, who apparently teaches literature at Brown and now also part-time at Dartmouth. Chrysanthi didn't like her because she spoke mostly about herself, although very engagingly. The headmaster discussed what is different and what is the same. He bravely noted Mr. Boyden's deficiencies: no interest in the arts, for example (they now flourish at Deerfield).

Kinhaven

Breakfast at Deerfield with some alums. Then we drove to Kinhaven. I'm in Leander's four-hand piano workshop again. My partner is Alice Buseck (Dan couldn't come). We're doing Bizet (from the Children's Suite), Barber "Pas de deux" from "Souvenirs," and Dvořák's Slavonic Dance no. 3. Chrysanthi will stay until tomorrow. Ditto for Deanna and Sophia. Alice and I had a splendid lesson with Leander, all on the Barber. What was just a collection of notes now has a chance to become real music. After supper, Leander and Ignat played Schubert beautifully (and how much more attractively on Miss Mann's modern Steinway than on the Broadwood at Strathmore Hall). Ignat and Mrs. Shin played Schumann's "Pictures from the East" poorly (Mrs. Shin's fault, not Ignat's, of course). Monica and Alec arrived in time to hear it. Afterwards, cheese and wine and good talk. (Leander and Ignat lay awake talking until 4:00 a.m.) Ignat's fiancée, Caroline, is here, a 4th year medical student at the University of Vermont, and very pretty. A Catholic, she plans to convert to Orthodoxy.

Sunday, June 14, 1998

I had a very good lesson on the Dvořák from Ignat, a sensitive, brilliant teacher. Our three pieces are sounding better, although technically I still cannot play the final four bars of the Dvořák at breakneck speed. In the afternoon master class, Mrs. Shin's was boring, Ignat's scintillating, on Haydn's Variations in F, played by Kit Van Winkle. Alice and I practiced separately and alone after supper and then talked in the living room about Ireland, which she and Peter hope to visit this summer. I told her not to miss Bewley's Café.

Monday, June 15, 1998

Bits of sunshine this morning. It has rained steadily since Friday. At breakfast Mrs. Shin told how when she first got Ignat as a student, aged 8 or 9, he couldn't play a C-major scale. Two years later he was playing the 2nd Beethoven piano concerto. Alice and I had our coaching this morning from Mrs. Shin. Very useful both technically and interpretatively. But I still cannot play the last three bars of the Dvořák most of the time up to speed. Fine master class. Bruno played Fauré and was coached well by Mrs. Shin; Steve played Beethoven's magnificent Opus 90, such a deep, tragic work, and was coached brilliantly (as expected) by Ignat. In the middle, I had to wait for a phone call from Greece. A reporter from Tá Néa wants to interview me. We've set an appointment for Wednesday. Good talk with Kit at supper. She'll speak for Leander at the Kinhaven Board meetings. Also informative talk with Bill Rhodes, a retired A.I.D. official. He considers that the international formula for a crisis like Indonesia's does make sense.

Tuesday, June 16, 1998

A full, pleasant day. Rose at 6:30 a.m. in order to practice, yet again on the last 5 bars of the Dvořák. Run-through with Alice at 8:30; still doesn't sound right. We resolved to do the ending at 108 instead of 132. Practiced some more. We were first on the program. Barber went very well. Bizet was certainly satisfactory. And even the Dvořák went well, although I got confused very briefly owing to the syncopations that Ignat stressed. But the ending was perfect. Introducing the piece I warned the audience that the Dvořák might be transmogrified into the ending of Mozart's "Musical Joke." But, happily, that did not happen. . . . Stayed only 20 minutes longer; heard a nice rendition of Ravel's "Beauty and the Beast." Then drove to Hanover to be in time for the Kendal Board, my last meeting. A full agenda, very interesting, with plans for new construction, and splitting the Cadbury Fund into three separate funds, and resolution, finally, of the financial arrangement between us and the Kendal Corporation. At the end of the meeting Margery read a beautiful citation about my contribution over the years, since this was my last meeting after 14 years' service. I spoke briefly about past and future. Re: the past, how Jim Strickler alerted me to Doris Ferguson's fervent desire to keep her land out of Dartmouth College's clutches. Re: the future, that the crucial area is admissions, to attract a quality of residents to match those who have come so far.

Then we all went down to the area just outside the Gathering Room for a "tea" with residents. Here, again, Margery spoke about my contribution, and then I was presented with a gift, a large box. I unwrapped it. It seemed very light. Soon it became clear that there was nothing in it, nothing, that is, except a photo of a beautiful chair on order for me, with the Kendal logo imprinted on the back. . . . Various people came up to say nice things. Then I went to see Yiayia. She had just started supper, so I joined her and the lady who always sits at her table. Strange: why is it that people at this stage never talk to each other? It can't be hearing, because both heard me when I tried to make some conversation. . . . Then to my study in Baker Library to collect JMGS and other materials to take to the farm. Back to 12 Ledyard for more materials. Alice was there, beaming. Said that Leander and the others had declared that our playing this morning was the best of the whole lot. Especially the Barber. But also the Bizet and Dvořák. Alice ecstatic. On this happy note I drove to the farm, arriving at 11:30 p.m. to find Leander, Alec, and Chrysanthi waiting. Leander repeated this judgment, very warmly. To bed at 12:45 a.m.

Riparius

Getting settled. Worked on Beaton's JMGS article. Rain most of the day. The 7th day of uninterrupted rain. The small cellar in Leander's house is flooded and he is very worried. Alec has put one window in his addition and is chinking it. Also did nice paneling in the bathroom. . . . We all had a leisurely supper, talking about the Indonesian mess.

June 20, 1998

Nice long supper at the new Copperfield bistro with Mary and Maureen, followed by continued conversation at their house. Politics, philosophy, religion, North Creek gossip. Maureen accessed Indonesian news on the internet, which we printed out for Alec and Monica.

June 21, 1998

Shapiros for supper. More talk about Indonesia with Monica. Her family has no cultural connection at all with China. They've been in Indonesia for 14 generations.

June 22, 1998

A hot, muggy day. I worked eight long hours getting Middleton's essay ready for JMGS. After supper we all opted for the Caboose for ice cream, watching the swollen Hudson River run past. Back home, Alec and I tried Mozart's violin-piano sonata no. 15, which we decided to practice. The slow movement is ethereally beautiful. I'm doing better and better on the piano. Of course the four-day workshop helped immensely. I really should take lessons regularly.

NYC

Up at 5:45 a.m. Drove to AMTRAK Albany-Rensselaer station. Easy 2½ hour ride along the Hudson. Started reading Ian McEwan's Enduring Love, which I'm reviewing for World Literature Today (already a month overdue). Entering Penn Station and the New York subway after a morning among 1,000,000 trees is an experience. Exhilarating in a way. . . . Lunch at the Yale Club with John Rassias, who had just returned from a meeting with His Eminence. The Commission is very meaningful for John and he kept insisting that he needed my involvement at every step, which of course he has already received. We feasted on lamb chops to fortify ourselves for tonight. . . . Then went to the Strand Bookstore on Broadway at 12th and bought a 1988 Encyclopedia Britannica for Alec's house, at $350. . . . Then to Daffy's for a new shirt and tie for tonight. Then to the Yale Club barber. . . . Our hearing began at 6:00 p.m. at the Archdiocese's center on East 74th. Everyone was there except Vasos. I reached him in his office. He was about to come when he received news that his cruise ship's generators had failed at Karpathos and he was frantically flying people out to remedy the situation. So we'll miss him. The hearing went well; about 50–60 people, many teachers, one school principal, some parents, some priests. One of the priests came up and asked me to autograph my "Introduction to Cavafy, Kazantzakis, Ritsos," which he'd just bought in Greece. The principal of the Astoria school was a bit obstreperous and unreasonable, insisting on talking Greek (although two of the Commissioners cannot understand it) and complaining about our questionnaire. But the others were passionate in constructive ways, very committed to Ελληνικότητα and very worried about the situation. One confided to me privately that she couldn't say in public the full story about the deleterious role of the Church. But another stated that the priest of her congregation insisted that school prizes go only to those children who were regular in church attendance, not to those who did best in their lessons. We were urged to visit a school, and also to have another hearing in New York, preferably in Astoria or Flushing. John was asked to demonstrate his method, so we had a lesson in Chinese, with a six-year-old boy stealing the show. . . . Hot soup with John and another Commissioner at 11:00 p.m. and to bed.

Saratoga

I forgot to note that last Monday Mrs. Morris appeared at our house around 4:00 p.m. very distressed. Her car had caught fire just beyond our entrance. We walked back to it together. The left rear wheel was askew. The moment she started the engine and put the car in gear red flames darted out from between the spokes. She turned off the engine and they promptly stopped. Clearly a problem for "Car Talk." She waited in the car until one of her children drove up the road and took her home. . . . Up again at 5:45 a.m. 7:15 a.m. train, full this time, back to Albany. Then drove to Saratoga State Park to meet Irv, Fran, Chrysanthi, Alec, and Monica for a picnic lunch followed by a performance of La Traviata. Violette and Alfredo very mediocre, but not bad enough to ruin the miraculous music. And Il Padre was excellent. What an extraordinary composition! The melodies haunt me day and night.

Hanover

To Hanover last night with Chrysanthi. Delicious meal: shrimp scampi with cream sauce on the pasta, in Lake George. Spent today scurrying about, cleaning our room in anticipation of the Shepherds' arrival. Meeting with Sara Zuniga, my current Presidential Scholar, who actually does quite well. To Radio Shack and phone mart to replace the cordless phone zapped by lightning yesterday. Drove back late at night, listening deliciously to Joan Sutherland in La Traviata.

Sunday, June 28, 1998

Working in the garden. The tilling with the Mantis is much easier this year, but still laborious. Alec and Monica are progressing on the floor of their addition. But the water in Alec's shallow well is fetid, really stinks, from all the rain we've had. . . . In the office, I'm copyediting reviews now for JMGs 16/2; some are so full of gibberish that they're incomprehensible.

Tuesday, June 30, 1998

Alec and Monica left for Hanover. I accompanied them to Lake George, where we had another delicious Italian meal. Returned listening to more of La Traviata. The farm is incomparably beautiful now, so green from all the rain, the fields peppered with wildflowers (I haven't mowed yet). Alec's Britannica arrived and I've been reading various articles in bed. Glad to see my books cited in the article on Modern Greek literature.

Friday, July 3, 1998

Since I finished preparing the journal yesterday, I spent today doing farm work, although I had to write some letters for the Pendle Hill Publications Committee after breakfast. Spent the morning spraying ant poison in my office, the Guest House (very badly infested), and Alec's cabin. At first the sprayer didn't develop any pressure, but I discovered the reason and fixed it. After lunch, continued weeding and tilling the garden, and finished the forward part (the blueberries remain). It looks very "manicured." Then mowed with the tractor around half of the lower field and the entire field east of the pond, and raked around the pond. Monica made a fine supper: meatloaf, spinach topped with cheese, mashed potatoes. After supper, practiced Mozart. Alec came down about 10:00 p.m., after putting yet another coat of polyurethane on his new floor, and we played Mozart number 15. . . . Yesterday afternoon I took care of all of Leander's screens, placing the hardware where needed, drilling holes for the screws, etc. Some skill required. I was very gauche the first few times, but improved in quality and time rapidly.

Saturday, July 4, 1998

Yasuo and Naoko are here. We played Shostakovich, and the Beethoven piano quartet, and hacked away at the Schumann piano quartet, which is stirring.

Sunday, July 5, 1998

Spent the morning writing letters for the journal. Yasuo, Naoko and Monica went to church in Riparius. Daphne and family went to the Adirondack Museum in Blue Mountain Lake. After lunch I finished mowing the east field and everyone—Yasuo, Naoko, Greg, Monica, and Alec—raked hay, and Alec brought it to the garden. I raked after finishing mowing the “beach.” The field looks lovely, as does the garden. We then played music: St. George, and the Beethoven violin concerto. Then a splendid supper: hamburgers, franks, and corn cooked on the fire outside; home-fried potatoes made by me, salad, coffee, apples. Christina was cranky and finally had to be taken “home” (to Leander’s house), to our general relief. After dark, Alec and I dealt with the large wasps’ nest under Leander’s porch. In mowing, I spared the splendid wildflowers on top of the drywell.

Monday, July 6, 1998

To Hanover to get Chrysanthi to prepare the house for Jack and Kathy Shepherd. Met with Sara Zuniga, my current Presidential Scholar, who seems competent in some ways. Lunch with Mother, who actually conversed more than usual. Dick Eberhart asked me to write my name on his menu, then asked me how many years I’d been at Dartmouth. Bev and Franny Webster sat at the next table and smiled graciously when I said hello, but I’m not sure they know who I am. Bev said he once had a shirt just like mine, with bold stripes. We’re still hoping to bring Mother to the farm on the 25th. . . . ALPS dinner in Alumni Hall. I met Chrysanthi’s five students, one of whom is a French girl from Paris, another, Danae, a charming Greek-American. John told me that he is having the Commission questionnaires processed professionally by a statistician.

Tuesday, July 7, 1998

Drove back to Riparius with Chrysanthi, listening to Il Trovatore.

Saturday, July 11, 1998

Daphne, Greg, and Christina have been at the farm all week. Leander arrived yesterday, saying that all his cares melted away as soon as he entered his new house. On Thursday, Greg and Daphne departed for the Sagamore, leaving Christina in the capable hands of Chrysanthi and Monica. The baby behaved well, hardly missing its parents. Today we all drove to the Sagamore to return her to them and have lunch. The Sagamore is very lush and posh, a mixture of nineteenth-century elegance and modern efficiency. Beautiful grounds, flowers, lawns, everything manicured, filled with rich people. The lunch was nothing special, but pleasantly outdoors overlooking the lake. Daphne and family then headed back to NYC. We stopped at Silver Bay on the return, to show Leander, Alec, and Monica the very interesting assembly hall, ca. 1900. Then stopped at Brant Lake Camp to show them my boyhood venue, including a picture of me aged 11 (1941). . . . Back at “Terpni,” I finally finished my work on the garden, spreading pine needles around the blueberry plants and then mulching with newly cut hay. Also swept out the Guest House, which was filled with “sawdust” created by infestations of ants, and sprayed poison around it and around Alec’s (again). Leander, too, has ants, apparently. Next project is to widen by two slats the table I built last year. I’m relaxing, now, since I sent in JMGS 16/2 yesterday.

Sunday, July 12, 1998

Practiced Starer’s duet for  $\frac{3}{4}$  hours, playing against the 2nd part, which I had recorded on cassette. Then spent the rest of the morning (a) searching the internet for London theaters in October when we’ll be there, (b) widening the kitchen table by two boards, fairly successfully, but with some errors. In the afternoon, napped deliciously for  $1\frac{1}{2}$  hours, then raked the field in back of the barn and put the hay in the garden; then picked all the remaining apples on our tree (which ripened extraordinarily early this year); then helped Leander with his job of applying preservative over the cedar siding, then mowed around Chrysanthi’s garden with the Jari; then sprayed ant poison around Leander’s cabin; then cleaned the sprayer that he’d been using; then showered, tired and hungry. Γιουβαράκια and καρπούζι for supper.

Tuesday, July 14, 1998

David and Leone Mirza arrived. They'd last been here in 1965. David had a stroke but is functioning well, teaching economics at Loyola in Chicago. Leona is a math educator. She may be able to help our Commission when we visit Chicago. They told me about the remarkable language villages for teenagers at Concordia College, something that might be good for students studying Greek. Nice to see old friends. As happens so often, the passage of years evaporated immediately.

Wednesday, July 15, 1998

On Monday, while Leander was still here, we celebrated Alec's birthday, which isn't until July 29, when they'll be gone. Indeed, Alec won't experience a 29th at all, because he'll be crossing the international dateline and will go directly from the 28th to the 30th. I gave him, and Monica, and their house, the beautifully bound set of the Encyclopedia Britannica (1988) that I bought at the Strand Book Store last month. A very special gift, all agreed. Then Leander and I played through my four-hand repertoire for them: Barber, Bizet, Dvořák, even Starer.

Tonight, Wednesday, we celebrated our 43rd anniversary (which isn't until the 17th) by, as usual, dining in the Hall of Springs and going to the ballet. Met Donna Trautwein there and Shandra; nice reunion. The program was lovely. "Concerti Armonici" choreographed by Peter Martins: pure serenity. Then (the reason I'd picked that night) "Prodigal Son," choreographed by Balanchine, music by Prokofiev, scenery by Rouault: the original Diaghilev production premiered in 1929. Damian Woetzel was spectacular as the Prodigal, and Helène Alexopoulos equally so as the Siren. Balanchine was 24 when he conceived this amazing work, so extraordinarily expressive from the first moment to the last. Finally, Stravinski's "Symphony in Three Movements," again Balanchine. Wonderful music, but the choreography was nowhere as striking as that for "Prodigal Son" or even Martins' in the first ballet.

In the morning, I had to make an abstract in Greek for my Καπετάν Μιχάλης lecture, which Alexis Kalokairinos wants to have read by someone else at the symposium in Iraklio in August celebrating the centenary of Crete's liberation in 1898. Now I need to reduce the Greek version, currently a full fifty-minute lecture, to twenty minutes. . . . All afternoon I worked on the bench that will serve on one side of the table for the kitchen. Alec sawed the half log to make it less bulky. I spent hours sandpapering it (with our machine), and then filling all the holes with plastic wood. The difficult part will be the legs.

Friday, July 17, 1998

Finished sanding my bench and prepared the legs, draw-shaving rough  $2 \times 4$ s and then sanding them clean. Perrymans here for dessert. Arthur laconic re: ineffective English class at Adirondack Community College. Art cynical about the Riparius-North Creek train venture (as I am, too). Waste of taxpayers' money owing to vested interest in business community, etc. . . . Reading a fine book about Quakers and the law, recommending mediation. I hope that we'll publish it.

Saturday, July 18, 1998

Mowed the lower fields again, to prepare for the big event next Saturday. Katia, Alec's Russian friend, came with her husband, mother, and two lovely children, ages 6 and 9. They live in Wynwood now; I hope to show her Pendle Hill sometime. . . . Inserted legs in the bench. The first one is skewed but the others are fairly straight. . . . After supper, to the Caboose in Riverside for hot fudge sundaes.

Monday, July 20, 1998

Everything's happening at once. Pinky and Adam O'Dell came to dig the new footings for the Guest House, which they'll move onto higher ground. The tent is arriving tomorrow. Busecks are in North River and want us to visit. . . . I started reading Mike Keeley's new book, Inventing Greece, about Durrell, Miller, Seferis, Katsimbalis, and—invariably—Keeley. Very nice so far. . . . Finished vetting four book manuscripts for Pendle Hill publications. Sadly, Doug Gwyn's newest, on the Seekers, needs lots of reworking. . . . Ordered a wheelchair for Yiayia's visit. Re-did tar on the ash tree next to the cabin, again infected with ants. Mowed Alec's path across the road with the Troy-Bilt, which I fixed yesterday. Chrysanthi put a fourth and final coat of polyurethane on the bench I built, and I moved it into the kitchen. Alec and Monica sat on it for supper. It's quite handsome. At 8:30 p.m., exhausted, we drove to North River to visit the Busecks. Pinky arrives tomorrow at 7:00 a.m. to continue. Oh, I forgot to note that last night there was a serious thunderstorm, and we were up half the night.

Tuesday, July 21, 1998

Again, everything at once. Pinky and Adam arrived at 7:00 a.m. to finish Alec's countertop and vanity, then to finish the four footings for the Guest House. A huge truck came with three men to erect the tent for Saturday, a festive white affair that looks very grand next to the pond. The telephone man came to try to fix the static that prevents one from accessing my e-mail. He found a short, replaced a cable, but the static persists, probably a defect in the computer itself, alas. Then another truck came bringing top soil (cost $100) to cover Leander's dry-well. Alec spread it a bit using Pinky's Bobcat. As for me, I got almost to the end of Keeley's lovely book, then changed into working clothes. First I put my toolbox together again after Chrysanthi's thorough cleaning. Then I mowed around the rest of the pond with the Troy Bilt, at one point losing my balance and falling into the pond, my left side under water, my right dry. Afterwards, I just continued, with one boot slurping water. Shirt and dungarees dried remarkably fast on this very hot day. Afterwards, finished off with the scythe and then the John Deere, and raked a pile. By this time it was 7:30 p.m. Enough. Shower, supper, reading TLS for relaxation.

Wednesday, July 22, 1998

Big thunderstorm again last night at 3:30 a.m., so both Chrysanthi and I were up disconnecting plugs and turning off the pump and water heater. Probably the last strike is what injured the internal modem in my computer. Wrote my report for Princeton University Press on Mike Keeley's book, and started straightway typing in the revisions for Demotic Greek 1: still on lesson 1. In the afternoon, Alec and I attempted to remove a huge stone in the driveway, unsuccessfully. I broke the logging chain twice, and Alec, even with Pinky's Bobcat, couldn't lift the monster out of its hole. We were giving up when, unexpectedly, along came Pinky and proceeded, of course, to dislodge it successfully; then did a few other stones (smaller), then stayed and talked for an hour. He has IXΘYΣ on his machine, and I explained the meaning to him. In the course of this, Leander, Deanna, and Sophia arrived. Alec invited all of us to his newly civilized living room for a drink—champagne. His house is truly lovely. I'm encouraging him not to cut the bottom log in the window that became a door. Late supper, turkey, and then all to bed at 10:30, exhausted. Oh, Daphne called. She went to the gynecologist yesterday; has new pregnancy, now about eleven weeks; is doing just fine. The doctor heard the fetus's heart. . . . She's going to lend me her modem to solve, I hope, my e-mail problem.

Working in my office this morning I heard a snort and saw a doe not too far away looking at me and snorting repeatedly, wagging her tail; further away, two fawns, that ran off. But the mother remained probably for five or ten minutes, just staring and snorting, although she loped a bit further away at one point in her beautiful jumping gait. Then I returned to lesson 2 of Demotic Greek 1, typing in John's good ideas for classroom activity.

Off to Glens Falls at lunchtime to pick up a wheelchair for Mother (it's raining, so it's a good time to go). Got stronger poison for carpenter ants, and a new long-handled shovel to replace the one whose handle we cracked under the stone yesterday. Worked on the muddy spot on the entrance road, packing it down with the tractor. Then everyone descended upon us at once: Rhoda and a friend, Alici Friedman, whose son lives in Jakarta (she was there two weeks ago), Lori, daughter, and Clive, Paul, David and Linda, Susie (Peter and Alice stayed away with the other baby, who has conjunctivitis). Picnic supper outdoors. Then a nice time in our living room with Alec and Monica recounting how they met and showing the two beautiful albums of wedding photos.

Things are beginning to happen. James and Stephanie McBride arrived with their two children, in James's luxurious Mercury sedan. Nice visit. Sweet children. Steph is working toward a B.A. in English, concentrating on drama (she is an ex-actress). Brittles is still working on his biography of a certain jazz great whose name is Quincy Jones. The success of Color of Water is great, but also dangerous, for it siphons him off into unproductive (but lucrative) publicity stunts. He now charges $10,000 for a lecture, mostly in an effort to reduce the number. I want him to come to Pendle Hill, which he says he'll do for free. He totally disagrees with Paul Manglesdorf's assertion that "the whole African-American community is trying to escape from a continuing expectation of servitude" and that therefore "there is a terrible mismatch between the cultural expectations of the Society of Friends . . . and the cultural expectations of most African-Americans.” James says that the distance between blacks and Friends is mostly a matter of (1) class, (2) ignorance regarding Friends’ existence, (3) general decline of blacks’ interest in religion. I hope that we can have him at Pendle Hill to discuss all this. What’s really needed at PH for diversity is blacks on staff and on the board, first, more importantly than black students.

The big day. People began arriving around 10:30. We had about 120 all-in-all, on a glorious day: sunny, breezy, cool. So nice to see Charlie Hamlen, Tom Wood, Allan and Claire Munck, the Corindias, the Nodas, and, late, of course, John and Mary Rassias and Helene and Bill and Matthew, even Athos and family. Also Jack and Kathleen Shepherd. From here: Perrymans, Fitzgeralds, O’Dells, Akstens, Lorna Bunker and daughter and family, McGinns. Also Yasuo and Naoko, Milly Adler, Shapiros, and Walter and Joyce from Jakarta, and a dozen or so of Alec’s classmates at Haverford, and two Friends Central teachers. Alec made a lovely introductory speech when everyone was seated under the tent, saying how lucky it was that I had planned all this in 1950! (I should record also that “Big Yiayia” was here, driven by Audrey, and of course Brittles, and all the Busecks, even Paul.) The food was gourmet from start to finish (except for the coffee). Also Amy and Roy Bernstein came. And Rhoda and her friend, and Rosine Gardner. The children loved the pond and the boat and various balls, and the badminton. Very pleasant indeed. Afterwards, Alec took his Haverford chums up to his cabin for beer, and I took the Rassiases and others on “the tour.” Everyone had left by about 5:30, I think. But we still had Brittles and family back after supper for more good communion. Monica of course was radiant and relaxed through it all. She is very gifted in those ways.

Sunday, July 26, 1998

Brittles and Naoko and Yasuo again in the morning. Then David and Linda came, and I put David to work mowing the south field, which he did for three hours, very helpfully. A crew came and removed the tent. It’s now as though nothing had ever happened, except that both paddles for the boat got broken (I’ve ordered new ones from L.L. Bean already). Brittles and I joke that we must go to the movies when he next visits. Did I mention that Daphne and Greg and Christina came on Saturday; they left this morning. Christina and Sophia really noticed each other this time. Sophia even tried to push Christina on the swing. (The swing broke, so did the hammock, but all is fixed again.) Daphne brought me her modem, so I am back on e-mail now: a great relief.

Monday, July 27, 1998

Leander sprained his ankle yesterday playing badminton with Alec, but is fine today. Yiayia and Chrysanthi spent their second night in the Alp Horn motel, sleeping better. Pinky and Adam came at 7:00 a.m. to show us how to drain Alec's water. David and Linda came for breakfast and then left for Hanover, driving Yiayia back. Alec and Monica are packed, but Alec insisted on going to the dump. So we all had lunch together. They finally left in mid-afternoon. I felt very emotional about Monica: we all love her. Afterwards, Chrysanthi and I relaxed by driving to Lake George and having a good Italian meal.

Tuesday, July 28, 1998

Started the trench from shed to Guest House for the electric line. I started it with the plow, which actually worked. Then used the Mantis tiller, finally the pickaxe. Worried when the John Deere's lights and gas gauge stopped working. But discovered later that I had accidentally turned the ignition key off, although the motor kept running. So, no problem. For supper, we all had yet another meal from the leftovers from Saturday's lunch. . . . Alec telephoned from Newark Airport. They leave at midnight. The flight from D.C. was bumpy and Monica got sick. Bad start. But they're both in good spirits. . . . Chrysanthi went to Curtis Lumber today and ordered kitchen cabinets. I'd been planning to install them ever since we built the kitchen, 40+ years ago. . . . Have started to fill out the forms for entrance to Kendal.

Wednesday, August 5, 1998

Went swimming for the first time. But combined it with work, pulling out water plants that are encroaching in the pond. . . . Finished the trench to the Guest House; laid #10 wire in it, in a plastic pipe. . . . Supper with Don Kurka at Garnet Lake. He's doing photography now and showed us his portfolio. Wonderful. Such technique, and also human or natural interest. I'd love him to have an exhibit at Dartmouth.

Thursday, August 6, 1998

John sent me two paragraphs he has written on elementary education for Life Magazine (Rob Sullivan, of course). So poorly written. I converted them, I trust, into something publishable. They're "vintage Rasias," viz.: "What we need are manias. Who will touch students," etc.

Spent all day yesterday in Glens Falls, to xerox Demotic Greek 1 and send a copy to Dimitri Gondicas in Athens. Went to the new, enlarged "Price Chopper," an extraordinary store, and bought luscious bread and bagels and (even) cherry pie. . . . Supper with Maureen and Mary Fitzgerald, who alas are going to be moving to Queensbury.

Friday, August 7, 1998

More clearing of the pond. More work on the Glossary of grammatical terms, which is turning out to be a major project. Supper with Evelyn and Aser Rothstein. He is always interesting. Brought us up to date on research and progress on cystic fibrosis since the gene was discovered in his lab. Children can now live much longer, although still not cured. Prevention occurs chiefly through the aborting of fetuses who have been identified as having the defective gene.

Saturday, August 8, 1998

Bad news. My Powerbook 145 died. Won't boot up; blank screen. And I had just ordered a new battery this morning. What to do next? The Morses gave us tickets to the Adirondack Ensemble concert in Wevertown. Not bad. Saint-Saëns trio, mediocre music, but it showed off the pianist, Dan Weiser, who, I learned, will be teaching at Dartmouth now. I hope to recruit him for Kendal. Saw Allison Clarkson and her father. Also Cara Arsenault, who wouldn't say, really, why she chose Middlebury over Dartmouth.

Sunday, August 9, 1998

Spent all day putting in the electric in the Guest House, a much bigger job (as always) than anticipated. I'm using #10 wire throughout, overkill perhaps but useful if we ever want to run an electric heater there, for example. Chrysanthi and I cleaned it out considerably. It will develop into an attractive space. . . . Then off to Meadowmount with Irv and Fran. The Meadowmount Trio, all faculty, played Robert Ward and Chausson—nothing special. Chausson about on a par with Saint-Saëns. But then they were joined by a wonderful violinist and violist to do the Schumann Piano Quintet, which was scintillating, especially the miraculous scherzo, molto—but molto—vivace. What a treat! Topped off by ice cream at the Shapiros' afterwards.

Monday, August 10, 1998

To Hanover to try to deal with the computer crisis. They told me the prospects of repairing the 145 are minimal. Might cost $400; the whole machine is worth only $125. So, I took the plunge and bought the new G3, top of the line, cost $2900. But since I never paid a penny for any of my previous computers, all being given by Dartmouth, I shouldn't complain. . . . Lunch with Mother, who seems quite well. Back by 5:00. Swim. Supper with Irv and Fran and Mike and Laura Gouthreau, very pleasant. To bed at 10:30 exhausted, since we'd awakened at 5:30 a.m. this morning. . . . Oh, yesterday we had a stray dog all day, a puppy, very friendly and domesticated, but whining, wanting to come in the house. We drove it to the Riparius campground and deposited it there, where there are lots of homes and lots of children; perhaps someone will take it in.

Wednesday, August 12, 1998

Spent most of yesterday trying to get my new computer to receive e-mail, unsuccessfully despite long conversations with Kiewit, Apple, and Global Visage. Something's missing. But this morning, following a Kiewit suggestion, I tried Global Village scripts at random, and one of them worked. So, I'm back in touch with Alec, etc., but still cannot print anything because I forgot to bring Microsoft Word with me on Monday, stupidly. . . . Continuing to do the electric in the Guest House, a very slow process, very difficult with #10 wire. . . . Leander and family returned in the wee hours last night. Their experience in Seattle was very positive. We're glad, for they now have a better relationship with Deanna's father. Leander even toured Janice's factory, where the bottled water is processed, all by robots. . . . I am also reading galley proofs for JMGS 16/2, the special issue on Kazantzakis: a real pleasure.

Friday, August 14, 1998

My $3000 G3 Powerbook stopped working last night. It freezes after booting. This morning I spent 1½ hours on the telephone with an Apple technician as she walked me through the procedure to fix it, having to do with extensions. Now, let's see how long it keeps working. . . . Finished the electric wiring in the Guest House, but haven't tested it yet.

Swam. Deanna has a guest, Linda, a vivacious 40-year-old, veteran of 20 years in the National Symphony. She told me that Rostropovich was a “letch.”

Sunday, August 16, 1998

The new computer stopped functioning again this morning and I felt good because I was able to set it right by myself. It worked the whole rest of the day. I finished reading JMGS galleys and then returned to the grammatical glossary in Greek and English for DG1. . . . Leander and I played through Starer four-hands and recorded it for Dan. Then I played my secondo part for him, too, and recorded it. Also finished pulling the plants that had invaded the pond, a big job that took over a week.

Tuesday, August 18, 1998

Pinky arrived at 7:00 a.m. with Adam. A huge truck with a boom came at 8:30 and by 11:00 the Guest House was moved. Of course the truck broke one of the footings, a part of the eaves and drip edge ripped off, but basically the house seemed unhurt. Then came the electric. It didn't work. Pinky suspected my wiring, but that was fine. Eventually we located the problem in the underground cable. Despair. But Pinky's bright idea saved the day. He linked the white of the underground cable to the black of the source, and it worked. Brilliant. The black must have been injured somewhere and shorted out, but the white was fine, and everything is now in order. I don't like the new position of the house in relation to everything else, but I'll get used to it. . . . Also, the computer broke again last night. But the Apple technician solved the problem very quickly this morning and I worked for four hours, still on the glossary of technical terms, then cleaned up around the Guest House, then tried to repair the moldboard on the mower. Spaghetti for dinner. Afterward, the Perrymans came. Art related Carson Bunker's questioning of faith after losing two daughters to MS. Theodicy, of course. What kind of God would permit this?

Friday, August 21, 1998

We're all suffering from colds caught from Sophia. Couldn't work yesterday, outdoors, that is. But finished assembling the grammar that I'm sending to Peter Mackridge for vetting. Marianna Spanaki says that the grammar is the best part of the book. . . . Leander's pupil and friend Steve arrived today with his “partner,” Terry. Lovely people that I've gotten to know at the four-hand workshops. They're in the computer business and told me that what I've experienced with the new G3 is common with all computers of all makes. Generally, quality control at the factory is so poor that adjustments need to be made afterward. Also they said that the people who answer the telephone at Apple and try to help me are trainees and often don't know much. Yesterday I was three hours on the phone with one of them, who failed to fix my new problem—failure to print. But afterwards, almost accidentally, I solved it myself by installing a new system. . . . Despite our colds, and fortified with aspirin and Sudafed, Chrysanthi and I took off at 5:30 today for Saratoga, with Don Kurka. Supper in “Dr. Moriority's,” then a lovely evening: the Miami Ballet, directed by Edw. Villella, whom we remember of course from the NYC Ballet. Nothing profound, but lots of raw energy, youthful exuberance, occasional beauty. Lots of fun. A sparse audience, but very enthusiastic. These dancers are like super-trained race horses: sleek, powerful, overspecialized.

Thursday, August 27, 1998

An interesting day. In the morning I finished the talk I'll give in New York on Kazantzakis's travel writings. After lunch I worked for four hours to mount the kitchen cabinets that arrived this morning, and finished successfully. Then mowed for an hour, completing the south field, which means all the mowing for this season. Και του χρόνου!

Friday, August 28, 1998

Pinky is going to put a water heater in the Guest House, so next year we can have electricity, hot and cold running water there. Wow! The remaining problem is the toilet. . . . Leander and I marked the north and west borders with the blue paint I bought. The north, that is, until we got into the swamp and there was nothing to mark. On the way back we apparently had gone too far and were on Antler Lake territory, and suddenly we saw a huge tent with a little vehicle in front of it—the “domicile” of the minister from Speculator whom Gary McGinn told us about; he comes there to escape. In the middle of the woods, truly. It's good that we did this marking, for there were stretches on both borders with very little sign of any previous marking. However, we always managed to find a trace of fence eventually and to fill in the gaps. Exhausting work climbing up ledges, through slash, over fallen trees, and then slog-ging through the swamp with water up to our calves and boots totally waterlogged. But had a delicious dinner of our own zucchini stuffed, and a Sam Adams beer. Afterwards, I felt strangely dizzy and decided to go to bed early, but not before writing a few letters. . . . The stock market lost about 500 points yesterday and today; it's now at 8000 (Dow Jones), down from a high of about 9000. About a 5% loss, I believe. Actually, this might be beneficial. The long-term gain was too unreal.

Sunday, August 30, 1998

Leander, Deanna, and Sophia left today. Too bad. It was a lovely month of August having them. We made a festive breakfast. Chrysanthi did French toast. I did bacon and my "famous" home-fried potatoes. . . . Thinking back over this summer's projects, as I remember them:

In the office: finishing JMGS 16/1; entering all changes in DG1; creating a grammatical lexicon for DG1; starting the Greek lexicon for DG1; writing my talk on Kazantzakis as travel writer; struggling with new G3 computer.

On the farm: widening the kitchen table; bench for kitchen table; trench for electric to Guest House; wiring of Guest House; removal of old piers behind the Guest House; removal of a huge rock in the entrance; installation of kitchen cabinets; remarking of boundary lines; removal of all growth in the pond; better, and complete, tilling of the garden; seeding around Leander's and Alec's; routine mowing, of course; 120 people for lunch for Alec on July 25th.

Spent the day seeding around Leander's, Alec's, and the Guest House, raking Leander's in the hot sun, and using the disk harrow, repaired by Bud Rodick. Helped Leander drain his water. After they left, Chrysanthi and I finished marking the border: the south side, the easy one. Then we treated ourselves to a nice supper at the Sicilian Spaghetti House in Lake George that we find so uniformly good. And we strolled like tourists up and down the Lake George Main Street—quite a sight. At home, telephone message from Dick Williamson. His leg is better, but now he's developed a condition that keeps him from urinating. He has to introduce a catheter each time he wants to void. Ugh! And Susan, his hoped-for girlfriend, is trying to put her life together without Dick. Sad. How blessed we are to have (a) a stable marriage, (b) normal, productive children who still like to see us (and vice versa). None of this can be taken for granted. . . . Barbara Gilbert telephoned to say that Mary Metz died. I wrote to Bob. We'll have more and more of this, obviously. And then one day it will be Chrysanthi or Peter.

Tuesday, September 1, 1998

Supper at Shapiros with David Frost and his "partner," Joan, who was my classmate, incredibly, in p.s. 69, 7th and 8th grades. She related how our troupe arriving in 7th grade from Sunnyside was considered a phenomenon by the other students, who'd been together, mostly, since kindergarten. We were thought to be direct from Europe! (Among other misconceptions.) We both enjoyed recalling the amazingly good education we received at p.s. 69, via the project method. I of course still have the project books I completed then. They are remarkable for that age and level. Poor David, who was flourishing as a re-writer of Japanese articles on biology, is now critically unemployed, since the Japanese have run out of money. But he is keeping busy reading for the blind, etc. Fran and Irv are off to France soon, to visit the Normandy beach where he landed in the war.

Thursday, September 3, 1998

Another dinner, this time at Rosine Gardner's, now the home of a divorcée, alas. Her other guests were Dan Weiser, the pianist of the Adirondack Ensemble, and Ovidiu Marinescu, the cellist. Lots of cozy musical talk. They'd all been to Apple Hill, for example, and of course knew about Bev Webster and so forth. Dan will be teaching this year at Dartmouth. Rosine made us a splendid quiche Lorraine.

Saturday, September 5, 1998

Chrysanthi and I marked Alec's south line, as far as the beaver pond. Tough going, but we managed to follow the line. Pinky came and installed what's needed for hot and cold running water in the Guest House next summer. And of course it now has electricity. A transformation. After supper, went to the Adirondack Ensemble concert, chiefly because Dan Weiser and Lisa Spilde played four of the Dvořák Slavonic dances. They of course got the notes, and up to tempo, but I found the interpretations unexciting and uninspired, especially the A major one that Alice and I played (if I may say so) more musically. Then the full trio did Paul Schoenfield's "Café Music for Piano Trio," a brilliant piece very exciting to hear. But for the second half another group came and played jazz, which bored me silly. Afterwards we went home with Tom Akstens and Susanne Murtha for a nice visit in which Tom regaled us with anecdotes about his terrible boss at Empire College, Saratoga, who sells her desk copies to students. They pledge to help Alec and Monica in the winter if necessary.

Sunday, September 6, 1998

Finished lesson 9 for the Greek-English glossary. Tough, tedious work requiring ultimate concentration. Three lessons left. I should be able to finish Monday–Tuesday–Wednesday. We leave on Thursday. In the afternoon, Chrysanthi and I marked Alec’s northern line, again as far (actually almost as far) as the beaver pond. Very tough going because of all the slash from logging, but we found old markers and actually some fence, too. Walked back along the power line. What a wilderness all this is: hundreds of acres without human habitation (whereas 100 years ago it had been cleared and farmed).

Tuesday, September 8, 1998

Trimmed branches off the trees between the garden and the south field. Great improvement aesthetically and also practically, for mowing. But balancing with a chain saw on a ladder is dangerous, and really not a good idea. I might buy one of the extended chain saws they now make for limbing.

Wednesday, September 9, 1998

Chrysanthi ran out of leftovers, so we had supper at “The Rooster.” Very nice. All set to leave tomorrow except for the water.

Thursday, September 10, 1998

To Hanover

Turned the water off; locked up. And off we went, alas. Breakfast at McDonald’s. Piles of mail at home, as always. Dick Williamson called; treated him to supper, the first night. He seemed very low, almost in clinical depression.

Friday, September 11, 1998

Brought Mother home for supper. She was quite alert at the start but then lapsed into her accustomed silence.

Tuesday, September 15, 1998

I did a mediation workshop for student supervisors at Thayer Hall; got them in groups of 3—two antagonists, one mediator. It was fun and maybe did some good. . . . Trying to get Veysel at Kiewit to shift the columns on my Greek-English lexicon so that it becomes an English-Greek lexicon. But, as always, it cannot be done straightway. I need to enter tabs in each entry. So I began this tedious job. . . . Dick had me come to play with his group: the Mozart and Beethoven piano quartets. I did most of it all right until we came to the last movement of the Beethoven, which I started at a decent tempo, which was a big mistake.

Wednesday, September 16, 1998

Dick and Allan came for music and supper. Bach and Mozart, very nice. We also did a good Max Reger piece.

Friday, September 18, 1998

Pendle Hill

Publications Committee with Rebecca, etc. Coming to PH is always so pleasant. Mary Barnes said how much she misses us; so did Richard. Yuki, beautiful Yuki, changed her hair and doesn't look beautiful any more. Suzie Morrison is teaching King Lear at Friends Central. I'll send her a tape of the Brattle Theater production. But the nicest treat was at supper. A man with a Scottish accent came up to me, "Aren't you Peter Bien?" "Yes." "I'm Roland Ellis, and here is June!" They were the wardens at Woodbrooke when we were then in 1985. Lovely reunion. We spoke for 1½ hours at supper, and I was late for the board meeting, as usual. He of course was very eager to hear my assessment of Woodbrooke as a result of our 1995 stay. And he remembered Leander and Outi and Marianna Katopi, and Jasmyn Chelish. . . . Dan and I went over the Starer, Schubert, and Barber after ice cream. Dan very tentative. Trouble with timing, but after an hour we were beginning to get the hang of it.

Saturday, September 19, 1998

More visits with Roland and June. Also Larry Ingle, here for the Board. His new book project is "Richard Nixon—Quaker"! In the afternoon Dan and I practiced again and I worked on the English-Greek lexicon.

Sunday, September 20, 1998

Board retreat, mostly on our strategy and timing regarding the search for Dan's successor. He gave his accustomed speech about the virtues of hierarchy and the defects of Denny O'Brien. At the end, Paul Mangelsdorf came up to me and asked if I would be willing to be a candidate! "I'm too old," I protested. "I'm 68, will be 70 when the term begins." "But you look ten years younger,” he said. How nice! But I certainly, at this stage in life, do not want to be Executive Director of Pendle Hill, nor do I think I could do the job very well. . . . At 4:00 p.m. Dan and I practiced again. Then off to the airport and home. Every time I go to PH I feel that it is my home; it seems strange to leave.

Thursday, September 24, 1998

NYC

Supper with Daphne and Greg and Christina, still awake at 9:00 p.m. when I arrived. Her first words to me: “Play piano.” Good! She sings very well, right on pitch. Tebbe apartment still not “finished.” No paintings on the wall. I find their taste very bad: repulsive drapes, an ugly couch. Oh well. Chacun à son gout.

Friday, September 25, 1998

A full, exhilarating day. Breakfast with Daphne and Christina. Then to Homeric Tours, 59th Street, to pay the balance on our tickets to Greece. Very quiet. Not the chaos I expected. Made some itinerary changes to get an extra day in Athens on the way back and to leave London on Sunday rather than Monday, so that Chrysanthi can be home for her Senior Citizens meeting. . . . Then to Columbia. Entered Butler Library nostalgically to view the main reading room again—unchanged—and then the English and Comparative Literature reading room, which wasn’t there any more: transformed into offices, alas. A librarian downstairs told me that all the specific reading rooms had been removed 20 years ago but that they were now going to be replaced. . . . Then to Hamilton Hall. Gayle Holst was there, and Martin McKinsey arrived around an hour late, having taken the wrong subway. We chose this year’s winner of the Elizabeth Constantinides Translation Prize, a woman who translated a play by Ziogas. Unfortunately we couldn’t give it to Tom Doulis for his Θάνος Βλέκας because the translation has too many problems. Meg Alexiou placed Doulis first and the Ziogas play last, but she wasn’t present to argue her case. Nice lunch with Martin afterwards; he’s finishing his Ph.D. and going on the job market this year, poor fellow. . . . Then to the Yale Club to meet John and other Commissioners. Vasos Papagapitos treated us to a limousine to go to Flushing, but it held only four passengers, so John and I, unable to find a taxi in the rain, took the #7 IRT train, past 47th Street, Sunnyside (!), to Main Street Flushing and then a cab. Good meeting, once again with lots of teachers, parents, and some newspapermen present. Phyllis Franklin will be especially useful when we Commissioners convene to make our report. The one new element this time was a long plea for use of the internet. Limousine back, very quickly. In bed by 11:00 p.m. It's nice to be involved and appreciated, emotions I felt strongly today.

Saturday, September 26, 1998

And today, too. Breakfast with Greg, who explained what hedge funds are (one has just turned bottoms up, throwing Wall Street into a dither). Christina running around with no diaper or panties, apparently beginning to be toilet trained. . . . By subway to NYU. The moment I entered the building (no, even outside in the street) people began to come up: "Oh, Professor Bien" etc., etc. Old acquaintances, like Dorothy Gregory, and new ones. I delivered my lecture on "Nikos Kazantzakis as Travel Writer" and it seemed to go very well indeed. Good questions afterwards. But I couldn't stay for the rest of my panel (I'll hear them next week in Boston). By taxi over the Williamsburg Bridge to LaGuardia Airport. Driving down Delancey Street, passed Allen Street, where my father grew up. It looked very nice: wide, with some green in the middle. But then I remembered that in his day there was an el there. . . . To Kendal for supper with the Bev Web Performance Committee and Nigel Coxe, our recitalist tonight. His concert was extraordinary. First, Mozart's Fantasia K 397, which of course I played. He did it very slow and soft, an interesting interpretation. Then Beethoven's Sonata opus 28, which I also played, especially the Andante. But the high point was Beethoven's 32 Variations in C Minor: as exciting as the Diabelli, and played with tremendous verve. Then Chopin's Nocturne op. 27 no. 1 (played often by Bev Web), Mendelssohn's scintillating Rondo Capriccioso, and Liszt's Valse-impromptu as an encore. Afterwards, one of the residents came up to me and said, about the recital, "I think I was in heaven." "You were," I replied, "and so was I." Afterwards, I gave Nigel a tour of the place and had a chance to talk. He stressed what a good composer Leander is, what a shame that he is not composing. Yet, his diversions—a viable family (and now the farm)—are also very important, especially for Nigel, who of course is unmarried and I think beginning to fear a lonely old age. He was appalled at the sight of Webster, who came to the recital in a wheelchair.

Sunday, September 27, 1998

I ministered in Meeting about Nigel's recital. Why does this send us to "heaven" and what does that mean? Surely aesthetic pleasure is finite and fleeting whereas heaven is meant to be infinite and permanent. But the genius of a Beethoven (and a Coxe) puts us somehow in the realm of angels—accomplishment beyond the human norm. Most importantly, the inexhaustible creativity of Beethoven's variations (there were only 32 but we know that there could have been 64, 128, etc.) simulates for us the inexhaustible creativity of the Nature of Being, otherwise known as God.

John came and we did more of the Μία ματιά exercises for the book. He has also done his introduction finally. Last night: a nice long dinner with Ned Perrin and his new girlfriend, Susan A., a professor in the religion department. Very good for Ned—a bright, sympathetic woman, mature yet youthful. He seems in very good spirits. I asked him what his current project is (meaning writing, of course) and he answered, "Mending stone walls."

Tuesday, September 29, 1998

Long supper with Dick Williamson and then music: Prokofiev, Mozart, Vaughan Williams, followed by some real conversation, which isn't easy with Dick. . . . Earlier, inauguration of the Peace Study Fellows program at the Dickey Center. A fine initiative. People were very gracious toward me, calling me the founder.

Wednesday, September 30, 1998

Telephoned Leonard Rieser, who has pancreatic cancer metastasized to the liver, and was given two to six more months to live (two months are up). His speech is very slurred but he obviously wanted to talk, and kept me on the telephone for twenty minutes. I told him my thought about his situation, that length of life is of minimal importance compared to quality of life, and that his life had been of such high quality that all of us will be hard pressed to equal it. He agreed. He is very open about his condition; seems to be at peace spiritually. . . . Read an extraordinary book for Pendle Hill Publications: Lawrence Miller's "Witness for Humanity: the Biography of Clarence E. Pickett." Speaking of a life of value! Extraordinary. And the whole account makes me see Quakerism in general in one of its best periods. Strange that I sleep so often in Waysmeet at Pendle Hill, Pickett's home. His ghost will hover there more meaningfully now.

Thursday, October 1, 1998

Alivizatos's group of essays arrived for the constitutional law issue of JMGS. Good! . . . Long lunch with Steve Scher. We might go with them to the opera near Cooperstown next summer. . . . John came in the afternoon and we did one more lesson in the Μια γιατί review series. Then in a flurry to get to White River Junction and meet Tom and Joan Wilson for supper, I was sure I'd deleted everything we did over the past two hours. Delightful supper with the Wilsons, who'll be entering Kendal in 2000 or 2001, just like us, presumably. Tom had a radical prostatectomy and is doing fine. Joan is eager to meet up with musicians here and will be bringing an electronic keyboard. . . . Returning home, I discovered to my relief that I hadn't lost our work after all, but had saved it on a floppy instead of the hard disk/finder. But also discovered that we had skipped lesson 5 inadvertently, so I did that one myself.

Cambridge

Supper at Giannino's with Meg Alexiou, who insisted on paying. We speculated on who will succeed her. Her favorite is Tziovas and her least favorite is Lambropoulos. I also wondered if Christos, now that Pavlos's future is settled (he'll go to England to live in the Haunch Lane house, which Christos has donated to the autistic society), will continue his campaign in Greece for autistic halfway houses. Surely he will not decide to relax now. Neither he nor I knows how. . . . Big disappointment earlier at Harvard Coop, where I went to buy another green book-bag and was told that they're not manufactured any longer. So, this has joined Caroid tooth powder as a staple of mine that I have lost. . . . To A.R.T. with Meg afterwards to see a play called "How I Learned to Drive" by Paula Vogel, very well acted by Debra Winger (the others being acceptable). I found it rather boring most of the way, although it began to hang together toward the end, and probably needs to be seen more than once, for, like modernist and postmodernist art, it doesn't go straight forward from beginning to middle to end, but backwards and sideways. So, the first viewing is disconcerting. The author is a feminist and Lesbian, and the play seems to be a study of the harm that men can do to women. But the man in question, "Uncle Peck," a 40+ year old who is irresistibly enamored of his 11- and then 17- and then 18-year-old niece, is too pathetic, really. The cards are all stacked against him, which hurts the play considerably. And his wife and mother-in-law are simply a chorus for the author's anti-masculinism. So, not a very satisfactory play; yet it's always nice to see good acting, which we did very well indeed since we were in the first row. Afterwards I missed my hat, so we walked back to Giannino's. It wasn't there. Then to Winthrop Entry K, where Meg is living (exactly where I lived in 1983), then back to A.R.T., where they had my hat waiting for me.

Brookline

Up early. Drove to Hellenic College, of course getting lost once or twice. Beautiful day. I'm sitting now on a bench on the lawn of this place, the former Weld estate, looking out over downtown Boston. My job today is to M-C the Greece in Print panel on travel writing, with Mike Antonakes, Lily Bitá, and Vangelis Calotychos. Bitá recited an amazing story of her "passage to India" to find Indians full of enthusiasm for Greece and things Greek. Mike Antonakes spoke well about Kazantzakis and Buddhism. Then we went out together for a cordial lunch. He is still teaching occasionally, and planning to stay in their house in Lynn. He surprised me by saying that there is no real community in Lynn; he is mostly alone. Strange. Hanover is much better. . . . Back to Hanover. Martin McKinsey sent forms for me to write, immediately: a testimonial for a Fulbright grant. So, here we go again.

To Princeton

By AMTRAK, slowly, to NYC and then by NJ Transit to Princeton Junction, using my computer to do more of the English-Greek lexicon, and reading the full dossier of the American Farm School trustees' meeting. Met at the station by Mike Keeley; to his home for supper with Mary and Dimitri Gondicas and Evie. Had a little time to speak about AFS with Mike. He feels that the new college must go to four years, indeed will save the rest of the school, whose program, he feels, is now passé since Greece must cease being primarily an agricultural nation. I find this strange, for Greece will still need farmers, although fewer. Mike feels that agricultural training is now as good if not better in Greek schools, and that the AFS no longer offers anything really special. We'll see. Furthermore, the farm, now surrounded by the city, should be sold or developed, especially now that the School has the Zannas farm in the countryside. . . . Our other time at dinner was spent mostly discussing MGSA. Dimitri and Mike are very worried. The Executive Committee is mediocre, they feel; the new constitution is ineffective; there is a vacuum of leadership. Another real problem is who will succeed me as editor of JMGS. We thought of Mark Mazower, John Iatrides, and Danny Danforth. . . . Mike is still suffering, mostly from his medications. Lacks energy. Has inadequate blood supply to the heart despite the stent in one artery. But he is delighted that his new book on Miller, Durrell, and Katsimbalis/Seferis is about to appear, including six pages on Karyotakis, responding to my complaint that Karyotakis had been overlooked. . . . Dimitri drove me to the apartment assigned me only to find that Claire Myones had forgotten to leave the key. So I spent the night at the Nassau Inn.

Good work with Mache on John's Μια ματιά, correcting and adding. Later, good work with Dimitri concerning Kazasis's remaining suggestions and those of Gonda Van Steen. More tomorrow.

Princeton–Pendle Hill

Finished vetting John's Μια ματιά and selections for proverbs and expressions. Drove to Pendle Hill in the late afternoon, arriving in time for supper. Liz says that my guidelines for cohabitation were not received very favorably by staff, but Dan demurred, saying that they want to keep the queries relating to the impact of cohabitation on the Pendle Hill community but to eliminate the queries that relate chiefly or entirely to the couples themselves—what they call the “marriage counseling” queries. So be it. . . . Played Starer and Schubert and Barber with Dan. Not too bad. Dan expanded to me at great length about his former wife, Betty Jean, from whom he's not divorced (strangely) and who is now seriously ill with cancer. He fears that his own resources will be attached so that she can go on Medicaid. A sad story of an alcoholic, self-destructive woman, according to his account: an aspiring actress who, after finally being given a leading role, decided she would quit the theater. Plus more of the same. When I hear such stories I of course am reminded of how blessed my own situation is. I am like Clarence Pickett who, near the end of his life, complained (after a fashion) that he'd never had occasion to suffer.

Chicago

Met at O'Hare by David and Leone Mirza, who then took me out to lunch, very graciously, and delivered me to the University Club on East Monroe Street. David was very lucid and informative on hedge funds, the volatility of the stock market; Leone was very helpful regarding bilingual education—she's an Armenian-American and therefore appreciates the problems of the Greek-American community. University Club is palatial. My room reminds me of the accommodations at the Hotel du Pont in Wilmington. And Chicago is lovely. So rich, so clean. I walked in the loop area, entered the Sears Tower to see the huge, fascinating Calder mobile in the lobby: sun, moon, stars, and a helix revolving, all hugely big, in keeping with the hugely big building. Then to the Greek Orthodox Cathedral where we had another Commission hearing, with John, Nick, John's employee in Chicago; Leone came too but sat in the back. A slightly different flavor here from Boston and New York. More emphasis on the need for centralization by the Archdiocese. Very articulate principals, and also a woman high up in the Chicago Public Schools' central office (the CPS is headed by Vallas, a Greek-American, who is now nationally celebrated for his accomplishments in upgrading the system). To bed at 11:00 p.m., Chicago time.

Friday, October 9, 1998

Chicago-Philadelphia

Up at 4:30 a.m. (ugh). Back to Pendle Hill via 6:20 a.m. plane from O'Hare. Our Books Committee lasted from 12 noon until 4:45 p.m. Approved the Pickett biography, thank goodness. Also Margaret Hope Bacon's "primer" on Quakerism. Rejected Emma Lapsanski's interviews of people who remembered the 1955 unification of Hicksites and Orthodox. And, surprisingly, everybody except one rejected the anthology of essays on Woolman. Liz Kamphausen is the sticky one; she doesn't like anything. . . . Had only an hour to play Starer and Barber with Dan. Then Rebecca joined us and we had a nice supper outside, talking mostly about Anna Mays's desire to go to Greece. Also, I read and vetted Dan's very fine essay on community. No fatigue at all, despite only four hours of sleep last night. My plane home was delayed. Finally reached Lebanon at midnight, still wide awake. Lovely reunion with Chrysanthi.

Sunday, October 11, 1998

Business meeting. Some people want to have two separate Meetings for Worship because of crowding. Happily, many were opposed. I came away with a pile of checks for depositing and bills to pay, now that I'm treasurer. Also, the Independent in London wants me to write an obituary for Lily Zografou. And Filia Macedon telephoned at 10:00 p.m. needing a testimonial by tomorrow. I spent many hours writing up the minutes for the Chicago Commission meeting. Luckily, that's finished.

Monday, October 12, 1998

Lunch with Tom Corindia. When I hear stories such as his I realize how fortunate we are. He has diabetes and isn't able to manage it successfully despite the injections he needs to give himself several times a day. His wife, Nancy, suffers from depression and has been in and out of the mental hospital. Now she's on even keel, with drugs. But until when? And their eldest, Nikos, has "attention disorder." Cannot concentrate. Cannot finish his homework. This, too, is now considered a disease, so he goes to a psychiatrist for treatment with drugs. What a mess! On top of that, the Hitchcock Clinic alliance is almost bankrupt because of bad mergers with local clinics. . . . Went to Jim Heffernan's inaugural lecture as the 2nd Beebe professor, following me. On rhetoric. Amusing but not deep. His 98-year-old mother was in the audience, looking about 70.

Tuesday, October 13, 1998

Took my presidential scholar, Sara Zoniga, to lunch. She's a dear, and is growing enthusiastic now about her work for JMGS. She actually finished two manuscripts and I gave her four more. She wants to travel to Greece, perhaps Santorini. . . . Working on Xenophon Kokolis's essay on Anagnostakis, which needs massive copyediting. I wanted to finish in time to bring it to him in Salonika, but I won't make it. . . . Nice talk with Darrel Mansell in Sanborn. He, too, has problems. Fearful of retirement because he doesn't know what he'll do. Poor guy! And his Italian wife wants to return to Italy, which he dreads for himself. I told him that usually I am more eager to go to Greece than Chrysanthi is.

Routine flight on Virgin Atlantic to London.

To London

Friday, October 16, 1998

London–Athens, Hotel Arethousa

A very full day. Routine flight, again via Virgin Atlantic, to Athens. Settled in Hotel Arethousa, Οδός Μητροπόλεως. Not bad; very cheap—δρ 24000 = $85.00. Walked around central Athens taking photos for Demotic Greek 1, mostly of Greek signs. Chrysanthi bought little dresses for Sophia and Christina. Then to Christos Alexiou's office, Αθανάς 2, which at first we couldn't find. With him to his apartment, Πλατεία Βικτορίας, pleasant reunion with Έρη and their daughter, Ασπασία-Μαρία, now ten years old, in fifth grade; acts like a little adult. Does she ever play? She's in the famous Αρσάκειο, Greece's first public school after the revolution. Christos brought me up to date on the offer by Crete University Press to translate and publish my Politics of the Spirit. Apparently it's going to happen. And the translator we approached, Ασπασία Λαμπρινίδου, has agreed to undertake the project. Christos telephoned her, and she said that she could come right over. So at 10:00 p.m. she arrived. A young woman, devoted to literature, who does translation on the side. Not very talkative, however. We all sat until 12:45 a.m. (!) talking with enthusiasm about literature. How nice! And Christos actually laughed, a rare occurrence. Christos wants to publish Ritsos's letters to me. I hope I can find them. . . . So we slept at 1:15 a.m., which of course was 6:15 a.m. Hanover time, just about the time to get up. But thanks to my feast-fast regimen, I had no jet lag.

Athens–Thessaloniki

Slept well. To the airport by 9:30, only to find that our plane is delayed an hour; doesn't leave until 1:15. Telephoned Vouli, who'll pick us up. Took more photos, against mostly of signs. . . . A nice quote from Proust's La Fugitive, included in a TLS review (October 9, 1998, p. 11): "L'homme est l'être qui ne peut sortir de soi, qui ne connaît les autres qu'en soi, et, en disant le contraire, ment." . . . Vouli, Lola, George, and Odysseas were waiting at the airport. Hugs and kisses. Then to seaside restaurant with Vouli and Lola for μύδια, οκταπόδι, etc.—a plunge into Greece. To the Farm School. Cocktails and dinner at the Drapers' house. Christine Lansdale came; I thought she was Tad! Started meeting other trustees, also David and Patty Buck. David is the headmaster elect, currently head of the Prague International School. He's interested in Alec for a principalship there next year. They are eager to learn Greek and want our books and tapes. Good beginning.

Kavala

AFS excursion to Eastern Macedonia. How amazingly developed everything seems: good roads, electricity everywhere, tractors, fertile irrigated fields. . . . To Amphipolis, but the museum was closed because it's election day. (Earlier, the guide took us to her polling place in Neapolis. Her school, formerly τῆς Νεαπόλεως, is now τῆς Νεαπόλης. Beautiful view. Then through Drama, and lunch there on the Nissaki island in the middle, with ducks swimming next to us. . . . Then to Philippi, to see (again) the stream in which St. Paul presumably baptized and the Baptistery of St. Lydia (the first European Christian), with beautiful mosaics in the dome, not the Pantocrator but St. John baptizing Christ. Then the impressive remains of the basilica at Philippi and the theater. . . . Then to Kavala. Hotel Philoxenia, high above the city. Cocktails. Then to the harbor for dinner.

October 19, 1998

Kavala–Thessaloniki

A long fascinating day. Began for me with a leisurely breakfast sitting next to trustee Eve Labouisse, whose husband was ambassador to Greece under Kennedy, just after Ellis Briggs, and whose mother was Eve Curie! An old woman still full of vitality, and speaking enough Greek still. . . . Interesting walking tour in Kavala to the home of Mehmet Ali, who became the Pasha of Egypt—a fascinating Turkish-style house. Coffee in the Foundation he established, now a restaurant for educational purposes, in the Imaret. . . . Then to the village of Nikisiani, way up the mountain, to a new κέντρο nestled between peaks, for a lunch of goat, lamb, σουτζουκάκια, halvah, and a breathtaking view. . . . Then to the extraordinary cave Alistrati, newly opened thanks to EU money. A fairyland of stalactites and stalagmites looking, to me, like Miss Havisham's cobwebbed living room in Great Expectations. The pedestrian walkway took us for a full kilometer through this magic of diverse forms, like pillars, like coral, like jellyfish, like the legs of sheep. . . . Finally through Serres (not very impressive, although I made Chrysanthi laugh because I pointed out all the stores where one could buy men's underwear—I forgot mine home) to the village of Chrissórata because 150 families from the village live in Worcester, Massachusetts, the home of one of our trustees. Grand welcome. Flowery speech by the village president, proud demonstration of the guesthouse paid for by remittances from Worcester, where the visiting Worcesterites can sleep; ceremonial coffee; loukoumia distributed to everyone. I sat with the new president-elect. He'd been a gastarbeiter in Germany for 19 years. Another man had been in Germany for 35 years and now enjoyed an ample German pension. The children are in law school, etc. The fields are fertile and are irrigated from the nearby lake. Again, the miracle of development. In Chrysanthi's childhood not far from here it was malaria and tuberculosis for everyone. . . . Back to AFS by 11:00 p.m., very tired.

As planned, this trip has enabled trustees to exchange conversation informally, and I feel I've gotten to know some of them—not all. They're quite a group. Two widows of ambassadors, one high official in the World Bank. And it was veyr nice, as I said earlier, to get to know David and Patty Buck. Turns out that her father's family were Quakers, named Hoag (I thought of Becky Hoag Shankland) and that she grew up in Greenwich, NY. David's family had a summer home on Friends Lake. Small world! I've heard a little about the school: for example that the college doesn't have many applicants, that English is taught very badly in the lyceum, which explains why so few lyceum graduates can be accepted into the college. Vouli feels that there's one very bad person, the one on charge of EU relations, and one very good man: the vice-principal, Tasos. I hope to speak in private to Tasos soon.

AFS

A full day at AFS, from 7:45 a.m. to 11:00 p.m. The student assembly is every weekday at 7:45. All students are present. This time each trustee was introduced. But first a student read from the New Testament in Greek, then in English, followed by a hymn sung by all (including Chrysanthi, who knew all the words) and everyone crossing himself or herself. Students actually looked quite reverential. Then the boy who had read the passage gave a presentation about his village, the ancestral village in Thrace, the exchange of populations, and the new village in Χαλκιδική. Very nicely done, with illustrations projected by an overhead projector. Afterwards, George Draper spoke in beautiful Greek about trustees, the day's arrangements, etc. . . . The rest of the morning was devoted to a tour of administrative offices: library, information center, EU coordination center, girls dormitory rooms with six beds, each with a teddy bear (or two or three); Turkish toilets across the hall. They put three Western toilets in as well, but the students prefer the Turkish style. . . . Big lunch, then two hours in the library with the director talking about his problems, chiefly owing to the school's desire to be accredited. The library needs extensive upgrading, but they don't know whether to buy books or CD-Roms. Big problems. . . . Afterwards, Finance Committee. More big problems, dipping into endowment because of cash flow problems, expectation to be saved by the Ministry of Agriculture and/or the EU. . . . A recess; finished reading over my Καπετάν Μιχάλης lecture, which needs lots of practice. . . . Then to dinner at Mr. and Mrs. Levis's apartment. US trustees, Greek trustees, and friends of the Levis, including Mr. Voutaris, the wine-maker, and his wife. He explained to me that οἶνος, wine, vin, and wein are cognates. Yesterday I learned that κρασί arose because they diluted the wine, or mixed it, with water. Thus κρασί (cf. κράμα = mixture). Supper; delicious meal, very European. The apartment is filled with paintings, including a very nice Sikeliotis of a nude girl and man. Levis is not Jewish. His father or grandfather was adopted by a Salonika Jewish family. In 1912 Venizelos appointed him mayor of the newly liberated Thessaloniki provided he change his name to a Greek one. He refused, and Venizelos relented and appointed him anyway.

Wednesday, October 21, 1998

American Farm School

In the morning, another moving assembly. Then a fascinating tour of the practical side of AFS: the winery (donated in part by ο Γιάννης Βουτάρης), with excellent dry red wine, and the girls pasting on the labels by hand; the hothouses, huge expanses; the machine shop, with power tools from Germany probably dating from the Occupation; the milk production unit, with explanation of how carefully the cows' teats are protected from infection after milking, and lots about artificial insemination to enhance genetically those features that create greater production of milk; finally the poultry houses, with old methods in one, modern methods in a second, and absolutely contemporary ones in a third. In the last two, everything is automatic: feed distribution, egg collection, waste removal. In the last (in which each hen spends her life in a cage), special feeds (e.g. oregano) given (a) to decrease the smell and, more importantly (b) to decrease the cholesterol and increase a nutrient that is good for human hearts. These eggs are twice as expensive, for obvious reasons. They have probably 20% less cholesterol. . . . This was followed by a staff/student mixer. I sat next to a recent graduate of the two-year college, now a new staff person, who was born and raised in Nigrita. But then Tasos, the vice-principal, came and spent a long time expanding on what Vouli had told me, about the Σατανάς, Micheliidis, head of EU relations and lifelong learning. Tasos says that because he brings in money he is impossibly arrogant and wants the tail (money) to wag the dog (AFS), destroying the school's spirit of cooperation, unity, and service. Κρίμα! I spoke to George Draper about this afterwards, in confidence, and he said he was aware of the problem and had almost fired Micheliidis but had ended by promoting him. It's almost impossible to fire anyone, and in this case he would demand $75,000 minimum severance pay and "hush money," not to bad-mouth the school. We'll see. In any case, George wants to settle this somehow before David Buck arrives. . . . Lunch with a young teacher of mathematics, a Cretan, who adores Kazantzakis. . . . In the afternoon, by van to the Zannas Farm, about an hour away. About 500 stremmata, nice flat land, next to the Axiós Ribver, thus ready for irrigation. But the buildings are in ruinous condition. A rig was drilling a well. Plans exist for restoring the buildings. David Acker hopes that the farm will become a well-known demonstration project for "ecological and organic farming." . . . We also had a Greek Summer meeting. They've run out of meaningful projects, it seems. I spoke about the Quaker work camp experience and suggested that they combine American and Greek youth into teams working with Albanian refugees, helping them to build homes (cf. Jimmy Carter's Habitat for Humanity), or otherwise to settle better. This would be a big change from the usual attitude condemning "those awful people who do nothing but steal," etc. . . . Then Chrysanthi and I went to one of the "clubs" functioning on Wednesday afternoons, to the one organized by the Cretan mathematician, whose hobby is traditional folk music. He played λαούτο and mandolin; others had guitars, bouzoukia, and drums. Lots of singing, too. And Manita, a trustee, added her voice and guitar very pleasingly. What a nice, varied life is possible at this school! . . . At 8:00 p.m. we all left for another splendid dinner, this time at the Panorama apartment (with paintings galore, and a view of the entire city) of Stavros and Loretta Constantinidis. Met the new American Consul-General, Stephenson; very nice; the one who was absent when I spoke to the group at the Foreign Service training school last year. He wants to arrange a lecture for me if we return. Also met several wealthy women who form a group that helps AFS students on the weekends, bringing them to cultural events in town if they can't go home to their villages.

Thursday, October 21, 1998

Another very full day. Σύναξη at 7:45 a.m. Three students spoke about their visit to America sponsored by AFS and 4-H. But they really didn't say much. No analysis; no meditation on the meaning (or lack of meaning) of their visit; just bare facts—we did this, then that. . . . From 9:00 to 1:00, formal meeting of the Corporation first, and then, quickly, the Board. Very well led by chairman Thomas and George Draper. Lots of committee business reported efficiently and approved without discussion, but lots of discussion about the Zannas Farm, Greek Summer, and, of course, finances. Nothing, strangely, about accreditation or expanding the college to four years. We meet again in NYC on February 19–20 and then (surprise) in Greece on May 20–21 followed by an excursion to Corfu. The decision to meet in Greece in May is because the Drapers will be leaving and an appropriate celebration will be organized. . . . After lunch, Vouli drove us to the Metropolitan Hotel, where I began by complaining about the price, which they lowered from 39,000 to 35,000. More shortening and tightening of the lecture, which I read aloud to Chrysanthi: 48 minutes. Then bus to the university with a bougatsa and Nes on the way. Dimitri already had the 115,000 drachmas I get paid. About $400. Perounias showed up, a linguist I'd last seen in Berkeley probably in the 1970s. Not a single teacher from the τμήμα. Oh well. . . . But my Cretan mathematician friends from AFS came, together with the school's φιλόλογος (Vouli's replacement), plus Vouli and Lena Stefa and a Ph.D. student I'd met in Oxford. No one from Chrysanthi's family. But the room was filled with students, including some standing in the aisles. How nice! That's the way it should be. The lecture went well. I had no trouble articulating the Greek. Questions afterwards were also easy to answer in Greek, although I had to be helped with the word στοιχειό (ghost—Kazantzakis's father). Afterwards, about a half dozen people came up to ask private questions, including a German (speaking Greek) who is writing a thesis on Kazantzakis's Οδύσεια. . . . Afterwards to Διαγώνιος with Vouli and Lena Stefa for γύρος και σουτζουκάκια. Walked back to the Metropolitan on the παραλία, part way with Lena, who is trying to read Ulysses. I'll send her the chart and my notes.

Friday, October 23, 1998

Long breakfast at the hotel with Victor Roudometof, who is now teaching at Anatolia College. It turns out that he can be a considerable help for the Archbishop's Commission (a) because of a relevant article he has just written, (b) because of his access to relevant statistics compiled by the Greek Ministry for the Διασπορά, (c) because he can usefully vet our draft report. So, I'd like to include him in our work as a consultant. . . . Mailed two heavy packets of papers and books (Stylianos's two latest) home, and sat in the Information Center of the British Council (the library was transferred to one of the "free" colleges now here) to write at length in this journal. . . . then to the university to meet Dimitri, who took us home for lunch. Their daughter, Angelica, is just back from school in Somerset, speaking English with a perfect British accent; their son, Frankiskos, is doing well at Anatolia College. Ruth is completing an interesting book approaching literary texts, including Beckett, via psychology—e.g., Molloy's complicated relationship with his mother. Dimitri wants to bring me here again for another collaboration at the university. We'll see . . . At 7:00, to Odysseas's and Eleni's. Lola was there, too. Supper, of course. Most of the time we had to listen to Odysseas and Lola screaming at each other (in a friendly manner) over politics—the recent elections—, also over Andreas Papandreou's Mimi vs. Clinton's Monica. Fortunately George and Efthymoula arrived later and asked for details about Alec's marriage in Jakarta and the celebration in Riparius, with George always asking, in each case, how much it cost and who paid. Then Stavros and Toula arrived to pick up their child, Αρθούλα, now about ten years old and very pretty. Stavros told me the latest tragedy. He'd purchased a large tract of land in Halkidiki, all forest, with 100-year-old pine trees, hoping to establish there a summer music camp. And last summer the entire forest burned. Nothing left except ashes. As for their house in Neapolis, at the other edge of Salonika, it's 80% finished, but how can they live there, it's so far away from the Odeon. They'd thought to put his parents in it, but his father died last year. Their family life is a continuous saga of bad plans, wasted money, and awful luck. Yet the Odeon continues with 200+ students, somehow. We'll see them again tomorrow night. Odysseas walked us back to the hotel, vociferating in a machine-gun-speed monologue without respite. When we entered the hotel both Chrysanthi and I sighed: "Ah, quiet at last!"

Saturday, October 24, 1998

Walked all the way down to the Museum of the Macedonian Struggle, housed in the beautiful nineteenth-century mansion of the Greek consul in the then Ottoman Salonika. Excellent photos, slide show, placards. Lots about Παύλος Μελάς, of course, and also something about Ίων Δραγούμης. It's hard to imagine the frenetic excitement when the Greek army entered the city in 1912, of course on October 26, the name day of Saint Demetrius. . . . Also stopped at City University, across the street from the museum; it now has the books that used to be in the British Council library. Walking slowly to Lola's, I sat on a bench near Πιάτσα Ναυαρίνου and was approached by one of the students who attended my lecture on Thursday. "What is your view of God?" he asked straight off. How nice! I said that God is just shorthand for . . . το ων, η ουσία, το σύμπαν, and that whatever we say about "him" automatically lessens "him"; therefore Quakers sit in silence. He is from Mykonos. Said that his λύκειο teacher gave them Ο τελευταίος πειρασμός to read. Όλοι οι καθηγητές ήταν φιλελεύθεροι. . . . Lunch with Κώστας και Λόλα. Too much meat, as always, but easy conversation. . . . Toula and Stavros were supposed to pick us up and they telephoned to say they were too busy. So we walked to Αμαλίας and got theater tickets for tonight. On the way back, stopped at the so-called Αρχαιολογικό Μουσείο, which is actually an art gallery. But most interesting of all is the building itself. We were told that in the nineteenth century and early twentieth it was used as a joint church-mosque-synagogue by Orthodox, Moslems, and Jews who developed joint services. Imagine! That's the sort of thing we never hear; yet it exists, and existed, at least to some small degree. And the building itself is beautiful, with a huge dome, Saint Sophia style. . . . Then a quick supper in our favorite restaurant: Οι Λύκοι (The Wolves). Disappointing. All different waiters and chef. But the old chef came in later. . . . Then to η Πειραματική Σκηνή, Οδός Αμαλίας, with Vouli, to see George Tabori's «Το κουράγιο της μητέρας μου», a largely autobiographical account of his Jewish mother's capture by Germans in Budapest and her dispatch in a cattle train to Auschwitz, but how she was saved by a German officer along the way, and returned safe to Budapest. The technique was very undramatic: narration by her son, played beautifully by Χρήστος Αρναμάλλης. But the mother was Έφη Σταμούλη, the mediocre actress who is the wife of the director and is thus given all the leading roles in this troupe's productions. Oh well . . . All the supporting players were better, so the net result was quite moving. And Chrysanthi and Vouli both liked it.

Sunday, October 25, 1998

Chrysanthi went to Vouli's to see if they can buy tickets for the Prague Symphony tonight at the Μονή Λαζαριστών, where Dimitri did the glass railings. I am this moment watching in television the very special service at the Αγία Μονή Ξενοφώντος Αγίου Όρους, celebrating its 1000th anniversary. The Patriarch is there; he was just given some golden medals. So is the Archbishop of Greece. And Stephanopoulos, the Greek president, and all the ministers of state, including the Minister of Culture, Ευάγγελος Βενιζέλος, whom I met. The abbot just delivered a colorful speech in church katharevousa; now Stephanopoulos is speaking in demotic, about the invaluable tradition preserved in such monasteries, and the hope that the Turkish government will learn to value to Patriarchate in Istanbul. . . . Now Patriarch Bartholomew is speaking, in a clear, deep voice, again in church katharevousa. He is saying nice things about the Christian κήρυγμα—e.g., it hopes for ελευθερία από των παθών. Η εκκλησία δεν πολεμά· σώζει. He spoke against rabid nationalism as well as individualism. . . . To George's and Efthymoula's for lunch. Dimitri and Tilda and child came. George has recurrence of prostate, with PSA of 2. He is interested in hearing about any new therapy that is developed in the US that I hear about. Dimitri is about to develop a web site for his business, and has just purchased a “notebook” computer. And soon will have e-mail. They'd all like to come to America but cannot afford it. So they buy lottery tickets and hope. . . . Zetta Farinou telephoned earlier and came to see us at 6:00 p.m. We sat for 1½ hours in a café near Διαγώνιο and talked about literary affairs, the μεταρρύθμιση, etc. She's discouraged regarding the quality of students studying philology now. They learn facts by heart, not much more. . . . Then with Vouli to Μονή Λαζαριστών to hear the Prague Symphony do pieces by Smetana, Wieniawski, Wexman, and Dvořák, the 2nd and 3rd with a fine Greek violin soloist, Χρήστος Γαλιλαίας. But all the music was mediocre. Still, it's nice to hear a fine orchestra. . . . Joann Ryding was there, from the Farm School.

Athens, Hotel Phoinix

Vouli drove us to the Salonika airport. Breakfast there at exorbitant prices (\$4.00 for a cup of coffee). Taxi to Hotel Phoinix in Glyfada, near the airport. Then immediately taxi to Αγία Παρασκευή, a 45-minute ride. Greeted by Mr. and Mrs. Demos and Iason. Demos was a teacher; applied for headmastership of Pinewood but lost the job to George Draper. Little by little went into the photography business, chiefly as a representative in Greece of foreign photographers. They had prepared some slides for us, and we chose about twenty of them as appropriate. These need to be scanned into the computer and then returned for negotiation regarding price, which Demos says he'll keep as low as possible. Also, someone here could take photos in Athens by pre-order. They also showed us magnificent photos by Manos, who lives in Boston. To use these we'll need to negotiate directly with the photographer. All in all, a useful visit. They then took us out to lunch, after finding most restaurants closed on Monday, but finally one open in Halandri. Very grateful for my care of Iason at Dartmouth. Iason is working for them in the interim before he begins his military service of 18 months. We finally got a taxi back to Glyfada (another  $\frac{3}{4}$  hour ride), telephoned Christos to say we were too tired to go downtown, telephoned General Macedon to send greetings from Filitsa (but it's doubtful that he understood), walked along the seashore, visited a Luna Park, returned to the hotel, and thankfully went to bed at 8:30 p.m. (Last night,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  hours of sleep only.) In Glyfada we saw a hotel that's been converted into a sort of CCRC. How nice!

Athens-London

Routine flight to Heathrow. Tube to Russell Square. We have a double room on the third floor of the Penn Club with bath "en suite," very fancy. Went out immediately to find Lloyds Bank and Boots (for baby supplies for Daphne). It's quite a shock to encounter the darkness and rain of London after so much Greek sunshine. Stopped to find Rowena Loverance in her office but she was gone. Then back to Piccadilly by foot. Spaghetti dinner in a restaurant I remembered in Haymarket. Then to Comedy Theatre for its double bill, Stoppard's "The Real Inspector Hound" and Schaffer's "Black Comedy," acted by the same cast, more or less. Both plays brilliant, funny, marvelously acted. Why is it that British actors are so much better than American ones, in body movement, voice quality, everything? The theatre was filled with teenagers; that's how a theatrical tradition continues. In "Hound," two critics watching a who-done-it are confused with the characters themselves. The pompous language of their criticism is delicious, a parody of how we scholars and critics pontificate. The Schaffer play brilliantly reverses lighting. When the fictional lights are on, the stage is black (!). When a fictional fuse blows and the plot is plunged into darkness, the stage lights go on full force. When the "dark" room is lit by a match or cigarette lighter, the stage lights dim to half-force. All this, combined as it is with slapstick: actors groping in the "darkness," bumping against things (and each other) in hilarious ways, is delicious. So we concluded a very pleasant first day in London at 11:00 p.m., British time, 1:00 a.m. Greek (and our body) time.

The Penn Club

Tried to talk to two Germans at breakfast without much success. Chrysanthi took off by herself to go to Marks and Spencer in Oxford Street to buy turtlenecks. I found another Lloyds Bank and got more £, which don't last long here. Then to Euston to get a rail schedule for Gatwick. Then to Friends House Library. Nice conversation with the people there regarding our Pendle Hill publications, the three books we recently approved and they'll be receiving. Asked for news about Woodbrooke. The man lamented the lack of academic rigor there, as do I. . . . Jay Bruce, the born-again Christian Dartmouth student who took several of my classes and also assisted me with JMGS, wanted to see me. He's now at Oxford, finishing another B.A., this one in theology. We had a nice lunch together; he has a good memory—asked about Leander's tinnitus, Alec's situation in Indonesia, the farm (which he had visited). He is hoping to teach next year in an independent school for a few years and then to return for a Ph.D. and possible ordination. His B.A. thesis is on "The Theology of Pleasure." Interesting! His tutor predicts that he'll get a First. I said I'd try to help him re: Quaker schools or international schools. . . . Walked all the way to the Old Vic, getting lost a bit. Saw an amazingly effective production of Amadeus directed by Peter Hall, with a splendid Salieri played by David Suchet, and an equally splendid Mozart (Michael Sheen). Again, the magic of live theater! Then rushed via tube to Senate House, Malet Street, to hear Frank Kermode lecture on Cleanth Brooks. Met a nice man on the tube going to the same place, a Mr. Bushey, an American forty years in London, a lawyer working for the U.N. The lecture was very reminiscent for me re: new criticism vs. historicism (Douglas Bush), vs. theory vs. New Historicism. Nice talk afterwards with a young Canadian who just finished his doctorate here in American Studies, which are now offered in twenty or thirty British universities. Hors d'oeuvres afterwards at the reception, plus lots of wine, all deliciously gratis.

To the new British Library. Contrary to the press releases, Chrysanthi and I found it very pleasing both inside and out—more than pleasing: grand in the best sense, μεγαλοπρεπής. I even secured my reader's ticket, good for five years. Will I ever do research in London again? Perhaps on "light" for a Pendle Hill pamphlet. . . . Back to the Penn Club to meet Lewis Owens, the Cambridge Ph.D. candidate in theology who has been working so well on Kazantzakis. He sees Kazantzakis's "blasphemous" ideas as straight from Boehme and the Buddhists. And he has discovered, in the Iraklion museum, which houses Kazantzakis's library, 50 relevant books with underlining and often an indication that they were purchased in Vienna or Berlin when Kazantzakis was developing his ideas for Ασκητική. Lewis gave me the dissertation as it now stands, about half finished. But he doesn't know Modern Greek, alas. Also, he has run out of money and will need to leave Cambridge for nine months in order to work and save for next year. I'll try to help him, and already have written numerous testimonials to granting agencies, none of which gave him anything. . . . To the Gielgud Theatre for Michael Frayn's amusing "Alarms & Excursions," a series of five or six short plays, extremely funny, extremely biting toward modern urban life with its plethora of machines and gadgets. A bit like a Greek επιθεώρηση, without the music, song, and dance. Once again, actors playing multiple roles convincingly, so one is actually surprised that the actor or actress is the same person. . . . By tube to the Barbican. Rush hour. Thousands of people rushing up, rushing down. We're glad we don't live here. But where else can one find such exquisite theater? . . . Good lamb (better than in Greece) in the Barbican Terrace Café, where we shared many meals with Daphne and Greg in the past. The RSC performance of Sheridan's The School for Scandal struck us as labored: trying too hard, with the effect being chiefly of people trying too hard. But the second part went better, and of course has delicious scenes, especially the "usury" with Charles Surface, the dissolute son, and Sir Oliver Surface (impersonating the moneylender's accomplice, played excellently by Tim Wylton). But the Jewish moneylender, Moses, is embarrassing to put on stage nowadays, but of course was real then, I suppose. He recommends interest of 50% if Charles isn't really too bad off, and of 100% if he is desperate for money. The moral of the play is of course all too clear; there's very little subtlety here. . . . On the way out, a pleasant voice cried, "Hello, Professor Bien!" It was a Byzantinist from King's and her husband and son (who complained that the play lacked scenery). She told me about the graduate seminar at King's tomorrow. . . . Home via tube, very tired. Gave one ticket, which strangely had not been gobbled by the machine, to someone who was begging for a way home. (London has its share, it seems, of the destitute.)

Nice conversation at breakfast—finally!—with an American academic, John Shawcross, then with a British woman from Lancashire who has macular degeneration of the retina and expects to go blind. She is down to meet with a support group. Thinking of my father's unwillingness to prepare himself for blindness, I asked her if she were learning Braille. She said No, just like him, alas. . . . By tube to Piccadilly, to the Royal Academy for a very unusual exhibit: Picasso's work in ceramics. At age 65+ he developed this interest in the south of France (e.g., Antibes), where he found some very skilled ceramic craftsmen who could execute his designs. And what a variety of designs! Plates, pots, jugs, statue-like columns, all executed with superb skill. Much inspiration from ancient Greek forms, too. . . . An interlude in Fortnum & Mason's, not buying anything, but enjoying some free samples of delicacies. . . . To the National Gallery, which in the past I've often done in a hurry. This time we went leisurely, first through the eighteenth-century wing, then in the older wing to see El Grecos, Rembrandts, Vermeers, and my favorite Michelangelo painting, the one that is only half finished. There are also wonderful Cézannes, Van Goghs, Monets. . . . To King's College. Roddy Beaton welcomed us with a lovely smile. To the graduate seminar, a paper on Cavafy's abandonment of the πολιτικός στίχος (δεκαπεντασύλλαβος), with some parallels with Ezra Pound. David Ricks in charge. The student said that Maronitis declares that Achilles and Patroclus were lovers (he was reading Cavafy's "Τα άλογα του Αχιλλέα."

I wondered. Achilles seems extremely heterosexual in the Iliad. Also, I wondered if Pound was right in claiming that iambic pentameter needs to be “heaved” away in English in order to approach the speech rhythms of the people. Iambic is the natural speech rhythm of English. Nice to see such a large group of M.A. and Ph.D. candidates at King’s. But I was disappointed at Iason’s thesis, which I read on the plane from Athens, and David told me that Iason received a mere pass. Too bad. Afterwards—surprise—Judith Herrin appeared, just back from Vienna (?) and about to leave for Athens. We shared a few moments together with her and Roddy. . . . Then to the Haymarket for Tom Stoppard’s “Invention of Love.” I’d read it last year and found it tedious. I found—we found—the production equally tedious. It reminded me of Kazantzakis’s plays, all declamation, no action. Of course it had its moments, especially at the start when Housman has died and finds himself approached by Charon to be rowed across the Styx, and is told “You’ll find a three-headed dog at the other side. Just ignore him and he’ll ignore you.” The subtext is homosexuality, quite suppressed in the play, just as it was in A. E. Housman’s life. But the hints are obvious enough for those in the know, especially the material relating to Oscar Wilde’s trial (I’d finished reading “Gross Indecency” a few days ago and was very aware of all this—for example, the cue words “posing as . . .” Everyone is in the play: Jowett, Pater, Frank Harris, Jebb. The jibes against pedantry are poisonous. So it’s intellectually stimulating, but is not theater. John Shawcross, a retired professor from Kentucky who became my breakfast partner at the Penn Club, called Stoppard a “charlatan.” Too strong perhaps, but I’m amazed that this very poor play has received so much praise and sells out night after night to capacity audiences.

A splendid final day in London. Pleasant breakfast again with Professor Shawcross. Walk in the rain—rain all day, sometimes hard—to Courtauld Gallery, which reopened only yesterday after a closing for refurbishment. A treasure house of impressionists and also of Rubens, especially his “Wrath of Achilles” and “The Death of Achilles,” two studies done as designs for tapestry. Another surprise: Cranach’s famous “Adam and Eve.” Still another, a small room filled with canvases by Vanessa Bell, Roger Fry, and Duncan Grant, with a striking self-portrait by Fry. Bell and Grant strike me as mediocre, however. But the glories on the third floor are the impressionists: Manet's "A Bar at the Folies Bergère," which the museum placard rightly calls "magisterial." I particularly loved Cézanne's "Le Lac d'Annecy," with its gleaming blues. . . . Then across Westminster Bridge to meet Peter and Jackie Mackridge at the National. Leisurely lunch there with them, joking about our "profiles"—more fiction than fact—in Ta Néa recently. (But I forgot to mention another surprise at the Courtauld, a special exhibit on drawings, with all the modes on display—graphite, chalk, carbon, quill pen—for the spectators to try out, and then each masterwork identified with its particular mode made clear. There were drawings by Michelangelo, Van Gogh, Cézanne, Rubens, Constable, Canaletto. Beautiful.) . . . Then a magnificent production of Antony and Cleopatra at the Olivier, all 3¾ hours of it. Shakespeare's skill is such that although both Antony and Cleopatra are dissolute, unheroic, weak, they (especially Cleopatra) nevertheless capture our sympathy sufficiently so that their deaths, especially Cleopatra's, are moving. Antony comes close, however, to failing this heroic stature, especially when he insists on fighting by sea at Actium against everyone's advice, and then cowardly follows Cleopatra's ship when she abandons the battle. And when Enobarbus leaves him to go to Octavian's side, this is almost confirmation of his (Antony's) degeneracy. On the other hand, he is the remnant of a great leader, one ruined by an excess of passion. He is a "strumpet's fool," like Bill Clinton. . . . After this feast, it seemed wrong to want more, or to be able to stomach more. But we had a 2½ hour interval, ate crêpes leisurely off St. Martin's Lane and then saw an equally magnificent show: Racine's Britannicus, very connected with Antony and Cleopatra, of course, because it continues Roman history, Junie at the end throwing her arms in desperation around the feet of the cult statue of Augustus (i.e., Octavius Caesar), as the only representation of virtue. The depiction of Nero's pathology, and especially of the evil counselor, Narcissus, is brilliant. An unrelentingly intense play, from the first moment to the last, with Toby Stephens as Nero and Diana Rigg as his powerful mother, Agrippina. In the RSC production of Antony and Cleopatra, Alan Rickman played a powerful Antony and Helen Mirren, a famous screen actress, a captivating Cleopatra. . . . A wonderfully stimulating day; we felt very fulfilled as we walked back, still in the rain, to the Penn Club for our last night's sleep.

Hanover

John Hennessey and Len Cadwallader delivered my Kendal Chair, with a brass plate attached recognizing me as founder, leader, and esteemed colleague 1986–1998. Very nice of them. . . . Daphne and Christina are here. Greg had to return yesterday. I've been playing nursery rhymes for Christina.

November 12, 1998

Big trouble in Jakarta again. Students killed. Alec telephoned and sent an e-mail. Mrs. Haskin sent an e-mail. They're all OK, but Alec had to close the school today. He and Monica are packing and getting ready to ship everything, including some furniture, in a container. We're glad they're leaving, but of course Monica will have big worries about her family. They're meant to return here in early January.

November 13, 1998

Cambridge

To Cambridge to hear Dimitri Tziovas's Christopher lecture, a very fine one about developments in Modern Greek pedagogy, from the "continuity hypothesis" to the "polarity hypothesis" (e.g., Hellene vs. Romios). He recommends focusing now on hybridity. Good! Nice dinner afterwards at the Harvard Faculty Club. Had a chance to visit with Meg and Michael, Nea Herzfeld, Dia Philippides's cousin, a wealthy woman who raises money for the Cambridge Greek Orthodox Church School, which is very successful, she says. Why? Money!

Sunday, November 15, 1998

Quaker Finance Committee meeting in the morning. Then I performed, with Peter Saccio, Jim Heffernan, Lawrence Davies, and others, in Gross Indecency, the moving play about the three trials of Oscar Wilde. I was the Judge in Act I, and Gill and Lockwood, the prosecutors, in Act II. I had wanted to play the professor, lampooning him, but the director didn't like my interpretation and gave the part to Davies, who did it very well indeed. Good audience, including Ned, Steve, Brock Brower, Alison Clarkson, the Champions. Very few students. The audience was attentive; no yawns. I'm hoping that Jim will organize Act III of Man and Superman for next year.

Princeton

Up at 4:45 a.m. yesterday for the 6:00 a.m. flight to Philadelphia. Arrived at Princeton at 9:30 and began to work immediately with Mache, correcting the Επανάληψη sections for lessons 10, 11, and 12 that John and I did recently. Not bad. Most of the Greek is OK. Long lunch yesterday with Dimitri bringing each other up to date. Lunch with Mike Keeley today in Prospect. He's on strict non-meat diet because of his heart trouble, but otherwise doing well. He just gave a gift of $25,000 to the American Farm School. He has no children and lots of money, so is thinking of his favorite charities. He continues to feel that my role on the AFS board should be to help the College become viable. Μακάρι. Supper with Mache and a nice Greek from Thessaloniki, Νίκος Πάνου, just graduated from the Aristotelian University and hoping to do a Ph.D. in Comparative Literature at either Harvard or Princeton. He is a native of Mytilene and says that he used to swim by the Fykiotrypa rock described so lovingly by Myrivilis.

Thursday, November 19, 1998

Princeton–Washington

Dimitri and I, and sometimes Mache, have been going over Peter Mackridge's grammatical corrections very carefully. They're most helpful, indeed lifesavers. Lunch with Mache. She's going to have a baby in March. How will she ever continue her studies? . . . Drove back to Philadelphia and met Chrysanthi on the Vermonter AMTRAK, which took us to Washington, to Leander's.

Friday, November 20, 1998

To Ballston on the Metro. Spoke to Jim Miller's State Department class on "Inventing Greece." Lots of questions during the talk instead of after it, basically on the difference between ethnicity and nationalism as a motivating force. Maybe the poetry would have been better. But at least I was able to elaborate on Korais and katharévousa, which they hadn't heard about at all, as yet. . . . Afterwards, to the National Gallery. An interesting show on Edo art and culture, meaningful of course because of our visit years ago to the Edo Tokyo Museum in Tokyo. There was a special ceremony today, with about thirty Japanese singing and then doing an acrobatic show in which three of them, successively, climbed a huge ladder held vertical by the others and then at the top turned upside down, hung on with no hands, etc. . . . Also shown was some of Jock Whitney's collection, paintings I'd seen in the American Embassy in Regents Park when Chrysanthi and I were invited there in 1958 as Fulbrighters by Whitney, then our ambassador. But for me the best part was the rooms in the West Building devoted to El Greco and Rembrandt. "Christ Cleaning the Temple" (like the one in the Frick), a powerful St. Jerome, nude, and the famous "Laocoön" and "St. Martin and the Beggar" by El Greco. Wonderful. Of the Rembrandts, I particularly liked "A Polish Nobleman," the 1659 self-portrait (but still not as good as the one in the Frick), and the wonderful Apostle Paul. A real treat. . . . Then to Union Station for a good cup of coffee and some sorbet, and back to Rockville on the Red Line, reading a helpful primer on the E.U. that I got at the Foreign Service School this morning. . . . Read stories to Sophia. Watched television news and discussion regarding the impeachment hearings that took place yesterday. As Leander said, "It's theater!" But where is the Shakespeare or Ibsen to make it truly theater? . . . Learned tonight that Deanna is pregnant gain. Due in early June.

Washington

To Kennedy Center with Deanna in the evening. First time I've seen the rebuilt concert hall, very nice, with seats now in back of the stage, and vastly improved acoustics. James DePriest conducting, a black man with polio, heavy steel braces on his legs, just like FDR. He hobbles up to the podium, manages to ascend somehow, seats himself on a swivel chair, hands his crutch to a violist, who lays it on the floor, and is ready to begin. Very moving. Brahms's exquisite "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," a bit energy-less, maybe too slow, but still exquisite. Then the great cellist János Starker playing first Haydn's Concerto in D, then Tchaikovsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme." I like the Haydn more. In both, of course, Starker's extraordinary technique was evident: a real show, but also musical. But the "hit" of the evening was Lutoslawski's "Concerto for Orchestra," for a huge orchestra including two harps, piano, celeste, xylophone, drums of all sorts. Exciting, percussive, but also contrapuntal music that showed off the orchestra—the lovely flutist, for example. We were in the circle, looking down on everyone, and thus easily able, visually, to follow the orchestration: English horn, timpani, tuba, trombones, a long solo by violas, etc. We had entered via the stage door with Deanna, and were able to look out onto the stage from the wings, mingling with the orchestra players in tails waiting to go on.

. . . During the day, I entered on computer the changes we'd done in Princeton owing to Peter Mackridge's very fine vetting of my grammar.

Sunday, November 22, 1998

Out for lunch to a diner: pancakes and ham. Then to a nearby park, playing hide and seek with Sophia and walking in the brisk air. In the evening, Grant Thompson and his wife Sharon picked us up and we went out with him for supper in Bethesda. Lovely visit 6:30 to 9:30 with easy flow of conversation. Happily, Grant is doing well again, after being fired as head of the Library project in NYC. He is now a consultant helping CEOs of giant corporations to be more effective, for which he charges $2400 a day! ($300 an hour!) But he has terrible chronic prostatitis, forcing him to urinate once an hour. No cure in sight. Sharon is doing better also. She's holding down a job in real estate, and she refused wine at dinner (she's an ex- (I hope) alcoholic. Daughter Carrie, only two years out of Haverford, is working as a paralegal in the White House. Son Ben is a bicycle delivery boy in San Francisco, married to a woman with rings through all the secret places on her anatomy. Grant embarrassed me when he asked what I've been reading and I had to answer, "Only books submitted to Pendle Hill Publications or sent me by World Literature Today for review. He reads copiously, goes regularly to ballet, opera, and theater (he's seen Gross Indecency twice). Good life. And D.C. is getting better, he assured us. I was pleased to learn that David Kendall, President Clinton's lawyer so much in the news these days, is a Quaker member of Florida Avenue Meeting.

Monday, November 23, 1998

Finished reading Pendle Hill pamphlet submissions for December and typing my review. One is by Kenneth Boulding, a possible reprint, but much too flowery for my taste. The one on Quakerism and science is excellent. . . . Raked leaves with Leander and Sophia, who disappeared in the large piles into which she jumped with glee.

Thursday, November 24, 1998

Washington

Treated myself to the Phillips Gallery. What a treasure! I'd last been there with Richard Dellamora during an MLA, probably 15 or 20 years ago. The special exhibit of impressionist paintings of winter was disappointing except for the Monet canvass of ice breaking upon the Seine, and four of the twenty-five amazing wheatstack paintings he did, each one slightly different. But the permanent collection is exquisite, starting with the two depictions of Repentant St. Paul, one by El Greco, ca. 1605, the other by Goya, ca. 1820, the first bright, full of color, showing a magnificent figure in pain, the Goya dark, colorless, showing an ugly insignificant-looking man, also in pain. As a painting, the El Greco is immediately more striking, indeed one of the most stunning El Grecos I've seen; but the Goya is truer. Both of course carry the keys to the kingdom. Other delights: four dual-color canvasses by Rothko, each with a slightly different combination of colors. Very soothing. A lovely Van Gogh, "The Road Menders" (1889) with monumental trees in a village square. And the pride of the museum: Renoir's huge "The Luncheon of the Boating Party," as large and striking as the great Manet bargirl at the Courtauld in London, and happier. I also particularly liked Delacroix's "Paganini," conveying the diabolical streak of the violinist; two Cézannes: "Woman in Blue" with its lovely shades of blue, and of course yet one more "Mt. Sainte-Victoire" (1887). There's a nice Picasso, "Bullfight" (1934) and a splendid Eakins portrait of a Miss Van Buren (ca. 1891). Plus Hopper's "Winter," O'Keeffe's "Dove," Marsden Hartley's "Wood Lot, Maine Woods" (1920). And more, of course. . . . A sandwich in Starbuck's Dupont Circle, where I discovered that my hotel is no more, alas. . . . Home. Then to a first-class fish restaurant with Chrysanthi, Deanna, and Leander (the babysitter keeping Sophia): oysters Rockefeller. Memories of New Orleans. Then to a wholesale shopping extravaganza. Bought garlic.

Wednesday, November 25, 1998

Finished writing a book report yesterday for World Literature Today. This morning sight-read Schubert impromptus, practiced Barber, and then had a nice lesson from Leander on Barber, mostly, the Schubert march, and Starer. . . . To town, Chinatown, to lunch with Dennis Carroll, who is excited about yet another novel he's writing (he rises at 4:00 a.m. in order to work before going to his job at the General Accounting Office (GAO), where he'll be able to retire in seven years at age 55 with full benefits. And of course he brought along a 250-page manuscript for me to read. How nice if he could get published finally! I hadn't realized that the sleazy character in the play he wrote about academia was based on Leon Black. Stupid of me. Afterwards, he took me to the GAO, whose endless corridors seem directly out of Kafka: hundreds of individual cubicles, spacious enough, each with a single individual and a huge, expensive computer, and everyone seemed to be working. The GAO, Dennis explained, is an arm of Congress and is meant to investigate the Executive Branch. Speaking of the Executive Branch, I recommended that Dennis go see "Gross Indecency," which is playing now in D.C., and write a similar play about Clinton–Starr–Lewinsky & Co. But he is too engrossed at the moment in his novel. He introduced me to a nice colleague who is also a writer on the side, and then telephoned his father, Admiral Carroll, who was at Dartmouth two days ago, speaking for our Peace Studies program. He said that all went well but that everyone was wondering where I was. Ironically, Admiral Carroll was the one who knew, since I'd written him to say ironically that I'd be in D.C. He couldn't see me this afternoon because he was just about to be interviewed on CNN, twice. So Dennis and I left together. He took me through an amazing building, the Pension Building, built after the Civil War to serve the army pension system. A huge central atrium supported by Corinthian columns. Lovely. . . . Then I went off to the Space Museum on the Mall, always a favorite. The Wright plane, Lindbergh's Spirit of St. Louis, and next to it the plane that recently went clear round the earth without refueling. Wright's flight at Kitty Hawk lasted less than one minute and traversed all of about 200 feet, yet it solved many of the problems that were to make later development possible. Space capsules, missiles, a piece of metal from the moon, demonstration of the principles of flight: lift, thrust, drag. I had only  $\frac{3}{4}$  of an hour, alas. Had to get back to Rockville by 4:00 p.m., since Leander was meeting Susie Buseck there, too, at that time. She's here with friends for the holidays and came to have supper with us tonight. We delivered her later to her friend, and roommate, who is visiting her parents in Silver Spring. Leander suspects that they are Lesbians.

Thanksgiving. Steve and Perry came: interesting, considerate companions, as always. Lots of admiration for Leander's new G3 Powerbook computer, which he just set up last night. I've borrowed the installations disk for his Microsoft Word 98, since it can draw boxes and produce colors, all of which will be good for our Demotic Greek revision. Turkey dinner with all the trimmings. Chrysanthi made spinach, Steve brought sweet potatoes and cranberries and homemade ginger ice cream and a good French wine (which the two of us finished). Apple, pumpkin, and pecan pie afterwards followed by liqueurs in the living room. Very civilized. After they left we watched a movie on television featuring an eight-year-old boy, which fascinated Sophia. Early to bed, in order to rise at 5:30 a.m. tomorrow and take the Metro to Union Station in time for AMTRAK back to Hanover. All in all, a pleasant, varied week, mixture of work and play, and of course heaven for Sophia, for she had Yiayia's full attention from morn till night.

AMTRAK

Eleven hours on AMTRAK from D.C. to White River Junction. Very relaxing. Very good for work on the computer. But when we got home we received messages that Mother had had congestive heart failure again, had to be placed on oxygen, was hallucinating, couldn't breathe, swollen feet and legs. We rushed over. She was in skilled nursing, but much better, totally stabilized. Invited us to lunch tomorrow!

Saturday, November 28, 1998

Mother quite silent at lunch. Didn't eat anything. We brought her back to bed. It seems clear that she should be transferred to skilled nursing permanently.

Sunday, November 29, 1998

A good Meeting. I ministered about Admiral Carroll. Lunch with Nodas, Soderbergs, Audrey. Dinner party with Elliotts, Dick Williamson, and Laasperes. Nice to have old friends.

Monday, November 30, 1998

Our interview at Kendal for admission to the Ready List. Hélène went over the contract, then spoke about Quaker values; Louise Mertel discussed insurance. Then lunch with two residents. The full ritual, although for us it was a bit redundant. Hélène says it will be 2½ years before an apartment is ready, but Chrysanthi wants to wait five years. We'll probably compromise at 4+. . . . To UPNE afterwards to see Mike Burton about formatting our book. He's had success so far with the disk I gave him.

Tuesday, December 1, 1998

To see John Rassias, who had a cataract and glaucoma operation yesterday. He seems fine. Wants to go to the American Farm School again for a second workshop.

Wednesday, December 2, 1998

Jim Sharpe, the broker who has taken over from Hank Elitzer at Paine Webber, visited. He's a former football coach and looks it. Adopted two Chinese girls; was intrigued that I had two Chinese daughters-in-law. . . . Then back to Kendal to complete our admissions process: nurse practitioner, then back to Hélène. Good session with the social worker, Donna LaFleur, who was intrigued that neither of us in our written declarations had remembered any real sadness. She elicited some good articulation from me, I hope, regarding philosophy of life—and death. . . . They decided to move Mother to Vining 70, skilled nursing. All the furniture will go, too, except the bed, so she'll be in a very similar environment but with much more attentive care. Actually she's much better; the swelling has subsided, appetite has returned. But the nurse practitioner said that she's probably not going to live more than a few months more. . . . Nice music with Dick and Allan. Four Handel sonatas and Vivaldi. . . . And John Radebaugh then brought me a packet of materials on F.U.N.D. to take to Pendle Hill tomorrow.

To Pendle Hill

To Fleet Bank for the semiannual review of the A. F. Bien Trust and Mother's custody account. Both doing very well indeed. I alerted them to the possibility of Mother's death soon, and they recommended lots of gifting. . . . To Ledyard Bank to open a F.U.N.D. account. Now at $1300. . . . Then to lunch with Sara Zuniga, my presidential scholar helping with JMGS. She delighted me by finishing all the manuscripts I'd given her and then expressing how much she'd learned, and giving me a present (and a hug). I should have given her a present, but I've given her three or four fancy lunches at the Inn. . . . To Pendle Hill by air and Avis. Supper with Roland Ellis, who is very friendly. Also Larry Ingle. Then music with Dan: Starer, Barber, Schubert. Dan was expressive about his great difficulty: his ex-wife (whom he never divorced) is dying of cancer and he fears that she'll run out of money and he'll be responsible. He visits her in New York City weekly.

Friday, December 4, 1998

Pendle Hill

After Meeting, I told everyone about F.U.N.D. and placed the flyer in people's mailboxes. Many expressions of support. . . . Publications Committee without Rebecca, who's in Zimbabwe. Mary Barnes substituted, very nicely. They rejected a piece on science and religion that I thought splendid. Too bad. Accepted one on prison visitation by Keith Maddock, my friend in Toronto Meeting. . . . Supper with Caroline Jones and Doug Gwyn. I've agreed to edit his new book on the Seekers. . . . Executive Board: they finally accepted my cohabitation regulations, after revisions by staff. Let's see now if this new approach—queries rather than rules—works.

Saturday, December 5, 1998

Pendle Hill

After the Board lunch, I sat as consultant with the Search Committee for Dan's replacement. No names yet, but ideas about where to advertise. Also, we changed the name of the job from Executive Secretary to Director. Good! Also, we determined that the candidate does not have to be a member of the Religious Society of Friends. Good!

Sunday, December 6, 1998

Pendle Hill

Mike Keeley called. Wants to use one of my paragraphs as a blurb for his new book. With pleasure. Told me that Gourgouris was denied tenure by the Comparative Literature department. Hellenic Studies was not involved at all. He is despondent and angry. . . . To Middletown Meeting with Doug Gwyn. Afterwards, I spoke about F.U.N.D. The clerk turned out to be the person at Crosslands who has been arranging Leander's concert on this coming Thursday. On our way back, Doug was very open about his relation with Caroline, his feeling that he was denied the pastorate in Indiana because he is "living in sin" with her. To Dan's at 5:00; more practice. Then a good Thai meal in a restaurant in Lansdowne; then more practice and a Bach Toccata for "recreation," as well as our old Brahms waltzes, some of which (but not all) were still in our fingers.

Monday, December 7, 1998

Princeton

Worked with Dimitri and Mache. Dimitri wants color pictures in the book whereas UPNE wants black and white. Supper with Dan Seeger, Richard Barnes, and Mary Wood, who drove up from Pendle Hill to solicit me for the campaign. I agreed to transfer $5000 of appreciated

American Express stock this year, and to give another $5000 over the next four years. Then we ate a nice dinner; I had filet mignon. . . . Chrysanthi said that Mother, sadly, has been a bit abusive with her, saying sharply, "Don't treat me like an invalid!" She obviously senses her diminishment and has to strike out senselessly at the person least deserving. Too bad.

Tuesday, December 8, 1998

Mache and I selected poems for each lesson in the book, a good addition. Lunch with Mache and with a professor in Cyprus who's interested in the role of religion in shaping both Greek and Turkish civilization. She hopes to submit something to the journal. Fun to have the entire discussion in Greek. More work on poems after lunch; then Dimitri and I went to hear Prof. John Gager lecture fascinatingly on Saint Paul as allegedly anti-Jewish. A brilliant lecture claiming that Paul honored Judaism always. His supposedly anti-Jewish remarks were actually directed against gentiles who had begun to frequent synagogues in the diaspora—e.g., "It is evident that no man is justified before God by the law" (Gal. 3:11). Also Ga. 3:10, 6:15, Rom. 3:20, 9:31, 11:28. He balanced this with many pro-Israel passages, which might seem inconsistent but are not if we can accept that the supposedly anti-Jewish passages do not concern Jews. For example, Rom. 3:31: "Do we overthrow the law through faith? By no means. On the contrary, we uphold the law." Saw John and Woody Wilson in the audience. They asked straightway about Kendal and I brought them up to date. They still have done nothing. . . . Watched the fascinating impeachment hearings. One of the witnesses today was Professor Sam Beer, whose marvelous course Social Sciences 2 I took fifty (!) years ago. He still looked vigorous and spoke well. Humorously, however, I thought that the lecturer today on St. Paul would be appropriate for the impeachment hearings, which are also saying that the president (like St. Paul) said one thing but actually meant something else.

Thursday, December 15, 1998

Leonard Rieser died, aged about 76. What a shame! He made my life at Dartmouth a pleasure. He was the ideal administrator because always so humane.

Monday, December 21, 1998

Lunch with Michael Webster and Leone Buyse. I asked Michael what happened to his father's career. Was it the alcoholism? "No, not initially," he answered. "Father was very difficult. He didn't know how to be graceful with managers; he demanded his own repertoire, wouldn't play Tchaikovsky's piano concerto a thousand times. So they wrote him off. And when he started teaching at Juilliard he found that very fulfilling. He knew 70 piano concertos by heart. Toward the end he began drinking so much that sometimes it showed in his teaching, and Juilliard had to ease him out. Sometimes he was picked up drunk in the gutter. And he had periods of great anger and abusiveness, including recently at Kendal, until he was put on an 'anti-psychotic' drug, which calmed him down." Michael says that Bev was performing demanding programs in recital at age 12 in Pittsburgh, also that he was an abused child, whatever that means. In any case, they seem extremely grateful to me for easing the Websters' way into Kendal. It has been a salvation for them.

Tuesday, December 22, 1998

Ned Perrin and his new friend Susan Ackerman for dinner with the Schers. Ned seemed depressed. I must try to get him alone when I return in January. He published a very moving memoir about his marriage to Anne Lindbergh (five years only) in Modern Maturity. . . . Big computer troubles recently. The Greek-English lexicon froze and I had to re-do an entire month's work on a back-up that luckily was not corrupted. I'm enjoying the new formatting capabilities available in Word 98, which I got from Leander. I can now make squares with different kinds of borders around paradigms or poems, and also shade them various degrees of gray. A big improvement. But slow work, as is the introduction of the poems and songs we selected recently at Princeton. I've finished nine lessons so far. Three to go. I'll take them to New York tomorrow and maybe work on the train.

Yale Club, NYC

Amazing Jackson Pollack exhibit at MoMA. I never appreciated his late "splatter paintings" until now, seeing the evolution that led to them, the differences among them, and how they reflect his tortured psychotic soul. . . . Lunch at Daphne's. Greg and I went to the pastrami take-out place on Lexington and ordered pastrami on rye and chopped chicken liver on rye. A real New York City treat. . . . Christina very excited by our presence, especially Chrysanthi's. This morning, Chrysanthi's birthday, I gave her the new Merck medical guide, which she seemed to appreciate. She is obsessed, almost, with medical details. . . . Over coffee in the Yale Club, read a TLS review on Heidegger. Not very sympathetic, and yet the following attracted me, at least: "Being and Time teaches us that 'Authenticity is intensity, nothing else.' The great fact of our existence, the one that we spend most of our time ignoring or trying to overcome, is its finitude. We will one day have to die, and thus the flow of time is, for each of us, 'a series of little departures, lots of little deaths.' An authentic existence is one that recognizes that 'the meaning of being is time' and 'resists the tendency to escape, to evade.' Authenticity is thus 'the negative of negation' [Das Nichts [which] selbst nichtet]." Ray Monk, TLS, Nov. 1998, p. 30, reviewing Rüdiger Safranski's Martin Heidegger (Harvard UP).

Friday, December 25, 1998, Christmas

Opening presents at Daphne's. Daphne got me a Flanders & Swann video, very thoughtful. Then a delicious roast beef dinner that even Chrysanthi liked. A pleasant Christmas without any religious dimension whatever. We walked 40 blocks from 44th to 84th along Lexington, admiring the stunning architecture of new buildings.

Saturday, December 26, 1998

Daphne came for breakfast, a leisurely visit. I'm still hoping that they'll get Christina a British passport. Chrysanthi and Daphne went shopping. I went to the Guggenheim to see the splendid show bringing together treasures from the Pompidou Center in Paris and the Guggenheim here, all the way from Cézanne to yesterday. Beautiful Kandinskys and Mirós, but also everyone else in modern art since the Fauves. Minimalism leaves me cold. But, interestingly, Jackson Pollack now seemed conservative (!) to me, after I saw the latest, supremely ugly, manifestations of art. . . . Then met Greg to see together Zoë Wanamaker in Electra. A splendid performance, adapted by the Irish playwright Frank McGuinness and directed by David Leveaux. Claire Bloom as Clytemnestra. Everything that a Greek play should be. Even the histrionics. Even a mask, just at the start and finish. But no sung chorus; indeed no choral chorus, just one speaker, with two other women in dumbshow. But wonderful modulation from intensity to expectation to silence. The moment when Orestes (thought dead) reveals himself to Electra was totally powerful. Zoë Wanamaker received cheers and a standing ovation, deservedly. . . . To the Yale Club with Greg for a beer and a cordial visit. Then to their apartment for another supper of leftover beef. . . . I've been working on Kokolis's essay on Anagnostakis, a huge job of copyediting, alas.

New York City

To the Met with Chrysanthi. An interesting special exhibit on Netherlands painting from Van Eyck to Breugel. Exclusively Christian subjects (which became tiresome) until Breugel liberated art to deal with the life of peasants—humanized it. However, in the Christian subjects one sees, increasingly, experiments in perspective, wonderful landscapes stretching out behind, and the conflation of the historic subjects with contemporary costume, architecture, and landscape. So, in a way, the humanization was prepared before it actually happened. . . . We then visited our favorite, the El Grecos and Rembrandts, before walking to Daphne's. . . . There I was called into service to repair door knobs, affix a door stop, etc. Tried to rewire a lamp yesterday, only to cause a short circuit. Then, miraculously, Daphne brought out all the paintings that had not been hung for a year, and we all experimented with proper locations, even agreeing on some. She has my parents' Costigan, plus a lovely Schweitzer, the Sikeliotis dancers, and others that they bought. . . . I went off by myself to the Alvin Ailey ballet at the City Center: a memorable experience. One of the four ballets was recent and very contemporary—spasmodic, ostentatiously anti-beautiful, with percussive music: Polish Pieces (1995), music by Górecki, choreography by Hans van Mauen: an ensemble piece, quite attractive. Then "The Time Before the Time After (After the Time Before)" (1970), choreographed by Lar Lubovitch to Stravinsky's lovely "Concerto for String Orchestra," a pas de deux, very sensual, exquisitely danced. The spasmodic one, hard to take, but again exquisitely danced, was "Lettres d'Amour" (1998), choreographed by Redha, music by 8 or 9 different composers—overly long, without apparent shape except for a sort of rondo recurrence of certain steps. But then came "Revelations" (1960), choreographed by Ailey, to music of Negro spirituals. The audience went wild. This is what the aficionados had been waiting for (audience full of blacks). And justly. Such moving music, such expressive, creative dancing of the ten different spirituals, the audience clapping and shouting with glee and bursting into bravos at the end. How lucky I was to go, and to have this on the matinee program. . . . Then back to Daphne's where we actually hung various paintings, plus Yiayia's antique mirror, and moved a bookcase, making the apartment look more "ready," finally. Then a lovely chicken and orzo supper, cooked by Chrysanthi.

NYC–Hanover

Our morning ritual at the Yale Club of leisurely breakfast reading the NY Times. This time lots of conversation with Carlos, the headwaiter, who regaled us with his favorite jokes—e.g., "In Cuba, people discuss where they'll bury Castro when he dies. In Napoleon's grave? OK. In Lenin's grave? OK. In Jesus' grave? No no! He came back after three days!" Or: "An American Jew complained to his rabbi, 'My son became a Christian.' The rabbi replied, 'Well, so did mine, but let's pray and ask God what to do.' So they question God, who replied, 'Don't ask me what to do. My son became a Christian, too!'" Or: "A famous professor gave the same lecture repeatedly. Once, he asked his chauffeur, who had heard it often, to pretend he was the professor. They'd exchange places. So the chauffeur gave the lecture and no one knew the difference, until the question period, when a question stumped the chauffeur. But he rose to the occasion, saying 'That's so simple, I'll ask my chauffeur to answer it.'" . . .

Chrysanthi accompanied me to Penn Station, worried that I couldn't manage all the heavy luggage. Then she went back to Daphne's until Thursday (Greg leaves tomorrow for Vaughan's wedding in Los Angeles), and I returned via AMTRAK to Hanover.

1998 HOLIDAY GREETINGS
FROM PETER AND CHRYSANTHI BIEN

This year our lives were filled with the beautiful creatures in the photos above. The little ones grew up, started to talk, sing, and dance, and spent many pleasant hours with their Παπιά and Παππού. Alec and Monica were married in March in a memorable ceremony in Jakarta, Indonesia, attended by us and Leander, and also by Aunt Alice and Uncle Peter Buseck. The church service was followed by a grand reception and dinner for 500 people. Then in July, at Terpni, we had 120 good souls for lunch so that all of Alec's friends and ours could meet the bride. In the interim, Alec and Monica were evacuated from Jakarta following the riots in May—not a happy time. They are back in Jakarta now, experiencing renewed violence. But Monica's family are all fine, and Alec's school has been functioning through thick and thin, although with only 190 students compared to the 360 before the troubles began. Happily, the couple will be returning in January to the Adirondacks, which will be a novel experience for Monica, who has never seen snow. Alec will then begin looking for a new position.

Good news, also, from Greg and Daphne. Greg received an important promotion from Goldman Sachs; he is now high up on the managerial ladder. And Daphne is expecting in February.

As for Leander and Deanna, their biggest change in 1998 was occupancy of the lovely cabin they had built at Terpni last winter. They spent most of August there, very busily transforming it into a cozy second home. So we now have three dwellings on the farm, all miraculously furnished with electricity and modern plumbing (not to mention e-mail, fax, and internet: Monica, for example was able to read the Jakarta newspaper in Bahasa Indonesia each day during the unrest last summer). Alec's cabin now has two rooms, two lofts, a modern kitchen, and even a bathtub! In ours, kitchen cabinets were installed after 40 years' procrastination. (We need to keep up with our children.) Even the little Guest House was upgraded: moved out of its swamp to a dry location, furnished with electricity, indeed with hot and cold running water. We find all this quite amusing, given the farm's history of seven years without electricity, eighteen without a telephone, and forty with a privy and no plumbing. But Peter's office is still in the south field in an Adirondack lean-to under his huge yellow birch. (But it's furnished now with a brand new GE3 Macintosh Powerbook whose batteries last seven hours.)

Chrysanthi continues as chairperson of the Hanover Senior Center, as coordinator for the Quaker Meeting's service in feeding 120 homeless people once a month, and as the only one in our family still actively teaching at Dartmouth. She has begun to write very moving memoirs of her childhood experiences in Terpni, Macedonia, and in the last two years she has clearly become the world's most desirable babysitter! Harriet is going to be 94 years old. She was able to travel to the farm for Alec's celebration last July, and she continues to receive superb care at Kendal at Hanover. Peter is busier than ever in his so-called retirement: lecturing in Sweden, Greece, and at the State Department, teaching Faulkner and Kierkegaard at Pendle Hill and Joyce's Ulysses for ILEAD in Hanover, editing the Journal of Modern Greek Studies, revising the textbook Demotic Greek 1 with colleagues in Princeton, serving on the Greek Orthodox Archbishop's Commission to investigate the teaching of Greek in Church schools, continuing on the Board at Pendle Hill and as clerk of the Publications Committee there, serving as Hanover Monthly Meeting's treasurer and also as treasurer of F.U.N.D. (Fund the United Nations' Deficit), an effort by local Quakers and others to embarrass our legislators into paying the full amount of the United States' dues to the UN, and serving as a new trustee of the American Farm School in Thessaloniki, Greece. (This enabled both Peter and Chrysanthi to have a very meaningful time there in October, visiting family and touring villages in Eastern Macedonia, where Chrysanthi had recruited girls for the Quaker school decades ago.) Peter also attended his 50th reunion at Deerfield Academy in June, a lovely chance to renew various friendships, and then spent several days of intensive practice at Leander's four-hand piano workshop at Kinhaven, teaming up with sister Alice to perform Barber, Dvořák, and Bizet, which they both managed miraculously to do without total or even partial collapse. Happily, weekly chamber music with Dick Williamson and Allan Munck (flute and 'cello) has continued quite regularly.

We are thinking of the future. Chrysanthi and Peter went through the admissions interviews (six hours of them) at Kendal at Hanover. We expect to move into two rooms there sometime before 2004. The major problem will be what to do with all the books.

With greetings, best wishes, and hopes that 1999 will be health, happy, and productive for you and yours.

Peter and Chrysanthi Bien

Leander underwent a colonoscopy owing to pains in his lower abdomen, scrotum, etc. There was some sort of growth, and the doctor took a biopsy. So we're all waiting now for the pathologist's report.

Thursday, January 7, 1999

Ceremony in Ledyard Bank this morning, with speeches by John Radebaugh and the leader of the Bahá'ís, TV coverage, and presentation of the proceeds of F.U.N.D., of which I am the treasurer, $1800 so far, to the sixteen-year-old Helen Drysdale, who will drive to New York City today with Scot and Patricia and will present the money to the UN Treasurer, Susanne Bishopric, tomorrow morning. We hope that Congressmen will take notice. The whole idea is to make a gesture that says, in effect, that the US ought to pay its UN dues.

Friday, January 8, 1999

Cambridge

Mailed clean typescript of complete Demotic Greek 1 (441 pages)—well, almost complete—today to Peter Patrikis, from whom we hope to get more money, and to Peter Mackridge, whom we'll pay $500 to give everything a careful professional look. I'll be so happy when this burden is behind me. The past few weeks I've been frightened that my computer files will be corrupted (again), and have taken extra precautions regarding multiple backups. . . . Also posted to Dan audiotapes of me playing secondo in the Barber Waltz, Pas de Deux, and Galop, and primo in the Schubert march, sloppy, with errors, but at least I was able to get through all the pieces in time. Very hard in places, technically, but I improve a little each morning. Speaking of music, very nice Telemann, Handel, and Bach last Wednesday with Dick and Allan. . . . Drove to Cambridge in the afternoon, trying to keep ahead of the snowstorm, which we did most of the way, but not all of it. Route 128 was a nightmare: bumper to bumper all the way. But listened to the entire B Minor Mass on the way down. What a blessing! . . . Delicious supper in the Charles Hotel: lobster pot pie. Then to A.R.T. to see Phèdre. Good, but not in verse, and generally a bit slow, especially compared to the machine-gun rapidity of the Britannicus we saw in London. The absence of verse was a big mistake; it changes the entire character of the play, making it stand or fall by criteria of psychological realism whereas in the French original, or even in a good verse translation, the language becomes a major factor, if not the major factor. The play of course is of particular interest right now because of the impeachment and trial of Clinton, which started yesterday. The subject is the same: self-destructive adulterous love. But Racine (and of course Euripides, his prototype) put this in a broader context—a family curse, the enmity of the gods—and this lifts the interest up and beyond that of purely psychological abnormality.

January 9, 1999

Cambridge

Leisurely breakfast in Au Bon Pain: croissant, coffee, and NY Times. Then worked on Stephanos Stavros's article on the EU court. At 1:00 p.m. heard the A.R.T.'s lecture on The Merchant of Venice, very interesting. Shylock was originally conceived in the comic mode in commedia dell'arte, and only later was conceived as tragic. This production will restore some of the comic approach. How carefully everything is researched: the exact meaning(s) of every verb in the text, the past production history, the particular forte of each actor. . . . Worked on Stavros in the afternoon again. Supper at Giannino's, very leisurely. Then a magnificent A.R.T. production of The Merchant of Venice directed by Andrei Serban. Will LeBow was a perfect Shylark, Kristy Flanders an engaging Portia. The courtroom scene is the highlight, in which Portia (disguised as a brilliant justice) pleads so eloquently for mercy as opposed to law (again one thinks of the House vs. Clinton, of course), but then in the end uses the law itself to undo Shylark's bond. Shylark, like Antonio in Measure for Measure, remains ultimately inscrutable. He certainly never seems a villain despite his bloodthirsty need for vengeance; yet he hardly is a hero more sinned against than sinning. Thus we have a problem play, tempting us to “solve” its perplexities by artificially narrowing its possibilities.

January 10, 1999

Alec and Monica arrived in New York. Monica’s passport was stamped immediately as OK for her green card. They’re off to Leander’s now, and some rest. How nice to have them here, finally.

Monday, January 18, 1999

Philadelphia–Princeton

Long AMTRAK trip. Lost power outside of NYC and waited two hours for restoration. But I worked well on my computer, using the battery. Spent most of the trip copyediting the Pendle Hill Vietnam book supposedly (but not) copyedited by Chuck Fager. Arrived at 30th Street too late to get my rental car, so taxied to the airport’s AVIS location with a woman in a similar predicament. Drove to Princeton, arriving at midnight.

Princeton

Very good session with a professor of German, Jamie Rankin, who explained that the Rassias drill method is now considered passé and ineffective. The “in” thing is “realia.” Students should never utter anything they don’t understand as part of their experience, etc. We’re trying to add such elements to the Rassias-type drills we already have in abundance. . . . In the evening, listened to Bill Clinton’s State of the Union speech. What a circus this: his impeachment trial at 1:00 p.m. and his State of the Union at 8:00 p.m. But very effective nonetheless. He seems determined to go on.

Pendle Hill

Arrived on Thursday. Good piano practice with Dan, who again did not practice, this time because he was three weeks with his former wife, Betty Jean, as she died horribly from multiple cancers. This morning I ministered at some length in Meeting about Clinton and theater, Don Giovanni, Paradise Lost, Antony and Cleopatra, The Merchant of Venice, Phèdre—everything relates. The question in the current proceedings is: Where is God? . . . Supper last night with Doug Gwyn, whose next book, on Seekers, is ready for my editorial hand. Yesterday, Publications meeting, a marathon, 12:00 noon to 4:15, six manuscripts discussed. But we did it! Today: Board and then Search Committee, followed, beautifully relaxing, by more piano with Dan, followed by supper together at the Media Inn. I got him to talk about his post-PH plans: he has two projects involving a sort of symposium he hopes to organize. More music afterwards, including sight-reading of Beethoven's Fifth.

Tuesday, January 26, 1999

Good meeting with Peter Patrikis regarding the Demotic Greek revision. He offered another $3000 to $4000 support. Also met with Robert Binswanger, who was in town for a day. He continues to want to help and advise Alec. I urged him to convince Penny to have them register for Kendal at Hanover. Robert says he thinks he is immortal.

Riparius

Up at 6:45 a.m. Breakfast with Leander at the Woodstock Inn. Arrived at the farm at 11:00. The snow is crusted over, sheer ice, very hard to walk. But Alec's path is plowed. He and Monica are cozy in their lovely cabin, with a fire in the stove. And Monica is pregnant, due in September. She's very happy. Said that her mother needed three years to get pregnant, and Monica obviously did not inherit that tendency. Leander turned the heat on in his cabin and is also comfortable. I arranged the five boxes of Yiayia's books I brought, including two in Hebrew that belonged to Pincus Bien, my paternal grandfather, and some of my father's medical books, plus the art books that I gave them year after year as Christmas presents. Then we drove to Lake George for supper together. Snowing badly, so I registered in Day's Inn, mostly to keep Chrysanthi from worrying. Then we had a leisurely supper, very pleasant, at the Chinese buffet, followed by a visit to Price Chopper to show that marvel to Monica. Chrysanthi telephoned at 10:00 p.m. to say that Daphne gave birth to a boy: Andrew Tebbe. 8 pounds. No hair. Big feet. Fat. She's well and so is the baby. Amen.

Hanover

Chrysanthi sick. Dizzy, unbalanced. I took her to the hospital. They couldn't find anything wrong. Told her to drink lots of water. For supper I went to Canaan to Ann Forbes's to talk to about a dozen people about Quaker clerking, business process, clearness committees, etc. They're interested in relation to the housing commune they're setting up. Very good questions and discussion. I was delighted to be able to offer this sort of witness.

North Haverhill

I'm sitting in the jury room of Grafton Superior Court, on jury duty, waiting to see if I'll be called. Just saw a long video explaining the jury system, the trial system, and exhorting us to be fair and unprejudiced. Amen.

Today, Leander, Deanna, and Sophia are leaving. Leander attended Ignat's wedding yesterday. Deanna couldn't go because she has the flu. A beautiful wedding followed by only about 25 people at dinner in Grafton, Vermont. Mrs. Solzhenitsyn asked Leander to send especial greetings to Chrysanthi and me. Alexander did not come.

There is an opening now for a principal at Moses Brown School. Alec says he is interested. Monica has morning sickness, vomiting. She's going to NYC tomorrow to be with Daphne and the new baby, Andrew Gregory Tebbe.

Last Saturday we went to the memorial service for Leonard Rieser in Rollins Chapel. String quartet and clarinet played Mozart's clarinet quintet. The rest was all testimonies by, among others, Thaddeus Seymour and Greg Prince, both of whom it was nice to see again after many years; Joan Baez's father; Jim Wright (very dull); Jill Conway (very alive); Leonard, Jr.; Tim, who broke down weeping and couldn't talk; Jim Cox (semi-articulate in his usual manner, but amusing); Bill Cook (read Robert Frost); and Leonard's older and younger brothers. Lots of laughter about Leonard always being late to meetings and also about his shoveling his donkey's manure each evening after dealing with the "shit" at Dartmouth all day long. But lots of serious admiration for his intelligence, humanity, devotion to family, and general wisdom. All in all, an appropriate tribute.

Back to the jury. This morning, amazingly, I was chosen by lottery for 3 out of the 4 juries selected. No one else had this "honor" (catastrophe?). However, owing to this, the judge's clerk excused me from further selection next week for civil cases, which means that I can go to L.A. for the Archbishop's Commission, then to Princeton, and then to the AFS board.

North Haverhill

All day in court. A fourteen-year-old girl, very attractive and mature, testified that her fifty-year-old uncle molested her sexually over an eight-month period, gave her alcohol, and showed her pornography on the internet. First he just asked her to undress and then he masturbated while gazing at her. Then he began touching her breasts and inserting his fingers in her vagina. Finally he had intercourse with her. Then they had an argument. Three days later she went to the police (she had told no one up to this point, and may have been enjoying the whole affaire). Her uncle, on the stand, denied everything. His attorney claimed that the child was “troubled” and was taking revenge after the argument. A nurse certified that the girl was no longer a virgin. A “sexologist” explained the “grooming” of victims that is common, and the sort of escalation exhibited in this case. The uncle’s wife and the girl’s mother (sisters) also testified.

Thursday, February 4, 1999

North Haverill

The trial resumed. Final arguments. Then we began our deliberations around noon and by 4:30 still had not reached unanimity, although most, if not all, of us considered the man to be lying, not the girl. But had the State proved this beyond a reasonable doubt—that was the question. We agreed first about the masturbation and voyeurism, reasoning that a thirteen-year-old wouldn’t be able to make this up if she hadn’t experienced it. Also, when asked if he was circumcised she said he was, which he was, so this was a sort of evidence. But regarding the sexual intercourse (with a condom) we felt that she could have invented this from her own experience with boyfriends. Also that she could have accessed porno on the internet, without his help. So, deadlock. That night I did some “research.” I called up “Buttman” on the internet: the pornographic code that he apparently knew. Gross. But for the real stuff one needs to have a password, which you get by dialing a 900 number and paying a fee with a credit card. I reasoned that the thirteen-year-old was unlikely to have been able to do all this, and that her uncle presumably had indeed shown her the obscenities she described (women performing oral sex on dogs!).

Friday, February 5, 1999

North Haverhill

Back in court from 9:00 a.m. to 12:30. I convinced the others regarding the pornography charge, and gradually we agreed as well on the intercourse one. So only the alcohol remained, with a single juror, Jim Poage, formerly of Kiewit, holding out. But eventually even he became convinced that there was enough testimony on this as well. So we marched back into the court and the foreman (thankfully not me) pronounced guilty nine times. The defense attorney asked for the jurors to be polled, so each of us pronounced guilty on each of the nine counts. No emotion from the defendant. But the girl was crying on her mother's shoulder. We learned afterwards that the defendant was escorted immediately to jail. He'll be sentenced in a month or so, and can get up to twenty years. The judge told us that this type of case, sexual molestation of children, is now the most common that they do, chiefly because the perpetrators insist on denying guilt rather than in admitting it in exchange for a lighter sentence. . . . Interesting people on the jury. A motorcycle type with long hair tied in pigtail and, he said, a pistol always carried. (But a nice guy, actually.) An insurance adjustor, formerly a military officer. A performer and student of Western folksongs. An employee in the local John Deere tractor store. A girl raised on a farm and now working in a store. The director of admissions of Keene State College. Poage, the former head of Kiewit (who was fired, and now works for Dartmouth Medical School). . . . My second jury won't convene because the case was settled out of court. They'll let me know about the third one on Monday.

Wednesday, February 10, 1999

John Rassias and I planned the Archbishop's report. Met with the Dartmouth statistician who had tabulated our questionnaire's results, which sometimes are at variance with the oral testimony we received. How to deal with the discrepancies remains a problem.

February 11, 1999

Met with Len Cadwallader at Kendal to complain about the Admissions Director's neglect in responding to us. No letter for over two months. She wrote rapidly last week after my letter of complaint.

February 12, 1999

Conference call with the new committee at Pendle Hill charged with evaluating the short courses there. Should they continue or be laid down? We meet again in March. . . . Nice supper with Allan and Claire Munck, feeling sorry for me because Chrysanthi has been away all week in New York with Daphne and the new baby.

Saturday, February 13, 1999

Supper at Kendal with the Webster Performance Committee plus Mother, who was pleased to be included. Then we all went to Sally Pinkas's lovely recital: Beethoven opus 111, Ravel's "Valse nobles et sentimentales," and a big Liszt extravaganza, all played with feeling and elegance. Afterwards, Sally joined the committee to plan for next season. We've collected over $41,000 so far. The goal is $50,000. In introducing Sally, I urged the audience to contribute—again!

Sunday, February 14, 1999

Business Meeting. I reported that we had received a $25,000 bequest from the Georgia Rese estate. . . . Picked Chrysanthi up at AMTRAK; nice supper afterwards.

Wednesday, February 17, 1999

Princeton

I came here on Monday night. Yesterday, had a long nice supper with Martin McKinsey, who is here for a month. Today, surprise, Judith Herin appeared. We went together to an extraordinary "Gala Reading" to celebrate sixty years of creative writing at Princeton: Mike Keeley, Toni Morrison, Joyce Carol Oates (very funny as Marilyn Monroe), C.K. Williams, a splendid poet, and others. Then to supper with Judith, a nice reunion. I asked her if anything is wrong with Rowena Loverance. "No," she said, "it's just that she never answers letters or even e-mail." So it's not just me.

Thursday, February 18, 1999

To NYC. To Daphne's to see the new baby: Andrew Gregory Tebbe. Very tiny still, with closed eyes, sleeping peacefully. A nanny arrived, and we were able to have supper with Greg. Daphne finally seems to have found a reliable nighttime nurse and daytime nanny. So she's quite relaxed. I put together the lamp I rewired. It works.

Friday, February 19, 1999

Leisurely breakfast with John Rassias at the Yale Club. Then to the Farm School board: committee day. I'm on the Education Committee. The major problem is whether, and how, to extend the two-year college to a three- or four-year college awarding a BS degree. This seems the way to go. In the evening, cocktails at the Footes' on East 66th. He is head of the Cathedral School, and he urged me to have Alec telephone him since he knows about openings everywhere. Leisurely supper afterwards with Joann Ryding, David Acker, and John Cleave.

Saturday, February 20, 1999

Full AFS board, mostly going over material covered yesterday, but with new information on the sale of parcels of land. Afterwards I went to the Guggenheim to see the new exhibit "Picasso and the War Years" and "Jim Dine." The Picasso somewhat disappointing, except perhaps for the many "weeping woman" studies. Guernica not included, but reproduced photographically. Jim Dine's work left me totally unappreciative. Yet he is celebrated as an innovator. Strange. . . . More typing of DG1 at the Yale Club, fixing lesson 5 now. Then to Lincoln Center for a grand evening of ballet, especially the final one: "The Four Seasons," choreographed by Jerome Robbins, full of humor and athleticism and beauty. The shining girls of winter, the pale green costumes of spring, the languidness of summer (danced by Hélène Alexopoulos), and then the spectacular autumn with Damian Woetzel at his best, and Wendy Whelan. And of course the Verdi music, always engaging. This was preceded by Pergolesi's Stabat Mater complete with soprano and counter-tenor, choreographed by Peter Martins. Very quiet, contemplative, danced by Peter Boal, Darci Kistler, Jock Soto, and others. This was its premiere. The first dance was Respighi's "Ancient Airs and Dances," choreographed by Richard Tanner, very baroque, black costumes, stately, danced by Jock Soto, Damian Woetzel, Nilas Martins, Wendy Whelan. A gorgeous show in the majesty of the New York State Theater, which had a display of scores of photos of dancers from the past: Maria Tallchief, Jacques D'Amboise, with Balanchine coaching.

Sunday, February 21, 1999

NYC-Hanover

Another breakfast with John Rassias, who is doing a workshop here at Baruch College, including several unemployed actors whom he trains to teach English as a second language. AMTRAK back home.

Thursday, February 25, 1999

Ned Perrin took us to supper at a restaurant in Fairlee. He has broken with Susan. His daughter Amy is separated from her husband, who insists on custody of their child. His daughter Elizabeth collects men for two-year periods and then discards them. Another dysfunctional family, alas.

Friday, February 26, 1999

Dick came at 5:00 and we did the Fauré sonata and then a Bach violin-harpsichord sonata that he is learning on the flute. The Fauré is of course impossible for me, but I think I did the Bach reasonably well. Then Allan and Claire came and we all had a lovely spaghetti supper after which Allan, Dick, and I did Bach, Bridges, and Damase.

Saturday, February 27, 1999

Cambridge

Dia Philippides and Wim Bakker took us to supper at Giannino's, very graciously. Dia wants me to edit a festschrift for Meg Alexiou when she retires in December 2000. Perhaps Greg Nagy and I could do it together. Wim and I both feel that retirement is an altruistic act, opening places for younger scholars. . . . Then to A.R.T. to see a rather good production of The Master Builder. Ibsen is so amazing in the way he begins with realism but introduces ritual and mystery along the way. Here, Hilde, although played realistically, is equally a kind of spirit, and/or a projection of the Master Builder's own psyche and his diseased psyche.

Sunday, February 28, 1999

Cambridge

Overnight at Friends Center. I'm reading a rather good Greek novel for a World Literature Today review: Εφιάλτες και όνειρα by Ελένη Βοϊσκού, about life in Athens during the Junta period, covering different social strata, age groups, etc. . . . Quaker Meeting at 10:30. Too many people. Too much vocal ministry, all disparate, 80% by women. Saw Andy Towl afterwards, and Warren, and Anna Jones's daughter Emily. Brunch at the Charles Hotel, a feast, but we were shocked when the bill came: $32 each + tax and tip, and vowed never to go again. . . . Back to A.R.T. to see a new play, indeed a premiere, Don De Lillo's Valparaiso, which turned out to be terrible, the worst play I've ever seen: pretentious, boring, un-theatrical. What a waste!

Tuesday, March 2, 1999

Princeton

Arrived at 11:00 p.m. last night. Dimitri and I spent the morning going over Peter Mackridge's corrections of our textbook. Then a fancy lunch at Prospect with the Cypriot poet Κυριάκος Χαραλαμπίδης, who is here to work with his translator, Martin McKinsey. Also present: Mike Keeley and Stathis Gourgouris, who was pleasant despite his failure to receive tenure. Haralambidis very approachable and simple and humble. Sees no solution to Cyprus's problem except increasing integration of Cyprus and the EU. Afterwards I spoke at length with Mike about the American Farm School, especially about the problem of extending the College to four years, an idea that he greatly supports. Glad to hear that he'll be coming back on the Board next year. Supper at Meadow Lakes with John Baker, who asked me to come again. He's still spry at 102, his mind entirely clear; bad sight and hearing, and sore back, but otherwise still relatively fine, living independently in his apartment. He half-indicated that he'd like to give more money to us, perhaps as a bequest in his will.

Wednesday, March 3, 1999

Princeton

Continued doing the Mackridge corrections. Then heard Judith Herrin talk about three Byzantine empresses. Very large audience and good discussion afterwards. Reception and supper following. Then to the Nassau Inn for a beer and two hours of conversation with Stephanos Pezmazoglou, mostly about our experiences as journal editors. He wants me to write an account of my tenure as editor. Good idea, but when can I find the time? . . . Finished Εφιάλτες και Όνειρα but wasn't able to start writing the review. . . . Spoke to John. It seems that we'll be going to Los Angeles after all, on March 26th or 27th.

March 4, 1999

Princeton–Pendle Hill

Nice visit with Mark Mazower, who'll need to decide next year whether he stays in Princeton or returns to his post in Sussex. Princeton, he says, is clearly a superior university; it offers him much more time for research, but he prefers to live in England (London) where, he says, it's so much easier to have a rich social life. May we all be troubled by problems no worse than these! . . . Drove to Pendle Hill and had supper by accident with a professor of theology at Moravian who was about to start an extension course. He used Zorba to teach existentialism, so we had lots to talk about. And he promised to remember me to the Schantzes, Leander's chairman/woman, when he was there. . . . Piano afterwards with Dan, who actually practiced the Starer and some of the Barber Serenade.

Friday, March 5, 1999

Pendle Hill

Meetings all day. Short-course review committee (looks like we'll recommend continuation), then publications, the board.

Saturday, March 6, 1999

Pendle Hill

Board, board lunch, search committee, then piano with Dan and a nice leisurely supper in the Thai restaurant with Dan and Larry Ingle, who's progressing on his book on Nixon as Quaker (!). More practice afterwards, including "recreational" playing of a Haydn symphony.

Sunday, March 7, 1999

To San Francisco

Routine flight to San Francisco. I worked well for most of the six hours, reading galley proof for JMGS. Will I miss the journal when I lay it down at the end of the year? Yes, in many ways. But not if I dive right back into the Kazantzakis letters and volume 2 of Politics of the Spirit, my own work instead of the work of others. . . . Martha Klironomos was supposed to meet me at the airport. Didn't find her. Managed in my AVIS rental car to get to S.F. and find the hotel, which is right at the northeast corner, fronting the sea. She showed up later, very remiss, and took me to supper at the famous Cliff House nearby, opposite "seal rocks." Very pleasant. And very different décor from the East. And the serving people are so often Mexican or Hawaiian or . . . Telephoned Chrysanthi. They'd just had a huge snowstorm. Telephoned Alec. Two feet of snow yesterday, but he got to town today. He was very pleased with his visit to Friends Select, contrary to expectation. So if they offer him the principalship he may accept. Durham is clearly still very interested. He expects to hear from Troy soon. And he might go to interview in the Bahamas.

Monday, March 8, 1999

San Francisco, Seal Rock Inn

I'm sitting in my room in front of a huge window overlooking the Pacific Ocean. Boats go back and forth, waves crash. It's raining, alas, but still . . . different. Thanasis telephoned. We'll meet tomorrow. Martha came and we turned into tourists: Lincoln Park and Legion of Honor Museum (closed), with good views of the coast and the Presidio. Then downtown through Japantown, Russiatown, Chinatown, Italytown, etc. to Coit Tower, Rivera murals, and a spectacular view on top of the whole city, with the Golden Gate and Oakland bridges. Then lunch in a café with a friendly Greek waitress. Then the department. Roland Moore appeared. How nice! He showed me the MGSA website that he created which, among other things, enables one to access To Βήμα in Greek . . . I lectured to about 40 people on Kazantzakis's travel writings. Afterwards a full hour of questions, one of the liveliest groups I can imagine. Then coffee and cake. Met again a Thessaloniki girl whom I had helped while there; she is now in the US on a three-year scholarship. Then all the way across town again (thanks to the Avis car) to the Italian center for a lovely supper (to which I treated Martha) at "the oldest Italian restaurant in the US, Ristorante Fior d'Italia, with a waiter who looked like Groucho Marx and unexpectedly gave us coffee and dessert on the house. Very grand. Full of happy people enjoying themselves. . . . An extremely satisfying day. I'm glad that I still have something to offer people, or so it seems.

Awoke to sunshine and blue skies. Walked to Lou's, a breakfast place along the seaside road, and sat at a table facing the breakers, with a full, gorgeous rainbow over the ocean, and large birds soaring above or hanging in the air for prolonged periods without moving their wings. Worked on galley proofs in the hotel, looking out at the ocean, until Thanasis Markaleris arrived. Hugs and kisses. We talked non-stop from 12:00 noon until 5:30 p.m. He drove me across the Golden Gate Bridge to a lookout point where one can see this lovely city in its full glory, and took some photos as remembrances. Then into the countryside of Marin County, up winding roads to another spectacular lookout point. Then down into a moist valley, shaded and foggy, to the Muir Forest, 500 acres of preserved first-growth redwoods—trees 500 to 1000 years old, arrow-straight, trunks 15 feet wide, towering majestically into the sky. It was my first view of these trees in their natural growth (we'd seen redwoods transplanted in two rows in a Scottish garden). What a treat! . . . This city is so exceptional. Clean, well-ordered, rational. And surrounded by sea, bay, countryside, forests, all very Mediterranean in feel. . . . Thanasis brought me to San Francisco State. Coffee in the student union. The students are "first-timers" mostly: the first in their families to go to college. And of all races. Certainly 50% oriental. At the Kazantzakis Chair offices I was interviewed for television. A pleasant Greek-American assisted by a taciturn (but pleasant in a different way) Irish-American technician. I then lectured on "Kazantzakis's Religious Vision" to about 50 to 60 people, again a mixture: students, adults. Afterwards, lots of questions and discussion, like last night. Very satisfying. . . . By the time Marsha and I found a restaurant still open (Chinese) it was 11:00 p.m. Full of Chinese youngsters, the name in Chinese characters spread over the walls. Dirty. But we survived. To sleep at 12:30 a.m.

Wednesday, March 10, 1999

Sacramento

Drove out to Sacramento to visit the Vryonis Center. Speros, as expected, treated me to an hour-long monologue of extreme paranoia, chronicling the sins of Brademas (coward), Papadimitriou (autocrat), Lambropoulos (schemer), Karakasidou (incompetent), Gourgouris (average intelligence and arrogance), Van Dyck (mediocre), and so forth. Thus he now runs his own show, funded in large part by Angelos Tsakopoulos. He denies that he is an extreme nationalist, yet he expanded on the machinations of the Turkish government vis-à-vis the scholarly community. Afterwards, thankfully, he showed me the quite interesting library, which has Greek, Turkish, Bulgarian, Armenian, Persian, etc. materials. He referred to his son's suicide—schizophrenic—and to his own humble upbringing and the discrimination he experienced in Tennessee because he was Greek. It was a relief to have some time with Christos Ioannidis, who is happier, it seems, and more stable. He agrees that instruction in Greek language/culture in the Church just doesn't work. No money for teachers, so the schools recruit anyone who is willing to be exploited. Then, around 1:30, we all went for a large lunch and more pleasant conversation, even bantering. Speros encouraged me to take some of the Center's publications. I drove back, again without getting lost, and through the S.F. civic center on Van Ness: concert hall, town hall, library, etc., very handsome. Martha came to the hotel around 8:00 and we had another nice supper in a "rocking" youth-culture bar and restaurant right on the seaside, again with Rivera murals, and we exchanged stories about Speros. To her, he had commented that Cavafy was a degenerate and thus shouldn't be taught or studied.

Friday, March 12, 1999

New York

At 9:00 a.m. I was at the Diller-Quayle School, East 95th, to see Christina's rhythms class. And what a treat! John, the major leader, is clearly an actor with trained voice and body, very much for musical comedy. Mia, his assistant, a cute Japanese young woman, also has a trained voice, and the pianist, so imaginative and effortless, doing everything by ear, integrated immediately with the improvisations of John. So, what I witnessed was  $\frac{3}{4}$  hour of pure theater as John had the children build towers with blocks and then knock them down (accompanied by downward arpeggios on the piano), use the blocks to tap in rhythm, jump in time, move around in time, run and stop according to the music, sing together (e.g. ABC and Barney), play triangles, sing the 8 notes of the scale, and do-re-mi, etc. And there was even time for a snack. About ten children were present, all with a parent, mostly mothers but an occasional father, who participated in all the routines. And then they went to a café nearby for muffins or cupcakes, and gradually all become friends. As I said, it was a great treat to be present. They even sang a song welcoming Υιαγιά and Παππού. . . . Afterwards, to the Met to see the Dacci exhibit, which didn't move me, really (what a difference when viewing the El Grecos just outside the exhibit's exit), and then the really remarkable exhibit of Picasso's ceramics, which I'd seen already in London but was well worth a second viewing. . . . Then back to the Yale Club. Finished the JMGS galleys. . . . This morning, how nice to be greeted warmly by Carlos the head waiter's "Hello, Professor! Haven't seen you for a long time." At 7:30 p.m., Daphne and Chrysanthi came for supper at the club. Oh, I also bought more ties at Daffy's, one reduced from \$70.00 to \$3.00.

Saturday, March 13, 1999

Breakfast with Daphne, Chrysanthi, Christina, and Andrew. Bagels and lox. Then back to the Yale Cub to work on editing Pendle Hill's vision statement, which needs complete rearrangement and retyping.

Monday, March 15, 1999

Hanover

Campions, knowing that Chrysanthi was away, kindly invited me for supper, with Ned. Then I rushed home to be interviewed by telephone by someone in Sydney, Australia, preparing a radio program on Ασκητική. Spent the day finishing JMGS 17/1 galley proofs.

Tuesday, March 16, 1999

Unpleasant telephone altercation with Alexander Kyrou, who is angry because I printed Gallant's criticism of Kyrou and because I didn't let Kyrou know until this morning, when it's really too late for him to reply. But we ended more cordially. Times like these make me delighted that I'll be freed of the Journal by the end of this year, after 25 years.

Wednesday, March 17, 1999

Quaker Finance Committee meeting. Bruce will help me soon to make my first budget. Right now I'm trying to get an accurate sense of the Meeting's assets. . . . Finished the Pendle Hill vision revision. Sent JMGS galleys. Now back to Demotic Greek. . . . Alec hasn't decided about Durham yet. He is hoping to hear in time from Friends Select in Philadelphia.

Thursday, March 18, 1999

Spent most of the day trying to get a sense of Quaker assets. And the other day I had to spend an entire morning answering questions the IRS sent regarding F.U.N.D.'s application for tax-exempt status. All this is OK, I suppose, but I really should be working on the Kazantzakis letters and on volume 2 of Politics of the Spirit. . . . Dick came for supper and we played his pieces; then Allan came for our usual trio music but had a bout of diarrhea and left after Della Joio and one Haydn. Dick brought ½ of a baguette (!) as his contribution for supper.

Friday, March 19, 1999

Alec accepted a principalship at Friends Select School, Philadelphia, turning down Durham Academy, which also offered him a principalship. How nice to have him and Monica nearby in Philadelphia, and in a Quaker school! . . . Nardi wrote that after I left them last Monday, Tom remarked, "Well, Peter Bien's mental health is certainly in good shape." Yes, it is. Amen.

Wednesday, March 24, 1999

Princeton

Dimitri now finds that 600 words are missing from our revision and must be added . . . somehow. We developed some strategies. . . . Very pleasant poetry reading in the afternoon by the Cypriot poet Kyriakos Haralambidis, accompanied by excellent, effective translations by Martin McKinsey. The two have been working together at Princeton this entire month. Kyriakos said that Greek-Cypriot and Turkish-Cypriot poets do know each other's work and are mutually appreciative. . . . At the dinner afterwards, I told Alexander Nehamas that my times at Princeton make me feel that I'm still partaking in the academic life, something that is really not happening at Dartmouth any longer. . . . Nice chat with John Wilson. He's been reappointed Dean of Graduate Studies for another five years, after which he plans to retire (perhaps) to Kendal at Hanover.

. . . Dan Seeger, Richard Barnes, and I were meant to visit John Baker, but he canceled, owing to severe back pains. We'll try again in April. He wants us to try to bring Quakers, Mennonites, and Brethren together to be more effective politically in their shared peace testimonies.

Philadelphia–Los Angeles

Good, very good, practice with Dan last night, especially on the waltz. We did the first page and a half about 20 times until we really began to get the feel of it. Today, met Jan Hoffman by accident at breakfast. She's the former clerk of NEYM. She was at Woodbrooke in 1993 when John Sheldon was appointed and said she felt his presentation to Council was very poor. . . . We're gathering names for a possible successor to Dan. I telephoned several people, the most helpful of whom was Gordon Browne. . . . Doug Gwyn is still without a job for next year. Ditto for Martin McKinsey. Doug can stay at Pendle Hill, but there he has essentially no income. . . . Long, tedious flight to Los Angeles, so different from San Francisco: flat, spread out incredibly. To the Marriott Hotel in the center, top floor, with a view of freeways and office buildings. Then a lovely supper in the hotel with John Rassias, Bill Scott, and Constance Tagopoulos, planning for tomorrow and also for our report. Connie told us something we'd not been aware of before: that many Greeks want to escape Greekness because they feel that Greece rejected them, whether economically or politically, or both.

Los Angeles

To Saint Sophia Community Center for the Commission hearing. Most vocal were the priest, Father Ioannis Bakas, and the school director, Mrs. Doulmas. The priest is very young, energetic, smart, articulate in both English and Greek, ambitious—a doer. Lots of other good testimony from parents. Afterwards, Father John showed us the St. Sophia Cathedral, a garish monstrosity in my opinion, a Hollywood version of Byzantine glory. And we learned that it had been financed by Spyros Skouras, the movie mogul, and his brothers. Apparently the Skouras family sat in the front pew, the upholstered one, and had a switch that could dim or enhance the lighting. When Skouras disagreed with the sermon, or was bored, he would lower the lights (!), and vice versa. Then we saw the $700,000 “parking lot” just constructed, like a Disney theme park, with space for ρητά (at a price). Father John hopes to reclaim the entire neighborhood, obviously quite slummy, by making it into the Byzantine-Latino Quarter in cooperation with the neighboring Roman Catholic church, peopled by Latinos and served by a very Irish pastor (whom we met in the tavern across the street (3 lamb chops and the trimmings for $5.99). . . . Back to the hotel. Lunch. Then all four of us retreated to my room and began to revise my "Digest of Commission Hearings." Break for supper, then another session until 10:00 p.m. (= 1:00 a.m. New England time).

Sunday, March 28, 1999

Los Angeles-Philadelphia

Breakfast in the hotel with John and Demetrios Liappas, who unfortunately was unable to attend the hearing yesterday. He told us that almost all the assistants he'd hired to teach our book with the Rassias method found this activity "demeaning" alas. But he's a believer. He helped us with some good ideas for the Commission. Then John and I worked intensely until breaking for lunch. Short walk; then visited the L.A. Public Library, a beautiful building filled with people. As always, one is overwhelmed by the wealth and productivity of America. More work then, until we completed this phase of the revision at about 6:00 p.m. I went to the airport. Watched the exciting national championship of women's basketball—Purdue defeated Duke. Returned to Philadelphia first class, thanks to a frequent flyer upgrade. John and I plan to work more this week and to send a completed draft to all Commissioners on Friday.

Spending Easter weekend at the farm with Alec and Monica. Things are so different there now. Alec is living in his cabin, keeping warm thanks to the wood stove (he needs to add wood at 1:00 a.m. and 4:00 a.m., however). We stayed in Leander's house, heated by electricity, indeed so hot that I had to turn the heat off and open the window. We tramped back and forth through the remaining snow from one house to the other; it's already mud season, so all vehicles remain at the entrance. Waddell Road is quite passable, although rutted. We breakfasted each morning with Alec and Monica and lunched together and took them out Saturday night to the Inn at Gore for a very nice supper. I started the tractor, the earliest ever. We'll go back in late April or early May and plant some garden, since Alec will be able to tend it in case of frost. For now, however, he and Monica are going to leave on Monday for a two-week trip to Philadelphia to begin looking for a place to live; then via Williamsburg, Savannah, and Charleston to Tom Wood in Florida and the Shapiros. Alec made a very fine door for the bathroom; now he's working on window trim. Still lots to do in his house, but it has served very well this winter.

NYC

To NYC via AMTRAK. Met Daphne for supper. She'd just come from jury duty and looked distressed. Then to the New York State Theater for Don Giovanni. Greg met us. At intermission Daphne was suffering so acutely from a migraine that they left. Chrysanthi and I returned for the second half. Singing OK but not superlative. Audience very lukewarm. Yet here was Mozart at his incredible best, his glory. The dinner scene at the end is incomparable. At least Chrysanthi seemed to appreciate it fully. So it wasn't a fiasco, despite the departure mid-way of Daphne and Greg. We both agreed that in the future we should plan no more "occasions," for children. Let them do that for us if they wish. Good night's sleep at the Yale Club. Work in the library on Pendle Hill pamphlet submissions. Relaxing trip home. A nice outing, at least for the two of us. Chrysanthi amazed me by saying she wants to go to the Virgin Islands—she who always in the past said No to every suggestion I made for travel, but then of course came along and was pleased. . . . We both read Andreas Giannakos's little theatrical piece—very "sick": pessimistic, anti-civilization. He needs the simplistic moralizing of Don Giovanni.

Princeton

Nice lunch with Mike Keeley. We need to be watchful regarding travel to Greece in May. If the Kosovo war continues, Americans in Greece may be very unwelcome. Mike will be returning to the American Farm School board, I'm glad to learn. I told him about Bill McGrew's valedictory report to the Anatolia board, which I think should be obligatory reading for AFS trustees. He suggests that George Draper be encouraged to write a similar valedictory. . . . Drove to Hightstown in the evening. Dan Seeger, Richard Barnes, and I met with John Baker, who was in bathrobe and pajamas. He's confined to his room now, at age 103, with severe back pain caused by disintegrating vertebrae that pinch nerves. But he seemed fine for the  $\frac{3}{4}$  hour we stayed. Dan explained Pendle Hill's hope to start a forum program and how intrigued we are with Baker's suggestion that Quakers try to bring the three historic peace churches together—Quakers, Brethren, Mennonites—to be more of a concentrated force politically. This would be perfect for our forum, but of course we need money. Baker said that he'd like to give us some. He also wanted to know the level of the Jean Monnet Fund at Dartmouth—it's now at \$350,000. I brought him our proposal for a War/Peace minor, very impressive, and a video of one of the speakers who came on the War/Peace Fellows program. Let's hope he'll be convinced to leave something in his will. . . . Afterwards, Dan, Richard, and I had a big dinner in the Hightstown diner. . . . I returned to Princeton and did more typing for our Demotic Greek 1 revision, all the new words we're adding. . . . On the way to Princeton from Philadelphia yesterday, I returned to center city Philadelphia to see "The Versailles," where Alec has rented an apartment. What a location! Locust Street in the middle of everything, two blocks from Rittenhosue Square and Curtis, two blocks in the other direction from the Academy of Music and Broad Street. Every type of restaurant is nearby including a "trendy" café filled with young people. WaWa supermarket a block away, lots of parking, subway adjacent. And Alec can walk to work at Friends Select in fifteen minutes. The building is ca. 1920, very well maintained, with a man in the lobby at all hours. Very nice indeed.

Princeton

Good work again with Dimitri. Also, Mache came; she's fine after giving birth a month ago. . . . Met John Wilson at the fountain of the Woodrow Wilson School. Walked to his house. Wine with him and Woody. Their four grandsons all look like Tom Wilson—four towheads. Then drove to the graduate college, a huge Gothic memorial to a Dean West who fostered it around 1915, against the wishes of Woodrow Wilson. A mimicry of Oxford grandeur. We ate in "hall," with students. Unlike Trinity, Dublin; no grace in Latin.

To Pendle Hill

Princeton: work in the morning. Saw Dimitri Mitropoulos, the journalist, briefly. He is the son of the marvelous cartoonist. Then to Pendle Hill: good practice with Dan; we're playing the waltz better now. Rapid supper in Wendy's. In the afternoon, Cadbury Fellowship Committee. We chose Orion Smith for next year; she'll do an anthology of Nailer's writings, with apparatus, introduction, etc. Margaret Bacon lectured on Friends' treatment of blacks in the nineteenth century and early twentieth. Not at all encouraging. Meetings made blacks sit in the back on segregated benches. In the discussion afterward, I spoke about my impression of Haverford when I arrived in 1950. It seemed like the antebellum south: all the students and professors (except one: Ira Reid) white; all the servants, janitors, gardeners: black and servile. Helen Horn, Douglas and Dorothy Steere's daughter, confirmed this memory. . . . Felt very tired, probably because of the tensions inevitably involved now in the Demotic Greek 1 book, with the publisher asking for a manuscript by May 1st. We hope to give half (lessons 1–6) by May 15. Also, I worry about producing the Hanover Monthly Meeting budget on time. Then comes the next journal, by early July, not to mention finishing the Archbishop's Commission document by May 13th, probably. And I've just been booked to lecture in New York—"Death in Venice" on May 13th, too. Too much!

Pendle Hill

A long full day. Started at 9:30, after Meeting, with Book Committee, discussing Wilmer Cooper's revised volume on Conservative Friends, which we agreed to publish. Then to Short Course Review Committee. Renamed "Week-long Courses," we'll run them for another three years. That's very good indeed. Then Publications Committee. Reported the mess owing to our rejection of the pamphlet about US troops in Okinawa. Rebecca said one reason was its one-sidedness. Surely not all Americans were rapists, etc. Now the author is accusing Pendle Hill of "racism"! Long long discussion of Lisa Sutton's rewritten essay on potting and spirituality. Friends found it too self-focused. We hope she'll rewrite it yet again, concentrating more on the pots and less on herself. She'll be devastated. But at least we accepted Jennifer Elam's despite its bad writing, asking that it be shortened by 25%. . . . I rested a bit. Then had supper with Doug Gwyn and Caroline Jones. I've got to edit Doug's book on Seekers this summer. They'll be staying on at Pendle Hill next year. After supper, we introduced the Vietnam book and Larry's book on education to the General Board. Escaped to the Barnes' to tell them what to see in Greece. Then to Dan's. We're really doing much better on the Barber waltz, the Starer, even the Schubert. Only the Barber Galop is really not ready yet. This may be too much for us this year. Dan wants me to come during Festival Week to perform.

Saturday, April 17, 1999

Pendle Hill

Wallace Collett invited me home to tea in Bryn Mawr to meet his wife, Stella Miller, who is an archeologist dealing with Greece. Very pleasant. We of course have shared many experiences. I showed them the Mitropoulos cartoons in our revised DG1; much appreciated. They showed me their mansion, a huge house exquisitely furnished. She has an office that is any scholar's dream: floor to ceiling bookshelves in a huge room, state of the art computers. She married well, for Wallace is a millionaire, of course. He's 84 now and still active and vigorous. She must be around 60, if that. . . . Returned to supper meeting at PH of the Search Committee for Dan's successor. We were asked for three questions to be used in interviews. I submitted: (1) The PH mission states that we are witnessing to the Truth. Can we speak any longer of the Truth with a capital T? (2) How can we reconcile the difference between conservative and liberal Friends over the subject of homosexuality? (3) Do Quakers have a position on the world's economic order, namely capitalism? . . . More practice with Dan after the business meeting. We're doing better. Even played the Schubert march at a faster tempo.

Sunday, April 18, 1999

Pendle Hill

Nice talk at breakfast with Sally Palmer about Lisa Sutton's essay. It's so strange that Friends are now "frightened" by discussion of Jesus. Then a long practice with Dan, again quite encouraging, followed by lunch "out" and more practice until he had to leave to visit his parents at Medford Leas and I had to go to the airport. At Meeting this morning, good ministry about the need to retain hope and optimism despite everything we see and hear. Directly to Kendal from Lebanon Airport, with Chrysanthi, in order to introduce there the movie Zorba the Greek.

Wednesday, April 28, 1999

Richard Barnes telephoned excitedly from Pendle Hill. John Baker gave them $100,000 as a result of our visit. And Baker phoned me earlier to say how much I'd meant to him over the years. Imagine! It's just the opposite: how much he meant to me. He feels he's dying now, at 103 he may be right. Will I see him again? I'll try on May 5th when I'm in Princeton, but I fear it's doubtful. . . . John came again. We've spent many hours together this week polishing the Commission report. Now we'll meet with Phyllis Franklin and others in New York on Monday.

Saturday, May 1, 1999

I'm feeling very conflicted about going to Greece on May 18 because of the war in Kosovo. The Greeks are 90% in favor of the Serbs and against NATO and us. John Iatrides wisely advised me: "If you're going to do important business for the school, then go. If you're going to celebrate, don't go. This is no time for celebration." And we're going to celebrate George Draper's retirement, David Buck's accession. Normally, the board would be in New York. And John Rassias quite rightly says that at a time of graduation, celebration, etc. the board won't do much business anyway. I've been trying to convince Tom Thomas to cancel the trip, but so far he hasn't. Hope to speak to Mike Keeley about all this on Thursday. I think that I should take the sum I would have spent on the trip and contribute it to Kosovo relief.

Sunday, May 2, 1999

Presented my first Hanover Monthly Meeting budget to the Finance Committee. I did it on Excel, which I didn't know how to work very well. (Subsequently, I bought a manual.) The question, as always, is how to balance income with expenditure. It will work, eventually. Lunch afterwards with the "gang"—Nodas, Audrey, Sydney, Mary, Chrysanthi. Then drove to Manchester with John Rassias and flew to New York.

Monday, May 3, 1999

New York City, Yale Club

All day at MLA, 10 Astor Place, revising our Commission report. Phyllis Franklin very helpful as a super editor, fixing and rationalizing. Dimitri Gondicas full of good ideas. Jim Alatos, too. Many changes, all of which I entered on the computer. We worked intensively from 9:00 a.m. until 5:30 p.m. with a short break for a lunch of overcooked hamburgers. Then dinner at the Yale Club with Constance Tagopoulos and John. . . . I'm asking all concerned what they think about my going to Greece. Long talk with John last night over supper at Docks. "Don't go." But he also says, "Don't go to Kendal. Ugh, to be surrounded by so many people!" I hope he is wrong. About Greece, Effie Cochran agrees, "Don't go." So does Dimitri. Supper with Tom ?, professor of Russian at Queens, Peter ?, chair of the Italian Department, and Sophia ?, who does media research, at Maltemi on First and 41st. Very pleasant and lively. To bed at midnight, but not before John and I worked a bit more on his “editorial comments” in the Commission report.

Tuesday, May 4, 1999

New York

Back to MLA at 10 Astor Place. Joined by Connie and by Vasos Papa-gapitos. Warm regards to Chrysanthi, Daphne, Alec, Leander. He was helpful regarding the schisms in the Orthodox Church, and confirmed the accuracy of our strictures about the schools. Worked from 9:00 until 1:30. Back to the Yale Club with Constance for a late lunch. Then I went off to the Whitney for the “American Century” exhibit, part one, 1900–1950. Video introduction by my former student, Maxwell Anderson, now director of the Whitney. Fascinating, and very nostalgic: Wizard of Oz, Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers, lots of Bentons (including diorama of the entire mural at Missouri’s State Capitol, including the inset, the study for which we own). . . . Then to Daphne’s. Lucia is there, and we had a nice reunion. Andrew slept placidly despite an ear infection. Christina was absorbed in Sesame Street. Greg returned from work elated because the Goldman Sachs stock, floated today, rose from 53 to 70. We all went out to a French restaurant for dinner. Daphne expatiated on her jury trial, a case in which a woman who had received plastic surgery was suing her doctor for malpractice. She lost. It was a good experience for Daphne, all told. . . . Back to Princeton. Worked there until midnight.

Wednesday, May 5, 1999

Princeton

Dimitri had some more good ideas for John regarding his visit with the Archbishop. We found John at the Yale Club luckily and faxed the pages. Continued working on introducing new words to lesson 11. Cambanis came through with the Πολιτιστικά for 1–6. Mache has done nothing, however. Very frustrating. But she arrived later with baby in carriage and apologized. Actually, she’d done her job, given it to her husband to mail, and he neglected his part. Spent an hour with a Princeton junior, a Mennonite, who will be doing a thesis next year in history on the different effect of Greek ideals on elocution/rhetoric on Quakers and non-Quakers in the period just preceding the American Revolution. He senses that the Friends viewed rhetorical training as contrary to plain speech, and that this attitude may have hastened their loss of power. I was able to relate him to the Swarthmore and Haverford collections, to Mary Ellen Chijioki and Emma Lapsanski, and I told him about Larry Ingle. I also mentioned Paradise Lost, in which Milton makes the devil an accomplished rhetorician. . . . Went to a Chinese restaurant for supper and found Gail Holst there with her husband, Warhaft, and their two adopted Asian children. I joined them and reminisced about Melbourne. . . . John telephoned late to report that his interview with Archbishop Spyridon went well. Spyridon's answer was always the same: "John, you should appoint an independent commission to oversee the implementation of your recommendations." 'Eyve! Our official presentation is now scheduled for May 27th.

Thursday, May 6, 1999

Princeton

Dimitri is again overly meticulous, revising the revision. . . . Long expensive (and very good) lunch at Lahere's with Mike Keeley. Bruce Lansdale, whom he saw last night, thinks I should go, that staying home is like putting one's head in the sand. But Mike can see my position, especially since this is an ad hoc trip, not one of the Board's regular sorties to Greece. I still haven't decided, but I tentatively booked accommodation for another trip to Princeton on the assumption that I will not go. . . . Spoke yesterday on the telephone to John Baker. He is still hurting, and having bowel problems. Not a good idea for me to come now, but he still hopes to see me in the future. Amen.

May 10, 1999

To Tom Thomas, Chair of the American Farm School Board:

Dear Tom,

Thanks very much for your thoughtful letter in which you say that part of the reason the School has been held in high esteem in Greece is that the Board has "never wavered in its message or mission even when Greece has been in turmoil. We have always stayed the course and operated the School without missing a beat." I appreciate that thought from you. A similar thought was relayed to me from Bruce Lansdale via Mike Keeley last week.

However, I have decided—after much internal (and external) debate—to cancel my tickets and not come. I have taken the $1000 I would have spent on the trip and have sent it to the United Nations' High Commissioner for Refugees to be used for relief of Kosovars.

I very much appreciate your view that this is precisely the time when one should be present, and applaud you and other trustees for making the trip as planned. But my situation is somewhat different, chiefly because of Chrysanthi. She was a refugee herself (from the German bombing of Thessaloniki), and her family suffered horribly in the German occupation and the subsequent civil war; therefore her visceral reaction to the events so close to Greece (with their inevitable repercussions in Greece—my brother-in-law says that they can actually hear the bombing!) is acute, and her reaction to my absence in Greece even more acute. There is really no sense in doing something right in service to the School at the cost of doing something extremely wrong at home.

I hope and trust that you and the others will understand this very special situation in my case and will rest assured that I will remain an active, energetic trustee in the future.

May 13, 1999

New York City

Flew in this morning. Returned Olympic Airways ticket. (And they waived the refund fee “for me,” the employee said. Nice.) Saw the new Greek exhibit at the Met; very airy and spread out, so one doesn’t get claustrophobic. Also a good exhibit on the tragic destruction of Assisi owing to an earthquake last year and what is being done by way of restoration. Then went to 10 E. 39th, where I bought shoes ten or more years ago, and got another pair of these superb shoes. Cost: $255! Then was picked up at the Yale Club in a limousine and driven to the World Trade Center. Met by Jeffrey Murphy, Dartmouth ’76, my host. Entrance clearance required because of a bombing scare some years ago. Up to the 40th floor, offices of Thacher Profitt & Wood, 150 years old, with 170 lawyers, a “mid-size firm,” says Jeffrey. His office looks out over the Hudson, beautifully. His neighbor’s office looks out over the Statue of Liberty, Ellis Island, etc., even more beautifully. I lectured to 15–20 lawyers on Thomas Mann’s “Death in Venice.” An attentive audience, some questions afterwards, and much discussion in the very fancy reception that followed, with superb hors d’oeuvres offered by lackeys, plus wine. Another Dartmouth student, very friendly. Also several of the other lawyers. How young they all seem! Then by limousine again to a fine Italian restaurant with Jeff and one other colleague. Fine discussion about literature and education, and (inevitably) about politics. Jeffrey wants to bring humanities into the workplace. How nice! He says that the firm's partners are very supportive. By limo back to the Yale Club at 11:30 p.m.

May 14, 1999

NYC-Pendle Hill

To the Diller-Quayle School at 9:00 to observe the class again. Same leader, assistant, and extremely talented pianist. Christina sleeping at first but woke up gradually. They learn coordination, mostly. Afterwards, we went for the ritual muffins. Met a friend of Daphne's. Nice to see all these mothers of about the same age knowing each other. Then a long walk in the park with Daphne and Christina. Lucia's visit last week was a disaster because Christina continues to reject all her advances and Lucia reacted "like a three-year-old," says Daphne. Strange. . . . To Pendle Hill by AMTRAK and SEPTA. No Publications meeting. But our "Week-long Course Review Committee" met over supper. We had ideas for the future that I am meant to write up in draft form for the others. Then the board. I said, provocatively, that the board was "held hostage" by the Resident Program, afraid to make changes. But Dan and others said appropriately that we, as hostages, can open the door and walk out. I was reminded of Kafka's parable in The Trial. . . . Ice cream afterward. And then Dan and I still had enough energy to practice the Barber Waltz quite systematically, going from slow to medium to fast, and keeping lots of control.

Saturday, May 15, 1999

Pendle Hill

The board decided not to approve Vince Buscemi's request for $5500 plus a half-time staff person for the U.S. Ethnic and Racial Concerns Committee. We've got to investigate this whole problem more, speak to consultants, etc. One possible consultant is James McBride. Gay Berger is the new clerk, a relief after too many years of Mary Wood. . . . In the board lunch afterwards, we spoke more about the Resident Program. No attention to politics, no service program, no scholarship by teachers. Dan showed us the 1942 brochure. What a difference! . . . Afterwards, two and a half hours of good practice with Dan, very encouraging. What we really need now is lessons, which of course we'll get at Kinhaven. He drove me to the airport and we had a Chinese supper together in the food court and then espresso in the US Airways club plus a long conversation about "Death in Venice" and The Magic Mountain and Ulysses. Dan hopes to visit us at the farm in late July after attending New York

Yearly Meeting at Silver Bay. How nice! . . . Dan revealed that Liz Kamp-hausen is now in a Lesbian relationship with Orion Smith. Teacher with student. Not good. . . . Nice reunion with Chrysanthi. We went out to Starbucks at 10:30 p.m. for coffee and pastry and “catch-up.”

Sunday, May 16, 1999

Cambridge

After Meeting for Worship, when newcomers introduced themselves, lo and behold a man stood up and said, “I’m Dirk Spruyt”! I couldn’t believe it. We co-directed weekend work camps in Rochester in 1953–54. Have I seen him since? If so, I have no memory of it. We had a pleasant reunion. He’s retired from the Public Health Service and is now obsessed with sustainability. I suggested that he lead a week-long course at Pendle Hill. Also saw Andy Towl and talked about John Baker, and thanked Andy for his part, I’m sure, in the $100,000 given to Pendle Hill. Lunch at the Meeting with Andy, Dirk, and a man who kept insisting that Quakerism needs to pay more homage to the intellect. Amen. . . . Then to the A.R.T. to see Martin McDonagh’s “The Cripple of Inishmaan” about life (if you can call it that) in the Aran Islands, with memories of Synge, of course. Very well acted except for Jeremy Geidt, who just played himself. Home via Vermont Transit bus; met Larry Davies at the bus station. He and Heffernan are planning another play-reading next year, but clearly I haven’t been asked. Oh well . . .

Monday, May 17, 1999

Hanover

Started my next review for the TLS, and visited Phyllis Deutsch at UPNE to explain my trouble with Gondicas. She’ll “threaten” him and we’ll see if this works. . . . Looked up my journal entries for May 1969 for Brock Brower this Friday. What an extensive journalist I was then! Will I ever have time to type out the entire series of entries, the record of a (mostly intellectual) life? A propos, I learned today that John Petropulos died last week while he was at his desk marking student papers. Ugh!

May 24, 1999

To NYC and Princeton

I may have found an illustrator for DG1—Duane Bibby—thanks to Dick Williamson. Let’s hope that Dimitri doesn’t object. . . . Waiting at Manchester Airport for a delayed flight to LaGuardia (bad weather in New York), I read this nice passage in the TLS for May 21, by David Constantine: “Translation . . . is, like teaching, an intrinsically humane activity. I don’t mean that its practitioners are always themselves, in whatever else they do, humane, but that the activity itself, ideally conceived, is humane, and, in practicing it as well as they can, translators are doing something that Rilke might have added to his list of things to show to the Angel, as proof that humanity matters after all. . . .”

May 25, 1999

Mike Keeley’s book on Miller and Katsimbali and Durrell was reviewed superlatively in the Times. He’s delighted, as are all his friends. His only complaint, to me, was “They keep calling me ‘Professor.’ I don’t want to be ‘Professor’ any longer. I want to be ‘writer!’” . . . More proofing and insertion of new words and ideas on formatting with Mache and Dimitri. He wants to postpone the delivery of lessons 1–6 to UPNE but I refused. Mache came up with some very good new ideas.

May 27, 1999

To NYC

On New Jersey Transit to Manhattan with Dimitri. Quick visit to Daphne, about to leave for the Hamptons. Christina very grumpy, wouldn’t even say Hello. She has a cold and has been that way for three days. . . . Then to the Archdiocese for the big event, the presentation of the Commission’s report. Lots of journalists, TV cameras, photographers. Very grand. Spyridon made a fine speech, first in Greek, then in English, saying in effect that the Greek language is necessary for faith and culture. John spoke well about our report and then answered questions. The only time he probably didn’t rise to the occasion was when someone questioned the appropriateness of the word “diaspora,” saying, quite reasonably, that second, third, fourth, etc. generation Greek-Americans really do not think of themselves as a diaspora. Photos afterwards, distribution of the printed version, very nicely done; then dinner on the sixth floor, with very good wine (not Greek). Sat next to Vasos Papagapitos, happily. And opposite the Archbishop. Then he signed copies of the book for each of the Commissioners and gave us signed photographs. Then a lackey came and started to shine his shoes! Afterwards, John, Connie, Sofronos, and I unwound a bit over a cool drink. John is already thinking of the implementation committee.

May 28, 1999

To Terpni

Two-hour breakfast at the Hanover Inn with John, planning the implementation committee for the Archdiocese. Obviously this θηρεία isn’t going to end for a while. . . . To Riparius, late. What a relief! And how nice to see Alec and Monica there. Monica is showing her pregnancy now. Alec mowed, cleaned our cabin a bit. I turned on the water, opened some shutters, and we were instantaneously at home. Birthday greetings from the children, and even a phone message from Sophia, like a little bird.

Terpni

Planted the garden. It's easier and easier now, with the Mantis tiller. Didn't get jammed even once. Also set up my office. Fertilized the cherry trees. Sprayed ants already sharing the house with us. Supper pleasantly with the Shapiros and Gouthrous.

Hanover

Stayed May 30 and 31 at the farm, deliciously. Working of course on the Demotic Greek 1 revision. Crisis: the Greek-English vocabulary file is corrupted. But I think that I saved it back in Hanover, using an older version. Supper with Mother. Very difficult to converse, but Chrysanthi tried valiantly. Bev Webster looking worse and worse. Franny, too. Like a zombie. Terrible. I found the new Kendal Keynotes (Spring 1999) there with the front page devoted to me, quite nicely:

. . . TO CONVEY THE VISION OF KENDAL'S BEGINNINGS

AT THE BOARD MEETING held on June 16, 1998, the directors honored Peter Bien for his leadership of Kendal at Hanover over the past twelve years. Peter's term on the board had ended and it was appropriate to use the occasion to fête the man who had done more than anyone else to make Kendal at Hanover a reality.

More than Peter's leadership was honored that day. It was Peter's strong commitment to values and vision that steered the youthful organization through the growing pains of its first years. There were crises of construction, Medicare surveys, taxation and governance issues—to name but a few of the problems that tested Kendal's earliest years and would have caused someone with less tenacity and commitment to become discouraged.

Once Kendal filled, Peter turned his attention to strengthening the board, crafting innovative personnel policies, and supporting the effort (from his position as board chair) to have Kendal become the first continuing care retirement community in northern New England to be accredited.

Upon the recitation of the Minute of Appreciation at the board meeting, Peter was asked if he would like to say a few words. After regaling us with stories of the early days, Peter asked the board to remember that “the existence of Kendal is really a miracle.” He went on with the following words:

“This splendid Word made Flesh is what needs our incessant care and vigilance now. If it is to become ever more healthy, beautiful, civilized, and temperamentally serene, it will do so only because of the quality of the people who continue to come here as residents and staff. So, our greatest challenge in the future, I believe, is to convey to prospective residents and employees the vision of Kendal’s beginnings.”

Thank you, Peter, for giving us the gift of your farsighted vision. We are all most grateful. —Len Cadwallader

To UPNE with John to present half of our book, lessons 1–6. Phyllis Deutsch, Mary ?, Mike Burton, and the president all in attendance. They’ll start copyediting and formatting. Our job now is to supply the remainder. Still much to do, especially regarding illustrations. And Mike sent a message later that one of my disks is unreadable. I made another. I’ve had great problems with computer corruption—files freezing or Greek suddenly becoming (garbled) “English” or English (garbled) “Greek.” I’ve rescued the frozen files by going to earlier versions and also by splitting them in two. Shorter files seem to work better. So, fingers crossed for the UPNE typesetting! But it was a relief to submit this much, even if it’s only half. . . . Lunch with Tom Corindia last week, for help with the Meeting’s budget. He is going to send a new way to do the summary. But afterwards I found a way to reconcile the account totals and the fund balance totals. . . . Lunch last Friday with Ned. He’s better now, he said, than at any time after Anne’s death. . . . And saw Chauncey Loomis in the English Department a few days ago, by coincidence. Still grumpy, very involved in town affairs in Lenox, where he’s a grandee, of course. . . . We’re watching the elections in Indonesia. No result yet, but Megawati’s coalition seems favored to win, and Golkar (Habibie) to lose. So far, everything peaceful and orderly. Mrs. Haskin sent an e-mail bulletin, very upbeat and optimistic.

To Princeton

To the farm late last night, then up at 6:30 this morning to drive to Albany Airport and fly to Newark in order to get to Princeton by lunchtime. One new problem: We want our book to be called “It’s Greek to Me,” and John discovered another book called “It’s All Greek to Me.” Alas!

Kinhaven

Back from Princeton late on Thursday the 10th. Leander at the farm, playing a Bach toccata on the piano. Chrysanthi unpleasant because she feared she would be left without a car when I go to Princeton on the 20th, since Alec and Monica leave on the 21st. I had to change my tickets, to go from Hanover instead of Riparius. On Friday, Monica fixed my Excel difficulty on the Meeting budget. She knows Excel perfectly—used it in her job at Eveready Battery. Made plans with Alec to repair the garden fence, to try to keep rabbits out. . . . Off to Kinhaven. Heard the Firebird Suite on the radio on the way. Scintillating. Alice is at the workshop this year, also other old-timers: Bruno, Kit, Sue, etc. Lovely to see Nigel Coxe again, and Ignat and Caroline. Dan arrived this morning in time for our coaching by Nigel. Lots of help with the Barber Waltz especially. Later, I had a superb lesson from Ignat, again mostly on the Waltz, which he sees as a parody, like Ravel’s “La Valse.” And he taught me four different exercises to do for octaves, a technique developed by Liszt, and passed down via Goldowski, etc. Then, a special surprise, Nigel offered to give a concert, previously unscheduled. He played Beethoven’s Sonata no. 28, magnificently. Then Beethoven’s 32 Variations on an Original Theme, which I had heard him do at Kendal. (He’ll be happy to play again at Kendal, he says.) He has extraordinary control. No one plays Beethoven so meaningfully, except Richard Goode. Then Chopin Nocturnes, Impromptu, and the 3rd Ballade, not so effective as the Beethoven, but still a bravura performance. And earlier he’d done a master class with students playing Mozart’s Sonata in C and Prokofiev’s “Visions Fugitives” (Steve Klein, a major accomplishment). I played the Galop with Ignat. Fun. . . . Worked a bit on lesson 8 of the text, and to bed exhausted.

Kinhaven

Dan and I were first on the program. I completely flubbed the first two bars of the Starer, but no one seemed to notice. The rest went well enough. Dan played his very best throughout, so we did a credible job even on the Pas de Deux. And the Waltz went well, too, indeed the parodistic way we ended it was a great hit. Lots of good music followed, but the high point was the great Schubert Fantasia in F minor played movingly by Alma and Bruno. It was nice to have Alec and Monica and Chrysanthi in the audience. They came last night and thus heard the faculty four-hand recital in which Leander played first with Nigel, then with Ignat (the Schubert “Marche caracteristique” at breakneck speed and clean as a whistle, with Ignat in the treble) and then with Mrs. Shin. Exhausting for him (on four hours sleep), but he managed. After lunch, Alec and Monica drove off to Portland, Maine, to visit their Jakarta friend Andy, and Chrysanthi and I drove back to Terpni.

Right to work on the Greek book. More computer failure. Steve at Kinhaven says I need more memory. Must have this done immediately. Also started to work on Aspasia Lambrinidou’s needs for her translation of Politics of the Spirit: various Kazantzakis texts for which she had no access to the original Greek. Slow work. I found about half. The rest need a visit to Hanover.

Saturday, June 19, 1999

To the Mountainside Christian Church in Schroom Lake to witness Marcus McGinn’s highschool graduation. It’s all Bible and Jesus. Very cozy, but I interpreted it as a triumph of brainwashing. They have an entire life-system, all based on a lie—that every word is directly from God. But of course the details make sense: to be kind, to love God rather than money. Gary McGinn pointed out his Speculator pastor, Rev. Hart, who has the tent adjacent to our southern border. We hope to meet him sometime. . . . Pizza at the Narrows afterward. The owner, my friend, gave us two coffees on the house.

To Hanover–Philadelphia–Princeton

To Hanover early to present the Meeting’s budget. It went well, with not too much carping. Major discussion concerned my designation of $0 for AFSC-Philadelphia. That was changed, of course, to $50 (!) pending investigation about the spiritual condition of AFSC-Philadelphia, which according to Dan Seeger is pathetic. Too bad. . . . Then I tried to find more texts for Aspasia. Took one hour to find the first one, the Sipriot interview, misquoted (of course) by Mrs. Kazantzakis in her biography. Finally flew to Philadelphia and proceeded by Avis car to Princeton.

Wednesday, June 30, 1999

Sent lessons 1–6 of “Eureka! It’s Greek!” to UPNE. What a relief!

Thursday, July 1, 1999

Len Cadwallader telephoned to say that Bev Webster died yesterday. A blessing. His life-style was so very poor. How pathetic when once I wheeled him back to his room from the dining room and had to lift him out of the wheelchair into bed, his legs totally nonfunctional. What a gift knowing him these past nine years! And hearing him!

Monday, July 5, 1999

Yasuo and Naoko have been here since Saturday, their eleventh year visiting us on the July 4th weekend. Alec is not here (he’s at Leander’s in case the baby comes) but in some ways it was better because we had so much good music to play (piano-violin-violola) including two exquisite Mozarts. We had five separate sessions over the weekend, besides lots of talk, pizza at the Narrows, etc. Naoko is devastated because she cannot get pregnant, it seems. Yasuo is exploring a change of career, to go into gerontological research and therapy. . . . I’m also working as fast as I can on the journal—my last. Hour after hour! I want to publish a valediction at the start of the issue.

Saturday, July 10, 1999

Worked fifteen hours yesterday on the journal and another three this morning in order to get it to the post office on time. And off it went, huge, my last, after 24 years. I included the following “valediction”:

Folklore asserts that BMGS / JMGS was founded by Mike Keeley and Anthony Bryer in a Birmingham bar, or else by Peter Bien and Anthony Bryer in a Birmingham bar. The stable elements seem to be Bryer and the Birmingham bar. In any case, twenty-five years have passed since then. Bryer, who preferred to remain as business manager, induced the formidable Donald Nicol of King’s College London to edit BMGS (affectionately nicknamed “bum-gas”) with me as his associate editor. This Anglo-American modernist-Byzantinist collaboration continued from 1975 to 1983, published by Blackwell's. By that time, folks at MGSA felt that our discipline had advanced sufficiently for us to manage a journal on our own. Thus Lily Macrakis and I journeyed to Blackwell's in Oxford with a proposal; they were not amused. Then Bryer and I journeyed to Baltimore to lure Johns Hopkins into some sort of interest; that went better—indeed, for seventeen years Hopkins has provided us with a succession of totally professional editors. And the marriage de convenance between England and America ended amicably, with BMGS continuing on its own in Birmingham and with a newly invented JMGS edited by Bill McNeill taking flight in Maryland. We changed then to two issues a year and added book reviews. Later, with the great help of Jeffrey Rusten of Cornell and the valiant cooperation of Hopkins' compositors, I was able to computerize the typesetting of Greek, ending the previous nightmare in which every  $\gamma$  had come out as a  $\chi$  every  $\nu$  as a  $\upsilon$ , and all the breathings were facing in the wrong direction (for we then used polytonic). Next, Michael Macrakis and The Greek Font Society stepped into the act, lamenting our ugly font and making us a present of the elegant Didot, which is now employed.

For me, these twenty-five years have been quite an adventure. To work with Bill McNeill and then with his energetic successor, Ernestine Friedl, was a valuable apprenticeship. When I assumed the editorship in 1990, I then had the pleasure of collaborating first with Michael Herzfeld and then with Peter Allen as associate editors, both of whom are possessed of an excellent eye for detail and a clear mind for judgment. Thankfully, the book reviews were always handled separately, initially by Mary Layoun and then by Eva Konstantellou, who despite family obligations and massive troubles at work has always been a dedicated, imaginative colleague. In addition, of course, JMGS has had a distinguished group of experts on its editorial board ready to read submissions and recommend or dissuade (we have published only about 38% of the 440 submissions received since December 1985). Many many thanks, therefore, to Margaret Alexiou, Richard Clogg, Loring Danforth, John Iatrides, Kostas Kazazis, Edmund Keeley, Mark Mazower, Nicos Mouzelis, Alexander Nehamas, Dimitris Tziovas, and Speros Vryonis. Lastly, I must mention the succession of Dartmouth students whom I have trained in copyediting, proofreading, and bibliographical research, young people who in some cases have gone into the field professionally. In particular, I remember with gratitude Kate Cohen, Jay Bruce, Erica Thrall, and Sara Zuniga.

Thinking back over my nine years as editor and fifteen before that as associate editor, I consider the most notable areas of growth to have been (1) the computerization of Greek, already mentioned, (2) the greatly increased diversity of scholarly fields represented, instead of just literature and history, which dominated at the start, and (3) perhaps most important, the large number of submissions now coming from Greece itself. Yes, these years have been an adventure—stimulating, educative, and mostly pleasurable despite the curses hurled at me occasionally by rejected authors. The real purpose of JMGS has been not just to make scholarship available in print but also to act as a kind of school for peers, offering constructive advice for improvement and always operating according to the dictates of scholarly rigor. Consequently, perhaps the journal's most important activity is not what is seen on its pages but everything that occurs invisibly before publication. With hope and trust that this will continue, I happily turn over the editorship now to my successor, Professor Susan Sutton, wishing for her the patience, fortitude, and sleeplessness that she will need for her own forthcoming adventure.

Drove Chrysanthi to the AMTRAK station in Rensselaer, arriving at 8:20 a.m. She went to Washington to help with Nicholas, born on July 11th via natural childbirth rather than Caesarian. 8½ lbs. I drove to Saratoga, bought ballet tickets for matinee and evening, shopped at Price Chopper (cherry pie), visited the National Museum of Dance (disappointing, but I neglected to go next door to see if any instruction was taking place). Then I saw a deliciously exuberant program: pure joy and fun plus athleticism. Robbins' "interplay," Balanchine's "Tarantella," Peter Martins' "Barber Violin Concerto" (both music and dance extraordinary), and finally Balanchine's "Stars and Stripes," to march music by Sousa. Then a nap on the grass. supper in the Hall of Springs with Don Kurka and two friends of his, the Skinners, he a retired sculptor, she an elementary school teacher, followed by an all-Balanchine/Stravinsky program, so entirely different from the matinee: "Apollo," perfectly done by Nikolaj Hübbe, "Orpheus," which I'd never seen before, very imaginative in its evocation of Hades, and “Agon.” What a splendid treat! Back at the farm at midnight, with a star-filled sky overhead.

Saturday, July 17, 1999

Chrysanthi telephoned to say “Happy Anniversary.” We’ll celebrate next Friday when she returns. It’s our 44th. . . . Terribly hot again. I’m working indoors so I can use a fan. Still typing new material and revisions into lessons 7–12. It’s endless. Worked outdoors a bit. Put up the bat house. Assembled the composter some more. Put oakum in slits in sheathing where bees have invaded our kitchen wall. . . . Took a delicious swim, my first this year. Pond very low, very warm. . . . Hummingbirds are back. Saw three at once feeding on our porch, although they seem usually to want to chase each other away and hog the sugar-water for themselves. . . . Christina telephoned. Do we have horses? Daphne says she’s horse-crazy. I telephoned a stable in Lake Luzerne and we discovered that they do pony rides for children.

Tuesday, July 20, 1999

To SPAC again, alone, to see the all-Stravinsky program, highlighted by “Firebird” with the Chagall sets and choreography by Balanchine and Robbins in collaboration. Stunning, of course, especially the wild scene in the middle with the monsters. Very good for children (and adults). The final ballet, “Stravinsky Violin Concerto” again displays Balanchine’s genius to interpret the music so expressively, and always in a new way, without falling into clichés.

Wednesday, July 21, 1999

Managed to finish part 1 of lesson 7 and to print it without further corruption of the file. Spent a second afternoon on the new outlet in the kitchen. Finished it, plugged in the Microwave. No juice! What did I do wrong? I think it’s because I used the black and red of the three-wire conduit instead of the black and white (stupidly). Will correct this tomorrow and see what happens. . . . Don Kurka came for supper. I fed him one of Chrysanthi’s delicacies: τουρλού.

Friday, July 23, 1999

Picked Chrysanthi up at AMTRAK, Rensselaer. Supper in Saratoga, then ballet: “Serenade”: very early Balanchine to Tchaikovsky’s lovely music, mostly ensemble, especially the girls, all in white, the Balanchine genius already in evidence, especially when compared to Peter Martins' setting of Wynton Marsalis's mediocre music—unimaginative choreography for the most part, although some of it was daring, I suppose, especially in the way the men maltreat the girls. But the "Stravinsky Violin Concerto" was brilliant again, both as music and dance. Home later, very tired, but filled.

Monday, August 9, 1999

A full, interesting day. Vetted Lewis Owens's chapter 1 in the morning, briefly (I'm doing it by installments), read over a Mozart violin-piano sonata, telephoned Corey Smith to sell and buy stocks, blitzed Elenor Marsh regarding a performance at Kendal by one of Hopkins Center's residency groups, blitzed Artemis Leontis regarding how bad the article on Whitman and Elytis is and how right she was to recommend rejection, spent most of the morning completing my vetting of galley proofs for JMGS 17/2 (my very last issue!!). After lunch, read TLS a little, then assembled the easel that Daphne shipped here for Christina (that took an hour), finished the swings that Alec and I have built for the children, lengthening the chain so the seat is lower; then with Alec, using the Stihl trimmer, removed protruding branches on the south field, up to my office, a big, tiring job, then collected them all and took them to the brush pile, using Alec's trailer; then mowed around Leander's house in preparation for his arrival in a few days. Showered. Then Asa and Evelyn Rothstein came for dinner. Asa in very good mood. I had him explain at length the ongoing research that is attempting to create stents with the protein "elastacin" in order to render the stents more acceptable by the body. They're at the stage now where they hope to begin experiments with animals. All laboratory tests are positive—encouraging. At dinner he regaled us also with tales of his "secret" research on radiation to be expected from the atom bomb then under construction at Los Alamos and his almost farcical time conducting experiments with live soldiers in the desert prior to our invasion of North Africa, to determine how humans react in a temperature of 120 degrees Fahrenheit. A very stimulating time. But then, after they left, I had Monica and Alec help me display on the computer the first illustration done by Duane Bibby for our revised textbook: the Pavlakis family. Quite nice, but Chrysanthi says that the faces should be longer, not so round, and I say that Mrs. Pavlakis's nose shouldn't be quite so bulbous. But the style is fine. Also received a blitz from Tom Doulis, to whom I'd mentioned Alec's new job. Tom enthused that he and Nancy had met at Friends Select, where she was teaching and he came to teach English for two years. Small world. We'll both be at the Nassau Inn in November for the MGSA symposium. How nice that his translation of Θάνος Βλέκας was accepted for publication by a university press.

Wednesday, August 11, 1999

To Saratoga for a lovely supper with Donna Trautwein and Ed Welsh and Donna's father, aged 90, Leo Cohen, very lucid and talkative. Then to hear the Philadelphia Orchestra, Peter Serkin spectacular in Brahms's 1st piano concerto and the orchestra equally spectacular in Dvořák's New World Symphony, Dutuit conducting.

Friday, August 13, 1999

Leander, Deanna, Sophia, and Nicholas arrived last night after a surprisingly quick and peaceful drive. Nicholas, five weeks old, very placid; Sophia full of pep. . . . Broke the Ford mower yesterday: all the rivets sheared off the knife-bar. Took it to Bud Ruddick this morning for repair. He's into tractor restoration now. People collect old tractors. Too bad I lost my 1935 Allis Chalmers. . . . A surprise this afternoon was the arrival of James McBride with his two children, but not Stephanie. They're having marriage problems, alas, but he thinks they'll survive as a married couple. He finished his ghost-written "autobiography" of Quincy Jones, but Jones doesn't like the non-laudatory passages and won't pay James his fee. A mess. But his musical will get a workshop performance at the Kennedy Center and a chance to be seen again by the "big wigs" who could bring it to Broadway. James is willing to come to Pendle Hill to lecture, as a favor to me, he says. His normal fee is $10,000 (although he'll accept $5,000). Pendle Hill will pay him $200. . . . Eleven people for supper tonight. Stew. It went well. . . . Peter Allen did his usual very conscientious job of vetting and I entered his changes this morning. Waiting now for more authors and for Sara Zuniga. My last galleys!

Monday, August 16, 1999

Peter Schweitzer telephoned to say that his sister, Joan Bewley-Bull, died at age 76. Poor benighted soul: fabulously rich but everything else wrong. She refused to go to doctors, never had a pap test, and of course died of breast cancer. Peter thinks that the ex-husband, James Bewley-

Bull, is in a sanitarium, a hopeless alcoholic. In any case, there is no contact. . . . We are having quite a time with everyone here. Christina and Sophia enjoy each other most of the time, but also compete and fight at times. Tonight, as we were celebrating Sophia's birthday with cake and champagne, she came in screaming, saying that Christina had pushed her, and Leander lost his temper, called Christina a bully and accused Daphne of refusing to discipline her. When Chrysanthi defended Daphne Leander left the table in a huff, slamming the door—and ruined our party, of course, although the rest of us stayed for a while calmly and cordially. Sometimes the adults are more childlike than the children. But the kids are somewhat barbaric. We made a swing-set with two swings, but they want only the single swing, and continually compete for occupancy. Chrysanthi says it's "natural." . . . By and large, it's nice to have them all here. Daphne's Andrew is very placid, and Deanna's Nicholas, five months old, is like a little mouse. I'm comfortable in the guesthouse, now with electricity and running water. Chrysanthi, since Greg left, is sleeping in the main house to keep Daphne company. . . . Spent time clearing trees in back of Leander's; he has opened it up very nicely. And yesterday we had a good time at the Warren County Fair, with the girls taking ride after ride and the parents indulging in franks and fries. . . . On the book, I've started entering the paradigm numbers in the Greek-English vocabulary: very slow and tedious. John says the Press is now going to delay the book. Duane Bibby's drawings need further fixing; Nikos is too young, so is Maria, etc.

Tuesday, August 17, 1999

All fine with Leander. His good quality is that he forgets and forgives easily, after exploding. The girls went off for pony rides. In the afternoon. Rhoda came with her brood, two sons with their wives and families—five more children, making nine kids and 10 adults for pot luck supper. One son, Martin, a lawyer, is assistant to the attorney general of New Hampshire, based in Concord. He is currently working on the new regulations for school taxes. A very astute, articulate man. The other son, Paul, I think, also a lawyer, is in the Department of Justice in Washington. His wife, Carol, also a lawyer, is in private practice in McLean, Virginia. Is Martin's wife, Ann, a lawyer, too? Maybe. The children, five in all, range from about 15 to about 8 or 9. Paul's are all blonde, as is Carol. Mike, the oldest, is a swimmer and violinist. Wants to be the best in everything; refused to swim in our pond because afraid of the frogs (!), but they took him to the YMCA in Glens Falls to do laps. Sweet, demure children, all of them. And of course both boys married non-Jews. So did we all.

Sunday, August 22, 1999

Greg arrived again yesterday and promptly finished mowing the south field. That's it for this year. Και του χρόνου! Today Daphne and family left, which means that Chrysanthi and I return to our house after a week very comfortably in the Guest House, now furnished with electricity and running water. The visit was a good one. Daphne is already talking about next summer. Rain finally.

Monday, August 23, 1999

After the rain, I burned the brush pile. A nice mist hung low over the field at 6:00 a.m. One match was all that was needed. Most of it was consumed in fifteen minutes. But then I added three loads of brush from Leander's. Chrysanthi came out with the watering can (!) to protect the grass.

Tuesday, August 24, 1999

Finally, thank God, finished entering the paradigms in the Greek-English lexicon. Took me ten days, such boring work. But it's done. I'm still trying to get decent drawings from Duane Bibby. Discouraging. And Alix MacSweeney sent me the copyedited version of my TLS review, a travesty, done by an illiterate. I've told her that it cannot be published in that form. How could the TLS descend so far? . . . In the afternoon, walked the south logging path with my chain saw, clearing the various trees that have fallen across it. On the left-hand fork, alas, several large trees lie across the path, from the blow-down two years ago, I think.

Wednesday, August 25, 1999

Last night prepared four more testimonials for Lewis Owens; he never stops. Sent off IRS payments for us and Mother, also NH taxes. Returned TLS review to Alix with a long distressful letter. This morning wrote a review of Mike Keeley's Inventing Paradise for World Literature Today, without having to read the book a second time. Quick work, and fun. Now, before JMGS page proofs arrive, and before Aspasia sends me more chapters of the Greek translation of Politics of the Spirit, I must turn to Doug Gwyn's latest, Seekers Found, which I foolishly agreed to copyedit. Let's hope its English is better than what I had to deal with in The Covenant Crucified.

Sunday, August 29, 1999

Leonard Cadwallader telephoned to tell me the shocking news that he is resigning as director of Kendal. Why? He cannot get along with the board, which presumably means chiefly John Hennessey. I asked him if essentially we could call this a conflict between Quaker culture and non-Quaker culture. He said Yes. So, the troubles that I had to begin to deal with, chiefly with Hennessey and Jim Armstrong, have led to this. Apparently Hennessey has stacked the board with "corporate" types so that the few Quaker voices—Margery Walker, Treat Arnold, Gordon Browne—are drowned out. But Len and Mary Ann hope to remain in Hanover, at least. What a surprise! What a disappointment! I asked if in his view the people coming in as residents in the last year or so have impressed him as "quality" and he assured me that they are wonderful. So that, at least, is encouraging.

This morning, Leander, seeking a bit of hose I have in the basement to our bathroom, stepped on the ladder before securing it. The ladder slid out from under him and he fell down into the basement on his back, striking his head against the concrete wall. But luckily, thankfully, he didn't break any bones or suffer a concussion, although he did seem to pass out briefly. A narrow escape. What a horror story it would have been if he'd ended up in the hospital, with them slated to return to Maryland tomorrow. But later in the day he seemed fine. After supper we took Sophia to Stewart's for ice cream (and indulged ourselves).

Long talk with Margery Walker about Len. It turned out that, basically, he was fired. Just like Jean, but for the opposite reason. She was a splendid manager and hopeless at personal relations. He is good at personal relations but apparently hopeless as a manager. Margery says he didn't understand the budget, failed to follow through on promised projects, failed to establish meaningful relationships with the hospital, college, and town. He had a bad review after the first year, was counseled subsequently, and it didn't work. Again, just like Jean. Well, too too bad. John Hennessey already has a search committee formed, of course, dynamo that he is. He, Jim Armstrong, and Margery are all serving their final year. Margery says that the board is strong, with good new members. Μακάρι! . . . I suggested to Chrysanthi that we think about selling the house and moving into temporary rental quarters, in order to be prepared for the move to Kendal. She says that Felitsa wants to buy the house.

Sunday, September 5, 1999

Very sociable. We visited a Greek family (imagine!) that purchased the cabins halfway between Wevertown and Johnsbury, where the musicians used to live. They hope to run a business. The son is a Ph.D. student in philosophy at the New School, and knows Adi Polis. Small world. Then we called on Deana and Matt, our neighbors, and saw their converted barn, very cozy. He gets up at 3:00 a.m. every day to get to work on time. He's the caretaker of a very fancy golf course. All this was preceded by pizza at the Narrows. "Will I see you next year?" I asked the owner. "Not if we sell the place," she replied with a sigh. They've been trying to sell it for years. No takers.

Monday, September 6, 1999

Finished Doug Gwyn's Seekers Found, 532 pages, all requiring heavy editing. But it's an amazing education in Quakerism. Then I immediately began to revise my etymology paragraphs, guided by the Princeton professor who vetted them. Later: flushed and changed the coolant in the John Deere, my baby!

Wednesday, September 8, 1999

Finished rewriting all twelve etymological sections of our textbook, incorporating suggestions made by a Princeton classicist, and adding new material here and there. . . . Also finished putting the tractor to sleep for the winter.

Friday, September 17, 1999

Apprehensive regarding 6:00 a.m. flight owing to Hurricane Floyd (we had an amazing fifteen inches of rain yesterday and last night), but the weather improved and the flight took off 45 minutes late. Sunny skies in Philadelphia. I went to 1530 Locust Street and visited with Monica, who is huge and waiting. . . . Beautiful apartment, tastefully decorated with Indonesian artifacts. So different from Daphne, whose apartment was cluttered with packing cases for months and whose pictures didn't get hung until I did it. Then we walked to Alec's school, ten minutes away. A fine facility, with auditorium, gym, pool, wrestling room, weight room, art room, music room, etc. Alec already knows many names; he introduced us to everyone he encountered. He's feeling much more positive now. Out to a Korean self-service restaurant with an amazing collection of dishes, oriental and occidental. Upstairs in the dining room, encountered Shirley Dodson, about to do a fund-raising presentation at Friends House, which is across the street. Afterwards, Monica and I walked to Arch and Broad to see the Maxfield Parrish exhibit at the Philadelphia Academy. He was a superbly gifted artist, full of whimsy, especially when he illustrated books of nursery rhymes. Of course many paintings evoke New Hampshire owing to his residence in Plainfield-Cornish. Monica was eager to see everything. We walked back to 1530 and I continued to Pendle Hill. . . . Search Committee. We now have nine applications, including Mary Ellen Chijioki's. Board. Ice cream. Then practice with Dan, who obviously prepared the Satie, so it was fun. I played terribly. Must study my part much more.

Saturday, September 18, 1999

All-day board retreat at Providence Meeting, founded in 1684. Clarence Pickett is buried in the graveyard. We unexpectedly concentrated on my concern: to expand and deepen the curricular offerings and to employ outside teachers. I drafted a minute at the end that we hope will be approved in October. . . . Long talk with Larry Ingle about Doug's book. He agrees with me. So I met with Doug and Caroline over supper and urged him to eliminate the final two chapters, on Abraham and Hellenism, or perhaps to relegate them to appendices. . . . To Dan's again for longer practice, followed by some of our old repertoire: Debussy's "En Bateau" and Schumann's "Träuer," which we did well, the Dello Joio, which we did very badly, then Bach preludes and fugues for fun. How lovely!

Sunday, September 19, 1999

To Swarthmore Meeting. Lawn mower howling outside for most of it. Afterwards, nice to see Lee Bennett after so many years, and Mary Ellen Chijioki, and especially Asia Bennett, whom I asked to contribute to the Seeger festschrift. Then to Philadelphia to lunch with Alec, Monica, and Dan in Penang, a Malasian restaurant. Very noisy and ethnic, filled with Asians. How nice to have Alec and Monica now in Philadelphia!

Saturday, September 25, 1999

Kesaya and David gave a surprise 80th birthday party for Mayme at the Shaker Inn, with dinner for 70. After supper, as we did as at Lafayette's 80th, people getting up to recite poems, sing songs, or just tell anecdotes. Here is my contribution:

A SONNET FOR MAYME NODA ON HER EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY

Eighty years are long but not too long if filled with care, love and some variation—city, farm, domestic peace, and a tiff with nuclear power and wartime preparation.

Nor too long if sweetened by the piping of recorder consorts after pruning humongous hours with minimum whining, or by friends regaled with sushi in the evening.

Mayme's eighty had all of these and more, plus detention camp and decades galore with industrious, compliant Lafayette.

But taught by Quakerism to abhor vi-o-lence, bellicosity to deplore, she never was a militant suffragette.

I've been reading books by Hartshorne, Cobb, Griffin, etc., thinking perhaps to write something on Quakerism and process theology for the Seeger festschrift.

Sunday, September 26, 1999

To Strafford to hear Admiral Gene Carroll—finally—speak on American militarism. A superb lecture. The basic point was that no imperial power in the history of civilization was ever able to maintain itself by virtue of military power, and we will fail also because alas our main strategy to maintain our hegemony is a military one. Very discouraging in the details, too. But he remains optimistic; that is his virtue. We spoke about Dennis, still unpublished. His father has advised him, as I have, to condense and tighten, but he does not listen. Sloan Coffin was there; he recently had a stroke and now walks and talks with some difficulty, alas. And Ned Coffin, his brother, was there, too; he'd been in one of my ILEAD classes. Went out with Chrysanthi and Chris Dye, whom I'm hoping to interest in serving as a Kendal trustee. . . . Still no call from Monica. The baby is now one day overdue.

Monday, September 27, 1999

Alec telephoned this morning. Their son, Theodore, was born last night about 2:00 a.m. 8 pounds 15 oz. Huge. Monica is exhausted but well.

Wednesday, October 6, 1999

To Philadelphia and Princeton

Visited Alec, Monica, Chrysanthi, and Theodore (!), now ten days old. He's cute, with an interesting mouth. Alec looks very happy and comfortable as a father.

Friday, October 8, 1999

Princeton

Dimitri and I worked long hours yesterday and today and we have finished only lesson 1. We thought we'd do the whole book. But instead of just responding to Kate Cohen's copyediting, we're rewriting large sections—again! (And sometimes with cause.) Now Dimitri wants to delay publication for an entire year. But the drawings he got from Greece are superb, much better than the first two submissions that I got here, except for the price: she wants over $3000! Saw Bob Fagles on the street. He's thinking of retiring next year, at age 68. I encouraged him.

Tuesday, October 12, 1999

Long meeting at UPNE. They refuse to accept all the changes we made in lessons 1 & 2. They also remind us that all illustrations are to be in black and white. Phyllis will write a strong letter to Dimitri. I telephoned Mike. He'll talk to Dimitri, if Dimitri wishes, telling him that enough is enough. Will he comply, or withdraw, or sabotage? Thankfully, had a nice long supper with Robert Binswanger, a chance to unload emotionally.

Wednesday, October 13, 1999

Lunch with Steve Scher; another chance to unload. And supper with Dick, followed by Mozart, Beethoven, Joplin, C.P.E. Bach, Handel, and Vivaldi. Nice! Also had a good long talk with Frank Currier about money—how to minimize taxes. Lots of good ideas. Then visited John Boswell, who is packing all his files in boxes and is about to retire.

Thursday, October 14, 1999

Spoke with Jack Hunter, trying to interest him to serve on the Kendal board. Then met with the Webster Performance Committee and Sally, planning concerts for this season. Actually, all slots are already filled, and the fund has grown to $58,000.

Friday, October 15, 1999

Pendle Hill

Piano last night with Dan. The Satie is going a bit better, but I still haven't mastered my part. Dan took the plunge and invested in the house at Lumberton Leas. We both wonder how our piano relationship can continue after he leaves Pendle Hill. . . . Books Committee, Publications Committee, nice talk with Yuki, who still has the most exquisite face I've ever seen. Then to Philadelphia. Supper with Monica and Theo, who is already bigger than last week. Alec still at school. Kids were there for a slumber party. He got back at 8:15 p.m. He already has a small string program going, about twelve players, but he can rehearse them for only ten minutes, twice a week. Yet they already sound quite good, he says. He has a low opinion of the productivity of his dean, the woman with the ring in her nose, although they get along, more or less. So, it's a mixed picture, but basically positive. Tomorrow he goes to a reunion of his Haverford buddies, who feast on crabs once a year.

October 21, 1999

To NYC

Flew to LaGuardia. Met a Quaker acquaintance accidentally at LaGuardia food court, the ex-president of the Haverford Corporation, Collett, very friendly, on his way to Ohio to help direct FAHE. Then to the Yale Club. Bought another pair of expensive shoes, $285, perhaps my last, plus three shirts and two ties at Daffy's. Then: limousine to 2 World Trade Center. Nice to be recognized by various lawyers at Thatcher Proffit Wood. I spoke this time on "The Dead"—a good lecture, I think. Questions followed, not many but enough. More nice talk in the reception and then a very fine dinner in a hugely expensive Italian restaurant in the East 20s ($32.00 for an entrée). With Jeff Murphy and two others from the firm, one a young lawyer and the other a painter who works there as a secretary to make ends meet. Lots of good talk about literature, art, and religion. How pleasant to be back in this sort of discourse and fellowship again; I now realize how little of it I have enjoyed since retirement. Yet I said No to an invitation to do another Alumni College trip in Greece in May. Maybe that was a mistake. But I didn't want to lose, in effect, a whole month.

October 22, 1999

NYC–Lebanon

Breakfast at the Yale Club with Graham Tebbe and Greg. Very cordial and pleasant. Greg made me understand better that a move to the suburbs might be right for them, especially if his commute is no more than an hour each way. We talked also about money and the inadvisability of giving grandchildren too much too soon. In any case, if they have a trust fund they shouldn't be told about it.

November 3, 1999

To NYC by train. AFS cocktail party. Long talk with David Buck, who says he feels that he and Alec will be working together one day.

November 4, 1999

Yale Club

American Farm School board this morning. Education Committee very disappointing: long speech by the Greek trustee, no real engagement with the issues. I then rushed to Princeton for the MGSA 30th anniversary symposium. I spoke in the session on the bibliography edited by Stratos Constantinidis, finally come to fruition after thirteen years. I gave the early history: how the Greek Embassy conceived of the project because the Turks had produced a bibliography; how I traveled to Washington to collect the first payment and to discuss details with the Library of Congress. Earlier: nice long lunch with Tom Doulis, followed by a nice long supper after the session. His translation of Θάναος Βλέκας is being published by Northwestern University Press, miraculously. We had a cordial reunion; it's been a long friendship. . . . Then rushed back to NYC.

November 5, 1999

NYC

AFS full board all morning. I tried to get them to pass a resolution that they'd cease relying on EU funds for the operating budget after 2006. They refused, but most of the sentiment went in this direction. . . . After lunch, went to part 2 of "The American Experience" at the Whitney. Awful. Nothing to lift the spirit. Such a disappointment after the very stimulating part 1. Then walked all the way to Woolman Rink in Central Park, where Christina was getting an ice-skating lesson. Mostly tumbling at this stage. When she and Daphne joined Chrysanthi and me, Christina ran to me and gave a big hug. Consequences of the farm. Then Daphne couldn't find a cab to take herself, Christina, and Andrew home, a typical NYC saga. But this weekend is the marathon and New York is full up. So we all got on the crosstown bus. . . . Chrysanthi and I got dressed in tuxedo and long dress and then went to the Colony Club for the AFS banquet honoring the Drapers and the Bucks. Tad and Bruce were there, also Brenda and Everett Marder. Also Mac Godley, whose wife Betty had described his multiple infirmities to us at Wednesday's cocktail party. George and Charlotte were presented with portraits. David tore up his prepared remarks and spoke extemporaneously, and well. I sat next to Annie Levis at dinner. She's a lively conversationalist.

Saturday, November 6, 1999

Princeton

To Princeton by bus. I had hoped to find three Greek passages in the library for Anastasia. Found Dragoumis's Σαμοθράκη easily enough, but the others were in Νεοελληνικά Γράμματα and Καινούρια Εποχή, both shelved as "rare books" and unavailable on Saturdays. . . . Lunch at the renovated Palmer House, more beautiful than ever, to discuss the MGSA endowment. Our committee consists of past presidents. Herzfeld was missing (he's in Europe), but the others were there, except of course for John Petropulos, who died: Nikiforos Diamandouros, Mike Keeley, Lily Macrakis, John Chioles, Van Coufoudakis. Also John Iatrides, ex officio. We set guidelines for use of the endowment, which has grown to around $300,000 from the original $30,000 that I deposited with Corey Smith 25 years ago. They worry about the Executive Committee's friction between young and old. They hinted that it would be good if I could serve again as president if Van is not reelected. I hope he is. . . . I then chaired a session with Karen Van Dyck and Helen Kalias speaking on diaspora issues. I ended it by remarking that the Rassias Commission had been criticized for using the word "diaspora," since many (or most?) Greek-Americans do not consider themselves a diaspora. . . . Then another banquet. 200 people. I was up front, between Ernie Friedl and Electra Petropulos, John's widow. His daughter was there, too; she knew Alec at Haverford (she was at Bryn Mawr). Nikiforos eulogized John very well indeed. Then each of us, past presidents and past editors of the journal, was honored. Very pleasant, to be sure!

Sunday, November 7, 1999

Taxi to Trenton AMTRAK station. It took us 13 hours to get home because the Vermonter's engine caught fire near Baltimore. We took another train to New York. I asked permission to wait in the first class lounge and this was granted. So we read the New York Times in comfortable surroundings. Home finally at 9:30 p.m.

Monday, November 8, 1999

Learned today that Mac Godley, whom we had greeted as he circulated in his tuxedo at the Colony Club before the dinner, died yesterday at home. He was reading the paper, got up, and died. And Petropulos died at his desk while grading student essays.

Monday, November 8, 1999

Dick for supper and music. We did a sonata written by John Koch, very fine. Then Mozart.

Tuesday, November 9, 1999

To Kendal to hear Lisa Mayer and a violinist and cellist do Beethoven's 3rd trio and the Mendelssohn trio. Excruciating. The music was dead. I kept squirming but couldn't leave. Afterwards, saw Wendy, Bev Web's daughter, in the hall. She's here because Franny is probably dying. Wendy says she was with Bev when he died and was playing Mozart for him. So he died listening to Mozart.

Wednesday, November 10, 1999

Meeting for Grieving for Dick Brokaw, who was killed with his new wife in the Egyptian airlines crash last week. Very deep and gathered. I ministered, saying that we are probably designed by nature not to live much more than 50 years and that everything beyond should be considered a gift. Also that what matters is the quality of one's life, not the quantity. And that "immortality" is probably best provided by the fact that one is remembered, as the ancient Greeks well knew.

Thursday, November 11, 1999

Lively supper with Robert Binswanger. Alas, Penny has breast cancer and will have a mastectomy next Wednesday. He is taking a leave of absence for a month.

Friday, November 12, 1999

Lunch with Tom Corindia at the hospital to discuss the auditor's report on Meeting finances. The auditor wants us to depreciate the building and furnishings. Tom disagrees. Then to Felitsa's and Otmar's for supper. Again very lively with lots of laughter.

Saturday, November 13, 1999

Philadelphia

Up at 5:00 a.m. to catch the 6:00 a.m. flight to Philadelphia. Walked Alec, Monica, and Theo to the hotel in Rittenhouse Square where Alec had a strategic planning conference all day; we met teachers, principals, and a student from the school, all very attentive to Theo. Then breakfast with Monica. Ordered scrapple so that she could experience it. She's very active; goes to a breast feeding support group at the hospital, for instance. Goes most days to Friends Select to have lunch with Alec. Family are fine in Indonesia, thankfully. . . . To Pendle Hill. Search Committee 1:30 to 5:00. We reduced the 30 candidates to 8. Len Cadwallader received 9 out of 10 votes, the highest of the lot. Good, so far. But Gay Berger says we should choose a woman. Lots of other strong candidates, for example Mary Ellen Chijioki. . . . I drove back to Philadelphia. Supper with Alec & Co. and Dan Seeger. Monica made a lovely Indonesian dish complete with hot sauce—really hot. Dan took photos. Everyone very jolly. Alec seems quite fulfilled now by his job. He is even beginning to appreciate the dean, the one with the ring through her nose, who conducted a dance for the students last night very well. Then we all went to 18th Street for coffee and ice cream. . . . To Wallingford. Dan and I went through our repertoire: Satie and Bizet's "Le Bal." I still have trouble with the Satie. Must really learn it by heart, I fear, and that is something I don't seem able to do.

Sunday, November 14, 1999

Quechee

To Quechee to see Brenda and Everett Marder and to give Brenda the photos of the Quaker girls' school. Lots of good talk about the School, and also about Everett's future. He confesses that he is fully tied to his job; that's his whole life (except for children). If he retires, there's a void. Worrisome. He is thinking of becoming an arbitrator in labor disputes or finding something in Greece. Brenda's book will try to place the Farm School in the broader political context, which may make it very controversial. Already, where she wrote “bandit war” her Greek translator used εμφύλιο instead of συμμοριτοπόλεμο.

Sunday, November 21, 1999

Cambridge

To Cambridge. Lunch with Andrea Useem, back from Africa and now doing a Master’s degree at Harvard Divinity School. Interestingly, she realized that it was “too easy” to remain an ex-pat (she’d been four years in Africa) and that she’d better come home to see what might be the right step for the future. She’s charming, and very gifted as a writer. . . . Then to Widener (my key still works) to look up some Greek texts for Aspasia. Found the one in Καινούρια Εποχή about Rosa Luxemburg, but Widener didn’t have the one by Λαμπίδη in Νεοελληνικά Γράμματα. . . . Then to Dorchester to meet Darren and Betsy Middleton and Lewis Owens, all here for the American Academy of Religion meetings. Lovely reunion. Darren is pleased with his job in Fort Worth. Betsy finished her Master’s in Divinity at Princeton and hopes to find a Ph.D. program in Texas. Lewis is confident that he’ll submit his dissertation on schedule in January. It should reach me in February. And the viva is on March 24. I brought him Kazantzakis’s handwritten reading notes on Frobenius. In the car, we listened to School for Scandal and laughed heartily.

November 23, 1999

To Washington

Up at 4:45 a.m. Drove to Springfield, AMTRAK to Washington, reading Pendle Hill pamphlet submissions. Metro to Avis. Avis to Bamboo Buffet to meet Leander, Deanna, Sophia, and Nicholas by pre-arrangement. Huge Chinese dinner, very pleasant. Then to Courtyard Marriott hotel. Leander accepted Kinhaven’s proposal to run a second workshop, this time for duos (piano-violin, piano-cello) with 16 students, beginning in 2001. Good. Deanna’s back at work. Everyone is mad at Slatkin, who fired a half dozen of the older players. The orchestra will tour Vermont in April. I suggested that Leander and Deanna play at Kendal then. But Deanna says that she hasn’t practiced for a year, cannot play solo now. So she goes every day to Kennedy Center and of course plays the notes.

November 24, 1999

Washington

To Davis House, R Street and 18th, near Dupont Circle, to interview Frank Massey, executive secretary of Baltimore Yearly Meeting, with Pat Hunt and Andrea Wasi. He was OK, could do the job certainly, but all three of us felt somehow unexcited. Afterwards, long cordial lunch with Pat, talking about AFSC, where she worked for so many years. She confirmed its problem. It became a victim of its own affirmative action. . . . Then to the Phillips Gallery, which had a big show detailing the collecting efforts of Phillips himself, and of course showing his treasures. My favorite was John Sloan's "Six O'Clock, Winter," showing the Third Avenue El. (He died in Hanover in 1951.) But equally memorable among the Americans are Edward Hopper's "Sunday," showing a lonely man on a stoop, and Stuart Davis's "Corner Café." Of course, there are also the spectacular "Luncheon of the Boating Party" (Renoir) and the two "Repentant St. Peter" (Goya, El Greco, so very different). In addition I loved Rouault's "Circus Trio" and Picasso's "Woman in Green Hat." All in all, a treat. . . . Then Metro to Rockville and via my Avis car to Leander's. Alec, Monica, and Theo had just arrived. Alec expatiated on defects of the Friends Select board: two factions with opposite educational philosophies, so endless wrangling and inability to reach decisions. Board and school controlled by two Meetings instead of being independent. That's already 75% of the trouble. I reminded Alec of Lloyd Lewis's advice to me when we were conceptualizing Kendal at Hanover: "Don't affiliate with a Meeting!" But Alec sees the adventure of being in a situation where so much needs to be fixed but where the school, despite its annual deficits, and despite teachers who are 100% individualists without a sense of corporate purpose, is nevertheless getting better rather than worse.

November 25, 1999, Thanksgiving

North Potomac, Maryland

Everyone came to the hotel for breakfast. The two infants at the head and foot of a long table, the six adults and Sophia around it. Returned to 9 Lopa Court. Leander gave me a long, good lesson on the Satie, also on the Bizet, showing how to practice the octave jumps in the latter. Returned to the hotel to vet Aspasia's Greek of my chapter 8—very slow work. Then Daphne, Greg, Christina, and Andrew arrived. All to 9 Lopa Court for Thanksgiving dinner. We even gathered round the table with clasped hands and gave thanks for health and food. The girls were excited to see each other. The three infant boys competed for our attention. Lots of photos. Then back to the hotel for babies and mothers, and we four men went to a James Bond movie, all chases and murders and sex and torture and espionage, but beautifully acted. Even Judi Dench was in it. Such skill and expense for such drivel and rot.

Saturday, November 27, 1999

Gay Berger arrived and the two of us interviewed Len Cadwallader for the Pendle Hill directorship. I see him as the perfect candidate. His referees—Margery Walker, John Hennessey (who helped me understand more what went wrong at Kendal) and Nash Barsom—are all extremely positive. Let's hope.

Sunday, November 28, 1999

Marders and Lincolns for supper. Very jolly. John brought me a large-print, beautifully framed drawing of Icarus about to fly, thinking it was Daedalus—all this as thanks for my Ulysses course in ILEAD, which he took.

Monday, November 29, 1999

Don Blackmer for supper. We talked about Richard Warren Hatch, whom Don had gotten to know at M.I.T. I found four or five Hatch letters, plus a long one from me to him, bringing back that important time in my life—1960 ff. Don will come to Kendal, but without his wife. He gave me an excellent article on woodlot management.

Tuesday, November 30, 1999

To Northampton to interview David Foster for the Pendle Hill job, with Anne Moore. I was not impressed. Walked around Deerfield on the way back. Nice to see it with all the students there.

Wednesday, December 1, 1999

Nicole Laundry at Kiewit has helped me by developing a program to alphabetize Greek words. I spent two hours with her worrying about its operation and some bugs, but now it seems to work. Faculty lunch; sat next to Dirk Van der Walle, who leaves for Indonesia tomorrow. Also saw Syd Lea after decades. Dick for supper. We played another John Koch sonata, very mediocre. Then, with Allan: Haydn, Bridges, and Martinu, surprisingly well.

Thursday, December 2, 1999

To Pendle Hill

Up at 4:45 a.m. Interviewed Mary Ellen Chijioki at Pat Hunt's house. She's a person of depth and knowledge. Alec called. He's very sick. Sore throat, etc., so he won't come for supper with James McBride tonight. Just as well, because James didn't show up for supper either. So Dan, Andrea, Orion and I ate our special meal in the Reading Room and tried to figure what we'd do if he never appeared. 7:00 p.m., no James. But at 7:15, with me standing at the PH entrance, he drove in. He'd been caught in traffic. We stuffed him with brownies instead of supper. He signed dozens of books. Finally we started. I introduced him. He read from Color of Water, spoke about his mother, and the strange life his family led, evoking peals of laughter from the large audience: a sort of Shakespearian laughter, an escape valve for pathos. Then he switched (as we had arranged) to why African-Americans don't seem interested in Quakerism. And he was blunt. Why should we come to you? Are you so great? Have you ever come to us? He also spoke about the pain of being black. Most of his boyhood friends are either dead or in jail. And he voiced some very lovely compliments about Leander and our whole family. All in all, it was a resounding success. He was totally genuine. Critical, but not angry or paranoiac.

Friday, December 3, 1999

Pendle Hill

Breakfast with Vince Buscemi, who has been diagnosed with prostate cancer, Gleason score 6, just like mine. He wanted to discuss the radical prostatectomy—its aftereffects. . . . Worship. Then to Pat Hunt's again, with Judy Harvey and Gay Berger, to interview Daniel Smith-Christopher, a professor of Old Testament at Loyola Marymount. Very ebullient, indeed so much so as to be a bit frightening. He turned Gay off totally and she sort of vetoed him for further consideration. . . . Publications Committee. We didn't accept Kenneth Boulding's reprint; suggested that it be photocopied from the original edition. . . . Then Search Committee. We reduced the 8 finalists to 4, just the ones I wanted, including Len Cadwallader and Mary Ellen Chijioki. . . . Executive Board after supper. Long discussion about the minute I wrote at the retreat. It was misunderstood or not understood. We should have written a narrative and have briefed Margaret. Ice cream at Dan's. Then practice. I still can't get all the notes securely in the Satie, even when we go slowly. Discouraging.

Saturday, December 4, 1999

Pendle Hill

Long discussion in Executive Board about whether students should have a computer furnished for e-mail. We finally said Yes. . . . At the board lunch I suggested laying down the Resident Program for two years, using as a pretext Liz's resignation (if it comes, for she'll probably want to join her Lesbian partner Orion, who is going off to Toronto to head the Canadian Service Committee). Of course this was too radical for everyone. But the board does wish to bring teachers in from universities, to strengthen the intellectual content. . . . Then the wedding of Doug Gwyn and Caroline Jones. I spoke about the union of poetry and prose, and the hope that this complementarity could keep all idioms accurate. (Subtext: Hornby dictionary.) Lovely to see them united after much hesitation. Doug is short-listed for Ben Pink Dandelion's job at Woodbrooke. . . . At Meeting this morning I ministered on the amazing sunrise seen from my flight yesterday. And God said, "Let there be light," and it was good. Good? No, not just good. A daily miracle that we don't deserve! Then Paul Mangelsdorf ministered on the sun's centrality to all life owing to photosynthesis. . . . Met Farah Mendelsohn again. Long talk with Larry Ingle. . . . To Dan's for more practice. Then a nice supper together. Then playing over our old repertoire, which is now rather extensive: Barber, Brahms, Schumann, Schubert, Della Joio, Persichetti, Debussy, Starer. Some were discouraging, but some went rather well.

Sunday, December 5, 1999

Pendle Hill-Princeton

Breakfast with George Lacey and Peter Jarman, very stimulating. Long meeting with Margaret Fraser in an attempt to clarify our mysterious minute on bringing courses on politics, economics, etc. into the term-length course curriculum. . . . Then to Locust Street. Alec feeling much better. I used his printer to produce a copy of the Cadwallader interview and reference reports that I'd typed from my handwritten texts. Theo is bigger now. Monica is looking very radiant. We bought sandwiches at a French bakery and ate our lunch in Rittenhosue Square, watching the world go by (including the art teacher at Friends Select). Alec is inviting a new teacher to replace one who resigned and broke his contract. . . . Drove to Princeton. No key at Nassau Inn, but then Claire rushed in, very flustered because her father is undergoing surgery tomorrow and she has to have root canal work done. But at last I was able to get into my apartment. Watched Greek television (!) after supper.

Wednesday, December 8, 1999

Princeton

Lunch with Anthony Hirst, an interesting man who was years in the building trades in London before deciding to return to university (King's London) to do an MA in Byzantine Greek and then a Ph.D. in Modern Greek. He is interested in the appropriation of religious language by poets not necessarily people of faith. Very pleasant and stimulating. . . . Dimitri and I worked well over the three-day period, but we're still no further than the end of lesson 3. Mache has devised new exercises but is careless re: introduction of new words, which is a pain for me. Oh, when will we finish this damned book?!

Friday, December 10, 1999

To Philadelphia

At the airport for a 6:50 a.m. flight. The pilot came out and told the ticket agent that tomorrow's 6:00 a.m. flight would be delayed 2½ hours. I panicked because Len and Mary Ann Cadwallader were booked on that flight and the delay could make him miss his interview. The pilot said he'd delay the flight 10 minutes if they would get to the airport. I telephoned. Nobody home. So, helped by the ticket agent, I detailed alternative flights from Manchester, hoping for the best, whereupon in they walked! They had independently changed their flight, so we all flew down together.

Saturday, December 11, 1999

Pendle Hill

Mary Ann charmed everyone, and I think that Len did too, especially in the afternoon session with the staff, when he seemed more relaxed. The committee clearly sees him still as a viable candidate. . . . Rushed to the Armenian sweet shop to get desserts for tonight. They were closed, but still there. They opened for me, annoyed, and said "Quick!" So I got 6 kataifis, that's all. Heard part of the mad scene and the last scene from Lucia on my way back sung by magnificent Met Opera voices. . . . Dan cooked a splendid stew, served at Roadside with lots of wine, for Alec, Monica, Theo, Claudia, Gay, and me. A lovely dinner and fellowship. Then we played Satie (getting better), Bizet (still very rough) and the Schubert Fantasia (ugh!).

Sunday, December 12, 1999

Pendle Hill

Second interview with Mary Ellen Chijioki. Her husband, Mark, was also present. He's a Nigerian intellectual, very charming. She was articulate and full of ideas, but the committee found her a bit overbearing. Good! That means Len is now competing in a field of three rather than four. Fingers crossed. . . . Supper at a Chinese restaurant on Broad Street with Alec, Monica, and Theo, who was restless and unhappy. Met Len and Mary Ann at the airport. Len was very happy with his time with Margaret and Denny; they were together until 5:45 instead of the scheduled 4:15. Good! Good! I talked earlier with Barb Parsons about Len from the point of view of the Corporation. She said they all lamented because “Another Quaker bit the dust!” . . . Our flight was canceled because of “maintenance.” We were placed on a later flight. This was cancelled too, for the same reason. So I’m now in the Sheraton Hotel near the airport to spend the night at US Airways’s expense. Luckily I have no appointments tomorrow. Len does, but there’s no solution except patience.

Friday, December 17, 1999

Yesterday I misplaced chapter 8 of the Greek translation of Politics of the Spirit. I was frantic, since its loss meant a month’s work gone for nothing. But today, looking for George Draper’s address in the AFS file, I found chapter 8 there (!). Hallelujah!

December 20, 1999

Hanover

Daphne, Christina, and Andrew are here. Andrew is trying so hard to walk but cannot quite make it . . . yet. I played Jingle Bells for Christina (joined by Chrysanthi and Daphne) to dance to. “Faster! Faster!” she demanded, and became a whirling Dervish. Then “Slower! Slower!” I did it lugubriously, in minor key. . . . Went to Kendal to hear Michael Webster’s and Leone Buyse’s concert. They plan to continue every Christmas despite his parents’ deaths. Wonderfully clear clarinet and flute tone, and she also used the alto flute, which is throaty and mysterious.

December 29, 1999

Tebbes left this morning after a very nice stay. Highlight was Andrew’s discovery that he can walk. In the last four or five days he has advanced from a very hesitant step or two followed by collapse, to 15–20 steps this morning, including a turn or two, with his arms raised high to aid balance, and a look of triumph in his eyes. How jealous the chimpanzees must have been when they saw early homo sapiens rise up in this way to two-legged locomotion. A miracle! . . . Leander’s family and Alec’s left yesterday. We had a fine week with everyone here—no accidents and no crises. Our dinner at Kendal with Yiayia went splendidly, with all babies on best behavior. And Theo in Meeting on Sunday slept peacefully from start to finish and was then introduced with eyes open.

December 30, 1999

John Heaney sent me an e-mail. PSA zero. Happy New Year! Yes, that's the very best New Year's gift.

December 31, 1999

I'm working on Dan's festschrift. Vetted Chuck Fager's article on NEYM as the originator of liberalism. Now I'm going over the Supreme Court's Seeger decision, which Chuck got off the web and I got from Baker Library. . . . And I finally finished chapter 8 of Aspasia's translation of Politics of the Spirit and sent it off to her. Still have chapters 2, 5, and 6, plus notes. Slow work, but it's nice to read my book again. I'm amazed that I even could have written it.

January 1, 2000

To Cambridge to A.R.T. The Idiots Karamazov, a very irreverent post-modern takeoff on Dostoevsky and Constance Garnett. Energetic and amusing in places but mediocre. It needed to be written by Oscar Wilde or Tom Stoppard, and wasn't.

January 2, 2000

A.R.T. again. Chekhov's Ivanov. Magnificent. So well acted, and specially directed by a Russian using the Stanislavsky method. The magic is that a play about boredom doesn't end up boring the audience. On the contrary. It's a brilliant depiction of clinical depression.

January 3, 2000

Finished reading the Seeger case. Fascinating. I thought back to the Harvard course I took on constitutional law. This decision was more philosophy than law.

January 7, 2000

To Philadelphia

Plane delayed two hours because of ice on roads preventing pilots from arriving on time. But I got to Dan's by 10:00 p.m. and we played Satie and Bizet until 11:15.

January 8, 2000

Pendle Hill

Interviewed Steve Baumgartner, a former CEO of Donnelly Corporation with a $600,000 salary who has opted out of business at the age of 50+ and wants to contribute to Quakerism. Superbly articulate, experienced, cosmopolitan. I fear him as a real challenge to Len Cadwallader's candidacy. . . . Long talk with Rebecca afterwards, preparing for Publications Committee's presentation to the Executive Board on the 21st. Then to Dan. Great improvement on Satie especially and also Bizet. I'm finally learning my part, but more work is needed. I am an exceedingly slow learner on the piano, alas. Supper with Dan. Long good conversation about religion and science. I told him about process theology and insisted that the Truth served by religion includes what science tells us about the nature of the universe, even if it leads to the conclusion that the soul does not exist. Afterwards, we played Husa, with no pleasure at all, then turned to the great Mozart sonata and finally to the 40th Symphony.

January 9, 2000

Interviewed Norman James. I wasn't very impressed, but Mary Wood will be his advocate. Lunch with Doug and Caroline. Doug, thankfully, has prepared an essay for the Seeger festschrift. He is off to Woodbrooke on Tuesday to compete for a teaching position there. Good luck to him! . . . Supper with Alec and family. Baby up every three hours last night. Monica is exhausted. And Alec had a difficult week at school: a teacher was upset because of his suggestions for curriculum reform: wept, left, slammed the door. (But he made up with her, somewhat, later.) A parent was equally upset over being told that her son is a problem child. Further outburst of weeping, another door slammed. So many of the children are from divorced homes or are being raised by single mothers. Alec says that there's no unified vision in the school, no joy among the teachers. And the board is divided into two contending camps. Alas! Alack!

Tuesday, January 18, 2000

Princeton

Started lesson 4 with Dimitri, and finished it in one day. Silvio Levi's comments are very helpful. Lunch with Dimitri and Mike Keeley. They want me to be president of MGSA and Dimitri plans to nominate me. Then they're arrange for someone to nominate Dimitri as treasurer, Gonda Van Steen as secretary, and Jerry Augustinos as vice-president. Well, we'll see. Supper with Dimitri, too. Now he wants me to teach a course for one semester next year, perhaps Religion and Literature, using some Greek materials and some non-Greek. The class could meet once a week for three hours, and I'd be housed in Palmer House and could commute. Will I have the strength to say "No"?

Wednesday, January 19, 2000

Princeton

Working on lesson 5. Lunch with Serena Joyce, who runs the Farm School office in New York. She came down to see the Nancy Crawshaw archive. She has a brother names James Joyce! She was eager to learn more about Greek political history (and Irish, too; she didn't know who Parnell was). Fun.

Thursday, January 20, 2000

Princeton-Philadelphia

We didn't finish lesson 6, mostly because of the extensive rewriting prompted by Silvio Levi. Snow all day, but travel to Philadelphia was almost normal. Played Satie, Bizet, and Husa with Dan. He places Len Cadwallader last on the list because of his emphasis on community. Dan fears he'll undo Dan's "progress" vis-à-vis false ideas of community.

Friday, January 21, 2000

Pendle Hill

Doug Gwyn was offered the job of Quaker Studies tutor at Woodbrooke and accepted. I'm delighted for him and Caroline. Book Committee: Liz Kamphausen negative about everything as usual, and without written comments or even notes. Very unprofessional. But the rest of us over-balanced her, and we accepted Ratliff's collection on pastoral counseling. Margaret Hope Bacon asked me to have lunch with her to complain about Rebecca's procrastination. Then, Search Committee, ably clerked by Anne Moore. Denny and Margaret's choice (by written statement): Baumgartner and Cadwallader. Staff pretty much the same. After much discussion my recommendation that we eliminate Chijioki and James was accepted. Bill Newman spoke strongly in favor of Baumgartner. Gay Berger spoke against, but then switched. I of course spoke in favor of Cadwallader. Chris favored him, too, as did Fuson. But it became clearer and clearer that Steve Baumgartner was going to win. Friends favored excitement and risk and vision over "comfort" (Len). So, I lost, I suppose. But I realized from the start that Steve was the more adventurous choice. So be it. . . . This long day continued with the Search Committee dining together. Then, at the Executive Board, we of course reported the results (Dan was delighted) and then Rebecca and I had to present the annual review of Publications Committee activities. I pleaded for her to be given a part-time secretary. (The Japanese whose pamphlet on Okinawa we rejected is still bothering everyone and still wants to meet with me!) Spoke to Bob Gray afterwards about Medford Leas, which is looking for a new director. Perhaps Leonard can apply, if he hasn't already. . . . Satie and Bizet again with Dan; getting better, and we're using the metronome. Then Schumann for our "recreational" music. . . . Nice talk at supper yesterday with Cyril Harvey, about Olympia and Delphi.

Philadelphia–Hanover

Long board lunch, with Dan haranguing us again about Denny's and Margaret's failure to be "team players." Mickey Edgerton bravely accused him of distortion. Many changes in organization might be made, but now Steve Baumgartner must have a say.

Tuesday, January 25, 2000

Snyder telephoned. The $1000 had "made his day."

Sunday, January 30, 2000

I telephoned Cadwallader last night because we received word that Baumgartner is now officially the new director. Also, I told him about the search for a new dean of the Tucker Foundation. I'll try to get him to meet Robert Binswanger and Jan Tarjan. . . . Adult education with Jack Hunter after Meeting. On prayer. A difficult subject, especially if one doesn't believe in a personal God. Jack will be going to FAHE in June. I wanted to go with Alec, but he can't.

Wednesday, February 2, 2000

Long, good lunch with Jack Shepherd. I'm hoping that he'll teach a course at Pendle Hill on development issues.

Thursday, February 3, 2000

To Dan Connolly yet again. We've finished phase 2, the trusts for children and grandchildren.

Friday, February 4, 2000

To NYC

To the Yale Club. Three-hour delay owing to weather. But in time to get to the ballet. And what a revelation the first ballet was, indeed one of the most memorable I've ever seen: "Goldberg Variations," played of course on the piano, expertly. Choreography by Jerome Robbins. Brilliant interpretations of the musical mood, again and again. Exhausting. Lasted ninety minutes, but worth it. The other two, "Tarantella" and "Western Symphony,” both Balanchine, were routine by comparison: light, fun, pure froth after the “ordeal” of the Goldberg.

Saturday, February 5, 2000

My first meeting as a newly elected member, again, of the MGSA Executive Committee. I was elected president, for three years. Gondicas vice-president, Gonda Van Steen secretary, Jerry Augustinos treasurer. Tony Molho is on the board; very helpful. So is Zachariadis; a bit of a pain, I fear. We started planning the next symposium. The trick now is to convince someone to head the program committee.

Sunday, February 6, 2000

To 15th Street Meeting, 9:30 a.m. service, sparsely attended, but good. . . . Worked on chapter 2 of Politics of the Spirit, checking the translation from Anastasia. Then to Daphne’s. Christina active as usual, dressing us all up in costumes, including me. Then to Metropolitan Museum. I saw the Walker Evans photographs as best I could, owing to crowds. Poignant images of poor whites in Alabama, like Adirondackers. Also to Gulbenkian exhibit: his private collection from Lisbon; disappointing, but I liked Manet’s “Boy Blowing Bubbles.” . . . To Princeton by bus. Lovely room again in Palmer House.

Tuesday, February 8, 2000

Princeton

Lunch yesterday with Anthony Hirst, who is doing interesting work on the computer. Finished lesson 6 with Dimitri. Great problems again with corrupted computer files. Today at breakfast I met a British Ottomanist, Michael Hayward, here as a visiting professor. Lots of frothy talk about Bryer, Kings, Oxford, etc. . . . Dimitri now wants me to do a Freshman Seminar here next year. Why not on Joyce’s Ulysses? . . . Got draft MGSA minutes already from Gonda Van Steen. Am I crazy to take on this new responsibility? But I suppose it proves that I’m still “alive.”

Wednesday, February 9, 2000

Princeton

Finished most of lesson 7 with Dimitri, but also cleaned up a lot of Mache’s new drills. Not bad. Don Skemer showed me the Kazantzakis manuscript they’re thinking of buying. The owner wants $60,000; they’d like to offer $25,000 or $30,000. It’s remarkable. The entire Οδύσσεια on onionskin paper in Kazantzakis’s hand, with extensive additions, deletions, changes—e.g., two drafts. What a demon Kazantzakis was! Simply to have written all this out (several times) is almost unthinkable. . . . My TLS review appeared, finally. . . . At 5:00 p.m., Dimitri and I changed rooms and discussed MGSA business for two hours: committee structure, etc. Lots to do when I get home.

Thursday, February 10, 2000

NYC

By bus to New York. Continued typing in new changes to the Greek text. Then to Bowling Green via subway to visit Goldman Sachs. But at lunch, at the Yale Club, I walked out forgetting my attaché case. Suddenly remembered as I was in Grand Central; ran back in a panic, and found it. Untouched. Scary. Hadn't been in the financial district for years. The Customs House is splendid, as is Federal Hall with the statue of George Washington, not to mention the Stock Exchange. Paine Webber has its own huge building at 85 Broad Street. Greg showed me the trading floor—hundreds of young people in front of multiple computer screens, one of which is Greg's. He has Christina, Andrew, and Daphne on the screen, too. Actually, he was most distressed today because of a personnel problem in London. A young "superstar" (age 28), moved there from the Tokyo office, wants to get rid of the old employee (age 33), who he says is "over the hill." Greg must decide. But the "old" one, although perhaps no longer the best trader, has been a loyal and good member of the team. Greg cannot just discard him. So his problem is to convince the young one to be patient and also compassionate. There will be multiple telephone calls tonight, so he won't join us for dinner after my lecture. But he did come to Thatcher Proffitt Wood with me, talking also about his increasing desire to leave Goldman Sachs entirely. But the huge bonus in GS stock he received last year is like a noose around his neck, since it doesn't become vested at all until three years, and then only in part. The full sum is his to keep only after five years. Should he stay, and agonize? Or leave, and lose the money? In addition, he and Daphne are disgusted with the ridiculous competition for school places in the Upper East Side. For kindergarten, Christina will need to take an exam (!) and the parents will need to be interviewed. Imagine! And at a dinner for Christina's pre-school class they were revolted by the kind of parents they met, all ostentatious and of course filthy rich. Greg says he might like to become an independent financial advisor. Also, to stay in the northeast; no desire whatever to return to California. All this affects, of course, whether they decide to abandon their apartment and move to the suburbs. . . . The lecture at Thatcher went well: on The Last Temptation. The “class” or audience was the largest so far, including many regulars. Good questions and spirit. There even was a former TPW employee who had been at my first lecture who came for this one although he now works for IBM in San Jose, California (obviously, he’s doing other things as well in NYC). Eight people for a lovely supper afterwards. And Jeff Murphy wants me to come again, perhaps to do Mrs Dalloway.

February 11, 2000

NYC

Nice long lunch at the Yale Club with Burt Pike. At first I didn’t recognize him, he looked so old. But, as soon as we started talking, of course the familiar Burt was revealed. He is about to retire, finally, discouraged by the cutbacks and underfunding of the City University; they’ll need to reduce everything by 40%. (I thought of David Lodge at Birmingham under Thatcher.) Like me, he has lots of money now, but unlike me he has no family. None. So he plans to make a substantial bequest to Haverford. How nice! It’s nice to have this one colleague still familiar, from Haverford. . . . Went afterwards to Patelson’s to buy more music for our flute–cello–piano trio. . . . Then to Daphne’s. Greg came, much relieved, since a series of telephone calls seems to have set right the wrongs of yesterday; the superstar will now be patient. . . . To Lincoln Center for the ballet again. And what a pleasure! “Ballo della Regina” (Verdi/Balanchine) wasn’t much, although danced by Damian Woetzel. But then came “The Cage” (Stravinsky/Robbins), with a marvelous set suggesting a spider’s web. Wendy Whelan danced “The novice” superbly, all sinewy and spasmodic. The “story” is the bug-like destruction of the male by the female; the corps seemed like a colony of ferocious ants on the rampage. All this to Stravinsky’s orgiastic music. Finally “La Valse” (Ravel/Balanchine), one of my favorites. The orchestration is superb. I hadn’t realized that Balanchine places one girl dressed in white amidst everyone dressed in black. She is eventually courted by “Death,” who gives her black to wear over the white and then kills her. Ravel said of his piece that it involved “Dancing on the edge of a volcano.” Precisely.

February 12, 2000

NYC–Hanover

Charlie Wood was having breakfast at the Yale Club, horribly obese, about to lead a Dartmouth alumni weekend on Shakespeare, with Peter Saccio. I did some more typing on Mache’s additions, and flew home.

February 13, 2000

Hanover

Judy and Cyril Harvey here, looking at Kendal. I gave them a Dartmouth tour, and then we all went to Sally Pinkas's duet concert with her husband. Among other things they played the Barber Souvenirs, complete, of course, and up to tempo. But, frankly, I think that my own rendition of the "Pas de deux" with Alice was more musical.

February 14, 2000

Took Len Cadwallader to lunch with Bob Binswanger to learn more about Tucker and the deanship. But alas the result was that he was frightened away, especially by our sense that the dean should be a moral voice crying in Dartmouth's wilderness. . . . Glad to hear, though, that Kesaya Noda got the job as the president's letter-writer.

February 17, 2000

To Dan Connolly again. We've now finished phase 2, the children's and grandchildren's trusts. What remains is to decide what to do with CREF and eventually to fund these trusts.

Friday, February 18, 2000

To Cambridge, Holiday Inn Express

Snowstorm predicted tomorrow, so we left for Cambridge this morning, after I sent Susan Sutton, again, everything she needs to type Greek Didot. She procrastinated, I fear. Will the May journal appear on time? Doubtful. We're domiciled in a hotel at the east end of Cambridge, the Quaker guestroom being unavailable. The hotel is filled with high school debaters from all over the country, contestants in a debate fair to begin tomorrow at Harvard. It's delicious to hear them discussing their topics so knowledgeably. I'm using this time to go through Anastasia's translation of my chapter 5, which, if I may say so, I find very interesting reading.

Saturday, February 19, 2000

Cambridge

Joe Orton's "Loot" at the A.R.T., splendidly acted by Alvin Epstein, Jeremy Geidt, etc. And hardly as scandalous as the notices made it seem. Very Wildean actually: epigrammatic style, destructive criticism of dead mores. I'm thinking of Andreas Giannakos's "autobiographical novel," also so negative, but lacking Orton's structure, humor, and brevity. . . . We also watched some of the debate contest, on the subject of whether juvenile offenders ought to be tried in adult courts just like adults. Good arguments on both sides, but not much elocution. The man who talked about Joe Orton before the performance, an actor, had of course much more training in speech and was a pleasure to hear. Poor Orton, murdered in his 30s by his lover. What a waste!

Sunday, February 20, 2000

Cambridge

Finished chapter 5. Started a long letter to Andreas, in Greek, about his writing, difficult to compose because I'm so unimpressed by his piece and don't want to discourage him. Saw Charles L. Mee's extraordinary play "Fall Circle" at the A.R.T., about East Germany just as the Berlin Wall came down, with reference to Berliner Ensemble, Heiner Müller, Brecht's "Caucasian Chalk Circle," etc. Marvelous theater: profound, tragic, comic, full of energy and eloquence.

Thursday, February 24, 2000

Yale Club

To the American Farm School's cocktail party at Phil Foote's, East 66th Street. President Clinton dining on East 65th Street, scores of police everywhere, traffic redirected, a canopy extending from the restaurant door out into the middle of the street. Reminded me of Queen Elizabeth's visit to the University of Bristol, when they built a separate toilet for her. Foote asked immediately about Alec, as did David Buck. Foote and Alec will try to meet in Baltimore next week. People very friendly, including Tommy Thomas, who took me aside to talk about continuing the two-year college rather than expanding to four years. . . . Walked back to the Yale Club along Park Avenue, being shunted first to one side then to the other because of the president's itinerary.

Friday, February 25, 2000

Good meetings. I felt much more connected this time. I'll be able to help (a) with Brenda's book—in fact they sort of put me in charge to bring down the cost, coalesce the two volumes into a single binding, find copyeditors, (b) help with better teaching of Greek to Greek Summer students, (c) help with better teaching of English at AFS. . . . Grand Central a carnival. Wonderful four-part singing by a group of African-Americans. Oysters Rockefeller in the bowels. Then to Lincoln Center to the ballet. 2 out of 3. "Scènes de Ballet" (Stravinsky/Wheeldon): wonderful music and choreography. Ditto for "Opus 19, The Dreamer" (Prokofiev/Robbins), danced spectacularly by Damian Woetzel and Wendy Whelan. But "Liebeslieder Walzer" (Brahms/Balanchine) was tedious, strangely. In “Scènes de Ballet” there were about fifty children from the School of American Ballet performing beautifully up to their capacity.

Saturday, February 26, 2000

Full board of AFS, again very satisfying, probably because I’m feeling my way better in this crowd and seem to have something to offer. For example, in discussion about computerizing the new library, I told them about Stelios Orphanoudakis, who surely could be helpful as a consultant. . . . Supper with Daphne and Greg at Rado’s on East 84th near 2nd. Very relaxed. They went off to a movie and I returned to plough along in the Politics of the Spirit translation.

Sunday, February 27, 2000

NYC–Princeton

Breakfast with Daphne. Andrew smiling at the door. Christina playing games, hiding behind it. Eventually we had an extended game of catch. It’s amazing how Daphne copes all day long, but she seems to be surviving, even smiling. . . . Then to Morningside Meeting. I’d hoped to see Vince Buscemi there but he and Ernie didn’t come. But Jerry? was there, my acquaintance from Pendle Hill two years ago, the gay man who’d thrown over his job in computing and was pretty disoriented. How nice to find him now a pillar of the Meeting and a full-time student at Union Theological Seminary. He ministered on the story of Sodom and Gomorrah, explaining the subtleties of the Hebrew text. After Meeting I once again told them all that I think I am a co-founder of the Meeting owing to the Fifth Day Meeting that Smith and I started at Columbia in 1956 and was then taken over by Victor Paschis and changed to a First Day Meeting. Friendly people, obviously very liberal. . . . Walked all the way from 116th down Broadway to 65th to the ballet again. In next to last row in the 4th tier, but could see fine, especially with opera glasses. And what a treat again! “I’m Old Fashioned” starts with a movie clip of Fred Astaire and Rita Hayworth. Then comes a series of variations on this by Jerome Robbins, until the final scene in which fifteen couples onstage duplicate exactly the Astaire steps, with Astaire and Hayworth again shown on the screen. It was spectacular. Then “Scènes de Ballet” again, with all the children, and Stravinsky’s haunting music. Finally, for the last number of the winter season, “Stars and Stripes” (of course) with Wendy Whelan and Damian Woetzel outdoing themselves, and the boys of the “Third Regiment” being especially scintillating. Pure joy! And a woman next to me was in ecstasy because she teaches ballet and one of her students, sixteen years old, was in “Scènes de Ballet.” Also during intermission one of the corps explained about the point shoes (which are used only once and then discarded) and answered questions—e.g., how do the men lift the women so effortlessly (it’s because (a) the women don’t weigh much more than 100 lbs., (b) the women spring upward just before the man lifts, so he isn’t lifting “dead weight”).

Tuesday, February 29, 2000

Princeton

My usual lunch with Dimitri going over MGSA business; then to visit Hank Dobin, the dean in charge of Frosh seminars. He thinks that Ulysses will be too challenging for the freshmen. A shame. I’d love to do it again. Can it be done incomplete? I need to elect either a writing-type seminar (12 students) or a regular one (15 students). Here we go again! Do I really want this? But it’s nice to be at Princeton. At 5:00 one of Dimitri’s students, Karen Emmerich, a blond beauty, came to meet me because she plans to be a grad student at the University of Thessaloniki next year, when I’ll be there. Her CV is remarkable. She was “hooked” by going to Germanacos’s program when she was in high school. Then Mache drove me to her home in Englishtown, about 45 minutes away, for a nice supper with Demo, her husband, who works in an engineering think-tank doing mostly military research, and baby Andrew, age eleven months and clinging to mother. Mache is remarkable, caring for baby (which she still nurses), commuting, helping us with the book, pursuing her Ph.D., caring for a husband. Demo and I had a vigorous conversation for 2½ hours on various subjects ranging from prostate cancer to the Kosovo war.

Wednesday, March 1, 2000

Lunch with a professor of philosophy here, Bas Van Fraassen, who did a Freshman Seminar entirely on Light. We shared bibliography and ideas connected with my desire to write about Quakers’ standard phrase, “Hold him in the light,” and the Inner Light. He gave me his bibliography and syllabus, some of which may be useful. But when will I ever find time to write on Light? Right now I’ve got the Greek book—huge amount of typing; a book review already late for World Literature Today; the translation of Politics of the Spirit that I have to check for Aspasia—so slow; and Owens's dissertation that I have to read for Cambridge later this month. Too much!

Friday, March 3, 2000

Pendle Hill

I ministered in Meeting about Truth, using Tillich's God Beyond God; thus always the Truth Beyond Truth. A difficult theology, but good for Quakers because it keeps us always seeking. . . . Steve Baumgartner asked to meet with me and we had a 1¼ hour tête-à-tête in the library: very cordial and friendly. He said that I was signaled out by staff as being behind the call for "rigor." I tried to explain, telling the whole story of the Resident Program Review Committee, whose report he hasn't seen, and must see. He asked what advice I could give him and I said, "Keep talking to everyone. Be visible. Don't disappear all day in your office." . . . Good music with Dan after supper.

Saturday, March 4, 2000

Pendle Hill

Board, ground-breaking for the Conlon Conference Room, off of Brinton House, with Conlons present and very pleased, of course. Good talks by Dan, Richard, Shirley. . . . Then more piano. Dan wants us to perform in May. We'll try to revise the Starer, Debussy, and even the Schubert March, plus doing Satie and maybe the Bizet. . . . To Alec's for supper. Baby up every night; they're both suffering from lack of sleep, but don't look it. Then we all went to Friends Select for the middle school play: C. S. Lewis's "The Lion, the Witch, the Wardrobe," expertly done by these remarkable seventh-grade children. Lovely to see Alec in his work context. He's obviously very well liked, and surrounded by interesting, nice people. The auditorium was packed with parents, teachers, and fellow students.

Ugh! Meeting Takashi Mizuno, with Rebecca, Emma, Bobbi Kelly, Claudia, and a woman from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. He very emotional. Broke down in sobs and weeping, about how injured he was by Rebecca's letter. When I tried to defend Rebecca, saying that it was basic Quakerism not to demonize either group in a conflict situation, he cut me off saying he couldn't listen to me any more. But we got beyond this impasse, slowly. Emma was very good, and so was Rebecca, Claudia less so. I think I regained his trust when I said that although I'm sure I'm not a racist, I'm also sure that I can lapse into offensive remarks or behavior.

Eventually I tried to suggest that although his object was to make us grow, because we were the offenders and he the offended, probably he could grow, too, as a result of all this misery. He sort of admitted that he had heard, sort of . . . What a sad case: a paranoid nourished by the white man's guilt of those who have stood behind him. . . . Thankfully I then went to Dan's and played for two hours, supped, and played again, "recreationally," Mozart's G-minor Symphony and Haydn's exquisite symphony.

Barb Parsons telephoned with the sad news that Lloyd Lewis died, aged 72, of leukemia. What a shame! Just as he was beginning to enjoy his retirement; indeed he was traveling in Italy when stricken. We were buddies through all the early days of Kendal.

From: Peter A. Bien
To: lingle@bellsouth.net
Subject: Bacon review, etc.

Dear Larry,

Thanks for sending the Bacon review, which is very upbeat indeed, except for the paragraph about PH's editor. I don't know what dates were involved, and the reviewer doesn't give details. Oh well . . . Dan feels strongly that Rebecca should not continue any longer, but he also seems to know that Quakers are unable to fire anyone. And in many respects she does very well indeed. But then there are the lapses. Margaret Bacon complained bitterly to me about Rebecca's inaccessibility, and Larry Miller was furious for the same reason. Pendle Hill is filled with people who, in effect, have no place else to go.

The meeting with Takashi Mizuno was excruciating. He came with a high-level support, Arlene Kelly, clerk of Central Philadelphia Monthly Meeting and now of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. We were represented, thank goodness, by Emma Lapsanski, who spoke eloquently, and by Rebecca, who also did a splendid job. Bobbi Kelly was there but totally silent throughout. And Claudia Wair was predictably paranoid, but calm. As for Takashi, he let us know how severely we had injured him, then broke down in a paroxysm of sobbing. When I said that it was a basic Quaker belief and principle always to assume that there is something good in every group, and that we don't like to demonize one side in a conflict (using as an example the Germans who were so horrible in Greece during Chrysanthi's girlhood but among whom there clearly were some, at least, who hated what their own army was doing), Takashi replied, "I can't talk with you." When I said later that I have two daughters-in-law who are people of color, he replied, "They all say that." However, Emma and Rebecca saved the day, sort of, and Takashi calmed down a bit. I think I got through to him when, toward the end, I said that really I am not a racist but I know and admit that, even so, I am capable of remarks or attitudes that perhaps escape me and that I'll later regret, and that could be considered racist. In short, no one is pure. He liked that. Then I suggested, at the very end, that we had all learned and grown from this difficult meeting together, and that the "we" should include him as well. He frowned, but uttered a few words that seemed to indicate that maybe he heard. So, after two very unpleasant hours, we parted in a friendly way (sort of). My hope, and Rebecca's, is that this will be the end. But it won't be, for he now has a program for "encouraging" the Publications Committee to publish materials by non-white authors.

Dan told me that Takashi's behavior is similar to lots of analogues he saw in the AFSC—basically an ego-trip hiding behind accusations of discrimination, and bringing to its support a whole league of guilt-ridden Quaker types. Amen!

We're off to England on Monday to see Othello, Merchant of Venice, Timon of Athens (my first time), and Antony and Cleopatra, plus Rosenkavalier, the ballet, Copenhagen, and Maggie Smith! I hope to forget Takashi in the process.

Sincerely,

Easy, routine flight yesterday, especially pleasant because we both went Business Class owing to frequent flyer mileage. And what a splendid first day we had today, first of all because of the weather: brilliant sunshine, daffodils everywhere, some tulips, pansies in Russell Square, fruit trees in bloom. We went to the British Museum and with luck happened upon a group being conducted by a splendid guide from the museum. She dwelt on the Rosetta Stone, and Chrysanthi and I were able to make out the Greek pretty well. Then she added so much to the Elgin Marbles, explaining Athena's birth and why the figures on the pediment display, with their bodies, since the heads are missing, such surprise. She enthused that the Parthenon was completed in fifteen years. I thought also of Hagia Sophia, and of the Empire State Building, which was finished in an amazing eighteen months. Miracles, all. The Museum has redone its Hellenic collections and has placed placards everywhere now to help orient the viewer. The grace and perfection of Ancient Greek and Hellenistic sculpture astounds repeatedly, every time one views these artifacts. How satisfying, especially compared to the deliberate ugliness of certain contemporary art. . . . Then to the Barbican for an astounding production of Othello, with Ray Fearon in the title role and Richard McCabe as a slimy Iago. Superbly directed by Michael Attenborough. Of course the major compliments need, as always, to go to Shakespeare. "How," Chrysanthi asked, "would he know about the depths of evil we see in Iago?" Good question. But he reflects so much experience, and such divine experience, in all the plays that the only answer, I suppose, is an evasive one: genius. In any case, this production held one spellbound from start to finish. No wonder it is sold out night after night. I was pleased to see so many children in the audience. This theatrical experience was so perfect, probably all the rest will be anticlimaxes.

To Friends House. Asked for Stuart Morton, but he's in Sri Lanka for two weeks on Friends Service Council business. Spoke with Josef Keith in the library about Nancy Crawshaw's photos; gave him the ones I have and promised him more information once I return to Princeton. Also Norman Gilbertson's address. The library already has Brenda Marder's first volume, plus minutes of Friends Service Council during the period of the Quaker School's existence, plus Margaret Backhouse's letters. Actually, Brenda might do well to spend a week here. . . . Chrysanthi had violent diarrhea but then felt OK, thankfully. . . . To Piccadilly for Lady in the Van, Alan Bennett's comedy, starring Maggie Smith as the homeless eccentric who enters Alan Bennett's life for fifteen years. Mediocre compared to Shakespeare, of course, but surely it's unfair to make this comparison. On its own merits, it was a clever way of expressing many social issues: homelessness, senility, the ineffectiveness of social workers, feminism, the emptiness (outwardly) of an artist's life, sons caring (or not caring) for aged mothers, etc. Bennett splits himself into two look-alike characters, using this technique to allow his "thoughts" to be aired as one speaks to the other. Maggie Smith of course stole the show; indeed there wouldn't have been much of a show without her. . . . Then to the Olivier. Nice supper there, followed by Trevor Nunn's Merchant of Venice. Derbhle Crotty was unbelievably good as Portia, a wonderful comedienne, and then a severe justice in the Ducal courtroom. And Henry Goodman played Shylock perfectly, with just the right proportion of malice balanced by righteous indignation and self-pity. All was done in a sort of 1920s Berlin or Vienna ambiance, with nightclubs, torch singers, and Beethoven's "Moonlight Sonata." Lots of fun in the romance aspects—e.g., with "lost" rings at the end—and lots of very serious discussion of mercy vs. justice, Christian vs. Jew. Shylock is, in the end, ambivalent, justified yet at the same time impossibly intransigent. I'm sure that the play should allow this ambivalence to remain, rather than tilting the balance one way or the other.

Worked on Aspasia's translation in the morning. Then to Duchess Theatre, off Aldwych, to see "Copenhagen." We sat on the stage, very close, obviously, to the three actors: Bohr, his wife, and Heisenberg. Fascinating encounter: Heisenberg returns to his mentor in 1941, after Denmark was occupied by the Germans. The reason is not entirely clear, or at least Bohr isn't clear. Is Heisenberg helping the Nazis or hindering them? Does he want to find out from Bohr what the Americans are doing (i.e., are they able to make an atomic bomb)? Along the way, lots of the science is explained: uranium 235 vs. 238, plutonium, what the critical mass is. Heisenberg miscalculated the needed critical mass, making German success seem impossible. Did he do this out of ignorance or design? He claims that he keeps his post, cooperating with the Nazis, in order to prevent it going to someone else who might achieve success in making the bomb. Bohr isn't sure he believes this. As for Bohr, he went to Los Alamos and developed the triggering mechanism for the Nagasaki bomb. So, says Heisenberg, you killed 100,000 people. Lots of talk also about Bohr's complementarity principle and Heisenberg's uncertainty principle, those two great advances; and of course about quanta vs. waves. Aesthetically, it's remarkable that this totally intellectual play, with no real "action," nevertheless was theatrical, with a shape, a development, emotional climaxes. . . . Supper nearby in the Sofra restaurant, Turkish, where Mark Mazower once took me. Then to Covent Garden to the newly rebuilt Royal Opera House, to see Der Rosenkavalier. We were way at the top, still £50 each, but with a perfect view. Richard Strauss's music is gorgeous, miraculous. The story, at first frivolous and petty, becomes better, as one would expect from a text by von Hofmannsthal. The singing was splendid, especially Baron Ochs (Franz Hawlata), Octavian (Susan Graham, an American who studied at the Manhattan School of Music), and Marie Therese (Renée Fleming); the entire production rich and lavish in terms of scenery, costumes, fine acting. But obviously the music—its variety, congruence with the text, orchestral color (lots of brass)—was paramount.

Cambridge

Train from King's Cross to Cambridge. Installed in Fellows' Guest Room at Queen's. Then to King's to meet Rev. Dr. George Pattison, the dean, and the person in charge of all the services at King's College Chapel. Young, very friendly. We agreed on strategy for Lewis Owens's viva, and how he would be required to do all the typographical corrections (manually, with white-out or new text pasted over the old). George's expertise is chiefly on Kierkegaard. He knew of Douglas Steere as the first translator of Purity of Heart. He wants to see my essay on Faulkner and Kierkegaard. Lewis arrived at 11:00, somewhat frightened, with sweaty palms. But we were civil and gentle, and actually had a good conversation for 1¼ hour. We started with the typos; then I raised my queries; then Pattison his—for example, best omit the discussion of Heidegger if this gets developed as a book (which I hope it will). I felt that he should expand his criticisms of Kazantzakis; he mentions only "excessive individuation" at the very end, without any discussion. Also, can Kazantzakis truly be helpful to professing Christians, or is he best called a meta-Christian? We weren't allowed to say "You pass," but we indicated his success indirectly by saying that all he needed do was clean up the typos. Then Chrysanthi returned and we had a lunch of sandwiches and fruit in King's Senior Common Room with George alone. . . . Walked to Selwyn at 3:00. Nice reunion with David Holton. No news yet about his application to be promoted to a Readership, his third try. But he's better situated now at home, in a village eleven miles away, with a cohesive village life, which they missed in Cambridge. At 4:00 his graduate students came, and others, including Μάχης, whose article on Greek labor I'd published in JMGS after meeting him in Princeton. I read my "Inventing Greece"; it went well, with lively discussion afterwards for an hour on questions of nationalism. A very articulate, thoughtful group. . . . Then to St. John's College for a splendid dinner hosted by Lewis. Present were Lewis's "partner," Monica, a beautiful woman of Spanish extraction, his parents, very young, a fellow student who also got his doctorate recently, George Pattison, Douglas Hedley (the supervisor who should have warned Lewis about the technical errors), Chrysanthi, me (at head of table), and, best of all, Nicholas Hammond. An elegant meal beautifully served, and topped off by cognac and truffles. Hedley engaged me in a long conversation about Rufus Jones and Coleridge, the mystical inheritance. At table during this long meal (7:00 to 11:00 p.m.) the most interesting was of course Nicholas Hammond, aged over 90 but still very sharp, though deaf in one ear. He'd been one of the British classics dons sent out to Greece in the war. He learned Greek well enough and grew a ferocious looking black mustache well enough to "pass" as a shepherd when he traveled into German-occupied Salonika. He knew Aris and Siantos and all the others. Told me that the ELAS leaders were basically out for personal power, alas. At one point he helped negotiate an agreement between ELAS and EDDA to cooperate instead of fighting each other, but it was vetoed by EAM headquarters (Zachariadis, probably). He was part of the group that planned and executed the destruction of the Gorgopotamos rail viaduct, thus interrupting German supplies going down through Greece to Rommel in Africa. Earlier, when Hitler invaded, and before he was smuggled back into Greece to work with the resistance (if I got the story correct), he was evacuated to Crete, narrowly escaping death as German planes strafed the caique he was in, escaping only because the German plane hit an air pocket and was thrown a bit off course. Then he was evacuated to Egypt. He said at the 50th anniversary celebrations in Crete that the most moving testimony was by a Maori who had been in Greece with the New Zealanders. Lots of other stories of derring-do, hair-raising escapes, etc. Then, back at Cambridge after the war, he was assigned to look after Kazantzakis in 1946 when Kazantzakis was sent to Cambridge. Kazantzakis's English was very poor, but Hammond could of course converse with him in δημοτική. Kazantzakis wanted to see Sheppard, the principal of King's, the eccentric don. "Who are your intelligentsia?" Kazantzakis asked him. "We don't have intelligentsia at Cambridge," Sheppard replied; "they're at Oxford. We have only intelligent people." Kazantzakis asked who were people of the spirit. "I am," replied Sheppard, then named some others. "Trevelyan?" asked Kazantzakis. "No, not Trevelyan," came the reply.

London

Lewis and his father picked us up at Queen's after we had a "full English breakfast" with a score of dermatologists there for a convention, one of whom turned out to be a Cypriot with whom we talked in Greek. Poor man had lost his home and περιουσία in the north. . . . Back in London, worried about the US Airways strike. As of last night it looked probable, with consequent cancellation of our Gatwick-Philadelphia flight. But I reached them by telephone this morning and was told that although an agreement had not been reached, both sides did agree to keep talking, at least until May. So we seem safe. . . . To Sadler's Wells, where I had never been before, to see the Northern Dance Company in "Carmen." A little like West Side Story, but I was not moved by any of it, as I was in New York recently, for example. Graceful and acrobatic, with Bizet's music sometimes pure and sometimes transmogrified into rock and roll. . . . To Moorgate and the Barbican for Timon of Athens, which I've never read and had never seen. Richard McCabe, the splendid Iago, played the Touchstone-like cynic Apemantus. Michael Pennington played Timon. My favorite was John Woodvine, who played the steward—what a beautiful voice he has. The first half was very effectively staged with wonderful jazz music played by an off-stage band, and a fanciful Turkish bath scene, plus dancing girls played by boys. The moral is all too clear, and quickly clear. Timon is generous to a fault, and naïve. He thinks he has friends, but he has only flatterers and sycophants. When he exhausts his resources and is hounded by creditors, he asks the former "friends" to help him financially, and all find excuses. All this is convincing. But the second half is not; probably this is the part that Shakespeare never finished and was pieced together by others. Timon is discovered destitute, in a cave, although with a horde of gold, still. His wits have turned. It's very much like Act III of King Lear, but lacking the preparation for this desperate state. Here it happens instantaneously. The loyal steward is just like Kent in Lear, Apemantus somewhat like Lear's fool. But none of this is developed sufficiently to work. Furthermore, the subplot with Alcibiades—who is banished unjustly by the Senate, serves to aid Athens' enemies (as happened in "real life" if one can believe Thucydides), and who then returns to neatly punish those who deserve it (although we're never shown how the choice is made)—is much too rudimentary. What is fascinating is this: Could Timon, especially the second half, be typical of Shakespeare's first drafts, which were then rounded and filled by his own genius and also by the actors' reactions and experiences—something that never happened in this case, at least not by actors' reactions.

London

Interesting breakfast conversation with a Spanish woman who teaches British literature in Spain. She likes Barry Unsworth. They do Dubliners and Portrait but cannot do Ulysses except in translation. . . . Walked to Westminster Meeting. A man from Korea ministered, using an interpreter, saying that he had discovered the Truth and that if anyone wanted enlightenment, they should ask him (in Korean presumably). I was moved to minister about the truth that is always beyond Truth, like Tillich's god beyond God, and that Heisenberg's uncertainty principle should remind us that in "knowing" the truth we also alter it in the very process of cognition. After Meeting, in the "announcements" period, the Korean got up again and restated at excruciating length that he was Enlightened. But a man from Toronto Meeting also begged to differ with me, saying that Heisenberg's principle applied only to the material world, and that surely God could know us without uncertainty, and that we, in such knowledge, are changed. Afterwards, we talked, and he insisted that being a Seeker isn't good enough. We eventually do become Finders, and surely George Fox passed beyond seeking. Perhaps so, but I still like Heisenberg, Tillich, and seeking. . . . To the National Gallery: a special exhibition called "Seeing Salvation: the Image of Christ," where in the very first room I found what could be on the cover of the pamphlet I hope to write some day on the subject of Light. This is William Holman Hunt's "The Light of the World," based on John's gospel, showing Christ with a lantern knocking on a door. Luckily they had a reproduction of it in the shop, so I'll bring it home. In the final room was Dali's famous crucifix and also Sutherland's cartoon for the large tapestry at Coventry Cathedral. . . . In Trafalgar Square, I did look up this time to see the one-armed adulterer atop his pillar. An acquaintance at the Penn Club says that in the Greenwich Maritime Museum they show his tunic with the bullet hole, and how small he must have been. . . . Then to the Royal Academy for a very special interesting exhibit, “1900: At the Crossroads,” composed entirely of paintings and sculptures done around 1900. There are early Picassos, Matisse’s, even a Kandinsky, all done in the realistic mode of their beginnings. There was Cézanne’s “Man with Crossed Arms.” Picasso’s “The Absinthe Drinker,” influenced by Toulouse-Lautrec, is moving. And there’s another early Picasso, “The Death of Casagemas,” that looks extraordinarily like a modernist’s El Greco. The same colors, the same division into layers, as in El Greco’s “The Burial of Count Orgaz.”

Continued working on Aspasia’s translation. Also walked down Charing Cross Road to Blackwell’s for children’s books and Benny Hill and then across the street to Foyle’s for some music for flute, cello, and piano. Found some. Difficult because the cello parts need to be in treble or bass clef since Allan doesn’t read the viola clef. The “boss” of Foyle’s (I presume) came up to speak to the clerks—very suave, in a suit that looks like it cost £500. Reminded me of Walter’s suit in Kendal. . . . To King’s College at 5:00-ish. Heard their student symphony practicing Shostakovich for a concert tonight. The heard Renée Hirschon give a very interesting paper on name-day celebration in Greece versus birthday celebration, stating that the former, as a ritual, derives from religious precepts and is totally collective whereas the latter is secular and individualistic, celebrating an individual’s temporal existence whereas the name-day celebrates that individual’s connection with something eternal, as manifested in the saint whose day it is. Afterwards, I said that name-day occasions in my experience have often been sterile, with people paying respects to others they really do not like, whereas the one birthday party we attended, at Goody’s, was very communal indeed. She answered well, holding that the birthday, because based on invitations, was exclusionary, whereas the name-day, where people just go, without being invited, is not. Afterwards, Renée, Roddy, Judith Herrin, Chrysanthi, and Roddy’s wife all went for a delicious meal at Sofra, the Turkish restaurant. And Judith walked us home to Russell Square. Alix MacSweeney was at the talk, and wants to meet tomorrow.

London

Back to King's, where I lectured to Roddy's class on my talk (given originally at Deree-Pierce) on the works and thoughts about Christ that preceded Ο τελευταίος πειρασμός: Comedy, Fasga, Σπασμένες ψυχές, Νικηφόρος Φωκάς, Χριστός, a bit of Οδύσεια, terza rima Χριστός. It went well, I think, with about 45 minutes of good questions and discussion afterwards. David Ricks said interestingly that meta-Christian and post-Christian can mean quite different things. I had thought the terms were interchangeable. He sees meta- as continuing traditional Christianity but with changes whereas post- signifies a replacement with something essentially different. Maybe. Afterwards, a woman gave me her CV, hoping that I could find her a job in America! . . . By tube to Tower Hill and then further along the river to the Times Building to meet Alix MacSweeney. She showed us around the large room where the TLS is produced each week, remarkably the week of publication, not well in advance, as I had supposed. Indeed today, Tuesday, was "press day"! A man was doing last-minute adjustments on the page layout. Then it goes to the printer. They receive it back tomorrow, after which it is posted and placed in shops (still on Wednesday). The date of the issue is the following day, Thursday, in this case 30 March. Alix introduced us to the editor, very pleasant. I mentioned that I'd been a subscriber since 1957 most likely. "Yes," he replied, "most people end their subscription at death." "Well, we can look forward to that." Alix told me that TLS has 30,000 subscribers. It's owned, as is the entire Times, by Rupert Murdoch. It needs to be self-sufficient, and turn a profit on its own: it isn't carried by the other papers. So they're always looking for more subscribers, especially in the USA. I thought that if I were an ancient Egyptian and were to be buried with familiar, desired objects to take with me to the "other world," I might do worse than to have some issues of the TLS. . . . To the Barbican for Antony and Cleopatra with Alan Bates and Frances De La Tour. We'd heard how good she is, and of course remember Bates as the Boss in Zorba. But the production was disappointing. I preferred the one we saw at the Olivier last year, which got bad notices. De La Tour made Cheopatra seem charmless, a spoiled egomaniac with childish demands. Nor is she attractive physically. Bates is now fat. His Antony was OK, with all the paradoxes of the characterization, and he did, I suppose, make us feel for him toward the end, despite his stupidity, gerontic voluptuousness, and obstinacy beforehand. Shakespeare's "trick" is of course to have Antony send along Enobarbus's treasure even after E. has switched sides: evidence of the "noble Antony" whom we really have not seen otherwise. And Octavius, who really is noble, or at least will be as Augustus, seemed just a querulous autocrat. Correctly, the audience was luke-warm, a huge contrast to the truly excited audiences at Othello and The Merchant of Venice. Oh well, two out of three isn't bad, and even the first half of Timon was splendid. Add to that the exquisite Der Rosenkavalier and the intellectually compelling Copenhagen and perhaps the merits of Lady in the Van, and we did well enough. But how I wish I could see Martinu's The Greek Passion here at the end of April!

Back from another three days at Princeton, when we finished lessons 10 and 11. Only one more to go. Practiced twice with Dan, but he's still not ready for a concert at Pendle Hill in May. On returning, glad to hear that Dick Williamson's prostate operation (TURP) went well. He told Dr. Heaney, who has now operated on prostates for everyone in our trio, that we will call ourselves henceforth the Heaney Trio—better, the Heaney Urological Trio.

Stylianos published a lovely poem in his monthly bulletin.

ΕΠΙΣΗΜΕΣ ΟΥΤΟΠΙΕΣ

Ο χρόνος, άκου που σου λέω, δεν κυλά μήτε καν κινείται για τον απλούστατο λόγο ότι δεν υπάρχει.

Τ'αστέρια όμως που περιστρέφονται ακαταπαύστως ως την οριστική τους θανά εκπέμπουν φως ή δανείζονται φως ρυθμίζοντας τις εποχές κι ανοιγοκλείνοντας τα βλέφερα σε μέρα και νύχτα.

The idea, clear from his article, is that "time" is a human construct, an invention.

Financial planning continues. I visited Dan Connolly again; we're setting up the accounts for three trusts for children and three for grandchildren. I received my first obligatory distribution for my CREF account, and we rolled over $1,000,000 from CREF to PaineWebber, to be invested in American funds. Let's hope . . .

Pendle Hill

We arrived Thursday night and supped with Alec and family, very pleasantly. Friday started for me with Cadbury Committee. Only two applications. Then Publications at noon, but Rebecca neglected to send the manuscripts until I reminder her a few days ago, and I got mine only this morning. We rejected both. I described the Takashi meeting to the group. Afterwards, Rebecca and I had an 1½ hour talk. I was hoping that she'd say she wanted to resign. She is going to apply again to Westtown, but of course they won't hire her. She says that she cannot attend to details because she is so discouraged by the lack of a "unified vision" at Pendle Hill and in Quakerism. Poor Rebecca! She might have to wait 100 years. I also forewarned her about the Seeger volume done by Chuck Fager and me, and of course she was miffed that we hadn't included her in the enterprise (if we had, as Chuck mentioned later, we probably would never have produced the book in time). . . . Business Meeting was occupied mostly by memorial minutes, for Lloyd Lewis, Elizabeth Gray Vining, Sonny Cronk, and others. Very sad, except for Vining, who died at age 97. . . . Chrysanthi slept early, having been sleep-deprived by virtue of three nights with Theo. I put corrections for lesson 11 into the computer. . . . Today started with Nominating Committee, 1½ hour instead of the expected ½ hour. I'm going to have to be recorder for Executive Committee since Paul Mangelsdorf is rotating off. Ugh! A quick breakfast in the huge, beautiful tent erected in front of Firbank; then worship, marred, only at the start, by a "speech" against hate literature. . . . Lunch in the tent. Nice to see old friends: Coleman Dorsey, John Cary, Margery Walker especially. Then the afternoon celebration, 2:00 to 5:00 p.m. the first speech, by a 92-year-old man who had been in the Pendle Hill class of 1930 (year one) was amazing. He was eloquent and youthful. But then Janet Shepherd went on forever. Max Carter was better. And Paul Rator, the new forum-director, was interesting in giving us his very varied background. Richard Barnes spoke about the campaign. I was pleased that he expanded on John C. Baker's $100,000 gift received owing to Andy Towl and me. Finally, Gay Berger began the celebration of Dan's ten years. After her talk she invited Chuck and me onto the platform. Chuck spoke well about his indebtedness to Dan, first for the Seeger decision, which enabled Chuck to be granted CO status instead of going to jail, secondly for hiring him to do the original forum program despite his dubious reputation for extreme positions. Then he spoke of the festschrift idea, saying that he figured, since a festschrift is an “academic” concept, that he needed the help of a “certified academic,” namely Peter Bien. Then came my turn. I began by stating that I’d never been called “certified” before, and that this was usually for incarceration in the loony bin. Then I described the contents of the volume: the reminiscences by allies in the AFSC years, the scholarly articles (including my own on process theology, saying that I’d given it to Dan but he never read it, which drew a huge laugh from the audience), and Dan’s essays, and finally the Supreme Court decision itself. Dan was of course totally surprised, as we had hoped, and very moved and gratified. I presented him his copy, inscribed by Chuck and me. He then delivered his valediction, speaking well about the need for all of us to realize that the basic laws of life ordain that younger hands need to take over. . . . Lastly, Gay introduced the director-to-be, Steve Baumgartner, who spoke briefly, mainly to express his gratitude for being chosen to lead what quite obviously is a very extraordinary institution. . . . It was long but nice. Folks seemed very pleased by the festschrift; many offered their hands to shake as we exited. . . . Then to Philadelphia again and a nice Italian restaurant with Alec and family. Theo slept through most of it. Alec expatiated to me about his effort to introduce uniformity in the curricula of each of the sections of a given grade, something not yet done at Friends Select. The school’s most basic dilemma is that the Head, and ½ the board, want it to be academically rigorous and able to compete with Friends Central in this regard, whereas the other half of the board and most of the older staff want it to be diverse, educating non-university-type students as well as future scholars. Alec is caught in the middle. He recognizes the need for more rigor and uniformity in the curriculum, yet he would like the school to become even more diverse than it already is, via the recruitment of international students (resisted now by many teachers because they don’t want non-speakers of English). As for Monica, she’s a full-time mother, but meeting other mothers in the park, and beginning to decide on a particular Presbyterian church that she favors. They both love Philadelphia, which is not surprising.

AMTRAK

I read two of Brenda Marder’s chapters. No spark. And so many grammatical mistakes and infelicities. One is quite bad, a survey of women’s predicament, potted sociology. The other, on the Quaker school, based in considerable part on interviews with Chrysanthi and Vouli, is better, but still rather pedestrian. Oh my, oh my! What are we going to do?

April 17, 2000

Terpni

To the farm with Chrysanthi to turn the water on so that Leander and family will have water when they come on Friday. But discovered a broken (frozen?) pipe under the kitchen. Leander's hydrant will be fine but we'll need to repair our pipe before we can have water in the house. Strange. Why did this happen? Is it because I was unable to undo that little cap on the "appendix" last summer?

Tuesday, April 18, 2000

"Quaker 8s" at the Spottswoods' in Norwich with the Cadwalladers, Anne Baird, Billi Jo Johnstone and partner. We talked about people who greatly influenced our spiritual development. I cited Douglas Steere and Dave Ritchie as the yin and yang of my early Quaker experience. Chrysanthi spoke movingly of her father: how calm he was despite provocation during the German occupation.

Wednesday, April 19, 2000

Took Kesaya Noda to lunch at the Inn. She is now an official "letter writer/corrector" for President Wright, in a lovely office in Parkhurst. She seems pleased. She even ate a huge portion of the Inn's buffet instead of her home-prepared rice.

Sunday, April 23, 2000, Easter

Daphne, Greg, Christina, and Andrew came on Friday. They're still looking for a house in the suburbs. Greg is thinking of leaving Goldman Sachs in two or three years. The children are a 200% occupation, but Daphne is very patient. . . . At Meeting today I ministered on Resurrection: What can it possibly mean for liberal Quakers? I mentioned D. H. Lawrence's "scandalous" interpretation in "the Man Who Died," Yeats's conflation with Dionysus in his play, and the general yin-yang of life: sleep-wake, winter-spring, grandparents-grandchildren, senescence-vitality, the fact that a universal principle seems to be that vitality comes from a previous death. This was picked up nicely by subsequent ministry.

Monday, April 24, 2000

Leander, at the farm, was present when Ray Smith, plumber, fixed our pipe and also a defective valve in Leander's system. So, all is now well again. Leander's family were treated to the sight of 4 or 5 young deer "dancing" in the south field.

Tuesday, April 25, 2000

Leander, Sophia, and Nicholas arrived. Deanna is in Manchester, Vermont, playing with the National Symphony at the start of its week-long Vermont residency. Sophia was extremely withdrawn and shy to begin with, but then warmed up, eventually coming willingly to my arms for a goodnight kiss, and proclaimed, "I love you!"

To England

Last night in Cambridge at Howard Johnson's. Up early to get the 9:00 a.m. plane, tourist class, but two empty seats adjoining so it wasn't too bad. Am reading Brenda's volume 1 of Farm School history, interesting, and well researched, but the writing is terrible: faulty punctuation and idioms, sexist language, anachronisms, grammar. It will really need to be copyedited. At Heathrow, took the new express to Paddington to save time, but then lost an hour in the metro trying to get to Russell Square. But made it just past 10:00 p.m., to find a note from Gay Berger inviting me to supper on Saturday, which of course won't be possible. . . . Found two excellent reviews, indeed superlative ones, of Martinu's The Greek Passion plus one negative one. Of course much of the information is wrong. They speak of Turkish refugees (!) and of Kazantzakis as a communist. Alas, alack!

Friday, April 28, 2000

London

Worked on Aspasia's footnotes in the morning. Then to Friends House. Long, pleasant lunch with Stuart Morton, who remembers Leander very vividly and seemed like an old friend. He's not too happy with his work at Friends House (he directs projects in Sri Lanka and India) and expects to quit in a year or two, and move back to Birmingham. Wilhelmina is unemployed there. He movingly described her experience with racist remarks and attitude among Quakers. I told him at length about the Takashi affair. . . . Then to the library. Josef Keith was absent, having just gone home owing to an emergency there. So I met with the head librarian, Malcolm Thomas, to deliver my photos of the Quaker School, Norman Gilbertson's address, and a catalogue of Nancy Crawshaw holdings at Princeton. In the midst of this the fire alarm rang and we all had to evacuate the building to the street opposite. Standing there, suddenly a load of excrement fell from above, splattering the shoes of one of the girls. "Endsleigh Gardens aren't what they used to be," said Thomas. Luckily we were able to finish indoors. . . . Walked then to the British Library to see the special exhibit "1000 Years of English Literature." What a treasure: first editions, manuscripts, sound recordings of Plath reading "Ariel," Conan Doyle speaking about Sherlock Holmes, news on the day that Lady Chatterley's Lover went on sale, Auden reading "The More Loving One"—"Looking up at the stars / I know quite well / that as far as they care / I can go to hell." Splendid! Philip Larkin reading "Wedding Wind," Eliot reading "The Burial of the Dead" from "The Waste Land," ending with "I will show you fear in a handful of dust." And Virginia Woolf's manuscript of Mrs Dalloway and Joyce's workbook for Ulysses, with different colored crayons crossing out motifs already inserted. As if all this wasn't enough, the permanent exhibit now has Woolf's BBC talk on the magic of words: the first time I'd ever heard her voice. Also Yeats and Joyce reading. But the biggest surprise for me were the Beatles—how good they are, especially the song "Michelle," which is brilliant. And there is Nelson's last letter to Emma Hamilton, two days before the Battle of Trafalgar, where he was killed, and his strategy for that battle, written out on four pages. . . . Nice talk afterwards over tea with a student of organic farming and sustainability, doing an MA in Wales and very opposed to the World Bank, IMF-type development. . . . To Covent Garden to pick up my ticket. . . . To Piccadilly. Ate in an Indonesian restaurant: Daging Melati (strips of spicy beef, very nice). Then indulged myself in Raymond Review Bar, quite tasteful. Home in the rain. A surprisingly rich day, and zero jet lag.

Saturday, April 29, 2000

Long discussion at breakfast with a young man here for a conference on nonviolence. He'd done the Peace Studies M.A. at Bradford. We had much in common, although he is not a Quaker. A believer in the true possibility of cooperation and peaceful coexistence for all human beings. . . . Pre-performance talk at the Royal Opera, 6:00 p.m. The speaker quoted a letter from Martinu: "I hate America." He was himself a refugee since 1938; never returned to Czechoslovakia after the war. Loved the theater. The Greek Passion is not an opera; it is musical theater. He composed fifteen operas; left France for the USA in 1941. In 1945 he taught at Tanglewood. After the communist takeover of Czechoslovakia in 1948 he couldn't return; he was considered a reactionary in Czechoslovakia and a communist in the US! The Greek Passion is his last major work. Begun in 1954. He had read Zorba. Kazantzakis discouraged Martinu from doing Zorba because the dialogue was all-important. He offered Martinu instead his newly translated Christ Recrucified. So Martinu knew the book in English from the start. Two themes: the heritage of Christian virtues and our obligation to humanity. He called Act IV a requiem; the chorus is paramount. Martinu sent the opera to Covent Garden. Sir Arthur Bliss had the score sent to three referees who said No. Discouraged, Martinu revised considerably: thicker orchestration less chorus, more conventional plotting, also more old fashioned. The revised version was performed in Zurich in 1961, in Wales in 1981. Tonight we'll hear the first version for the first time. Four musical themes recur: (1) theme of the cross, (2) Kyrie eleison, the compassion theme, (3) selfless love, associated with Katerina, (4) marriage and folk music. . . . Finally, the great moment. I'm seated in A13 in the stalls circle, on the level of the stage, about 20–30 feet away, with a good view of the conductor and orchestra. While the audience is still being seated, the Agha is on stage, looking very Turkish—dissolute, drinking raki (already!), while Manolios sleeps on a mattress stage-left. The curtain is down. Immediately the conductor takes his bow and raises his baton, the curtain rises to reveal the extraordinary set—like a child's jungle-gym, with numerous platforms at various levels. Beautiful. Quickly, the notables are introduced, all dressed in suits and neckties (although fingering worry-beads) whereas Manolios, Yannakos, etc., are in old dirty clothes, unshaven. Katerina, Lenio, and the other women are in black. Grigoris is in typical priest's "uniform." The notables proceed to assign villagers to perform in the Passion Play. The best is when Judas is selected. "Never, never" sings Panayotaros, but the priest reasons with him, "Without Judas, the resurrection cannot take place." All this is splendid. We also see Lenio, who expects Manolios to marry her and is very much in a hurry whereas he is not. And of course Katerina is secretly attracted to Manolios. About halfway through the first act (of this production, and acts 1 & 2 of the original), the refugees arrive, bedraggled. I was disappointed in Fotis, who somehow lacked the stature, visually, that he is meant to have. But he sang beautifully, although all in all I don't think that Martinu did justice to him. One of the refugees dies, and Grigoris screams "Cholera!" as a way of excluding them. Already, however, Manolios and the "disciples" wish to help the refugees. Food is brought, etc. A fine scene involves Ladas, the miser, and Yiannakos, when Ladas employs him to get the refugees to relinquish their jewelry, etc., in exchange for food. (Later, Yannakos, in another good scene, finds that he cannot cheat them in this way, confesses to Fotis, and is forgiven.) The second act (= Acts III and IV of the original) somehow lacked the dramatic force of the first one. Manolios finds that he cannot marry, Lenio all but seduces Nikolios and they are wed in a colorful scene complete with on-stage band, clarinet, but sounding more Czech than Greek. Manolios and Katerina pledge to be brother-sister rather than lovers in another good scene, chiefly because for Katerina the orchestra is repeatedly silenced and replaced with a folksy accordion. Manolios's "offense" in the eyes of Grigoris is somewhat short-circuited, but a tremendous moment comes when Judas clasps him close and kisses him brutally. The mob, incited by Grigoris, kills Manolios, but Martinu skips the fact that it's in church and that Grigoris gives the final OK (in the novel) and crosses himself. Too bad. The opera ends with the despair of the refugees, and Fotis's fortitude. They'll pick up again (although in an earlier scene they had sketched out the gates of their future village) and walk into the future . . . quietly.

The audience, full house, was ecstatic. Repeated curtain calls, one man in the stalls standing and shouting "Bravo, Maestro!" for the conductor. A triumph. Kazantzakis must be smiling. He had to wait such a long time and experience so much misunderstanding and opposition. Yet here he is, via Martinu, enchanting this audience and greatly moving them. I was thinking during the performance, "Once upon a time, Christianity suffused people's lives (for better or worse) as it does the lives of these characters. Especially Manolios, "playing" Christ, realizes increasingly what a responsibility, burden, and opportunity is his. And the disciples "catch" his sanctity, imperfectly at first, because they're all-too-human, but eventually in a definitive way.

During the interval, sipping coffee in the Amphitheatre lounge, we listened to Peter Mackridge, on Lewis's portable radio, talking about the novel and about Kazantzakis, a very “orthodox” approach, rightly stressing Bergson, dematerialization (seen in Manolios as opposed to fat Patriarcheas), and transubstantiation of flesh into spirit.

Back to the Penn Club with Lewis and Monica (going to King’s Cross). A Häagen-Dazs ice cream walking through Russell Square, then telephoned Chrysanthi the good news about the opera, and to bed.

London–Boston–Hanover

Breakfast at the Penn Club, very lively, with Gay and Horst Berger. They’d gone to the Dome yesterday. Awful, Horst concluded: ugly, noisy. And he should know, since he is famous for building huge dome-like structures worldwide. Gay told me that Dan was always exasperated by Paul Mangelsdorf’s minutes because they were typically late and far too detailed. I, as the new recorder, will try to do better. She also noted some mistakes already made by Steve Baumgartner, acting perhaps in the way he had as CEO of a large corporation. But small mistakes, and ones that he was able to cover over. So far so good. . . . Taxi to Paddington. Heathrow Express. Nice talk on the airplane with an African expert who flew in from Nairobi last night. He expanded on the scourge of AIDS there; 30% of young girls are infected. One spends time going to funeral after funeral.

May 4, 2000

Hanover

Gay Berger is here, overnight, for Kendal all-communities’ meetings. Tonight there was a dinner, held at the hospital, and Chrysanthi and I were invited. Nice of John Hennessey. Nice to see John Diffey again, and Lynmar Brock and Claudia, and to meet some of the new figures, like Earl Harrison, former head of Sidwell Friends, and Mr. Rogers, former president of Guilford, and some new people on the Hanover board, e.g. Hebble. Lynmar spoke at length, not well (as usual). John Hennessey was more controlled and cogent, and said nice things about me.

May 5, 2000

Received e-mail from Shirley Dodson that Laura Sherwin died. She was my consultee at Pendle Hill, the totally neurotic figure. I assumed it was suicide but it wasn’t. Perforated stomach at age 25.

May 8, 2000

Princeton

Did half of lesson 12 with Dimitri, severely revising one of the grammar sections. At lunch, Anthony Hirst gave a brilliant talk on the appropriation of Christian language by Palamas, Sikelianos, and Elytis, all of whom are neo-pagans and actually quite blasphemous. But they never got into the trouble that Kazantzakis did, perhaps because neither State nor Church worried about the evil effect of poetry. . . . Supper at Mike and Mary Keeley's, where I went to discuss Brenda Marder's book, which I should recommend to the board next week. Very pleasant. Mike is off to Greece, then to Moscow for PEN, then to London for Seferis celebrations. PEN is in a pickle. They combined with Amazon.com to select a short story for a prize and then a display on Amazon's internet. But the story is about fellatio in a Muslim context, and Amazon is afraid to display it.

Princeton

A full day: 7:00 a.m. to 1:30 a.m. on Thursday morning. Finished lesson 12. Lunch with Dimitri in Prospect: lots of "business" concerning MGSA especially. In the late afternoon, to Dan's for practice (he decided not to do the mini-concert at Pendle Hill on the 15th). We did Satie, Bizet, Debussy. Then to the airport. Chaos. Most flights canceled owing to thunder storms. Mine delayed two hours but at least it flew. I arrived at Manchester at 1:00 a.m. No luggage. Filled out a form, and returned to Motel 8 to sleep.

Thursday, May 11, 2000

Worked on computer at the motel. Returned to Manchester Airport at 11:00, the first flight in from Philadelphia. Still no luggage. Returned to Hanover. Prepared "Oxen of the Sun" for Heffernan's course, which I taught at 4:00 p.m. (he's in Sweden at a conference). Twelve students doing an entire term on Ulysses. What a pleasure! I realized, for the first time, I think, since I retired, that I really do miss teaching. So probably the course at Princeton next spring will be pleasurable. . . . Dick and Allan came at 7:30 and we had good music for two hours. Did Vivaldi's "Seasons," all four. . . . Phone from Manchester. They found my luggage. They told us to go to sleep; it would be delivered in the middle of the night.

Friday, May 12, 2000

Terpni

Awoke to find my valise in the mud room. Amen! Off early to Woodstock Inn for breakfast (our little ritual) and then to the farm. Everything fine. Broken pipe repaired. We planted potatoes, string beans, parsley, and fertilized all the fruit trees, plus the little evergreens we planted in Leander's field that look so deprived. Chrysanthi vacuumed. Back to Woodstock for supper at the Inn with two very young, pretty waitresses.

Saturday, May 13, 2000

I delivered the fiscal year 2001 Hanover Meeting budget to the clerk's slot, since we'll be gone tomorrow. Luckily I was able to prepare 95% of the budget last week while traveling. It was easy, compared to last year (the first try). Actually got fund balances and total of accounts to match exactly. . . . When to Jimmy for a haircut but he was closed, so went to Hilde's salon for the first time and was barbered (much better than by Jimmy) by Matilda, a beautiful, talkative blond whose parents, she told me, are both doctors at Hitchcock. She hails from Kansas City. . . . Kendal for supper with Lisa Mayer, the Sandersons, and another couple, all on the Beveridge Webster Performance Fund Committee. Wendy Ardizzone and husband were at dinner, too. Then came our great benefit concert, on Bev's 92nd birthday, given by Veronica Yochum, the teacher at New England Conservatory who has sent us most of the students who have played in the series (four of the five students were present). I introduced her and also encouraged everyone in the hall to give $100, just as so many impoverished musicians, his former students, had done when we inaugurated the fund. I started with appropriate quotes about music, especially Sir Thomas Browne's about music evoking divinity, and then enlarged on how we had been blessed by the presence of Bev (and Franny), to whom Veronica was presenting this offering. She played a splendid recital complete with introductions to each piece: a Mozart sonata (late), Chopin nocturne, barcarole, and best of all a spectacular performance of a Bach English Suite. She commented on how Mozart had discovered Bach toward the end of his career and been influenced, and that even Chopin wrote polyphonically to some degree, inspired by Bach. Thanking her at the end, I said that we can now believe in the immortality of the soul since Mozart, Chopin, Bach, and the Websters had been with us in the hall. In the interval, Wendy spoke tearfully about her parents' death (within four months of each other) and how she had played Mozart for Bev in his last moments of awareness. All in all, it was a beautiful evening. My mother came, too, in her wheelchair, and lasted through to the end. Though she chided Veronica for talking so much; she just wanted her to play.

Sunday, May 14, 2000

Cambridge-Philadelphia

Up at 5:30 a.m. to get a Vermont Transit bus at 7:00 to Boston. On this long trip I read over my poems for Monday's lecture and finished Valtinos for WLT review. Lunch in the Square at Au Bon Pain, then to the A.R.T. for a superb production of A Winter's Tale, fully as good as anything we'd seen in London, directed by a Macedonian. Costumes very Turkish (especially for Bohemia): βράκες, αργιλέ, belly dancing. Jeremy Geidt was in his best form as the shepherd who raises Perdita, who was played by a radiant beauty, Sarah Howe. Thomas Derrah was of course a perfect clown, Autolycus, joined by Remo Airaldi as a perfect son to the Shepherd. The production somehow managed to unite the Sicilia (tragic) portion with the Bohemia (romantic comedy) portion, so much so that the final scene of Hermione's restoration was extremely moving.

Monday, May 15, 2000

Pendle Hill

Routine flight last night. Met at the airport by a limousine sent by Pendle Hill. Breakfast with students in Rebecca's journal-writing short course. Then SEPTA to Suburban Station, and a short walk to Locust and 15th to visit Monica (her 29th birthday is tomorrow) and Theo, who has one tooth and is crawling, but still somewhat cranky. Met Alec at Friends Select for lunch. Michael has resigned the headmastership at NJIS and the position has been offered to Alec, but he says that he isn't interested. Nor is Monica. They may have another child and want to spend at least six years in this country before returning, perhaps, to Indonesia. But he thinks he'll leave Friends Select after next year; he just doesn't feel comfortable there. . . . Back at Pendle Hill, met with Rebecca concerning the Van der Merwe book and his antagonism to AFSC. I strongly urge publication, perhaps with a preface by someone from those AFSC days. . . . Supper with Chuck Fager, who urges us to begin granting royalties and advances to Pendle Hill authors. Not much chance, I told him. . . . At 7:30 I delivered my Poetry and Science talk, really a poetry reading. Good audience, including of course many friends.

Tuesday, May 16, 2000

Pendle Hill–Medford–Princeton

Shirley Dodson drove me to Medford Leas after we left Chrysanthi at Wallingford Station to go to Washington. Lots of good talk along the way, including more on Van der Merwe. My poetry talk was OK, I think. Lyle Tatum's wife came up afterwards and said it was the best in the whole series. Tatum commented on Van der Merwe's egotism, very obvious in his writing itself. Good questions and comments after the talk. Shirley and I then took off, after talking pleasantly with a man who had spent twenty-five years at Monteverde in Costa Rica and of course knows Katy Van Dusen, her husband and family. . . . We got box lunches from Medford Leas and ate them while driving to Princeton. Arrived around 2:00 p.m. and at 2:30 I was again at 58 Prospect Street. Dimitri and I went over Mache's latest additions to lesson 12 and then began a review—again—of lesson 1, concentrating on formatting. Will this ever end?! . . . Back in Palmer House I worked on my WLT review of Valtinos's Deep Blue Almost Black, which I found rather disappointing, but can I say that in the review?

Thursday, May 18, 2000

Princeton–Washington

Dimitri had to leave at 11:00 a.m. because poor Evie has bad news medically, probably ovarian cancer, and he had to bring her for treatment. I'm hoping that he, and perhaps Mache, can come to Terpni in June. . . . Train to Washington Cosmos Club, very grand. Met with Tommy Thomas and David Buck about "the book." We made some basic decisions: two books instead of four; revise volume 1; use a printer not a publisher; do some in hard-cover. . . . To Kennedy Center, where Chrysanthi joined me for a lovely concert conducted by Gerald Schwarz: Tchaikovsky's suite no. 4 (not very memorable), Shostakovich's cello concerto no. 2 played with panache by Lynn Harrell, a devastatingly morose piece of music making me think of Shostakovich suffering under the Stalin regime, but fascinating musically. Then Stravinsky's "Petrushka," so nice to see and not just hear, because the orchestration is so varied and exciting.

Friday, May 19, 2000

Washington, Cosmos Club

Spoke to Alec, who might come to visit Leander tomorrow. David Buck asked after him yesterday and so did Phil Foote today. Breakfast with David and Patti and Tom, very sumptuous. I recommended Bill McGrew and Μίμης Λυπουρλής as possible new trustees. They told me that McGrew was probably forced out of Anatolia and bitter, and his departure not even celebrated after 20+ years as director. Sad. . . . Board committees. Long discussion about “the book.” They decided on one volume instead of two, with volume 1 copyedited but not cleansed of anachronisms (this will please Brenda). Published by the Farm School. Some copies in hardback. Arthur Dukakis donated $20,000 to the project, and there are other donations, so the money is in hand. Discussion also about “precision farming,” which analyzes the soil square meter by square meter. . . . I left at 2:00 p.m. and took the Metro out to Rockville. Met by Deanna and Sophia. They worry about Sophia because she is so morose and cranky, but she and I did well together. We built a locomotive with blocks; she showed me her room, etc. . . . Back to the Cosmos Club (such a handsome building; good to see Gilbert White’s photo on the wall as one of the most distinguished members). Then two blocks down Mass. Ave. to the Greek Embassy for dinner hosted by Ambassador and Mrs. Philou. I was seated at his table next to Eve Labouisse, daughter of Mme Curie, 96 years old (I’m told), and remarkably alert and sensible. Philou very charming and genuine; no airs. Glen Grant’s widow on my other side. Philou spoke well toward the end, followed by Tommy Thomas and David Buck and Sperry Lea. Then I got up and told about the Turkish Bibliography that inspired the Greek government to give $35,000 to MGSA to produce a Modern Greek Bibliography, which I now have the pleasure to present to the Ambassador. It took 17 years, but it’s done! He was suitably impressed and grateful. After dinner we talked at some length. He knew of my work, and asked for a recommendation of a computer expert in Greece, so I’ll send him Stelios’s address.

Saturday, May 20, 2000

Washington

Breakfast with John Borovilas, who lives on Staten Island, has three small children, leaves home at 6:00 a.m. arrives home at 8:00 p.m., and is fed up with this lifestyle. Cf. Greg and Daphne. . . . The long meeting of the full board included some good discussion: of TEE vs. Λύκειο, two-year college vs. four-year, “the book,” etc. Tommy and David are very positive about the retreat I suggested for October on the entire educational situation. . . . Chrysanthi returned to Leander’s earlier (their house construction is finished: a kitchen twice the size, a guestroom and bath in the cellar). I went quickly to the Philips Gallery, next door. At 5:00 Chrysanthi returned with Alec and Monica and Theo, driven by Leander. Alec and family were able to accompany us to the reception at a club on Mass. Ave. and 18th Street, and they had a reunion with David and Patti. Too bad that Phil Foote wasn't there. He wants to see Alec, will be recruiting a middle school principal for 2001–2002. I had invited Jim and Penelope Alatis and also Jim and Marge Warren. Both came. Alatis, thank goodness, seems ready to host the 2001 MGSA Symposium. 99% sure, at least. We both went to Ambassador Philou and told him, and he promised to assist. Had a nice long talk with Mike's brother, Ambassador Keeley, who is now retired from the diplomatic service and is active as a publisher of his own writings. Regarding Brenda's book, he strongly recommended self-publication (actually he uses Thomson-Shore, Pendle Hill's printer) and also hardback for a certain percentage of copies. Also met Mimi Hughes again, the former Consul General in Thessaloniki, about to be posted to Mexico City. David Schuler, the former Consul (and a Dartmouth graduate) resigned from the diplomatic in order to take a job in Japan (his wife is Japanese). Afterward, Jim Warren and Marge invited us home, so we drove to their 1830 house on Capitol Hill, a doll's house filled with treasures such as original Lear watercolors. I hope that he'll help Alatis re: MGSA. And maybe introduce me when I come in September for Ann Lea to speak on "Odysseus Across the Centuries." (I met her briefly yesterday at the Greek Embassy; she flew off to Greece today for a conference on the Elgin Marbles.) It's interesting and fun to be involved with so many capable individuals, for instance Mimi and Charles Lowry, with whom I had lunch yesterday; he was in Honolulu on Dec. 7, 1941 when Pearl Harbor was bombed; his father was an officer in the Navy. He wonders whether Roosevelt, presumably knowing that the bombing would take place, deliberately hushed up the information so that the incident would propel us finally into the war. And Sperry Lea is interesting. His father (or grandfather) was a Quaker. And all of Jim Warren's ancestors were Quakers, and he and his sister still use thee to each other, although no one in the extended family is a practicing Friend.

Washington–Hanover

Up at 5:50 a.m. Vermonter at 7:30. Chrysanthi got off at NYC to spend three days with Daphne. I continued home, loaded with things to do: typing the Greek book, vetting the Politics of the Spirit translation first and foremost.

Thursday, May 25, 2000

Evelyn Greene here, with lots of conversation for hours before, during, and after supper. She encourages me to contribute to the Black Hole rather than the library.

Friday, May 26, 2000

Terpni

To the farm. Planted tomatoes and more string beans. Lots of weeds because we didn't use hay mulch last year.

Sunday, May 28, 2000

Terpni

My birthday. Chrysanthi said "Let's not count any more birthdays. Christina said, "Happy birthday, Pappou." Then, when I tried to start a conversation, she replied, "I'm busy playing." . . . Last night, lovely dinner with Irv and Fran. Irv showed his photos from Normandy, 1945–46. Beautiful. But they're feeling older. Fran cannot drive now. They're thinking of selling their property. I asked Daphne if she might be interested. . . . Deana Baker and Matt pulled in for a short visit. He has bought a new John Deere, also made mostly in Japan. . . . Did lots more weeding, started the tractor, mowed in front of Leander's house, prepared my office, fixed the big shutter on the picture window. . . . Then to Quechee for supper with Everett and Brenda Marder. Everett, for the first time, explained his army career—what "a nice Jewish boy was doing in the Army." He had fantastic training and advantages, all kinds of education subsidized by the army, and then of course he served in Greece in tumultuous times, including the fall of the Junta. I reported to Brenda the discussion at the board meeting. She seems OK except regarding publisher vs. printer. She very much wants the former. But who?

Monday, May 29, 2000

Big problems with our "Greek Today." Dimitri has been sidetracked by Evie's illness. She has severe cancer. So, he has done nothing since I was there. And Phyllis Deutsch, our editor at UPNE, says she'll be leaving in the autumn. If we don't deliver the MS this summer we won't have an editor there. . . . But at least I'm finishing my vetting for the Greek translation of Politics of the Spirit. Will send the footnotes off to Aspasia tomorrow.

Kinhaven

Back at Kinhaven for Leander's four-hand workshop. Waited anxiously for Dan to arrive by lunchtime, as he had promised. No Dan. But he arrived at 1:25, five minutes before our coaching with Leander. We did half of Satie's "Trois morceaux en forme de poire," with much improvement. Our other piece, Bizet's "Le Bal" from Jeux d'Enfants, we never got to. Later, Nigel told me that Satie had gone to dinner at Debussy's and Debussy had told him, "You need to have more form in your compositions." So Satie went home and wrote his "Three pieces in the shape of a pear"! And of course they aren't even three pieces, but . . . Nice to see Ignat again, and Caroline, who is studying for her medical license exam next Thursday and looked pale and worried. In the afternoon Ignat gave a master class for Kit Van Winkle (Bach's Partita in D), Barbara Sherman (Beethoven's Opus 31 no. 2), and Linda Lienhard (Beethoven's Opus 110). A brilliant class, showing that everything depends on details. . . . Dan and I made some progress in additional practice after supper. At the 9:00 o'clock party I spoke with Robin Williams, who works in no. 2 Trade Center and wants to come to my Mrs Dalloway lecture. At supper, earlier, I spoke with Molly Bidlack, now grown up, going into her sophomore year at NYU, and surprisingly "civilized." I remember the horrendous child, smiling at Benjy's funeral, for example.

Kinhaven

Another very good coaching, this time from Nigel, who really understands Satie's music and helped us to do it "right," with no dynamics except those specified in the score, and less contrast between piano and forte despite the ff and fff. And he explained things like "Comme un bête," which means not "brutally," but "like an unthinking simpleton." At lunch, caught sight of Nancy Bidlack in the kitchen and said hello. She reacted with what Leander terms her "forced smile"—they can never seem to forget my campaign to have Jerry retire. . . . In the afternoon, another master class, this time by Nigel, again brilliant (and also entertaining). Bruno Repp played Griffes's "Roman Sketches," opus 7, very French impressionistic. Susan Nisbett did Chopin's Nocturne in F. And Steve Kline did Ravel's "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales." Nigel was wonderfully animated, gesticulating, singing, conducting as though for an orchestra, and of course demonstrating. And what a difference when either Ignat or Nigel sits down and plays portions, no matter how well the student did beforehand! . . . In slack spaces I am putting in Kate Cohen's corrections to the Greek-English lexicon on the computer. One file corrupted completely but I was able to restore it from the backup. So far so good. . . . But I tried scanning for the first time before leaving for Kinhaven on Friday and so far haven't succeeded. Dimitri and Mache promise to work so that we can submit in July. We'll see . . .

Kinhaven

Fine coaching from Nigel on the Satie and also a little on Bizet. The secret for Satie is no dynamics except what is indicated. Also crisp staccatos. The Bizet, he explained, is really a "Can-can." We should play it as though for the Folies Bergère. Dan and I spent many hours practicing together, and separately, to try to apply what we were taught. In the evening, a splendid faculty recital. Nigel played Schubert's Sonata in A (D 764) with absolute control and the ability, like Horowitz, to go from p to pp to ppp. He also trilled effortlessly with his 4th and 5th fingers. And did the final octaves with both hands at breakneck speed, a technical challenge that, so Leander told me, forces most pianists to neglect this sonata. Then Leander and Ignat played the Sonata in B-flat (D 617) for four hands, superbly. Afterwards, Nigel remarked to me that they are a perfectly matched duo team, and the best he has heard. The rest was less memorable. Nigel and Chonghgo did Fauré's "Dolly" and then Chonghgo and Ignat played Mendelssohn's "Andante and Variations," opus 83a, technically brilliant but without the musical quality of the Schubert.

Kinhaven

Recital day! Dan and I practiced at 7:30 a.m. before breakfast. Everything still very vulnerable. I made new mistakes. But thankfully the actual performance went well. I think we did the Satie musically, in the style taught us so well by Nigel. And even the Bizet went off without serious problems. The other teams were mostly excellent, especially Kit and Sue doing the Liebeslieder Waltzer and Charlotte Armstrong and Robin Williams doing Schubert's "Eight Variations in A-flat" (D 813). So, another year's workshop came to a successful end.

Terpni

Arrived yesterday afternoon. Nice to have the house open and ready, more or less. Today an orgy of shopping in Glens Falls to five different furniture stores to buy a new sofa-bed, which finally we did. Also some wooden cabinets for Chrysanthi to keep silverware so the mice cannot parade over them. Supper in a Chinese restaurant where we saw the woman who runs the Narrows. Sadly they won't operate it this year, so no new trips for pizza overlooking Schroon Lake.

Saturday, June 17, 2000

Shapiros for dinner last night. I played the Satie, feeling very much in control. They're looking for a CCRC but the prices are frightening. . . . I've been re-reading Mrs Dalloway. Exhilarating but also a bit tedious, alas. Also reading Bobby Gersten's short history of Brant Lake Camp, full of reminiscences concerning people whom I remember vividly—e.g., Marv Kahn, the great pianist when I was a camper, and Joe Demmy. . . . Went to Rosine's for the party celebrating Ellie's graduation from high school. Her brother thinks he might like to teach English literature. Saw Bill Thomas there and talked again about my donation, not for the Black Hole but maybe to provide the New York Times and/or TLS in the library, or something for the school. Nice to see Laura and Mike (she's retiring in November). Rosine and I will do four-hand piano in August; she has learned the secondo to the great Schubert F-minor Fantasie. Finally met David Greene, also Hornbeck, who builds the boats and wanted to know how I start my brush fires so well. . . . Then to Perrymans after supper. Art said he wanted to show me something. So we loaded into the truck and drove up a sort of mule track, up and up, behind Antler Lake, where he is building a ten-foot square log structure or lodge with a superb view of the whole green countryside. Notched logs, perfectly, of course. A hideaway; another hideaway. On our way back we saw a black bear and three cubs crossing the road. Also all the new homes around Antler Lake, some quite grand.

Sunday, June 18, 2000

Am trying out Karel Husa's "Acht böhmische duette" for next year's four-hand workshop. I think that Dan can do them.

Friday, June 30, 2000

To Glens Falls, Staples, to xerox 450 pages of Greek Today and post them to Dimitri. Four more lessons to do; I'll post those on Monday. I've been sitting at the computer morning, afternoon, and night putting in all the final corrections. How good it will be to be finished with this. I do take an hour or so off each afternoon to weed in the garden—nice, mindless activity with an immediately visible result.

Monday, July 3, 2000

Again to Staples for xeroxing. Posted the remainder to Dimitri. An orgy of shopping at Price Chopper. Then a long, pleasant supper at Applebee's with Mary and Maureen Fitzgerald, followed by another hour or so at their house, with continuous good talk.

Tuesday, July 4, 2000

Gary and Wendy McGinn arrived unexpectedly on their "bike," a huge Suzuki motorcycle they just bought. I hope they don't kill themselves. But it's very sexy, to be sure. Afterwards, Don Kurka and the Morses came for supper. And yesterday we had a visit from Mylene, Daphne's Filipino babysitter, who is vacationing on Loon Lake. Very social, all of a sudden. Don Kurka brought the New Yorker article on prostate cancer, not much new, except that sometimes if they cut the nerves to the penis they can graft on another nerve taken from the foot. But it still seems right that I had the radical prostatectomy instead of radiation or "watchful waiting." The death from metastasized prostate cancer is excruciating and certain. . . . Am trying to learn Virgil Thomson's "Synthetic Walzes." Nowhere as interesting as Satie, alas.

Wednesday, July 5, 2000

Alec telephoned this morning from Pekalongan, with Theo's squeals in the background. All's well there, he says. Fiona was accepted to the same university that Monica attended, and goes off to start tomorrow.

POND SUMMERS

When early July's
Arrival quieted the spring's black flies
We spent green afternoons
Stretched on the moss
Beside dark Eagle Pond, and heard across
Its silences the calling of the loons.

The days swam by,
Lazy with slow content and the hawk's cry.
We lost ambition's rage,

Forgot it all,
 Forgot Jane Kenyon, forgot Donald Hall,
 And sleepily half-glanced at a bright page.
 Day after day
 We crossed the flaking railroad tracks and lay
 In the slant August sun
 To nap and read
 Beneath an oak, by the pond's pickerelweed.
 Then acorns fell: These days were almost done.
 —Donald Hall

NYC

To AMTRAK in Rensselaer, then to Penn Station. What a shocking contrast to emerge there and then take the subway, after departing our sylvan paradise! Yale Club buffet very relaxing. Then to Patelson's for four-hand music. Then Jeff's limousine to the World Trade Center. Lectured on Mrs Dalloway. Not many lawyers this time but lots of other people, including Jeff's oldest client, and his two uncles and a whole book club from Long Island. I think it went well. Oh, Robin Williams was there from Kinhaven. Afterwards, she, Chrysanthi, Jeff, and I had supper in a fancy restaurant on Central Park South that actually wasn't particularly good, especially considering the prices. To bed at 12:30 a.m.

Friday, July 7, 2000

To Amagansett

Lovely breakfast on the 22nd floor. Then to Met Museum to see the "Painters in Paris" exhibit. Fabulous Picassos, my favorites being "The Blind Man's Meal," done in 1903 when he was 21 years old, and "Women in White" (1923). But I also liked Derain's fanciful portrait of Lucien Gilbert (1906), Juan Gris's "Violin and Playing Cards" (1913), Utrillo's "Dorémy" (1935), and the Giacometti sculpture of "Three Men Walking" (1949). . . . Then to Penn Station and the Long Island Railroad to Amagansett. Noisy, crowded, but I was able to read (Yatromanolakis). Daphne's rented house is a mansion—huge, with heated outdoor pool, tennis court, billiard table in the cellar, and whirlpool tubs, five television sets, etc., etc. Disgusting, really, but also very quiet and pleasant. Christina and I went swimming in the pool. She is being taught at a day-camp. Andrew now walks and runs with assurance, and makes noises that aren't articulated words quite yet. Both children very friendly, which is a relief. Greg came on the 6:19 train; we barbecued steak for supper on the house's super gas grill outdoors. All this luxury is shocking, but easy to get used to. Of course, people seeing our 300 acres and 3 houses at Terpni must think that we, too, are living in luxury, which we are, but it's different because so much of the construction was homemade.

At the lecture last night, someone asked me why people keep diaries (referring to Virginia Woolf). In my own case it's certainly not with any thought that these diary entries will be published or even read in holograph by anyone. It's simply that, without this record, experience evaporates almost instantaneously into the ether and is lost. With this record, experience is nailed down, solidified, retained. Is that an adequate reason? Yes!

Saturday, July 8, 2000

Another swim in their delicious pool. Then to Amagansett riding academy to watch Christina's lesson on a pony. The children groom the horse first, then saddle and bridle it, then walk, finally try to trot just a little. In another rink, an expert woman was doing dressage. Remarkable. The whole stable is quite obviously a playground for the rich: youngish mothers with their invariably blond children, and most of the riders (of all ages) women and girls. . . . Finished Yatromanolakis's remarkable first novel, which I'll review for World Literature Today; watched the Wimbledon women's finals, very exciting, with a black American woman defeating a white one, both over six feet tall. . . . Andrew mouthed something like "Pappou" once or twice. Christina is in love with my comb, which she borrows morn and night to do her hair.

Thursday, July 13, 2000

To SPAC. Buffet at Hall of Springs, very disappointing, as it has been for several years. Then to a pre-performance talk in the Little Theater, which was a delight. The dancer Stephen Hanne moderated. The three speakers were O'Brien, who joined the company in its very first year and is now retired, Sean Lavery, the assistant to Peter Martins, and Hélène Alexopoulos. They reminisced about "Mr. B." (Balanchine), "Jerry" (James Robbins) and Lincoln Kirstein, about first arriving in Saratoga in 1966, and in being told "This is a horse town, not a dance town"; about rain storms when the orchestra pit became flooded and members had to flee, with the conductor playing the rest of the ballet on a piano on stage, reading from the orchestra score (!); about lights failing in thunder storms, about a ballerina getting stung by a bee in the midst of a performance, about “Jerry’s” sense of inferiority compared to the incomparable genius Balanchine. Lots of laughs. Afterwards, I spoke personally to Alexopoulos, asking her how her parents reacted to her interest in ballet. “They supported me as a child because they never dreamed that I would make a career.” She is married with two 6½-year-old children, twins, and she worries because they’re not learning Greek (she speaks Greek herself). I’ll try to send her a copy of Greek Today when it’s ready.

Started another barrel-full of compost yesterday. The first batch was very successful, ready in three weeks. And the garden is now entirely civilized. We laid black paper along some of the edges, and mulched the blueberries. But in bending down to pick up the roll of black paper I heard a “crack” in my back and could hardly stand straight. Terrible time sleeping that night. It’s considerably better since, but still troublesome. Am I getting old?

The ballet tonight was lovely, as always. “Symphony in Three Movements” (Stravinsky/Balanchine), starting with the gorgeous line-up of girls, all in white, in two rows; “Mercurial Maneuvers” (Shostakovich/Wheeldon) with the marvelous Edward Liang, and Jenifer Ringer and Jock Soto, showing how lovely and satisfying a modern work can be (it premiered last April in New York); and finally the exciting “West Side Story Suite” (Bernstein/Robbins), with Damian Woetzel as one of the leads, dressed in T-shirt and blue jeans.

Tuesday, July 18, 2000

Long talk on the phone with Sue Halpern-McKibben concerning my intended donation of $10,000 to the Johnsbury Library Foundation, of which she is a trustee. She has a child at Farm and Wilderness, so we had lots to share. She told me that I was the first person to donate to the library in the start-up phase, and that I would be the first person to donate to the Foundation except for one of its trustees. The problem is to try to decide how the income from the endowment should be used. . . . Evelyn Rothstein invited us to supper, kindly. Aser as always was very articulate about his scientific progress. Actually not too much progress since last year because they had to find how to make significant quantities of elasticin, in order to begin testing with animals. They finally did manage, and the testing will now begin. Meanwhile they've discovered possible new uses for elasticin, for example in cosmetic surgery.

Wednesday, July 19, 2000

Fed Ex brought Dimitri's latest—and final, I hope and pray—revision. Now: retyping again, pasting, xeroxing. And he telephoned from Athens with still more ideas that he had thought of on the plane. . . . To Saratoga with Don Kurka. Nice supper in Lillian's Restaurant. Easy, continuous conversation about painting, literature, politics, old age. We saw "Concerto Barocco" (Bach/Balanchine), which leaves one with the feeling that nothing can possibly be wrong in the world, that evil does not exist: it is so perfect, chaste, pure. Next: Slonimsky's "Earbox," Very different (John Adams/Peter Martins). Not to my taste, really, but colorful and energetic. The second new ballet, "Appalachia Waltz" (choreography by Mahdavian) was better, a very imaginative extension of square dance motifs, and engaging music played by cello, violin, and bass fiddle on stage. Last came "Symphony in C" (Bizet/Balanchine), the girls in tutus, very traditional and lovely.

Thursday, July 20, 2000

Russell Puschak came from the Johnsbury Library to go through the four cartons of books I had made ready, to see which might be kept for the collection and which should go for the book sale. He discovered Mr. Boyden's prize book, given to me for having the highest average at Deerfield in my class. I almost lost that one. Separating from the rest is hard; they've all been meaningful to me, and in some cases to my father (biographies of Morris Cohen, Mr. Justice Holmes, William James, Santayana). But they really must go. . . . I decided, talking to Russell and after speaking to Sue Halpern, to ask that my $10,000 gift be used to inaugurate a periodical fund, perhaps to start with the daily New York Times.

Friday, July 21, 2000

More ballet. "Mozartiana" (Tchaikovsky/Balanchine), gorgeous, with children, Kyra Nichols, and of course Woetzel. A Balanchine style that I've never seen before. "In the Night" (Chopin/Robbins) suffers by comparison with Balanchine. Very romantic and even sexy but lacks the Balanchine spark. Finally "Brahms-Schoenberg Quartet": Brahms's juicy music orchestrated with full color by Schoenberg and beautifully danced—another of Balanchine's triumphs. Saw Mel and Herb Goertz there. He very friendly, she withdrawn. I think that she must be a mental case; she looked sick. At Lillian's Restaurant, before, the young waitress, when I said I was going to the ballet, admitted that she had never been, although she lives in Saratoga. I thought of her during the performance: what a miracle she is missing, right in her back yard.

Hanover

Driving over last night I listened to Garrison Keillor telling jokes. One was: "What happens when you cross a Jehovah's Witness with a Unitarian? You get someone who knocks on the door and doesn't know what to say." I used this as a text for ministry this morning, changing Unitarian to Quaker, of course, and going on to venture that if we say anything we've got to learn to base our faith on truth, namely the naturalistic basis of everything, including what used to be called soul or spirit. I was thinking of course of the genome project and my conversation with Aser the other night. It was a good, centered Meeting, with others taking up the theme appropriately, especially Hugh and Rhea, she telling about a scary time when she was lost in the woods and he, later, stressing that a compass always gets you through. . . . At Business Meeting we did the budget, with Friends deciding to spend more and more. Let's hope they contribute. . . . In the evening I attended ALPS supper, then skits night, full of fun and lots of fluent Italian, French, Japanese, even Greek. The Greek skit was based on my story about the girls in Thessaloniki who asked how to get to the train station and the Greeks arguing amongst themselves regarding the best way and forgetting the girls, whom I put in a taxi, telling the driver to take them to the station.

Monday, July 24, 2000

Nice lunch with Robert Binswanger. Penny is 85% cured of her cancer, and continues for life with a medication. He has been elected president of the Hampton College Board, a white man presiding over a black college. He'll return to Dartmouth winter and spring to teach in Rockefeller.

Tuesday, July 25, 2000

Hanover-Riparius

Supper with Mother. She's stable, the same, much diminished in "cognitive facility." But she has a good appetite and can still walk . . . slowly.

Wednesday, July 26, 2000

Working on what I hope is the final revision of Greek Today. I visited Phyllis Deutsch on Monday and had a good preliminary talk. Promised her the full MS by next week. And Aspasia blitzed me from Athens. She has finished the translation and will deliver it tomorrow to the University of Crete Press. Good. Two projects nearing some resolution.

Saturday, July 29, 1999

A nice poem by a friend (TLS June 30, 2000, p. 28):

THE DEPARTURE

At first a boiling from within. The heart pounds and the groin thumps with an all but irresistible pull drawing me to you or her to him.

Later a cooling curls the corners up.
One finds a peaceful perch from which (as in a nineteenth-century novel or a story by Katherine Mansfield, matrons at a dance sit on little gilded chairs against one wall and watch their daughters waltz) to view the widening gap between the self and all it recently so fiercely wanted.

The focus on the tricky glancing mirror can't be sustained in this new stolid land whose reigning deity, till yesterday beautiful, young, trembling with urgency, myopic now, thick-bodied, stoical, struggles to his feet and walks away toward a dark stream in a shady grove without a backward look.

—Rachel Hadas

To Friends Lake Inn at 8:00 p.m. for a surprise 70th birthday party for Don Kurka, hosted (and paid for) by his daughter Mara. Son Karel up from Florida, old friends from Long Island, plus the local friends: Tortoras, Morses, and some new ones we met. And what a good meal! Then we all gathered in a function room for birthday cake and coffee and good cheer. I hadn't realized that a place as sophisticated as Friends Lake Inn was in our vicinity.

Monday, July 31, 2000

A day to remember: I finished Greek Today! (At least for now.) To Staples to xerox it. Tomorrow I'll post it to Phyllis Deutsch at the Press.

Thursday, August 1, 2000

I worked hard doing nothing—wrote letters, played the piano, read a little Whittier, arranged more books in the Guest House. In the afternoon we went to the Shapiros to see Milly Adler, who was in great form talking about Jack Adler and Sharon. . . . Later, Leander and Sophia arrived. Sophia so mute, but with a beautiful smile, and of course eats nothing. Nice dinner with Alec, Monica, Theo, Leander, Sophia. . . . I wrote to Meg, whose sister Liz is dying of pancreatic cancer. Also, Adam Lindsay wrote that his brother Angus died of a brain tumor. We remember them as beautiful children at the Quaker School in Thessaloniki.

Friday, August 4, 2000

An interesting day. The forester Ross Morgan walked Alec, Leander, and me through the woods in the morning for three hours and filled us with knowledge and information. Among other things he showed me how beneficial my thinning had turned out, over the years. He'll return next week. Leander wants to cooperate, as do I. Alec hesitates because he fears that cooperating with RCPA will label him as a "green" and he wants to be free of labels here. We'll see . . . Then in the afternoon Alec and I did another half of the south field, trimming branches that interfere with mowing. I used the long Stihl, much better this year than last. One needs technique in this, too. . . . Then Rosine came and we played for 1½ hours, Schubert's F-minor "Fantasie" (wow!), Arensky, Bizet. She's very good. As Leander keeps saying, it's a shame that I am "stuck" with Dan. But friendship is also important. . . . After supper, Leander played the Husa with me. Too difficult for Dan, we concluded, except perhaps for two of the items. . . . At the office, I'm working now on Kazantzakis and Hitler, for the Australian JMGS.

Tuesday, August 8, 2000

Did as much as I could on Kazantzakis and Hitler; need access now to my study in Hanover for all the missing quotes. So I started copy-editing Brenda Marder's Stewards of the Land, which she had scanned. Monica solved the problem with the scanning that had prevented me from extending the margins. It was a question of frames, which need to be removed. . . . Alec and I have been trimming back all overhanging branches in the south field, a big job. Finished yesterday and today gathered up all the piles and brought them to the central pile for eventual burning. At 3:30 Rosine came, so I descended the tractor and played Schubert and Mozart in my dungarees and work boots. Then back onto the tractor to finish the job. Only here can one have this delicious variety. Deanna and Nicholas are here, adding to the complexity of supper in a nice way. Deanna and Monica have pledged to provide dessert each evening. Daphne telephoned to remind me that I never paid rent this year (!), so I'm mailing $750 to Paine Webber tomorrow.

Thursday, August 17, 2000

Put the tractor up on blocks this afternoon, with Alec's help. Serviced the Jari and the Troy Bilt. Yesterday finished mowing the south field. Κα του χρόνου! We felled a very nice balsam that Leander felt too close to his house, barked it, and placed it in the pole barn for possible future use. . . . Today worked on MGSA business, preparing the agenda for September's meeting. Yesterday finished another chapter of Stewards of the Land. I've done front matter, chapters, 1, 2, 8, 9, 10, and the epilogue. Good research, terrible writing, but it's easy to fix. . . . Now must start preparing for my Cosmos Club lecture on Odysseus across the centuries. The boys went to Hanover on Tuesday and brought back a new book from Baker that discusses the Ajax and the Philoctetes à propos. . . . But I also have all the Translation Prize submissions to read, and Constantinidis's dissertation on Greek theater. Too much, as usual. . . . Lovely visit on Monday from Joan and Tom Wilson. Learned more about her background. She spent her girlhood in Sofia, where her father was headmaster of a near-eastern college; also in Beirut later. They hope to be in Kendal before we get there. . . . Also nice visit from Art and Chris, with Art telling us at great length about his boyhood and his early career as a trooper. And Hilda Grunblatt came a few days ago, also to see our family and tell about hers. She still hasn't edited Jacques' memoirs but hopes to do so at some point. Life here with the five grandchildren and their parents is very noisy. But more pleasant than unpleasant, although there are moments of the latter. Supper is not peaceful. Two days ago we escaped to Schroon Lake pizza with the McGinns; that was better. But Christina and Sophia play well together. Andrew is delightful, and Nicholas and Theo always sources of a laugh. But when Andrew cries all morning and Christina throws a tantrum, poor Daphne is ready to scream and so are we. Chrysanthi of course keeps everyone sane. . . . Daphne and Greg are seriously interested in buying the Shapiros' house on McCarthy Road. We'll see . . . I'm writing this lying in bed in the Guest House, where Chrysanthi and I have migrated since Daphne's arrival. Filled now with my books, it is extraordinarily pleasant.

Saturday, August 19, 2000

Terpni

Dan Seeger arrived yesterday afternoon, fresh from Canadian Yearly Meeting and his move to Lumberton Leas. This morning Leander and I played the Thomson Synthetic Waltzes for him and he liked them well enough. We also did three of the Husa pieces. So Leander says, learn all of these and we'll see what is best next June. . . . Then we all went to Irv and Fran's, which Daphne and Greg are thinking of buying. And so they did, for about $300,000. We walked through the woods. Disappointing, because clearly lumbered recently (which Irv knew nothing about); lots of pine but not much else. In need of thinning rather than cutting at present. . . . Dan and I had lunch at the Caboose overlooking the Hudson, and the train arrived, full of tourists. In the afternoon we played our Satie, still OK, and Bizet (not so OK). Then guests began to arrive. The children had planned a 70th birthday/50th Terpni anniversary party for me. Fran and Irv, Mike and Laura, Art, Chris, and Arthur, Dan, Don Kurka. They made a feast: shrimp cocktail, prime ribs, corn, birthday cake (made by Christina and Sophia). Christina, the perfect little hostess, offered drinks. Don Kurka videotaped everyone on his superb digital camera and interviewed all the children regarding me, I fear. He'll send us the tape next week. Chrysanthi in her interview said all the important things: that she is so glad she had three children who like each other and get along, and five grandchildren who seem also to be friends. I stressed the role of the farm in the children's lives. All in all it was a lovely gesture on the children's part, although I don't feel 70.

August 30, 2000

Finished my "Odysseus Across the Centuries" lecture after reducing its length by about 30%. Sent Brenda's sample chapters off to Mercer University Press. Started reading submissions for the Elizabeth Constantindes Translation Prize. . . . Leander gave me a 1½ hour lesson on Thomson's "Synthetic Waltzes," with lots of helpful comments pertaining to Dan's part. I'm liking the piece more and more. . . . In the afternoon, Ross Morgan came, and Leander and I went with him to survey Shapiro's forest. Marie McCarthy drove up, thinking we were intruders, but we explained everything. We discovered some boundary lines, quite close to the house, and also considerable logging obviously directed by a forester, so presumably not on Irv's property. When we get the tax maps next week we should understand better precisely where the boundaries are. But on Irv's land there is lots of pine. Ross thought they could harvest $50,000 worth straightway. . . . Yesterday did lots of chipping. The new machine is a great addition.

August 31, 2000

Leander and I drove to Newcomb to meet the contractor Dan Turcott, who brought us to some homes he had renovated in an exclusive private development around a lake. The lots go for $48,000 each, 100-foot frontage, about one-half acre each. I knew Daphne would be happy. Beautiful work, including staircases. Maybe he can build one for us. . . . Did more trimming with the Stihl pole trimmer. . . . After supper, ice cream at the Caboose, getting to be a sort of ritual for us now.

Sunday, September 3, 2000

To Albany for Shandra Trautwein's wedding, performed by her minister, a very nice Christian service, tender and inoffensive. Brent was there, of course, to give her away, dressed in a tuxedo. I didn't recognize him; it's been 20 years, but as soon as we identified each other the old friendship resumed. Had time to speak also with Bob and Kelly Nestle and their daughter. And an interesting young man from India who will be entering an arranged marriage soon. Niki Trautwein, now a jazz saxophonist, supplied the music with his combo, and very well indeed. He told me he loves Kazantzakis.

To Don Kurka's on Garnet Lake for supper preceded by a long walk along the lake. While he cooked, Chrysanthi and I viewed the video he took at our celebration on August 19. Lovely. Besides pictures of Christina and the other grandchildren, he sequestered each of the three children plus Dan Seeger and interviewed them regarding their feelings toward me and the experience of growing up at Terpni. Of course they spoke movingly; indeed, I was embarrassed hearing their remarks. Interestingly, among other things, they all said that from me they learned how to work. Don also interviewed me, and Chrysanthi. I appreciated the fact that for 50 years we could spend our summers without television, radio, or newspapers. And how meaningful Terpni has been not just for me personally but for the entire family. Chrysanthi of course gave thanks for health, bodily and spiritually.

To Queensbury to sup with Mary and Maureen, followed by a long coffee at their home. Very pleasant, as always. Maureen wants to read Mann's Magic Mountain after listening to my description of it.

Thursday, September 7, 2000

Put my office away for the winter. And I'd finished extensive pruning of the plum and cherry trees and the apple tree a week or so ago. Now pruned the blueberries. Affixed shutters, etc. It's sad to close the place, but part of our accustomed yin-yang existence.

To Hanover

Drained the water, including the pipe that I couldn't do last year and that presumably caused the frozen pipe. Breakfast at McDonald's. In Hanover, picked up Quaker treasurer's mail, Sanborn mail, xeroxed Joyce's chart for Washington, sent everything by Fed Ex. . . . To Kendal for supper with Mother, who looked fine but was very closed within herself, as always. We showed pictures of family from the summer.

To Cape May Point

Flew to Philadelphia. Exiting the plane onto the tarmac was like going outdoors in Indonesia: into an oven. . . . Drove to Cape May Point. First session of the Pendle Hill staff retreat was very lively owing to two fine facilitators, a white male married to a black female. The subject was diversity. But the main benefit I think was the relaxed atmosphere in which the full staff and some trustees could listen to each other and appreciate the generic seeking involved. . . . I walked down to the beach afterwards on this moonlit night. Calm sea, gentle breakers, skimmers (birds) pecking away to bring out tiny creatures just below the surface of the sand. Old houses ca. 1875 everywhere; a peaceful setting.

Monday, September 11, 2000

Another session with the facilitators. Then a free afternoon, but Steve Baumgartner wanted to meet with me, so we spent a half hour together and then Gay Berger wanted to be briefed on Rebecca's failure to communicate, apparently, with Van der Merwe in South Africa (Rebecca told me that her computer was down for three weeks, but surely she could have used someone else's). After supper, skits and songs, including one that Rebecca cooked up for me and herself and two others: a simulated Publications Committee meeting in which the committee differed diametrically on a manuscript and we resolved the difference by consulting an oracle: a fish that sings. My part was to condemn the submissions' fancy language by using even fancier language myself in support of plain talk! This got some good laughs from the audience. A jolly time. There was even a song by Doug Gwyn, recorded from a previous year. And of course Sandra (now no longer living with Sue Morrison) sang a fervent song in Spanish.

Lumberton-Princeton

Steve Baumgartner initiated us into his strategic planning process. I was assigned to the "Stewardship of the Faith" discussion group and made a speech about faith based on truth, including scientific truth, and perhaps the realization that everything is materialistic, so that the older concepts of spirit and soul are no longer valid. . . . After lunch I drove to Dan Seeger's, stopping at Atlantic City out of curiosity. I went into Caesar's and Bally's: hundreds if not thousands of slot machines with addicts engrossed. In Caesar's also blackjack and roulette. An amazing sight. The boardwalk was crowded. Huge hotels to house the gamblers. I was glad to leave. . . . Dan's new house in Lumberton is lovely—large rooms, light-filled, nicely designed. He of course has devised ingenious ways to house his computer, TV, etc. We played Thomson's "Synthetic Waltzes" and Husa, not badly for the first try. He gave me a tour of the area, including the infamous airport that threatens to extend its runway. And he cooked a dinner for the two of us: a roast, couscous, vegetables. And a splendid pastry (boughten) for dessert. We're planning subsequent meetings already. . . . Got to Princeton at 10:45 p.m. Couldn't get into Palmer House because the phone to the Security Office was broken. Walked there. Finally got in by 11:30 p.m.

Princeton

Good session with Dimitri, who did a careful vetting of Appendix C & D. Over lunch we discussed the MGSA agenda, committee structure, symposium arrangements, etc., then returned for more work on Greek Today. Saw Theano's cover but didn't like it. Dimitri is going to pay $5000 of my rent in spring term, in exchange for which I'll deposit $5000 in the Greek Fund at Dartmouth and pay Θεανώ. Afterwards, we started designing mandates for MGSA committees. . . . Then to Mike Keeley's to talk about the Farm School. He says that David Buck's reliance on Barry Fieckman is deeply resented by the Greeks. Mike also wonders who'll be the next board chair. Mimi wants it but is a dictator. Drackus wants it but doesn't seem too smart. Best would be John Cleave. Mike even suggested me. Horrors! Then he, Mary, Dimitri, and I went to a nice pizza place, packed with very un-college-like Princeton inhabitants, for a leisurely supper.

Thursday, September 14, 2000

Princeton

Continued with Dimitri writing mandates. Met Don Skemer accidentally in Firestone and sat with him for an hour while he had lunch. He had returned recently from Greece—Metemora, etc. He is not concerned if we extend the ten-year prohibition period for MGSA archives. . . . Got Valtinos's Στοιχεία για τη δεκαετία του '60 so that I can see the Greek while I review the English for WLT. . . . To lunch at the Annex with Mache (pregnant again) and Φιλοθέη Κολίτση, whom I'd known both in Thessaloniki and Cambridge. She's now a fellow at Princeton for the year, a very sweet young lady. . . . A bit more with Dimitri, then drove to Philadelphia for supper with Alec, Monica, and a rather restless Theo. Alec has had a good beginning at school despite a leaking roof (which actually helps bind people together). Monica is infinitely patient with Theo, as always. . . . Overnight at Pendle Hill.

Pendle Hill

After Meeting, Richard Barnes interviewed me for Steve Baumgartner's Strategic Plan. Two hours, very pleasant, because the questions drew out many good memories about my religious life in general and my association with Pendle Hill in particular. I stressed the need for a Quaker theology consistent with “Truth” as it is now understood. And the need for Quaker-based communities. . . . Then a long long lunch with Rebecca about publications policy, especially her desire to integrate Paul Raso’s forum publications into the overall publications program. Steve wants to increase publications and also to hire a professional to supplement (replace?) Rebecca. . . . Then a haircut. Then ice cream in the mall. . . . The board meeting was my first as recording secretary, so I sat behind my computer. Easy agenda. The best will come tomorrow.

Saturday, September 16, 2000

Today’s board was extraordinary. Steve has created a very new atmosphere of forthrightness, clear speaking, honesty. He led us through difficult questions: What we really think Pendle Hill’s mission is? Who do we really serve? What do we really think about the resident program, the week-long courses, the extension program? What inhibits change? Most of the time was spent on the resident program, the consensus being that it doesn’t work and must be either abolished or radically changed. Good. I mentioned the case of Fircroft College in Birmingham, whose governors closed it for several years, firing all personnel, while they redesigned it. Steve is determined to do something. He agreed with me that, to some extent, we have been “held hostage” by the core teachers and that a new diversity of subject matter and personnel is needed. But Bill Newman is convinced that there are no longer enough people who can come for 10, 20, or 30 weeks, and pay. We hope he’s wrong—that by redesigning the program we can make it work.

AMTRAK to Washington. Supper leisurely in Union Station. Then to Kennedy Center to meet Deanna and attend a most wonderful concert by the National Symphony, devoted entirely to Beethoven’s Ninth Symphony as orchestrated by Mahler. In the first part, Leonard Slatkin explained, with numerous musical examples played by the orchestra, exactly what Mahler did and why he did it: added more instruments, rewrote parts for horns, trombones, and flute, all of which were limited in Beethoven’s day compared to Mahler’s (e.g. horns could not play a chromatic scale), made adjustments so that melodic voices could be better heard, etc. In each case, Beethoven’s original was played first, then Mahler’s revision, the difference always obvious. Then, after an interval, the orchestra did the entire 9th. It was stirring and of course especially the final movement with soloists and chorus. At the end, the audience exploded and rose as one body to its feet to give a prolonged standing ovation, something I've never experienced before. . . . Sorry I'll miss the Balanchine ballets tomorrow, but they're sold out. Drove home with Deanna, who is now teaching a student, a sixteen-year-old Romanian boy who is being subsidized by the National Symphony's endowment for this purpose. How nice!

North Potomac

Lovely, excited greeting by Sophia: Pappou! But Nicholas seems not to have remembered me, which is OK, given his tender age. Deanna outdid herself for breakfast: bacon and French toast. Leander gave me another fine lesson on the Synthetic Waltzes, on his beautifully rebuilt piano.

Washington

We delivered Sophia to her play-school at 9:00 a.m. She went in without objection or hesitation, contrary to last year's behavior. Metro to Dupont Circle. Left my luggage at the Cosmos Club; took the Georgetown University shuttle to the campus. Conferred at length with Jim Alatis's assistant, Ai-Hui Tam, a lovely Singaporean. Then met with Jim, toured the various auditoriums and restaurants that we may use for our MGSA symposium next year. After lunch at the Faculty Club, met with sales agent at the convention center, which has everything we need but is very expensive. I then taxied to a local hotel to see about rooms there and a possible banquet. Back to the Cosmos Club. Supper with Ann and Sperry Lea, Jim and Marge Warren. Greg Nagy arrived in time, from Cambridge, where he commutes to teach once a week, to introduce me very exaggeratedly saying that I was responsible for the addition of Modern Greek to Harvard (!). Very friendly indeed. Amazing to see Lelia Washburn again. Jim and Penny Alatis came as did Senator and Mrs. Sarbanes and Ambassador Philou, so this was really quite a grand affair. My lecture, "Odysseus Across the Centuries," apparently went well. Ann said it was the best they'd ever had. Lots of questions afterward, most of which I could answer, more or less. Then I was able to sit with Greg for a few moments. Asked about Meg's book, why the long delay. He said it was mostly Meg's fault: her alcoholism and "that dreadful man," Michael, who has removed her from the academic world. But the book will probably be published soon. He surprised me by remembering my suggestion that we collaborate on a festschrift for Meg. We'll talk further after the conference on ritual in the spring. I asked him as well about the 2nd person used with Eumaeus in Book XII of the Odyssey. Kelly Nestle had asked me at Shandra's wedding. He said it's a locution used for oracles and gods, and shows that Eumaeus is much more than a simple swineherd.

AMTRAK

Long trip by train from Union Station to White River Junction—11 hours. Did more copyediting of Brenda's deficient prose and some corrections in Greek Today. And read some more in Valtinos's novel, which continues to be fascinating.

Saturday, September 23, 2000

Chrysanthi went to New York on Thursday to babysit this weekend while Greg and Daphne go to Petra Schumann's wedding in San Jose, California. I had a good evening of music with Dick—some new pieces that he discovered, and Prokofiev's sonata, lovely but hard. There's a Beethoven that I hope we'll do with Allan next week, also. . . . Out of the blue, I've been invited to Australia to give the keynote address at the MGSAAZ conference there, November 23–26. I think that Stylianos is chiefly responsible, although the invitation came from Vrasidas Karalis, head of department. I'll go, and will miss Thanksgiving at Leander's.

Monday, September 25, 2000

Visited UPNE. They're very negative, refusing to take the revisions I'd prepared. Said all revisions must be done after copyediting, by hand. Ugh!

Tuesday, September 26, 2000

Had lipid profile done yesterday. My cholesterol is up again to 225. Not bad, but not good. Gerber wants me to resume the Lipitor drug, which I'll do after we return from Greece. Chrysanthi returned on AMTRAK at 6:30 and we went directly to John and Mary's for supper. John in good form, exulting in the new office he created by adding a room. He expects to continue forever, it seems.

Wednesday, September 27, 2000

Jim Sharpe and John Bodnar from Paine Webber are trying to help us avoid death taxes. They suggest a "CRUD" trust, enabling a large sum to go to charity, thus decreasing the estate and producing a sizable tax deduction plus annual income of, say, 8% of the principal, for life. Added to that could be a Bien Public Foundation, enabling the children to continue to give to charity after our deaths, and life insurance, which would pay to the children the equivalent of what we removed from the estate, but without tax consequences for them (although we'd need to pay high annual premiums). Let's wait to see who is elected on November 7, Gore or Bush, since that will affect the disposition of the estate tax.

September 28, 2000

Meetings all day today. First, Webster Performance Series Committee over breakfast. Sally Pinkas charming and vivacious, as always. Lisa Mayer has already booked the entire year, so we're fine. I contributed two programs, one by the thirteen-year-old child prodigy I heard in the hospital last year, another by Mrs. Shin. Next, lunch at the Dickey Center with the new War/Peace Fellows, a lovely group of about 15 students, including Alexios Monopoulos. Each one recited briefly what brought him or her to want to be a Fellow. What a fine group! For the first time, I feel saddened that I've lost contacts with young people, but perhaps I'll have some in the future. Alexios wants me to advise him in setting up a War/Peace Studies minor. Afterwards, Ron Edsforth expressed his delight at the turnout and thanked me profusely for having invited him to take over the introductory course. He's now coordinating the entire program. We're very fortunate, for his heart and soul are dedicated to this endeavor. . . . Finally a private meeting with Tom Corindia at the Meeting House to prepare for the finance committee plus trustees' meeting on Monday to clarify how we're going to finance the reconstruction. Tom prepared excellent tables showing the consequences of various strategies over a ten-year period.

To New York

Lovely flight to LaGuardia, including the circling of Manhattan on this beautifully clear day. We flew down the Hudson, then over the Statue of Liberty, and back along the East River, affording the best view of this unbelievable city that I've ever experienced. . . . Three hours with Daphne, Greg, and the children, including supper (Vietnamese take-out). I brought them English cheese—double Gloucester and Wensleydale. Christina and Andrew all smiles, laughter, and unquenchable vitality. But Andrew still doesn't really talk, although he understands much. Daphne is discouraged by all the fuss necessary for Christina to be accepted to kindergarten next year, including interviews with the child plus both parents (requiring Greg to miss work). Among other places,, they're looking at Friends Seminary. But they still hope to move to New Jersey if they can find a house in Rumson or vicinity.

I read over my "Kazantzakis's Attitude Toward Hitler in the 1930s and 1940s," prepared for JMGAAZ, but also part of my volume 2 of Politics of the Spirit. Over the last two weeks I had laboriously entered the extensive quotes. Now it reads very well indeed. I was very pleased by the writing.

Princeton

Comfortably housed in Palmer House again for our MGSA Executive Board meeting today and tomorrow. Today's meeting went well; we made progress especially on the symposium and its venue. Then there was a nice reception, still in Palmer House, after which John and Nancy Iatrides, Victor Papacosma, Jerry Augustinos, and Mike and Mary Keeley, and I went to the Nassau Inn for a leisurely supper, where I was able to bring Mike up to date on our deliberations.

Sunday, October 1, 2000

Princeton–New York City

A very useful morning meeting where we went over the entire committee structure holistically, making many changes. Also began to think of an updating of Stratos Constantindis's bibliography. Then I drove to Manhattan with John and Nancy, who left me at the Columbia University subway, 116th and Broadway.

Wednesday, October 4, 2000

Took Alexios Monopoulos to lunch. He's a sophomore who wants to minor in Peace Studies in addition to completing a geography-modified major by the end of his junior year so that he can be a Senior Fellow in his final year. Wow! And he has already done a research project in Greece, all on his laptop, which he foolishly packed in checked luggage, whereupon it was stolen. But how nice to see a student like this at Dartmouth!

Thursday, October 5, 2000

Dickey reception for faculty. Professor Joseph is returning. I worked with his wife Jennifer for years on English 1–2 and Intensive Academic Support. It will be nice to see her again. How good that through the Dickey Center I still have this connection with Dartmouth! And I saw Rosemary Rieser on Tuesday at the Laasperes' for dinner: memories of Leonard, John C. Baker, Elise Boulding and all we did together to get Peace Studies started and to keep it going.

Saturday, October 7, 2000

Zürich–Athens

Long layover in Zürich, where we enjoyed the food and especially the French-style coffee. Arrived late in Athens and alas one of our two checked valises didn't arrive, happily Chrysanthi's, with clothing only, and not mine, which has all the books I need for teaching. With luck the valise will arrive . . . sometime.

Hotel Fenixs (Phoenix)

Η Θεανώ had a family emergency. I'll see her next Saturday. But Aspasia came, with Christos. We went to the πλατεία to a tavern and had a nice leisurely lunch. I learned that Aspasia είναι φιλόλογος και διδάσκει σε ένα γυμνάσιο στις Ελευσίνες, που πρέπει κάθε μέρα να πηγαίνει με τ' αυτοκίνητό της μια ώρα, ή δύο αν έχει κίνηση. Πρέπει να γράψω έναν σύντομο πρόλογο για την ελληνική έκδοση του βιβλίου μου. Της είπα και να περιμένει κάποτε έναν 2<sup>ον</sup> τόμο. Από το Χρήστο μάθαμε με λεπτομέρειες την πρόοδο για την υπόθεση των αυτιστικών. Θα κτιστούν τώρα δύο-τρία σπίτια, το ένα στα Γιάννινα, το άλλο στον Βόλο, με πιθανότητα ότι και άλλα θα κτιστούν. Και ο Χρήστος είναι τώρα διάσημος στον κόσμο ετούτο. Π.χ. είναι ο μόνος από την Ελλάδα που πήρε πρόσκληση να πάει σε ένα διεθνές συμπόσιο στο Washington, και μεθαύριο θα πάει για άλλα συμπόσια στη Γαλλία. Είχε βγάλει και 5-6 βιβλιοράκια για τους αυτιστικούς. Και συνεχίζει να εκδίνει το περιοδικό Θέματα λογοτεχνίας που λέει η Τζίνα Πολίτη ότι είναι το κορυφαίο λογοτεχνικό περιοδικό. Είναι και 70 χρονώ, όπως είμαι κι εγώ. Μάθαμε επίσης για την μεγάλη περιπέτειά του να μεταφέρει τον Παύλο στην Αγγλία. Έπρεπε σιγά-σιγά να ετοιμάσει το γιο για την αλλαγή, με φωτογραφίες από το ίδρυμα που θα πήγαινε, νότια από το Birmingham, ακόμα με ένα βίντεο δείχνοντας τους κάτοικους, το περιβάλλον, κτλ. Πάντως, όταν ήρθε πια η μέρα αναχώρησης ο Παύλος δεχόταν στην αρχή αλλά στο τραίνο από το Βόλο ξαφνικά αντιστάθηκε βιαίως, σκληρίζοντας τόσα δυνατά που όλος ο κόσμος έφυγε από το βαγόνι. Ύστερα κάλμαρε πάλι, ώστε κατάφερε ο Χρήστος να τον φέρει στην Αγγλία, οπού τώρα είναι σχετικά ευχαριστημένος. . . Ύστερα μας πήγε η Ασπασία στο Σύνταγμα, για να δοκιμάσουμε το καινούργιο Μετρό. Οι αποβάθρες (platforms) είναι πανόμορφες, όλα μάρμαρα, και στολισμένες με τα ευρήματα των ανασκαφών. Πήγαμε στο σπίτι του Χρήστου για να δούμε την Έρη και την Ασπασία-Μαρία, που μεγάλωσε πολύ και μπήκε τώρα στην πρώτη γυμνασίου, στο Αρσάκιον. Μιλάει πολύ αθηναϊκά. Η Έρη μου είπε ότι ο Ροϊλός, που διδάσκει τώρα στο Harvard, ήταν δικός της φοιτητής. Ο Χρήστος μου έδωσε μια καινούργια μετάφραση των άρθρων του George Thomson και μου διάβασε δύο σελίδες από το άρθρο του πάνω στην «Τέταρτη διάσταση» του Ρίτσου, που μοιάζει, όπως φαίνεται, με τη Σιγή του Καζαντζάκη και νομίζω και του Beckett. Θα ήταν ωραίο να συνεργαστούμε, γράφοντας ένα πιο πλήρες άρθρο πάνω σ' αυτό το θέμα. Ίσως θα εκδόσει τη διάλεξη που ετοιμάζω τώρα για το Αριστοτέλειο Πανεπιστήμιο πάνω στην Οδύσεια του Καζαντζάκη.

Ξέχασα να γράψω ότι στην πτήση από τη Zürich ο διπλανός μας ήταν ένας καθηγητής καλσσικών σπουδών στην Κύπρο. Μιλήσαμε ωραία για δυο ώρες, στ' ελληνικά εννοείται. Και όταν φτάσαμε στην Αθήνα είχαμε άλλη περιπέτεια αφού μία από τις δύο αποσκευές δεν ήρθε. Ευτυχώς αυτή που ήρξε ήταν η δική μου, με τα βιβλία μου. Της Χρυσάνθης είχε μονάχα ρούχα, αλλά και φάρμακα και δώρα. Συμπληρώσαμε ένα χαρτί, και φτάσαμε στο ξενοδοχείο στις 2:00 το πρωί. Και την Κυριακή δεν ήρξε. Φεύγοντας από του Χρήστου, πήγαμε ξανά στο ανατολικό αεροδρόμιο και μιλήσαμε με τον κατάλληλο άνθρωπο, ένας πολύ καλός τύπος που φροντίζει αν και δεν περιμένει να μας ξαναδεί.

Αθήνα—Θεσσαλονίκη

Στο ρεσεψιόν μάθαμε ότι η βαλίτσα η χαμένη είχε φτάσει. Ωραία. Μάθαμε επίσης ότι η Ολυμπιακή Αεροπορία θά 'χει απεργία, αλλά ευτυχώς όχι σήμερα. Θά 'ρχισε αύριο. Επίσης προβλέποναι καταιγίδες στα βόρεια μέρη. Θα φτάσουμε στη Θεσσαλονίκη σήμερα; Στο αεροδρόμιο ακούσαμε ότι η πτήση μας θα έχει καθυστέρηση λόγω καθυστερημένη άφιξη του αεροσκάφου. Έτσι περιμέναμε. Στην Ελλάδα πρέπει νά 'χεις υπομονή και γαλήνη. Πετάξαμε επιτέλους και προσγηωθήκαμε μέσα στη βροχή και μαύρα σύννεφα, αλλά εν τάξει. Μας περίμεναν και ο Πώργος και ο Οδυσσεάς και η Βούλη. Η Βούλη μας πήρε στη Σχολή, στο

Cincinnati Hall. Το βράδι όλοι οι σύμβουλοι πήγαν για φαγητό στο σπίτι του Γιάννη Βεζύρογλου στο Πανόραμα, πολυτελέστατο. Είδα εκεί και τον Καθηγητή Κολιόπουλο, τον ιστορικό, και τη γυναίκα του, που διεύθυνε την αμερικανική βιβλιοθήκη.

American Farm School

Κάθε μέρα πηγαίνω στη σύναξη (assembly) των παιδιών στις 7:45 π.μ. Αρχίζει με ένα χωριό του Ευαγγελίου στο πρωτότυπο, ύστερα στ' αγγλικά. Μετά έχουν έναν ύμνο και μια προσευχή. Ύστερα, ένας μαθητής μιλάει πάνω σ' ένα θέμα—π.χ. το χωριό του, τη τατουάζ (tattooing), τα καράβια, τον μακεδονικόν αγώνα. Τελευταία, ο διευθυντής σχολείου ο Σωκράτης Αδαμίδης μιλάει για το πρόγραμμα της ημέρας. . . . Σήμερα εμείς οι σύμβουλοι αρχίσαμε το workshop μας, ακούγοντας μια καλή παρουσίαση από το αμερικανικό πρόξενο, τον John Koenig, πάνω στην τριτοβάθμια εκπαίδευση στην Ελλάδα. Τεράστια προβλήματα. Και αβεβαιότητα για το μέλλον. Έπειτα είδαμε τον καινούργιο ξενώνα του κολλεγίου, την προωρινή βιβλιοθήκη και το χώρο στον δεύτερο όροφο του Princeton Hall που ετοιμάζεται για την καινούργια βιβλιοθήκη.

Wednesday, October 11, 2000

Τη πρωί ακούσαμε μια κυρία που είναι Consultant for EU Affairs of the National Employment Service να μιλήσει για το εκπαιδευτικό σύστημα και τη δυνατότητα ή μη-δυνατότητα των αποφοίτων να βρουν θέση. Στο τέλος είπε ότι δυστυχώς το σύστημα ετοιμάζει τους μαθητές και φοιτητές για συγκεκριμένες θέσεις αλλά οι συνθήκες αλλάζουν και εξελίσσονται τόσα γρήγορα που σε λίγα χρόνια αυτά που έμαθαν δεν ισχύουν πια. Έτσι έπρεπε να μάθουν «πώς να μάθουν». Ύστερα την πλησίασα εγώ και της είπα, «Στην ψυχή σας είστε αμερικανίδα». . . . Ύστερα υπήρξε άλλη σύναξη όπου ο Σωκράτης Αδαμίδης σύστησε εμάς, τους συμβούλους, με λίγα λόγια να προσπαθήσουμε να εξηγήσουμε τη σημασία του όρου “trustee.” Φάγαμε το μεσημερινό με το προσωπικό. Ο δάσκαλος της θεολογίας, που ήρθε προ τριών χρονών στη διάλεξή μου, κάθισε πλάι. Το απόγευμα με τον Αδαμίδη πήγαμε σ' ένα χωριό με δύο μαθητές να δούμε την οικογένειά τους. Ήταν εκεί ο παππούς, η μαμά, που προσέφερε γλυκιά και καφέδες, ο θείος, και ο πατέρας. Ο δε πατέρας μίλησε με πάθος εναντίον της γεωργίας. Δεν μπορεί, λέει, να τα βγάλει πέρα. Η ελπίδα του είναι να πουλήσει τα χωράφια για βίλες! Δεν είχαν βροχή και ξεράθηκαν τα προϊόντα. Απ' την άλλη μεριά, προσέξαμε ότι έχει τεράστια τρακτέρ και combine. Μου είπε ότι όλες οι μηχανές είναι πληρομένες· δεν χρωστάει τίποτε. Επίσης δύο εργάτες έβαλαν πλακάκια στο εξώτοιχο του σπιτιού—δηλ. δεν ήταν παμφτωχός. Ύστερα ο Αδαμίδης μας εξήγησε ότι είχε κερδήσει αρκετά λεφτά αυτός ο γεωργός σε δύο δεκαετίες και υπέφερε μόνο τα τελευταία χρόνια. Το χωριό πριν από τριάντα χρόνια ήταν πολύ φτωχό και δεν είχε νερό. Το πηγάδι ήταν ενάμισο χιλιόμετρο μακριά και έπρεπε να κουβαλήσουν όλα το νερό τους από εκεί. Ο πληθυσμός είναι μεικτός. Πολλοί ήρθαν από τη Μικρασία στα '22· άλλοι είναι Βλάχοι, κτλ. Λέει ότι όλοι τώρα ενώθηκαν, είναι όλοι Έλληνες! . . . Το βράδι πήγαμε όλοι στο μέγαρο του Σταύρου Κωνσταντινίδη, παμπλούσιο με πελώριο πισίνα, ζωγραφίες παντού, κτλ. Μας έδειξαν το καινούργιο βίντιο της σχολής που ήταν η ευθύνη της Randy—παραπολύ επαγγελματικό, μα χωρίς συνοχή, όλο κομμάτι-κομμάτι, αλλά όμορφο. Είχαμε δει ένα άλλο βίντιο που το έκαναν οι άνθρωποι της Marshall Plan το 1950, όχι πολύ επαγγελματικό αλλά δείχνει χίλιες φορές καλύτερα ακριβώς τι κάνουν και τι μαθαίνουν τα παιδιά.

Στη σύναξη ένας μαθητής μίλησε για το τατουάζ. Τότε ο David Willis μας εξήγησε τι πρόκειται να κάνει με τα τρία κιλά σκουλήκια που έφερε από την Αμερική τα οποία θα βοηθήσουν να κάνουν compost από τα manure του κτήματος. Συνεδρίασε η επιτροπή της δευτεροβάθμιας εκπαίδευσης με πρόεδρο τον Γιάννη Βεζύρογλου—με εμένα, τον John Cleave, τον John Crunkilton και τον David Acker. Αποφασίσαμε να μην πανικοβληθούμε λόγω της απουσίας φοιτητών στο Κολλέγιο, αλλά να συστήσουμε έναν καλύτερο τρόπο ώστε να βρεθούν φοιτητές και στην Ελλάδα και στα Βαλκανικές χώρες. Οι ξένοι χρειάζονται υποτροφίες. Χθες σε μια συνεδρίαση εγώ είπα ότι θα δώσω $5500 αμέσως, που φτάνει για έναν χρόνο. Το απόγευμα, στη συνεδρίαση του Development Committee, μίλησα για το «βιβλίο» της Marder, πως το έστειλα στο Mercer University Press, πως άρχισα να το copyedit, κτλ. Ευτυχώς έχουμε $9000 για το βιβλίο. Το βράδι φάγαμε barbecue μπροστά στο Princeton Hall και κοιτάξαμε τους χορούς των παιδιών, παραπολύ ωραία. Και χορέψαμε και εμείς το καλαματιανό και στο τέλος-τέλος το «τρίβω το πιπέρι»!

Συνεδρίαση όλων των συμβόλων. Μίλησα πάλι για το βιβλίο, και όταν ο Παύλος Κοντέλης είπε πως χάνει η Σχολή το «πνεύμα» που είχε, είπα ότι πάντα ακούμε τέτοια παράπονα, και ίσως δικαιολογημένα, όταν ιδρύματα αλλάζουν, και δε μπορούν να ξαναγυρίσουν στις συνθήκες μιας περασμένης εποχής. Στη 1:00 η ώρα όλος ο κόσμος αναχώρισε για το Κτήμα Ζάννα. Και τι μεγάλη διαφορά είδαμε εκεί από τα ερείπια που είχαμε δει πριν από δύο χρόνια. . . . Το βράδι ήρθε ο Δημήτρης Γουνελάς και μας πήρε στο διαμέρισμά μας, 29 Μεγ. Αλεξάνδρου, πάλι στον 3<sup>ο</sup> όροφο, ακριβώς εκεί που είμασταν στα 1998.

Athens, Hotel Andromeda, 641-5000

Πετάξαμε όλοι με Aegean Air. Μας μετέφεραν με πουλμάν στο Ξενοδοχείο Ανδρόμεδα, δίπλα στο σπίτι του αμερικανού πρέσβη και κοντά στη Πρεσβεία. Από εκεί, στο Μουσείο Μπενάκη, που τώρα είναι τετραπλάσιο. Ένας ξεναγός μας οδήγησε χρονολογικά από την προϊστορική εποχή μέχρι σήμερα, σε 60 λεπτά! Έχουν φωτογραφίες μεγάλων ποιητών του εικοστού αιώνα: τους Παλαμά, Καβάφη, Σικελιανό, Σεφέρη, Ελύτη, και Ρίτσο. Ο Πάννης Βεζύρογλου μου είπε, όταν έδειξα τη χαρά μου και την έκπληξη ότι και ο Ρίτσος συμπεριλαμβάνεται, ότι λάθος κάνουν, επειδή ο Ρίτσος δεν ήταν υπέροχος ποιητής! Φάγαμε στο εστιατόριο του μουσείου, στον ύπαιθρο. Τότε πήγαμε με τη Χρυσάνθη στο Χίλτον όπου ήρθε και η Θεανώ Πετρίδου να μας δείξει τις ζωγραφιές της για το Greek Today, προπαντός το καινούργιο εξώφυλλο, διορθωμένο από το προηγούμενο, που δε μου πολυάρεσε. Και αυτή η δεύτερη εκδοχή πάλι δεν είναι ό,τι χρειάζεται. Θα προσπαθήσει ξανά να μικραίνει τα γράμματα και να μεγαλώσει το σκίτσο του Μητρόπουλου. Χαριτομένη κοπέλα. . . . Στις 8:00 η ώρα όλοι οι σύμβουλοι πήγαν στο “residence” του πρέσβη, του Nicholas Burns. Παραπολύ προσιτός άνθρωπος, νέος, όλο χαμόγελο. Είδα στη βιβλιοθήκη του τη δική μου μετάφραση της «Ζωή εν τάφω». Του την έδειξε και μου είπε πως τη διάβασε με πολύ ενδιαφέρον. Είδα και μια ανθολογία του Πλάτωνα με επιμέλεια του Raphael Demos και του εξήγησα ότι ο Demos ήταν ο καθηγητής μου στο Harvard για τον Πλάτωνα και τον Αριστοτέλη. Αυτό το βιβλίο ανήκει στη Κυρία Burns· το χρησιμοποίησε στο πανεπιστήμιό της. Στο φαγητό ο Burns μίλησε ωραία για την Κυρία Labouisse και τον άντρα της, και αυτή, που είναι 96 χρονώ, σηκώθηκε και μίλησε ωραία. Εγώ ήμουν πλάι στη Shelly Crunkilton, που φαίνεται να ξέρει για εκδοτικά πράγματα και θέλει να μας βοηθήσει σχετικά με το βιβλίο της Brenda.

Athens-Thessaloniki

Περίπατο στη γειτονιά με τη Χρυσάνθη. Ωραία γειτονιά, με πάρκο, συντριβάνι, σχολεία, και το νεο Μέγαρο Μουσικής κοντά. Τότε πήγαμε όλοι στο σπίτι του Παύλου Κοντέλη κοντά στο στάδιο. Με καταπληκτική θέα στη βεράντα: η Ακρόπολις και ο Παρθενώνας απέναντι, ο Φιλοπάππας στο βάθος. Γάγαμε εκεί. Ήρθαν και ο Bruce και η Tad. Ο Bruce μας διήγησε μερικές ιστορίες του Hodja. Μίλησα πολύ με τη Tad. Ο Bruce γέρασε πολύ αλλά στέκεται ακόμα, πάει στη Bosnia και στην Αλβανία, διανέμει εκεί το καινούργιο του βιβλίο. Όταν έφυγαν οι περισσότεροι, μείναμε εμείς που επρόκειτο να επιστρέψουμε στη Θεσ/νίκη, δηλ. Ο Γιάννης Βεζύρογλου, ο Σταύρος Κωνσταντινίδης, η Άννη Λέβη. Και συνέχισε η κουβέντα για τη Σχολή με τον Παύλο Κοντέλη για δύο ώρες. Ανησυχούν πολύ. Ξαναρχίσαμε την ίδια κουβέντα και στο αεροδρόμιο, που έπρεπε να περιμένουμε δύο ώρες. Φτάσαμε επιτέλους με τη Χρυσάνθη στο διαμέρισμά μας, τακτοποιηθήκαμε, βγήκαμε για καφέ, και κοιμηθήκαμε παρ' όλο το θόρυβο από τη λεωφόρο δίπλα και τα σκυλιά.

Thessaloniki

Άρχισα αμέσως. Η ώρα 9:00 το πρωί στο Παν/μιο. Έλαβα το κλειδί του γραφείου μου, εκείνου που το είχε ο Δημήτρης (τώρα έχει πιο μεγάλο). Συνάντηση με τον Παναγιώτη Μουλλά και τη κυρία Χρύση, τη γραμματέα. Πήρα και τα χρήματα για τη διάλεξή μου (που θα γίνει την 1<sup>η</sup> Νοεμβρίου). Το βράδι πήγαμε περίπατο στην παραλία με τον Οδυσσέα και την Ελένη. Μιλήσαμε για τον Αντρέα (του Γιώργου), ο οποίος δεν έχει δουλειά σαν δικηγόρος και φαίνεται να παθαίνει ξανά από νευρική ασθένια. Τους περιέγραψα το κείμενο που μου είχε στείλει, όλο για το θάνατο και την αυτοκτονία, και στο σημείωμα προς εμένα τόνισε πως το κείμενο είναι «αυτοβιογραφικό». Η παρέα του είναι αναρχιστές. Ο Οδυσσέας είπε, πολύ σωστά, πως φταίει ο Γιώργος επειδή το ζόρισε το παιδί να παρατήσει μια καριέρα στο θέατρο ως ηθοποιός για να σπουδάσει τα νομικά. Κρίμα.

Tuesday, October 17, 2000

Πάλι στη Σχολή. Η γραμματέας με βοήθησε να γράψω στη Τράπεζα American Express, που το κατάστημα στη Θεσ/νίκη έκλεισε, να πάρω τα χρήματά μας από την Αθήνα. Τότε ο Τάσος, που ξέρει για υπολογιστές, έβαλε software στο κομπιούτερ μου ώστε να πάρω ημείλ εδώ. Τότε ο David Willis με δάνεισε το κινητό του τηλέφωνο. Έφαγα ένα σάντουιτς με τον Everett και τη Brenda στο ωραίο σπίτι που τους έδωσαν. Ο Everett θέλει παραπολύ να διοριστεί ως διευθυντής του Fulbright στην Αθήνα αλλά ξέρει ότι και ο Bill McGrew ζητάει να διοριστεί και αυτός. Τελευταία πήγα στο γραφείο της Randy Warner και κάθισα εκεί τρεις ώρες με τη Randy και τη Brenda συζητώντας το «βιβλίο». Το βράδι, πάλι στην παραλία με τον Οδυσσέα και την Ελένη. Για πρώτη φορά, ο Οδυσσέας μιλούσε για τους Γερμανούς και για το εμφύλιο. Άρχισε στη νομική σχολή, λέει, και έγινε εργάτης. Θυμόταν ότι ήταν πρώτος στο στίβο, πριν έρθουν οι εισβολείς. Έτρεξε, νίκησε, και αμέσως λιποθύμισε από την κούραση. Όταν έβαλαν οι Γερμανοί τους γονείς και τη Χρυσάνθη στη φυλακή, ο λόγος ήταν αυτός, είπε.

Wednesday, October 18, 2000

Πήγα στο παν/μιο για office hours: 10:00 με 1:00, κάθε Τετάρτη. Και ήρθε ένας φοιτητής· έμεινε δύο ώρες. Ο Frank Bretschneider, ένας Γερμανός που τον είχα γνωρίσει και στα 1998 και που προσπαθεί να γράψει μια διατριβή πάνω στις ομηρικές επιρροές στην καζαντζακική Οδύσεια. Δύσκολο! Θα μπορέσω να τον βοηθήσω, και άρχισα κιόλας. . . . Προσπάθησα να συνδέσω το ημείλ αλλά η γραμμή πάντοτε ήταν απασχολημένη. Πήρα εισιτήρια για μια συναυλία μεθαύριο. Πήγα στο πρακτορείο για το κινητό, που δεν δουλεύει καλά. Έφτασα αρκετά κουρασμένος στο Makedonia Palace, που ήρθε και η Χρυσάνθη, και πήγαμε για pizza.

Thursday, October 19, 2000

Θα μιλήσω στο Anatolia College πάνω στο Odysseus Across the Centuries στις 30 Οκτωβρίου. Πρέπει να ετοιμάσω την ελληνική μου διάλεξη στο πανεπιστήμιο, 1<sup>η</sup> Νοεμβρίου, πάνω στην Οδύσεια του Καζαντζάκη. Θα χρησιμοποιήσω ως βάση το κεφάλαιο 8 του Politics of the Spirit, μεταφρασμένο από την Ασπασία, αλλά το κείμενο θέλει αρκετή δουλειά για να γίνει κατάλληλο για μια διάλεξη. Ο Bob Chatel, που διδάσκει “humanities” στο American College of Thessaloniki (= Anatolia) ήρθε και φάγαμε μαζί στους «Λύκους». Ωραία να κουβεντιάσουμε για τον Όμηρο, τα δράματα του Σοφοκλέους, τις μεθόδους διδασκαλιών, τις διάφορες μεταφράσεις τις Ιλιάδας, τα διάφορα λεξικά, και παρόμοια. . . . Το βράδι περπατήσαμε με τη Χρυσάνθη στην όμορφη παραλία ως την πλατεία Αριστοτέλους, και φάγαμε μπουγάτσα κρέμα. . . . Δουλεύω τώρα λιγάκι: διάβασα για να προετοιμαστώ για το αυριανό μάθημα—τι θα πει «άβυσσος» και «σιγή» και προχώρησα στη διάλεξη πάνω στην Οδύσεια.

Friday, October 20, 2000

Το πρώτο μάθημα σήμερα με το Δημήτρη. Περιμέναμε 7–8 φοιτητές—ήρθαν 17. Τους μίλησα εγώ για το μεταφυσικό σύστημα του Bergson. Τους μίλησε ο Δημήτρης για το Kant, Marcuse, Σεφέρη και Ελύτη, που όλοι τους προσπαθούν να εκφράσουν το αίσθημα του συνόλου, δηλ. όταν χάρη στην τέχνη ή στη θρησκεία υπερβαίνεις την καθημερινή κομματισμένη πραγματικότητα και αρχίζεις να καταλαβαίνεις την ενωμένη ουσία. Ευτυχώς έχουμε στην τάξη μερικούς που σπούδασαν φιλοσοφία, αν και η πλειοψηφία σπούδασαν λογοτεχνία. . . . Ύστερα βρήκα τη Ζέτα Φαρίνου, που καθόταν με μια κοπέλα που ήταν στην τάξη μας πριν από 3 χρόνια. Ωραία συνάντηση. Τότε ο Δημήτρης και εγώ πήγαμε σ' ένα εστιατόριο στην Οδόν Εγνατίας και σε λίγο ήρθε και η Ruth, και περάσαμε ωραία. Τότε γύρισα στο γραφείο και κατάφερα να συνδέσω το ημείλ: πολλά γράμματα σχετικά με το MGSA. . . . Το βράδι περπατήσαμε με τη Χρυσάνθη στην οδό 25<sup>ης</sup> Μαρτίου, στο καινούργιο Μέγαρο Μουσικής, ν' ακούσουμε τον διάσημο πιανίστα τον Σβουρό, που έπαιξε και ένα πανόμορφο κονσέρτο του Mozart και το α' κονσέρτο του Tchaikovsky. Κατόρθωμα. Όταν ακούς και τα δυο μαζί, καταλαβαίνεις πόσο υπερβαίνει ο Mozart. Το έργο του Tchaikovsky, που όταν ήμουν παιδί και άκουε το Artur Rubinstein να το παίζει το αγάπησα πολύ, τώρα μου φάνηκε πολύ στομφώδες.

Saturday, October 21, 2000

Ο Δημήτρης Γιαννακός μας επισκέφτηκε το πρωί με τη κόρη του, την Έβη, που είχε μεγαλώσει πολύ. Θα τελειώσει του χρόνου το δημοτικό και ψάχνουν για ένα καλό γυμνάσιο. . . . Φάγαμε στους Λύκους και περπατήσαμε στην παραλία, στις Βούλγες. Ήταν εκεί η κυρά Κούλα που μιλούσε ακατάπαυστα ώσπου να γυρίσει η Βούλη. Με τη Βούλη μιλήσαμε για το σχολείο των Κουακέρων που δυστυχώς δεν θα μείνει στη συνείδηση του κόσμου γιατί του λείπει μια ιστορική αφήγηση. Κρίμα που οι Jones δεν ανέλαβαν τέτοια δουλειά. Της πληροφόρησα για το αρχείο που βρίσκεται στο Friends House στο Λονδίνο. Μιλήσαμε και για το Στυλιανό, που δεν ήθελε λείει να 'ρθεί στην Αμερική και για το Σπυρίδωνα, που λείει ότι είναι ομοφυλόφιλο. Γυρίσαμε στο σπίτι πάλι με τα πόδια, στην παραλία. Απόλαυση. . . . Το βράδι πήγαμε στο Θέατρο Αμαλία, να δούμε «Μετά την πρόβα» του Ingmar Bergman με τρεις ηθοποιούς που όλοι ήταν έξοχοι. Το έργο ήταν πολύ συναρπαστικό, σχετικά με την προσπάθεια του Bergman του ίδιου να καταλάβει τις ανάγκες των ηθοποιών του και να ξεχωρίσει την επαγγελματική επαφή από την προσωπική και μάλιστα ερωτική.

Sunday, October 22, 2000

Τελείωσα και ένα ακόμα κεφάλαιο του Stewards. Πήγαμε στη Σχολή με το Δημήτρη Γιαννακό και μπόρεσα να το φέρω το κεφάλαιο στη Brenda. Γυρίσαμε το σχολείο με τους Μάρντερ, τον Δημήτρη και την κόρη του, την Έβη, που είδε για πρώτη φορά μια αγελάδα, ένα γκουρουίνι, κότες κάνοντας αυγά, κτλ. Επίσης το μπρόκολο για την πρώτη φορά. Ύστερα πήραμε την Τίλντα από το σπίτι τους και φάγαμε όλοι κοντά στο λιμάνι σ' ένα παλιό μέρος της πόλης που στο παρελθόν ήταν γεμάτο πορνεία και τώρα γέμισε με εστιατόρια, ξενοδοχεία, και ταβέρνες. . . . Ο Έβερρετ λαχταράει να εγκατασταθεί πάλι στην Ελλάδα. Ενδιαφέρεται για τη θέση του διευθυντή του Fulbright. Γι' αυτό έγραψα ένα συστατικό γράμμα στην κυρία που είναι επικεφαλής της επιτροπής.

Monday, October 23, 2000

Πήγα στην Εγνατία Τράπεζα, όπου έχουμε τώρα το λογαριασμό μας. Είχαν έλθει τα χρήματα από την Τράπεζα American Express στην Αθήνα: 741473 δραχμές. Μου είπε η κυρία Μαμεδάκη στο Customer Service ότι ως μόνιμος κάτοικος της ΗΠΑ δεν αναγκαζόμαστε να πληρώνουμε το φόρο των 15 τοις εκατόν του τόκου. Πρέπει να της στείλω ένα πιστοποιητικό από την αστυνομία στο Hanover που επιβεβαιώνει ότι μένουμε στην Αμερική. . . . Ύστερα πέρασα από το κατάστημα του Bosch για να μάθω πώς να μάθω πόσες μονάδες έχω ακόμα στη διάθεσή μου στο κινητό τηλέφωνο. . . . Γύρισα στο διαμέρισμα. Ήταν εκεί ο Γιώργος. Καθήσαμε με τη Χρυσάνθη για μian ώρα ενώ αυτός, με πολύ πάθος, μας διηγήθηκε τα βασανά του λόγω της ψυχολογικής κατάστασης του Ανδρέα. Ο γάμος κλονίζεται, δεν έχει πελάτες στο δικηγορικό του γραφείο, πηγαίνει κάθε μέρα στο γραφείο και βάζει κασέτες με μουσική. Η παρέα του είναι οι αναρχικοί της πόλης, καπνίζει σαν καμινάδα, κτλ. Έμμεση αυτοκτονία, είπε ο Γιώργος. Του είπα εγώ ότι μπορεί να μετατραπεί σε άμεση. Και του εξήγησα τις εντυπώσεις μου πάνω στο κείμενο που μου το είχε στείλει ο Αντρέας για την κριτική μου. Πάντως, ο Γιώργος ήταν έξω φρενών και πολύ απελπισμένος. . . . Ύστερα από τη συνάντηση ετούτη, πήγαμε στις Λόλας. Μεγάλη διαφορά. Ο Κώστας και η Λόλα έχουν ένα εξαρητικό ομαλό παιδί, το Νίκο, που είναι γιατρός με σπουδαίες ευθύνες στο νοσοκομείο. Η γυναίκα του είναι οδοντογιατρίνα. Δουλεύουν κανονικά, κερδίζουν το ψωμί τους, και παραπάνω. Ο Κώστας ενδιαφέρεται στα πολιτικά, στα οικονομικά, ακόμα στη λογοτεχνία: μιλούσε για μια γνώμη πως τα ποιήματα του Σεφέρη είναι μέτρια και πως ο Σεφέρης συνεργάστηκε και με τη χούντα και με το Μεταξά! Μεγάλη διαφορά να είμαστε σ' ένα χαρούμενο σπίτι. . . . Το βράδι μας πήραν η Βούλη και η Λένα Στέφα σ' ένα ωραίο κέντρο στην πάνω πόλη, στο δάσος Σείκ Σου (που θα πει χίλια δέντρα). Η Στεφα θα πάει κι αυτή στην Αυστραλία, προσκαλισμένη από το Στυλιανό. Έτσι είπαμε «Καλή αντάμωση». Μίλησε και για το Bill McGrew, που, καθώς ξέρω, ζητάει δουλειά (Fulbright, π.χ.) κι αυτός στην Ελλάδα.

Tuesday, October 24, 2000

Προχώσησα λιγάκι στη διάλεξή μου πάνω στη καζαντζακική Οδύσεια. Ανταμώσαμε τον Μίμη και την Αγλαΐδα Λυπουρλή στην Πλατεία Ναβαρίνο και φάγαμε ωραίο ψάρι και ήπιαμε ωραίο τσίπουρο. Μου έδωσε ο Μίμης το βιβλίο με τη σειρά διαλέξεων που έβραλε στο Βαφοπούλειο. Μου είπε πόσο σκληρά δούλεψαν όλοι στο Ίδρυμα Τριανταφυλίδη πάνω το καινούργιο λεξικό. . . . Το βράδι πήγαμε στο Κολοκοτρώνη 11 και φάγαμε με τον Οδυσσέα και την Ελένη. Ο Οδυσσέας μου διηγήθηκε πόσο πίνουν οι Ρώσοι. Vodka για πρωινό! Και η παραγωγή τους ελάχιστη. Τι φταίει; Το σύστημα που τους εγγυόταν φαγητό, διαμέρισμα, ασφάλια, εκπαίδευση, γιατρούς, κτλ. Γιατί τότε να βγάζουν ιδρώτα; . . . Στο σπίτι διόρθωσα τα πρακτικά που έγραψε ο Γιάννης Βεζύρογλου για την επιτροπή μας. Στο γραφείο, με ημέιλ, διαπραγματεύτηκα με τον Alf Vincent για τις διαλέξεις που θα κάνω στο Σύνδευ.

Wednesday, October 25, 2000

Κάθησα τρεις ώρες στο γραφείο. Ήρθαν οι τρεις κοπέλες που θα παρουσιάσουν την Ασκητική την Παρασκευή· φαίνεται ότι είναι προετοιμασμένες. Η μια θα μιλήσει για το Kant, η άλλες για το Bergson και το Nietzsche. Τέλεια! Βρήκα και έναν κουρέα, πολύ φλύαρο· είπα ότι θα γυρίσω ύστερα από τρία χρόνια. Τηλεφώνησα στη Gonda να της πω ότι τα πρακτικά που έγραψε για τη συνεδρίαση της Διοικητικής Επιτροπής της MGSA μπορούν να τυπωθούν στο Δελτίο μας. Πιο σπουδαία: τελείωσα την πρώτη γραφή της διάλεξής μου πάνω στην Οδύσεια του Καζαντζάκη. . . . Ύστερα ήρθαν η Ρίτσα και ο Ζήσης και μας πήγαν να φάμε σ' ένα μικρό ταβερνάκι κοντά στο Ντεπό. Μιλούσαν για το γιο τους που πέθανε τόσο τραγικά και ο Ζήσης μίλησε πολύ για το τεκτονισμό (Freemasonry) που, φαίνεται, είναι η σωτηρία του γιατί εκεί βρίσκει και παρέα και πολιτιστική διέγερση. Πρέπει, λέει, να πιστεύεις στο Θεό και στη μετεμψύχωση για να γίνεις μέλος.

Thursday, October 26, 2000

Αργεία σήμερα: η γιορτή του Αγ. Δημητρίου. Ολόκληρη η πόλις κλειστή. Περπατήσαμε στην παραλία ως τη Πλατεία Αριστοτέλους και πήραμε το λεοφορείο στη Καλαμαριά για να φάμε το μεσημερινό φαί στον Πώργου. Ήταν εκεί και ο Αντρέας, η Δήμητρα, και ο γιος τους το Γιωργάκι. Το παιδί, τεσσάρων χρονών, έχει ένα εξαιρετικά πλούσια λεξιλόγιο· είναι και ζωηρό, εξωστρεφές, όλο χαμόγελο και γέλιο. Ο δε Αντρέας μοιάζει με φυλακισμένο, πεινασμένο, με μακριά μαλλιά ενός κοριτσιού. Όμως ρωτώντας για τις ουρανοξύστες της Νέας Υόρκης, αν είχα ανέβει καμιά φορά στην άκρη, του διηγήθηκα για το Empire State Building και επιπλέον για το World Trade Center όπου έκανα τις διαλέξεις μου για δικηγόρους. Τότε, δε ξέρω πώς, μετεκόμισε η κουβέντα στον εμφύλιο πόλεμο της Ισπανίας και μου είπε επανειλημμένα ότι ενδιαφέρεται για τους αναρκακικούς που πολέμισαν τον Φράγκο. Όταν καθίσαμε να φάμε, αυτός έφαγε τέσσερις μερίδες τουλάχιστο, σαν να μην είχε φάει για μια βδομάδα. Ύστερα, πριν τελειώσαμε, μας αποχαιρέτησε και έφυγε. Δε φαινόταν ψυχολογικά άρρωστος αλλά απ' την άλλη μεριά η συμπεριφορά του δεν ήταν ομαλή. Η γυναίκα του, η Δήμητρα, ήταν πολύ φιλική· μιλήσαμε εύκολα πάνω σε διάφορα θέματα αλλά δεν ανοίξαμε ούτε το θέμα της συμπεριφοράς του, ούτε της δουλειάς που φαίνεται δε πάει καλά. . . . Το βράδι πήγαμε στις Βούλγης. Είχε γυρίσει στο σπίτι η κα. Στέλλα από την κλινική. Ήταν εκεί και η Φω-φώ, η αδερφή της Κύρας Κούλας, να φροντίσει τη Στέλλα ώσπου να συνέλθει εντελώς από την εγχείρησή της. Βγήκαμε και φάγαμε γύρο στην Πλατεία Ναβαρίνο, ύστερα καφέδες και γλυκό σε κομψό ζαχαροπλατείο.

Friday, October 27, 2000

Έγινε το μάθημα πάνω στην Ασκητική. Η μέρα ήταν αργεία και στο πανεπιστήμιο. Ερμηιά. Αλλά ήρθαν 50 τοις εκατόν των φοιτητών, και οι τρεις κοπέλες που είχαν ετοιμάσει παρουσιάσεις. Μίλησαν αρκετά ωραία, όμως και οι τρεις διάβασαν μακριά χωρία, που δεν είναι καλό. Ευτυχώς υπήρξε συζήτηση αρκετή. Βρήκαμε και άλλους τρεις να ετοιμάσουν παρουσιάσεις για τον Zorμπά. Με ημείλ ο Βασίλης Λαμπρόπουλος μου έστειλε ένα μεγάλο άρθρο στην Καθημερινή πάνω στη Joice Loch, πολύ ενδιαφέρον. . . . Το βράδι περπατήσαμε ξανά στην Πλατεία Αριστοτέλους. Είδα στη θάλασσα ένα πελώριο πουλί, πελεκάνο μάλλον. Σ' ένα ουζερί εκεί ανταμώνσαμε τον Ξεναφώντα Κοκόλη και περάσαμε τρεις ώρες πολύ ωραία μιλώντας για τη λογοτεχνία προπαντός. Υποσχέθηκε αυτός να με βοηθήσει στην επιλογή των εκατό ποιημάτων για το Fakazis. Ξέρει πολύ καλά τα άπαντα του Αναγνωστάκη, π.χ. Μας είπε ότι η Ζωή Καρέλλη έζησε πολλά χρόνια στην Αμερικανική Γεωργική Σχολή όπου ο άντρας της δούλευε. Ο καημένος ο Ξενοφών έχασε τη γυναίκα του εδώ και πέντε-έξι χρόνια και παραμένει μόνος. Η κόρη τους ζει στην Αγγλία, που σπουδάζει για ντοκτορά. Ήταν ο μόνος καθηγητής που δεν ενδιαφέρθηκε καθόλου για προαγωγή. Τώρα όμως άλλαξε, λόγω της οικονομικής του κατάστασης, αφού σε έξι χρόνια θα γίνει υποχρεωτικά συνταξιούχος.

Η ημέρα της Όχι. Αργεία πάλι. Παρέλαση στην Οδό Μεγάλου Αλεξάνδρου· την είδαμε μια χαρά από το μπαλκόνι μας. Ήρθαν και ο Οδυσσέας, η Ελένη, και ο Γιώργος. Στην αρχή, μαθητές σε διάφορες παραδοσιακές στολές—παραπολύ όμορφοι. Ύστερα όμως, τανκς και παρόμοια μηχανήματα με όπλα, στρατιωτικά αεροπλάνα από πάνω, φαντάροι, ναύτες, ναυτίνες, κτλ. Φρίκη. Όταν υπάρχουν τόσα όμορφα παιδιά, γιατί πολεμούν τα κράτη; Φυσικά θα απαντήσουν πολλοί ότι πολεμούν ακριβώς για να ασφαλίσουν την ασφάλεια τέτοιων παιδιών. Ίσως. Αλλά η σπατάλη πόρων και ενέργειας είναι φρικτή, σε όλα τα κράτη, όχι μονάχα εδώ. . . . Πήγαμε ύστερα να φάγουμε το μεσημερινό στου Δημήτρη Γιαννακού. Η Τίλντα χαριτωμένη, η Εύη γελαστή. Μας έδειξε η κόρη τα βιβλία που χρησιμεύουν για αγγλικά, πολύ ωραία. Της χάρισα το Oxford Learner's Dictionary, του οποίου την πρώτη ή δεύτερη έκδοση είχα χαρίσει πριν από 20 χρόνια στον πατέρα της. Ίσως μια μέρα θα σπουδάσει η Εύη στην Αγγλία ή στην Αμερική. . . . Το βράδι ξαναπήγαμε στο θέατρο να δούμε μια κωμωδία του Κεχαΐδη και Χαβιαρά, «Με δύναμη από την Κηφισιά». Είναι από τέτοια έργα που περνάς την ώρα σου ευχάριστα και την άλλη μέρα ξεχνάς πως το είδες. Με μια λέξη: σαχλαμάρες. Αλλά οι τέσσαρις ηθοποιοί έπαιζαν πολύ ωραία, με κέφι.

Για μένα επίσης ήταν μια γλωσσική άσκηση αφού μιλούσαν παραπολύ γρήγορα, μα και καθαρά. Μπορούσα να καταλάβω, νομίζω, γύρω από τις 75 τοις εκατόν. Ύστερα, φάγαμε γύρο και μπύρα με τον Οδυσσέα και την Ελένη. . . . Νωρίτερα η Χρυσάνθη διάβασε προσεκτικά τη διάλεξή μου και αρχίσαμε να καταγράφουμε τις αλλαγές: να διορθώνουμε τυπογραφικά ή γραμματικά λάθη, να απλοποιούμε τη γλωσσα.

Sunday, October 29, 2000

Γυρίσαμε στο Θέατρο Αμαλία, να δούμε «Οδύσσεια»: σκηνές από το ομηρικό έπος με σκηνοθετική επιμέλεια της Έφης Σταμούλη. Το πρωτότυπο ήταν στα γαλλικά από το Colin Harris. Ήταν και για παιδιά (που γέμισαν το ακροατήριο) και για ενήλικους. Γεμάτη φαντασία και ενέργεια. Και χρησιμοποιήθηκε πολύ απλά σκηνικά· έτσι μπορεί να παιχτεί και στα σχολεία. Κρίμα που δεν έχουμε το αντίστοιχο στα αγγλικά και στη τηλεόρασή μας. . . . Ύστερα φάγαμε με τον Οδυσσέα και την Ελένη. Τους ρώτησα αν η συμμετοχή γυναικών στην Αντίσταση ήταν η κύρια αιτία της κατοπινής απελευθέρωσης των γυναικών, όπως ισχυρίζεται η Brenda. Συμφώνησαν με τη Βούλη ότι οι γυναίκες στην Αντίσταση ήταν λίγες. Άρχισαν να κάνουν «αντρικές» δουλειές νωρίτερα, στον πόλεμο εναντίον των Ιταλών. Γενικά η αιτία ήταν ο δεύτερος παγκόσμιος πόλεμος, λένε, και όχι η συγκεκριμένη προσαρμογή της γυναίκας στην Αντίσταση. . . . Το βραδι περπατήσαμε στην πόλη και καθίσαμε σαν Θεσσαλονικείς σ' ένα τραπέζι στο πεζοδρόμιο και φάγαμε τυρόπιτες. Τελευταία, διάβασα σιγα-σιγά τη διάλεξή μου για να την ακούσει η Χρυσάνθη, και κάναμε διάφορες απλοποιήσεις.

Monday, October 30, 2000

Όλο το πρωί δούλενα ξανά στη διάλεξη. Το συντόμεψα. Προσπάθησα να το κάνω πιο σαφές, αφαίρεσα μερικές επαναλήψεις. . . . Φάγαμε στους Λύκους, ξαπλώσαμε, πήγαμε στο A.C.T. (The American College of Thessaloniki—i.e. Anatolia College) στο “New Building” που βρίσκεται δίπλα στο παλαιό campus, δώρο του αμερικανικού λαού. Δίπλα θα χτιστεί μια state-of-the-art βιβλιοθήκη. Μίλησα αργότερα με τη διευθύντρια της βιβλιοθήκης, που φαίνεται να ενδιαφερθεί για τα βιβλία που μπορούσα να τους χαρίσω, στους τομείς της αγγλικής και της ελληνικής φιλολογίας. Θα γραφόμεστε. Μίλησα σ' ένα μεγάλο ακροατήριο για “Odysseus across the centuries,” στ' αγγλικά. Ύστερα, μια νεαρή κυρία με πλησίασε, αμερικανίδα, και είπε ότι ήταν φοιτήτρια μου στο Dartmouth στη συγκριτική φιλολογία γύρω στα 1976. “Your course changed my life!” είπε. Τι καλοσύνη! Και τότε, σχετικά με τη διάλεξη, “You haven’t changed.” Μακάρι. Γνώρισα πολλούς καθηγητές στο Κολλέγιο. Λένε πως θέλουν ν’ αρχίσουν μια “minor” στις νεοελληνικές σπουδές ή, καλύτερα, στη νεοελληνική λογοτεχνία. Πήγαμε μαζί τους σ’ ένα εστιατόριο στις Βασιλίσσης Όλγας σ’ ένα από τα παλιά μέγαρα, πολύ κομψό και παραπολύ ακριβό, με πιάτα flambé, κτλ. Μα το δικό μου μοσχάρι ήταν σκληρό, σαν δέρμα. Περπατήσαμε στο σπίτι με το Bob Chatel και τη γυναίκα του, μια ιρλανδέσα που διδάσκει αγγλικά. Όλοι αυτοί οι ξένοι expatriates εδώ έχουν μια καλή, ευχάριστη ζωή. Ήρθε στη διάλεξη ο Γιάννης Βεζύρογλου και ο David και η Patti Buck. Ο Γιάννης μας κάλεσε για αύριο. Το “social life” μας πλημμυρίζει.

Tuesday, October 31, 2000

Δούλεψα στη διάλεξή μου. Έκανα πρόβα, την συντόμεψα πάλι. Το βράδι πήγαμε στο ωραίο σπίτι του Γιάννη Βεζύρογλου και της Νόρας, στο Πανόραμα. Προσκαλισμένοι επίσης ήταν ο Γιάννης Κολιόπουλος και η γυναίκα του. Έτσι περάσαμε πολύ ωραία, συζητώντας ζητήματα της Σχολής, της Α.Σ.Τ., του πανεπιστημίου, της γεωργίας. Και φάγαμε το νοστιμότατο φαγητό που είχαμε ως τώρα στην Ελλάδα. Άφησα με το Γιάννη τη μετάφραση του Προλόγου μου στο βιβλίο της Brenda, το πρώτο μέρος.

Wednesday, November 1, 2000

Τηλεφώνησε ο Γιάννης: Τα ελληνικά δεν είναι καθόλου καλά. Κρίμα. Κάποιοι πρέπει να τα ξανακοιτάξει. Θα γράψω σχετικά στη Randy. Είχα office hours στο πανεπιστήμιο. Ήρθαν οι τρεις που θα μιλήσουν για το Ζορμπά, με πολύ λίγη προετοιμασία. Η μια, η Στέλλα, θα έρθει και αύριο. Το βράδι έδωσα τη διάλεξή μου πάνω στις προσεγγίσεις προς την Οδύσεια του Καζαντζάκη. Το σπουδαστήριο ήταν γεμάτο, standing room only. Ήρθαν ο Μίμης και η Αγλαΐα, ο Ξενοφών, η Ζέτα, ο Σωκράτης από τη Σχολή μαζί με μια κοπέλα που διδάσκει φιλολογία εκεί, και ο Γιώργος, η Ευθυμούλα, η Λόλα, η Βούλη, η Λίνα Στέφα. Το διάβασα το κείμενο εύκολα, χωρίς δισταγμούς, χάρη στις πρόβες. Ελάχιστα ρωτήματα στο τέλος, δυστυχώς. Έπειτα, πήγαμε με το Δημήτρη στο Πανόραμα, ήρθε και η Ruth, και φάγαμε.

Thursday, November 2, 2000

Ήρθε η Στέλλα και την έδωσα δεδομένα για τον Σταυριδάκη για την παρουσίασή της. Το βράδι πήγαμε με τη Βούλη και τη Λίνα σ' ένα πολυτελέστατο εστιατόριο στα «Λαδάδικα», γεμάτο κόσμο, όπως πάντα. Οι Έλληνες δίνουν πρωτερότητα, καθώς φαίνεται, στην παρέα τους. Ένα στενόμακρο τραπέζι γεμάτο άντρες, άλλο γεμάτο γυναίκες. Πανάκριβο, αλλά ο κόσμος έχει χρήματα.

Friday, November 3, 2000

Το τελευταίο μου μάθημα. Χωρίς το Δημήτρη, που αναγνώστηκε να πάει στην Αθήνα για ένα συνέδριο πάνω στον Τσίρκα. Πήγε καλά αν και ένας φοιτητής δεν μας προσέφερε πολλά. Στο τέλος, μεγάλη έκπληξη, είπαν να πάμε όλοι να φάμε για να γνωριστούμε καλύτερα. Αλλά ήταν προπαντός ένα πάρτι για μένα. Καθήσαμε στην Πλατεία Ναβαρόνα ως τις 5:00, και η συζήτηση ήταν ζωντανή—για το μέλλον τους, για τους ξένους που βρίσκονται παντού τώρα στην Ελλάδα, για την ταυτότητα που πρέπει ή δεν πρέπει να συμπεριλάβει και τη θρησκεία καθενός. Γύρισα στις 5:00 στο γραφείο. Κοίταξα το ημείλ μου για την τελευταία φορά, τηλεφώνησα στο Swiss Air να επιβεβαιώσω την κράτησή μας, και στο Ξενοδοχείο Φοίνιξ, μάζεψα τα πράγματά μου, κλείδωσα, και άφησα το κλειδί για το Δημήτρη. Πάει και αυτή η εμπειρία. . . . Το βράδι πήγαμε στο Μέγαρο Μουσικής όπου ανταμώνσαμε το Γιώργο και την Ευθυμούλα. Ακούσαμε την Κρατική Ορχήστρα Θεσσαλονίκης, που είναι μέτρια: Mendelssohn Hebrides Overture (δε μούκανε εντύπωση), Bruch Violin Concerto: πολύ όμορφο και ο σολίστας υπέροχος (Έλληνας που σπούδασε στο Oberlin). Τελευταία, Stravinsky Firebird, που δεν είχε τη φλόγα που πρέπει, αλλά πάντως ήταν συγκινητικό. Δυστυχώς, αυτή την ωραία βραδιά τη χάλασε ύστερα η Ευθυμούλα στο πίτσα που πήγαμε, αγού επέμεινε να αλάξουμε τραπέζι να μην υποφέρει, λέει, από τον καπνό. Η φωνή της με νεύριασε φοβερά. Αλλά μπορούσα να μιλήσω λιγάκι με το Γιώργο για τον προσάτη του (που ξαναφύτρωσε) και για το Δημήτρη, που λέει ο Γιώργος οφείλεται τώρα να μπει μέσα σε μια μεγάλη επιχείρηση αντί να παραμένει ανεξάρτητος. Η δε Ευθυμούλα, φαίνεται, είτε της Χρυσάνθης όλα τα μυστικά της οικογένειας—πως το πρόβλημα είναι και ο Δημήτρης, όχι μονάχα ο Αντρέας. Του έδωσαν τα πάντα και ποτέ δεν τους προσκαλεί, ποτέ δεν τους προσφέρει κάτι. Τους τηλεφωνεί μονάχα όταν χρειάζεται babysitting για την Εύη. Τους έκανε ένα παραπολύ μικρό σπίτι στη Φούρκα, και τους το πούλησε μολονότι αυτοί τον είχαν δώσει ολόκληρο το οικοπέδο. Και τα λοιπά. Τραγωδία μεγάλη. Σκέφτηκα ξανά αν έπρεπε εμείς να δίνουμε επανειλημμένα στα δικά μας παιδιά. Ίσως καλύτερο θάταν να κάνουμε ένα Ίδρυμα Bien που θα δίνει στις φιλανθρωπιστικές υποθέσεις.

Thessaloniki

Πήγαμε το πρωί στο ωραιότατο διαμέρισμα της Λίνας για brunch με τη Βούλη. Πάλι μεγάλη συζήτηση ως τη 1:00 για τη Σχολή, τον Καζαντζάκη, τη θρησκεία, τα κύρια προσόντα του Θεού (βούληση; ορθολογισμός;). Η Λίνα μούδωσε μερικά ποιήματα του Στυλιανού που είχε μεταφράσει, να κάνω έλεγχο. Θα βλεπόμαστε σύντομα στο Σίδνεϋ. . . . Το βράδι ήρθαν η Τούλα και ο Σταύρος μ' ένα σωρό δώρα για τα δικά μας εγγονάκια. Είχε έρθει νωρίτερα ο Οδυσσέας να μας αποχαιρετήσει με γέλιο και δάκρυα. Ο μεν Γιώργος είναι τόσο κλειστός, ο δε Οδυσσέας τόσο ανοιχτός. Όσο για την Τούλα και το Σταύρο, ακόμα θέλουν να ιδρύσουν μια κατασκήνωση καλοκαιρινή (Music Camp) με δάνειο ή/και ενίσχυση από το Ε.Ε. Μακάρι! Είπα στην Τούλα ν' ρθεί μόνη της ένα καλοκαίρι να δει το Κιnhaven. Πήγαμε στους Λύκους να φάμε. Πολλή συζήτηση για το παιδί τους, Ανθούλα, που είναι δέκα χρονώ και ετοιμάζεται να πάει στο γυμνάσιο. Ενδιαφέρονται για το Κολλέγιο Ανατόλια. Ο Σταύρος πιέζει το παιδί, που είναι πανέξυπνη, μαθαίνει μεμιάς χωρίς κόπο και γι' αυτό δεν ξέρει να κάθεται και να συγκεντρωθεί. «Κάνω κακό;» μου ρώτησε. «Μπορεί,» απάντησα, αν και βέβαια δεν πρέπει να πας στην άλλη άκρη και νάσαι αδιάφορος. Να την πιέξεις, αλλά με την αγάπη. Προπαντός οπότεν σου έρχεται η αγανάκτηση, σκέψου αυτό.» Ύστερα πήγε να φέρει το κορίτσι, που ήταν σ' ένα πάρτι στο σπίτι μιας φιλενάδας. Πανόμορφη κοπελίτσα με αριστοκρατικό μακρουλό πρόσωπο. Είναι προχωρημένη, είπαν, στα αγγλικά, αλλά δεν ήταν πρόθυμη να μιλάει. . . . Λέγοντας ότι θα πάω στη τουαλέττα, πήγα και πλήρωσα. Όταν ο Σταύρος αργότερα πήγε κι αυτός να πληρώσει και του είπαν ότι δεν χρειάζεται, θύμωσε. «Τι έκανες, θείο! Στην Ελλάδα εμείς πληρώνουμε.» Και έβαλε δύο δεκα-χιλιάρικα στο τραπέζι (ο λογαριασμός ήταν μόνο 14000). Δεν μπορούσα να αντισταθώ. Μακάρι να 'ρθεί η Τούλα σε μας μια μέρα για ν' είμαστε κι εμείς φιλόξενοι.

To Athens

Περιμένοντας στο αεροδρόμιο της Θεσσαλονίκης, διαβάσαμε τον όρκο του Μεγάλου Αλεξάνδρου. Είπε ότι δεν ξεχωρίζει τις φυλές. Δε ξεχω-ρίζει τον Έλληνα από το βάρβαρο. Ένας καλός άνθρωπος, από οποιανδήποτε φυλή, είναι Έλληνας. Ένας κακός Έλληνας είναι χειρότερος απ' ένα βάρβαρο. Και αν διαφωνήσετε, να μη πολεμήσετε, αλλά να βρείτε μια λύση ειρηνικά. . . . Κρίμα που στη συζήτηση για το αλβανό παιδί που δεν του έδωσαν τη σημαία στις 28 Οκτωβρίου μολονότι που ήταν πρώτος στην τάξη, κανείς δεν θυμήθηκε τον όρκο εκείνο. . . . Μας περίμενε στο Ξενοδοχείο Φοίνιξ ο Don Nielsen. Ευθύς πήγαμε στο παλιό του αυτοκίνητο ρωσικής κατασκευής προς το Σούνιο. Κάναμε όμως μια στάση στο δρόμο για να μας δείξει ο Ντον ένα ωραίο λιμνάκι με θερμό νερό που κολυμπούσαν ακόμα οι άνθρωποι. Στο Σούνιο φάγαμε ψάρια φρέσκα βλέποντας το ναό. Τότε ανεβήκαμε στο ναό και στο γύρω-γύρω τέμενο. Τι ωραίο! Θάλασσα, νησιά, μνήμη των αρχαίων. Όλο μιλούσαμε για την Ελλάδα, για τη ζωή του εδώ (ζει τώρα εννιά χρόνια στην Αθήνα), για τη βοήθεια που προσφέρει σε διάφορες ομάδες προσφύγων, μαζί με τους Πατρούς Χωρίς Σύνορα. Είναι φορβερός επικριτής της Ελλάδας, αλλά συνάμα την αγαπάει. Για εκείνον, οι περισσότεροι πολιτικοί είναι "thugs" (ληστές) που ενδιαφέρονται πρωτ' απ' όλα για τα συμφέροντά τους και που βάζουν τους συγγενείς τους σε επίσημες θέσεις. Η κατάσταση του Κολλέγιου Αθηνών, π.χ., είναι τρομερή, χάρη στον Αντρέα Παπανδρέου, που έβαλε στη δικό του διοίκηση αγγράμματους που μισούν την εκπαίδευση (κατά τον Ντον). Όταν γυρίσαμε αργά στο ξενοδοχείο, καθίσαμε άλλη μια ώρα και μας περιγράψε την επιθυμία του να δημιουργήσει εδώ μια National Trail από τα Γιάννενα μέχρι τη Μάνη. Θα χτιστεί από νέους εθελοντές που θα μπούνε σε κατασκηνώσεις "Outward Bound" που θα μάθουν Leadership. Είπα ότι ίσως θα ενδιαφερθεί η Γεωργική Σχολή, που πρέπει τώρα να βρει καινούργιες διευθύνσεις και ν' αρχίσει πρωτοποριακά προγράμματα. Αν μου στείλει μια πρόταση (proposal) θα προσπαθήσω να τον φέρω σ' επαφή με το David Buck.

Athens-Zürich-Boston-Hanover.

Ευπήσαμε πρωί-πρωί στις 4:45 π.μ. Χιλιάδες κόσμο στο αεροδρόμιο των Αθηνών. Μας έβαλαν στο Business Class στην πτήση προς τη Ζυρίχη, δε ξέρω γιατί. Φτάσαμε στο σπίτι στις 5:00 μ.μ., ύστερα από 20 ώρες χωρίς ύπνο.

Hanover

Voted for Gore. Wrote an abstract for my "Inventing Greece" lecture, which I rather liked. Went to the clinic and had wax—large lumps—irrigated from both ears. Supper with Mother at Kendal. She's much reduced in body and mind, but at least still recognizes us.

Thursday, November 9, 2000

Dickey Center lunch with two administrators who were at Kent State when the students were shot and killed by the National Guard. A horrible story of inadequate leadership, especially by the Ohio governor. I kept pointing out contrasts with what happened at Dartmouth in 1969. Much better. At least we had trained officials in the State Police. Kent State had the National Guard, untrained in part. Still nobody knows whether they were commanded to fire or just panicked. I recall so vividly my reaction, in Birmingham, when I first heard of this tragedy.

Friday, November 10, 2000

Nice long lunch with Dick Sheldon talking about Russia and our children and Odysseus's tale about alcoholism in Tashkent. Then we went together to St. Thomas's for the memorial service for Tom Champion, who died last week at age 84. Full house: bagpiper playing Amazing Grace, lovely hymns, a fine homily, and lots of reminiscences by children and grandchildren; laughter, stories of Tom's fanatical love of fishing; then prayer that Tom used to recite at dinner, by Robert Louis Stevenson: "O Lord, give us grace and strength to forbear and to persevere. Give us courage, gaiety, and the quiet mind. Spare us to our friends, soften to us our enemies. Bless us, if it may be, in all our innocent endeavors. If it may not, give us strength to encounter that which is to come, that we may be brave in peril, constant in tribulation, temperate in wrath, and in all changes of fortune down to the gates of death, loyal and loving to one another." (Engraved on Stevenson's statue in St. Giles Cathedral, Edinburgh.) Afterwards, at the reception in Top of the Hop, Nardi said she would like to continue going to the A.R.T. with us. Saw Peter Champion, my former student, who recited a fine poem at the service and says he's still looking regularly at Joyce's Ulysses. Also saw Sheba Freedman. Asked her about Jim, to whom I'd written last week and who returned my note but not saying anything about his own health. It's very bad. The lymphoma returned and he has tumors in the brain and on the spine. He's undergoing chemotherapy again, and the brain tumor is shrinking but not the spinal one. He's very glum at the moment, Sheba says. No wonder.

Saturday, November 11, 2000

Russell Puschak from the Johnsbury Library came. We looked through all my books, in the bedroom, living room, television room, basement, and he selected scores and scores to take for the library. Good unburdening.

Sunday, November 12, 2000                      Philadelphia–Lumberton–Princeton
To Dan Seeger's at Lumberton. Played the Synthetic Waltzes and the Husa pieces. Dan hasn't practiced, as usual, but we improved a little after listening to a CD of the waltzes. Also played the 1st and 2nd Brandenburg Concertos for fun. Dan was politically successful in getting two democrats elected to the town council: dems who oppose the airport extension.

Monday, November 13, 2000                      Princeton
Working on Brenda's chapter 3 from the first book. Very slow and tedious. Dimitri and I went over MGSA business, chiefly concerned with the forthcoming Georgetown Symposium. I'm not eager to continue with all this responsibility. And the "book" continues. Many changes in the rear matter, the lexica. Here we go again! Will it never end? Mache is seven and a half months pregnant, but the baby has an abdominal cyst that is worrisome. . . . In the afternoon: to Mike's to meet with Yan-nis Fakazis and Peter Constantine and Mike about the 100 best poems project. We were successful in modifying Fakazis's ideas. We'll stress the translations rather than the 100 "best" poems. He wants the whole thing ready by next October for the Frankfort Book Fair. Peter Constantine (a friend of Burt Pike's) is a very impressive man. We all went out for dinner afterwards. Mike and Mary were in Australia about six weeks ago. Mike showed me a medal given him by Stylianos. Perhaps he's planning something similar for me. We'll see . . . An idea for the Meg Alexiou symposium in April: I could "perform" Ritsos's Moonlight Sonata (in English) as an example of ritual, and then perhaps speak about it a bit, and also about my own experience of ritual in Quaker Meeting. . . . Working all afternoon with Dimitri and seeing how much still needs to be done in the lexica, I feel very tired.

Philadelphia

Supper with Alec, Monica, and Theo, who now walks and runs, and was in a very good mood. Alec seems more at peace with his job and likely to stay there next year, which is good.

Saturday, November 18, 2000

Two hours with Dan Connelly trying to figure out what to do with all our money. We think now that we'll delay the charitable gifts or just make a designation regarding the obligatory withdrawal from the IRA, probably listing  $\frac{1}{3}$  with Chrysanthi and  $\frac{2}{3}$  with the children. Later, Tom Akstens's student Steve Meirs arrived. He wants me to guide him: he translates Spanish poetry without knowing Spanish. But does it well. I showed him my translation of Stylianos's "Hector to Andromache," to convey that a translation really can be quite free. But I'm hoping that he'll try rhyme when the originals are rhymed.

Sunday, November 19, 2000

Nice to be back in Meeting after such a long absence. Lafayette ministered at length; indeed, I've never heard him say so many words all at once—about a woman who had been raped, and the supposed offender sent to jail for eleven years, until proved by DNA to be innocent. Kesaya ministered about her brother David's wedding in Hawaii, how the minister asked bride and groom to forgive each other their lapses and faults, and how strange and difficult this was. . . . Afterwards, Finance Committee met to worry about Craig Putnam's latest estimate for the renovation: $350,000. . . . Coming home, I received an e-mail from Australia saying that Stylianos hoped I could extend my stay to December 1, when he'll be celebrating his name-day with a big dinner. Of course I cannot. Chrysanthi said that we should give him a gift. So I spent the afternoon composing the following sonnet:

A BILINGUAL SONNET FOR ARCHBISHOP

STYLIANOS ON HIS NAME-DAY

Στυλιανέ, thy name itself's a prop στύλος, στύλωμα—a mainstay, pillar where Simeon legislated on top to pilgrims arriving from near and far.

And how much better than "Your Eminence," since height for thee conveys a fatherly concern both strict and loving, assurance of σπογγή ruled by faith, hope, and charity.

Therefore let the στύλ- in Stylianós ring out in thy name-day's celebration; for pillars, props, and columns keep the roof from caving in, sustain our Lord Χριστός the Pantokratoras's elevation, and provide each pilgrim with living proof.

Quaker 8s at our house. Poor Billie-Joe Johnston has metathesized breast cancer and is undergoing chemotherapy. Don, her husband (partner?), was here, too, and spoke very movingly of their new situation. Also present were Many Ann Cadwallader and Judith Pettingill. The topic we chose was Thanksgiving. What are we thankful for? Answers: living in the Upper Valley, speaking English, belonging to a vibrant Quaker Meeting, living in a country without religious discrimination, having children who are productive independent citizens. It was a lovely gathering.

To Los Angeles

Chrysanthi went off in ΑΜΤΡΑΚ to Washington to spend Thanksgiving with Leander and everyone else. I took Vermont Transit to Manchester Airport, then flew to Pittsburgh, and again to Los Angeles, where I boarded a Quantas flight for Sydney. Los Angeles is amazing from the air, stretching out flat, all lighted up, as far as the eye can see, except where delimited by the Pacific Ocean. And the LAX airport is equally amazing. Everyone seemed under 25 years old. All announcements in Spanish; everyone you ask for directions speaks English with a heavy accent. Mexicans everywhere in broad sombreros. I was spoiled on US Air, being in first class. Now: 14+ hours in Quantas, tourist class. . . . Started reading John Banville's latest novel, Eclipse, for WLT review. Lovely language, especially the similes and metaphors, but so far (just 20 pages) the plot and characterization haven't gripped me. How good Conrad was with his openings! I sat next to a nice Australian girl with a Greek-Australian boyfriend, so we had something to talk about.

Sydney

Went from Tuesday to Thursday because of the international date line. Met at the airport by Vrasidas Karalis and another Greek-Australian. Nice hotel in city center. Telephoned Alf Vincent and will meet him tomorrow. Telephoned Stylianos but he wasn't there. Lunch in Malaysian restaurant. Long conversation with the owner about Indonesia and Papua New Guinea, where he had lived. He decries Australian intolerance and, like me, wishes that we could move beyond nationalism. "I don't feel I'm 'Australian,' he concluded. "More importantly, I'm human!" . . . In the evening, the conference inauguration took place in the Great Hall of the university. Very grand. Short speeches by the vice-chancellor of the university, the dean of the Faculty of Arts, Vrasidas Karalis, and then a major address by Gough Whitlam, a remarkable 84-year-old former prime minister obviously very knowledgeable about Greece. He ranged from Thucydides to the Elgin Marbles, easily, amusingly. Later, people told me that he had been deposed by Her Majesty's Governor-General, a dramatic moment that people still remember although it occurred thirty years ago. Afterwards, a group went out for supper. Among them, Spiro, who identified himself as a graduate of the American Farm School who was saved from expulsion by Phil Foote. I'll write to Phil. Small world. To bed at midnight, still feeling quite alert. Once again, the feast-fast regimen negated jet lag.

Friday, November 24, 2000

I gave my keynote address, "Inventing Greece," just before lunch. It seemed to be well received by this group of thinking people despite what I say about the Church and about nationalism. In general the papers are very good, much better, I must say, than those at our own MGSA symposium a year ago at Princeton. . . . In the evening I went to the Opera House and got a standing room ticket to the sold-out performance of the Australian ballet. Waiting, I struck up a conversation with an Australian lady who invited me to share a coffee. We enjoyed a lively conversation for  $\frac{3}{4}$  hour. The first ballet, "Belle Figure," had very distinctive and imaginative choreography by Jirí Kylián. The second, to lovely music by Schubert, was neoclassical and beautiful. The third (for which I was able to sit) was horrible owing to Philip Glass's orgiastic, repetitive music, which I detest. Twyla Tharp's choreography, better than the music, at least, still seemed to emphasize the ugly rather than the beautiful. But it certainly did not lack energy.

Saturday, November 25, 2000

Finally reached Stylianos on the telephone after many tries. He is in Melbourne, returning on Monday. He asked about Daphne και το καπέλο μου, of course. Wants to tell me his problems. . . . The highlight at the conference today was Michael Jeffreys' paper on Greek bibliography, really his swan song, because he has retired and will be leaving Australia for good in a fortnight, to join Elizabeth in Oxford. He began and ended with kind references to my "Inventing Greece" of yesterday. . . . Good discussion in the afternoon after Helen Nikas's paper on Kazantzakis's women in Zorba. . . . In the evening the banquet, at the Hellenic Club, to honor Michael upon his retirement. I should mention that Alf Vincent came to my paper yesterday, as did Lena Stefa. Alf is persona non grata apparently at the department. A long story! . . . Learned how bad things are in Melbourne. Pavlos Andronikos has been forced into early retirement, in his late 40s, because Greek is no longer going to be offered at Monash. . . . In the evening we all went to the Hellenic Club, Elisabeth Street, for our banquet and a farewell dinner for Michael Jeffreys. I was seated next to Professor Crittenden (?) of the philosophy department, and a former dean. So of course I asked him about György Markús. They are good friends. He and his wife are doing well, despite the tragic injury that reduced one of their sons to an invalid. Crittenden will send my regards. There were speeches, including one by me in which I compared this retirement to Bill Smith's where, in answer to the question, "And what does he leave behind?" we heard "A parking place!" For Michael, the answer is, "A scholarly community that really did not exist ten years ago." And I told how he had called everyone together in 1990 to found MGSAANZ, which now produces symposia, a journal, etc. I also said, very honestly, that the level of this symposium is far above our own MGSA's last year in Princeton. How nice to have, accidentally, been able to eulogize a colleague in this way! I remember the similar occasion, of course, when I eulogized Meg Alexiou in Birmingham.

Sunday, November 26, 2000

To Quaker Meeting in Devenshire Street, a convenient walk from the hotel. About 25 people only, fully silent, but meaningful. Afterwards, I spoke with a man who had been to Hanover to meet Rosenstock-Hussey. The Meeting subscribes to our Pendle Hill pamphlets, I was pleased to see. . . . Then back to Sancta Sophia College for the last session of the symposium. A man from Greek radio intercepted me there and I did an interview in Greek, about 15 minutes, that will be broadcast tomorrow, on my Odyssey lecture, on “Inventing Greece,” on not believing in history. . . . I caught the last of Mihalis Pieris’s talk. He is the one whose Sydney dissertation on Cavafy I felt was not worthy of acceptance, many years ago. At the session’s end, Michael Jeffreys and I were asked to sum up. I went first because Michael also wanted the use the occasion to say Goodbye to Australia after twenty-five years, which he did gracefully.

To Circular Quay. Ferry to the zoo. Kangaroos, gorillas, seals, pandas (of course), otters, a huge Kodiak bear. I didn’t see everything; the heat was oppressive. I remembered how impressed we were with this zoo when we first saw it, because there are no cages. . . . In the afternoon, Stylianos sent a car. Lovely reunion at the Archdiocese. Lena Stefa was there, too, and Vrasidas. Hugs and kisses. Jokes about το καπέλο μου. Showed photos of Daphne and the children. Immediately Stylianos telephoned Vouli and we all said hello. Too bad Chrysanthi wasn’t here, too. Then leisurely to St. Spyridon’s for my lecture on “Odysseus Across the Centuries.” The famous Greek chorus was rehearsing in the church, the one that performed so beautifully at the Olympics. I spoke in the hall downstairs to a full house, after a too-flattering introduction by Vrasidas. I included Stylianos’s poem “Hector to Andromache” and this lengthened the lecture. I went over an hour, alas, and people began to leave before I finished. But I hope it was OK. Afterward Stylianos spoke beautifully, ending by honoring me with the medal of St. Andrew, the same that he had given Mike Keeley. Then all to a seaside restaurant for a huge fish dinner and good conversation. Stylianos is now 65. No thoughts of retiring, but if and when he does retire he will stay in Australia. Much praise by him and also Vrasidas for Australian social policy, multiculturalism, health care, etc. We spoke about the Church in America. Spyridon, Stylianos said, was “sick.” Stylianos is so glad he did not go. Γλίτωσε.

Again to the Archdiocese. Then Stylianos, Lena, Stylianos’s deacon, and I went to the Sydney aquarium, a marvel displaying huge sharks and turtles and crocodiles, and the tiny fish of the coral reef, and everything in between. Here, as at the zoo, one feels the unity of all creation, of which we are only one very recent portion. Frogs, for instance, have been around for 150,000,000 years. Stylianos was very philosophical about all this, and also very aware of poems written on this subject and collateral ones. Fond farewells at the university, where I was delivered to meet with the Modern Greek department to talk further about the need for a comparative dimension to Greek studies and also to answer questions about possible exchange programs for their students in America. This was followed by a nice lunch with good fellowship and more fond farewells. . . . In the evening, Alfred Vincent came. We had a long coffee in the hotel, then went off by bus to Newtown, to the Στέκι, a small tavern filled to choking capacity with about 150 people squeezed in together. After an hour we were all served drinks and μεζεδάκια. Then Alfred introduced me very grandly and I spoke on The Last Temptation. In the question period people seemed to want to make Kazantzakis a Christian. I had to justify my view that, at best, he is a “post-Christian.” Nice to see Alf, who is so vilified as “Satan” by Vrasidas and Stylianos, in his element here, surrounded by friends. This group convenes regularly for “philosophy nights”: a meal, a talk, questions, and then music. In this case, just as the music was beginning, I begged a ride home (it was already 11:00 p.m.) from Andonis Costopoulos. In talking with him I learned, alas, that “Vrasidas is very difficult,” after naïvely remarking that it seemed to me that members of the department all liked each other and got along. Not so, apparently. In any case, this was my first lecture in a tavern. Very nice, actually.

Sydney–Los Angeles

Vrasidas accompanied me to the airport. We hope to keep in touch. Among other things, he is interested in Quakerism in connection with Kairis. Routine flight to Los Angeles and then from L.A. to Philadelphia, it still being Wednesday because of the international date line. Telephoned Chrysanthi upon arrival; she’d just returned from New York on the train. They’d had a fine Thanksgiving.

Thursday, November 30, 2000

Pendle Hill

I ministered on the fish in the Sydney aquarium—how they coexist in peace because presumably they’re all given enough to eat, even the sharks, so don’t eat each other; also my feelings of “relationship” to all of creation, and of humility: the frogs have been around for 150,000,000 years. . . . Drove to Lumberton. Dan cooked a full lunch. We played Thomson and Husa, he not having practiced much, as usual. But the Synthetic Waltzes are going better. We also did our old Satie, not bad, and finished with Mozart's Symphony in G minor, #40. Fun!

Pendle Hill

Breakfast with Larry Ingle and Bill Tabor. Bill is teaching a course on Quaker language, including "light." Larry is still stymied on his Nixon as Quaker biography. . . . Forgot to say that I supped with Alec, Monica, and Theo last night, all sick with colds and sore throats. Alec is worried because the high school principal is leaving and the elementary school principal might leave. Yesterday he had a successful conference with the fifth grade teacher who neglects writing. Apparently this individual understood the need to change and didn't get angry. So, a victory for Alec, so far. . . . I sent a fax to Stylianos again, thanking him for his φιλία, φιλοξενία, και το σταυρό του Αγίου Ανδρέα, και το δώρο της Δάφνης. . . . Book Committee at 10:00 a.m. Doug Gwyn's on Seekers is published. Charlotte Fardelman's is in the pipeline, as is Ratliff's on counseling. We're still undecided about the book on Woolman; it's going out to Bill Spengemann for review. And we're going to reprint the anthology of Quaker seventeenth-century women writers. Quite a lot. . . . Publications at noon. An easy Yes to a good essay on journal writing composed, we learned later, by Mary Morrison and Barbara Parsons. And an easy No to a garbled essay on "the spirit." The Executive Board meeting concentrated on Steve Baumgartner's strategic plan.

Saturday, December 2, 2000

Pendle Hill–Hanover

A whole morning on the strategic plan, ending with our approval for the process to continue. Steve is bringing very ambitious, imaginative leadership, and working with the staff so they don't feel that all this is being imposed from on high. . . . Finished another of Brenda's chapters, and continued typing in corrections to the front matter of Greek Today. Will it ever end? Nice to get to know Wilmer Stratton, a fine new board member, retired chemistry professor from Earlham.

Saturday, December 9, 2000

John Rassias called early today to say that John Walsh had died. I went to the service at St. Denis's. Age 61, from a blood clot probably resulting from an operation on his ankle! Tragic. Such a nice man! The service was all about Jesus Christ, not about John. No eulogy. Just the assurance that he is in heaven, thanks to Christ's sacrifice. Terrible! Such lies, and yet the Eucharist still has a strange power.

Tuesday, December 12, 2000

Quaker 8s again. Don spoke of his dilemma as a physician working in a nursing home with a repulsive nursing director. Should he resign or persevere? This led to interesting speculations and comments by all concerned, including Chrysanthi, who spoke of the man who smelled and had to be excluded from the Hanover Senior Center. There is always the black sheep (Manolios in Ο Χριστός ξανασταυρώνεται) that needs to be excluded. But I said how glad I am that the Meeting does not exclude Billy, the Down Syndrome man who speaks, sometimes at length, in a way that no one can understand. And I recalled also when people wanted to elder Elizabeth Ballard but I argued vigorously against this.

Saturday, December 23, 2000

To Boston

To Boston to the A.R.T. performance of "Three Farces and a Funeral," adapted from Chekhov by Robert Brustein. The farces are bittersweet: funny but also terribly sad because of bad tempers, greed, and general self-destructive irrationality. The best was the first, "The Proposal," splendidly acted by Jeremiah Kissel and especially Mirjana Jokavic. In between the three farces were scenes drawn from Chekhov's correspondence with the actress Olga Knipper, who eventually became his wife. The final scene shows her present at Chekhov's death from TB. Lots of energy, imagination, creativity. . . . A few days ago I finished copyediting Brenda's Stewards, part 1, all 12 chapters. She is an incredibly bad writer; thus practically every sentence needed to be "fixed." But the story she tells, and the research she presents, is admirable and fascinating. What stalwarts those early leaders were: Father House, Charlie House, Theo Litsas especially. . . . Arrived at the Yale Club at 12:30 a.m., owing to a breakdown of AMTRAK, the "new" service.

Sunday, December 24, 2000

Worked on Greek Today in the morning, mostly transferring the Ημερολόγιο in each chapter to its new position just after the Πρόσθετο λεξιλόγιο and before the first grammar. But I took some time out to explore the ever-increasing wonders of Grand Central Station, and bought some Stilton and Shropshire cheese for Daphne. Then to the Metropolitan Museum. Saw three special exhibits, plus my favorite El Grecos and Rembrandts. The first exhibit was "The Year 1": art from the Mediterranean basin all the way to China and Southeast Asia. The Roman artifacts, of course copying Greek ones for the most part, were the highlight for me. The second exhibit was "New York City ca. 1825-65": how by 1865 it already was a great financial and also cultural center with gifted painters and architects especially (the exhibit did nothing with literature). Lastly, "Gold of the Scythians," with excerpts from Herodotus on the walls. The gold stags with enormous antlers were the main attraction. . . . Then to Daphne's. Roy, Amy, and Laura Bernstein came for tea. Laura works in the fashion industry. Her older sister, Jill, who's in Puerto Rico at the moment, teaches pre-school at Temple Emanu-El. Roy said that all the parents are in duplex and triplex apartments on Fifth Avenue, with summer homes in the Hamptons! Alec, Monica, and Theo arrived fresh from Minneapolis, where they attended the wedding of Monica's Indonesian friend. Then Leander, Deanna, Sophia, and Nicholas arrived. We celebrated Chrysanthi's birthday with lots of presents, a song and a cake. All the children were well behaved; some actually could talk to each other a bit; yet I couldn't sequester the adults in order to ask their opinion of a charitable foundation. Maybe tomorrow.

Monday, December 25, 2000, Christmas

NYC

Breakfast and opening of presents at Daphne's. Sensibly, each adult member now gets only one gift, the giver chosen by lottery at Thanksgiving. The grandchildren were relatively placid. Andrew was mesmerized by Disney's Tarzan movie. Leander, Greg, Sophia, and Christina went to Radio City Music Hall to see the Rockettes and the rest of that extravaganza, which appealed it seems more to the adults than to the children. Leander was most impressed by the quality of the orchestra and especially of the two organists. Daphne then fed us all a beautiful turkey dinner with all the trimmings. A totally secular Christmas except for Monica and Alec, who disappeared for a few hours to go to church. I managed in the interstices of child care to talk to all three children about my scheme to set up a sort of charitable foundation that they would manage at some point and perhaps that their own children would manage eventually. Happily, all three seemed very eager to do this and approved the idea heartily.

Tuesday, December 26, 2000

NYC–Princeton

Bought a new raincoat at Daffy's for $59.00, reduced from $205.00. Worked on our Greek-English lexicon; one of the files is totally corrupted. I hope that I can restore it from the zip disk when I get home. Alec, Monica, and Theo came for breakfast, which went well. Chrysanthi went back to Daphne's with them. I lunched at the Oyster Bar on oysters Rockefeller. Then I was picked up by Yannis Fakazis. Drove to Princeton with Peter Constantine also, to Mike Keeley's to take the next step in our book of 100 poems. At first I thought Mike was going to sabotage the project; he was so negative about everything and how much work he had to do and how much he had to pay a research assistant, etc., a side of him I hadn't seen before. But gradually he warmed to the project and we made progress. He wants me to write the introduction. We decided on about 75% of the poets and poems. Sat for 3½ hours, then went and had steak for supper. Fakazis drove me back to the Yale Club, arriving at 10:30 p.m. Peter Constantine is a mellow, nice person, very easygoing, without Mike's prima donna side. Fakazis is a dynamo, very eager and apparently very well organized. The book will probably happen and probably be nice. He also intends to bring Life in the Tomb back into print.

December 31, 2000

Hanover

Daphne and family are here—very lively. We had a jolly New Year's Eve gathering at the Rassiases', at 6:00 p.m. because of the kids. The rituals continue: snails smothered in garlic followed by lamb and the βασιλόπιτα with quarters hidden for the children. . . . I've had to copyedit the proofs for my "Odysseus Across the Centuries" lecture, very badly set in type by the Society for the Preservation of the Greek Heritage. Also, I've corrected and revised two of Lena Stefa's translations of Stylianos's poems; more to go. And I've found more poems for the Fakazis project: by Decavalles, Zoë Karelli, Nikiforos Vrettakos, Palamas. Also spent considerable time preparing the agenda for MGSA's February meeting. And I finally emptied the valise we'd brought back from Thessaloniki last November 6th!

John and Mary Lincoln invited us to lunch at Simon Pearce's together with Nardi Campion. A jolly time. John's stroke leaves him with impaired speech, but we could understand him almost always. Nardi is coping, after Tom's death, answering thousands of letters that have arrived.

January 7, 2001

To: Bob Fagles
Subject: Antigone

Dear Bob,

I saw your lovely Antigone at the A.R.T. in Cambridge yesterday. What a good show! More accurately: how utterly exhausting (emotionally) for the audience! Have you seen it, or will you?

Assuming that you have or will, I won't go into detail. But—first of all—the language was 100% comprehensible yet at the same time sufficiently hieratic, elevated, in a word “poetic,” especially of course in the choruses, which are always the hardest to stage and which they did valiantly, even at first with masks and buskins, and later with dance and some percussive music.

Of course what strikes one is how utterly contemporary the play is. That was helped, I suppose, by the mixture of costume: the principals in dress of olden times but the male chorus outfitted as rather up-to-date soldiers. Creon seemed too much like Milošević.

The weakest part was Tiresias. Poor Alvin Epstein (who always plays himself no matter who the character) just did not have enough magical authority to effect the 100% reversal in Creon convincingly.

I liked the excesses of Antigone, who is played as a sort of Weatherman (the daughter of one of our dear friends here, a Quaker, was the well-to-do girl whose townhouse in New York blew up when she and other Weathermen were making bombs in the cellar—so all this is more than academic for me). And Haemon, too, was acted most effectively. Creon perhaps less so. In the 1950s I saw the play in Thessaloniki, with Irini Papa as Antigone and Manos Katrakis as Creon, staged on the basketball court of the local YMCA, and I still remember Creon's stare or glare as a kind of knife passing right through every member of the audience. Nothing like that, alas, at the A.R.T. yesterday, although we were in the 4th row.

But, as I said earlier, the play was exhausting for the audience in the best sense, meaning that from start to finish we were rapt out of ourselves and living the anguish of the characters on stage. It's good to be back to normal again . . . purged.

Sincerely,
Peter

January 25, 2001

What's happened since January 7th? On the 9th we went to Cadwalladers' for Quaker 8s. Each person was told to bring a quotation. I brought the ending of Molly's soliloquy, and it was chosen. We went into worship sharing mode, each person commenting. Most spoke about flowers and the marvel of creation. But others spoke about saying Yes instead of No. I thought of Cavafy's poem, of course. . . . On January 10th I posted two boxes of books on American and British literature to a student in Belgrade, daughter of a scientist whom we had met in Thessaloniki. She has no access to books; what they have are 40 years old. So I gleaned some beauties from my office boxes in the cellar. . . . Lunch on the 11th with

Irene Kacandes, who turns out to be offering this moment a “Homer Across the Centuries” course at Dartmouth. She includes “Omeros,” which I don’t, plus Krista Wolf’s “Cassandra.” . . . On the 14th, Business Meeting re: the renovation, now priced at $325,000. I spoke against, but the major effect of my sentiments was to energize those in support to voice their enthusiasm. So it seems that it will go ahead. . . . We also had a nice dinner party: Tom Laaspere was in unusual good spirits, smiling, talking about his war experience, and not asking to go home early (which he usually does). We had the Sheldons, too, and Jack and Ruth Hunter. Very jolly and cordial. . . . We are truly reaching the end of the book now. I finished vetting the Greek-English lexicon and also all the chapters. Of course Dimitri still wants to add expressions and a poem or two. All the art work is in from Θεανώ in Athens. Dimitri even obtained a permission letter from Mitropoulos. Amazing! But he still has not written his short preface, which has been promised since last July. I visited the apartment assigned to us; it’s no palace, but OK for a short stay. Also got an ID card, parking permit, e-mail access, locker in the Greek σπουδαστήριο in Firestone Library. Visited Butler College, where I’ll be teaching. The master told me that he wanted me as a fellow, but I have been “snatched away” by Forbes College. So I walked over to Forbes. There, the Director of Studies turned out to be my former student, John Hodgson, whom fortunately I remembered (he visited at Dartmouth, became a professor of English because of me, he said, sent a daughter to Dartmouth). Very friendly. We had lunch “in hall.” I get five free dinners a week. Thursday lunches the fellows congregate. He may even have an office for me. Very nice. Also, Mache told me that the chair of the Classics Department is another former student of mine who told her that his best course at Dartmouth was mine. Gratifying! . . . On Wednesday, January 17 Hellenic Studies had a βασιλόπιτα party, with about 20 people present. Afterwards, Dimitri, the Keeleys, David Connolly, and I went out for a splendid dinner. And I got back to Palmer House in time to see another video in the jazz series that has been running for two weeks. Fascinating and informative, not only about the music but also about black America—the total discrimination and segregation that blacks faced until quite recently. Among other things, I learned that the expression “Hey, man” was cultivated by blacks because the southern whites so often called them “Boy” no matter what their age. . . . Returning home on Thursday January 18th I learned to my dismay that Jim Alatis mis-managed the arrangements at Georgetown for our MGSA Symposium in October. The dates he chose now turn out to be parents' weekend, and we cannot use any of the facilities! . . . Visited Phyllis Deutsch at UPNE and asked her to blitz Dimitris saying that the book cannot be delayed again. I actually brought the manuscript back with me, but I still have lots of typing to do and then need to print out a new copy. . . . On Saturday, January 20 went to Kendal. Supper with Lisa Mayer and others on the Webster Committee; then introduced Mrs. Shin, stressing her expertise as a teacher. She gave a really unsatisfactory concert, playing virtuoso pieces that made her strain. No magic, except perhaps in the two Brahms intermezzi she did, the only pieces that did not require huge technique. . . . After Meeting on the 21st, Jack Hunter conducted Bible study. We spent two hours on ten verses in Mark: Jesus' temptation and the start of his ministry and the "recruitment" of Zebedee's sons. Chrysanthi recited the passage for everyone in Greek. . . . On January 23: vetted the printed version of my "Odysseus Across the Centuries" talk, which the Society for the Preservation of the Greek Heritage is printing. So poorly set; all the poetry wrong. I'll need to see the next set of proofs. To the Fleet Bank to meet with J. T. Underwood and Cindy Neily regarding my father's trust and mother's custody account, which together are now worth two million. And Fleet has done wonderfully: a 3% profit since last time despite the falling stock market. We made some changes and took out some money for gifting. J. T. is a reader; he is into Shaw right now, reading Man and Superman. I'm going to send him my recording of the Arts of Death speech and I encouraged him to go see The Doctor's Dilemma at the A.R.T. . . . Lunch with Steve Scher, just back from Berlin and excited about going to Sydney in July. I told him about our stopovers in Hawaii and then Tahiti when we went in 1983. Then to the dentist. Then at 4:00 to a special lecture-demonstration by Yoyo Ma about his "Silk Road Project"—namely, discovery of the marvels of Asiatic music. He played a Mongolian sort of cello but also played his own cello, so beautifully, and spoke well. He repeatedly expressed gratitude for his liberal arts education at Harvard as opposed to a conservatory education. At 6:00 we had guests at another successful dinner party, this time with Robert Binswanger, Jim and Carol Armstrong, Margery and Alan Walker, and Chris Dye, a very lively, compatible crowd plus a super dinner: spanakopita, lamb, meringues for dessert. I gave Jim my Odysseus talk; he seemed pleased. He's an ex-classicist who still loves things Greek. . . . Today, to Philadelphia and then to Dan's at Lumberton. He had just returned from twelve days in Florida and hadn't practiced at all. So Thompson and Husa were very rough. But they improved as we went over them again and again. It would be so nice if he learned the notes. But we had lots of good talk about "the airport" (of course), Pendle Hill, Daphne's new home in Riparius, and George W. Bush as usurper.

February 1, 2001

To Princeton, 324 So. Stanworth Drive

Drove to Princeton in our Buick, Chrysanthi having decided at the last minute to come, so I canceled the reservation for a rental car. First use of the E-Z pass, which worked. I love technology! Our quarters are actually quite nice: large (2 bedrooms), lots of closet space, a full kitchen, laundry machines next door, a lawn in back, parking in front, etc., and lots of light.

Friday, February 2, 2001

Washington

To Washington by train. Met Deanna at Kennedy Center and heard a fine concert, seated this time in back of the orchestra in the first row, in full view of the audience. The high spot was Radu Lupu playing Beethoven's 4th piano concerto. Our view of him was "intimate." He is extraordinarily relaxed, or seems so, looking away from the instrument, communicating very obviously with the conductor (Alan Gilbert), and of course playing with exquisite control and feeling. What a contrast to Mrs. Shin the other night! Equally enticing was the 2nd half, devoted to Rachmaninoff's Symphonic Dance, which is a show-off piece for a huge orchestra including harp, piano, saxophone, gongs, xylophone, marimba, etc., etc. We were right over the percussionist, who had to race back and forth among his various instruments. Fun to watch and hear.

Saturday, February 3, 2001

MGSA Executive Board at Georgetown University. Everyone present. Tom Gallant has made much progress on the symposium program, but the venue remains unsettled. We all returned to the Holiday Inn for supper with the marketing director there, who showed us the facilities (mediocre) after serving us a mediocre supper (gratis). Jim Alatis and his wife Penelope will try to have us meet at Georgetown after all. We hope that his capable assistant, Ai-Hui Tan, will arrange everything, including the banquet. Afterwards, some of us continued pleasantly over cocktails in the bar.

Sunday, February 4, 2001

Began with the Fund-Raising Committee meeting over breakfast and then spent the rest of the morning in plenary sessions discussing the reports of our various committees. All in all, a productive two-day meeting. Afterwards, I met Deanna, Leander, Sophia, Nicholas, and Chrysanthi in Union Station, where we all indulged in the food court. But in the afternoon I was able to spend some time in the National Gallery, a special exhibition devoted to Alfred Stieglitz and all the painters he aided, especially Arthur Dove, Marsden Hartley (nice picture with Maine subjects), Georgia O'Keefe of course, and John Marin, among others. Some beautiful work, all showing the importance of a gallery, in this case Stieglitz's.

Monday, February 5, 2001

324 S. Stanworth Drive, Princeton

Leon Black telephoned. His son Josh was not accepted for Bill Miles's summer program in France. He wants me to intervene. I spoke to Bill, who accepted Josh for next year. Leon very friendly; invited us to supper when we're in New York.

Tuesday, February 6, 2001

We're getting settled little by little in Princeton. Such a nice town! Fine tour of Firestone Library today, together with one of the Hellenic fellows, Angelos Delivorrias, director of the Benaki Museum. Also lots of help at the computer center setting me up for e-mail using a local server. Then met with Dimitri to go over MGSA business resulting from our meetings. And at 7:30 in Butler College, my first class. Eleven students. Went well. The three hours didn't drag. We discussed Odysseus's character as seen in the Iliad. Students are articulate and not shy.

Wednesday, February 7, 2001

Alexander Nehamas took several of the fellows and me to lunch at Prospect. Very grand. Good way to begin to get to know people. Then visits to various offices to get better settled. After supper, went to hear Bob Hollander and his wife (both colleagues at Columbia grad school) recite from their new translation of Dante's Inferno. Not great.

Thursday, February 8, 2001

My first Fellows' Lunch at Forbes, where I'm entitled to 10 meals a week. Nice to meet colleagues and to share with John Hodgkin, my true host at Forbes.

Friday, February 9, 2001

Chrysanthi has a bad cold, or the flu, coughing, aches, maybe temperature. I went to hear Liana Sakelliou's paper on Seferis's "Thrush." OK, but more an appreciation than an analysis. A few of us had supper at the Annex and then went to Richardson—Liana and David Connolly—to hear the Brentano String Quartet. They did a quartet by Charles Wuorinen that was excruciating, and 25 minutes long. Stravinsky's "3 Pieces" are often as dissonant and wild, but redeemed by melodic interludes and also brevity. Probably 4 minutes of Wuorinen might have been interesting.

Sunday, February 11, 2001

To Huntington, Long Island

Bus to New York. Limousine picked us up at the Yale Club and took us to Jeff and Teresa Murphy's in Huntington. Very hospitable. Sweet children. Sister, brother-in-law, grandfather (stockbroker who knew and admired Walter Frank). Fancy lunch. Then to Sophia Center, a huge seminary that used to have hundreds of seminarians studying for the priesthood and now has 25, mostly foreign, and mostly second-rate, as Father Smith informed me later. I lectured on Kafka's "Metamorphosis" and "The Trial" to a good audience including several of Jeff's lawyer colleagues whom it was nice to see again. Lots and lots of questions. Afterwards a fine Italian meal with Jeff, Teresa, and Father Smith, whom I hope to entice to Pendle Hill. Limousine back to the city.

Tuesday, February 17, 2001

My Roland electronic keyboard arrived. I'll get used to it, I suppose. The second class again went well. One student dropped, so now I have ten. Very comfortable. We did Ajax and Philoctetes.

Wednesday, February 14, 2001

Lunch with Mike Keeley, Yannis Fakazis, Peter Constantine and David Connolly to talk more about our translation project. Fakazis still wants a full introduction. We hope that Anghelaki-Rooke can write it, or Constance Tagopoulos. . . . My first office hours, at Butler. Two students came and we had a useful time together.

Friday, February 16, 2001

I lectured on Ritsos's "Painterly Technique" for the Hellenic Program. Michael the archeologist called my approach "alchemical," but Angelos liked it.

Saturday, February 17, 2001

Dimitri and I are working every day, going through the English-Greek lexicon word by word. Slow but important. Long lunch with David Connolly, who hopes to have more professional engagement with institutions, journals, etc. in America. He is a sweet guy and was terribly mistreated, it seems, by the Ionian University. He has taken out Greek citizenship; now he must do his military service, but only three months' worth.

Sunday, February 18, 2001

Angelos, Dimitri, Chrysanthi, and I went to the Keeleys' for supper and lots of good conversation.

Monday, February 19, 2001

Dumbarton Leas

We drove to Dan's for practice (not bad—he had learned his part much better) followed by his home-cooked supper. Very nice. I forgot to say that yesterday Alec and family and Daphne and family visited. We all had brunch in Butler College. Christina admired all the "castles" on the Princeton campus. She's been accepted to Marymount School, where she'll go, also to Friends Seminary and Hewitt. What a relief! . . . Watched some of Joe Losey's "Don Giovanni" with great pleasure.

Tuesday, February 20, 2001

Lunch at Forbes with Joan and Tom Wilson, just back from the Amazon and Machu Picchu. They're moving to Kendal at Hanover in ten days. Worked with Dimitri again; we're getting closer. My third class. Students' papers were due and they made presentations, sharing their work with the rest of the class.

Wednesday, February 21, 2001

Talk by David Connolly on principles for translation in general and translation of Engonopoulos in particular. He speaks well and has lots to say, but his usual principle is the opposite of Mike's and mine. We try to adopt the text to English; David adapts English to the text. Fine dinner afterwards, about 30 people. And I finished xeroxing the first installment of Greek Today for UPNE: front matter, Before We Begin, Lessons 1 & 2, Before We End, Appendices A, B, C, D, E.

Thursday, February 22, 2001

Yale Club

Sent the material to UPNE via Fed Ex. I hope to send everything else by the end of next week. . . . Walked to the Dinky. Train to New York. Visited Ambassador Tsilas at the Onassis Center at 3:00. Very friendly and welcoming. But he referred to the "problem" with MGSA, namely Karakasidou. We agreed that that was past history and should now be forgotten, so that we may cooperate. I invited Onassis to mount an exhibit at Georgetown in October. We also talked about the poetry reading scheduled for April 11 and a possible bench reading for Life in the Tomb sometime. Then I was shown around the current exhibit, which includes good canvases by Tsarouchis and Ghikas, but nothing by Sikeliotis. . . . Next went to the Foundation for Hellenic Culture on 57th Street to see Katy Myrivilis again after so many years. She's fine, except of course she laments the loss of Lambis at age 59 from lung cancer (he was a heavy smoker). She's happy to have my Life in the Tomb published again by Fakazis, and sees no impediment. I also invited the Foundation to collaborate with MGSA in October. She'll think about that. . . . Back to the Yale Club in the snow. Then Chrysanthi and I walked to Sheila Baird's on East 37th between Park and Lexington. The ground floor and basement of a brownstone: beautiful plaster work, high ceilings, garden out back. All the AFS trustees were there, for socializing and fellowship. Everyone asked me about the Dartmouth murders, which now seem to have been motivated by neo-Nazi propaganda, that the holocaust didn't exist, etc. We left at 7:00 in order to get to Leon and Debra Black's for dinner. They live in baronial splendor at Park and 72nd in a duplex apartment that is filled with Leon's art collection: original Turners, Picassos, Monets, Manets, Rembrandts, Michelangelos, Seurats, Van Goghs, Cézannes, Brancusis, Modiglianis, and a Degas, Delacroix, Corot, Hals, Pollock, Matisse, plus Chinese bronzes from 3000+ B.C. to A.D. 100. Like the Frick Collection. And he is now on the boards of the Met and MoMA. So his wealth has a purpose: feeding his "addiction" to collect art in a discriminating way. Debra, too, is active in community good works.

And the four children are lovely: Ben, Josh, Alex, and Victoria. Two of the boys have been reading the Odyssey in Bob Fagles' translation, so we had a lively discussion about their teachers' interpretations and misinterpretations. I thought to myself: How nice if our grandchildren turn out like this when they're 6, 11, 13, and 17 years old! The meal began with candles, yarmulkes and Alex reciting the proper prayer in Hebrew (although he confessed that he didn't know what it meant). Leon took us around the collection, elucidating everything, and especially the various Chinese dynasties. He also remembered Leander, Alec, and Daphne and hopes to meet Daphne when we all gather again for another meal. How nice!

Friday, February 23, 2001

AFS committees. Post-secondary chaired by John Cleave in Yannis Vezyroglou's absence. Then Student Life chaired by Jenny Fenton. They've decided to have English-speaking interns, after being pestered by Annie Levis and me for two years. David Buck says that he is interested in Don Nielsen's proposal for a sort of Outward Bound program, but must talk to staff about it. In the plenary session we were instructed meaningfully by a fund-raising consultant whose handouts I hope to use also for MGSA. . . . Afterwards I went to Patelson's to buy the Diabelli Variations and assorted Chopin and some four-hand music, then to Carnegie Hall to pick up our tickets for Alfred Brendel in April, then to Steinway Hall to ask about pianos for Kinhaven. A new Boston goes for about $26,000 but a new Steinway is $55,000. They give 20% discount to institutions. And the wreck now at Pendle Hill will have a certain trade-in value. . . . At the Yale Club, Maxwell Anderson, Dartmouth graduate, spoke about the Whitney, which he now directs. He kindly brought me up to date about his father, whose writing on Joyce was so important. Oh, I forgot to write that Leon also collects first editions. He has a copy of Ulysses, the "blue book" printed in France, and also something with Joyce's scribbled additions and corrections.

Saturday, February 24, 2001

Full AFS board, 9:00 to 1:00. Ambassador Niles spoke well about future EU funds, which surely are going to go to Poland, Hungary, etc., rather than to Greece. George David, head of Coca-Cola in Greece, spoke well about the economic and political situation. Some of us are beginning to think that both the School and the College need to change their name so that the name does not seem to restrict their mission solely to agriculture. . . . Chrysanthi and I then went up to Daphne's. Greg is leaving for Hong Kong tonight. Chrysanthi is going to stay for a week. I returned by bus, alone, to Princeton.

Monday, February 26, 2001

Nice supper with Tom and Joan Wilson, who have sold their house and will be moving to Kendal at Hanover next Sunday.

Tuesday, February 27, 2001

My third class. We read poetry: Du Bellay, Seferis, Cavafy, Ritsos, Auden. Hard to be sure if anything is really meaningful to these students, but who knows? I need to be optimistic.

Wednesday, February 28, 2001

Gonda Van Steen is here for a week. I brought her to Forbes and introduced her to John Hodgson and Allison Cook in the hope that they'll invite her to be a Fellow next year. Had office hours in Butler from 4:30 until 8:00 (!), going over student papers. Supper at the Annex, where Tom and Joan were celebrating their departure with friends.

Thursday, March 1, 2001

Princeton–Pendle Hill

Met with Mike Keeley in the morning to go over the Fakazis project, about which Mike continues to be very negative. We're both going to read over some additional translations to see which we want in, which out. . . . Worked again with Dimitri. He still keeps adding to the book, incorrigibly. But I think we'll finish by the end of March.

Friday, March 2, 2001

Pendle Hill

All day in meetings. Book Committee re: the Woolman volume. Pubs Committee accepted a beautiful essay on hospice care. Evening: Board and Staff together in the Barn to listen to staff (and students) summarize findings re: Pendle Hill history in various areas: curriculum, community, service, etc. Very well done.

Saturday, March 3, 2001

Pendle Hill–Hanover

More reportage in the Barn in the morning re: Steve Baumgartner's strategic planning, followed by questions and discussion re: affirmative action, the possibility of giving a certificate for completed study, etc. I suggested—perhaps!—an MA program in collaboration with the University of Pennsylvania, modeled on what Ben Pink Dandelion has done at Woodbrooke with the University of Birmingham. Over lunch and until 2:30, the Board sequestered, hearing Steve's summary of new developments (in thought, not yet in action). He pledges himself to have PH racially diverse by 2015. I doubt it. . . . I then flew to Hanover, ahead of a snowstorm, in order to find the Joyce notes that I stupidly neglected to bring in February. Found them in the bottommost carton, buried beneath five others. Chrysanthi is sick again, alas—sore throat, cough, like before.

Sunday, March 4, 2001

Luckily, landed in Philadelphia again before the snow, which began in earnest as I was driving back to Princeton. So much to do! AFS, Fakazis, PH, my course, Greek Today, and the upcoming lectures in New York and Washington. A man in Melbourne wrote beautifully on Kazantzakis and existentialism, inspired by my Pendle Hill pamphlet. I hope the Pubs Committee will accept this one.

Friday, March 9, 2001

Worked with Mike Keeley again, choosing poems for the Fakazis book, followed by lunch and then Mache Karanika's talk at Hellenic Studies on women's laments in Byzantine times and thereafter. I mentioned the professional mourners at Chrysanthi's mother's funeral, and also the vibrant singing of girls going off to the vintage in Αγία Τριάδα.

Saturday, March 10, 2001

Cambridge

Joyful reunion with Chrysanthi in South Station. We missed each other exceedingly. To the A.R.T. to see Shaw's The Doctor's Dilemma, not his best, to be sure, yet remarkable for its time and brave criticism of the medical profession and also of "moral correctness" as opposed to the amorality of a creative artist. Star of the show was Will Le Bow as Sir Ralph Bonington. The lead, Sir Colenso, played by John Feltch, was adequate only, no real depth in the portrayal. Alvin Epstein was at his best as the aged Dr. Blenkinsop.

Sunday, March 11, 2001

An extraordinary experience: seeing Brecht's Mother Courage at the A.R.T. with Karen MacDonald brilliant in the leading role and (my favorite) Mirjana Jakovic equally brilliant as Kattrin, the mute daughter. The director was brought from Budapest—János Szász. Extraordinary power and imagination, a total condemnation of war and an examination of war's mercantile aspect: it provides a living for certain people (typified by Mother Courage). Brecht's total theater is startling when compared to Shaw's traditional dramaturgy. In Brecht there is song, movement, solo action, choral action: everything. But all controlled, emotionally as well as intellectually.

Tuesday, March 13, 2001

Class: Joyce's "Proteus" through "Lestrygonians." Even my best student, Scott, is dismayed and disheartened by what he calls Joyce's "showing off." How to get beyond this is the problem, especially on a first reading.

Wednesday, March 14, 2001

Dan came and we rehearsed the Virgil Thompson and the Husa. He's still having much trouble, especially with the timing of the Husa. It's discouraging for me, but I remain patient.

Saturday, March 17, 2001

An important day. Carol Sheehan came; she's going to copyedit our book for UPNE. Dimitri and I sat with her for three hours, and she took the manuscript with her—most of it (I still need to do the two lexica at the end, and of course Dimitri still hasn't written his preface). But essentially the monster has been delivered. . . . Last night I had supper with the Sheehans, Don and Carol, at their son Rowan's apartment. He is finishing a degree in musical composition. He sings beautifully, as do they all. For grace, they faced the icons (they're all converts to Russian Orthodoxy, and Don is a sub-deacon), sang the Lord's Prayer in four-part harmony, acapella, effortlessly. Then served a very fine dinner. Don and Carol's home in Sharon, Vermont, is without electricity and built by their own hands. (Correction: they recently installed some solar panels, so they have electric light and can run a computer, if the sun is out). Rowan has a terrible stutter, but he keeps on stammering until the word finally comes.

Sunday, March 18, 2001

More material from Dimitri. When will he stop?! But I finished the Greek-English lexicon and delivered it to Carol. Then treated myself to a video of Horowitz palyng Schumann's Scenes from Childhood. Lovely!

Tuesday, March 20, 2001

To Washington

Overnight at Leander's. His rebuilt piano sings. I sight-read Beethoven variations; then we played Virgil Thompson together and Husa, which Leander particularly likes. He says that Dan and I should do Der Abend as well as Kleines Scherzo, which probably Dan won't master.

Wednesday, March 21, 2001

Washington

A very fine meeting for two and a half hours with Jim Alatis and Ai-Hui Tan over lunch at the Georgetown faculty club. I gave Ai-Hui $2000 to cover her good work. We talked about rooms, finances, food, hotels, publicity. Very cordial. Ai-Hui will come to Princeton at the end of the month to meet with Dimitri and go over the materials that were used for the last symposium. . . . Then by train to NYC, working for three hours straight on the English-Greek lexicon, which is slow going. Bad weather in New York: high winds, heavy rain. And a scaffold collapsed in front of the Yale Club. All the streets are roped off. So I had oysters Rockefeller in the station. Afterwards, a policeman wisely suggested that I telephone the Club. I was advised that they have a service entrance on 44th between Madison and Vanderbilt. So I got in, finally, very wet and a bit tired. . . . Andreas Yiannakos published a short essay (vanity press) dedicated to his father. I'm trying to read it, but the Greek is very difficult. He's a philosopher, an abstract thinker.

Thursday, March 22, 2001

Worked well on Appendix H in the morning. Then a long, pleasant lunch at the Yale Club with Serena Joyce: lots of talk about the Farm School, and her brother James Joyce (!). I hope that she'll attend our MGSA symposium in October. . . . Then to East 95th Street to be interviewed by a member of the firm supervising Kinhaven's proposed capital campaign. I was frank about the need for transition plans to a post-Bidlack and post-Bethlehem school. And I doubted that raising $1.6 million to build a new concert hall was feasible. Urged by Leander two days ago not to say anything negative about the Bidlacks (since vengeance is taken on him) I indicated that I thought the School was well administered now, which indeed it is, since it fills up each summer, has a good faculty, and ends in the black. I said I could probably contribute $5000 but not more, especially considering the current bear market. . . . In the evening, to Merkin Hall to hear Izzy (Gardner) Ganz. While waiting, I sat unknowingly next to Abbie, her husband, and in back of Debbie Gardner. Their conversation soon made it apparent who they were and we had a joyful reunion. Debbie says she remembers the tractor at Terpni. Abbie is an 80-year-old punster who has every possible physical defect but still seems vibrant. Izzy performed a “happening,” I suppose—directed by daughter Debbie and composed by Christopher Vassiliades, who, I later discovered when we met (a) loves Kazantzakis and my translations, (b) was Leander’s classmate in Robert Goldsand’s studio at the Manhattan School of Music. So we had lots to talk about. The “happening” or (perhaps) opera, entitled “Eve,” was an ongoing lament about everything. (But Vassiliades assured me that he has also written an uproariously funny comic piece.) Izzy went through the motions of injecting herself repeatedly with crack, of rolling in agony on the floor, etc., but singing most of the time in her deep, strong mezzo-soprano voice. At one point she accompanied herself on an electronic piano; throughout the rest she was “accompanied” by computer tape going swish-swish. I found it pretentious and very unbeautiful, but I guess I’m a square. Apparently it was composed for Izzy. The second half was devoted to the music of a black basist called Brian Smith. First voice and piano, then a trio with clarinet, bass (played by the composer) and marimba, finally a string quartet. Unpleasant music, always too long, but with interesting moments, and a merimba part that was fun to watch played with gusto. The audience in Merkin, at least tonight, is very different from an audience at Carnegie Hall or Lincoln Center. Lots of blacks, lots of Jews, lots of mulattos. The artsy crowd. Afterwards we all went to a restaurant—Vassiliades and his crowd, Izzy and hers, Debbie and her collaborator in TV production work. Lots of extroverts. Dirty jokes, guffaws, good cheer. I felt somewhat out of place, but not entirely.

Friday, March 23, 2001

To Philadelphia

By train to Philadelphia. AMTRAK Metroliners now have a quiet car—no cell phones allowed. What a pleasure! To Pendle Hill to meet some of the QUIP people. Anthony Manousos was there; nice to see him after so many years. Also Susan Corson-Finnerty, the editor of Friends Journal, who told me that they have just received the issue containing my article "How to Be Happy." At last! Over lunch, the man from Barclay Press explained how with a $28,000 machine they can now produce books on demand (but binding and covers need to be done elsewhere), enabling them to do print runs of 200. We've got to advance, too, to this digital technology. . . . Drove to Chestnut Street to go to Jacobs Music Company, the official Steinway dealer. To my great surprise, I learned from Valerie, the institutional head, that Pendle Hill can get a new Steinway M (5 foot 7 inches) for just about the same price as Zenier would charge to rebuild our existing O (six foot one inch): $24,500. This is because Pendle Hill gets a 20% institutional discount, plus $6500 trade-in for the decrepit Steinway in Waysmeet. We talked also about a Boston (for around $11,000) and a Yamaha (for about $16,000). She played all three. The Steinway really is better sounding. I've offered Steve Baumgarner $10,000 for the new Steinway if he can come up with the balance. . . . Met Chrysanthi in 30th Street Station; she had returned from the weeks' babysitting for Leander, with lots of stories of how horrible Sophia is. Too bad.

Sunday, March 25, 2001

Went to Princeton Friends Meeting for the first time. A very old (18th century) Meeting House, very quaint. But the vocal ministry was pathetic. People very friendly afterwards, however. . . . Listened to Richter's CD of the Diabelli Variations. Actually, I don't like everything he does. Am eagerly awaiting our trip to Carnegie Hall in April to hear Brendel's playing. I'm trying to learn the easier ones; it's slow going. . . . In the late afternoon, I finished typing Appendix H, the English-Greek dictionary. That ate up a week of my life, but at least it's done.

Monday, March 26, 2001

Hooray! Mercer University Press is going to accept Brenda Marder's book! What a relief!

Thursday, March 29, 2001

Nice visit by Margaret Fraser from Pendle Hill. We went to the Princeton Art Museum. There's a lovely Burne-Jones stained glass window of Saint Cecilia, among other treasures. Then to a lecture by Hermione Lea on suicide and death in literature and biography, culminating in the case of Virginia Woolf, whose biography she has just written (I heard her read from it two days ago). A fine scholar and lecturer. Then supper, excellent, at Forbes.

Saturday, March 31, 2001

Chrysanthi is sick again: infected ear. Very glum. We went to the doctor yesterday and then again today. . . . Met with Ai-Hui Tan and John Iatrides and Dimitri to make further arrangements for the MGSA symposium. Greg Nagy has indicated that he'd like to cooperate, as has the Society for the Preservation of the Greek Heritage. . . . Nice visit with John and Woody Wilson over dinner at an Indian restaurant. John will finish eight years as dean of graduate studies next year and then retire two years beyond that. They've made no plans for the long-term.

Sunday, April 1, 2001

Philadelphia

Visited with Alec, Monica, and Theo. They were very excited to see us. Huge brunch in a hotel. Walked to see the new concert hall under construction, the lovely hotel with a lobby imitating the Roman Pantheon, and the old Wanamaker's store, now Lord and Taylor's, with its huge central hall and immense organ.

Monday, April 2, 2001

Randy Warner has finished copyediting part 1 of Brenda's book. I sent her my files electronically to produce a clean copy. We're moving forward nicely on this. And I finished the first draft of my talk on ritual and Ritsos's Moonlight Sonata for Harvard at the end of April, referring to Quakerism, mowing, Anastenarides as my own brushes with ritual. My "How to Be Happy" just appeared in Friends Journal. Let's see if anyone reads it. (Margaret Fraser did and liked it.)

Thursday, April 5, 2001

NYC

To NYC by bus. Supper at Daphne's. Christina raced across the hall to embrace me. What a pleasure! Andrew is a bundle of laughter and energy, but he doesn't talk. He had a second speech therapy yesterday. We're all assuming that this will pass, but what if it doesn't? Then to Carnegie Hall to hear Alfred Brendel, looking very old, but still totally vigorous at the keyboard. He did Haydn's Sonata in G minor, lovely, then the great D minor Mozart Fantasy that I used to play, but he did it so freely, so romantically that I'm sure Leander and other pedagogues would object. But Brendel obviously can do as he pleases. Then the equally great Mozart Sonata in A minor, K. 310, very bravura. The 2nd half, however, was the real reason we came: Beethoven's Diabelli Variations. Whew! Tempi! I couldn't come close, even in the easy variations, and the hard ones were like whirlwinds. Such a variety of moods and styles: arias, fugues, parodies. Brendel did everything very dramatically, bringing out the contrasts. Program notes said that this was the last major work that Beethoven wrote for the keyboard, and of course he was totally deaf. It's impossible to fathom. I had the score, and followed it carefully. A great joy. The man next to us was McNeill, from the McNeill-Lehrer hour on television. Carnegie was sold out, and gave Brendel a loud standing ovation at the end.

April 8, 2001

Hanover

Flew to Hanover last night to get certain materials from my study, to check bibliographic details for Aspasia, and to attend Business Meeting this morning, summoned by Hugh MacArthur since the chief agenda item was consideration, once more, of the renovation project. I presented the latest treasurer's figures, showing that we had already spent more for architectural fees than had been collected for the Building Fund and also that annual fund contributions are only 80% of budget, although only three weeks remain in the fiscal year. Nevertheless, almost everyone was eager to proceed with the $325,000 project. Even those who had demurred in the past—Audrey Logan, Treat Arnold, I, Lafayette Noda—spoke up voicing our willingness to stand aside. So a minute was drafted giving the go-ahead to Jack Hunter and others on the fund-raising committee to try to raise $100,000 at least. . . . I was booked for a 3:10 flight back to Philadelphia. In the event, I needed 25 hours to get to Princeton. Everything was canceled owing to fog in Philadelphia. So I spent another night at home in Hanover, got up at 4:45 to catch the 6:00 a.m. flight, which was also canceled, finally flew out to New York, waited several hours there, was booked onto a 12:15 flight to Philadelphia, which was delayed an hour. Arrived home at 3:00 p.m. But luckily I had the Spyridon biography with me, so made lots of progress reading.

Tuesday, April 10, 2001

Very good class tonight, the last on Ulysses. We covered Eumaeus, Ithaca, and Penelope. Scott Nancarrow brought his high school English teacher to observe. He, at least, seems to have discovered the marvel of Ulysses and some of the others have also, although people like Miss Whitney prefer The Great Gatsby.

Wednesday, April 11, 2001

Dan came again to practice. He still doesn't know his notes and needs to count out loud "one-and-two-and," although he says he can play everything perfectly when he is alone, but at half speed, of course. Very discouraging. We went to lunch again at Forbes with Paul Bou-habib, who is interested in the Seeger case. . . . At 4:00 p.m. we went off to Manhattan in a stretch limousine with Mike and Mary Keeley and Bob and Lynne Fagles. Lots of fun going but then we got stuck in traffic, worried, and arrived at the Onassis center with only seconds to spare. The hall was full. Warm greetings from Ambassador Loukas Tsilas. Serena came; also Burt Pike. Bob read beautifully from Odyssey XXIV, the reunion of Odysseus and Penelope. Mike read Cavafy's "Trojans" and "Ithaca," Seferis's "King of Asine," Ritsos's "Nausicaä" (which I didn't know), and "Penelope's Despair." I did Ritsos's "Moonlight Sonata" accompanied by the cassette of Casadesus playing Beethoven. Peter Constantine read short poems by Kondós and others, not very memorable, and the poet Χατσόπουλος, flown in from Athens, spoke at length, boringly, about the nature of translation, all abstractions, no examples, but then read two lovely poems of his own in Greek (one called "Nemesis") which were followed by David Connolly's very flatfooted translations. Oh, Constantine also read a superb poem by Constance Tagopoulos, who was present and recited it in Greek—on Apollo, the Sun. Saw various old friends afterwards: Rachel Hadas for example. Then went with Constance, her partner Peter, Peter Constantine, Chrysanthi, and Burt to Lindy's for cheesecake. People seemed very moved by the "Moonlight Sonata," not surprisingly.

Friday, April 20, 2001

Pendle Hill

General Board at Pendle Hill, but I was mostly interested in the piano. I got Denny and Steve Jackson and Shirley Dodson to agree on a spot for it in the foyer of the barn. I got Richard Barnes to write a purchase order and Denny to agree to sign it. Leander contacted Ignat, who owns and loves the Yamaha piano and who confirmed that this was the way to go.

Leander agreed, and warned against the Boston, which falls to pieces after about a year whereas the Yamaha has very fine durability.

Saturday, April 21, 2001

Pendle Hill

Finally caught Steve and got him to agree. I'll pay half ($8500) and he will raise the other half. I ministered in Meeting about the nature of ritual, emphasizing the need to have faith that it will somehow change the outside world. After lunch drove to Philadelphia, picked up Alec and we all went to Jacobs Music. I played the Yamaha C3 (6 foot 1 inch) and loved it; it's bright, with a mellow base and a brilliant treble. I actually like it more than the Steinway B (5 foot 7 inches), which was much more subdued. I tried a few of the Diabelli variations on each, a good test because they're so expressive. Bought the Yamaha plus a vinyl cover that I paid for myself. Easy! And cheap: $17,000, owing to the institutional discount plus the $6500 that they give us for the junk Steinway in Waysmeet. Done! It will be delivered next week. . . . Nice supper in a quiet restaurant, with Alec and Chrysanthi. Then to the Philadelphia Orchestra in the Academy: a spectacular concert—Mozart's Piano Concerto no. 20 in D minor K.466 played gorgeously by Angela Hewitt, then Mahler's Symphony no. 1, performed exquisitely by this superb orchestra conducted by a young Russian, Yakov Kreizberg. The Mahler is of course nice to see as well as hear, because it exploits all the resources of a huge orchestra: two sets of timpani, harp, augmented brasses, etc. The ideas are so original, the emotions so well controlled. It's hugely long, yet never tiresome, especially when one can see as well as hear.

Sunday, April 22, 2001

Little Yuki, the Japanese doll, is delighted that she'll be able to play the new piano. Margaret Fraser is overjoyed. (And Dan wants to concertize on it, as does Leander.) . . . A new development is Steve's decision to place Rebecca on probation if she doesn't voluntarily leave by next Wednesday. She's behind in two pamphlets and Steve just cannot let this continue. Richard, too, is fed up. I had long talks with Rebecca, trying to convince her that catastrophes can sometimes turn into opportunities, and in any case the religious approach to vicissitude is to convert it into something positive. I think she should leave, but she'll probably hang on for now. . . . Back in Princeton, went to a lecture on the photos of Athens taken by Félix Bonfils in the 19th century, and then to Firestone to see the exhibition. No cars, of course, no πολυκατοικίες, sparse population, a sort of large village with the Acropolis towering in the center.

Monday, April 23, 2001

Long relaxed lunch with Mihail Chrysanthopoulos, with lots and lots to talk about. What a pleasure!

Tuesday, April 24, 2001

Serena Joyce here. She found a beautiful write-up by Nancy Crawshaw, photos and text, of the Quaker school in Salonika published in 1951 in the Times Educational Supplement. We're having reproductions made. I treated her to lunch in Prospect. Then we all went to David Rudenstein's lecture on the Elgin Marbles. He's a lawyer and is interested in the legality of the firman from the sultan that allegedly allowed Elgin to remove the sculptures. Rudenstein's conclusion, so far, is that there is no evidence whatsoever for any such document and that the so-called translation presented to the parliamentary Special Committee in 1816 was fraudulent, a doctored translation of a document in Italian that probably was Elgin's application to the sultan. Fascinating. . . . We went to Forbes for supper, then Chrysanthi and I to Butler for my class, the first of two sessions in which the students presented, orally, their term papers. Ben Holstin however brought his clarinet and instructed the class on rondo form, using the Mozart clarinet concerto, all this being relevant to Molly Bloom's soliloquy, of course. Rachel Timinsky did a bang-up job, as always, with class participation, a monopoly game with Odysseus progressing toward Ithaca every time someone answered a question correctly. Even the weakest student, Sloan Fisher, did OK. One more week of this, and then a party on May 8.

Wednesday, April 25, 2001

To Dan's at Lumberton. The Thompson is going quite well, but Dan still needs to count one-and-two-and, etc. in the Husa.

Thursday, April 26, 2001

Long lunch and talk with Gonda Van Steen. I took her to Forbes, where I hope she'll be made a Fellow next year. . . . Then drove to Pendle Hill. Piano still not delivered.

Cambridge

Nicely housed at the Inn at Harvard. To Boylston Hall for "Ritual in Greece: Interdisciplinary Perspectives," marking the retirement of Margaret Alexiou. Lots of old friends. Dia and Wim, Thanos Veremis, Greg Nagy, Ruth Macrides, Vangelis Calotychos and his wife, Anna Stavrakopoulou, Michael and Nea Herzfeld, Charles Stewart, Laurie Hart, even Jan Ziolkowski. The first session was devoted to classics: Nagy on repletion in Homer, Yatromanolakis on Sappho, and Pat Easterling, who had been Meg's teacher at Cambridge, very interestingly on "new" and "forever" (= "incorruptibility" and "wastage" in Ritsos's language) in Greek drama. The second session was devoted to Byzantium. Ioli Kalavrezou was interesting on dance and Macrides on petitions. They had a "master of petitions" and I thought that Nikiforos Diamandouros should be called that now; he is PASOK's ombudsman, ο Συνήγορος του Πολίτη. Wim Bakker spoke on Ο θρήνος του Θεοτόκου and presented some exquisite poetry, especially the stanza in which the virgin entreats the cross to bend down so that she can kiss the dead Jesus. This was followed by a grand dinner in the Faculty Club, complete with toasts for Meg added to various testimonies voiced by speakers earlier.

Cambridge

The morning was devoted to Modern Greece. Dia spoke on the Cretan renaissance, Calotychos on the Balkans, Anna nicely on Karaghiozis, Panagiotis Roilos on Elytis as modernist, and I on a ritualistic approach to Ritsos's "Moonlight Sonata" followed by an abbreviated performance with the Beethoven music. It went well. In the afternoon, devoted to anthropology, Herzfeld spoke on "the ritualization of taxonomy" (!), Stewart on dream, and Laurie Hart, incomprehensibly, on architecture. Also, three papers on Welsh and Irish materials, honoring that side of Meg and her father. Also, deliciously, Andrea Useem came to meet me in the coffee break, by pre-arrangement. She married last Saturday and has converted to Islam, as has her husband. After finishing her M-Div at the Harvard School of Theology she hopes to return to journalism, as she should, because she is so very very good at it, and will now specialize in theological issues. She was radiant, and looked lovely in her Muslim head-cover. . . . I should add that this morning we had a long, leisurely breakfast at the hotel with Meg, reminiscing about the past and thinking of the future, especially Meg's appearance as keynote speaker at the MGSA symposium in October. The saddest news is that Pavlos has had three epileptic seizures, something not uncommon, says Meg, in autistics as they grow older.

Princeton

Went again to Princeton Friends Meeting. A truly gathered meeting this time, with good ministry about ecology. . . . Met my student Sam Choi at Forbes for an hour to help him with his term paper. I worry about Scott Nancarrow, who did so brilliantly at the start of the course and now seems paralyzed. He repeatedly says he is coming to office hours and then does not show up. . . . At 9:00 p.m., to Alchemist & Barrester's in Witherspoon Street to gather with others from Hellenic Studies to bid farewell to Angelos Delivorrias, who returns tomorrow to Athens. He's the director of the Benaki Museum, a big shot there, but here in Princeton a very friendly, warm, modest individual with strong, sensible opinions. We hope to see each other again.

Monday, April 30, 2001

Anna telephoned from the Onassis Foundation in New York. She wants to send me around the country lecturing for two weeks in October. One possibility is Vancouver, where we could see Jeff Ballard and family. And Onassis will pay transportation and hotel for Chrysanthi, too. . . . At 1:00 p.m. we went to the video conferencing room to examine Amherst students, via video hookup. Quite remarkable. We see them; they see us. Texts and pictures and handwriting come through well enough. A new experience. . . . Then bus to New York (Chrysanthi says she's beginning to like this varied life made possible by residence in Princeton). Quick supper with Daphne. Christina visited Marymount and met her teacher. Andrew is saying a few more words, but still very indistinctly. . . . We walked up Lexington to the 92nd Street "Y" for the "Tribute to Isaac Babel," with special VIP seats thanks to Babel's translator, Peter Constantine. The hall was filled, every seat. First Babel's daughter spoke, then Peter read a deliciously funny Babel screenplay about a Jewish production featuring a maid with pointed breasts and eyes congealed in lasciviousness. Cynthia Ozick read from her excellent introduction to the forthcoming book. Paul Auster read the lovely story "Guy de Maupassant." The poorest was Grace Paley, reading "Gedali." But then Elie Wiesel spoke inspiringly about the trial and execution of Babel in 1941, and how his silence condemned him in Stalin's eyes more than his utterances. The evening concluded with Nathalie Babel's overlong account of her mother's death. At the reception afterwards it was nice to congratulate Peter Constantine for this important book, and also to see Burt again.

Tuesday, May 1, 2001

To Butler College for a special dinner with a speaker who had been a CIA spy for 36 years in various locals, including Greece, which he said was a great posting for him because Athens was so very full of intrigue. For once we heard the real truth about spies, traitors, counter-intelligence, derring-do. He bugged foreign embassies, forestalled terrorist attacks, discovered American CIA agents who were double agents, spying for Russia, etc. Chilling. But real. . . . Afterwards, my final class, with five students making presentations. Scott Nancarrow, with whom I had an emergency tutorial in the afternoon, did very well. All the others were totally satisfactory, except Sam Choi, who doesn't have an oral gift, alas. Next Tuesday, our party.

Thursday, May 3, 2001

Delivered Chrysanthi to Trenton to take AMTRAK home so that she can vote in Town Meeting next week for the new Senior Center. Dan came to practice. Thompson going fairly well, Husa still not good. Lunch in Forbes again with Paul Bou-habib, whose dissertation is on John Locke and is therefore interested in conscientious objection and other limitations of state power, all of which Locke opposes. . . . Good session with Dimitri, finishing the revision of the English-Greek lexicon. . . . In the evening, went to hear a lecture by James Wolfensohn, president of the World Bank, on "Poverty in a World of Plenty." Excellent speaker, apparently devoted to alleviating poverty despite what his critics say. Horrendous statistics. Millions if not billions exist on $1 or $2 a day, still. Why are the dissidents so angry at the World Bank?

Friday, May 4, 2001

Pendle Hill

Sat with Steve Bamgartner talking about Rebecca. She has elected the probation period. Steve thinks (and hopes) that she will fail and expects to know by June. She is sure she'll succeed, of course. Everyone is delighted with the piano. I played Mozart and Beethoven on it. The treble is very bright, the bass OK but a bit grumpy. Good touch. And it fits well in the Barn. . . . Dan arrived in the afternoon; he is attending the Forum program. We played Thompson and Husa. Again: Thompson OK, Husa pretty tentative.

Saturday, May 5, 2001

Princeton

Carol Sheehan came again and showed Dimitri and me her copyediting strategies for front matter and Lesson 1. Very helpful. Dimitri still wants to change the arrangement at the start of each lesson, saving the cartoon for later. I disagree. We met again at 5:00 p.m. and worked out a good compromise that suits us both. . . . Watched Chaplin's "A King in New York," a bitter satire, and funny, on American boorishness, commercialism, and red-baiting.

Sunday, May 6, 2001

Went to the Westminster Choir School to hear Rowan Sheehan's presentation with a full evening of his compositions, mostly liturgical, for various combinations: two sopranos and cello, chorus, baritone and piano, organ, tenor and chorus. I didn't find the music very exciting—meager rhythmic interest, no counterpoint. But it was soothing. The real interest was the performance. Gorgeous. What voices!

Tuesday, May 8, 2001

Our class party in the basement café at Butler College, catered by "Oliver": Greek μεζεδάκια σπανακόπιτα, μουσακάς, μπακλαβάς. Then I showed the Joseph Strick film of Ulysses. The net effect of all this: hard to say. They're very reticent, very different from the Greek students I had in Thessaloniki.

Wednesday, May 9, 2001

Saw a student by accident and she said how good the food was. . . . To Dan's for final practice before we meet at Kinhaven. It's going better.

Thursday, May 10, 2001

I examined four students in the University of New Orleans taking elementary Greek. The best was a 70-year-old man who actually spoke Greek after only twelve weeks of instruction. All this was done by telephone, of course, unlike the Amherst exams I did last week by videoconferencing.

Friday, May 11, 2001

A symposium on nationalism moderated by Mark Mazower, who speaks as impressively as he writes.

Saturday, May 12, 2001

They came for my Roland electronic keyboard, which has given me much pleasure since February. Then to Philadelphia Street Fair on Walnut Street: music, dance, food. We had a nice Italian meal in a restaurant with Alec and family.

Monday, May 14, 2001

Nikos Christides arranged a little farewell dinner for me and Chrysanthi, inviting Sophia and Roxane. Very pleasant.

Tuesday, May 15, 2001

All the students turned in their term papers on time, except Scott Nancarrow, who had pneumonia last week and was in the hospital. I'll expect his on Saturday. Supper at the Keeleys' with Bruce and Tad Lansdale, and Bob and Lynn Fagles. Bruce had a brain operation that cured the trembling in one hand. He'll have a second operation for the other hand in November. But he seems very old, still.

Wednesday, May 16, 2001

To NYC to hear Patroclos Stavrou lecture on Kazantzakis at the Onassis Center—a very disorganized non-scholarly lecture with lots of quotes in Greek and English, of course all laudatory. He was very pleased to see me, it seemed. Afterwards met Loukas Skipitaris in the reception—the actor who did the tapes for Ιπτάμενος Θάλαμος. We might use him again for Greek Today. Supper at the Yale Club with Chrysanthi and Constance Tagopoulos with lots of good talk about Joyce's Ulysses and other books in Odysseus Across the Centuries, a course that she, too, is teaching.

Thursday, May 17, 2001

Prepared for AFS tomorrow and started reading Anita Brookner's The Bay of Angels, which I'll review for World Literature Today. Also finished reading and grading all the term papers, which ranged from one C+ to several A's, one A-minus, and several B-pluses. . . . Then to the Met. Lovely exhibit of Vermeer and the Delft school. His early "Christ in the House of Mary and Martha" (1655) is lovely, with Martha bustling about and Mary just sitting. There was the original of “Young Woman Studying at a Virginal” (1670), the reproduction of which we have in our bedroom. “The Glass of Wine” is also lovely. The colors of these originals are so bright and fresh. There’s also an exhibit of Byzantine jewelry and artifacts; not very impressive. The highlight was the Blake exhibit, on loan from Tate Modern. What a genius! I particularly admired “God Judging Adam” (1795), and of course “Newton” (1805) and the huge “Angel of the Revelation” (1803). I bought the catalogue, to enjoy at leisure. . . . Then to Daphne’s to see Christina and Andrew. Christina made me into her horse and tired me out. What energy! And I played peek-a-boo with Andrew, who is speaking a bit more now, but of course in a way that only Mother understands. Greg and Daphne came to the Yale Club for supper.

Friday, May 18, 2001

New York City

Committees: Post-Secondary with Yannis Vezyroglou, Secondary with Pandelis Panteliades, Student Life with Annie Levis. Then a plenary session with the Clinton administration’s chief State Department official for the Balkans, who gave us a fascinating “inside” picture of Milošević and the Bosnians and Montenegrins. Interestingly, although many have argued that the wars in the Balkans result from age-old ethnic and religious differences, his view is that most of the trouble results from a very small number of powerful, unscrupulous leaders out for power and money. They manipulate everyone else for their own advantage. He emphasized how incapable Milošević was of listening to advisers except those who agreed with him. . . . At 6:00 we walked to Sutton Place South to go to Eve Labouisse’s reception in a delightful apartment overlooking the East River. Ambassador Tsilas came at my invitation as did Anna Stavracopoulou and Amalia from the Onassis Foundation, whom Alex Drapos introduced as from the Niarchos (!) Foundation. Afterwards the Keeleys and John Cleave and Gail Grant went to Meltemi Restaurant, which I mistakenly thought was Molyvos, which sent Alex and Ami to 7th Avenue. But they joined us finally and we had a good Greek meal with lots of talk and laughter.

Saturday, May 19, 2001

NYC–Princeton

A long trustees’ meeting in the morning, 8:30 a.m. to 1:15 p.m. The English-speaking interns are all hired, and David wants them to have

Rassias training this summer. I convinced the Board to have a workshop on Greek education—TEE, TEI, Λύκεια, AEI. . . . Then back to Princeton by train.

Sunday, May 20, 2001

Hanover

Graded students; delivered grades. Easy drive back to Hanover, six hours, no traffic. I marvel at my “Easy-Pass” at toll stations.

Tuesday, May 22, 2001

Quaker 8s at Cadwalladers’ Billie Jo’s cancer is still responding to treatment, she says, although she has lost almost all of her hair.

Wednesday, May 23, 2001

Long lunch with John Rassias about Spyridon. (John is going to NYC to speak at an event celebrating the new biography.) . . . Flew to Philadelphia. Alec and Monica were out, so I had supper on Walnut Street in the same Italian restaurant we’d gone to previously. Then found them home and had a nice visit, except that I caught Theo’s cold.

May 25, 2001

Princeton

Intensive work yesterday and today with Dimitri and Mache shortening the book. We’ll put everything removed into a Workbook. Finished typing the corrected English-Greek lexicon. . . . Finally left 34 South Stanworth Drive.

May 26, 2001

Cambridge

To the A.R.T. for an imaginative, if zany, production of Richard II directed by Robert Woodruff, who’ll be replacing Brustein as head of A.R.T. next year. Lots of homosexual suggestion (more than suggestion) that didn’t add much, really. Richard played marvelously by Tommy Derrah (who’ll be Iago next year), and Bolinbroke equally well by Bill Camp. But the true marvel, of course, is Shakespeare’s language, plotting, and psychological insight. The incompetent, decadent Richard becomes a sort of artist. And Bolinbroke, the usurper, is a mixture of crass ambition plus an overpowering sense of sin that nevertheless does not overcome the ambition.

May 27, 2001

Riparius

To the farm. We planted the garden. Removed a huge pine branch fallen directly across our entrance. Leander’s cellar is dry, luckily. . . . Supper with Shapiros, who will be leaving in August for a new home in Queensbury. We celebrated my birthday with a lovely dinner.

May 28, 2001

Riparius

Started the tractor. Hooray! We drove home early and went to hear Joan Wilson perform Loeillet and other “old music” at Kendal: viola da gamba plus two recorders. Peter Tailer encourages us to apply for one bedroom and den, which will be easily available.

Dimitri Gondicas, Executive Director, Program in Hellenic Studies
58 Prospect Avenue, Princeton, NJ 08544

Dear Dimitri,

Thank you for your kind letter of May 24th. You ask about my class, my association with Forbes College, my research in the library, and my impression of the Program in Hellenic Studies.

My freshman seminar “Odysseus across the Centuries” was blessed with eight very capable students and only one who merely limped along. I’m glad to report that Agatha Gilmore, who had lots of Latin in high school and who wrote an “A” final paper on the voyages of Odysseus, Aeneas, and Bloom to the underworld, wants to start Ancient Greek next year. Rachael Timinsky, another “A” student in the course, is already studying Ancient Greek and hopes very much to go to Greece in her junior year. Scott Nancarrow, who started spectacularly but slackened a bit toward the end (owing mostly to a bout of pneumonia) is another who might do more with Greek subjects in the future.

It is difficult for the teacher of a course to have an accurate sense of its success; one must ask the students. They filled out course evaluations but I have not seen them; I think they went to Peggy Reilly. But I’d like to quote you what Jen Brea, another of the “A” students, wrote to me afterwards:

I’ve always considered myself an “English” person. In school it was always my favorite class, always the environment that I found the most stimulating and the most exciting. That changed when I moved to New York the middle of my junior year.

My academic experience there was very disappointing, and I started hating the idea of English class, which was just horrible considering how valuable it had always been to me, how much reading and writing about literature was a part of my life.

I'm telling you this because the experience of this seminar has brought me back to the way I used to feel about English. That I started being excited about the intellectual exploration again, I cannot thank you enough. I really enjoyed this class. I feel like it did what any good class should do—helped me to learn, to grow, to challenge my assumptions. Anyway, I wanted to thank you because I don't think that we, as a class, thanked you properly when I know that I speak for everyone when I say this seminar was a challenging and rewarding experience.

And thank you for introducing me to Joyce!

In any case, it was stimulating for me to be with such a good class. They even recovered from the seemingly mortal blow delivered them by Joyce at the start, ending with some appreciation of the wonders of Ulysses. A good sign was that Nancarrow brought his high school English teacher to one of the sessions and Brea brought her mother!

My time here was greatly enhanced by my fellowship at Forbes College. John Hodgson, my former student at Dartmouth, Alison Cook, and Andrea La Paugh couldn't have been nicer. I also enjoyed getting to know Paul Bou-habib, a graduate student, and Eduardo Cadava. Forbes provided me with an office, many meals, a place to bring friends and family, a venue for several very interesting lectures, and also—perhaps most important—the opportunity to see four of my students (all Forbes residents) informally outside of class. I am very pleased that, somewhat owing to my efforts, Gonda Van Steen will be a fellow at Forbes next year. I should add that although I was not officially a fellow of Butler College, where my seminar took place each week, I felt like one there as well, since the Master, Edward Champlin, allowed me use of his office for meetings with students, Betty Stein kept inviting me to meals and lectures, and Judy Fallon was always helpful. The course's end-of-term party took place in the Butler College café, with a Greek supper catered by Olives, and a showing of the excellent film of Ulysses by Joseph Strick.

Firestone Library, including the Hellenic Studies spoudasterio, was of course an important resource during my four months in residence, although I am sorry to report that I was unable to pursue work on either the Kazantzakis letters or the second volume of Kazantzakis: Politics of the Spirit. However, I used library resources for my course and also for a paper on Ritsos and ritual that I gave during the term at Harvard and another paper that I am about to give momentarily at the State Department. On three different occasions I made use of the rare book collections, and I also collaborated with the director of the American Farm School's New York office on further investigation of the Nancy Crawshaw archive.

The Program in Hellenic Studies was a source of constant stimulation owing to the excellent people who came and went during spring term. I was especially pleased to be able to meet privately with Mark Mazower, Mihalis Chrysanthopoulos, and David Connelly, as well as to share fellowship with various post-docs and other visitors. Additional highlights were the lectures by David Rudenstein and Helen Philon, and of course the Bonfils exhibit.

Chrysanthi and I felt totally comfortable owing to our housing at 324 South Stanworth Drive, which put us within walking distance of Nassau Street and the university. Thank you, Dimitri, for the Stanley J. Seeger fellowship-in-kind toward rent. This covered the months of March, April, and May at $1400 each (February being missed owing to a bureaucratic mistake), totaling $4200 if I am not mistaken. My out-of-pocket expenses for Greek Today, so far, add up to $3959.85, with more to come, so it looks like an equivalence has been achieved.

Especial thanks, Dimitri, go to you for making all this possible and for the jokes and meals, as well as the concentrated work, that we shared over the past four months. Hellenic Studies is a seaworthy ship with an energetic, imaginative captain at the helm.

Congratulations, and best wishes for the future.

May 31, 2001

North Potomac, Maryland

Nice visit with Leander and family. Niko seems to have taken an especial liking to me. I read him about eight books; he couldn't get enough. . . . Earlier, War/Peace luncheon with the new fellows. I was the featured speaker on "The History of War/Peace at Dartmouth." Nice to think again about Elise, Leonard, Jack, Al Rozycki, and of course Elizabeth and John Baker.

June 1, 2001

Washington

I spoke at the State Department for one and a half hours on Cavafy's Alexandrian cycle. The group included two spouses of future consular officials in Greece. One woman was lively and asked lots of questions; the others not so much. Jim Miller drove me to the Capitol Hilton. From there I went to visit the two hotels Ai-Hui booked for MGSA, Georgetown Inn and Lathem. Very useful. Discovered more flexibility in the arrangements, with increased possibility for room sharing. Supper at the Hilton for tomorrow's fifteen speakers. I sat next to Ambassador Montegale Stearns; good to meet him for the first time. And very nice to see Bill McNeill again. He told me that Elizabeth has Alzheimer's, alas. And they've made no arrangements for institutionalization. How fortunate we are that we're connected with Kendal through our Quaker life-style!

June 2, 2001

Washington

I was the first speaker in today's symposium, "US Relations with Greece in the Twentieth Century," sponsored by Gene Rossides's American Hellenic Institute, a Washington lobby, mostly. My topic: "What Non-Greeks Can Learn from Modern Greek Literature." I started with an audiotape of "Homer Thrace" in Never On Sunday saying he'd come to Greece to learn the Truth. Lots of people came up afterwards to say how much they'd enjoyed the talk. All the other talks were political: Pso-miades movingly on the Asia Minor Catastrophe and American aid; Coufoudakis on Greek-Americans and US-Greek relations; Iatrides on the Truman Doctrine; Papacosma on Greece and NATO. Then a ceremonial lunch honoring McNeill, who spoke amusingly about his adventures in civil war Greece as a 27-year-old, including in Salonika occupied by ELAS. I couldn't stay for the afternoon session to hear Jim Miller on PASOK, Stearns on the future of US-Greek relations, and Rossides on the US Executive Branch and relations with Greece. Too bad, but I had to catch the last plane back to Lebanon.

Sunday, June 3, 2001

Very good Meeting. Someone raised the basic question of evil. Theodicy. I ministered on the felix culpa—evil as an opportunity, challenging us to choose correctly. Nice to see Jack and Kathleen Shepherd afterwards. In the afternoon, went to vet John Rassias's speech for the Spyridon event in New York. We both learned that Pilitsis is now the archdiocese's head of education. Thus we have a friend on the inside.

Wednesday, June 6, 2001

Leander is here. We went to White River Junction together to buy a telescope for the farm. It is computerized. You tell it "Venus" and it is supposed to find Venus for you! Apparently one can see seven planets, galaxies, etc. With luck, that will interest the grandchildren (and maybe the grandparents, too). . . . John Rassias asked me to vet his application paper for the MLA coordinating committee and also his speech at Spyridon's affair next week. He always has lots to say but generally says it rather badly. Let's see now what happens. He very much wants to be elected to the MLA position. But his heart attack is now an everyday reality. To go to NYC, for instance, he hired a limousine rather than brave the rigors of plane, train, and taxi. . . . Good music with Dick and Allan. We did the Debussy sonata. And Dick and I tried Harold Boatrite's flute-piano sonata, which is very nice. . . . Yesterday: good long lunch at the Inn with Steve Scher, who is off to Australia soon. Alice arrived later.

Thursday, June 7, 2001

Alice and I played through her pieces and mine for the Kinhaven workshop. She is doing a beautiful C-major Mozart four-hand sonata and two Brahms Hungarian dances. . . . Yesterday Leander visited Yiayia and actually got her to laugh. He has a way with her that all the rest of us lack. . . . I had my general physical exam by a young woman doctor, Hong, Gerber having canceled twice. Everything fine, she says. . . . Went to Orford, invited by Chris Dye, to join a reading group composed of lawyers, all men, doing "A Painful Case" in Dubliners. Three of the five very well read, perceptive. One had Jesuit schooling. I remembered enough, aided by my annotated text. In any case, we had a true "class" from 4:30 p.m. until 7:00 p.m. Fun!

Friday, June 8, 2001

Kinhaven

Sent Lesson 3, revised, off to Carol, reduced from 51 to 33 pages. Then to Kinhaven with Alice. Dan and I are in the trailer again (another trailer). Practiced on the concert hall piano (Miss Mann's), which is lovely. Dan is much improved. We actually did the Husa up to speed.

Sunday, June 10, 2001

Kinhaven

Superb lesson on the Husa from Mrs. Shin followed by a helpful lesson for my solo Mozart Rondo, stressing phrasing. As always, it's the details that make the difference.

Monday, June 11, 2001

Kinhaven

We heard that Caroline Solzhenitsyn gave birth to a boy, Dmitri. How nice! Everyone here signed a card for Ignat and her. Nigel gave Dan and me a fine lesson on the Thompson, complete with anecdotes about Thompson himself. For example: "Nigel, how long should this fermata last?" "Well, Virgil always said that a fermata equals twice the value of the note or rest over which it stands." Yesterday's master class, by Nigel, was superb. Charlotte Armstrong, Leander's student, played the Debussy Toccata exceptionally well. Bruno played Glazunov for thirty minutes! Alma Rhodes played Brahms, but not very well. At supper tonight, Steve introduced me to a friend who comes monthly from Massachusetts to have a lesson with Leander. The faculty concert was thrilling. Nigel and Leander did a Beethoven march. Then Nigel played Beethoven's Opus 27 no. 7 sonata—fantasia—with extraordinary vigor and precision. I don't think that anyone plays Beethoven better. Then Leander and his Levine School colleague Nancy played Reger: froth and easily forgettable. Mrs. Shin and Nigel then teamed up for a Mozart sonata, which seemed somewhat formulaic to me. The program ended with Mendelssohn, played by Mrs. Shin and Leander. Scintillating. I've never heard Mrs. Shin play better. And Leander was amazing, both as a technical virtuoso and as a very sensitive interpreter. After the performance they said they'd like to play it again, and did. Later, we all gathered for wine and sweets. And Dan and I went over our pieces for the last time, slowly, with the metronome. It will be a miracle if we get through them tomorrow.

Tuesday, June 12, 2001

Kinhaven–Hanover

Dan and I played quite well. Both the Husa and the Thompson were greeted with squeals of pleasure in the audience. Dan didn't make a single timing error, just some garbled notes, nothing serious. I forgot some dynamics and had trouble finding the middle pedal, but otherwise maintained control. Alice and Bob Cummings played their Mozart exquisitely—musically the highlight of the program. . . . Leander told me that the cook had been told by Nancy Bidlack, “I hate Peter Bien. He tried to get us fixed.” Well, I did, I must admit. . . . Returning home, I began immediately getting chapters ready to send to Carol, and also rushed to Fed Ex to get lesson 3 to Dimitri before he leaves for Greece.

Thursday, June 14, 2001

Nice visit from Henry Hart, here for his 25th reunion. He is doing well at William and Mary. How nice that he has a normal career, unlike John Tallmadge and so many others who never achieved tenure. Also saw another former student to whom I was close, Rand Jones, the one who knew James Merrill. . . . Working hard on Greek Today in an effort to prepare all the shortened lessons for Carol.

Saturday, June 16, 2001

Done! Sent lesson 12 to Carol this morning. Now I have only the Workbook to prepare for her. . . . Mary Rassias had appendicitis and was operated on yesterday but today is already home and walking around. We visited. Nice to see Veronica and her children, all dressed Amish style. She is transformed, salt of the earth, producing goats-milk yoghurt and cheese, eggs, and chicken meat, and she says they're even making money. . . . John discovered that the celebration for Spyridon on the 11th was held on the very day that the archdiocese was celebrating Bartholomew's name day, and he is furious at the deception, for this was never told him beforehand. . . . Nice supper yesterday with Tom and Joan Wilson, who are flourishing at Kendal but are off soon to Midway Island (!) to do . . . of course . . . scuba diving.

To Riparius

Business Meeting considered my budget for 2002. All's well, more or less. People like to spend more and more, but they also contribute (some of them).

June 28, 2001

To Hanover

To Hanover to deliver Chrysanthi for the ALPS program in Greek. I moved my two filing cabinets from Baker 702, which I was forced to vacate owing to construction in Baker, to my new office, 312 Gerry, until Baker is ready again (about 1½ years) and we move back. Everything else is in boxes in the cellar of 12 Ledyard Lane.

Riparius

In the morning today Alec and I finished the grand staircase we've constructed to reach our sleeping loft and make Chrysanthi happy. (It will be a huge surprise for her when she returns after ALPS.) It took us 2½ days. We got 10-inch by 12-foot rough stringers from Brown's Lumber in Pottersville. Then we sliced a log in two for the treads, securing each with two long lag screws at each end, having been careful first to level each one in two directions. The result is totally steady, and very appropriately rustic. It even looks OK aesthetically, despite my fears. The log ladder is now serving in the barn. . . . Innovations this summer are (a) a video machine upstairs that we determine to keep secret from all the children—I've watched Balanchine ballets so far, lying in bed before sleeping—, (b) two oil-filled electric radiators that do wonders on a cold day or evening.

Saturday, July 7, 2001

My first batch of compost is ready; it took only two weeks. I'll start a new batch tomorrow. All three plum trees have fruit, the first time that ever happened. We had formed tomatoes even in June and a small ripe one today. Amazing. Lots of fun with Theo, who talks continually in both English and Indonesian, and is a comedian. And Monica is a splendid cook; she has made supper every night (except on Thursday when we all went to the Narrows, happily flourishing under new management, to celebrate the completion of the stairs) now that Chrysanthi is in Hanover. Alec and I cleaned up fallen branches around the swings next to the Guest House, using my Stihl extension saw. After supper we played Handel violin sonatas plus "cruise music." Leander sent me the Percy Granger piece. I hope to learn both parts and record them for Dan. I already did that for the Diabelli sonatina that Steve recommended at Kinhaven, but it is too "stupid" for my taste. I've been copyediting Brenda's part 2: fascinating material but very badly written. Semi-illiterate. Also copyedited Serena Joyce's AFS minutes and was dismayed to see that the trustees' meeting in Greece is scheduled for June 4–7, which conflicts with Leander's four-hand workshop.

Sunday, July 8, 2001

Went to work early, preparing another batch of compost: 12 portions of shredded green hay and 3 portions of wood shavings and old hay. Then showered, met Don Kurka in North Creek, and went to the Adirondack Museum to hear Bob McGrath lecture brilliantly on the role of Adirondack painting in helping to create the Park. He mentioned “muscular Christianity,” the view of a minister who advocated camping in the Adirondacks as a spiritual pursuit. I told Bob afterward that I must be a “muscular Christian” at Terpni. Warder Cadbury was there, too. He says that Tom Brown is depressed because throughout his life, but no longer, he made a difference or helped someone every day. But why can’t we deserve to rest on our laurels in old age? Why be depressed? . . . Off to Shapiros’ for sandwiches and the trip to Meadowmount. This is quite a Sunday! Rosine Gardner came, too. Jerry finished his P.A. course but at the last moment one of the teachers disqualified him. He is planning litigation. Poor Jerry—a failure in all pursuits, including marriage. The concert was typical: a 17-year-old girl playing Paganini with gusto, a 16-year-old emoting expertly over the Dvořák cello concerto (great performance of lousy music), but then the Harding trio—three sisters, blond-haired red-blooded Americans aged 19, 19, and 16—did the Brahms Trio no. 1, with its ferociously difficult piano part played with ease and power.

Saturday, July 14, 2001

A varied day. Started by writing a book review for WLT of Anita Brookner’s The Bay of Angels, until about 10:30 a.m. Then changed into work clothes, went down to the pond, and chipped a huge pile of brush. Then changed again and drove with Chrysanthi to Lincoln Inn, Woodstock, for the celebration of Andrea Useem’s marriage. Huge gathering under a tent with full dinner served. Then “testimonies,” mostly by Andrea’s numerous relatives, and her parents. I spoke about her gift as a writer, as evidenced first at Dartmouth (essay prize in War/Peace Studies) and then in African journalism. Her husband, Justin, stood up after his parents spoke lovingly, and said that they weren’t his biological parents; he had been adopted. And his biological parents were actually present. He’d met them for the first time about a month ago, and met his biological brother for the first time yesterday. Both he and Andrea are converts to Islam, their speech peppered with “if God wills,” and she looking lovely with her head scarf. He hopes go to Oman in the Gulf to teach English as a second language. It was a lovely, joyous time. Nice to see Nelson Kasfir there, too. He introduced Andrea to Kenya, which led to her journalistic career and also to her interest in Islam. . . . Then we drove to Weston to the Kinhaven anniversary celebration, with plans to meet George Goodwin and his wife at the staff concert. He has just turned 80 but looks and sounds 20 years younger. Very pleasant reunion of two past presidents of the Board. Also saw John Austin, another past president, and Jonathan Richman, the retiring president. Jerry Bidlack was very pleasant. Even Nancy managed to say "How are you?" or something like that. Staff concert mediocre, except for Shostakovich's piano quartet. All the staff now are unknown to me except for Caroline Wahl, the Fresh hornist, who is still blowing strong. Jerry led the staff orchestra in "Appalachian Spring," which I found boring and overrated. Irene Mendelsohn came over to say hello. How nice! Also Anna Mays, Rebecca's daughter. And Michael Webster, whom Chrysanthi dislikes so much, saying he's hopelessly egotistic. But he alerted me to Husa and now suggested a piece by Corigliano. . . . Arrived at Hanover at midnight.

July 16, 2001

My Harvard 50th occurs next year and there's going to be a new book published. Here's what I sent in, answering their questions:

"Of all your professional accomplishments or volunteer activities, which did you find most personally rewarding?" Somehow encouraging a student to continue a love of literature in later life despite quite different vocational pursuits.

"Given the chance, what would you do differently?" Practice the piano 2 to 3 hours a day.

"How would you like to be remembered?" As someone more concerned for others than for self.

"Remarks. What you'd like to say about yourself, your family, and your current interests." My main feelings continue to be gratitude and surprise: gratitude for a life that has been blessed in so many ways, surprise that (so far) no disaster has occurred to mar those blessings. I was not killed or maimed in a war; I married well; I engendered three fine children all of whom are happily married, comfortable, and productive; I spent thirty-six years teaching literature at Dartmouth, sensing most of the time that this was more like recreation than work; I found a supportive, energizing religion in Quakerism and (thanks to my wife) a stimulating scholarly endeavor in Modern Greek literature; I had the good fortune to purchase 120 acres in the Adirondacks while a sophomore at Harvard, and this has remained a summer paradise for the entire extended family; I was trained sufficiently in piano to be able to enjoy chamber music with friends; I've found ways to serve—helping to found the Kendal at Hanover retirement community, being a trustee for the American Farm School in Greece, Pendle Hill near Philadelphia, and the Kinhaven Music School in Vermont, chairing the Modern Greek Studies Association and editing its journal; I was fortunate to discover Nikos Kazantzakis's novels in the late 1950s and to translate three of them; I've written and published in other ways that have been meaningful to me and, I hope, to others. 'Retirement' seems to be a joke. Academics are fortunate in having intellectual pursuits not dependent on employment. Yes, there is more freedom and more time (to practice the piano, for example). But scholarly and trusteeship endeavors continue. Responsibilities continue. I do not feel 'superfluous,' at least not yet. And my wife and I are expecting to enter the Kendal at Hanover retirement community to finish out with fellowship, stimulation, and security this adventure that so far has been cause for such gratitude and surprise.

An interesting day. After writing the above, I began typing volume 2 of Kazantzakis: Politics of the Spirit. After a twenty-year (or more) delay, the writing seems very distant. In the afternoon, serviced the Troy-Bilt mower; mowed in back of the garden, very dense hay this year; switched beds: from our sleeping loft to the Guest House and vice versa, the beds in the Guest House being Adolph and Harriet's, which we put there last week although they really didn't fit in the old iron bedsteads. Now the fit is better. Then helped Alec unload his purchase of shiplap to finish off his new bedroom over the kitchen. Showered. Supper as usual with Alec and family, Theo in fine form. Then music with Alec: Dvořák's sonata, and Saint George's that we played at Woodbrooke. Went reasonably well. Oh, I should have stated above that I practiced Granger for an hour after breakfast, struggling over eight measures with difficult timing. In the evening, after music, fascinating articles on cosmology in the TLS. A full, varied day. And Morton Bien sent a letter with his sister's genealogical discoveries: the actual ship on which my father and his family arrived at Ellis Island, apparently in 1907, he aged 5.

July 18, 2001

We all went to a 2:00 p.m. rehearsal at SPAC. The dancers, out of costume, of course; a piano instead of the orchestra; the conductor on stage in a chair with the score in front of him; a ballet master seated center-stage and clapping hands whenever he or she wanted something repeated. They started with Balanchine's marvelous "Stravinsky Violin Concerto" with Yvonne Bouree the highlight in my mind, dancing with Nilas Martins. Then they did spring and autumn from "The Four Seasons" (Verdi/Robbins). Delicious music. Then "Dances at a Gathering" (Chopin/Robbins), where we were able to see even the great Damian Woetzel in rehearsal, and Helène Alexopoulos. A lovely experience, especially to see the true rehearsal aspects, when a sequence was repeated maybe five or six times (for example when Martins couldn't set Bouree down gracefully after lifting her (it was perfect in actual performance later). . . . Buffet in the Hall of Springs, then, with Don Kurka (Alec, Monica, and Theo having returned home), followed by the performance: Stravinsky and Verdi, plus a new ballet, "Soirée" (Rota/Tanner), very traditional in both music and choreography. OK but not as splendid as either of the others. Balanchine, clearly, was a Shakespeare in our midst, a supreme genius able to do multiple works all unique and different.

July 19, 2001

Alec put a second window in the new bedroom. I made great progress in clearing the south field of fallen branches and trees, in order to mow. And my second batch of compost is ready. We mowed the area in the foundation of the old barn and hope to build a sandbox there. . . . Am learning my part for the Percy Granger, slowly (as usual). Bought a new biography of Joice Loch.

July 24, 2001

Another lovely evening at the ballet and dinner with Asa and Evelyn Rothstein. He has progressed in his research project. They've coated catheters with their new substance and have had remarkable success in tests with rabbits. The uncoated catheters caused blood clots, the coated ones did not. Also, they're learning how to produce their "elasticine" in large enough quantities to be able to do more extensive testing. . . . Actually, the first two ballets—"Allegro Brillante" (Tchaikovsky/Balanchine) and "Romeo and Juliet" (Prokofiev/Lavery) were routine, and the orchestra sounded dull, perhaps because the great heat and humidity affected the instruments. But the final one, "The Concert" (Chopin/Robbins) was sheer delight. It's a parody on bad concertgoing and bad ballet dancing, brilliantly realized by Jerome Robbins and excruciatingly funny, which is of course rare in ballet.

July 26, 2001

Amazingly, I was able to secure a part for my Ford mower, a long rod that causes the blade to lift. Drove all the way to Granville for it. . . . Ai-Hui Tan has finally arranged for the MGSA banquet, at the Sea Catch restaurant. . . . I'm reading Paul Rabor's essay on Pendle Hill pedagogy, well done, but not too different from the older vision by Howard Brinton and, subsequently, Parker Palmer. The stress, of course, is on the "Meeting for Learning" as opposed to the hierarchical teacher-pupil relationship. And he's very good on the recent fetish regarding "spirituality," which he says has become "commodified"—it's like a new dress or a fancy car: an acquirement available in our capitalist society.

July 28, 2001

Another interesting visit with the Rothsteins. Supper at their house. Aser and I got on the subject of genetically engineered seeds, which interests me because of the Farm School, of course. As usual, he was splendidly knowledgeable and articulate. The US favors them, Europe prohibits them. He explained why. He is 100% in favor. The worst that has been feared so far is that modified corn can cause allergies although there is no proof. And a further modification makes the possibility of causing protein to disintegrate before the corn is ready to eat. A huge plus is the fact that seeds that resist certain bugs will mean less or no use of pesticides. Also, increased yields owing to genetic modification will mean less use of chemical fertilizer, all this being an economic benefit for the farmer plus an ecological benefit for everybody.

July 30, 2001

Fixed the mower for the second time, luckily discovering a huge spring lying in the field as I started to mow with the imperfectly fixed mower.

. . . Don Kurka for supper. Then we went to North Creek to hear Warder Cadbury lecture on Tait, the Adirondacks painter (really: “illustrator”). Third-rate painter and second-rate lecturer. But it was nice to see Warder and also Allison Clarkson and her mother, who talked to me about the social register (!) while Allison talked about sending her eleven-year-old son to Groton. Met some other people. There’s now a whole intellectual and artistic life in North Creek, with classes, lectures, library.

August 1, 2001

Ross Morgan, the forester, came for supper. Very affable and knowledgeable. He’s going to make us a master-plan for harvesting and thinning.

August 10, 2001

To Lake Pleasant to spend a morning and afternoon with Tom and Joan Wilson. Canoeing, pleasant lunch, viewing of his slides of Midway Island and snorkeling.

August 16, 2001

To Saratoga and the races with Tom Akstens and Suzanne Murtha, plus Don Kurka and his friend Amy. We actually won about half the bets, including one for which I would have collected $5.30 on $2.00 if I hadn’t lost the ticket. The horses are beautiful and unbelievably fast. The whole atmosphere is very festive. Dinner afterwards in an Indian restaurant in Saratoga. A pleasant outing.

August 17, 2001

Finished book shelving in the Guest House. I plan to move a large part of my library here. It’s a secure feeling to have this resource, which I already put to good use for my “On Retirement” essay, which I also finished today. It’s mostly about mortality as superior to immortality! Luckily I was able to use some good material by Michael Platt, sent me by Jeffrey Murphy. . . . Leander finished the fair copy of his sonata for flute and piano and gave me a copy, but it’s very hard and I can’t get a very good sense of it. However, I’ve begun to feel comfortable with the secondo of the Granger; made a recording of my part and sent it to Dan. . . . Daphne and Greg closed on their house in South Salem, New York, so they’ll now have three residences: East 84th Street, South Salem (for weekends) and McCarthy Road, Riparius. Lots of money. . . . We have ripe plums on two of our three plum trees.

August 25, 2001

Finished re-reading and vetting my very long chapter (monograph) on Kazantzakis's Saint Francis. I liked it. What energy and research went into that manuscript! I could never do it now. Next is: To translate Connie Tagopoulos's poems for the Fakazis anthology.

Sunday, August 26, 2001

To Camp Backlog in Indian Lake for Quaker Meeting with Warder and Judy Cadbury, David Borton, and about twenty other Friends from Adirondack Meetings, mostly from Saranac Lake. Pleasant, interesting people. Meeting under canvas on a tent platform, facing the water, with a fire going in front of the backlog. Afterwards, a huge lunch under another canvas. We came in by boat but walked out, 2½ miles through "forever wild" forest. Very pleasant. . . . Bought steak on the way back for the last supper with Leander, Deanna, Sophia, and Nicholas, who leave tomorrow, topped off by ice cream at Stewart's. Sophia improved greatly during her stay here, ending like a normal, happy child whereas she began as a neurotic disaster.

Thursday, August 30, 2001

Leander and family left on Monday, and on Wednesday we drove down to Waccabuc, New York (South Salem) to see Daphne and family in their new house. It's a mansion of course, a tastefully restored home and barn with huge rooms downstairs, lots of bedrooms upstairs, some usable space in the cellar. Plus perfect stone walls around the 2½ acres, lots of trees and gardens, etc. Daphne is of course in charge of establishing a new household to be used weekends and vacations. We visited the town, the lovely park, the impressive library. The area is of course very posh, but not as Gatsby-like as the Hamptons. Greg can get to Grand Central in one hour from Katonah. Not bad.

Impressively, on this same day Greg and Daphne purchased the Shapiros' home in Riparius, the lawyer doing the closing. We'll see now how they'll divide their time between Waccabuc and Riparius.

Friday, August 31, 2001

I finished translating Connie Tagopoulos's 4th poem. Her work is stunning. I'm delighted to be translating poetry again.

Saturday, September 1, 2001

Another reunion at Brant Lake Camp, celebrating its 85th year. Folks I was close to were absent this time, but various people came up to say hello. And Peter Schweitzer was there, so we sat together at the banquet. The highlight for me was seeing Vince Starace, 93 years old and still playing tennis. Everyone spoke at the banquet, mostly in praise of Bob Gersten and Karen Meltzer. Tiresome. Then we were all shown a video—delicious regarding the camp's activities but then cloying when it switched to more praise of Bob and Karen.

Sunday, September 2, 2001

Nice five-hour supper at Don Kurka's on Garnet Lake. Poor man, he's contemplating divorce after 45 years of marriage. But he needs to escape a relationship that is now purely business and no sentiment except bitterness and recrimination. His children are supporting him, luckily.

Monday, September 3, 2001

Pinky O'Dell came and started to tear the cedar siding off the back of Leander's cabin, preparatory to adding the shed. Then the Grangers came, grandfather, father, and son, to fell the large pine that is too close to the house. They cut the roots (or shredded them) with the backhoe, then leaned the bucket against the tree and pushed it over. A fifty-year-old massive pine.

Tuesday, September 4, 2001

Bill and Beverly McCarthy, owners of the McCarthy property, invited us for cocktails at their summer house on Friends Lake. I treated them to lots of history about Charles and Bernard McCarthy, how I got my farm, etc. They hope that the McCarthy property, 150 acres, will stay intact and not be subdivided. The proceeds from the sale are going to go to the Class of 1953's 50th reunion gift to Dartmouth. How nice! . . . I revised Connie's poems and sent them off to Fakazis together with four new Harkianakis translations.

Friday, September 7, 2001

Drove with Chrysanthi to Skaneateles. Housed beautifully in a converted farmhouse in the latest style, with the barn full of show-horses. Lovely people from the Dartmouth Club of Central New York took us to a very fine restaurant. Easy, jovial conversation. Beforehand we explored the main street of this extraordinary town, which looks like Switzerland: so rich, manicured, and sophisticated.

Saturday, September 8, 2001

Skaneateles

I spoke on "On Retirement" to the Dartmouth Club, avoiding the clichés and approaching it through an examination of whether immortality is preferable to mortality (No!). It seemed to hold their attention. A gerontologist said that he wants me to deliver it at the Syracuse University Medical School, whose doctors need to be enlightened about such issues.

Sunday, September 9, 2001

To Hanover

Drained the pipes, packed, returned to Hanover. A fine summer: very productive on the farm (staircase, lots of pruning and trimming, books in the Guest House) and regarding grandchildren, who got to know each other and us.

Tuesday, September 11, 2001

The World Trade Center's twin towers were destroyed by a terrorist attack. Daphne agonized concerning Greg, but he got through to her by cell phone around 10:30 a.m.. He was unharmed, but kept in the Goldman building until noon and then had to walk all the way home to 84th Street. I'm agonized regarding Jeff Murphy.

Wednesday, September 12, 2001

Telephoned Murphy at home. What a relief to hear his voice on the telephone. As soon as the plane struck Building no. 1, he and all his colleagues left Building no. 2 despite assurances from the management that all was well. If they had stayed, as many did, they of course would all have been killed when the building collapsed. Horrible!

Thursday, September 13, 2001

Philadelphia

To Philadelphia via train since all the airports are still closed. Visited Alec in his new apartment. Theo very excited to see Pappou. Raced from room to room showing all his toys. Monica is immense with the forthcoming baby.

Friday, September 14, 2001

I ministered in Meeting. The Dalai Lama opposes violence even against the Chinese oppressors of his nation. We cannot expect our leaders to take this Buddhist position, nor can we even expect them to follow Christian precepts. What kind of nation are we, really? I'd say: a Roman nation, convinced that power is glory. The Romans crushed the "terrorists" who attacked them. They were able to do this for several centuries, until they disintegrated from within. So . . . ? . . . Met with Steve regarding the future of book publishing at Pendle Hill. He'll remove Rebecca from this responsibility. Hopes to hire someone else and to commission books mostly. So we'll see what happens. The first in the new series might be an updated Brinton 300 Years with removal of sexist language and toning down of the bias against evangelicals. . . . Then spoke with Rebecca, who as usual complained about "lack of candor," saying that she had never been told that she would be relieved of the books. . . . Drove to Princeton to meet Mike, Karen, and Peter Constantine at lunch at Prospect. We agreed that we cannot meet Fakazis's schedule. We'll try to read and evaluate all the poems by December 1st. . . . Then to 58 Prospect Avenue to see Dimitri, who showed me Theano's design for lesson 3 of our book. Beautiful! We hope that the Press will agree. . . . Back to Pendle Hill. They delayed the Board so that everyone could meet in the barn for worship à propos of the September 11 events. Very moving. Short Board meeting afterwards, mostly about money.

Saturday, September 15, 2001

Executive session after the regular Board meeting, with Steve and not Denny or Margaret. Steve surprised us by saying that he'd like to replace Margaret (not Denny). Big trouble ahead. Also, he admitted that his "honeymoon" is over. I warned him against the trajectory that so often happens: increased isolation, paranoia, autocracy. He is aware of this, of course. We'll see if he can avoid it.

Sunday, September 16, 2001

More people in Meeting today than ever before. I ministered again about America as a latter-day Roman Empire.

Tuesday, September 18, 2001

Quaker 8s at the Cadwalladers'. We had a delicious discussion of an Emily Dickinson poem. I was most taken by the line in which she says the tune is better than the words in a song or hymn.

Friday, September 21, 2001

NYC

Vanderbilt Avenue, from 42nd to 44th is blocked off by police “for security.” Happily, they allowed pedestrians. I walked to Times Square. Large demonstration, mostly young people, with placards and chanting: “Justice, not war! Justice, not war!”

Saturday, September 22, 2001

To Princeton

Port Authority Bus Terminal also cordoned off in part “for security.” But to Princeton. Met with Stratos Constantinidis at the Nassau Inn regarding his grandiose plans for volumes 2 (and 3) of the annotated bibliography. He irritates everyone, but not me (so far). At 11:00 Dimitri came and also John Iatrides. We excused ourselves and went into conference about MGSA’s multiple problems. Who can replace Susan Sutton as Journal editor? Should we cancel the symposium, given what happened on September 11th? And so forth. Then to Palmer House for MGSA Executive Board meeting. No quorum: only John, Dimitri, Stratos, Katy Fleming, and myself. But we went through the long agenda nevertheless, as best we could. At 6:00 p.m., reception. I met Sikelianos’s great-granddaughter, a sweet young thing, poet in her own right, but only in English. Then Jen Brea came, my student last spring. She wants to do the undergraduate program in the Woodrow Wilson School and somehow to serve humanity instead of going to Wall Street. Brava! After all this, leisurely Chinese dinner with Stratos.

Sunday, September 23, 2001

Princeton

Full agenda again, mostly about the constitution and other administrative problems. We finished miraculously at 12:30, exhausted, Katy with a migraine. Drove to Manhattan with John Iatrides, pleasantly, lots and lots to talk about. He related how during the Junta period he was at a reception at the Officers’ Club in Thessaloniki when he walked Papadopoulos, surrounded by goons. Everyone began to applaud. But John kept his hands behind his back, whereupon one of the goons approached him menacingly. He then applauded, for which he now of course hates himself. But these moments of cowardice (or “accommodation”) keep one alive. The opposite story is the one I’m reading: the biography of Joice Loch and Sydney. What heroes and saints! What grit (and luck)!

Thursday, September 27, 2001

NYC

Met with Fakazis, Van Dyck, Keeley, and Constantine over lunch at the Yale Club, to discuss scheduling and other details of the anthology project. Mike and I will try to agree on the poems to stay and the poems to be cut; Karen and Peter C. will do the same, all this by December 1st. Then the two groups will try to agree, so we can give Fakazis a finished MS by March 1st. . . . To the Met. Exhibit of Breughel's drawing and etchings, not my taste. Then with Daphne to Marymount School. Very posh quarters, all walnut paneling. Lots of life inside. The older girls all look like Renoir's models. Met Christina's two kindergarten teachers—two more Renoir models. Christina was in baking class, an after-school activity. Very tired. She hardly said hello to me, which is unlike her. Then we took her to a birthday party held in a manicure shop. Each of the five-year-olds received a professional manicure. This is New York! . . . At 7:30 I met Greg and Daphne at a nice restaurant on 2nd Avenue and 84th. Greg is fine. His group at Goldman's are making more money than ever, he says. And he can travel to work without impediment. But afterwards they took me to the Fire Station on 85th, which lost nine men. Flowers outside, photos on the wall. Horrendous.

Friday, September 28, 2001

Pendle Hill

By train to Philadelphia, using my new Bose earmuffs to deaden the cell phone talk. Not bad. At Pubs we chose a very fine essay describing the peace vigils in Philadelphia, and also, to my surprise, Lewis Owens's on Kazantzakis's "existential vitalism," which the committee actually loved.

Saturday, September 29, 2001

Finished vetting all the anthology poems and typed out the results for Mike. Good to be finished with that chore. Marders came for dinner. We talked about Bill McGrew and Bruce Lansdale and of course Randy and "the book." Brenda promises to meet her deadline this summer. John Rassias and Veronica popped in around 9:00 p.m. delivering ten of Veronica's chickens. Ten whole chickens. Free range, of course.

Sunday, September 30, 2001

In Meeting I ministered by reading Sikelianos's marvelous poem "Agraphon," very appropriate for these days. . . . Later, finished preparing "Inventing Greece" for publication by the University of Sydney people. I also wrote this:

There is at least one head of state, the Dalai Lama, who refuses to respond to violence with violence—he will not support Tibetan guerrilla fighters in their struggle against the Chinese invaders of Tibet. We cannot expect American leaders to practice Buddhist precepts in the same way. Can we expect them, however, to practice Christian precepts? The preachers at the service at the Washington Cathedral on Friday, September 14 were eloquent in calls for restraint. “Let us not become the evil we deplore,” one of them declared, while others reminded the president that Christianity is based on love, not hate. But are we a Christian nation? I doubt it. What are we, then? I think we are a Roman nation. The founding fathers certainly had the ancient Romans in mind and there is a famous statue of George Washington dressed in a toga. They may have been thinking of the Roman Republic, but what we think of is the Roman imperial superpower that occupied a position in the world quite similar to our own today. Among other things, the Romans created the so-called Pax Romana, which was maintained for 200 years by virtue of a supreme military strength that crushed (and crucified) any opposition. We have maintained a so-called Pax Americana for perhaps 50 years, which once again has been maintained by virtue of supreme military strength ready to overwhelm all “barbarian” (i.e., “rogué”) incursions, even two at once! Our grandeur is based on power. How many times does one not hear the proud exclamation, “We are the most powerful nation on earth”? Not “the most moral,” “the most compassionate,” “the most forgiving,” “the most generous,” but “the most powerful.” To see ourselves as latter-day Romans is instructive, since we know that the Roman Empire eventually degenerated from within. Power works for a certain period—perhaps 200 years, perhaps 50—but apparently also self-destructs. That is why it is so important now, in considering what to do about the terrorist attacks, that we remember the forces that—ultimately—are more powerful than power.

—Peter Bien, Hanover, New Hampshire Monthly Meeting

Saturday, October 20, 2001

At Pendle Hill, I ministered again by reading “Agraphon.” Afterwards, Larry Ingle ministered by quoting Emerson: “When it gets dark enough, we can see the stars”—a perfect epigraph for the poem. . . . Last night visited Alec after Monica and he returned from hospital. She'd had contractions and thought the baby was coming, but it was a false alarm. Theo raced out to greet me and led me by hand to his pile of books. I read two; then he consented to go to bed. Alec's broken heel is keeping him on crutches, but he moves around with lots of agility. . . . Thursday, drove to Lumberton and played Thompson and Husa and even a little Corigliano with Dan. Fine supper out in the airport restaurant, which of course Dan should not patronize since he is so opposed to the local airport. Then Schumann. Very nice. . . . A long Publications meeting, four hours. One of the submissions is by Larry Ingle (although members don't know this), accusing Quakers of being irredeemably middle class. We recommended that he revise it slightly by acknowledging his own similar status. You should begin, I told him afterwards, with "I drive a Volvo and have three advanced degrees." . . . AMTRAK to New York this afternoon and then commuter train to Katonah. Daphne picked me up, very gaily. Graham and Karen were at the South Salem house for the weekend, and we had a roast beef dinner celebrating his birthday. Andrew and Christina were in (relative) good form. Daphne asked me to install a ceiling fixture in their dining room but I couldn't wire it properly because the ceiling uses 3 wires, only to a male switch, and I didn't have my "book" to remind me how to do this sort of arrangement. Too bad.

Georgetown

By AMTRAK yesterday to D.C., 11½ hours, well spent by me in going over all the queries in Carol Sheehan's copyedited Greece Today. She did a good job. I posted the MS back to her this morning from Georgetown. Last night at Leander's. He just had his flute-piano sonata printed by computer, but filled with errors that need correction. He's discouraged because Mrs. Shin now doesn't want to perform it at Dartmouth. Maybe he'll get Nigel Coxe. But all four youngsters to whom he gave master classes last month won prizes in an all-Eastern competition, two firsts, one second and one third. . . . To Georgetown University at 3:30 p.m. for the first panel of our MGSA 2001 Symposium. Supper with Jim Warren, as lively as always. Then the official opening ceremony in the lovely Gaston Hall. Welcome by Georgetown's Provost, then by Jim Alatis, then by me, with details of our award of the Translation Prize last year to Karen Emmerich, then Tom Gallant about the 2001 Dissertation Prize, and changes in the program occasioned by the decision of so many—mostly in Europe but also in the US—not to come. We started the evening with a few moments of silence in memory of those killed on September 11th. And we finished with Van Coufoudakis, Ambassador Monteagle Stearns, and Ted Couloumbis on Greek-American relations, with lots on Cyprus, of course. What remains with me from this presentation is the phrase “American exceptionalism,” which perhaps is no longer possible after September 11th—perhaps. I spoke about the error of Greek exceptionalism in my “Inventing Greece” talk, but I must admit that I never thought of American exceptionalism, which may be the most pronounced of all.

Georgetown

Long breakfast with Van Coufoudakis, who will be leaving Indiana to become president of a private university in Cyprus. We talked a lot about privatization, thinking of the American Farm School. He feels that EU pressure will be the crucial factor. Also spoke to Ted Couloumbis about this, with sureness that privatization will happen, deviously, without change in the constitution. . . . I chaired a session in the afternoon: two papers on linguistics, one on what happens with Greek immigrants in Montreal, the other about situations in which someone answers for someone else. The third paper was on marketing antiquities in Greece, done by a marketing person and very interesting. Fairly good discussion afterwards. We also heard the anthropologists’ session, with Peter Allen giving an amusing paper on how the “peasants’ in his village of examination were sure he was a spy, and Michael Herzfeld elaborating brilliantly as the discussant and chair. At 7:00 we re-gathered in the ICC Galeria for the Ambassador’s reception. Mike Keeley introduced Rhea Galanaki and Thanasis Valtinos. Galanaki read, poorly, from her latest, followed by translation read by Helen Koliass—a fine translation but read in a monotone. Valtinos was much better. His prose has ζουμί, as I told him. It’s full of whimsy. And his translator had a better voice and a more varied intonation. Then I introduced Ambassador Philon, telling about Odysseus in Iliad 1 & 2 as the man of action—reliable, efficient—and the man of words, and how I wished that Philon had run for the presidency of the USA, after we all suffered through the Bush-Gore debates. He started, “Keep on talking, Peter! I like it!” Then Tom Gallant introduced Constantine Tsoucalas, who had earlier brought me greetings from Iakovos Tsalicoglou plus an Olympic 2004 beautiful paper-weight as a gift. He spoke about the ideal of making the 2004 Olympics a reinforcement of internationalism and peace, and of the hope to have hundreds of young volunteers from the US, Canada, and Australia. . . . A propos, the staircase down to the ICC auditorium has an epigraph by Teilhard de Chardin: "The age of nations is past. It remains for us now, if we do not wish to perish, to set aside the ancient prejudices and build the earth."

Georgetown

In the afternoon, listened to three young scholars discussing the Greek civil war "from the bottom up" (i.e., on the village level), not from the top down. Good material. But in the question period I said that I found their presentations very horrifying because they treated the actions of people in warfare, including all the killings and executions, as not much different from, say, playing the violin—i.e., as something that perfectly normal human beings do. So I asked them, "Do you conclude from your researches that warfare is something that humans have always done and will always do? Or do you sense, at all, that this behavior is sub-human, a descent to insanity?" They of course justified their academic investigation. But people came up to me afterwards thanking me for this concern. . . . This session was followed by a colloquium featuring Ted Couloumbis, Thanos Veremis, and Constantine Tsoucalas talking about conflict in the Balkans. Couloumbis is really impressive: soul as well as brains. . . . Afterwards, Tsoucalas suggested that we devote our next symposium to the Olympics, in which case we could get lots of money, he says, from the Olympic Committee and also probably from the Costopoulos Foundation. I thought that perhaps we could use a museum as a venue. Must ask Leon Black and Max Anderson what they think. . . . We all then trooped to the Sea Catch restaurant for the banquet, a fine meal nicely served. Deborah Tannen spoke very well about Lilika Nakou's conversational language compared to the same material reworked for novelistic purposes. The original conversations were always more vivid. Then, in response to a question, she spoke, delightfully, about her famous men's speech vs. women's. Men never ask for directions (that's me!). Men don't confide in each other; women do. This starts in childhood. Women talk, men act. Michael Macovsky, her husband, was there. I hadn't seen him since he was fired from Dartmouth, mostly by Don Pease and Patricia. He had good memories of Lawrence Davies and me and Suzanne Brown. Luckily, he saved his career (by a hair's breadth). He is now chair of the English Department at Fordham! And so the MGSA 2001 Symposium ended: with smiles and good cheer. Valerie Caires came up, very happy that we could see each other again. And she's in love, she told me, and introduced her beau. How nice! . . . Walked back on M Street. Jumping. Νεολαία. Jazz.

DC-San Francisco

Breakfast with John Iatrides. Mike Keeley came over to announce that mail has been suspended in Princeton. Anthrax discovered. Who's next? He also told me that he'd grown up here in Georgetown and that all those million dollar houses were derelict shacks occupied mostly by blacks. Then the whole area was gentrified. The blacks are gone, the whites are here now. Iatrides worries about who can succeed me as MGSA president. Maybe Jerry Augustinos? Tom Gallant would be fine, but we'd really like him to take over the journal. We'll have lots on our plate to discuss when we meet in February.

The only dark spot in this weekend was a bad argument I had with Leander on the telephone on Friday. He was stressed out because of upcoming concerts for which he hasn't had time to practice, and exploded. But later that evening he called again and apologized. And the next day we had a very cordial conversation. So all is well.

Stanford, Palo Alto

Good flight yesterday, first class, thanks to the Onassis Foundation, with a lovely supper and a good movie. This morning drove to Stanford; found Richard Martin, admired Stanford's beauty, especially the main quad, where he is. Went to our hotel in Palo Alto, gorgeous, the nicest design I can remember. Back to Stanford for my first lecture, "Inventing Greece." Very small audience, maybe 10 in all, but a good audience, interested, some fine questions afterwards, and a correction: I shouldn't speak of the brevity of Periclean democracy, which lasted almost 200 years (not all under Pericles, obviously). Met Eva Prionas, whose class I'll address on Wednesday, and a nice linguist fresh from Oxford, Ela Widdows, who asked for a xerox of my bibliography. Also a gent who brought greetings from Speros Vryonis. I read the Teilhard quote at the very end of my lecture.

Santa Clara, Santa Cruz

A free day. After a haircut, we drove to Santa Clara, to the center of Silicon Valley, to see the Intel Museum. Fascinating. What miracles those engineers produced! Every facet of life is now different because of Intel's famous chips. (Last night, discovered a new Apple sales store in Palo Alto; the girls there claimed that Apple actually made a profit last quarter. Fun to see all the iMacs, G3s, G4s, etc. so nicely displayed.) By a huge coincidence, as we were leaving the Intel gift shop we spied David Buseck, visiting Intel on business, as it turned out. We'll have lunch with him and Linda on Thursday. Then we drove over the mountains on twisting back roads past wineries to Santa Cruz, a seaside resort, rather tacky. Then along Route 1 bordering the Pacific with its crashing breakers, until we headed back over the mountains again on a road passing through redwood groves, especially in San Mateo Memorial Park: gorgeous straight trunks like candles.

Wednesday, October 31, 2001

To Stanford via the "Marguerite" shuttle. Went to the Hoover Tower. The exhibit shows Hoover as quite extraordinary. Graduate of Stanford's first class, in mining engineering. An international entrepreneur in mining and a millionaire at a young age, after which he devoted himself to helping others instead of himself. Was this the result of his Quaker origins? Perhaps. Maybe even most likely, although in his memoirs, which I perused in the Hoover library, he didn't seem very attached to Quakerism. In any case he was apparently a dynamo in organization and management, and ran relief programs, first in Belgium after WWI, then elsewhere, with panache. He was at Versailles with President Wilson (Hoover was Secretary of Commerce under several presidents) and foresaw the disastrous future effects of the retaliatory provisions against Germany but couldn't get them changed. As president, he was ruined, of course, by the crash of 1929, by his refusal to spend huge amounts of federal funds to help restore the economy. So, with 10,000,000 unemployed, he was voted out of office in 1932. I found his memoirs very well written, very lucid. He is one more example, like Clarence Pickett, of a Midwestern (Iowa) boy born into a very humble Quaker milieu, a very strict one, who emerged into sophistication and power but also good works. . . . Then met Eva Prionas and the linguistic graduate student Ela Widdows for lunch at the new engineering building financed by David Packard, Sr. Then to Eva's class. Six very bright students, five girls and one boy, including one who was half-Greek, half Punjabi, who had pursued a career as an actress for five or six years in London and given up, another who is related to General Van Fleet. I did my State Department talk: Greek politics as seen through poetry, as a palimpsest. Do we Americans feel immersed, maybe trapped, in history the way the Greeks do? I of course argue that we do not. But perhaps we'll feel this more and more in the future. . . . Nice supper afterwards in a good Greek restaurant, with all the students, Eva, and Richard Martin, who gave us a lovely present: a book detailing all the trees on the Stanford campus. (I'd asked him yesterday about certain trees and he didn't know.) The campus is an amazing arboretum with exotic species from all over the world. It was laid out in part by Frederick Law Olmstead, who did Central Park. The book told us that redwoods require 400–500 years to mature.

Cupertino

Drove to Cupertino to have lunch with David and Linda Buseck. David works in a company that makes the huge machines that firms like Intel use to manufacture their "wafers" with chips on them. He is in customer relations. Linda, besides performing as a clown, teaches "leisure" at San Jose State—i.e., how to program and devise appropriate activities at schools, hospitals, prisons, retirement communities. And she consults and lectures freelance in this field, and especially helps à propos in their reform temple. Lovely people. We then drove to the Apple Computer Campus in Cupertino, a huge complex looking very prosperous. No museum, just a store. I bought an Apple cap. . . . My final lecture at Stanford, "Odysseus Across the Centuries," went especially well with a full house—audience mostly staff and adult students. We then went for a sumptuous supper at a restaurant with Richard, Eva, Eva's daughter, the linguistics professor and his wife, he a Finn, so we had lots to talk about owing to Leander's adventures with Outi and the sauna.

San Francisco

Freeway 280 to San Francisco to the Seal Rock Inn near the Cliff House. Dense fog over the ocean, but Chrysanthi and I walked down to the Cliff house, to the small museum there, and could see the breakers below. Thanassis Maskaleris met us at noon and acted as host and tour guide. Across the Golden Gate Bridge despite warnings concerning a terrorist attack on one of the SF bridges; lunch by the seaside; then to the tranquility of Muir Woods, where we heard a ranger explain the biological and chemical secrets of this ecosystem where even tiny slugs are necessary for the wellbeing of the giant trees. A lovely interlude. Then at 5:00 p.m. Susie Buseck arrived and we walked down to the Cliff house for tea. She's working as a combined social worker/lawyer, consistent with her training. She deals with children whose parents voluntarily request that the children be placed in foster homes, in today's case because the mother has AIDS and knows that she will soon die. A good serviceable job. . . . By car then to San Francisco State University, which I found in the dark, miraculously. Lectured on "Tempted by Happiness" in the building's central auditorium, to a large crowd including even high school students. Very good questions afterward, including a statement by Thanassis challenging my claim that Kazantzakis as early as 1950–51 was seeking "detachment." Thanassis sees him as more "Cretan," always ready to "overcome." Then Martha Klironomos took us to a fish restaurant, very noisy, a young crowd, but tasty. To bed at 1:00 a.m.

To Vancouver

Up at 6:00 a.m. Drove to the airport without getting lost (!). Security made me remove my shoes and put them separately through the machine. . . . Picked up at the lovely—spectacular!—airport by Geoffrey and Shelagh Ballard. Drove off in their huge Mercedes limousine for a tour of parts of the city, especially the extensive park. Then across the bridge to their sumptuous new home in North Vancouver, with a view of harbor and center city. Geoff astounded me by relating how he was driven out of his own company by the current CEO, a Pakistani Muslim, who lied to the board, saying that Geoff was sabotaging his efforts to run the company correctly. Eventually the opposition controlled more than 50% of the stock, and Geoff was voted out. He now has no relationship whatsoever with Ballard Power Systems. But he has founded a new company—Hydrogen—and has convinced General Motors to cooperate. The idea is that fuel cells do not just make electricity using hydrogen and producing water as the residue; they can also use water to produce hydrogen. So Geoff's idea is that you'll fill your fuel cell car with water; it will convert the water to hydrogen, and then you'll be ready to travel. Simple! But he has also had four years of severe illness needing a stent in his aorta, two artificial knees, and maybe a liver transplant. It's a miracle that he is alive. And he is somewhat hard of hearing as well, poor man. On the other side, he is famous, rich, and celebrated, with seven honorary degrees. And he lectures all over the world on transportation subjects. His son Curtis, whom we had last seen as a ten-year-old, called with his wife and two boys. He remembered Leander and Alec. We went to a lovely hotel for supper, where the owner is of course very familiar to the Ballards, who use his facilities for both pleasure and business. Before and afterwards, much good talk, some of it "theological."

Vancouver

Went to the Anglican Church with Geoff and Shelagh. Jolly, energetic, young rector who accompanies hymns on the guitar. Lovely moment for the children: "Do you know what a saint is?" "Are you a saint?" "Ah, hello Saint Sam!" But of course the service is mostly prescribed, with set readings and hymns. OK, but not for me. When they recited the Nicene Creed I kept silent. And they're afraid of silence. In the prayers, the woman conducting them said that anyone in the congregation could voice a prayer in the silences between the prayers she voiced, but of course there were no utterances. . . . Back home for lunch. Attempt to find the other two sons, Edward and Mark, but they were not at home. Then some more sightseeing, including the new art gallery that one of the sons' wives runs in an interesting building in the sort of Soho of Vancouver, including a huge market. . . . Finally we were deposited at the Hotel Vancouver, where we had a leisurely supper, alone, and retired early.

Vancouver

Discovered Vancouver's central library, in a beautiful building not far from our hotel. Started re-reading Dan Dombrowski's Kazantzakis and God. Excellent. I really should write a Pendle Hill pamphlet about God as no longer the Aristotelian unmoved mover or, more precisely, as bipolar: being and becoming. Lunch in a food court we discovered across the street. Picked up by André Gerolymatos and his assistant, Maria. To downtown campus of Simon Fraser University. I gave my "Odysseus Across the Centuries" lecture to a full house, standing room only.

Ballards came, too, and I had to kid Geoff about Tennyson's "Ulysses," which he knows by heart and adores. Reception afterward; met nice people including Cypriot consul to Vancouver and Maria's (non-Greek) fiancé. Then back to the hotel with Geoff and Shelagh for a leisurely supper. Geoff taught us about red wines, which need to be aerated before consumption—i.e., shaken or poured from bottle to decanter. I asked him how long he thinks it will take the internal combustion engine to be replaced. Forty years is his guess. The real culprits re: pollution are the "class-6" trucks, those that operate within cities. They account for a huge amount of the problem. If they were replaced with fuel cell trucks we wouldn't have to worry so much about cars or heavier trucks (which operate from city to city, not within the city).

Vancouver

We were driven out to Simon Fraser University's main campus, on the mountain in Burnaby. Beautiful architecture; a whole city, it seems, self-contained. André began to explain their internet system, which seems very sophisticated. Perhaps we can use it for Greece Today. More on this tomorrow. Geoff and Shelagh arrived in time for my seminar, but first we attended a class in elementary Greek, with good responses from the students but no Rassias tricks in the teaching. My seminar was on The Last Temptation. Small audience but some good questions afterward, chiefly from Geoff, who asked whether, if I had translated the book after understanding it in the ways I indicated, the translation would have been better. Tough question. I responded that probably the translation would have been worse. It was better to have approached the book naïvely. . . . Afterwards, Geoff, Shelagh, Chrysanthi, and I went to a lovely pub-like restaurant and continued with lots of good talk about faith and the afterlife. . . . They returned home; we went to the library, where I finished Dombrowski's Kazantzakis and God, the second half nowhere as interesting for me as the first half. Then dessert buffet at the hotel.

Vancouver

Maria's fiancé, who works in the computers sector, drove us to the Simon Fraser campus, to the Diamond Center, high on the mountain, with spectacular views of water below and jagged mountains in the distance, like the Alps. Then to a demonstration of their computer program for distance learning, with Ambassador Tsilas, a Greek journalist, and Chouláras, the press officer in Ottawa and of course an old friend. The program reminds me a little of our Annotext, but it isn't as fully developed yet: no sound, no graphics. But some of the ideas are OK for presentation of the grammar and drilling it. Overall, however, I had expected more and was disappointed. . . . Then back to the Diamond Center for an intimate lunch with SF's president, Stevenson, who turned out to be a youngish man, very affable, totally non-pompous. Born in South Africa, a historian. We talked about September 11, of course, and Modern Greek at Simon Fraser and about Simon Fraser himself, an 18th-century explorer active in this region. Afterwards, saw more of the stunning architecture of this campus, by the young Canadian architect Erickson. . . . Back at the hotel, walked down to the water with Chrysanthi, admiring building after building, plus fountains, pedestrian precincts, and the like. A very "civilized" city. . . . Then another dinner, hosted by the Dean of Arts in a fancy restaurant. I sat next to Tsilas and had a good conversation. He revealed that the impediment for Onassis vis-à-vis MGSA is Alexander Nehamas, who angered Papadimitriou, so that Princeton and MGSA are now blacklisted. I assured Tsilas that Nehamas is hardly active at all in MGSA. He would like to produce a rapprochement; wants me to meet with Papadimitriou in Athens. We'll see. He also asked me, strangely, if I am afraid of death. I said No and that I could send him my essay "On Retirement," which deals directly with this question. He felt bereft when he left the foreign service at age 62 or 63. I told him that I never felt that way, strangely, after I left the active professoriate. Geoff and Shelagh were there, too. Geoff said that he has so much money he doesn't know what to do with it. Also, they'd like to come to visit us and especially to see Leander again. So we'll try to get them to the farm this August. Apparently our times here together have been very stimulating for them as well as for us. I learned a little more last night about his standing here. He has a pin in his lapel. Someone asked what it signifies and he answered. Then Colin Jones, our Simon Fraser host in lieu of the president, said that it is the equivalent, in Canada, of a knighthood in England.

Thursday, November 8, 2001

Vancouver

The phone rang at 7:15 a.m. It was Alec happily announcing the birth of our new granddaughter (!), Elena Madeline Bien, 9.2 lbs., born around 6:30 a.m. Philadelphia time. Monica is fine and so is the baby. Chrysanthi will arrive there on Saturday morning, precisely when Monica and Elena will be returning from the hospital. The timing is perfect. . . . We went to Simon Fraser by taxi for my last lecture, "Inventing Greece." I started with an apology, saying that it was written long before September 11th and now seems not to apply at all to fundamentalist Muslims, whose allegiance seems to be to the religion rather than to any specific Muslim nation. On the other hand, I hoped that my "metaphysical" interpretation of nationalism might appear suitable as well as an explanation of the Muslim fanatics' mentality. Again, there was a small audience in the seminar room, but some good questions at the end. Then, delightfully, we departed with the Ballards for a long lunch near the campus. Geoff discussed his Quaker background, his mother having been a sort of foster child of Seeböhm Rowntree's. But he was raised in an upper middle-class family, sent away to a public school at a tender age, never loved by his father—the whole upper class catastrophe. He said that Shelagh prevented him, happily, from acting the same way toward his own sons. . . . To the Pan Pacific Hotel for the final dinner, 60–70 people, hosted by the Onassis Foundation. Lots of speeches, by deans, André, Colin Jones, and introductions including a very complimentary one for Geoff Ballard, and then for me. I spoke "personally," about learning Greek in bed, studying with Raphael Demos, L. H. Post, Kitto, being able to say in Ancient Greek "the general led the army into the plain," then learning Modern Greek from schoolbooks (Η Νίνα παίζει με το τόπι της), translating The Last Temptation because of Mrs. Kazantzakis's moratorium on translations not directly from the Greek; then a little about founding of MGSA and development of the field, with hopes, finally, that Simon Fraser's MG program will prosper. Tsilas spoke afterwards about the Onassis Foundation's programs and hopes. Fond farewells, presents from SF, ride back to the hotel with the Ballards. Geoff very excited because he received a hint, earlier, that vice-president Cheney, because we don't want to rely now on Arab oil, is going to say something about hydrogen. And General Motor's CEO booked a telephone call for this morning. Let's hope. Emotional parting with Geoff and Shelagh, and expectation of another reunion this summer, at the farm.

Vancouver–Seattle

To Seattle via AMTRAK bus, about 3½ hours. Dan Dombrowski, author of Kazantzakis and God, met us at the station. We had lunch at a harbor-side restaurant, then went to a salmon hatchery, saw the salmon fighting their way upstream to the holding tanks, where their bellies are split open and the eggs are placed where they'll hatch. The fingerlings are then placed in the ocean. Remarkably, these same fish return two years later to the exact same stream to spawn. Then to a huge waterfall emptying into a gorge. Fun to talk with Dombrowski because of his work with process theology, which he says is marginal but usually acceptable, at least in Protestant circles. I'd still like to do a Pendle Hill pamphlet on Quakerism and process theology, overcoming the theistic (Aristotelian) view of deity and in favor of the panentheistic one. Dan drove us to the home of Deanna's father and stepmother, Han and Rachel Lee. Surprisingly, he was easy to talk to, although he doesn't establish eye contact. She, too, except that her English is minimal. Their friends, they said, are Taiwanese, not Chinese. Han believes that Taiwan will be restored to China eventually. Even now, Taiwanese businesses are moving to China because labor is so much cheaper there. We also talked easily about Boeing (whose factory we later saw), Ballard fuel cells, Chinese characters (kanji means "Chinese word") and grandchildren. They took us to a Chinese buffet restaurant, mediocre, but near the airport, and then to the airport. Very convenient, obviously, and nice to keep our acquaintance alive.

Wednesday, November 14, 2001

Visited Steve Scher, back from hospital after his heart episode, arrhythmic, and doing well. He made me his "famous" cappuccino, using a "sparkling new machine." Then Dick came and we went to the Indian restaurant. Who do I see there but Ned Perrin and Nardy Campion and a youngish lady sitting next to Ned. It was only after some initial conversation that he volunteered, "We are married." Dick said afterwards that Ned looked ill, maybe with Alzheimer's, and I agree that he was strange. Is this his 4th marriage? The woman looked about 40; he is over 75, I imagine. . . . Dick and I played Prokofiev's marvelous sonata, then tried Bach's concerto in A and 1½ of Bach's violin sonatas.

NYC, Yale Club

Went to the World Trade disaster site. Still smells. Men scrubbing soot off the nearby sidewalk. Skeleton of the building's façade. Number 5 WTC reduced to its exposed  $2 \times 4$ s, a skeleton. Police everywhere and barricades. Public gallery at New York Stock Exchange, closed since September 11. . . . Tried to find a copy of Kazantzakis's Saint Francis at the Strand Book Store. It's out of print in both the US and Great Britain. No luck. . . . Supper with Daphne and Greg. Christina not very friendly. Andrew beautiful but still talks in a way that is largely incomprehensible (except by Daphne).

NYC

Post-secondary committee with Yannis Vezyroglou. Student life committee with Annie Levis. The three interns are functioning beautifully and the students are speaking more English. But the College is still greatly under-enrolled. Six Lyceum students did enroll, but these were the six who failed the state exams to enter university. After lunch, a plenary session: a think tank to throw out ideas for strategic planning. I started the session by reading Ritsos's "Peace," appropriate for September 11th and much appreciated. I also gave my update regarding Brenda's book. Lots of good ideas were thrown out. I thought of Jack Shepherd's Cambridge program as a perfect template for AFS in relation to Albanians, Bulgarians, etc. From 6:00 to 8:00, party at Phil Foote's. The Greek Consul will host us next time, he pledged. Met Phil's son, who graduated from Tuck School. Afterwards, I invited a group to sup at the Yale Club, which is always so deliciously placid: Mike and Mary Keeley, Alex Drapos, John Cleave, George Legakis and wife. Very pleasant and relaxed. Toward the end, Alex asked for ideas for the 2004 celebration. I felt that students should be involved, perhaps doing a play or pageant based on AFS history.

Saturday, November 17, 2001

NYC

A very full board meeting in the morning. Mike started it by reading Sikelianos's "Agraphon" at my suggestion—haunting and appropriate for September 11th, written during the 1942 περίοδος. During lunch, I spoke to Arthur Dukakis about possibly having MGSA 2003 at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts and maybe also at the Malliotis Center. He is chair of the Malliotis board and a friend of the Greek curator at the museum.

This might be more possible than the Met in New York. I spoke to three different people there over the weekend, and was not encouraged. Tried repeatedly to get Leon Black on the telephone (he's a trustee), without success. Dukakis told me that Michael Macrakis just died. So, Lily won't be much help. . . . Afterwards to the Giacometti show at MoMA. Not my taste, really, except for the gorgeous "walking woman," done before he developed the style for which he is best known. She is thin, elongated, but smooth, not composed of thousands of slabs of clay. Then to the New York State Opera to see The Magic Flute, sung in English. For me, its magic was only intermittent, perhaps because of the overall production, although the voices were all first-rate. As always, the miracle of Mozart's music is the highlight.

Philadelphia-Lumberton

Drove to Dan's to practice for tomorrow night. Then to Alec's to see Elena, now three weeks old: a tiny bundle, sleeping peacefully. Alec is very negative about Friends Select, but will probably stay next year, his 4th.

Pendle Hill

Books Committee with Steve present. He wants to change the whole procedure so that we'll commission books and pre-sell them. But he is going to allow the re-issue of Brinton's Friends for 300 Years with updating by Margaret Hope Bacon. Then he hopes for an entire book on the last fifty years, followed by a totally rewritten history of the 350 years. But who can do any of this as well as Howard Brinton? . . . Pubs Committee said Yes to two of the four submissions: a record. Suzy Morrison came, pregnant with twins. Since she'd been in a Lesbian relationship with Sandra, this came as a bit of a surprise. . . . Dan arrived at 6:00 and we practiced on the new Yamaha while everyone else was having supper. Lovely sound. After the Board, we performed the two Husa pieces (with lots of mistakes by Dan) and the Thompson, which as usual was a crowd-pleaser.

Saturday, November 29, 2001

After the morning Board meeting and executive session over lunch, I drove to Princeton and met with Dimitri for three hours mostly discussing MGSA problems, especially concerning the recent symposium. He is worried that young people aren't coming. Is MGSA in decline?

Then to Forbes College to have supper with my former student Nancarrow, and also Jen Brea and one other. Very pleasant. Nancarrow is doing humanities in the Columbia University type great books course and loving it.

Tuesday, December 4, 2001

Mother moved to Vining 630, in the new construction, a double room but occupied by her as a single. Very nice. I fixed the frame of a fine picture of my father, aged maybe 40, smoking his pipe and looking very distinguished.

Friday, December 7, 2001

Fancy English Department dinner at Home Hill. Chrysanthi and I went to see if we still felt some connection with the department. And actually we did. People were very cordial and welcoming. . . . Earlier, saw Dr. Heaney, the fifth year after my operation. All looks well. I don't need to return now unless the PSA goes up. He explained with excitement that he now does the "radical" laparoscopically.

Cambridge

To Harvard to hear Babiniotis's Christopher lecture, on Demotic and the EU. The main challenge, he stressed, is multilingualism. What's needed in Europe is linguistic polymorphism as opposed to the linguistic hegemony of English. Interestingly, he said that teachers of Greek in Greece itself misuse the communicative method, using it empirically with the outmoded Triantafyllidis grammar. . . . Afterwards to the A.R.T. to see Pirandello's fascinating Enrico IV, about reality vs. fantasy, madness vs. sanity, the historical vs. the contemporary. Bravura performance by David Kelly as Enrico. Lots of razzmatazz, as is usual at the A.R.T., but it was appropriate this time. Rich costumes; a whole world of delicious fantasy.

December 21, 2001

I saw Dr. Gerber last Monday about cholesterol. He had had me take a new blood test that indicates hardening of the arteries and also a vascular ultrasound. Today he told me that both tests came back very favorably, showing no hardening. Thus I don't need to take Lipitor, the cholesterol-reducing drug. Excellent.

December 24, 2001

To Philadelphia

E-mail from Stelios saying that he'd just been given as a present my book Καζαντζάκης: η πολιτική του πνεύματος. So, it's published, finally. . . . AMTRAK to Philadelphia. We were the only people in the Business Class car the entire trip. Overnight in Warwick Hotel, 13th and Locust. Surprise upon entrance: Leander and family already there (we expected them tomorrow). Shared their supper. Then to Alec's. They gave Chrysanthi a splendid present: an easel for painting. Plus cheesecake with 5 candles and "Happy Birthday." I gave her this morning a beautiful cookbook for "healthy" meals that she seemed to like and says she can't wait to use. . . . On the train, did draft agenda for MGSA board meeting in February and started revising my "Christ Recrucified" chapter for volume 2 of Kazantzakis: Politics of the Spirit. I'm doing all these chapters with Greek quotations as well as English translations to ease the process should volume 2 be translated into Greek. The chapter isn't bad, but very long. How good that I did all this (the entire second volume) 25 years ago. I could never do it now if I started from scratch. . . . Walked to the new concert hall, just completed. It was closed but we could gaze through the glass to see the magnificent lobby inside, all under a vaulted roof that looks like the sky itself. . . . Met afterwards with Leander a bit. They are in effect held hostage by their children, who control their lives from the moment they wake until, finally, they sleep.

December 25, 2001, Christmas

Philadelphia

Daphne and family arrived at 11:00. We all gathered at Alec's to distribute presents. The best, I think, was a set of a dozen dinosaurs for Andrew, who has a "thing" about dinosaurs and knows all their scientific names: brontosaurus, tyrannosaurus, etc. We had a light lunch, lots of talk, then returned to the hotel for a few hours so that Theo could have his nap. We gathered in Daphne's two rooms. I played hide and seek with Christina and Sophia. Lots more talk, pleasant. Then back to Alec's for a splendid turkey dinner prepared by Monica, followed by her special chocolate cream pie. Alec showed a Mr. Bean video that had us all in stitches. Back to the hotel, where luckily we found Humphrey Bogart and Katharine Hepburn on the TV in "African Queen" followed by the Royal Ballet's "Nutcracker." A very relaxing day, which also included a few hours' work on my "Christ Recrucified" chapter. The problem with this second volume, I fear, is that it will be too long. Will I have the discipline to cut?

December 26, 2001

Philadelphia–South Salem

Alec and I walked to the Kimmel Center, which is remarkable: two separate buildings under a single glass dome with sunshine flooding in. The large hall is beautiful, shaped like a cello. One of the resident orchestras is Ignat's. . . . Then drove with Leander to South Salem. He is such a bad driver, ignoring signs, switching lanes suddenly without directional signals. I'm amazed that he has not been already in a serious accident. Heavy traffic, wrong turns, but we arrived finally, enjoying the peacefulness of this lovely house. Greg had to return to New York by train after supper. Leander and I walked through Katonah, a typical upscale community with outrageous prices in its boutiques.

December 27, 2001

South Salem

Played with the children—tag, etc. Drove to Ridgefield, shopped in the fancy D'Agostino's. . . . Listened to a remarkable CD of Callas arias, also to Pavarotti singing "New York, New York." Finished melding my typed "Christ Recrucified" chapter with the longer version of the political section. Read two TLS's. Long talk with Daphne in the evening about Andrew's speech difficulty. He pronounces all the vowels correctly but not many of the consonants. Daphne is encouraged however by his progress over the last six months.

I read with surprise and dismay in the Harvard Alumni Bulletin that John Harvey died. Surprise because he had disappeared all these years, with nothing in the various Harvard alumni books; yet now there was a short account of his career, which was spent mostly in Korea, as it turned out. I thought to contact Peter Fleming, who had been across the hall from John and me in Lowell House. Peter telephoned and we had a long, cordial conversation, the first since 1949 or 1950. Actually, Peter had written the obituary. He and John's college friend Laszlo Berger had visited John in hospital in Boston and again in Washington, DC, as he was dying (of lung cancer probably, the result of his chain smoking). Peter's regret was that he hadn't contacted me as well. Too bad. John was important for three years in my life. I wish I could have said a proper "goodbye" to him.

Saturday, January 5, 2002

Cambridge

Lunch with Panagiotis Roilos, who wants me to lecture at Harvard in February on Kazantzakis's Saint Francis. He'll be doing an entire semester on Kazantzakis, and also will have a Kazantzakis film festival. He even has a print of Celui qui doit mourir. Then to the A.R.T. for a splendid performance of Othello, so vivid that we all felt the agony of the characters as though they were in real life, not in a play. Tom Derrah was a fine Iago, John Thompson an epileptic Othello and Karen MacDonald a splendid Emilia. Only Mirjan Jokovic's Desdemona left me not entirely enthralled. I realized that Cherry Jones will play the lead in Lysistrata in the spring; that should be a true treat. . . . Bought a CD of Rosenkavalier in Cambridge and listened to half of it in bed, following the libretto. It's a work of genius.

January 24, 2002

To Philadelphia

Yesterday H el ene Rothermund called from Kendal and offered us an apartment, number 171 in Lucretia Mott, two bedrooms. We went to see it this morning before I flew to Philadelphia. It's fine, a typical "F" apartment but with a screened-in porch, facing west. The only defect: two pine trees outside the windows blocking some of the light, but she says they can be trimmed. We're inclined to say Yes and will then avoid the 5% increase in entrance fee effective on April 1st. Chrysanthi told Daphne, who said it was a shame; we should wait for the two bedroom and den, but H el ene said that would be five years. Chrysanthi is eager to go, and I am willing. It has to happen, so why not now, before we have any debilitating illness. . . . Chrysanthi has already been talking to a real estate agent, who says she can sell our house in one day for $350,000.

Before rushing to Kendal: conference call with Mike Keeley, Karen Van Dyck, and Peter Constantine regarding the Fakazis anthology. We agreed on most points and will meet on February 10 to choose the poems that remain "in." Nice group to work with.

Gondicas delayed two months or more in returning the copyedited MS of Greek Today. We'll lose another academic year. Theano still can't use my disks for typesetting. I've gotten Stelios Orphanoudakis to investigate. And Felitsa Makedon gave me someone here who might be able to help. . . . Off to Philadelphia and then to Dan's. We played the Granger and the Townsend as well as possible. Dan ignores all phrasing and dynamics. But we did the old Husa better than ever. Lovely supper in a restaurant Dan has newly discovered. The town board wants him to run in their next election. He's hesitating. If he does run, he'll end up mayor for sure. . . . To Pendle Hill. Played the new Yamaha piano from 11:00 p.m. until midnight: Beethoven.

Saturday, January 26, 2002

Philadelphia

Long board meeting until 2:30 because of executive session, first with Steve, then without him, regarding the evaluation of his performance after his first year. I asked him if he had to go through a similar ordeal when he was CEO of the Donnelly Corporation and he said Yes, but not with such nice people. Among other things, he told us that he is determined to get Margaret Fraser to leave; he feels that she is incapable of performing the dean's duties because she is basically a "pastoral" person and says she agrees. This will be painful. I wish he'd be as decisive about Rebecca. . . . Drove to Philadelphia and had a nice supper with Alec and family. Then Alec and I went two blocks to the Academy for the Philadelphia Orchestra's 145th Anniversary concert, to be held every year still in the Academy even though the orchestra has moved to the Kimmel Center. A light program showing off the orchestra, and with Heidi Murphy, soprano, and Joshua Bell, violinist, as soloists. I found Murphy's singing especially moving. What a miracle to have such an instrument in one's throat! . . . Afterwards, back to Alec's for dessert and conversation, mostly about why Quakers aren't uniformly pro-life in the abortion question. Hard to answer, since liberal Quakers are pro-choice, which would seem to be contrary to the peace testimony, justifying the violent destruction of life.

Sunday, January 27, 2002

Philadelphia–Pendle Hill

Drove to Philadelphia again and went to the zoo with Alec, Monica, Theo, and Elena. A fascinating place. America's first zoo, with many rare, endangered species. Theo is especially attracted to the gorillas. Then to Chinatown for lunch in an Indonesian restaurant, a very authentic one according to Monica. On the way back, I bought four new shirts at Macy's for the ridiculous price of $7.00 or $13.00 (pure silk), since I'd forgotten to pack my shirts. . . . Tried to prepare a little for my course, starting with Waugh's A Handful of Dust. Chrysanthi telephoned that Sally Rutter thinks we can get $400,000 for the house. But $28,000 will go as the agent's commission. . . . First meeting of my course. Only five students, one of whom is Margaret Fraser. Another is an interesting young black man who wants to be a writer, presently teaching "language arts" in Middle School in a Quaker school in the south. Another is a Dartmouth dropout who also wants to write. And two older women. We started on A Handful of Dust. Luckily (for me), none of the students had a clue regarding the hidden religious theme.

Wednesday, January 30, 2002

Pendle Hill

Chrysanthi arrived last night via train and we visited Alec and Monica a bit. Today I met with Steve regarding Rebecca. We're both convinced that she has to go. (He's also firing Margaret Fraser.) Rebecca has reverted to her previous practice of not answering messages and has also become a sloppy editor. The recent pamphlet on Kazantzakis is filled with errors that she didn't correct on the MS and additional ones perpetrated by the typesetter that she didn't correct because she never even read the typeset copy. Maybe she can stay on as a part-time teacher, that's all. . . . To Route 3 to pick up 80 Greek desserts for tomorrow. Course going well.

Thursday, January 31, 2002

Chrysanthi cooked a Greek supper for everyone, much appreciated. After supper, lecture by Mary Lord, who's working for AFSC, on the response to September 11th. She said that the World Council of Churches wants help from historic peace churches regarding nonviolent techniques. I told her about John C. Baker's $100,000 gift to facilitate cooperation among the three historic peace churches.

Friday, February 1, 2002

Finished the course by playing Martinu's opera yesterday and today. It's magnificent. If only it is produced again, somewhere. Dan here for lunch. He's decided not to run for the Lumberton council. Margaret stayed a bit after lunch and told me that Steve is requiring her to leave. Nice that she was willing to share. She has no idea what's next. I reminded her of Kazantzakis's "eschatological hope." Perhaps this tragedy can become a blessing. . . . The course was nice and went well. But I still feel that I don't need this any more. I should steel myself to concentrate on writing. Now I've lost an entire week. . . . To Philadelphia. Luckily, tonight James McBride was signing his new novel at Border's at Walnut and 18th. We went with Alec and family to the Italian restaurant opposite Border's, then saw James and Stephanie and Azure and Jordan, and met James's mother for the first time. He signed a book for me, his novel on the black regiment in World War II. But we couldn't stay for his talk because Alec had gotten us tickets to the Tokyo Quartet at the Kimmel Center. The Perelman Recital Theater, where they played, is disappointing. Chrysanthi said the seat color is the color of vomit. But the quartet played Mozart, Brahms, and Hayashi beautifully, with perfect precision and grace.

February 8, 2002

Princeton

Nice supper with Tom and Nancy Doulis, who are at Princeton for two months. Before that, Hellenic Studies seminar with Michael Llewellyn-Smith, former British ambassador to Greece, speaking very knowledgeably on Venizelos's role in the Asia Minor disaster. Then I rushed to Firestone Library to see if I could access O Novμάς (1909) on the CD they have, and I did, finding what I needed (a quote from Σπασμένες ψυχές) in ten minutes. But the Νέα Εστία I needed was in storage. Yet interlibrary loan said they'd xerox some pages for me and mail them. Amazing! . . . In Prospect House after dinner, saw the opening ceremony of the Salt Lake City Winter Olympics. Stunning. Such ideals, such beautiful, youthful faces. But the Utah Indian show was sentimentalized.

Saturday, February 9, 2002

Princeton

A miracle! I convinced the MGSA Executive Board that the Olympics might be a good topic for our 2003 symposium. Tom Gallant, newly appointed to a chair at York University in Toronto, volunteered to be local arrangements chair if we go to Toronto, and promised ample financial support from his community. Looks good. Also the Minister of Culture was in New York last week and promised support if we do something on the Olympics. Thus my plans for the Metropolitan Museum of Art will go away, but we'll be fine in Toronto, where there is also a fine museum. . . . I discovered that Llewellyn-Smith is working on the Olympics as an expression of statehood, and another person here is studying them anthropologically. I'm also hoping to get Don Nielsen to come.

Sunday, February 10, 2002

More MGSA in the morning; then Mike Keeley and I went by train to New York and met with Karen Van Dyck and Peter Constantine in Mike's apartment on 9th Street, to compare ratings on the poems meant for the Fakazis anthology. We got as far as Ritsos. I'll need to go back next week. . . . Bought some κεφαλοτύρι και μανούρι cheese to take home, plus delicious double Gloucester.

Thursday, February 14, 2002

New York City

Went to Dimitri Tziouvas's Onassis Foundation seminar at Columbia, on collectivity vs. individualism in Greek culture. Good crowd including Adi Pollis, Sifakis, Gourgouris, Neni, Syrimis (teaches at Yale), Kate Fleming. Excellent discussion. I urged him to be more comparative, to avoid what Gourgouris calls ομφαλοσκοπία. Marianna was there too. I sent regards via them to Bryer, Katerina, and Harry in Brum. . . . Had supper with Daphne and Greg beforehand. They're going to Riparius tomorrow. Gary McGinn has agreed to be caretaker for the house.

Friday, February 15, 2002

To Columbia again. Nice to sit in Butler Library after so many years. Worked from 11:00 until 3:00 with Karen, Mike, and Peter on the anthology. Peter hopes to bring out a complete short stories of Papadiamandis to match his Babel volume. We're making progress. They agreed to keep four of the Χαρκιανάκης poems. . . . E-mail from the Metropolitan Museum saying they're willing to host our symposium. But we may go to Toronto.

Saturday, February 16, 2002

Bought 30 cartons from Staples. Discarded all the audiotapes I recorded 40 years ago in New York. One's past life ends up in the trash. Started to paste furniture decals in the diagram of our new home: Kendal 171. We'll be fine: downsized sensibly. But there are still lots of books. I'm very calm about the move, so far. What I'll miss most is walking to the office and walking home for lunch. But maybe a bicycle will suffice except during snowstorms.

Saturday, February 23, 2002

Cambridge

Lunch with Tasoula Karakasidou. But first, while I was waiting for her in the Charles Hotel, I walked Lynn and Bob Fagles with their daughter. Nice reunion, comparing impressions of retirement. Then a lovely reunion, too, with Tasoula, who is now interested in "medical archeology"—e.g., why Cretans have such an increased incidence of cancer, presumably owing to use of fertilizers and pesticides. I thought this might be of interest to the American Farm School, and good reason for supporting organic farming. . . . Then to the A.R.T. for Adam Rapp's "Stone Cold Dead Serious," beautifully acted, about a dysfunctional family that somehow improves owing to tragic developments. The first half, Chrysanthi said, is "sick"—so vulgar and obscene. But the second act is moving and humane. . . . Chrysanthi went home by bus; I continued to NYC via US Air Shuttle.

Sunday, February 24, 2002

Huntington, Long Island

Limo to Huntington driven by a Yugoslav from Montenegro. We talked for an hour about my experiences in Yugoslavia, and his of course. He is so happy to be here. . . . Lunch with Jeff, Teresa, and children. Then to the Sophia Center. Nice to see Father Smith again. Good crowd, including a woman who teaches Joyce at Adelphi College. I lectured for two hours with a short break, got as far as the end of Proteus. Nice reception afterwards with cordial conversations. People seemed very appreciative. And I enjoyed lecturing again on Ulysses. . . . Then supper with Jeff, Rev. Smith, and a colleague of Jeff's. Smith very liberal in politics. Greatly disturbed by American bombardment of Afghanistan, etc. Jeff strangely very conservative on all issues. I told him about Robert Frost's "I was conservative as a youth as a way of assuring I'd be liberal when I got older." Jeff went in the opposite direction, alas.

Wednesday, February 27, 2002

Cambridge

To Harvard. Dia visited at 5:00, followed by Roilos. Then to the Barker Center where I lectured on Kazantzakis's Saint Francis as a post-Christian using soul-force to create his own fate. Good questions afterwards, followed by dinner at the Faculty Club with Roilos and Dimitrios Yatromanolakis, who wants to see my essay on Μέλισσα.

Thursday, February 28, 2002

My first experience of the Acela train, the new AMTRAK express, from Boston to New York in three hours. Beautiful cars and good speed. . . . To Columbia. Worked from 2:00 to 6:00 with Mike, Karen, and Peter; we're getting near the end but not quite. I have to go to Princeton on Sunday.

Saturday, March 2, 2002

I read Harkianakis's "The Twentieth Century" to start the AFS Board meeting today, then reported on the Marder history: contract signed, copyediting progressing, illustrations being gathered. We expect to deliver the MS to Mercer UP in September. . . . They changed the dates of the 2003 meeting in June, so I'll be able to attend Leander's workshop then. . . . Last night, reception at the Greek Consulate on 79th Street, very grand and cordial. Tonight, Paul Taylor ballet at City Center. I'm reading more of Calotychos's materials for the tenure decision. How to support him? So much of it is journalism rather than scholarship. . . . To the City Center to see Paul Taylor's ballet troupe. Three ballets, each so different: "Arden Court" with music by William Boyce, classical, traditional, yet with the Paul Taylor flavor. Then one I hated: music by György Ligeti: postmodern, mostly computerized, it seemed; ugly; the dance movements spasmodic, disagreeable. But then "Black Tuesday," delicious, humorous, although set to songs about the Depression, ending with “Brother Can You Spare a Dime.” Joyous. And of course in all three, even the second, the marvel of trained bodies. At the final curtain call, Taylor himself appeared, looking about 40 years old although he is 71.

Sunday, March 3, 2002

Princeton

To Mike’s to continue work on the Fakazis anthology. . . . Yesterday Chrysanthi called: the furnace smoked, set off a smoke alarm. Boisvert’s Pete came, fixed it, he thought, left, and soon it started all over again. Finally they discovered that the culprit was the chimney, which Pete cleaned. And all this while Daphne was in Hanover helping to sort things out: what goes to South Salem, what to Riparius. Daphne likes our new apartment; that’s very encouraging.

Thursday, March 7, 2002

Paid Kendal $274,964 entry fee and $2944.10 for the first monthly fee (pro-rated). Supped with Wilsons there and then spoke in the Gathering Room on the origins of Kendal. Mother was in the front row in her wheelchair. Afterwards she actually spoke three or four connected sentences to me, just like old times, and said that she had heard every word.

Friday, March 8, 2002

War/Peace Studies lunch, full of students; good discussion of the current “war.” Is it the precursor to World War III or more like the imperialistic skirmishes of the nineteenth century? I suggested the Moslem resurgence from the 8th to the 15th centuries: maybe the same will happen. . . . After supper went to see Judy Dench in “Iris,” about Iris Murdoch’s Alzheimer’s. Superb, and infinitely sad.

Saturday, March 9, 2002

Cambridge

Lunch with Dia and Wim in the Harvest Restaurant. Then a spirited performance at the A.R.T. of Peter Weiss’s “Marat/Sade.” I must see a video of the Peter Brook production to compare. I remember seeing it on Broadway. This production has Corday kill de Sade as well as Marat. Stephanie Roth-Haberle was superb as Corday, Will LeBow as Marat. Total theater, very Brechtian of course.

Wednesday, March 13, 2002

Athens, Hotel Electra

Uneventful flights to Athens, via Amsterdam. Nice seat-mates to talk to, and delicious upgrading to business class on the transatlantic flight, which tempted me to cheat on feast-fasting in order to eat the delicious supper offered by US Airways. Arrived in Athens to find a band playing loud music in Syntagma. After supper, walked to Panepistimiou, meeting Victor Papacosma on the way, to indulge in loukoumadhes: shop filled to bursting with talkative middle-aged women. Strange to pay for everything in euros, 2.20 for loukoumadhes instead of 800 drachmas.

Thursday, March 14, 2002

Athens

Our group met at 8:30 a.m. in the hotel and were bussed out to Glyfada to a National Bank building (built with EE money). Lengthy introductions, more coffee, and finally our subgroup, Ανθρωπιστικές σπουδές (= Humanities), started looking at dossiers. I had six in all. For each we had to grade zero to ten for a series of criteria. Then a separate dossier came for ΕΤΠΑ (Ευρωπαϊκό Ταμείο Περιφερειακής Ανάπτυξης), another source of funding, and again we had about ten categories to grade: very difficult. In each case, we had the relevant grades of two earlier readers; very helpful. I finished one dossier by lunchtime but after lunch managed to do the remaining five (we stayed until 8:00 p.m.). I'm sure I did them poorly, especially in the area of funding, which I had very little sense of. The dossiers were from the Ionian University (for a program in translation), from Athens (for translation, Greek as a second language, use of computers in classics), and from Thessaloniki (Greek as a second language, computers and classics). I gave good grades to all except the one from Athens, with Babiniotis as chief, which was asking for extra money to do what a department should do in its normal operation. Also, the two theses submitted as evidence of past accomplishment had nothing whatsoever to do with the subject of the proposal. But the other five were worthy (I hope), although the Ionian people, who seemed very expert in translation, appeared very different from what David Connelly told me about them when we were in Princeton. If only we could reconvene in three years to learn which of the funded programs really did something. All in all, about 60% of the applicants will be funded. Lots and lots of EU money. . . . At 9:00 p.m. we all gathered at the Ταβέρνα του Ψαρρά in Plaka for a too-large meal and of course lots of conversation. I listened to and spoke Greek exclusively all day without too much fatigue. Among the colleagues here, beside Victor Papacosma, is Αργυρίου, head of the European MGSA, a soft-spoken gentle man; a nice French professor who has lots of Ancient Greek and struggles with Modern Greek; a Greek woman teaching in France; a super-confident lawyer who tries cases here in Athens; Greek professors teaching in California and at Brown, several from Cyprus, including one who teaches Plato and Aristotle and was delighted to hear that I had studied at Harvard with Raphael Demos.

Friday, March 15, 2002

Athens

Another twelve-hour day working. I had to write up a defense of my decisions in each of the six cases, in Greek of course. Then our group listened to each person's conclusions and the coordinator (from the Ministry, very capable) asked for any discussion. I think mine were the most controversial, largely because in several cases I liked the general idea of the proposal but wasn't strict enough regarding the particulars of the application, especially in the area of funding. But we finally finished about 8:00 p.m. and then had to sign each and every page of each and every set of grades. Very tedious. Supper at this center. Nice conversation. Taxi back to the hotel. Sleep! . . . But when I returned to the hotel I saw my message light blinking. It was a message from Chrysanthi saying that we had received an offer of $350,000 for the house and should we say Yes. I called; she wasn't home, so I left a message: Yes, say Yes. $350,000 minus Sally Rutter's 7% commission = $325,500, minus other costs of about $1500 = $324,000, minus Kendal's entry fee of $276,000 = a surplus of about $48,000, which fully covers a year's monthly fees and moving expenses. So, it's OK. And if we receive the money before around May 1st I'll avoid paying interest on $225,000 borrowed from Paine Webber on margin.

Athens

Walked down Ερμού, now only for pedestrians, to find the nearest branch of Egnatia Bank, on Αθηνάς, but of course it's closed on Saturday. Then by subway to Μέγαρον Μουσικής and one block to Μιχαλοπούλου to visit Θεανώ Πετρίδου in her studio at #93. She showed me what happens when she boots up my Greek: βλέπω becomes βλήπω, etc. All the letters are in the wrong place on the keyboard. Stelios's man in Crete is going to try a conversion; that's our only hope. But all the English is fine, so that can be copied and pasted even if the Greek needs to be retyped (lessons 1–6 are already retyped). In any case, Θεανώ is in touch with Panagopoulos, Orphanoudakis, even Jeff Rustin, and of course with the Press. Our next job is to get the copyedited MS to her.

She hopes to finish by July. . . . In spare moments I'm going through my dossier on Light, marking passages in red. Lots to do, still, to be ready for the course in April. Plus moving, of course. . . . Martin McKinsey came to the hotel and we walked through Plaka to the new pedestrian precinct at the base of the Acropolis, then across the shoulder of the hill back to Plaka, which is lovely, filled with restored mansions, new museums, etc. And fewer cars. Martin is here on a Fulbright to translate, annotate, and introduce Cavafy's prose writings for a book. And he has a real, tenure-track position next September at UNH. How nice! . . . By metro to Πλατεία Βικτορίας to see Christos and Eri. Christos gave me a long résumé of the situation re: autistics in Greece. Actually, much has improved. The Greek government is sponsoring three homes for autistics, out of the six proposed. More may be added later. Also, there are schemes to train the personnel involved. He has already translated into Greek and published about ten books dealing with autism. The negative side is that his own board of directors is sabotaging him and his efforts, trying to oust him from the presidency. Powerful individuals want everything done solely for their own autistic children and resent Christos's interest in the whole of the country. I thought of Jeff Ballard's ouster from the company he founded, the non-Quaker takeover of Kendal, ousting us Quakers. But when Christos in disgust said that he would not run again for the presidency, a leading supporter, a corporation in France, said that they'd withdraw their pledge if Christos wasn't president. So, he's still the boss. But who knows? In any case he has no clear successor (διάδοχος). . . . I told Eri about my service reading submissions and she commented that the one done by her department was done in a mad frenzy because they'd been informed of the competition only two weeks in advance. Typical!

Athens

Nice breakfast with Argyriou and Papacosma. . . . Then walked to the Acropolis. I've been many times, but I was just as amazed as always by the perfection of the Parthenon and its sculptures. The power of this art is so evident. And much has been restored on the north side. . . . Subway to Εθνική Αμύνη, where Don Nielsen picked me up on his Vespa scooter, without a helmet. He has a comfortable apartment at 40 Κωστή Παλαμά in Νέα Ψυχικό and lives with his huge, aged cat and lots of books. We ate in the local taverna. He knows everyone in the neighborhood and pays the tavern owner by monthly bills. Coffee in front of a wood fire in his apartment. Good discussion on the Olympics (he'll help in many ways our MGSA symposium), on environmental protection (he's interested in Alexios Monopolis's project and will introduce him to Costas Carras), on Theano's problem (he thinks Dimitris Daskopoulos can help), and on the American Farm School (he agrees that Dimitri's father would be an ideal trustee, especially since he knows everyone in the government in Thessaloniki). . . . Back on the scooter to the Metro. Stopped to view, again, the archeological finds displayed in the Syntagma station. . . . Then to Christos and Eri again. Lovely to be with old friends. Christos wants me to send him photocopies of Ritsos's letters to me, especially the one where Ritsos outlines what I should write about him. This can be published along with other materials in Θέματα Λογοτεχνίας. We talked a lot about Daphne's Andrew. Could he possibly be autistic? But the chief symptoms outlined by Christos don't seem to be evident in Andrew, thankfully. We laughed about the occasion when Christos brought me to visit Ritsos on the day of my arrival, after two sleepless nights, and we ended up going to a special performance of "D" with Katrakis that lasted until midnight, and then to a taverna as Katrakis's guests, until 3:00 a.m. or more. And Christos had other memories of Birmingham and even of New York that I'd forgotten. We'll hope to see each other again at the end of May, with Chrysanthi.

Tuesday, March 19, 2002

Sold the house for the full asking price of $395,000. This will pay the Kendal entrance fee plus two full years of monthly payments. . . . Space Committee in the evening. They still have not reduced the total renovation price to the Meeting's stated maximum of $375,000.

Saturday-Sunday, March 23-24, 2002

Leander and Alec here. Very helpful with the moving. We brought loads to storage in Lebanon, to my office in Gerry, and of course to Kendal 171. So much better to work together!

Tuesday, March 26, 2002

Moving day to Kendal. Hanover Transfer people wonderfully efficient and pleasant. One load went off to Daphne in South Salem; everything but the books to Kendal 171. Easy. We're both very comfortable here already. I don't miss 12 Ledyard Lane.

Sunday, March 31, 2002 (Easter)

Easter dinner at Kendal with Tom and Joan Wilson. Living here is like being in a fancy hotel. And going out on our balcony in the cool morning is like going out on the deck of a cruise ship. . . . All the paintings are now up, thanks to a maintenance woman who worked most of Friday. Some boxes are still unpacked, but mostly we are settled. I've been continuing to prepare for the Pendle Hill "Light" course. I wrote to Steve Baumgartner urging him to fire Rebecca after discovering that she never paid Bill Spengemann for his vetting of the Woolman manuscript.

April 7, 2002

Pendle Hill

My "Quaker Light" course ended at lunch today. It went well, with 12 varied and interesting students including a Jungian and a copyeditor who had actually done my Politics of the Spirit book for Princeton (Charles Ault). Also Betty McCord, age 93 and totally "with it." And a nice woman from Hanover Meeting, Anna, a nurse at Hitchcock. We went all the way from Genesis to Einstein, tracing the tradition of light that reached Fox and Barclay, then what they did with it, and then the science of light: wave or particle, material or immaterial. To me, finally, "Quaker Light" is the energy of creativity in the nature of being. It invades us, is "inward" (not "inner"), aligns us with metaphysical forces, is "panentheistic," is whole and yet subdivided without being fragmented. . . . Will I ever write all of this up to be a Pendle Hill pamphlet? Meanwhile, Rebecca gave me the committee's comments on my "On Retirement." Most people didn't like the Gulliver section at all; many liked the later sections. But they want it to be more directly Quaker, and more personal. I hope to do an acceptable revision.

April 8, 2002

NYC

Visited Marymount and spoke to the Admissions Director and the head of the Lower School, saying how pleased we all are with Christina's education there. They both were very aware of her, and Andrew, and Daphne and Greg. Lovely people. Then to Daphne's. She's pregnant, but wants to have tests, afraid that as a 35-year-old the baby may be defective, in which case they'll abort it. A double-decker bed was delivered. Christina will sleep on top, very proudly. . . . Then to the Onassis Center for the Cycladic exhibit. I had hoped to see the Minister of Culture, Venizelos, but he didn't come. Met his deputy briefly but couldn't talk to her in the press of people. Saw Sifakis, Mache Karanika, Babiniotis, Rachel Hadas, and my former student Sean Hemingway, now a curator of Greek and Roman at the Met. Also Varvitsiotis and Harry Psomiades, whose institute at Queens College has been saved.

Flushing

Out to Main Street, Flushing on the #7 train, past 46th Street. I had hoped to get off on the way back to see 3902 47th Street, but met Yannis Fakazis at the Stassinakis lecture and got a lift back in his car. Visited with Constance Tagopoulos in her office at Queens College, then met some Comp. Lit. people discussing course cancelations owing to lack of funds; then to Stassinakis's lecture. He had my book in Greek and was very jolly and friendly. His talk was entirely elementary, a general introduction (in Greek), well done for that level, but not at all analytical. At lunch afterwards he was very negative about Patroclos Stavrou, saying his only interest is money. Anemoyannis has withdrawn from active interest in the museum he founded; professors at Rethymno are resisting the idea of a Kazantzakis chair. Etc., etc.

Wednesday, April 10, 2002

Hanover

Spent hours at 12 Ledyard, clearing out my remaining belongings. I have no feelings of regret leaving the house—none. Strange. . . . Finished Don Cupitt's Emptiness & Brightness, recommended by Darren Middleton. I think I can use it as part of my "Light" essay. Basically he says that metaphysics is bunk; there's no eternal verity, and that religion must be based on love of, and gratitude for, the contingent world in which we have our existence. Bravo!

April 12, 2002

Splendid piano recital at Kendal by Frederick Moyer, a master. Did interesting pieces, by Arensky, Donal Fox, and Myra Hess's arrangement of Bach's "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring."

April 14, 2002

Yesterday, another fine piano recital by one of Veronica Jochum von Moltke's students, Chinese of course, and female. Tonight the movie "Amadeus," as fresh as ever, with Mozart's glorious music. . . . Meeting for Business, slated to approve the renovation project, couldn't because we still don't have a firm price from the contractors. But I was directed to send in the application to the Friends Meeting House Fund for a mortgage loan. I've also arranged with Tom Burton at Mascoma Bank for a line of credit up to $250,000.

April 17, 2002

Chrysanthi and the other Kendal folk dancers put on a one-hour demonstration before an appreciative audience. Nice to see the 70- & 80-year-olds doing the polka! . . . Today I bought a new bicycle, with twenty-four gears. Compared to my old Rudge with its three gears, this one is like a Mercedes replacing a Honda Civic. I go from Hanover to Kendal in 12 minutes. And the bike can be placed in a rack on the Advance Transit bus if needed.

April 18, 2002

Philadelphia

To Dan's. Much improvement in the Townsend, also the Granger. For "recreational music" we did Brahms's Liebeslieder Waltzes, sort of.

Pendle Hill

Long talk with Rebecca after Pubs. She doesn't seem to realize that Steve has determined to remove her from pamphlets as well as from books although he tells me he has communicated his decision to her repeatedly. And of course she has realized that I wrote a letter against her. I explained the whole mess with Spengemann. In the Executive session of the Board, Steve confirmed his decision to remove her, although he says that she is the very best person on staff insofar as articulating Pendle Hill's strategic goals is concerned. Richard Barnes gave me lurid details of her defects, including one time when she hadn't read her e-mail or heard her voice mail messages for a protracted period and the overload broke the system. He also said that we lost so many donations because of her neglect that it would have been far cheaper to have paid her to stay home for several years. Sad. . . . Last night the activists presented their stories to the General Board, prefaced by their leader, O'Reilley, one of my favorites. They went off today to D.C. to join the anti-war protests and we all "held them in the light." In Meeting, someone ministered about the correlation between brokenness and wholeness, after which I was moved to minister on darkness as the precondition for light. . . . Saturday p.m., picked up Alec and family and we all went to the Barnum and Bailey circus followed by dinner in the Indonesian restaurant. After the circus I asked Theo, "Did you like it?" and he answered, resolutely, “No!” Nor did we, really. It was all glitz and noise, although of course with some amazing bareback rides, acrobats, dancing elephants, etc. But the clown was a protracted bore. . . . I’m reading Brenda’s revised chapters for part 2. They still need editing. . . . Rebecca will read my revised “On Retirement” in a week if it’s to be included in next month’s mailing for Pubs. What first? . . . Chrysanthi reported that the man came to clean out 12 Ledyard on Friday and did a fine job. So, that’s the end of our relation with the house, except for the closing on April 30. I feel no regrets—none.

April 30, 2002

Closing on 12 Ledyard Lane. The new owner is Jolin Kish. We received a check for $363,691.09. The selling price was $395,000. We paid $28,000 for the house originally. The $363,691 covers Kendal’s entry fee and almost two years of residency. Excellent!

Saturday, May 18, 2002

Philadelphia

Last Thursday Dan came to Pendle Hill and we played for two hours on the beautiful Yamaha. Much better, especially the Granger. On Friday, Pubs accepted my “On Retiring” although Helen Horn voted No. But others were very positive. Book Committee was presented with Steve’s new concept of commissioning rather than using unsolicited manuscripts. I’m a bit dubious, but we’ll see what happens. . . . Today, after a long Executive Board meeting, I drove to Bryn Mawr and visited with Stella Miller-Collett to discuss our joint cruise next May. She is enthusiastic and will give splendid lectures using slides. Wallace gave me his latest book, detailing his fight against McCarthyism. He is 87 and becoming forgetful but otherwise seems well. . . . Then to Alec’s for supper and a long visit. They’re about to move to 18th Street and larger quarters.

Sunday, May 19, 2002

Cambridge

Flew to Boston. Chrysanthi came by bus. We met at South Station and went for lunch to Alice and Peter Buseck’s on Linnaean Street. Very pleasant. Then to the A.R.T. for a bravura performance of Lysistrata starring Cherry Jones in an adaptation by Robert Brustein. Funny, serious, beautiful, fanciful. Perfect theater. . . . Then to Andover to visit Lori and Clive and their three little girls, all very sweet. Peter and Alice were there, too. We ought to have gone sooner, but at least we finally got to visit them. We’d like Lori and children to come to the farm this summer.

May 21, 2002

Riparius

Planted tomatoes, protected by Reemay and wall-of-water. Turned on the water. Couldn't start the tractor because I hadn't charged the battery, the charger being invisible somewhere in our Lebanon storage bin. We came last night and slept over, even watching a Benny Hill video. Delicious Italian dinner at our favorite restaurant in Lake George.

Sunday, May 26, 2002

I introduced Sally Pinkas, who played a brilliant concert featuring Rachmaninoff's Etudes-Tableaux and the amazing A major sonata by Schubert, written three months before he died at the age of 31. I thought I was hearing Bev Webster again: the same power, assurance, and unerring musicality.

Athens, Hotel Arethousa

Arriving, we fulfilled our ritual and went for loukoumadhes on Panepistimiou. Then to Christos's and Eri's for supper complete with birthday cake. Christos very expansive, again, on the saboteurs on his governing board who accuse him of failing to produce a home in Athens for their autistic children, and of just enjoying travel as he goes off to Paris, Madrid, Washington (and perhaps soon Melbourne) to meet with international committees on autism. They also accuse him of placing his own children in England. But if he placed them here, somehow, he would be equally accused of feathering his own nest. In sum, his situation is impossible. But if he resigns he is convinced that the entire autistic society, and movement, will collapse. . . . Eri told me that her department's application to the Ministry and EU was approved. (This is the one, I think, that I said should not be approved, although maybe I'm confused.)

Athens

A very full day. Το Εγνατία Τράπεζα. My drachmas have been converted to 1700+ euros. I withdrew 400 without trouble. That's very pleasant. Then to Germanos shop where a young man taught me how to use my new Sim-card cell phone. Later, I called Alec—a beautiful connection—and he called me back. Amazing! Then Chrysanthi bought Greek-style skirts for Christina and Sophia, and Greek t-shirts for Andrew, Theo, and Nikos. All this in Monastiraki. Then we discovered accidentally a Γωνία του Βιβλίου, including a shop selling books for the University Presses of Crete. Mine was there and the clerk told me it sells well. But she offered me only 10% author's discount on the price of 12 euros. I should go to the Presses' office on Μάνης 5. So there we went and got 40% discount. Bought five copies to give to Christos, Ritsa, Gounelas, Vouli, and ?. Then to Μεταίχμιο publishers to talk about the Greek translation of "Stewards of the Land." Spoke with the co-owner, Vasso Papageorgiou. Randy found them: a new house, 8 years old, specializing in schoolbooks for φροντιστήρια and on translations. Vasso gave me various samples to show to the trustees. If we need a translation, they can supply one. Also, they'll of course do copyediting. She wants to produce a kind of coffee table album with lots of photos. . . . Lunch then in Δαφνή restaurant; the one on Φιλελλήνων is closed. Nap. Then to Θεανώ. All smiles. She'll finish half the book by June and send lessons 1–6 to Mike Burton for his approval. She showed us lessons 3 and 4. Beautiful, although we suggested some space-saving in the transformation drills. She hopes to finish by October. Her contacts with Burton are going well. When she sends an e-mail he answers quickly. At first she was (understandably) dismayed at Carol Sheehan's copious copyediting with its scores of codes, but now she says she's assimilated all this and it's OK. Good visit. Then to Acropolis. Again, first view of the Parthenon is so inspiring, as though that building is alive and wants to talk to you about dignity and rationality. . . . Walked back through Plaka. . . . Then to Ritsa's, walking along Λεοφόρος Αλεξάνδρου for the Victoria Μετρό. Mika Provota was there, the young girl with a Princeton Ph.D. whom Ritsa hoped I could help. Very eager. A lover of Joyce as well as Kazantzakis, Cavafy, and especially Homer. She'll be living in New York soon (moving from London) and hopes to find some work. I'll send her addresses and names to contact. . . . Ritsa looks older (she's 80) but her voice is exactly the same. Christos and Eri came. Christos expounded loudly on the general degeneracy of modern life, compared to his childhood in poverty, when ideals were present and clear. I don't think the rest of us agreed with his utter pessimism. I gave Ritsa my book; ditto for Christos. Ritsa gave me an album of photos of resistance women στην εξορία στην Μακρόνησος and elsewhere during the Occupation. "See if you can find me," she challenged us. Nice dinner, complete with another birthday cake and seven candles, which I blew out, it seemed, until one of the "extinguished" ones burst anew into flame. Surely an omen! Mika's father came to get her, and kindly drove us back to the hotel at 2:00 a.m.

Thursday, May 30, 2002

Thessaloniki

Traveled by Aegean Airlines for the first time. Very nice. In the evening, George and Efthymoula came and we all went to our στέκι, τους Λύκους. George tried to convince me (a) that not a single Jew was in the World Trade Center on September 11 because they all knew in advance what was going to happen, (b) that Bush and the government also knew and purposefully did nothing to stop the attacks because they knew how beneficial they would be politically. "Why do you believe those lies?" I asked. "Οι εφημερίδες γράφουν έτσι." "Το πιστεύεις το καθετί που γράφει η εφημερίδα;" Maybe I convinced him, at least about (a), if not (b). Otherwise we had a nice visit, covering the prostate (of course) and also Kendal, which Chrysanthi and I tried to explain at some length.

Friday, May 31, 2002

We're both sick, with bad colds, maybe flu. But made the rounds today, first to Odysseas and Eleni, then to Vouli, finally lunch with Lola and Kostas. Then a very long siesta. Then by taxi to George's, for a supper of hot soup and tea. He has a thermometer. Took my temperature. Just about normal, a good sign. He also has a blood pressure machine. Both Chrysanthi and I are OK. Nice visit with Odysseas. We'll return tomorrow for lunch. He is 82; George is 84. Odysseas has arrhythmia of the heart, and other infirmities, but looks fine. Toula is still overworked, all day long. Stavros still smokes (as does Andreas). Again, we tried to explain Kendal. . . . At Vouli's, Κυρά Κούλα voiced her desperation: nothing to live for, no interests, no sense of an attractive future. She feels trapped. Alas. Probably Vouli would love her to leave, but where can she go? Vouli's mother, Κυρά Στέλλα, is still compos mentis, but cannot walk without a walker, and tires quickly. Vouli is still vivacious and alive. I gave her a copy of my Πολιτική του πνεύματος. She has been visited by Irish Browning (!) but not the φιλενάδα, Paula; they've broken off. . . . Lola and Kostas are the same, very welcoming. Kostas cooking as usual and very interested in the world soccer finals playing in Japan. Nikos came for two minutes and invited us tomorrow but we won't go because of our illness lest we transmit something to their child. . . . In the evening, I also gave George a copy of my book. Don't know if he'll read it; he might. I of course gave Vouli a copy; she may look at it.

Saturday, June 1, 2002

Yesterday, I forgot to say, I went to Germanos (down the avenue from the hotel) to see why my cell phone stopped working. The answer: I'd used up all the credit on the Sim card, mostly by calling Alec in Philadelphia. So they added another 18 euros. Each call, even if local, is expensive—about 1 euro, or 90¢. I now know that if I dial 1501 I'll be told how much credit remains. . . . Then went to Egnatia Bank and withdrew more euros for our total bill. The exemption I hoped to get for the 15% tax on interest is not available because our account is in euros; it would be available if my account were in dollars only. . . . This morning we slept late, until 8:30, trying to shake off these sicknesses. Chrysanthi then went to Vouli and I walked all the way to the Λευκός Πύργος to see the book exhibit, only to find it closed. It opens at 6:00 p.m. tonight. We returned then. Amazing! Over 100 publishers with beautiful material. Among them the University Presses of Crete, with my book right out front. Also Kedros, where I discovered that my book on Ritsos is still in print. We also saw the excellent, beautiful methods for Greek as a second language, which of course will be competition for Greek Today. And lots of impressive programs on CD-Rom, especially an entire encyclopedia beautifully programmed. I even found the Δημητράκου Λεξικόν but they don't sell individual volumes (I seem to have lost my volume 1). Ευτυχώς, ορκίσαμε να μην αγοράσουμε ποτέ ένα καινούργιο βιβλίο, αλλιώς θα αγόραζα πολλά.

Sunday, June 2, 2002

Nice walk on the παραλία this morning. Then with Odysseas and Eleni to George's for lunch, with Efthymoula's fine cooking, and lots of ouzo. Eleni indicated that Hillary Clinton is Jewish (!). Really! I tried to explain many things—e.g., why the death penalty is applied in Texas but not in New Hampshire. Good discussion, very lively. We went at 1:00 p.m. and returned at 5:30. Rested, then met Vouli and had tea in the café on the 5th floor of the Macedonia Palace hotel, very fancy and nice.

Monday, June 3, 2002

To AFS

To the post office to mail excess papers and books. Then to Φράγων 13 στην αγορά to see Dimitris Yiannakos in his office, where all his glass projects are on display. We talked about the kind of anti-Semitism I'd experienced. He wasn't surprised. Andreas, who has his law office next door, peeked in toward the end but we just exchanged greetings, didn't talk. Vouli picked us up at the hotel and took us for lunch at the restaurant of the Ιστιοναυτικός Όμιλος nearby, then to the Farm School, where we are housed in Joann Ryding's basement apartment, very comfortably. All trustees to dinner at Μαϊμή Τάβερνα, Αρετσού, by the sea. Met Gail and Ruth Schoppert. He'll be a new trustee but is here now for board development. He enthused about Alec. It seems that Gail was head of the accreditation committee for North Jakarta international School when Alec was in charge of preparing for the assessment. Gail said that the school would never have been accredited if it hadn't been for Alec. He has a very low opinion of the two owners.

Tuesday, June 4, 2002

AFS

Workshop in which each farm and school manager gave an overview of his operation. Very useful not only for the information conveyed but also for our better sense of personalities—e.g., the new farm manager, and Tassos, the new dormitory manager, in charge of the three interns, who were also introduced. I told the interns how Annie and I had pestered the board for three years before the program was begun. It's been a huge success. . . . Dimitris and Tilda and Evie took us to Thermi for παγωτό. A nice meeting. Evie is about to start gymnasium.

Wednesday, June 5, 2002

Workshop continued. Gail Schoppert in the morning with exercises in better board functioning, based largely on the clash between Yannis Vezyroglou and David Buck over the school's alleged failure to consult the committee (i.e. Vezyroglou) before instituting (in brochures) the revised curriculum (that the committee had actually recommended). This was disguised in the example, of course, but was all too obvious to those of us on the committee. Generally the sense emerged that this board is not working well. Among other things, Gail advised a committee to evaluate board performance, something I had suggested last year but was rejected. In the afternoon, John Cleave walked us through the strategic planning conclusions in an effort to see what comes next. Supper in the palatial home of Stavros Constantinidis.

Thursday, June 6, 2002

Committee day. With Annie and others for student life, where we worried mostly about the monitors in the dormitory and the enforced study hall, which doesn't seem to work. Then Post-Secondary with Vezyroglou, who usurped 1/10 of the time over the clash with David (who actually apologized repeatedly) and who said he is going to resign as chair. Good. He's well meaning and a true friend of the school, but meetings turn out to be monologues. . . . We had an "International Lunch" cooked and served by students at the College: Albanian, Polish, Nigerian, Macedonian (FYROM), and Greek. I was introduced to two young ladies, one Albanian, the other Macedonian, who apparently are being supported by the $5000 I gave for financial aid. They were beautiful and graciously thankful. We sat together afterwards and had a good exchange (in English, of course). The Albanian will be in the US for two months this summer, in Alabama, and wants to continue for a higher degree. The Macedonian isn't sure at this point of her future. Both have one more year at Perrotis. I'll send another 6300 euros, which is the cost of a full year for one of them. . . . Dimitris Gounelas picked us up and took us to the American College at Thessaloniki (ACT), to the president's office—Dick Jackson, who had invited me when I met him at Constantinidis's. The purpose was to see the new library and to meet the new head librarian, Karen Bohrer. The library is colossal and beautiful, much more attractive, alas, than Dartmouth's new Berry by the famous Venturi. I spoke to Bohrer about donating books. They have lots of space. Of course, I'll need to make a catalogue. . . . Then to Dimitri's home. Frankiskos is now six feet tall and bass-voiced. He was studying for his religion exam tomorrow, and showed us the book, all about Greek Orthodoxy. "Does the book say anything about other faiths?" I asked. "Yes, they're heresies." Ruth seems fine; her sight is much impaired, but stable at least for now. Dimitri wants me to offer a public lecture and a one-time graduate seminar next May, for which they have a κονδύλι. I'll need to send him the dates between the end of the Greek university and the beginning of AFS meetings in 2003. . . . Returned for the barbecue at Princeton Hall and the famous "pepper dance" and lots of other dancing. Chrysanthi was in her element.

Ouranoupolis

Board meeting, at which I summarized the status of parts 1 and 2 of the centenary history and showed samples of Μεταίχμιο albums. The rest of the meeting was somewhat contentious and inefficient. Susie Alexander spoke passionately against reinstating Mimi Lowrey on the board, because she is so divisive, but nevertheless she was elected. So was Dimitri Gondicas. And Gail Schoppert. Vezyroglou announced his resignation as committee chair; so did Sperry Lea. So, the situation is not good. And we have an annual deficit of over $1,000,000! . . . By bus then to Ouranoupolis, the long way, via Σταυρός, where we'd come on an excursion once with Chrysanthi's father, long ago, and via Στάγεια, birthplace of Aristotle, newly excavated. Ouranoupolis is a Greek Lake George now, with wall-to-wall tavernas. But Mrs. Loch's tower still stands proudly by the sea. We took a caique across to the island of Ammouliani, where we are housed in the Agionissi Resort (03770 51-102), very lovely and peaceful. This is turning out to be a pleasant holiday despite my lingering flu.

Saturday, June 8, 2002

Back to Ouranoupolis and then on a boat for a tour of Athonite monasteries. Windy day with some swells on the sea. Eventually Chrysanthi felt seasick (the only one), threw up, and seemed to lose all strength. They shortened the trip. We all went to the Ξενία hotel for lunch. She lay down for several hours and finally rose, smiling. I brought her into the dining room where everyone was and we all sang triumphantly Η Χρυσάνθη αναστήθηκε εκ νεκρών. Long talk with Christina Willis about the Pinewood School, which might be appropriate for Alec. Peter Baiter, the head for seventeen years, is finally going to leave. Also long talk with David Buck about Kendal. He is interested. So is Christina for Bruce and Tad, but they need a CCRC in California, on the sea. Given what happened today to Chrysanthi, probably she should not accompany me on the Greek cruise next May.

Sunday, June 9, 2002

We were allowed a special tour of the Πύργος, normally closed. I saw the "famous" αποχωρητήριο that I remember so well from my overnight there as Joice Loch's guest, and the bedroom where I slept. The tower is being restored by the archeological service and will eventually be a Joice Loch museum. Right now about thirty rugs are there, rolled up in burlap bags strewn over the floor. Our host unrolled a dozen for us—one startling masterpiece after another. Obviously we all worry about their preservation. It's not clear, really, who owns them. Κυρία Φανή, Mrs. Loch's companion, now 80 years old, had much to say, and quite clear memories. This was a memorable visit. Ouranoupolis is full of restaurants, hotels, etc. People we asked said they like the new reality; they work hard for six months or so—the tourist season—and rest for the remainder . . . We were then all driven to Metamorphosis to visit Bruce and Tad at home, a lovely cottage on the sea on land bought for a song in the late 1950s. I wrote in their guest book, in Greek, "Seeing you here and remembering all you offered to children and adults in Greece, I truly believe that even a single candle can conquer the darkness," echoing a motto that Bruce has prominently displayed on his wall. But Bruce still shakes markedly when lifting, say, a tea tray, and looks ten years older than his 77 years. . . . Home to the Farm School at 7:30 p.m. owing to heavy traffic. Pano and Joann, the epitome of hospitality, offered us coffee and more fresh cherries just cut from their trees.

Thessaloniki–Zurich–Boston–Hanover

Up at 3:45 a.m. Joann drove us good naturedly to the airport. Comfortable flight to Zürich, where I helped an Albanian worker, resident in Greece, on his way to Sweden to visit a sister. Chrysanthi bought duty-free face cream, of course. . . . I'm vetting Brenda's part 1. Just read her account, in chapter 6, of the burning and then rebuilding of James Hall, which we of course rededicated a few days ago (it was blown up by the Germans when they left). Too bad I hadn't been aware of this passage; it would have been so appropriate the other day. In chapter 7, about Charlie, there's an appreciation of the School's Quaker connections, including Charlie's conscientious objection, influenced by Rufus Jones . . . After twenty-one hours, finally got to the Dartmouth Coach terminal on Etna Road, where we had left our car, to find the car battery dead. Called AAA; they jump-started the car but then in doing the paper work informed me that my AAA membership had expired. I'd never received the renewal forms. So, I paid the driver. Two hours later: back home. The apartment really did feel like home.

Kendal

Lectured to the Professors' Colloquium at 9:30 a.m. on "Retiring to Kendal (and Beyond)." My flu was so bad I could hardly get through a page without blowing my nose, but managed. John Hennessey was there, and Lorin Riggs, and Wayne Broehl, and a few others. . . . To the clinic in the afternoon. I don't have pneumonia, don't have temperature. It's probably in my sinuses. I was given Sudafed, to alleviate the symptoms.

Wednesday, June 12, 2002

To Riparius

Arrived at the farm at noon. Leander was there; his workshop finished yesterday. He is very pleased with the quality of playing and also the extra day. He wishes that I could get rid of Dan as my partner and play with Alice. But how? He's scheduled for lots of recitals this year.

Thursday, June 13, 2002

Put the charger on the tractor battery but it hasn't worked so far. Piles of mail and e-mail to go through. Brenda's chapters 9–12 in part 1 still waiting to be vetted. In the evening I patched together a Ulysses lecture for Saturday, using bits and pieces of my regular lecture on the book.

Friday, June 14, 2002

To NYC

Drove to Albany-Rensselaer AMTRAK. Penn Station always a shock: so many people! So many nationalities! I had hoped to see Vasos Pappas at Travel Dynamics, but he couldn't be there so late. We went to Daphne's. Both children very affectionate and lively. "You're It" (to me) was Christina's decision for a game of tag. Andrew proudly showed drawings. Daphne is due on October 15. Next Thursday they'll all be at Riparius. They went off to South Salem. Chrysanthi and I had a nice buffet dinner at the Yale Club. Worked on Brenda's chapter and reviewed my lecture.

Saturday, June 15, 2002

Huntington

Paul Moran, the artist who works three days a week doing graphic design at Thatcher, joined us for the ride, via limousine, out to Huntington. Same driver as last time, a Yugoslav. Met Jeff Murphy at a country club (his wife just had a hysterectomy and didn't want anyone visiting). Father Smith joined us. Champagne celebrating his forthcoming transfer to Cornell University as chaplain. He is 70 but looks 55. How nice! He told me that he celebrated the marriage of David Moro and Jackie McCarthy, our North Creek acquaintance. Small world. I lectured on Ulysses chapters 4–18 (!) at the Sophia, a full two hours, complete with Bach fugue and Mr. Bloom's fart. And tomorrow is Bloom's day. Small audience but attentive and appreciative, with some useful questions afterwards. Apparently my lecturing style was appreciated. It's encouraging to be able still to do it. Reception afterwards offering opportunity to talk to some of those in the audience. Then a nice dinner with Jeff, Chrysanthi, Paul. Paul is gay. Spoke about his first lover, who died of AIDS. He is with his second for ten years. He is HIV negative, amazingly. I asked if they'd thought of adopting a baby. They had, probably in India. A lively, talented man; wants me to visit his studio. Our driver brought us back, first depositing Paul in Greenpoint, Brooklyn, to visit a friend. Chrysanthi and I, very tired—to bed.

Sunday, June 16, 2002

NYC–Riparius

To the Met to see the marvelous Eakins exhibit. What a technical master he was, and what a visionary! His portraits exhibit souls, not just faces. His one-and-only self-portrait, done late, shows him angry and bitter. (He'd been excluded from societies and galleries because of his frank use of the nude, especially the male.) We also took a quick look at the large exhibit of tapestries, huge allegorical scenes done mostly in Brussels. . . . Train to Albany. Drove home, stopping to shop at Price Chopper.

Sunday, June 23, 2002

Visited Shapiros in their new home in Queensbury—lovely inside, filled with Irv's paintings, but the location is unpleasant, and to buy anything they need a car, not a good arrangement for 80+-year-olds. Irv thoughtfully bought a catalogue of the British Museum's Joyce exhibit. . . . After lunching together in the Chestertown ice-cream parlor (huge milk shakes), we said goodbye to Daphne, Greg, Christina, and Andrew, who'd been here since Thursday. The children are like two cyclones: "Swing me, Pappou" (or, as Andrew says, "Ding me, Pappou—higher"). "You're It, Pappou" (in tag). "Watch me, Pappou." I tried to teach Christina to play a four-note tune on the piano. She's a very slow learner (on the piano). Thursday and Friday they all slept in Leander's house, but Saturday in their own new home, the Shapiros' house on McCarthy Road. Previously, I helped them put shades in the children's bedroom, move furniture around, remove a tree that fell onto the beach by the pond, etc. Slowly it's become a "home." . . . Gary McGinn made us a lovely arbor out of cedar, which I placed over the well-pipe. We planted honeysuckle, which should cover it in flowers in about two years. Worked many hours in the garden removing weed-weeds-weeds. But our plantings are doing well. . . . Lovely siesta each afternoon, which seems to have helped me get rid of the flu I caught in Greece. It's gone now, finally.

June 29, 2002

To Hanover

Drove Chrysanthi to Hanover to start her ALPS Greek course, this time with two students from Hellenic College/Holy Cross. She'll sleep in a dorm room, having no transportation to get back and forth to Kendal.

July 1, 2002

Nice supper with Don Kurka at the Tortoras' home, where he is staying. He wants to read Ulysses, so I brought him Joyce's chart and my notes and answered a slew of questions. Lots of fun. He's now divorced, trying to sell his house in Florida, and considering where to settle, probably back at his university in Tennessee. Children are supportive. His daughter, separated from her Merrill Lynch husband, is in divorce proceedings. She says she needs to spend $100,000 a month (!) and thus needs a million-plus alimony. . . . Earlier today I was lucky to be seated on our porch while "our" chipmunk was digging a new hole. And what an engineer he is! He digs with front paws and then clears the dirt under his body and out the back. After a stint of this, he backs up to shovel the same dirt further away from the entrance, to be out of the way. Then, most remarkably, he turns around and uses his snout as a shovel, pushing the loose dirt still further away from the entrance. What a marvel of instinctive behavior!

I've been reading Howard Wriggins's remarkable memoir of his AFSC service as a young man, aged 22–26, during and just after World War II, in Lisbon, Algiers, Italy, Paris, and then slightly later in Gaza, feeding and clothing desperate refugees. What a tribute to the AFSC of those days, and of course to him. So many difficulties, so many crucial decisions to be made, so much tact needed to work with local officials. Of course the saddest part of the story is that the same phenomenon continues: the Palestinians are still in tents fifty years later. Howard started as a C.O. assigned to AFSC, but seeing the misery caused by the Nazis and feeling increasingly that only military force would be effective, he could no longer consider himself a pacifist. He asked me if I thought he would be misunderstood by his fellow Quakers. I see no problem. He is sensitive to both sides of the issue. He also asked me to “correct” the English, so I ended copyediting the entire 200 pages. It would be nice if Pendle Hill could publish this, but with Steve Baumgartner’s revision of the policy this may not be possible.

Alec, Monica, Theo, and Elena arrived safely in Jakarta after an “un-eventful” flight and a pleasant time in Seoul’s new airport, which has all the amenities of the Singapore airport.

July 4, 2002

Don Kurka came to Terpni for supper—the stew that Chrysanthi had prepared for me. Again, lots of good talk, including his history as a draftee in Korea.

July 5, 2002

All afternoon in North Creek at the new community center with Ross Morgan and some of the other forest owners in his “Smartwood” certification program. It’s moving forward slowly. He’s done the plan for our 300 acres but I haven’t seen it yet. We meet again on August 6. One of the people, a woman, is named Tannen. I asked her if she were related to Deborah, and it turns out that she’s Deborah’s sister. So we had lots to talk about.

July 6, 2002

A surprise telephone call from Nick Trautwein, who later came to visit with his girlfriend, charming Amy. He has clear memories of Terpni even though he was only six or seven years old when he used to come. Now a jazz saxophonist, he recently did a week’s gig in Athens. . . . On the farm, I’ve finally gotten rid of the weeds in the garden, a large job this year. And I finished mowing the north field. Will do the east field tomorrow. Mower behaving well so far, probably because I keep checking the bolts holding down the sickle bar. . . . Shelagh Ballard telephoned. She and Geoff will visit on July 18–20. And Leander called to say that Brittles and family will be visiting in August. Nice!

July 10, 2002

To Hanover yesterday. Returned Howard Wriggins's manuscript, a detailed account of his time working for AFSC in refugee relief, a remarkable service. Supper last night with Chrysanthi, John, Mary, and the Greek students at ACTS, including one from Holy Cross and one from Hellenic College, sent as promised by the president. Both are converts to Orthodoxy. . . . At breakfast this morning, I was surprised to see Jim and Carol Armstrong, in from Maine for a Finance Committee meeting yesterday. "Why does Kendal have a deficit?" I asked. "Because people aren't dying fast enough. The actuarial studies were wrong. We aren't collecting enough new entry fees." . . . Drove to Saratoga with Chrysanthi. Lovely ballet: "Raymonda Variations" with happy music by Glazunov. Then John Cage's interesting "Haiku" with brilliant choreography by Albert Evans. I liked the music, too. Mostly percussion, played by five experts on stage. Counting! Finally an old favorite, the Bernstein/Robbins "Fancy Free" with Damian Woetzel. A lovely evening.

July 12, 2002

To Queensbury to photocopy Greek Today, in part, for Mata Dova, who'll be using it at Hellenic College this August. I've been proofreading lessons 1-6, just received from Theano. What a mess! Mistake after mistake, made by her typist but also presumably by her, sometimes consciously, changing our text in ways I cannot accept. So, back to the "monster," many hours alas to be spent with red pencil. . . . Supper at Applebee's with Maureen and Mary. Maureen lively, as always; Mary preoccupied with bad health.

July 14, 2002

Finished mowing around the pond yesterday. Also Alec's path across the power line. The farm looks extraordinarily beautiful. . . . Shapiros came for an early supper and then we drove to Meadowmount. Beautiful concert, well balanced: Brahms's violin sonata no. 3, Martinu's violin sonata no. 1, played energetically by a young Czech, and the Dvořák Dumky Trio done with gusto and humor.

Saturday, July 20, 2002

Geoff and Shelagh Ballard arrived Thursday night and what a nice visit we had until they left this morning! And this morning we talked at length with Alec, who returned from Indonesia last night after a good stay and a good trip back. With the Ballards we had continuous, easy, stimulating talk, from start to finish. Thursday evening we all drove to Saratoga, feasted at the Hall of Springs, celebrating our 47th anniversary, and then saw a fine program: the Stravinsky/Balanchine "Agon," then a new ballet called "Morphoses" by Christopher Wheeldon, with excellent music by Ligeti, and finally the Fred Astaire piece by Jerome Robbins, with Astaire and Rita Hayworth excitingly on the screen and the corps de ballet imitating them. On Friday, after leisurely breakfasts, we went to the Adirondack Museum, where a special treat was a demonstration of chair caning (actually, with paper rush, not actual cane) that interested Geoff, because he does this as a hobby. And saw Ellie Gardner and Rosine there, since they're on the staff this summer. Back home, fascinating elaboration by Geoff of his dream: to eliminate the internal combustion engine. His new company, General Hydrogen, is enthusiastically backed by General Motors and some foreign giant corporations, and has developed ways for fuel-cell vehicles to be supplied with hydrogen by stopping at places like McDonald's and Walmart. I asked what will happen to gasoline stations. "They'll have forty years to gradually disappear," Geoff replied. He predicts that the Ballard company will also fail because they want to manufacture fuel cells whereas General Motors can do it more cheaply and better. The major argument for the elimination of internal combustion is the disease produced by pollution. Studies are now beginning to show, claims Geoff, that the lives of children growing up in a high pollution city like Los Angeles will be severely curtailed, and that the incidence of asthma is significantly increased. He is off today to New York to speak on all this tomorrow morning. Then off to China to do the same there. Et cetera. What a beautiful vision, and one that is eminently practical. Yet it will take thirty years at least for the changes to take place, and he won't be here to see them, nor will I. In any case we had a stimulating time with these good friends. I even interested him in Don Cupitt's book for their reading group at their Anglican church, since their priest keeps telling them that the worst status is that of certainty about religious truth.

July 25, 2002

Another marvelous evening at the ballet, with Chrysanthi and Don Kurka. The incomparable "Prodigal Son," danced by Damian Woetzel. Then two short Stravinsky/Balanchine ballets, totally different; then the lively “Tarantella,” and finally “Vienna Waltzes,” ending with the Rosenkavalier waltz. Beautiful.

July 29, 2002

Alec’s birthday dinner at Daphne’s (Shapiros’ old home) with the meal cooked by Monica. Children in best of form, even making chocolate cupcakes for me, the “chocolate boy.” . . . Yesterday a little party at our neighbors’, Irwin Morris and his young wife, who’ll be teaching 4th grade in Johnsbury school next fall. Morris clan there, very friendly. But the “lake,” at least there, is dry, just mud. Jim Morris assured me, however, that the beaver have not left.

July 30, 2002

To Hanover

To Hanover with Alec and Leander. Visited Yiayia, who was in good form, laughing, and insisting that we have lunch with her, which we did in the Wistar dining room. She walks there energetically, leaning on her walker. She finished all her ice cream but not much of her entrée. Leander, especially, was very lively with her. We then rented a seventeen-foot U-haul truck and emptied out our locker, completely. Drove back, supping at the Midway Diner in Rutland. A good day.

July 31, 2002

Emptied the truck into the pole barn. Why do we own so much? So many Greek books (they’ll be shelved at Daphne’s), so many English-language books (they’ll be added to those in the Guest House).

Sunday, August 4, 2002

Lovely visit from James McBride, Azure and Jordan, on their way to Montreal for a holiday. Stephanie and the baby will join them there, traveling by air. She wants to migrate to Canada to escape the U.S. value system. I was frank with Brittles regarding what I thought were construction problems in “Miracle at St. Anna.” Happily, he’s already planning a second novel, about a female saxophone player, and wants to improve. I’m going to send him Ford Madox Ford’s account of his and Conrad’s novelistic technique. Saturday night, Leander, Alec, Daphne, Greg, and I went to a grade-C movie in Glens Falls, thinking of Brittles: “Goldmember,” a movie easily forgotten. . . . I finished arranging all my literary books alphabetically in the Guest House, about 1500 volumes. But why? Also harrowed and seeded the driveway and the trench for Leander's water. Let's see now if anything germinates. . . . Working with Steve Baumgartner and Jack Coleman to get Pendle Hill to publish Steve Cary's memoir. Steve died a few days ago. And, alas, I heard from Nardi Champion that Ned Perrin's Parkinson's is bad and he doesn't have long to live. Telephoned him; cordial conversation. I asked how I could help and he said that since he's no longer able to drive he'd like to be chauffeured occasionally. I'll hope to do this in September when we return. How sad that he's being taken off in such an untimely manner.

Tuesday, August 6, 2002

Another meeting with Ross Morgan devoted mostly to the idea of a forestry cooperative. Alec and Leander present; very negative about RCPA. They don't want to be labeled as "greens" although they like Ross and his forestry plan for us. . . . Said goodbye to Russell, who's leaving the North Creek library for a year to go to school.

Sunday, August 18, 2002

Alec and family left yesterday, the last to go. Quiet. Off to Saratoga with Don Kurka, Tom Akstens, and Susanne Murtha to a polo match. Whitney cup. Very fancy. The horses are amazingly beautiful and vital. Then to an Indian restaurant followed by coffee in the Adelphi Hotel. A nice change.

Monday, August 19, 2002

Leander is back with furniture and a keyboard. His concert for the flute convention went well. . . . I'm progressing slowly with the bibliography of Greek books, all of which are now alphabetized on Daphne's floor. . . . Perrymans here for dessert and three hours' conversation. He is very down on all the "flatlanders" who now control the town.

Tuesday, August 20, 2002

Perrymans took us to the great "shed" built by Morrell. They just bought it. Beautiful views. Reminds me of the Greek temple in Arcadia. But Art sees it all as Christian: God's work, etc., with himself as steward. I asked him last night what could explain the mentality of the two boys who murdered the Zantops. "No God in their life," he answered. Could be right. A bankrupt secularism that offers violence as salvation.

Friday, August 23, 2002

Nice walk through the Pack Forest to see the “Grandmother Tree.” Large white pines, a feeling similar to Muir Woods. Must take the children next summer.

Sunday, August 25, 2002

Finished cataloguing and shelving the Greek books, which now occupy Daphne’s north parlor. A huge job; took all week. But nice to restore acquaintance with so many old friends.

Thursday, September 26, 2002

Lunch at the Dickey Center with Svetlana Broz, Tito’s granddaughter, a remarkable medical doctor from Yugoslavia who now is a full-time peace worker. She collected testimonies by the hundreds of individuals in Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Kosovo who were helped by others of the supposedly “enemy” ethnicity—Serbs helping Croats, Muslims helping Christians—and has published these in a book now translated into English. I bought a copy and will lend it to Zdenka, who idealized Svetlana Broz (alas, I didn’t alert her to the occasion). Broz’s plea was for all of us never to believe what we read in the newspaper. The media, in her experience, enhance hatred and divisiveness.

I haven’t written in this journal for a month, it seems—since August 25th. We returned to Hanover on September 7, felt fine entering our apartment as opposed to 12 Ledyard Lane. That part of our life is over.

- I contacted Jack Coleman about publishing Steve Cary’s memoirs at Pendle Hill.
- Spoke to Ned Perrin, who alas is very sick with Parkinson’s and not expected to live long.
- Went to New York only to visit with Peter Mackridge, who is lecturing for the Onassis Foundation. We had a lovely supper together at the Yale Club on September 11, four hours of easy talk. Then I lunched with him and others at the Columbia Faculty Club on September 12 and attended his fine talk on Solomos.
- Bought a new Buick Century 2003 model on September 16, for $18,500.
- Swam five laps in the Kendal pool after which Tom Wilson certified me as able to swim.

- Lunched with Kesaya Noda to talk about her desire to pursue an MFA program.
- Managed to get my G3 computer to use an Epson printer, thanks to help from Susan Bibeau.
- Played Schubert Ländler, set for four hands by Brahms, with Dan at his house on September 19
- Met with Steve Baumgartner at Pendle Hill on September 20 about Rebecca's departure from publications next March. He wants to use free-lance editors as an interim solution and then hire a replacement for the 2003–2004 year.
- Had two nice suppers with Alec and Monica and children on September 20 and 21. Alec feels better about Friends Select. Rose, the head of school, wrote a very complimentary letter showing her appreciation of all he has done, the first indication he'd had.
- Socialized at Kendal with Broehls, Deweys, Sandersons.
- Lunched with Robert Binswanger, who is here—again—for another year of teaching and deaning.
- Spoke with people at the Fleet Bank about continuing with them after my mother dies.
- Moved on September 27 from Gerry 312 to Baker's 5th level (the old 8th level) as a temporary location before going to the old 10th level, now the 7th.

September 28, 2002

Quick trip to Riparius on this beautiful day. Fixed the wooden case in our car trunk so that it can fit into the new Buick. Catalogued more books, the ones on philosophy in our cabin. Napped beautifully on the grass in the afternoon.

September 29, 2002

I've been revising my Fakazis introduction to meet some of Mike Keeley's objections. Received a very nice letter from Admiral Gene Carroll thanking me for my continuing support of Dennis.

September 30, 2002

Chrysanthi went off to NYC to be with Daphne in the days before her birth of our 7th grandchild, which we already know will be a boy.

October 3, 2002

The decoration committee vetoed my proposal to place five Sikeliotis paintings in the hall. Only two per resident, I was told, "and you already have too many." So I re-arranged things in the apartment and hung them in our bedroom. Much better.

Friday, October 4, 2002

NYC

Nice lunch at the Yale Club with Serena Joyce, who has a new job with the City, connected with September 11th. She's fine. But she confided to me that she never got along with David Buck, a bad sign. . . . At 4:00, went to a hotel on Lexington to meet Bill Breichner, head of journals at Johns Hopkins, and John Iatrides, to discuss the future of JMGS at Hopkins. Breichner was very supportive. Our future there is secure; the commission will most likely increase but only according to the inflation index. People are "hitting" the electronic version in the thousands. But regular subscriptions are below 400 and he would like us to spend about $5000 on a promotional campaign. A fine meeting, which I'll report to the MGSA Executive Board tomorrow. . . . Quick visit to Daphne and family, including Chrysanthi. The children go wild when I arrive and need to be raced after, swung round, etc. I was soon sweating. . . . By bus to Princeton.

Saturday, October 5, 2002

Princeton, Nassau Inn

Spent all morning with Dimitri going over the errors in Greek Today. He has already helped Theano correct some of them and will sit with her again at the end of October. We expect to get lessons 7–12 and front matter soon. I'm hoping that Otmar Foelsche can fix the computer problem before Theano does the rear matter, to avoid retyping. We need to start thinking about the Workbook, which will be on a CD only, not printed.

The MGSA board met all afternoon, dealing mostly with nominations for the upcoming elections. Then a reception and dinner. I had a good conversation with the woman who has been hired in Stathis's old position, a former student of Peter Mackridge's.

Sunday, October 6, 2002

Princeton–New York City

The Board spent most of its time today discussing the 2003 symposium in Toronto. Tom Gallant has been marvelous so far in preparing the hotel, banquet, etc. Too early to know about the program. The committee is chaired by Addie Polis, which worries many people. Drove back to Manhattan with John Iatrides, Nancy, and Addie. US Air to Lebanon. Home around 9:00 p.m., finally.

Tuesday, October 8, 2002

Surprise! Breakfast at the Hanover Inn with Bobby Gersten and Libby. Then I showed them Kendal, Orozco murals, Sanborn, and the Hop. They live half the year now in Brant Lake and the other half in Florida, near Miami. Sharon has become the managing director of the Alvin Ailey Ballet Company. Big stuff! I'm hoping that they'll visit us at Terpni this summer. Lib has a good memory; she recalled my father's good suggestions to her re: nursing her baby. Took them also to see Harriet, who just stared blankly.

Wednesday, October 9, 2002

Good talk with Roberta Moore about the alumni cruise this May. Then with Barbara Gerstner about getting Geoff Ballard here as a Montgomery Fellow. Lunch with Ron Edsforth and Doug Haynes regarding future policy for War/Peace Studies, which seems to be flourishing right now, happily. . . . Dick came for supper and then we played lots of Bach, and the Prokofiev sonata.

Thursday, October 10, 2002

Terpni

To the farm, with Dick. Catalogued more books, but still didn't finish. Dick pruned the fruit trees, a bit. It's wonderfully relaxing to be here.

Friday, October 11, 2002

Piano four-hands with Kitty Gibson; she's mediocre, alas, but still it's nice to have someone. I've suggested that we both prepare Debussy's Petite Suite a bit for the next time. . . . Dick came again for supper, bringing the Shostakovich sonata, which we'll try to play a bit, at least the first movement, which is slow.

Saturday, October 12, 2002

Daphne went to the hospital; the baby was induced; we now have a seventh grandchild.

Went to Gaylords' celebration for fifty years of marriage. Then supper with the Webster committee at Kendal, preceding a Webster concert.

Daphne's baby was born this afternoon, very easily and quickly. And they named him Peter Graham Tebbe.

October 17, 2002

Philadelphia

To Dan's to practice the Schubert-Brahms Ländler, the Townsend folk songs, and the Granger. Not bad. But the best was a Haydn symphony that we played very well. Then to Alec's. He'd just returned from a trustees' meeting. Theo stayed up "for Pappou," who of course was immediately pressed into service to read a long—long!—book about pigs. Alec surprised me by speaking very positively about Friends Select, more so than ever before. Excellent new teachers, a new administrator for development, beginning of a $5,000,000 campaign, and even Rose, he said, does some things very well. He had applied to the Town School in New York for the headmastership but wasn't even short-listed. Just as well. Perhaps he'll stay on at Friends Central.

October 18, 2002

Philadelphia–Washington

Good Pubs meeting. I announced that Rebecca will be finished in March (she was absent today). Very fine pamphlet by Mary Morrison describing her near-fatal illness at age 91 and how she was so eager to die. . . . Then via AMTRAK to Washington to Capitol Hilton Hotel for the American Hellenic Institute's symposium on "The Future of Hellenism in the United States." I arrived in time for the dinner and sat next to Ambassador Patrick Theros, who had served in various Arab and Muslim countries and explained much to me about different Islamic sects. Fascinating. Charlie Moskos gave the keynote address, stressing the vulnerability of Hellenism in the US owing to mixed marriages (over 80%).

I gave my talk, "Greek Language School Programs: Is There a Need for Change," essentially digesting the Commission report. It was well received and I was flooded with questions, the first of which was "Where did you learn Greek?" I answered, of course, "στο κρεβάτι" to much laughter. Lots of other presentations, mostly equally pessimistic. At lunch I sat next to Gene Rossides, the moving force in this Society. Very informative. I learned that his son went to Dartmouth and studied mostly with Charles McLane. In the afternoon, long tête-à-tête with Vassilis Lambropoulos regarding MGSA affairs. Afterwards drinks with Rossides, his son and wife, Pappadakis (president of Drexel) and, best of all Harry Mark Petrakis and his wife, both extremely friendly, as though I was the celebrity they were meeting instead of vice versa. He had given a rousing speech earlier, full of humor, especially about how he learned Greek με το ξύλο! . . . Afterwards to the Kennedy Center; met Deanna; splendid and unusual concert enhanced by my seat in back of the orchestra with full view of Slatkin and the extraordinary harpist and other musicians (except bass drum and timpani unfortunately hidden from view). The program: Saariaho's "Nymphaea Reflection for Strings." As preview, Slatkin explained: No melody, harmony, rhythm. What's left? Sound! And the sound was like computerized music. Interesting but too long. Then Rautavaara Clarinet Concerto played by Richard Stoltzman, world premiere. I learned later that Leander had studied with Rautavaara in Helsinki. A more traditional piece with extraordinary gymnastics for the soloist. After the intermission, another surprise: Tchaikovsky's 2nd Symphony, never heard, and extraordinary fun. Showing off the orchestra. Boom, bang, whoosh. We were all doubled over in appreciative laughter at the end. . . . Drove with Deanna to Lopa Court. Up until 12:30 a.m. with Leander and Deanna. They're in the midst, now, of the sniper problem, with schools locked, etc.

Washington–Hanover

Leander cooked a big breakfast: eggs, bacon, hash browns, muffins. Then he gave me a very long and good lesson on the Schubert Ländler. To the airport with Niki, who likes to watch planes. Home by 5:30 in time for normal supper at Kendal.

October 21, 2002

Jack Coleman called to say that he easily raised the $15,000 required for the Steve Cary book, most of it donated by John Whitehead, of course, and Norval Reece. How nice! And: Greg was promoted to Partner in Goldman Sachs. There are 300 partners. The firm employs 25,000 people. How nice, too!

October 25, 2002

Boston

AFS board met in the Harvard Club on Commonwealth Avenue. Dimitri Gondicas was there, his first meeting. I delivered the Workbook for Greek Today; he's going to Greece tomorrow and will deliver it to Θεανώ. Also delivered to him Otmar's attempt to make our disk compatible for her in Greece. In the break, went to the Poetry Room in Lamont Library to find poems for tomorrow: Anagnostakis's "Days of Thessaloniki 1949" and Ritsos's wonderful "Stones." Nice to be in Lamont, which I experienced in its inaugural year, 1949. . . . Then to Beacon Street, for a reception at the Greek consulate. Then by bus to the Maliotis Center for a dinner hosted by Arthur Dukakis. Some nice new board members. One is the boss of United Fruit and of course knows all about Eli Black.

October 26, 2002

Boston

I read my poems at the meeting's start and announced with pleasure that Brenda's book is finished—and delivered to Mercer University Press. I held up the CD, delivered to me from Randy by hand by Joann, that contains all 500 pages. The board, dismayed at the School's deficit, gave David Buck a hard time. With luck he'll cut expenses even more than he has already done.

November 2, 2002

To Northampton to a forestry conference with Ross Morgan, one of the speakers, and Peter Bauer leading a workshop. Very interesting, especially on growing ginseng. Ross already does this.

November 7, 2002

My first physical exam at Kendal. Dr. Watson, friend of the Rutters. Says I'm totally healthy, shouldn't even worry any longer about cholesterol.

November 8, 2002

Visited Ned Perrin, who has Parkinson's disease. He lost so much weight, but eats ice cream with impunity every night. I think that his spirit is serene regarding the prospects, which are discouraging. The worst moment was when he said he'd probably have to sell the house. What a shame that he is not in Kendal. He's happy to be publishing a piece in the Valley News tomorrow on hybrid cars. Said he'd like to come to supper. I'll try to arrange to have Nardi Campion too.

November 10, 2002

Riparius

Day at the farm. 60 degrees Fahrenheit. I catalogued the Quaker books and the poetry and prose anthologies. Met Daphne's neighbors. Saw the Riparius bridge in its new position 40 feet upstream.

November 11, 2002

To President Wright's house for the ΠΒΚ induction ceremony. They've put me on the nominating committee. Alan Gaylord is the chapter's president; he led the ceremony rather pompously, dressed in his academic gown. . . . Afterwards, to Peace Studies to view the gruesome film “No Man’s Land” about the Serbian-Bosnian war. Horrible.

November 13, 2002

Joan Wilson’s viola da gamba trio in the Gathering Room. Each player had treble, alto, and bass gambas and played them all. No vibrato. Contrapuntal music. But boring to my ear.

November 14, 2002

To White River Junction to see the performance there of “Proof,” about a mathematician’s dysfunctional family. Vigorous acting but somehow just below a truly professional level. Everyone was enchanted; I wasn’t.

November 15, 2002

Ned Perrin, Sarah, and Nardi Champion came for supper. Ned slow but still alert. We were so slow in getting to the dining room, getting soup and salad, that when we were ready to go to the buffet table we saw that it had been removed. I convinced the chef to bring pans of food back just for us. Losing Ned seems very unjust and wrong.

November 17, 2002

After Meeting, I presented my material on “Light” to the adult study group, a large crowd that seemed very interested. One asked how Jesus could be both God and Son of God. I said, read the opening of John’s Gospel: The Word was with God (προς το Θεό) and was God. I stressed that our ability to accept contradiction and illogicality is probably the sine qua non of an acceptable religious approach.

November 19, 2002

Howard Wriggins, at my invitation, spoke at a War/Peace luncheon about caring for refugees in Lisbon in 1942–1943. I asked the students, “Who has seen the film ‘Casablanca?’” Only one, and he did not register that Ingrid Bergman and her husband were desperately eager to get to Lisbon. . . . At 4:30 a fascinating presentation by John O’Reilly, a montage-ist, friend of Don Kurka’s. He showed 50–60 slides of his work, very beautiful (all dark, reminding me of Käthe Kollwitz), very brusque and even scandalous with blatant genitalia (he repeated often that he’s gay). In the question period one of the Studio Arts teachers, presumably a born-again Christian, accused O’Reilly of blasphemy owing to some risqué montages including Jesus.

November 20, 2002

I had a long breakfast with O'Reilly at the Inn. He and Don were room-mates at college and have been in touch ever since. He fancies Cavafy; I brought him some of my translations and an essay. He has worked at odd jobs to feed himself all these years, but recently has come into vogue. . . . I invited Tom Wilson to join me at the Wednesday faculty lunch. We sat next to Filitsa, who emoted about her need for a city.

November 21, 2002

My first meeting as a member of Kendal's Events Committee. The chair, Jeanne Reeves, is overpowering and domineering but she'll step down soon, thankfully. Joan Snell turns out to be a bit of a pill. But Tom Wilson's on it and some other good folk. My first project is to bring Dan Weiser's trio. Cost $500. The committee will give $200.

November 22, 2002

Four-hand piano again with Kitty Gibson. We're doing Debussy's "Petite Suite." She's over the hill, alas. But I enjoy the fresh sight-reading. We also did Clementi today.

November 23, 2002

Lunch with an eager freshman who graduated Friends Academy in Long Island and is attending our Meeting.

November 24, 2002

"Light" again after Meeting, concentrating on the scientific view, which turns out to be amazingly compatible with the religious view.

November 25, 2002

Went to UPNE, now in Lebanon, to pick up Theano's setting of lessons 7–12. These will now need to be proofread. Stopped at the Meeting House to see the progress. Outside work seems finished but the inside is still entirely rough. The Meeting room is significantly larger. The house proper is now a single wide-open space. The old useless porch is a fine enclosed room, our new library. But it's all going to cost $500,000.

I haven't recorded here all the interesting people we've been meeting at Kendal, most recently the Deweys, the Baldwins, the Pietsches—a great enrichment. My talk on the origins of Kendal was transcribed and published this week in "Kendalites." Lots of favorable comments from residents. It seems that I am clearly now “the founder” in everyone’s mind.

To Washington

Drove to Springfield, then AMTRAK to Washington. The train was full, every seat taken, but we were very comfortable in Business Class. Wrote my book review of Heaven’s Edge and began to correct lesson 7 of Greek Today. . . . Leander, Sophia, and Nicholas were waiting for us at the Rockville Metro station, Sophia very excited. At 9 Lopa Court, I of course was pressed immediately into service reading stories to Nicholas.

Courtyard Marriott, Rockville

The Greek Consul telephoned. Could I come to town to visit with her and the ambassador? So I went in, ate at my favorite café, the Midi, off Dupont Circle, and spent 2½ hours with them, trying to figure out what can be done about the problems exposed in the Rassias Commission report. I suggested (a) exploring the possibility of charter schools, (b) seeing if Modern Greek couldn’t be taught in, say, the Bethesda public school, where there are lots of Greek-Americans, (c) convening a conference of leading university figures (Lambropoulos, Gondicas, Van Dyck, Roilos, Gallant, Bien, etc.) to examine how the university programs could begin to affect what happens in primary and secondary schools. We’ll see. The next move is theirs. Oh, I also hoped that they could arrange a meeting between Rassias and Archbishop Demetrios. . . . Returned to 9 Lopa Court. Alec and family had arrived. Elena is now standing but not quite walking. She’s beautiful. We had a Chinese dinner at home (take-out). Leander is distraught because he just discovered that some criminal has been charging multiple purchases on a credit card bearing Leander’s name. . . . Overnight at the Courtyard Marriott since Alec is now occupying the guest room at Leander’s.

November 28, 2002, Thanksgiving

Leander gave me a good lesson on the Schubert Ländler. With Alec’s family we had a lovely turkey dinner with all the trimmings. Leander put on a good show despite his chagrin over the identity theft. Lots of reading to Theo and Niko.

Friday, November 29, 2002

We had both families to the hotel for breakfast, successfully. Even Christina actually ate something. Then to Rockville, the Metro, AMTRAK, Springfield, and home. A long day.

December 3, 2002

Amherst

To U-Mass for Greek exams. One student was extraordinary: a girl of Polish origin who had lived in Athens for a year at age 8, then had forgotten all her Greek, and now seems to have remembered it.

December 4, 2002

Holly Dustin, a former student, asked to have lunch. She is the fundraiser for Vermont Public Radio. I'll try to get her team to speak at Kendal. She fondly remembered a dinner for students at 12 Ledyard Lane, but I'm not sure she remembers anything from my course.

Thursday, December 5, 2002

Big snowstorm in Philadelphia. I canceled flights and went by train. Arriving at 6:00 p.m., I telephoned Chrysanthi, who then informed me that Gay Berger and Steve Baumgartner had been trying all day to reach me and that all the Pendle Hill meetings had been canceled. Nice supper with Alec and family, at home. Huge long book about pigs (as always) read to Theo.

Friday, December 6, 2002

Pendle Hill

Steve, Bob McCoy, and I met about books: Cary, Gwyn, etc. The Cary needs an editor. Doug Gwyn will be returning to PH for three years to write his new history of twentieth century Quakerism. All this extra time enabled me substantially to revise my talk for Canterbury: a political approach to The Last Temptation. Also, on the train yesterday, I copy-edited several more lessons of Greek Today as set by Theano, filled with mistakes. . . . Very strong Meeting for Worship this morning. Also good talk with Mary, who runs AFSC's peace program. She's devastating regarding the hypocrisy and deception involved in Bush's Iraq policy, and candid about AFSC's troubles, although she says that McNish is a good manager. . . . Back to Philly for dinner again with Alec and family, this time in a Persian restaurant, very tasty. Then more pigs read to Theo.

Saturday, December 7, 2002

Pendle Hill

Another strong Meeting for Worship. More revision of my lecture. Lunch with a surprise visitor, Nancy Frommelt, who wants very much to see my chapter on Saint Francis. Dan Seeger came at 5:00. We played Schubert and Townsend. He still hasn't learned his Townsend parts and I doubt that he ever will; they're too hard. Then we went to Darlington Fine Arts Center, meeting Alec there, to hear Leander's concert. He played Brahms' 2nd Piano Quartet, an amazing piece, complex, meaty, emotional, with a very fine violinist, cellist and violist, all of whom will join Leander tomorrow in coaching amateurs (including Oliver Rodgers). The cellist played Bach's 2nd unaccompanied cello suite: deep. The violinist & violist played a Mozart duo. A lovely, long program. Then Dan, Alec, Leander, and I went for food and drink. Very jolly.

Monday, December 9, 2002

Suddenly I was very sick with a stomach bug, on a day with three meetings. At 9:30, the Professors' Colloquium. I had to sneak out, exit to the snow and vomit violently. Rested. Then Music Meeting over lunch. I had only a few sips of soup, and had to leave again with diarrhea. In bed. Then Finance Committee at 7:00 p.m. Two long hours that I managed somehow, about Meeting House renovations, now priced at $450,000.

Tuesday, December 10, 2002

Amazingly better. Had lunch at the Inn with Jack Shepherd, who is teaching full time now at Dartmouth. We're wondering about the search for a new director of the Dickey Center. Half the committee wants a big-time diplomat; the other half wants a big-time academic. I'd like Ron Edsforth, who is neither.

Wednesday, December 11, 2002

Sent off revised lessons 7–12 to Dimitri yesterday and Theano today. Will this book ever materialize? And without errors? Supper party with Wilsons, Snells, McCullochs. Then music with Dick (Khachaturian, 3rd movement) and Allan: two Bach sonatas, then Poulenc.

Thursday, December 12, 2002

Afraid of snow (which actually did not come) went by bus to Manchester instead of by car. A long day. I'm re-reading Cupitt's Emptiness & Brightness with great appreciation. It's thrilling.

Friday, December 13, 2002

Canterbury, Chaucer Hotel

5:15 p.m. We're sitting in the Sanctuary of Canterbury Cathedral waiting for Evensong to begin. How lovely! Of course, the cathedral is essentially empty; we're two of perhaps a dozen "faithful." But the miracle of its construction is still powerful. . . . Yesterday traveled easily, no snow-storm, and very luxuriously in Envoy Class across the ocean. Lewis Owens arranged for a driver to bring us to Canterbury. We toured the High Street, activated my UK orange Sim card, had lunch in Marks and Spencer's café, and generally felt immediately and easily at home. Saw Lewis's cousin, Gareth Owens, and Lewis, who says that Don Cupitt will be present tomorrow. Wow! He's my guru of the moment. The second read of his book is even better than the first. . . . Evensong, especially in juxtaposition to Cupitt, confirmed for me the deadness and futility of this faith. Beautiful singing, beautiful reading of Scripture, but all dead, relating to nothing real. The only moment that spoke to me came near the end, when the priest prayed for Anglicans in difficulty in Nigeria. That, at least, was real. Of course, the entire "performance" does soothe one, does cover vicissitude with a kind of peacefulness, but maybe a good cappuccino would do the same. One can only try to imagine the cathedral in the 15th century, filled with thousands of active believers. But they, too, were dedicated to nonsense. . . . All the symposiasts met in the bar of the Chaucer Hotel and stood talking for two hours before going out for pizza and wine. How marvelously pleasant to see all these old friends again. Only Dan Dombrowski was missing, but he showed up with his wife at the hotel at 11:30 p.m., having been diverted from Heathrow because of fog. And Don Cupitt himself was among us, in person! I told him he was my guru. He seemed a bit distant and I couldn't warm up to him—not yet. Also, he seems old and a bit tired. But it was delightful to talk at length again with Vrasidas, mostly about Stylianos, who, Vras says, should resign but never will. And Howard Dossor: unaware of the mess that Rebecca Mays made of his pamphlet. And Betsy Middleton, who will be doing a Ph.D. dissertation at Duke on born-again Christian women: how they react, as women, to fundamentalist doctrine. Fascinating. I told her about Bruce Lansdale's findings regarding ποιος κάνει κομάντο. And beautiful Monica, Lewis Owens's partner, as charming as ever. And Gareth Owens, his cousin, who has a splendid career in Iraklio teaching Erasmus foreign students. And of course Darren, and Lewis himself. Vrasidas wants me to contribute to a book on Stylianos's poetry. Lewis wants an essay on reevaluation of The Last Temptation. If I could get Cupitt to Pendle Hill . . . ! We even slept OK, despite jet lag.

Walmer–Dover–London

Sitting in the train, at Dover, waiting to go to London. It's 5:30 p.m. and we've been with Meg and Michael since 10:50 a.m. Driven there by Lewis and Monica. What a nice visit! Meg very excited; we were her first American visitors. Michael a perfectionist; the old Tory (reminds me of Evelyn Waugh) cooked venison with all the trimmings. We drank gin and tonic, champagne, the best red wine and then vintage dessert wine: very fancy. Meg took us on a long walk despite the rain, to the strand to see the Channel, then to Walmer Castle with its association with Wellington and also the Queen Mam who died recently. Michael's mother, 90+ years, joined us for lunch. All very jolly. Meg totally relaxed. Her second book is out, finally. Her first book has been translated into Greek and is now out; her next project is to complete a biography of her father. She was truly pleased by our visit, and so were we. It was an unusual chance: our being so close because of the Canterbury conference. . . . The conference yesterday was splendid. My paper was the first: "Is The Last Temptation a Political or a Religious Novel?" It went well, I think, largely because of the revisions I made at Pendle Hill last week. Then Lewis spoke on "Kazantzakis and Trotsky: Philosophers of a Transitional Age." Then Darren on "Kazantzakis among the Postmoderns: Some Reflections." In this paper he treated Kazantzakis in relation, in part, to Don Cupitt, who was in the audience and who had participated in an earlier discussion very usefully. Dombrowski followed with "Kazantzakis's Process Theism and Negative Theology." After lunch, Vrasidas spoke on Kimon Friar's translation of Kazantzakis's Odyssey. Next came Howard Dossor on "The Ascent of the Self in the Philosophy of Kazantzakis." Finally, Gareth Owens, with slides and music, on Kazantzakis and the Palace of Knossos (entertaining, not scholarly). At the end, Lewis cited me for forty years' work on Kazantzakis and gave a present: a crystal globe, very nice. After a respite at the hotel, we were all taken to a very fine Italian restaurant, where I had snails, delicious veal, a lemon brulée, plus of course lots of wine. All in all, a fulfilling day with good friends and their charming wives. (Lewis finally proposed to Monica after 11 years!) . . . This morning, a long leisurely breakfast with Darren and Betsy before Lewis and Monica drove us to Walmer.

Monday, December 16

London, the Penn Club

We started by going to the British Museum to see the new courtyard and refurbished Reading Room. The Reading Room is of course spectacular, shining, with the original catalogue displayed (I'm in it!), reference books all around the lowest tier, and computers that enable one to access the Museum's holdings with full explanations. Lovely. The space is a little like that of the new concert hall in Philadelphia, covered with a glass dome under which sits a restaurant. While Chrysanthi explored the computer I went, of course, to the Parthenon Marbles, which are always a miracle. A video demonstrates how the horsemen are in ranks six deep. . . . We spent the afternoon collecting future theater tickets, then booking the train to Gatwick at Victoria Station, where we were introduced to "Panini," like Greek ταστ. After a rest, to Macbeth, a riveting production although the lead himself was not brilliant, but wholly adequate. The two rows ahead of us were filled with schoolgirls who obviously had studied the play and now had the privilege of seeing a super-professional production. Although I cannot remember any previous production that I saw, the play itself—the poetry—was extremely familiar. I must have read it repeatedly in school, for I certainly never did while at Dartmouth. In any case, our first day, and especially our first theater, during this stay in London, was marvelous.

London

Went to Friends House Library and found Josef Keith again. Delivered more photos of the Girls' School from the Nancy Crawshaw archive at Princeton, plus some text. I'll return tomorrow to look at Sydney Loch's account of 45–46. . . . We went to the new Tate Modern, across the bridge from Blackfriars. Imaginative conversion of an immense old power station. The building is monumental and interesting, the art disgusting, banal, trivial, shocking, and occasionally brilliant. There are some miscellaneous Picassos, Matisse's, and one nice Dufy. What I liked best were Giacometti's statue called "Spoon Woman" in which her abdomen looks like a spoon, and Sam Taylor-Wood's "Still Life 2002." This was a DVD video, starting with a Vermeer-like dish of fruit. But then, in the course of 3½ minutes, the fruit begins gradually to show signs of rot, then more rot, until the entire plate is a mess of putrescence attacked by bugs. In sum the normal three-dimensions of art have now become four dimensions, with time added. A perfect postmodern work of art. . . . We then went directly next door to the new Globe Theatre, and took the tour. The instigator was the American actor Sam Wanamaker. The theatre feels very uncomfortable. You get baked in the sun in most seats or drenched in rain if you stand in the pit as a groundling (umbrellas are not allowed). Only the very rear bench in each level has any support for the back. But it's true to Shakespeare's original. . . . Walked then across the Millennium foot-bridge to Saint Paul's: very disappointing, partially (but not entirely) owing to restorations in progress. The crypt is interesting: tombs of both Wellington (who now interests us because of Meg's flat) and Nelson. Memorials or graves of other notables. But nowhere as moving as a Gothic cathedral like Canterbury. . . . A little nap at the Penn Club, a pasta dinner, and then "My Fair Lady," the musical by Lerner and Lowe. Shaw's brilliance is not sacrificed. The songs are lovely. The acting was energetic and convincing. A good show but also an educational one, except for the sentimentalized ending in which Eliza returns to the despicable Professor Higgins.

Penn Club

Breakfast was fun for the first time because of affable, talkative table-mates including a lady whose first language was Welsh and whose children are completely bilingual. I spent the morning in Friends House library reading letters to and from Sydney Loch and sometimes Joice Loch. This should be very useful for my lecture. Nothing is startling new, but all the details are given here, and the day-by-day development of policies and activities. But I hadn't known that Hastings House was rented by Friends Service Council as the local Quaker Center. Or that Theo Litsas had joined the Society of Friends. . . . We then went to the matinee of Shaw's Mrs. Warren's Profession, done beautifully. I found it totally contemporary since the "profession" is used chiefly as a metaphor for every kind of mercantile hypocrisy. The mother, in particular, was played with huge passion. Where are the Shaws of today to treat mercantile hypocrisy so well? . . . Supper at Sofra restaurant. We met the manager, whose name is Greek and who, he told us, is from a mixed marriage: Greek father, Turkish mother. So, such do exist. Then to Covent Garden for La Traviata in very expensive orchestra seats (£140 each, the only ones I could get). The music is a miracle, especially the Father's sung by Paolo Gavaneli. Inva Mula's Violetta was fine—such a demanding role. Only the tenor (Alfredo) was weak not so much in voice as in stage presence.

Thursday, December 19, 2002

Penn Club

A very interesting time in the Science Museum seeing pioneering steam engines and attending a "lecture" for children on how bridges are really held up. One could spend a week in this venue; we had only 1½ hours available. . . . Back to Friends House for more Loch letters, until it closed at 5:00. . . . Then walked to the National to see A Laughing Matter by April de Angeles, playing alternately with She Stoops to Conquer. Brilliantly acted. The characters are, deliciously, Dr. Johnson, Oliver Goldsmith, Boswell, Garrick, and various eighteenth-century actors. A play perfectly designed for professors of English. Each scene is introduced by Johnson quoting definitions from his dictionary. The plot (if there is one) centers on Garrick's unwise decision to produce an inoffensive play by a clergyman instead of Goldsmith's "questionable" one. In the event, his audience is bored and starts throwing potatoes. So Garrick saves the day by switching to King Lear (with a happy ending). A delicious farce. Theatre at its absolute best. And tomorrow we see She Stoops to Conquer with the same actors.

Friday, December 20, 2002

Penn Club

Another long breakfast with easy conversation with the man who'll be running the club during the holidays as a hostel for youths working with the homeless. . . . Then Alix MacSweeney visited at 10:00 a.m. and stayed for an hour, talking about my work, Meg's, the TLS (with a new editor). She's fine, and her position remains secure at the TLS despite many cut-backs. The new editor, Stoddard, was trained as a classicist, which helps. . . . To Friends House for lunch with Stuart Morton, who left a note of regret and didn't show. Chrysanthi joined me in the library looking through the Greek files relating mostly to the start-up, in 1945–6, and the ending, in 1966, of the Girls' School. All in all, my researches will be invaluable for the AFS lecture in May, giving it the authenticity deriving from archival research. . . . Off to Pizza Paradise restaurant in Catherine Street to meet Peter and Jackie Mackridge. (Nice telephone call from Roddy Beaton, who has just finished his book on Seferis; it will be published by Yale University Press in the autumn.) She Stoops to Conquer at the National with Peter and Jackie. The first half rather slow, and not helped, especially for Chrysanthi, by the Litchfield accent of Tony Lumpkin. But this set up the delightful second half in which Kate clearly “stoops to conquer.” Of the two plays, we enjoyed the modern one more, but of course the modern one would not have been possible without the eighteenth-century one. So, it was good to see both. . . . Thinking of all we saw, Chrysanthi feels that probably Mrs. Warren’s Profession will be the most memorable. Agreed. But also Macbeth. And La Traviata for its beauty. . . . A very nice, different, diverse holiday.

Traveling

8:30 a.m., tube to Victoria. Rail to Gatwick. Plane to Philadelphia (business class), Alec waiting at the airport. To his apartment (Chrysanthi’s first time) for a few hours. Back to the airport. Plane to Manchester. Wait. Vermont Transit to Hanover Inn, arriving at 12:15 a.m. (5:15 a.m. London time). Big Yellow cab to Kendal. Bed at 12:45 a.m.

December 25, 2002, Christmas

South Salem

Drove to Daphne’s yesterday: four hours. Saw Peter for the first time, 2½ months old, kicking, smiling sometimes, eye-motion. Christina and Andrew in best form. Alec, Monica, Theo, and Elena arrived around noon. A restful day together: games, stories, birthday celebration for Chrysanthi, who cooked pita for supper. Today Monica made French toast and bacon for everyone for breakfast. Christina is becoming adept with her be-bop toy; Andrew is enjoying his castle, Theo his tow-truck. Eventually Leander, Deanna, Sophia, and Nikos arrived, all the presents were distributed (I received chocolate, of course) and we all sat down to a splendid dinner of prime ribs and then cherry pie from Atkinson’s, courtesy of us. Then the snow began, a huge storm that deposited about 14 inches.

Thursday, December 26, 2002

Car buried in snow. We barely managed to get out of Daphne’s still unplowed driveway, but the rest of the trip was easy, although slow. Alec and family left early for Riparius and are now cozily in their cabin. Leander and family left later, arriving at their bungalow (opened, plowed, and heated by Pinky) around 9:00 p.m. We hope to visit them this Saturday if the weather is OK.

December 30, 2002

Riparius

Alec and Leander and families settled into their homes a few days ago and we drove over today. Lots of snow, but beautiful weather. Both families are comfortable. I built a fire in our kitchen and was able to do some more cataloging on the computer. We shared lunch with everyone and then drove home, supping at Sweet Tomatoes in Rutland. Obviously both homes are winter-worthy, provided that plowing is done. If anyone spent the winter there, we'd keep the tractor going and put a blade on the front, which should do the trick. Also would purchase a generator in case of electric outages. . . . But this is just fantasy.

December 31, 2002

New Year's Eve again with all the Rassiases gorging on snails. Veronica's children are remarkable, as is Helene's little Matthew, who at age 5 acts like a 12-year-old. John is sickly, tired, and somewhat depressed. But he will never think of retiring. Helene told me, "If Father retires, he'll die."

January 1, 2003

Dick Williamson had us to supper along with Chuck Braun and wife. Chuck wants me to "perform" again in his Freshman seminar in March.

January 3, 2003

Joan Wilson got me to help her build an 8-foot-high snowman. We tramped out into the field in front of Mott, knee-deep in snow, only to find that the snow is so powdery that it cannot be packed to form anything.

January 7, 2003

Nancy-Rose Logan had me come to her home after supper to talk about "Light" to the 7 or 8 Dartmouth students who've been interested in Quakerism. And, wow! they're bright and articulate and hard to please.

January 13, 2003

At the Professors' Colloquium this morning, Dick Nolte, former US Ambassador to Egypt, spoke about the excesses of Israel's policies and the powerful Jewish lobby in the US that insures that we continue our support. Barbara Taylor, a Jewish resident, in the discussion called him an anti-Semite and a promulgator of dissention, and wept. So Fred Berthold and others are trying to decide what to do to heal this a bit, perhaps to invite Susan Heschel, who teaches Jewish Studies at Dartmouth and is opposed to Israel's policies and the Jewish lobby. . . . At noon, lunch with Mary Robinson. I reminded her when Perry Curtis, I, and others, had tea with her in Phoenix Park while she was president of Ireland, also of my memory of the portrait of Douglas Hyde by John Butler Yeats, who is buried in Chestertown. She spoke energetically about her new venture: to help globalization become ethical.

January 15, 2003

Joan Snell has enlisted me to play eight-hand piano, which we did today on the two pianos in the Gathering Room. Joan, I, Co Emlen, and Barbara Rice: Schubert's Marche Militaire, Liszt's Hungarian Dance. Nice. . . . Lunch with Ann Armbrrecht, my student who went to Nepal and visited the Dalai Lama, now sadly divorced but still sparkling.

Saturday, January 18, 2003

Cambridge

Lunch with George Pilitsis in Cambridge followed by the A.R.T. production of Euripides' "The Children of Heracles," directed by Peter Sellers. (Chrysanthi is in New York helping Daphne while Greg is away.) A play all about refugees preceded by a forum on the subject and followed by Sellers himself explaining his goals. Very powerful, and once again a confirmation of the genius of ancient Greece and the stagnation of humanity. Nothing basic has changed in 2400 years. . . . Went for supper at the Charles Hotel at the bar and got into conversation with my neighbor, who said after a bit, "I think I know you. Aren't you Professor Peter Bien?" She turned out to be "Maria," who TA'd in Chrysanthi's Greek 11. Nice long conversation about Dartmouth, the play, Greek, etc.

Sunday, January 19, 2003

After Meeting, Alan Walker's soprano arrived and we rehearsed the Walker songs, with Mayme Noda doing the harder obligato parts. Very unsure. Wrong entrances, wrong notes. . . . Only one more full rehearsal before the day of performance. Ugh! . . . Lots of e-mails from Rebecca Mays, who has been definitely fired, finally, begging for another five days to clear out her office. I telephoned Steve. Bob McCoy is trying to pick up the pieces.

Thursday, January 23, 2003

Princeton-Philadelphia

A good day with Dimitri. More changes in lessons 7-12 that he asked me to approve. Discussion of strategies for the CD-Rom. Viewing of internet lessons done in Greece by a government institute; we hope to convince them to enter our drills in their excellent format in exchange for which we'll recommend their site to our readers. Regarding MGSA, we both hope that we can convince Tom Gallant to replace me as president. Alas, he's the one and only viable candidate besides Dimitri himself, who is too overloaded to add this to his responsibilities. Among other things we had a sumptuous lunch in the Faculty Club. . . . Then to Philadelphia for turkey dinner with Alec, Monica, and children. Alec arrived finally at 6:00 p.m., having been working until then at school. Elena is walking everywhere. Practiced Alan Walker songs at Pendle Hill late at night.

Friday, January 24, 2003

Pendle Hill

At worship, I ministered about Don Cupitt. Folks approached afterwards: "That's what I believe. How can I find his books?" . . . Doug Gwyn is here. We breakfasted together. He will be writing the history of American Quakerism 1950–2000 over a two-year period. I quizzed him about Woodbrooke. It's OK, but just OK. He, like Daphne, found communicating with the British somewhat difficult. Later, in utmost confidentiality, Steve told me that certain staff people object to Doug's return because of an alleged sexual assault during his previous sojourn. (He was removed from his pastorate in California, years ago, owing to a sexual assault.) So we'll need to see now what happens. For this (unstated) reason we deleted his project from the Books Committee meeting. Everything is behind schedule because of Rebecca's non-functioning. We hope to catch up with the Woolman book, to place an errata slip in the Brinton reprint. The November pamphlet will be mailed next week. Other pamphlets will be two months behind until spring. Mary Stratton, Wilmer's wife, has joined the committee. Afterwards I took Rebecca out to lunch so that we could talk without disturbance. She is acting well under the circumstances, doesn't seem to be bitter or vindictive, but she feels that her summary dismissal was unjust and wants a "hearing." She wrote accordingly to the Board, which later denied the hearing, but is still struggling with a proper minute. After Rebecca, I conferred at length with Bob McCoy about timing of pamphlets, what to do with the 40 pamphlet submissions now piled on Rebecca's floor, and the date of our special meeting in February. Then: Executive Board, which went from 3:00 p.m. until 10:00 p.m. Most of it concerned Rebecca and what to do. Wilmer chastised Steve for acting out of anger, which Steve admitted and promised not to repeat. We tried a minute simply affirming support of Steve, but I and another trustee objected, so this was not passed, especially because members had not yet read the numerous letters from staff and students supporting Rebecca. We also discussed the proposed governance change, deciding that we are not ready to present it in April. Wilmer was testy about this, as was Tom Corl, complaining about all the work he'd done and the paucity of help or discussion. Sad. As solace

I shared ice cream with Mac Given and then practiced Walker songs again. Also, had a nice reunion with Caroline Jones during our short supper break.

Pendle Hill–Philadelphia

Board from 9:45 until 5:00 p.m. More Rebecca. But—better—a wonderful presentation by Elizabeth Ellis on the “Chester Project.” A sort of renewal of the work camp idea. Splendid. More on the continuing deficit. More on the dean search. Steve does not want Paul Rasor; he insists it must be a woman. Regarding Rebecca, we tried numerous wordings for a minute and could not agree. I recorded all ideas, which will be e-mailed to everyone. I’ll try to draft a minute from these, but not until we see if Rebecca is willing to sign the separation contract now in her hands, as opposed to pursuing litigation. A mess. Everyone agrees that she needs to leave publications (she too agrees). The two questions are: Why should she not continue on as a teacher? Was Steve’s angry, summary dismissal just? Steve’s argument re: teaching is that she repeatedly lied regarding the status of the pamphlets and books; also that if she is allowed to teach this year (as he is now doing, actually), she’ll wheedle her way into continuing next year. I feel that complete separation will be best both for Pendle Hill and for her. But we need to do it with kindness if possible, not anger. . . . To Philadelphia at 5:00 p.m. Picked up Alec and family and went to Marina and Kevin Brownlee’s home on 22nd Street for supper. A lovely reunion after about 15 years. Hugs and kisses. The lovely daughter is very adult physically and mentally although just in 8th grade. The son, younger, is the opposite: non-communicative. Daughter wants to learn Greek. I’ll send her information about ALPS and also the Farm School trip to Greece. Marina wants to see Greek Today when it’s ready. A lovely dinner and reunion.

Hanover

Flew home just in time to rehearse again with Alan Walker. I’m still making mistakes in certain parts, but I’m able now to watch the words more and adjust if I’m not with them exactly.

Wednesday, January 29, 2003

Performance. Betsy, the soprano, came at 9:00 a.m. and we had another run-through, also with Mayme. Not bad. From 10:00 to 11:00 I practiced some more in our apartment, then returned to the Gathering Room wearing woolen gloves, as Ignat does before playing. Large crowd. All went well. I wasn't nervous, and I didn't make any mistakes, although I surely didn't play all the notes. Betsy entered a measure early at one point, but I adjusted. Lots of smiles and congratulations afterwards. Rachel, Alan's daughter, was there, and Kesaya, and Carol Armstrong. Then a nice lunch in the Walkers' apartment. Alan now wants a repeat performance in Plainfield, Vermont. I'm glad to be finished, at least for now, with these un-pianistic Walker pieces. . . . In the afternoon, drafted a board minute for Rebecca's dismissal, drawing on attempts by Tom Brown, Carl, Given, and others and being very frank about Steve's error although supporting him in the end. We'll see if the others accept it. . . . Then supper in the café with Dick and the Wilsons, all voicing dismay over Bush's State of the Union speech last night (except for his advocacy of fuel cell cars). Music with Dick and Allan: Bridges, Vivaldi, Dello Joio, all much better than Walker.

NYC

Up at 5:00 a.m. Drove to Springfield. Train to New York. Lunch with Jeff Murphy in a restaurant on 44th. They'll be moving back downtown in August. He says that he'd like more lectures next year. He paid, saying that the firm "did very well this year"! Then to Columbia to see Karen Van Dyck and Peter Constantine about our next activities with the anthology. Mike Keeley didn't arrive because he has prostate cancer and today went for his first radiation session. Afterward, Karen took me to dinner at the Columbia Faculty Club, a treat for her, she revealed (away from the children for once) as well as for me. We hope to see each other next in Thessaloniki.

Tuesday, February 10, 2003

We had Quaker 8s at Billie-Jo Johnstone's house, all sitting around her bed. She is terminally ill with metastasized cancer and is near death. She spoke only in single words and occasionally a short sentence, although at the end when I thanked her for "putting up with us" she graciously said it was a pleasure for her. The quotation chosen as usual at random was from Don Cupitt, "When we give up the idea that our chief religious task is to discover some very important Truth, then we'll be ready to see that our chief religious task is to love this world and this life and to make the most of them that we possibly can." Beautiful, but hardly appropriate for someone dying at age 40. Her partner, Dr. Don Lacey, was upbeat and courageous. And a woman from hospice, there to help, joined in our spoken meditations, beautifully, in a heavy Spanish accent.

February 15, 2003

Cambridge

A nice reunion with Eva Konstantellou over lunch at the Harvest Restaurant. She trains teachers in "Reading Recovery," a method of helping first-graders who do poorly in learning to read. She's so happy that she escaped Hellenic College. . . . Chrysanthi and I then saw Marivaux's "La dispute" at the A.R.T., my introduction to Marivaux. I missed the rhymed verse that I presume is in the French original (later I found that the French original is in prose!) but otherwise fully enjoyed the humor and spectacle of this ironic look at human sexuality.

February 20, 2003

New York

Katy Myrivili telephoned, angry because she thought I was altering the Zωή ἐν τάφω translation and using the British edition. Now I have to deal with both her and Fakazis. And I'm spending countless hours going over his scanning. . . . To Daphne's. Christina very temperamental, Andrew not, always smiling. Peter holds his head up and is beginning to look like Greg. Daphne and I went by subway to the Harvey Theater of BAM to see Twelfth Night in the Donmar Warehouse production. Lovely. The language, of course; the acting; the songs; the humor (Malvolio, Sir Toby, Sir Andrew). Simon Beale's Malvolio especially fine. Also Emily Watson's Viola/Cesario. But the true hero is always Shakespeare himself.

February 21, 2003

New York City

Met Don Kurka, as planned, at the Leonardo Da Vinci exhibit at the Metropolitan Museum at 9:30. His colleague and friend, Sam Yates, also an artist, was there, and eager to talk to me because his maternal grandmother was a Quaker and one of the founders, he said, of Guilford College. The Da Vinci exhibit is gorgeous. I bought one reproduction, of the Virgin's head, perhaps to put in the hall next to all the other women we have there. We then went to a special exhibit of brilliant photographs especially of New York, and finally to another special exhibit of African-American painters, again splendid: such talent, such pathos! This was followed by a leisurely lunch at the Met. . . . I then visited Katy Myrivili at the Foundation for Hellenic Culture, to show her precisely the kinds of changes I'm making in Life in the Tomb, and calm her down. She was fine, all smiles. But Fakazis is strange. He told her, for example, that he had returned to me my copy of the novel—my one and only copy of the American edition—which he has not.

February 22, 2003

Princeton, Nassau Inn

Good. I'm no longer president of MGSA. Tom Gallant was elected, owing to a bit of "king-making" by Dimitri and me. I contacted Tom earlier to see if he would accept, and he answered Yes. So, we nominated him; there was no opposition. Gonda is now vice-president. But John Iatrides announced suddenly that he would be resigning as Executive Director at the end of 2003, a blow to the new president. Also learned during the meeting was that Kostas Kazazis had died at age 68, suddenly. He'd been studying Jespersen the morning of his death. The big question remains: Should we all travel to Greece on March 20 if the US invades Iraq? . . . Mike Keeley showed up briefly. He's undergoing radiation therapy for prostate cancer and beginning to have side effects: diarrhea, fatigue. And Mary has breast cancer and is also being radiated. He is very low, alas. . . . Kathy Vanderpool of the American School in Athens is now on our MGSA board and will be very valuable—e.g., regarding investments. Nice to meet her. And Mache Karanika is with us now, as are Karen Emmerich and Neni Panourgia. Tom led a very good meeting, followed by dinner and the drinks at the Inn. Oh, Peter Allen is with us again, vigorously.

Monday, February 24, 2003

Pendle Hill

Couldn't fly home last night owing to ice and sleet. So I'm in Pendle Hill for a few extra days. At Meeting today, Steve announced that Rebecca signed the termination agreement. Thus our board minute will now be posted. Let's see what happens. Tom Jenik asked to speak with me and said that morale is very low because of Steve. Everyone is afraid that if they're "obstructionist" they'll be fired. Can't talk to him openly. He just isn't right for this community, says Tom. I responded that the board is fully aware of his acting out of anger sometimes and has told him that this is entirely unacceptable. Can he cure it? . . . Steve told me that Doug Gwyn's marriage is faltering because of the revelation that he sexually "abused" a woman at Pendle Hill some years ago, this on top of the similar incident in California that cost him his job as pastor. Steve thinks the marriage will survive, maybe. All this will affect Doug's plan to be three years at Pendle Hill to write the history of American Quakerism 1950–2000. . . . I'm continuing with my copyediting of Life in the Tomb, and liking what I read.

Tuesday, February 25, 2003

Pendle Hill

Monday-night lecture last night on Quakers and Afro-Americans, debunking the myth and showing with lots of evidence that most Quakers were racially prejudiced, just like everyone else, that they were not heroes of the Underground Railroad, etc. In the question period I asked about work camps. Did they do any good? The answer was that they falsified the situation, making the white participants think that all blacks were poor, whereas many middleclass blacks existed. . . . Today, spent an hour with Bob McCoy, who is developing the Cary book into something much better by adding Steve's speeches and pamphlets plus lots of photos of AFSC relief workers in Europe. He is also making progress on the mess left by Rebecca concerning pamphlets. We'll need copyeditors, one of whom I hope will be Daphne. . . . Our board minute was posted yesterday. So far, everyone who has read it has been satisfied, they tell me.

Wednesday, February 26, 2003

Pendle Hill

Pubs meeting. It's clear that we really need an in-house editor to replace Rebecca, as opposed to the pick-up outside editors favored by Steve. I told him this when we met afterwards regarding the dean search. I favor opening it to non-Quakers; Mickey Edgerton wants only members. We'll decide in the Executive Committee next week. . . . To Dan's for music. He seems to have practiced a bit. He took me to his Friendly's, where of course everyone knows him. He is working 40 hours a week there, as host, manager, and computer expert. He recited to me at length the difficulties at Medford Leas, which is planning an expansion acutely opposed by most residents. . . . Late, back at Pendle Hill, I practiced Granger's Spoon River piece that I need to perform at Kendal in April.

Thursday, February 27, 2003

NYC

To Brooklyn for interviews—two—on Greek radio. One on Life in the Tomb, the other on the Archbishop's commission, half-hour each, in English. Very fine host, who had done his homework and asked all the right questions. The lovely homes still on Schermerhorn Street reminded me of Monroe Street, where Mother grew up but that now, I'm told, is a slum. . . . To Daphne's for supper. Alec was there, too, since he's been in NYC for a professional meeting. Bob McCoy asked Daphne if she'd edit one of our PH pamphlets but she said No—wait six months and then maybe.

Friday, February 28, 2003

NYC

American Farm School board. Committee day. I'm on the Secondary and Post-Secondary Education committees. We're recommending an increase in room and board fees to help heal the $1,500,000 deficit. David Buck seems to have done very little to improve the situation since our last meeting, but he hopes that we'll be operating with a balanced budget in six years owing to land sales, capital campaign, and some economies in operation. We discussed elimination of the Lyceum but David said that wouldn't save any money. . . . Met Burt Pike for dinner at the Yale Club. Nice reunion of two post-prostatectomy survivors. He's just translated Goethe's Werther. We went to the NYC Ballet, a brilliant, delicious evening: "Concerto Barocco" (Bach/Balanchine), so pure and stately. I thought: If human beings can do this, how can the same species kill each other in wars? Then the spectacular "Tarantella" (Gottschalk/Balanchine), which is such fun. Next, Wheeldon's "Carousel" to music by Richard Rodgers, showing this young choreographer to have the Balanchine mastery. Everything was precisely right for the music. Then "Hallelujah Junction" (John Adams/Peter Martins): music played by two pianos, very percussive and syncopated. Nice. A large cast in beautiful costumes. Finally "I'm Old Fashioned" (Morton Gould/Jerome Robbins), the one that starts with the movie of Fred Astaire and Rita Hayworth. Always delicious to see again. A splendid evening.

Saturday, March 1, 2003

NYC

More AFS. We had to agree to let David Buck draw down another $1.2 million from endowment to avoid closing the School. Horrible. "T" says that John Cleave's leadership of the Strategic Planning Committee is grossly deficient; thus nothing has been done. . . . At the end, I recited the anti-war passage from Life in the Tomb, the same one I did on Thursday for the radio interview. . . . Dinner of oysters Rockefeller. Then downtown to see G. B. Shaw's Heartbreak House at the Pearl Theater, St. Mark's Place and 1st Avenue in the East Village, a very lively neighborhood. Well acted, although not quite up to British standards. Shaw's humor is delicious, and also his awareness of aged dementia (Capt.

Shotover). Social counsel regarding snobbery and upper-class mating immorality, put into perspective only at the very end as the war intervenes with bombardment. Of course, we are precisely equivalent now to these Edwardian Englishmen living in a bubble until World War I broke it.

Sunday, March 2, 2003

Home by train owing to prediction of snow, again, in New Hampshire and fear that my flight would be canceled.

Wednesday, March 5, 2003

I served on the committee to select the Lewin Fellow in the Tucker Foundation. Three fine candidates all wanting to do a service project for their first year after graduating. Took Jan Tarjan to lunch. . . . In the evening MC'd the celebration at Kendal of Philip Booth's poetry, initiated by me and organized by Cleopatra Mathis. Six poets came to read and to speak about Phil and his work. The Gathering Room was full.

March 6–9, 2003

Pendle Hill

Worked in the Free library on Thursday before supping with Alec and one of his teachers, a young woman doing third grade, half Greek, very sweet. On Friday, Books Committee worrying about the errors in the Brinton re-issue, and about Gwyn. Steve divulged to everyone the accusation of sexual impropriety, which Sally and Chris seem determined not to forgive. And Larry Ingle wants a sample chapter from Doug. I impressed on Steve the need for an in-house editor to replace Rebecca at least part-time. He said OK. After Pubs, met with Rebecca, who wants our board minute revised to be "fairer." Later, Gay refused to put that on the agenda. At executive session, lurid terrible stories about Steve. . . . Supper on Saturday with Alec and family again, this time in the Italian market area, a totally different feel from downtown Philadelphia.

March 10, 2003

War/Peace Steering Committee. A bomb: Ron Edsforth announced his resignation as coordinator.

March 13, 2003

Friendly 8s at our apartment meditating on Milton's sonnet on Fairfax, which is so applicable to current events.

March 14, 2003

Met with Daryl Press and Kathy Allen to plan W/P speakers for next year, concentrating on terrorism, refugees, torture. . . . Cocktails and dinner with Osgoods and others. Then off with Tom Wilson to the White Church to introduce the film of The Last Temptation.

Saturday, March 15, 2003

At 8:00 a.m. rehearsed Granger's Spoon River with Co Emlen in the Gathering Room. I'm still missing notes, but at least I can fake it fairly well. Then drove to Cambridge. Lively lunch at Harvest with Panayiotis Roilos and Dimitrios Yatromanolakis, who very much likes my essay on "Melissa." Then to the A.R.T. to see Rinde Eckert's "Highway Ulysses," which I found extraordinarily poor. Pretentious, and really not related in any meaningful way to the Odyssey despite the intentions. The after-play talk was better than the play. Eckert has interesting ideas about the Odyssey, but they didn't find a suitable vehicle in this play. . . . Nice supper at home afterwards: omelet and apple salad and wine and good coffee.

March 20–23, 2003

Thessaloniki, Electra Palace Hotel

To Thessaloniki, despite Chrysanthi's worries because of the Iraq war, arriving Friday around 3:00 p.m. in the middle of a huge anti-war demonstration on Tsimiski that prevented my taxi from reaching Aristotelous. So I walked from XAN in back of the police lined up on the sidewalk, the marchers in the gutter, chanting. Long visit with Vouli after I registered in the hotel. Κυρά Στέλλα still alive and fairly active (she went out to church, aided by a companion). Vouli understandably worried about the future and her own life after her mother dies. If only Greece had something like Kendal, she said. I hope she'll read my Quakers and AFS lecture before I give it. . . . Our Ministry of Culture conference began on Friday at 9:00 p.m. with a supper at the new Mediterranean Hotel. Very mediocre food, but nice company, lots of old friends, and some new ones, like Panayiotis Pappas from Simon Fraser. On Saturday we had a full day of presentations, starting with Mrs. Souloyianni, who organized all this for the Ministry, and including an overly long speech by the minister, Venizelos, whom Vouli calls ο χοντρός. In the interval between the last presentation and another 9:00 p.m. supper (at Barrister this time, again mediocre), I visited for 2½ hours with Dimitri Gounelas, very pleasantly, at the hotel and then walking back toward the university. I decided not to call any of Chrysanthi's family, since if I contacted one and not the others there would be misunderstandings. At the start of Saturday's session I was unexpectedly asked to say a few words, in Greek of course (no English at all in this conference), and pleased people judging from the applause, when I noted that not all Americans support President Bush's war in Iraq. . . . On Sunday, we began again at 9:30 and went until 6:30. I chaired one session, trying valiantly to keep one of the questioners at the end from orating at length, and then I delivered my own paper on Η δραστηριότητα της Εταιρείας των Νεοελληνικών Σπουδών της Βορείας Αμερικής, adding Gonda's request to mention that eight of the twelve executive committee members are women. . . . Especially exciting in this fine conference was the chance to hear and meet Νεοελληνιστές from Turkey, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Ukraine, Latvia, not to mention Portugal, France, Germany, Italy, England. Many knew me or my work. Several are waiting—still waiting—for Greek Today. Kazazis attended, as did (nice surprise) Mme Tsistsiou from the Onassis Foundation: my friend. At supper at Barrister on Saturday I sat with two younger people from the Ministry of Culture and gained greater insight into their activities and frustrations. The woman, thirteen years beyond her M.A., is still living with her mother. On Sunday, exhausted from the full day of presentations and discussion, I walked back instead of taking the group's bus, had a quick τσούρι for supper, and went to sleep early. . . . Up at 4:30 a.m. on Monday. Taxi to the airport, arranged by the Ministry. Flew to Amsterdam on the same plane as Gonda, Tziouvas, the man from Portugal (José), and Panayiotis ?. I spent two hours together with Gonda in the US Air lounge wondering how we are going to replace Iatrides as executive secretary of MGSA. She's hoping it can be done somehow at Princeton but we both know that Gondicas is already totally overloaded.

April 2, 2003

Performed Percy Granger's "Spoon River" with Co Emlen, two-piano four-hands, at a Kendal impromptu. Covered up mistakes satisfactorily, and got back in sync with her when she turned two pages by mistake. Faking is all.

Voltaire: "How infinitesimal is the importance of anything I do, but how infinitely important it is that I should do it." Yes! . . . Finally finished vetting the Life in the Tomb text and sent it to Fakazis. Next; the Quaker-AFS lecture for May 14.

April 4, 2003

Starting to write my lecture: Η επίδραση των Κουακέρων στην Αμερικανική Γεωργική Σχολή. . . . Introduced Dan Weiser and the Classicopia trio at Kendal; they played a marvelous concert of Borodin, Rachmaninoff, and Rimsky-Korsakov.

April 8, 2003

Went with Lynda Boose to see Barry Scherr, now provost, to try to get his help in regularizing Ron Edgforth's appointment so he'll continue coordinating War/Peace Studies. Last weekend he ran a marvelous symposium on refugee problems, starring Romeo Dallaire, who headed the UN's force supposedly meant to prevent genocide in Rwanda. . . . Later, Jim Sharpe of UBS took us to lunch and explained better our accounts and future possibilities there. We're moving all other accounts (Prudential, Sims, Janney) to Fleet in a trust account—expensive but convenient.

April 22, 2003

Led Jack Shepherd's class on "Heart of Darkness," followed by lunch with three of the students. Very nice. . . . Learned that Harry Schultz, my first mentor at Dartmouth, died last Friday. Not too nice. But he was "ready."

April 30, 2003

Athens, Athens Plaza Hotel, 210 335.2400

I'm reading Fagles' translation of the Odyssey with great pleasure. Just reading. No pencil; no notes. I should try it on our grandchildren. Right now I'm on Book 13 in the hotel, with a gorgeous view of the Acropolis. Very fine supper last night with Christos, Eri, and Aspasia-Maria. For once the conversation did not concentrate on Christos's ταλαιπωρίες. If I can get D. Gounelas to review my Πολιτικά του πνεύματος, Christos will publish the review. No review has appeared. Strange. . . . My hotel is luxurious. A suite, with complimentary bottle of wine and bowl of fruit. This morning I went to Germanos to get a case for my Greek cell phone, then to the bank for euros. No problem. Monastiraki is transformed with a beautiful new Metro station. . . . At noon to Theano's. She gave me the back matter to proof-read for the first time, plus the front matter and lessons 1–6, which have been corrected and should now be OK (except for the polytonic poems, for which she needs a different font). I hope to complete my part by May 13 when, with Dimitri, we'll go over lessons 7–12. She and her colleagues have been given all the design work connected with the new Acropolis Museum: brochures, signs, placards. . . . Lunch in the Delphi Restaurant, still OK, but the nice place with the garden on Philhellene is gone, although it will be replaced soon by another with the same garden, by the same owner, whom I met. Our Travel Dynamics group convened for a reception at 7:30 p.m. Nice to see Stella Miller and Wallace Collett. . . . At the cruise reception, I met the one and only Dartmouth couple, an interesting man with a Hong Kong wife. He was a PAA and TWA jet pilot for decades. . . . Don Nielsen came with his girlfriend. We walked beneath the Acropolis on the beautiful pedestrian boulevard, then drove to Pangrati to a jazz club to hear the famous oud-player Haig Yazdjian. We met him before they started at 11:00 p.m. and he signed my copy of his latest CD. I also spoke at length with the bass guitar player—a Greek, who joined with him—about jazz vs. classical. The music was lovely, more like classical counterpoint than jazz. The club was packed, everyone listening carefully, no one talking. People of all ages. What a nice life in this city that seems to be getting better and better largely because of preparations for the 2004 Olympics. They drove me back to the hotel. To bed at 1:00 a.m.

May 1, 2003

Up at 6:30 a.m. We had to leave early because today, May Day, the center of Athens will be paralyzed by May Day demonstrations. Long bus ride to Lavrian with stops at Sounion, Stella, the Greek guide, talking continuously and annoying everyone. Boarded the ship after lunch. Lifeboat drill conducted by one of the German officers. I felt so glad that Chrysanthi wasn't present because he looked and sounded just like an SS officer. Chrysanthi would have had nightmares. . . . I lectured at 5:15 on Homeric epic and the restoration of order. Lots of questions. But the tour guide told me afterward that I couldn't be heard in the back row because I didn't speak directly into the microphone. . . . Nice supper after a cocktail. Some pleasant people here. Sailed at 8:00 p.m. for Chios. German officers, Ukrainian waiters.

May 2, 2003

Chios

Stella lectured on the excavations at Troy, all nine layers. We were driven by bus way up to the mountain-top to visit Νέα Μονή: an ossuary filled with the skulls and thigh-bones of those murdered in the monastery by the Turks in 1821. The church, in bad repair, yet with many intact frescoes and mosaics. What's sad is that the monastery is now deserted: one monk and one nun. . . . Then to the south of the island, mastic country, to the village of Πυργή, unusual because of the geometric designs painted on the façades of all buildings. Chios was the ancestral island of Κοραΐς and also of Θεοτόκας, but I saw nothing except street-names connected with them. There is a Κοραΐς Museum but of course it was closed since we arrived in mid-afternoon.

May 3, 2003

Delos. Good tour led by Stella first to private homes and the theater, then to the sanctuary, temple for Apollo, the lions, the Dionysos sanctuary with the phalli, finally the museum. There I saw for the first time a Herm and remembered what Alcibiades did. Back to the ship. Then to Syros: a revelation. Pure geometry: a cubist painting. What lovely architecture! What wealth! The town hall, the church, the Επιμελητήριο (chamber of commerce). And lovely alleys filled with restaurants. Surely one of Greece's most impressive places, obviously because it was the chief port in the nineteenth century. I remember that in Καζantzakis's Καπετάν Μιχάλης ο Κοσμάς έρχεται πρώτα στη Σύρο. . . . Good lecture in the evening by John Reich on the origins of the Greek and Latin civilizations.

May 4, 2003

Arrived at Nafplion. Bus to Mycenae. Beautiful day again. Shaft graves, beehive tomb, palace, lion gate. Extraordinary, but I told folks that it's even better on a blustery day with dark clouds. John Reich explained that the beehive tomb is constructed by corbelling, not by the principle of the arch, whose thrust is outward. The corbelling thrust is downward. Then to Tiryns, which is disappointing after Mycenae. Wallace Collett, age 88, climbed all the way up to the palace floor and felt dizzy on the way down but is OK. He's amazing. In the afternoon, I continued proof-reading the back matter of Greek Today, finishing appendix B (the paradigms). Walked a little in Nafplion; lovely, and much improved owing, as always, to the EU. Nice supper and a previous cocktail with the good people here.

May 5, 2003

At sea all day. Lecture by Stella on Mycenae and by John on Sicily.

May 6, 2003

Malta

Spectacular harbor, but the tour was disappointing: megalithic stones like Stonehenge but much smaller, about 3500 B.C., then the cathedral, baroque (excessive) but with Caravaggio's Beheading of John the Baptist. Filled with tourists. It's a "free port"—no tariffs, which accounts, in part at least, for its prosperity. But compared to Greece it is ugly and uninteresting.

May 7, 2003

Sicily

To Erice in the morning on the extreme west end of Sicily. An ancient walled city, now a tourist attraction. Lots of history but not very meaningful for our purposes. The afternoon was better, after a lunch in a hotel filled with school groups touring. To Segesta, with a splendid Greek theater and a fifth-century Doric temple especially interesting because it was never finished and thus one can see some of the building techniques such as knobs on the ends of large square blocks of stone, used to help move them; these knobs would be smoothed out later. Also, the main floor was not at its final height. More would be added after fluting of the columns. Fascinating. . . . Good lecture by John Reich on Pompeii, which we'll visit tomorrow. At supper with John and Erica, and Wallace Collett and Stella, impassioned discussion of atheism vs. Quakerism. "What do you believe?" John asked me. "I believe in the Nature of Being" was my best answer. Difficult.

May 8, 2003

Naples

Spectacular entrance into Naples harbor with Vesuvius on the right. John said it's due to explode soon. . . . Morning at Pompeii with a good guide. House of the Faun especially beautiful. Forum. Red light district with mosaics of various "positions" on the brothel walls. Ingenious streets with raised rocks to allow pedestrians to cross without wetting their feet in rainy weather and carriages to pass between the stones. So, I finally made it to Pompeii, after having been deposited at the locked gate when we traveled to Greece on the Cristoforo Colombo and arrived on Easter Sunday. . . . Afternoon at the Archeological Museum where finally I saw the famous Alexander mosaic. Huge. Alexander vs. Darius. Fairly well preserved. It was a floor mosaic, a masterpiece, in the House of the Faun. Now it is displayed vertically, on a wall. Lots of other items from Pompeii including bodies, skeletons, jewelry. One gorgeous vase, blue with white work overlaid. . . . Jolly dinner again with Stella and Wallace, John and Berit. . . . More proofreading; I'm now in Appendix F, the English-Greek lexicon.

May 9, 2003

Lipari

An especially nice morning on Lipari, one of the Aeolian Islands. We could see Stromboli, the reputed Cyclops, in the distance. Lipari is famous for pumice (I bought a piece) and for obsidian: black volcanic rock that is very hard and can be shaped into a knife, razor, etc. Lovely flowers. But the best part was the museum, one of the most attractive I've ever seen, because of the nature of the displays. Splendid Greek vases, hordes of jars rescued from sunken ships, burial urns, a collection of models for Greek tragic and comic theater masks. . . . In the afternoon I gave my lecture on Homer as Geometrician, preceded by reading the Scylla and Charybdis section of Odyssey 12 and then playing Ods Bodkin's splendid recording of the passage, all this because at the very end of the lecture we passed (calmly!) through the straits of Messina, with Sicily on one side and the boot of Italy on the other, about two miles apart.

Saturday, May 10, 2003

The tour this morning was to Taormina, where I've been twice before. So I stayed on board in order to make more progress on the Greek Today proofreading. Panel discussion in the afternoon, organized by me. It was OK, not great, but still useful.

Sunday, May 11, 2003

Town of Corfu, which is lush, all green, very Italianate. Interesting pediment of Medusa in the museum. Lovely monastery high on a hill. Turquoise waters. Very like Bermuda. Spectacular barbecue for supper on board.

Monday, May 12, 2003

Ιθάκη

A bus tour of Ithaca, which is very lovely, and has very little tourist trade. Way up to a mountain village on switchback roads (good that Chrysanthi didn't have to experience that frightening ride). . . . I gave my last lecture in the afternoon, Odysseus Across the Centuries, and offered to send anyone my reading notes for Thucydides when I get home. . . . Captain's cocktail party followed by supper ending in baked Alaska. Sat with a gentleman whose sister was married to A. J. Ayer, the British positivist.

Tuesday, May 13, 2003

Athens–Thessaloniki

Worked on Greek Today in the hotel. Then to Θεανώ, with Dimitri. We've got a "road map" for the rest of the book, including CD Workbook. Much left to be done. Theano hopes to finish by September. Then Dimitri and I went to a café (filled with sexy young women playing tavli and smoking) to talk about the Farm School. He is totally against expansion of the College to four years. A better plan would be to develop a plan whereby our College grads could go to Anatolia College. . . . Flew to Thessaloniki. Randy Warner met me at the airport. Lots of talk about Mercer UP, etc. I have a nice room in Cincinnati Hall, even my own toilet. Supper and long conversation with David and Patty Buck, joined at first by Christina Willis. David repeated his desire to quit in two years. I told him about Alec's "No" after being selected by the school in Cambridge. "Careful!" said David. "If one does that more than once, everyone assumes that something is wrong."

Wednesday, May 14, 2003

School assembly at 7:45. Very moving. Χριστός ανέστη. A girl spoke; then Socrates and Tasos. Lots of friendly greetings. Vouli came and went over my lecture, making many suggestions for improved wording. Visited the library; we'll talk tomorrow about the books they'd like. Then to Socrates, who'll be retiring at the end of the summer. He says that he really hasn't faced that yet; he is still too involved with the day-by-day operation of the school. Then to English class, each student using a computer donated by Mrs. Godley. Each wrote an e-mail letter to a pen-pal in the US and also did grammar drills, quite imaginative ones. Excellent spelling, and they're only first year T.E.E. Then to an agronomy class that was a review of the term's work, preparing for exams. What are the three breeds of pigs? How are cows artificially inseminated? What is genetic manipulation? The students answered most of the questions quite adequately. . . . Lunch with three students whom I quizzed on various topics—e.g., Is it OK if the president doesn't speak Greek? Yes, they all said. Siesta. Rehearsed my lecture. Did some more proofing of Appendix G of Greek Today. The lecture went very well apparently. Enthusiastic applause. Full house in the top floor of James Hall, including lots of students. Enough questions afterward, fielded by Dimitris Gounelas, who introduced me. Takis Litsas spoke well about the continuing power of Quaker witness. I asked him afterward if his father was or was not a Quaker. He was everything, the son replied, when the need arose, and always sincerely. Supper afterward in an ουζερί, with Barry, Dimitri, Vouli, and Vicki, the head librarian. To bed at 12:30 a.m. rather tired.

Thursday, May 15, 2003

Up at 6:45 in time for today's assembly, which involved an hour-long presentation by the astronomy club, aided by computer projections, of the nature of the planets of our solar system. Very fine. Then I spoke at length with Christina about the School's lack now of any real program and also with David, who seems alas alienated from the School and looks forward to retirement in the summer of 2004. He gave me a list of ideas he has shared with Mr. Zannas, confidentially. Then to Vicki, who handed me a list of the several hundred books she would like me to send. Then to Randy, showing her lessons 1-6 of Greek Today. . . . Tasos Apostolides, who will succeed Socrates as Head of School, spoke beautifully before the astronomy presentation this morning, emphasizing how wrong it is for the inhabitants of Planet Earth to war against each other. It's very exciting to see this School in operation, and in some ways to be a part of it. . . . Met the two young women I supported financially in Perrotis College: Iva Milenkovic, from Macedonia, and Albana Fejzo, from Albania. Iva doesn't know what she'll do next; she'd like to work on a cruise boat. (I said I'd give her Travel Dynamics' address.) Albana wants to continue for a Bachelor of Business Administration and eventually for a Master's. She can't go to Holland because the tuition is 10,000 euros a year and her parents, both teachers, earn very small salaries. She could go to A.C.T. (Anatolia College), paying the room and board, if she got a fellowship covering the $7,000 tuition. Otherwise no. I'll speak to Anatolia; maybe I can help. . . . In the evening, the ΤΕΕ-Λύκειο graduation in the gymnasium. So moving! The graduates beautifully dressed. Each got an AFS pin. The prizes (one of which was handed to the winner by me) included a heifer, which was led into the hall rather reluctantly. Special attention to Socrates Adamides, who is retiring. He was made an honorary graduate, and gave a fine speech. Sat between David Buck (who tried a little Greek in his speech) and Annie Levis, with Vouli in the row behind. What a nice atmosphere!

Friday, May 16, 2003

Spoke to Dick Jackson and Evangelos Vergos about supporting Albana Fejzo. Jackson will speak to his admissions team and call me back. Vergos says she's absolutely tops both in scholarship and character. He told me that his aunt trained as a midwife under the Quaker program established by Sydney and Joice Loch, and showed me the stethoscope and blood-pressure instruments she was given. Then I went to a management class taught by Rotsios. The students prepare extensive prospectuses for "new business," sort of like the reports I get from stockbrokers, very professional and advanced. I spoke to him about Alexios Monopolis and the Prespa Peace Park. Surprisingly, he knew about it and had even taken the class there already. . . . To town: lunch with Odysseas and Eleni. They're very worried about Toula, who works too hard, and Stavros, who, they say, is killing himself by smoking. His health problems sap his energy, shifting more burdens to her. They've moved to the large house they built on the other side of town, which means a long commute in addition. Very nice visit, two full hours of constant talk, plus a delicious meal. Then to Kostas and Lola for another hour, very pleasant and relaxed. Lola looks much older; Kostas is gray but otherwise spry, and still cooking cake and baklava. I treated myself to a γύρο. Also visited the new municipal library, whose collection seems very meager, alas, although they do have a few of my books.

Saturday, May 17, 2003

Lola telephoned, having forgotten completely that we visited yesterday, to arrange when we could see each other, and why doesn't Chrysanthi come, etc. Something serious, I fear: probably Alzheimer's. . . . Working on my Kazantzakis lecture, shortening it and making it more coherent. . . . George picked me up. His prostate is there again, causing all the usual symptoms. Obviously it was not all removed when he had the supposed "radical" operation. We drove to his house, where Andreas was waiting, alone, without wife or child. He's a mess: difficult to talk to, in a sort of depression I'd say, although we managed a few stabs, each of which terminated after a sentence or two. Thankfully, Dimitri, Tilda, and Evie then arrived, all very friendly and normal. They want me to speak English to Evie tomorrow on our excursion. Tilda said that my lecture Wednesday was συναρπαστικό, and I couldn't think of the English translation—maybe “compelling.” Immediately after the dinner. Andreas left, saying he needed to return home for his cigarette. Ugh! Chrysanthi telephoned. She's back in Hanover, has registered and inspected the car, done laundry, etc. Everything was fine with her visits to the three families, although she finds Sophia a bit of a problem, especially compared to Christina. . . . I finished shortening my Kazantzakis lecture and read through it aloud a few times.

Sunday, May 18, 2003

Worked on the front matter of Greek Today. Lots wrong. Dimitri, Tilda, and Evie came with two friends, Avram and Christina. I showed them James Hall, where Farm School reunions were in progress. David worried because tomorrow there's a general strike and trustees won't be able to arrive. We went off in two cars to Χορτιάτη, now a large village, and beyond on a dirt road for a walk in the country. Mountains, the lake of Λαγκαδάς in the distance, oaks, chestnut trees, nightingales. Very rural, yet so close to the city. Then the usual large meal (very unappetizing) in the town. Then to Panorama to another place for cappuccinos; this restaurant specializes in chocolate. Home at 5:30, very tired. Siesta. Then Toula came, not with Stavros but with a friend, Theano, another pianist, graduate of Anatolia and of the Sophia, Bulgaria conservatory. Toula seems fine, not at all downtrodden as Odysseas thinks. She is exploring religious philosophy and is interested in Quaker philosophy and in Kazantzakis's religious position. I'll send her the text of my Farm School lecture and perhaps my Καζαντζάκης, η πολιτική του πνεύματος. She of course wishes to know all about Leander especially. From what she said, she still loves her music and her job; she is still κεφάτη.

Monday, May 19, 2003

Interesting College class with Sachis Gertsis on plant nutrients with two Nigerian students and one Greek. Lunch with Randy Warner checking the status of Brenda's book. All the illustrations have been submitted. Looks good. . . . To Thessaloniki for my lecture on Kazantzakis's attraction to Fascism and Nazism. Small audience, only about 25 people, because of the general strike today (university closed) but Xenophon Kokolis came, and Michael Chrysanthopoulos, and Dimitris Gounelas of course, and Vouli and students. I think it went well; They seem to have found it interesting and informative. Afterward, nice supper with Dimitris, Michael, and a recent graduate who teaches Greek to foreign students and says she's looking for a better book. I of course made pro-paganda for Greek Today.

Tuesday, May 20, 2003

Workshop on the college. Very informative also on lifelong learning. Then another on the TEE and Lyceum. Also useful. On returning to Cincinnati Hall, after a coffee with Patti Buck and the Thomases, I found a letter from UPNE, the director, complaining angrily about our refusal to return corrected proofs to them and also about Theano's bill for $4000 for the Workbook. They demand everything by July 1. I sent an e-mail saying that August 1 would be possible. . . . To Vezyroglou for supper. Chance to talk at some length with Bill McGrew and with Dick Jackson (who says that Albana is accepted—the scholarship committee will meet Thursday and he'll call me), Stavros Constantinidis, who grew impassioned about not selling land, John Koliopoulos, Vezyroglou, and even John Cleave, who drew me aside wanting to learn what I thought about the various issues confronting us. He said that the resident trustees want David Buck to go. They expect him to save $1,000,000 and of course he cannot. No word from Gounelas yet about my payment for the lecture. I'm feeling homesick, am eager to return.

Wednesday, May 21, 2003

Tour of the farm—eggs, milk, maintenance shop—and the site for the new dormitory. Borovilas complains that the Lyceum grads don't get into university. True. But they go to TEI: technical colleges. I thought of the debate in Quaker schools: high academic success vs. the true mission. . . . College put on its international lunch. Beautiful. I spoke again with Albana. She's going for another interview tomorrow, for scholarship support. . . . Gounelas delivered €410 for my lecture. UPNE replied that August 1 is OK for our deadline. I phoned Theano. She can do it, she says.

Thursday, May 22, 2003

Post-secondary meeting chaired by me, with Bill McGrew present and also Vangelis Vergos, Annie Levis, David Acker, Yannis Vezyroglou.

Main item: expansion of the College to 3 or 4 years to offer a B.Sc. degree. McGrew's report listed advantages, disadvantages, reasons for waiting. We concluded that the investigation should continue and indeed should involve an outside consultant to join McGrew. . . . Rushed off to Thermi to deposit the €410 I earned for my lecture. Fine, but the bank's computers were down. Early afternoon, Dick Jackson telephoned to say they had accepted my proposal regarding Albana. I pay $5000, they pay $2000 and she has a full tuition scholarship. Hooray! . . . Secondary Committee with Betty Godley, Annie Levis, and me. We concentrated entirely on better instruction of English. Back to Thermi; computers up. Then plenary session called by resident trustees, very disagreeable. Paul Condellis recommended that David Buck not be renewed after his first term if he doesn't balance the budget. Dimitri Constantinou wants him to fire staff. Dimitri Zannas spoke of the "good old days" that are no more. Everyone says the spirit is gone, the staff are bureaucrats instead of a family, etc. Very difficult for David. . . . Afterwards, happily, I brought the good news to Albana. Hugs and smiles and more hugs. Vergos, too, is very pleased. Also Joann. Big dinner with staff. I ate with the Pougouras couple (Mary Chism), Tasos couple, Pelagia couple, the last two spouses both university professors. Good people. I spoke to Pelagia about her role in the ηγεσία but then realized that she hasn't been officially confirmed. And Condellis is opposed to Tasos's leadership. Then, the obligatory grinding pepper dance with much laughter. Finally, I sat with the three interns and learned lots of secrets about TEE and Lyceum, especially TEE: that the students don't study, that many have been sent by parents who want to get rid of their unruly children. Lyceum students are much better.

Friday, May 23, 2003

Full board. I read Harkianakis's "Expropriation of Building Sites." Shocking! More abuse of poor David Buck; demands that he cut the deficit. Schemes for exploiting our land without selling it. John Cleave's view that eventually we'll abandon both TEE and Lyceum and have only a university, and no farm. I of course gave the post-secondary report and also read the secondary although Annie is chair. We started at 9:00 and ended at 2:30, exhausted. Lunch finally. Telephoned Chrysanthi; all's well at home. Then we all got in a bus and were driven to the second πόδι of Halkidiki, to Porfi Hotel at Nikita, Sithonia. I brought along the remaining pages of Greek Today to try to finish before leaving Greece. I'm in the middle of lesson 4.

Saturday, May 24, 2003

Nikita

To Annie Levis's summer house in Gerakini. Beautiful, but surrounded now by tacky condos, etc. Everyone there: Lansdales, Tasos and wife, Pelagia and husband. I learned that Paul Condellis had abused Annie after yesterday's meeting, telling her to shut up. (She had read minutes that contradicted what he was claiming.) She cried, and said she was resigning from the board. Of course everyone assured her, as I did today as well, that it was Condellis who should leave the board. She said she'd stay. Long walk on the beach with Magda, a very interesting young woman recently married to a Serb. I told her about Svetlana Broz and will send info about her book. . . . After a rest, to the village of Parthenonas, mostly abandoned and dilapidated, but with several restored or newly built mansions. We went to that of Magda Kosma, widow of a fur merchant, high up on the mountain with a spectacular view of the gulf and Kassandra opposite. But it's the last place I'd want to live: so inaccessible. Long talk with Gail's wife about Kendal, which they hope to enter. . . . Back at the hotel, to the bar for coffee and to see a dance troupe, very fine, but I was saddened to see Greek dance prostituting itself now to entertain German tourists.

Sunday, May 25, 2003

Metamorphosis

Sunshine finally, after three days of rain. Finished lesson 6 of the book; Joann will mail everything to Theano tomorrow. . . . To Metamorphosis to Bruce and Tad's lovely home. Tad very interested in CCRCs but they can't take the actual step to decide. On the trip home in the bus, David Buck kept quizzing me about Kendal. With luck the Bucks and Gail and Ruth will visit Kendal in August and I'll give them a tour.

Wednesday, May 28, 2003

My 73rd birthday. Spent at the farm. We planted the garden, turned on the water, started the tractor, cleaned house. Everything fine. Lovely reunion with Chrysanthi when I returned two days ago. Sometimes it's good to be apart. We stayed up until 2:30 a.m. reciting our various adventures.

Saturday, May 31, 2003

Cambridge

Shakespeare's "Pericles" at the A.R.T. Not a very coherent play yet with a wonderfully poignant final scene as Marina is reunited with her father. Of course the A.R.T. pulled out all the stops, especially in the brothel scene at Mytilene. All in all, evil and despair is conquered mostly by magic and all ends well. A "romance" as they say. . . . Joan Williams wants to start a presentation of "What I Believe" at Kendal. I think I'd say, "I believe in rationality, the nature of the ordered universe." Do I also believe in evolution to produce consciousness (à la Bergson) so that we may appreciate and understand universal rationality? Perhaps.

Kinhaven

Our Schubert Ländler are going well. Dan knows his part. But Townsend, which we hope to do next year, is still problematic. The faculty four-hand recital started with Nigel and Chonghyo playing the great Schubert Fantasia extraordinarily well. Beautiful pianissimos and stark contrast with the fortes. Leander then did four Ländler with Betsy—melodic and sweet. Then Leander and Ignat did the 55-minute long Sonata in C, to my mind nowhere as great as the Fantasia, but a marathon accomplishment for the performers. Afterwards I learned that they had rehearsed only twice, for three hours on Wednesday and six hours yesterday. Tomorrow Dan and I have our first lesson. In practice I've been learning also the piano part to the Beethoven Trio No. 2, which is gorgeous. . . . In spare time, I found a Kazantzakis quote in Zorba for Bruce Lansdale's book being translated into Greek and started proofreading the galleys for Life in the Tomb, which still has errors.

Saturday, June 7, 2003

Very good, long lesson from Mrs. Shin pointing out numerous ways for me to improve my part and fewer for Dan. The main problem is touch; I have to produce full tones without hitting the keys. Excellent master class by Ignat, whose perceptions are brilliant. And of course when he plays a chord or phrase it is so different from the same played by a student. . . . I think that today is the 8th anniversary of my radical prostatectomy, and all is well.

Tuesday, June 10, 2003

Dan and I performed our eleven Schubert Ländler satisfactorily. A splendid concert except for the boring Schubert march with all its repeats. . . . At Kendal, heard John Kerry. He's the most impressive of the Democratic candidates we've seen so far.

Wednesday, June 11, 2003

To Riparius

Leander is here, very pleased with his workshop. We played the Townsend, all four pieces. He's clear that Dan cannot cope with the sec-ondo. I'll need to ask him to let me play with Alice. He can prepare a solo piece for the new impromptu format.

Wednesday, June 18, 2003

Bought a sit-down rotary mower at the new store in Wevertown: $2000. We'll begin to look like a golf course now. I hope to start by doing Alec's field and surprising him.

June 20, 2003

Pendle Hill

Dean search committee; we're just starting. Steve insists that we have at least one African-American (presumably female) on the shortlist. . . . Long talk with Bob McCoy after lunch. Pubs is going well. Steve has authorized Bob to hire a part-time freelance editor. I caught a half hour of a presentation to our college interns about transgender, by a man who considers himself a woman. He was very interesting, showing the scientific basis for gender confusion. At 4:00 reached Dan's. Told him about Leander's view regarding Townsend. Dan surprisingly acquiesced: "OK, you'll do it then with Alice. I'll prepare a solo." Exactly what I'd wanted. But we're inaugurating a good project that will maintain our relationship. We're going to revive all the pieces we played over the years. Dan will record each and put them all on a CD. We'll start with the Virgil Thomson waltzes.

Long talk with Mac Given about the trustee retreat I missed and generally about Steve's problems. I told him I was devastated when Steve hinted he might resign after the Rebecca mess. But no, he's still on board, thankfully. . . . To Alec's in the afternoon, and to the Kimmel Center for a festival (summer solstice) chiefly for children. Nothing very interesting except perhaps some jazz played by middle school kids.

Chrysanthi is doing ALPS again in Hanover. She told me that she has only three students. Those promised from Hellenic College never came.

Last Sunday, after returning from Pendle Hill, I went with Chrysanthi to visit Don Blackmer and Joan Dexter in Tunbridge. He looks so well; she is aged. She abandoned him to go and live in Zürich and become a Jungian analyst. I think they maintain separate domiciles but obviously visit occasionally. She, like me, was very stressed and unhappy at Harvard/Radcliffe in 1948–52, but for different reasons. Don of course was not. When I told him my view that Harvard did not have a soul (whatever that means) he cited wonderful people like David Tyack and Neil Hastings, full of soul. . . . We spoke also about Dick Hatch, whom Don came to know after Hatch went to MIT. Don saw him as a sort of surrogate father, and probably he was that to me as well. I was shocked to hear that after Hatch's wife died (following a long, distressing illness), Hatch committed suicide by walking into the sea (they lived on Cape Cod). Don assured me that he had told me this previously; I had suppressed it, obviously. . . . In Hanover I found the packet of letters I had received from Hatch, but alas I don't have copies of those I wrote to him. He saved me from science, opening up the beauties of literature.

June 26, 2003

A varied day. Finished proofreading Life in the Tomb (still full of errors; Fakazis's people are so sloppy), mailed it. After lunch I dealt with a dead groundhog I'd trapped; he was eating our garden. He was entangled in the garden fence, which I had to cut to extricate him. I buried him in his own hole. . . . Then mowed with the new White mower, which makes this place look like a golf course. Then weeded the garden around the rhubarb. Tomorrow I'll put fresh black paper down. Then scythed tall grass at the margin of the pond, completing preparation of the "beach" area (most of which I did with Leander's rotary mower yesterday). Then took a delicious swim. Water remarkably warm for so early (but the temperature has been 90 degrees for three days). Chinese dinner. Read the TLS. Studied the White manual. Prepared checks from Meeting to NEYM, the Quarter, and other Quaker charities. Answered e-mail. Oh, in the morning I practiced, trying to relearn the Chopin étude I did as a sophomore at Harvard when I took lessons in Boston. So far I doubt I can get it up to speed, but let's be patient.

Paul Condellis has resigned in disgust and anger from the Farm School board. Sheila Baird wrote that the board is totally ineffectual;

T. Jewett thinks the same. Sheila says, "Let the Greeks take over entirely." No! John Cleave failed us by not producing a strategic plan. Alex Drapos is a weak chair, reacting too late always. And probably David Buck is also to blame, since over three years he has produced no appreciable savings and thus forces us to destroy our endowment. So, the board is disintegrating just when we are planning the "triumphant" celebrations for the centennial.

June 27, 2003

Audrey Logan telephoned with the shocking news that Mary Soderberg died yesterday from a sudden, massive stroke. She suffered from high blood pressure, but seemed perfectly well the day before, indeed had just been with her daughter-in-law, who gave birth. Then she had a huge headache at night and by morning was brain dead. So her death is a blessing, in a way. However, "ask not for whom the bell tolls." Poor Roger, only a year after his retirement.

June 28, 2003

My first effort to pack the books meant to go to the American Farm School. Tedious, but I'm pleased they'll have this home and that so many other books will go to Bissell Library at Anatolia. Having one's books in a library is, I suppose, a viable form of "immortality."

Alec and family arrived. I mowed his field with the new White rotary mower. Took them all out to the Inn on Gore Mountain for supper. Elena has a sizable vocabulary of single words meaning (in her dialect) things like sleep, poop, yes, no, eat, Pappou, dad, mom. Her smile is infectious.

George telephoned to say "Lola is all right." What does that mean?

Subject: COURAGE!

Dear David,

Just a word to confirm to you that there are those of us "out there" who are thinking of you at this time, which must be extremely difficult for you and frustrating. What remains in my mind is your insistence at the Board's May meeting that remedial actions—especially reduction of staff—be done “humanely.”

You'll remember, perhaps, that when Dimitris Constantinou kept insisting on such reductions, I remonstrated that the procedure he was recommending (demanding?) could not possibly be humane.

At the time of a previous crisis, if I'm not mistaken, everyone on staff, from top to bottom, voluntarily took a salary cut of, say, 10%. Would that be possible now? Such a move would presumably help to mollify certain trustees.

My own sense—and I say this in frankness and confidentiality—is that a large part of the problem is John Cleave's failure to produce a strategic plan. The committee had two years, and the results are nil.

I hope that all the rest of us will actively resist Sheila Baird's advice to turn the School entirely over to the resident trustees. On the contrary, what's needed now is to solidify the Board once more behind the quite daring collaboration of two cultures that has worked largely with success in the past.

At the end of each difficult day, keep thinking of beautiful Vermont! I can say that with especial authenticity right now since I am typing this in the midst of 300 acres of beautiful forest in the Adirondacks.

With warm regards to you and Patti.

Alec and family came on Saturday. I took them out for supper at the Inn on Gore Mountain. Spent most of yesterday at Daphne's collecting the books requested by the Farm School and Anatolia College, all the best ones, of course. I hate to lose them but keep realizing that they're better off in a library.

Kinhaven

To Kinhaven yesterday to the dinner for former trustees. Lovely to see Bill Polk again, and John Austin, Ike Patch, Carolyn Wahl, also Mary Watt, Peter Schultz, and Michael Webster, guest conductor this week, and Leone. I arranged for them to concertize again at Kendal. Saturday's staff concert had two premieres of pieces commissioned by Kinhaven, one by Allen Shawn, another by Tison Street, the last deliciously formal and tonal. Then there was a jazzy original composition by a faculty member and finally Brahms' opus 34 piano quintet, with Kate Boyd awesome on piano. A treat! Today, the student concert was inspiring—such talent and sensitivity not only in expected things—Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Haydn—but in Milhaud and then some zany percussion pieces including an improvisation and a piece for four bass fiddles. Jerry Bidlack's madrigal group was exemplary. And finally Michael Webster conducted the full orchestra in two allegro movements from Brahms' 2nd Symphony, played with precision and verve, with especially good cellos and French horn. Another treat. Home by 8:00 p.m. to supper of stew with everyone in good spirits, and a splendid rainbow outside.

July 15, 2003

To the circus in the afternoon with Alec and family. Elephants, acrobats, jugglers, camels, trained dogs, an amazing hula hoop artiste. I think we enjoyed it more than Theo did. . . . Then to ballet with Don and Maria, meeting at the Hall of Springs a former colleague of Don's, an art historian, very pleasant. Donizetti's "Variations" (Balanchine) danced with bravura by Miranda Weese and Damian Woetzel; "Guide to Strange Places," music by John Adams, choreography by Peter Martins: loud, dissonant, gruff, not to my taste. Finally "Glass Pieces" with Philip Glass's awful music but deliciously humorous choreography by Jerome Robbins. At dinner, Maria asked about Quakerism: "Please explain it." I tried.

July 16, 2003

Mailed 449 items, mostly books, to Bissell Library, Anatolia College; 13 cartons, postage $358.20. The Guest House is now back to normal.

July 17, 2003

Our 48th anniversary. Alec and Monica had us to a delicious dinner with Laura and Mike Gouthreau also. Laura brought me a bar of especially delicious Belgian dark chocolate.

July 19, 2003

Hanover

In Hanover for the memorial service for Mary Soderberg, who died suddenly last week at age 68, from an aneurism. So sad! Kendal's Gathering Room was packed. The service was Quaker style, with excellent ministry evoking her gentleness and serenity. But poor Roger, recently retired, has been robbed of his retirement, really. . . . Nice to see Bruce Kolo-seike there, back from Shanghai, where he has already been four years. We drove directly to Saratoga. Gala night (not for us, but we could ogle all these celebrants in their tuxedos and evening gowns). Balanchine's "Walpurgis Nacht" was charming, but the best of the evening was Wheeldon's "Liturgy" danced by Wendy Whelan and Jack Soto: totally new, different, yet still consistent with ballet traditions. "Thou Swell," with lively music by Richard Rodgers, was no match choreographically (by Peter Martins), but very pleasant.

July 21, 2003

A sociable day. To Elizabethtown on Route 9, which is now totally neglected above Schroon Lake—looks the way Route 8 used to look between Bakers Mills and Speculator. Lunch with Maureen and Mary Fitzgerald, who now live in Plattsburg. Their minimal situation made us triply appreciative of Kendal. They're in a retirement institution that provides no health service, bad meals, no intellectual stimulation. But at least there are no stairs to climb. Maureen especially misses stimulating conversation (some of which we had over our two-hour lunch). . . . After supper, Art and Chris Perryman came. Their daughter, poor thing, has multiple sclerosis. Horrible! We avoided Christianity and horrible liberalism, to spend pleasant hours together talking about Arthur (who has a girlfriend), Greece, Adirondacks. How flexible one must be to go from the liberal Democrats Mary and Maureen at lunch to the reactionary Republicans Art and Chris (mostly Art) after supper. But the visits were equally pleasant because we've learned which topics are OK and which are verboten.

July 23, 2003

To Saratoga: dinner, then talk by Wheeldon, the excellent choreographer. He's 30 years old, English. Spoke exclusively about "Carnival of the Animals," which we saw tonight and found rather disappointing, certainly without the true genius of his "Liturgy," which we saw last week. But Balanchine's "Chaconne" (Gluck) and "Symphony in Three Movements" (Stravinsky) were both stunning, and so totally different. Clearly, Wheeldon wants to escape Balanchine; he spoke more enthusiastically about Jerome Robbins. He wants to bring children and new audiences to ballet, which is admirable, but “Carnival of the Animals” is a sort of cheap way to do it.

July 24, 2003

Theano Petridou e-mailed me. She has FINISHED Greek Today and has sent it to Mike Burton at UPNE. She and Dimitri worked on a daily basis for the last three weeks. What a relief! Finally!

July 28, 2003

Forestry meeting with the new forester, Charlie Butler, and some of the old participants and some new ones. Fred Vetter was there. I said to him, “You won’t remember me, because the last time I saw you I was seventeen years old.” He said he remembered. He seemed so tall then. Maybe I was short. And he seemed so much older than me—maybe five years. Another man, a former publisher now producing 300 cords of firewood a year in Keene Valley, was very friendly. Also a widow who owns 2200 acres in Speculator, a former high school English teacher. . . . Afterwards we all went to a restaurant in Olmsteadville to honor Ross Morgan, who showed up with his wife and was wearing a jacket and necktie. Amazing. When speeches began, I told about his metaphor of the “hare’s breath” [sic]. He said he knew that was coming. We all chipped in to give him a Hornbeck canoe as a present.

July 29, 2003

Alec’s birthday. Two couples, the wives teaching at Friends Select, were here as well as Leander and Sophia. Very festive: hamburgers and franks on the outdoor fire, then a birthday cake and wild blueberry pie. We gave him a small sander as a perfect present.

August 1, 2003

All afternoon with the new forester, Charlie Butler. Walking through the woods hearing which trees to keep, which to discard. He is young and somewhat “academic,” nowhere as mellowed as Ross. Chrysanthi doubts that he’ll last.

August 6, 2003

To Meadowmount with Leander’s family and Lori and Amy. Deanna was a student here, ages 14 and 15. The first summer, studying with Galamian, she was required to do nothing but scales and études to correct her bowing arm. The second summer she was allowed a few pieces. Tonight's concert was lovely: Ravel's "Tzigane," a tour de force for the violin (I thought of Balanchine's ballet throughout). Then Stravinsky's "Concerto in D major" for violin. Then, so lovely, the Fauré violin sonata with a superb staff pianist from Russia. We needed to leave at intermission (already 9:00 p.m.) and thus missed the Ravel string quartet. A splendid evening, preceded by a picnic in Lewis.

Alec, with Earl's advice and Clive's help, finally fitted the new muffler and exhaust system onto the Jeep, which is now purring along, although it still has problems. . . . I pruned around the old agricultural machinery in back of the barn, and also took down the asymmetrical apple tree at the edge of the old shed, to leave all the trees now in a straight row. Difficult to get the stump out but managed at last. . . . Also finished typing a new chapter concerning Kazantzakis's cultural and political involvements in Athens 1945-46. I think I'd like to use this for my talk in Iraklio in December, so I'll need to translate it into Greek.

August 8, 2003

A bad day. At supper, Leander exploded against Christina and Daphne, Daphne fled with children in tears, Leander continued to fulminate, Chrysanthi started crying. Horrible. All because Christina went second on my tractor ride although Lori's Amy was supposed to go second. But there was more from the past, obviously. With luck some repair was done late tonight at Daphne's. We'll see.

August 9, 2003

OK. All healed. Leander went to Daphne's last night and apologized. He has a terrible temper on occasion. My analysis is that Christina is so demonstrably better adjusted than Sophia, he is obsessed with Christina's faults. But Sophia seems to be improving . . . somewhat.

August 18, 2003

Wilsons here for lunch on the porch. As Joan was eating, suddenly three dead black ants fell out of the sky, it seemed, onto her plate. Looking up to where the playroom wall begins, we saw a whole army of carpenter ants, or rather two armies, for many pairs seemed locked in battle. Of these, one was all black and one black with a red middle: two tribes, it seemed, at war. We moved to the picnic table. Leander produced carpenter ant spray: we sprayed, and all succumbed, at least for now. More were found in the bathroom, parading from one end to the other. More spray; more corpses on the floor.

August 19, 2003

In one day, working for about twelve hours, I built a second large bookcase in the anteroom joining cabin and kitchen. Nine shelves 4½ feet long.

August 20, 2003

Chrysanthi polyurethaned the bookcase in the morning and in the afternoon we began transferring all the Greek books stored at Daphne's (she and Greg have put the property on the market for sale, alas). Finished in early evening: 750 items, still all in alphabetical order, alpha to omega. The room looks very nice indeed, now with at least 1000 books in its two large cases.

August 25, 2003

Arcadia Bed & Breakfast, Cherry Valley

To Glimmerglass opera to see Robert Kurka's The Good Soldier Schweik together with Don Kurka, the composer's younger brother. Kurka died in 1957 at age 35, of leukemia, just after finishing the opera. It's an anti-war piece tongue-in-cheek, sardonic, and also very funny sometimes. Very well performed. . . . Supper afterwards with Don and Maria, the Morses, and the Millers. The lead singer and one other were at the same restaurant, so we were able to chat a bit. He expects it to be done by the City Opera in the 2004–05 season. . . . Cooperstown is filled with grown men and boys in baseball uniforms, stores selling bats, photos of Babe Ruth, Mickey Mantle, Joe DiMaggio.

August 26, 2003

In the morning we went to the Farmers' Museum and learned how flax becomes linen, and where the phrase "towhead" comes from. Lots of other very interesting exhibits and demonstrations. Then across the street to the art museum, which includes Native American art, one canvas by Hicks, a few by Cole, but most of the others are mediocre. . . . Lunch with the baseball crowd again. Then "Don Giovanni," superb, such an amazing work of genius, beautifully sung, but at the ending there was no statue. Giovanni slit his wrists, committed suicide instead of being cast down to hell by a righteous universe. In other words, the parable was humanized, its metaphysical dimensions erased. This may be OK for twenty-first century audiences, but I doubt that it is OK for Mozart. But 9/10 of the performance was totally convincing and moving. . . . Returning home at 8:30 p.m. we were greeted by Leander and Nikos, who related all their many activities during our absence.

August 30, 2003

To North Creek's Tannery Pond Community Center to hear Dan Weiser in concert. He is such a good pianist. Best piece was Smetana's Piano Trio in G, opus 15, amazing, tragic, intense music. And all of this in North Creek!

August 31, 2003

Lovely dinner with Don Kurka and Maria at the Tortoras' house. They hope to come to Hanover to see the Orozco murals and want us to visit them in Tennessee in March or April. It's wonderful that Don's life has taken such a turn for the better thanks to Maria, who is smart and sweet. . . . Alec is here, closing up his cabin and worrying about the flying squirrels that are nesting in his roof. The Jeep is now going to winter in our pole barn. He hopes to plow snow with it when he comes at Christmas-time. . . . We're all sad that Daphne is going to sell the Shapiros' house, but what can we do? . . . I'm translating my essay on Kazantzakis in Athens 1944–46 for the symposium in Crete in December. Fun.

September 4, 2003

All day pruning the apple tree, which I neglected last year. Did the three prune trees yesterday. Chrysanthi said I gave the apple a "crew cut."

September 5, 2003

Mark Carpenter came to photograph and measure all the buildings, to rectify deficiencies in the insurance. . . . A few days ago we were supposed to visit Donna and Ed Welsh on their new land off South Johnsbury Road. We went, but the road was so bad we turned back and never found them. Next year we'll try in their van, which clears the rocks. . . . To Hanover, where there was a phone message from Eva Konstantellou that George Pilitsis died from a brain tumor. Funeral tomorrow.

September 6, 2003

So I got up at 6:15 a.m. and drove to Boston for the funeral, even though I should have been at the grand opening ceremony of the new Hanover Community Center, where Chrysanthi made a speech. Beautiful ceremony at Hellenic College, with Archbishop Demetrios officiating. Lily Macrakis gave a brief eulogy, the archbishop a long one. All agreed that George had rare qualities of sweetness. He was without malice. So, as the service wished repeatedly, he is now comfortably with the saints in heaven, his sins forgiven! . . . Saw Vangelis Calotychos, Patricia, and their twins, plus Eva and her daughter, now in college, and the president and dean of Hellenic/Holy Cross. Everyone very friendly and cordial. Poor George leaves a widow and three children. And, as the president told me, the Greek language program is now in a shambles there.

September 14, 2003

Terpni

To the farm, and how nice to be there, if only for six hours. We civilized the blueberry bushes, laying down mulch. And I brought more art books, Quaker books, and Greek books for the Main House shelves. Long talk with Earl, who stopped by. Happily, the bear that bothered Kelly and him is gone. Supper at our favorite restaurant in Lake George, but Anna, from Poland, my waitress friend, was working two shops away, in a Polish restaurant. We stopped to see her afterwards and to wish her well. She returns shortly to her final year in university in Gdansk, and hopes to visit Australia next summer.

Wednesday, September 17, 2003

AMTRAK to Philadelphia. I took my first Lipitor pill, urged by Brenda Jordan after liver test proved OK.

Thursday, September 18, 2003

To Friends Select's 9:30 assembly addressed by a graduate who is a documentary film maker. His excerpts were from a film on anarchists in West Philadelphia, very "liberal" I suppose, just like the school's image. Alec gave me "A Friends Select School History" from which I learned why the term "Select" is used. The original school was open to everyone. With increasing secularization in the nineteenth century the board decided to create "select" schools that would enroll Quaker children only and perpetuate Quaker values. Of course the school is once again totally diverse, as it should be. . . . On the train yesterday I read a book on Epictetus the Stoic philosopher, and found some choice quotes. I like the Stoic view that God/Zeus = nature, and that nature is rational. Thus we, "imitating God," fulfilling our own natures, should also strive to be rational. Amen! When I speak at Kendal on "What I Believe" I think I'll start with "I believe in Reason." Some of the quotes will be appropriate for Quaker 8s. . . . After 1½ hours in the Philadelphia Free Library, I went back to Friends Select and then with Alec to pick up Theo at his school and have lunch together. . . . I've finally found time, here in Philadelphia, to continue Harry Mark Petrakis's novelistic treatment of the Greek Revolution in 1821. It's very vivid, and very willing to show the atrocities of the Greeks as well as those of the Turks. He sent it to me with a plea for me to read and respond, then to donate it to Dartmouth's library, which I shall do next week. . . . At 3:30, telephoned Dan to say I wouldn't be coming, owing to the hurricane. Strong winds already and rain, but I got back to Pendle Hill easily. Lovely supper with Gay Berger and the two new Friends in residence, Ruth from England (former clerk of Woodbrooke Council) and Inge from Holland. Talk of Bill Fraser, etc. . . . Then played the beautiful Yamaha for 1½ hours, trying to learn Beethoven's 1st cello-piano sonata to do with Allan on Wednesday. Very difficult, especially the 2nd movement.

A. A. Long, Epictetus: A Stoic and Socratic Guide to Life (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2002).

70. Socrates used to say that an unexamined life is not worth living. [Apology 38a]

163. Our own natures are parts of the nature of the universe. Therefore, living in agreement with nature is the goal of life, that is, in accordance with . . . the right reason pervading everything . . . [Chrysippus, in Diogenes Laertius, Lives of the Philosophers, VII.87-8]

20-21. The Stoics . . . take all phenomena and living beings to be the / observable effects of a cosmic order, constituted and implemented by a principle they call Zeus, God, reason, cause, mind, and fate. . . . Everything that happens is ultimately an expression of this single principle, which by acting on 'matter' extends itself throughout the universe and makes it one gigantic organism.

145-6. First, and most important, is the characteristically Stoic identification between God and rational perfection. There is no gap between an ideally wise Stoic and God because the human paragon, by virtue of being perfectly rational, is obedient to God and in conformity with the divine will and law. We have already noticed how Epictetus talks about ‘the God within.’ . . . As cosmic rationality, God also exists outside every individual’s mind because he is the structuring principle of the entire universe. . . . If we apply our minds properly to the study of our own and the world’s nature, we are literally in touch with God. Physical nature, not a sacred text or revelation or inspired prophecy, is the Stoic’s guide to the divine.

110. What is a human being? A rational, mortal creature.

From what, then, are we distinguished by rationality? From wild beasts.

And from what else? From sheep and the like.

Take care, then, never to act like wild beasts. . . . Take care, too, not to act like a sheep.

When do we act like sheep?

Whenever we act for the sake of the stomach or the genitals, whenever we act in a random, dirty, or unconsidered way.

. . . Whenever we act competitively, injuriously, angrily, and aggressively, to what level have we sunk? To wild beasts . . .

(Epictetus, Discourses (Diatribai), 2.9.1-7)

137. Whenever you see someone holding political power, set against it the fact that you yourself have no need of power. Whenever you see someone wealthy, observe what you have instead of that. . . . If you have the absence of the need to have wealth, realize that you have something greater and much more valuable.

252. Why are we angry? Because we set such store on the things they steal from us. If you stop setting store on your clothes, you won’t be angry with the thief. Stop setting store on your wife’s beauty, and you won’t be angry with the adulterer.

188. We don’t need God, as distinct from ourselves, to tell us what to do; but we are able to tell ourselves what to do only because of the way our nature has been constructed. . . . Hence for Epictetus, the goal of ‘following God’ is equivalent to ‘living in accordance with nature’ (Discourses, 1.26.1), which was the standard Stoic definition of the good life.

272. How long are you going to wait before you demand the best for yourself . . . ? . . . Whenever you encounter anything that is difficult or pleasurable or highly or lowly regarded, remember that the contest is now, you are at the Olympic games, you cannot wait any longer, and that your progress is wrecked or preserved by a single day and a single event. That is how Socrates fulfilled himself by attending to nothing except reason in everything he encountered. And you, although you are not yet a Socrates, should live as someone who at least wants to be a Socrates. [Manual / Encheiridion (51)]

Pendle Hill

After Meeting I spoke with a man who works in local prisons. He says that the prisoners are all anti-Bush and opposed to the Iraq war. At Meeting I asked for prayers for all of us in New Hampshire who need to discern who will be best able to defeat Bush, when we vote in the New Hampshire Democratic primary in January. . . . The hurricane has passed. A huge tree is down across Rope Ferry Road. Pendle Hill has no telephone service. Otherwise, just small branches down everywhere.

Pendle Hill

One of the students in my course on Light is Fay Lawton, Peter Gardner's sister. I'm amazed. She is now a widow, living at the Quadrangle. And I'm going to see Terry Gardner next week. Gay Berger took the course also, as did Laura Melly.

October 13, 2003

This was my talk today at our "What I Believe" session:

To start, I must say that the title should be "What I believe now." Beliefs can change from decade to decade, maybe even from year to year. So, I'm not sure that what I'm going to say now would have been the same ten years ago or will be the same ten years in the future, if I'm still around to have an opinion.

What I believe in now is . . . rationality. That may sound strange for someone who, like myself, is aware of modern philosophical thinking—or, more accurately, postmodern philosophical thinking—with its emphasis on the vagueness and imprecision of everything, on the omnipresence of mutability, the multiple meanings of language, the total absence of any Aristotelian "unmoved mover," any "final point of stability in the swirl of existence."<sup>1</sup>

But I have been influenced recently by Stoicism, especially by the thought of Epictetus, who lived from about 50 to 130 A.D. first in Rome, then in northern Greece. Like other Stoics, he stressed that our own nature is part of the nature of the circumambient universe. That is certainly something I believe, and also a belief that is fashionable nowadays, especially among environmentalists. But Epictetus and the earlier Stoics believed that nature is governed by reason; they took “all phenomena and living beings to be the observable effects of a cosmic order.”<sup>2</sup> Again, this seems contrary to postmodern thinking; yet as I observe and contemplate the regularity of sunrise/sunset, the circling of planets around stars, the predictable cycle of living creatures’ birth, growth, maturation, and senescence, the intricate interdependence of animate and inanimate creation, I really do sense rationality at work around me and inside me. Of course unpredictability, chance, and inexplicability are also present, but right now I like to see them as defects of a system, not as that system’s essence.

The Stoics go one step further, asserting that the observable cosmic order is “constituted and implemented by a principle they call Zeus”—in other words, God.<sup>3</sup> That is more difficult for me, since I certainly do not believe that the universe was planned in advance by some supreme being. But if God is just shorthand for “the nature of things”—the predictable regularity characterizing cosmic order—then I have no problem. Indeed, I can subscribe to the Quaker assurance that something of God resides in each person: something of the rational universe in me, since I am part of the orderly cosmic whole.

But belief is frivolous if it does not manifest itself in action. Epictetus is especially attractive because he emphasizes moral behavior. His ultimate guru, Socrates, declared that an unexamined life is not worth living, which means that we are called to understand the ultimate structure and meaning of reality and, in addition, to collaborate with that structure, behaving morally. Moral behavior requires, first of all, that we differentiate between that which is subject to our control and that which is beyond our control. Furthermore, moral behavior requires that we act in conformity with a reasonable table of values. We are taught, for example, that the seven deadly sins may be divided into those that are carnal and those that are spiritual, with the spiritual being much more serious than the carnal. If one overcomes gluttony, avarice, or lust (all carnal) and in so doing succumbs to anger, envy, or pride, one is not collaborating with a rationally structured universe but, rather, is sabotaging a table of values that orders sins rationally according to their severity. Epictetus says this memorably: Why are we angry, he asks, when something is stolen from us. “Because we set such store on the things they steal from us. If you stop setting store on your clothes, you won’t be angry with the thief. . . . Whenever you see someone wealthy, observe what you have instead of that. . . . [I]f you have the absence of the need to have wealth, realize that you have something greater and much more valuable.”<sup>4</sup>

Clearly, Stoicism teaches us how to attain tranquility. Let me conclude with what Epictetus says concerning the relation between Socrates and ourselves: “Socrates fulfilled himself by attending to nothing except reason in everything he encountered. And you, although you are not yet a Socrates, should live as someone who at least wants to be a Socrates.”<sup>5</sup> That is perfect advice for someone like myself who believes that the prerequisite of tranquility is a rational universe that challenges us to understand its ultimate structure and to collaborate, as best we can, with that structure. So I end as I began: What I believe in (at least now), despite all the contrary evidence, is rationality.

Back at Pendle Hill. Played four-hand piano last night with one of the staff: Haydn symphony, Mozart sonata, Townsend. Today, Dean Search meeting. We have narrowed to 8 or 9 whom we'll interview. Among these are Paul Rasor, Laura Melly. In the afternoon, went to Philadelphia with Chrysanthi and Bartholomew Miheso, a Kenyan Quaker pastor who'll be at Pendle Hill for the year. Showed him Kimmel Hall, the Academy, Union League, Town Hall with Penn's statue, 30th Street Station, Four Seasons Hotel. Then to Friends Select, where Alec gave him a tour and listened to his method of Quaker liturgy in Kenya, very much like a Methodist service. He asked me about tithing and repentance. Monica came and we all trooped to Pietro's for an Italian supper. Cappuccino in the Springfield Mall, then early to bed, with plans to get up at 4:15 a.m. tomorrow in order to get to the airport in time (which for Chrysanthi means two hours early!) for the flight to Toronto.

Toronto, Sutton Place Hotel

To the hotel via bus and subway. Then Aser Rothstein picked us up and took us to his and Ev's luxurious apartment by the lake, overlooking islands, filled with art from China, Japan, India. Lovely lunch with them, but sorry to hear that they may sell their Adirondack house. . . . In the first session of the MGSA symposium, we heard Eri Stavropoulou speaking on depictions of Americans in nineteenth-century Greek literature. . . . Then Terry Gardner met us at the hotel and we walked to the rare book library of the University of Toronto for the opening of an exhibit of rare books. A lovely room, indeed spectacular. Some speakers followed: a scholar praising the collection, the librarian who did the catalogue, etc. Wine, hors d'oeuvres, and catching up with Terry, who has three daughters and six grandchildren. . . . Then by taxi downtown to inauguration ceremonies: a lovely tribute to John Iatrides, who in turn praised all past MGSA presidents and editors of the journal; then a splendid talk by Michael Llewellyn-Smith on the 1896 Olympics in Athens, and much more generally on the Olympic idea and reality.

October 17, 2003

Toronto

Good sessions, especially on the Junta, and especially by Ted Couloumbis, who stressed that Greeks should finally admit their own culpability for the Turkish invasion of Cyprus. In the audience was Brady Kiesling, the man in the US Embassy in Athens who resigned over the Iraq war. He'll be coming to Dartmouth in November. He said he learned Greek from our book. Very good keynote talk by Nikos Alivizatos on what, if anything, Greece can contribute to the EU. His answer was that Greece, more than any other EU country, has been growing and changing according in part to EU directives, for example in the treatment of minorities. It can therefore teach others in the community that a nation can comply and conform without losing its own identity and integrity. . . . Long talk at the reception with Peter Allen, who says that some of the Greek AFS trustees, e.g. Yannis Vezyroglou, are thinking of a merger of AFS with Anatolia College. If this happened, perhaps Anatolia could take over our Lyceum, relieving us of that function. . . . Long talk also with Elina Tsalikoglou, daughter of Iakovos and Ersi. She's at Oxford working under Peter Mackridge on nineteenth-century satires based on Lucian. At lunch, went with Chrysanthi to the Royal Ontario Museum, which turned out to have dinosaurs, etc. and not to interest us. Had a sandwich there and walked back to the hotel through the lovely University of Toronto campus, stopping at one of the libraries.

October 18, 2003

Liz Kamphausen joined us for breakfast. She spoke openly about the rupture with Smith, simply announced by the latter. There is no further communication between them. Liz is trying to find her way, perhaps via a degree in counseling and a future private practice combined with teaching in a Quaker day school (I mentioned Friends Select, of course). She'll be getting Canadian citizenship but actually hopes to return to the USA. Naturally I told her all the gossip about Pendle Hill: Rebecca, Steve, Deborah, what happened with the Doug Gwyn book proposal, etc. Liz would like to continue on the Books Subcommittee and also to serve on the PH board at some point. Lovely to see this old friend. . . . Listened to Elina Tsalikoglou's presentation. She is poised, speaks perfect (British) English, can ad lib at the podium. . . . Then I performed with Mike Keeley and Peter Allen in a session discussing Mike's book "Inventing Paradise." . . . Yesterday also saw Mike Antonakes and caught up with his news and family doings. They have six grandchildren. . . . To the Ontario Museum for the banquet. Sat at the same table with Brady Kiesling, who was informative on US government snafus regarding Iraq and so-called weapons of mass destruction. The speaker was the Greek ambassador to Canada, who told about his adventures as ambassador to Armenia, including some amusing airplane rides.

October 19, 2003

Toronto

Breakfast with Dimitris Tziovas, who would like me to lecture in Birmingham preferably in late February or early March. Also Margaret Kenna, who is still so excited about her research concerning political refugees on Anaphli. . . . Then MGSA Executive Committee. Chief problem: replacing John Iatrides as Executive Director. No solution so far. No action on my proposal to shift the endowment to TIAA-CREF.

October 22, 2003

Met with Mike Burton et al. at UPNE. He says that Theano's work is unprofessional because of low-resolution scanning making captions fuzzy. Also that she didn't follow copyediting specs. Etc., etc. They proposed doing a "pilot edition" with all the defects rather than trying to correct them. And the Workbook, which no one ordered done except Gondicas, is "over-produced." They haven't paid her fee. I'll need to check everything again, and they implore me not to involve Dimitri at all. How? Tasos has done the sample CD; it's in the mail. UPNE will not pay for it, so we authors will need to raise 6200 euros. Also, the Press will not pay us royalties until 5000 copies are sold. Price for the text: $45.00. For the Workbook: $15.00. They haven't priced the CD yet. But the bottom line is that yes, they'll have a book ready for academic year 04-05.

I'll be teaching a seminar at Columbia from January through early May, the one I did on Kazantzakis at Harvard in 1983, to students who know Greek. How nice!

New York

Supper at the famous "21" with Jeff Murphy. "21" filled to capacity. Very fancy. Waiters in tuxedos, etc. Very pricey. Each entrée $42.00. A la carte $12 more for appetizers, more for coffee, etc. God knows how much our drinks and wine cost. Jeff has been using the restaurant for twenty years, mostly for clients. He said that tonight was his best-ever dinner here (meaning the conversation). He confided that he'd fallen in love with one of the younger lawyers but (luckily) his feelings were not reciprocated. Thus it's finished, and his marriage is intact. Teresa was never told. He inquired about prep schools for his son, who isn't doing well in a local Catholic school. His conservative politics continue; he supports Bush and Wolfowitz in eliminating Saddam Hussein, thinks the UN is ridiculous, laughs at the Democratic presidential hopefuls. He despairs about the Catholic Church, beset by several scandals in the Long Island diocese where he is, resulting in significant drop in contributions to the parishes. . . . He marvels at his law office, overlooking the bay, Statue of Liberty, as before, but the other window overlooking ground zero (the former Trade Center), which is eerie—a huge hole. . . . Actually, my meal (veal schnitzel) wasn't all that special, but the company was lovely. . . . Then, back at the Yale Club, I discovered that John Rassias was there, and spent an hour with him talking about his trip to France, and then about the vicissitudes of Greek Today.

October 24, 2003

New York

Post-Secondary Committee with Crunkilton, Mike Keeley, and David Acker. The usual; no feeling that Perrotis should expand to three or four years. Need to wait for elections to see if Nea Demokratia is elected and if they'll recognize private universities. Plenary session concerning the proposal for Resident Trustees to meet regularly with David. Fear of divisiveness, although their spokesman, Kostas Kravvas, denied this. Annie whispered that she had been αντιπολίτευση in all this. Some of us worried and objected, so Alex asked Thomas, Kostas, Annie, and myself to draft a response, which we did later. This was read in another plenary session and approved. Annie and I, the only "Secondary" members present, drafted our report for tomorrow. Gondicas, the chair, is absent again. . . . Annie agreed to travel with me to see Kendal at Longwood next March. . . . Afterwards, a much needed Bloody Mary at the Yale Club. Then to Daphne's. Peter is walking (sort of), Christina is playing some one-handed tunes on the piano, and likes her lessons. Andrew is doing well at St. David's, including speech-wise. Greg's office may move across the river; he'll travel by ferry. . . . Then to AVRA restaurant on East 48th for dinner with trustees. Nice to talk with an employee who grew up in Astoria and went to Bryant High School, as did Bill Tsacalis's wife.

October 25, 2003

New York

The response to the Greek trustees that Tom, David, Kosta, and I drafted yesterday got deconstructed completely at today's full board meeting, chiefly because Mike Keeley felt that any re-affirmation of the unity of the board would be misinterpreted by Resident Trustees as an expression of distrust. In the discussion, which became rather heated, I wished that he had been in a Quaker context and I could have called for silence. In the vote, I abstained. Most of the meeting worried about the strategic plan, or lack thereof. We are going to devote all of the March meeting to brainstorming. There was no executive session, no talk of shortening David's term. Alex was kept as chair. . . . So it goes. . . . Afterwards, I went down to Prince Street in the Village, swarming with people, and up to the 10th floor in a building to Sam Israel's gallery to see the exhibit devoted to the Clintons. Many funny, evocative cartoons, paintings, photos, including a painting with Bill as Tarzan and Hillary as Jane. . . . Then to Carnegie to the new hall dug out beneath Carnegie to hear a recital of John Cage's piano pieces on a "prepared piano," complete with subway rumble (expected) and voice-over from someone in the hall upstairs (unexpected). The music pretentious and mostly (not always) boring. But a sort of experience, I suppose. The audience (about 1/3 full) applauded vociferously at the end. . . . Then to Patelson's for some more four-hand music: Mendelssohn, Beethoven's 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th symphonies. . . . Super at the Oyster Bar (of course). . . . Then to the Mint Theatre, like Sam Israel's gallery tucked away on an upper story of a building, to see Schnitzler's Das Weite Land, translated as "Far and Wide." Boring at first, just talk, no humor (until Act 3), no acting except sitting down, standing up, crossing legs, uncrossing legs. But it got better and by the end was recognizable as a study of dysfunctional human beings—upper middle class all with divorces, affairs, boredom, liaisons, gossip, no one really happy. . . . The Thomases were there. Nice. We compared our degree of boredom.

October 26, 2003

New York

Breakfast again with John Rassias, looking very tired. His workshop ends at midday today. On Friday Mr. Stephens from the cruise was also having breakfast; nice to see him again. . . . To the Met to see the El Greco exhibit. I've never been so moved and astonished by paintings. Truly, as the commentators state, El Greco liberates the soul of his bodies, the essential character of his portraits. And what colors! What movement and passion! A great experience. I purchased a poster of his "View of Toledo" for our Kendal corridor wall. And how special to see two icons indisputably done by Θεοτοκόπουλος while he was still in Crete. The elongated figures, the non-representationality, the lack of depth-perspective of later paintings all started here in the icon style. Of course when he went to Venice he deliberately assimilated Western style, including perspective, but gradually returned somewhat to Byzantine elements. Of great interest were the indications of how influenced Picasso, even Manet, were by El Greco.

November 12, 2003

New York

Supper at the Yale Club with Constance Tagopoulos. Then we went to the Foundation for Hellenic Culture for a program MC'd by Karen Van Dyck presenting three Greek writers and their translators: Zyranna Zatieli translated beautifully by Peter Constantine, Yorgos Skambardonis translated by Karen Emmerich, and Petros Tatsopoulos with a translation read by Karen (but not by her). All prose, too long, a bit tedious. Poetry is much better for such presentations, as we discovered at the MGSA symposium at Georgetown in 2001. Nice to see Peter, Karen Van Dyck, Karen Emmerich, and others including Katie Myrivili. I urged them all to go to the El Greco exhibit. The Greeks enthused about New York. One of them said he doesn't feel Greek, and indeed all the works were not "Greek" in any clear fashion. People nowadays, at least in Europe and North America, are so similar. I've always felt that differences in class are greater than differences in ethnicity.

November 13, 2003

New York

A very full day. No. 7 train to Flushing, but I got out at 46th Street and walked down 47th past what used to be my father's office (now a private dwelling) to the stores on Skillman Avenue—still a grocery of sorts, still a drug store, but now a store with Turkish provisions, a Romanian restaurant, a Greek pizza place (on 48th the barbershop is still in the same place). Homes and the gardens are unchanged but look rather shabby and untended. The Nursery School is still there in the same place. Our home, 3902 47th Street, is outwardly unchanged and seems cared for. The private garden in back of each house seems to me now much smaller than I remember it. The trees in the communal garden and along the street, sycamores, are of course much larger. I returned via 48th Street, where the Davidoffs' house on the corner seems unchanged. Faces along the street: Chinese, Latino, and . . . who knows? Then back on the no. 7 to Flushing; bus to Queens College; some xeroxing in the library, on the way to which one views the Manhattan skyscrapers with clarity. People here watched in amazed horror as the twin towers were struck and collapsed on 9–11. . . . Then to Constance's office. Introduced to Classics Department chair and other faculty, all of whom came to my lecture on a Nietzschean interpretation of Zorba the Greek. The room was full—lots of students. The dean, the department chair. Very nice. It went well. Good questions afterwards. Then lunch in the Faculty Club. And Constance drove me all the way back to the Yale Club. Twenty minutes later I was on Fifth and 51st in the studios of Greek Satellite Television for an interview. The interviewer, Nancy, grew up in the village next to Terpni and Nigrita. We ranged all over the lot, half in Greek, half in English. It was pre-recorded, not live, so the times when I blew my nose will be edited out. They broadcast across the entire USA, also to Australia and Canada. . . . Then no. 7 train again to Queensboro Plaza, change to W to Astoria, 30th Avenue, and walk to the Archdiocesan Community Center nearby for my second lecture: Kazantzakis in Athens 1944–46 engaged in the active life. In the audience: Skipitaris, the actor, who told me that Apostolidis's 6200 euro fee is no bargain, but not grossly overpriced. Lots of interesting people in the audience and lots of good questions afterwards. Luckily regarding the Δεκεμβριανά I was able to tell them, thanks to what John Iatrides said in Toronto, that all this history needs now to be rewritten because of the recent availability of various archival sources. . . . To the "Kendro Byzantium" with Constance, on 31st Street, all the waiters and waitresses speaking Greek, ditto for the customers. We ordered Greek τoστ but it was just a grilled cheese sandwich à la America. Back at the Yale Club at 11:30 p.m., watched André Agassi's tennis match a bit.

November 14, 2003

Philadelphia–Princeton

Up at 6:45. ACELA to Philadelphia. Avis car to Providence Meeting house to interview Deborah Haines for the dean's job and to tell Steve Baumgartner about "Religions for Peace," which I learned about thanks to Jerry Davidoff. Denni is on the board, as is Tsakopoulos and his daughter Eleni. But not a single Quaker. Steve said he knows about the group, has actually met Denni, and is in touch with her successor as head of the Unitarians. . . . Deborah Haines is a viable candidate. I especially liked the fact that she has a Ph.D. (in history) and has produced some research. But she also apparently is a good organizer. We'll see. Laura Melly surprisingly did not interview well, Steve said. Spann, "his" candidate, did very well. She's an African-American female, so has a great advantage. Jack and Ruth Hunter worked with her at Oakwood and praise her. . . . Long talk at Pendle Hill lunch with Bob McCoy, who expects to get $100,000 for the Cary book. But no recruitment yet of Rebecca's successor owing to some roadblocks placed by Barb Parsons. I'll speak to her. Also saw Bartholomew, who, I fear, expects me to help subsidize his children's college education in the USA! . . . Drove to Princeton and went to Firestone immediately, hoping to find the old volumes of Nea Estia I need to complete some documentation in a chapter of my volume 2. But all the Nea Estias are in storage and take three days to be delivered. So, no luck. I'll try Harvard. Then met Brady Kiesling at the Nassau Inn and sat for 1½ hours with him over a beer, talking about Dartmouth, the Dickey Center, Peace Studies, his forthcoming lecture at Dartmouth, and then especially the American Farm School. I explained its problems and the need for a new president. I wondered if he is persona non grata with the State Department and the diplomats in Greece but he said he is a great friend of the new Consul in Thessaloniki and with most in the embassy, although Ambassador Miller is mad at him. In any case, what we need is a good manager, and that is precisely what he does not want to do. So we talked about trusteeship. This would interest him. However, since we don't get reimbursed for service, airfare, etc., he couldn't manage now. Perhaps in the future when he has a source of income. He already has good ideas for the school, for example to develop a training program for Albanians and Pomaks to care for the elderly in farm villages. I told him about my Kendal "insanity"; he seemed interested especially since Greeks tend now to have only one child and since the demographics indicate an aging population. Perhaps some day he'll join us. He assures me that he won't forget his Greek.

November 25, 2003

North Potomac

To Washington via AMTRAK. Leander and children met us at the Metro station, Rockville. To a fancy diner for supper. Long good talk with Leander afterwards.

November 26, 2003

Alec and family arrived. To Vietnamese restaurant for lunch of Po (noodle soup). . . . Visited oldest oak tree, huge and symmetrical. Practiced Chopin and Townsend. Leander played Townsend with me and was very helpful. Visited Sophia's and Nikos's school, which is rich and impressive, filled with computers.

November 27, 2003, Thanksgiving

Everyone to our hotel for breakfast. Even Elena cherishes scrambled eggs and bacon. Macy Parade on the TV. The other night Sophia and Niko jumped and jumped on their two beds, screaming with delight, until the neighbor emerged to complain. . . . Turkey dinner with all the trimmings. Afterwards Leander gave me good pointers on how to practice the Chopin etude but warned against performing it at Kinhaven: too difficult. We'll see. . . . Drove to a sort of park/boardwalk/lake—to walk off the meal. . . . Alec noted that he had applied for a job in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, but wasn't shortlisted. Obviously he seems ready to go back overseas if an opportunity arises. He's in touch with John Magagna à propos.

November 28, 2003

Everyone to the hotel again for breakfast. Then Chrysanthi and I to Rockville Metro, Union Station, AMTRAK to Springfield; car home. On the train I listened to Madame Butterfly and shortened my Kapodistrias lecture for April.

December 1, 2003

Hanover-Amherst

Examined two students at U-Mass, Amherst. One truly remarkable, a linguist already in five languages. . . . On e-mail, a message from Dick Jackson, president of Anatolia, to say that Anatolia alums have spoken to him of the need for a sort of Kendal institution there. Thus, the way might open for my crazy dream to be realized via a collaboration between the Farm School and Anatolia. Very encouraging.

December 2, 2003

Philadelphia, Lumberton

To Dan's. Practiced Thomson again but did not record it. Needs lots of work. Started Satie, which became familiar, gradually. His group got "trounced" in the elections. The Republicans are back in control of Lumberton.

December 3, 2003

Pendle Hill

Dean Search meeting. We left two finalists: Spann and the Jacobsens. Eliminated Paul Razor and Laura Melly but want to keep them as interim possibilities if one of the others doesn't materialize. . . . Read and vetted Darren Middleton's good chapter on the theology of The Last Temptation. Long talk with Gay Berger over lunch. Kendal on Hudson now has its steel framework. . . . Flew to Frankfort.

December 4, 2003

Frankfort–Athens

On the flight to Athens I sat next to a young Greek woman doing a Ph.D. in papyrology in Germany. She asked about Margaret Alexiou and was interested in learning about George Thomson. I queried her about care of the elderly and explained the CCRC idea. She was most encouraging, saying that many families are at their wits' end over care of the aging. The children cannot, or do not want to, have the aged in their home. Typically, the children hire caregivers, usually Filipinos, to "solve" the problem, obviously without solving it. . . . Arrived at 7:00 p.m., checked in at Hotel Achilleas, much improved from its old state, and met Theano in the lobby of the Athens Plaza Hotel. She finished correcting Workbook 1–6; we'll check everything tomorrow. Walked along Οδός Νίκης to Don Nielsen's favorite restaurant, where he was waiting. Then had a relaxed two-hour meal, more conversation than food. Theano, too, encouraged me in the CCRC idea, saying that the old ways no longer work in Greece. Don, thanks to my intervention, will be traveling to the Farm School next week to talk about biotourism and ecotourism. Good luck! I brought him $80 worth of painkilling pills to quiet the throbs in his thigh. I also brought two more Kazantzakis quotes, much appreciated, for his fortune cookie project. Zero jet lag, really. Slept at 11:45 p.m.

December 5, 2003

Athens, Hotel Achilleas

Took €200 out of my bank account. Then to Panepistimiou 11, the Αθηναϊκή Λέσχη, a fancy 8-story club, for meeting with the group trying to create a bibliography of Greek journal articles, chaired by Kathy Vanderpool. Nice to meet the directors of the American School, Gennadion Library, National Library, National Documentation Center, Μακεδονικών Σπουδών, etc. We got through the agenda quite well. MGSA will be one of the collaborators. Then lunch in the rooftop restaurant, with all the bigwigs of the Onassis Foundation, including Papademetriou, at the next table. . . . Metro to Μέγαρον Μουσικής and from there to Μιχαλακοπούλου 93 to visit Theano. We went over every page of Workbook 1–6, checking each and every required correction. Good we did this, because several had not been corrected satisfactorily. Theano will mail everything to me on Tuesday. . . . In times of waiting at airports, I'm revising my Kazantzakis and Renan essay for Darren Middleton, adjusting it to conform to the required house style of the publisher.

December 6, 2003

Iraklio, Hotel Galaxy

Last night, on arriving around 9:00 p.m., I was told to go to a meeting of the group, already assembled. Introductions, all around. Lovely to see Alf Vincent again. Then we were all taken out for a late supper. Bed at 12:30 a.m. This morning, nice breakfast with Benjamin Hendricks, a Belgian resident in South Africa, with a Greek wife. Talked about Mandela and the miracle of their bloodless revolution. Then we were all loaded into a bus and driven to Μυρτιά (Βαρβάροι) for the symposium, held in an auditorium next to the Kazantzakis Museum. Each one of the nine speakers spoke about Kazantzakis in his or her nation: Lucille Brando for Brazil, Jelena Novaković for Yugoslavia, with amazingly good Greek, Alf Vincent for Australia, Ahmed Etman for Egypt, Hendricks, Jan-Henri Swahn for Sweden, Zurab Vacheishvili for Georgia, Li Chenggui for China. Fascinating. This went on until around 4:00 p.m., preceded by 8 or 9 introductory greetings from the mayor, βουλευτής, etc. Then a big meal with χωριανούς. Back at the hotel, I was picked up by Stelios and Ava and taken to their lovely home. Stelios is now president of this, president of that, a founder of Forth. Ava is doing beautiful paintings and will soon have a huge children-friendly installation in the new Natural History Museum. Daughter Eleni was there, looking very pretty. She graduated UVM in Art History, spent a year in Florence, and now thinks she wants to get an MBA. Of course at 11:00 p.m. she left for a night on the town. Coq au vin for supper, cooked by έναν Γιώργο who seems to have some relationship there. Stelios makes his own wine from his vineyards. Quite a lovely life.

December 7, 2003

Iraklio-Varvari

Back to the village. Tour of the Museum. The inevitable video produced by Patroclos Stavrou, better than the one I saw many years ago. New books, including collections of letters. Then each of us spoke again: Brando on Kazantzakis's Odyssey and Joyce's Ulysses, Novaković on Zorba, I on Ένα όνειρο που έγινε εφιάλτης: ο Καζαντζακης αφηνει το γράψιμο ύστερα απ' την Απελευθέρωση και μπλέκεται στην πρακτική ζωή της Αθήνας, 1944–46 (Stelios and Ava came to hear this), Alf on the Kalomiris and Martinu operas, Etman on how the Arabs preserved Greek texts, Henricks on Κωνσταντίνος Παλαιολόγος, Swahn on Börje Knös and the Nobel Prize, Vacheishvili on Christian monasticism in Ο Χρίστος ξανασταυρώνεται, and Li on Πώς αποκάλυψα και μελέτησα τον Ζορμπά. This last was the most moving, for Mr. Li, a jolly soul, related how he had been sent by the Mao government to Albania to learn Greek, how in the Cultural Revolution he was luckier than most because instead of being sent to the fields he was sent to a harbor to deal with Greek shipping, and how a Greek ship brought some books, all of which were meant to be seized and burned by the authorities because evidently tainted by capitalism, and how he convinced a soldier to allow him to retain Zorba, and how, reading it, he was struck by the hero's free mind, his rejection of authority, of all the horrors then prevalent in China. He resolved to translate the book and did, after many years' work. But Patroclos Stavrou refused him permission to publish! Somehow, publication now seems possible. At the end, he presented the Chinese manuscript of the translation to the Museum. . . . Then we were all presented with gifts: heavy books (!), a medallion with Kazantzakis's head engraved, two bottles of wine and one of oil, raki, thyme. More speeches, especially by the mayor, and by Alf suggesting that we hold a symposium every two years at the Museum. Also appreciation of how marvelously Kazantzakis's worldwide influence was indicated by the presence of these nine non-Greek individuals from five continents, all speaking Greek. Then, of course, another meal. . . . One of the audience, a woman of about 30 who approached me yesterday to express her appreciation of my books (as did many others) became a good friend. When she asked me yesterday when my volume 2 would be ready and I then asked her to wish me good health, she burst into tears and confessed that she has a health problem. She has a chapter in one of the books I now have, and hopes to receive a critique from me. . . . Back in Iraklio at the hotel, Stassinakis actually paid my total travel and hotel expenses in cash, and Vacheishvili invited me to come to Tiflis to lecture there (in Greek). I spoke to him, and also to Jalena Novaković, about possibly requesting some of my books; they're both in need. I'll send them catalogues. . . . Stelios and Ava picked me up at the hotel again, hoping to go to a nice place for some μεζεδάκια, but everything was closed on Sunday, so we had a very bad pizza at the airport, accompanied by good conversation. They foresee real difficulties with a Kendal in Greece. The rich will employ multiple caregivers and won't want to leave their homes; the others will not be able to afford a Kendal. The most likely residents might be foreigners who want to retire to Greece, but then Thessaloniki is not the best location—too cold and not directly on the water. . . . In Athens I went across the street to the Sofitel Hotel, very expensive (€245) and fancy. I was upgraded to the Executive Suite, even fancier. Slept from 11:30 p.m. until 4:00 a.m. on Monday morning, in order to catch a 5:55 a.m. Lufthansa flight to Frankfurt.

December 23–26, 2003 South Salem, Hayloft Motel, 914 763-5410
 At Daphne's for Christmas. Celebrated Chrysanthi's birthday on December 24. I gave her a portfolio volume on "I Love Lucy." Most others gave her jam—very appropriate. Leander was supposed to arrive on the 24th but Deanna was in bed throwing up, so they never left Maryland. Greg has basically had no serious buyer for the Riparius property, one huge defect being the 2nd parcel of forest for which there is no access. He thinks now to donate it to the Nature Conservancy and get a tax write-off. . . . Alec is fed up with Rose at Friends Select and is actively looking for another job. Too bad, because they'll miss Philadelphia.

December 29, 2003 Riparius
 I drove over to see Alec and Leander at Terpni. The new bridge is finished in Riparius. The old one was blown up and then its pieces retrieved from the river. Both families are cozy in their well-heated cabins. Alec is now determined to leave Friends Select mostly because of inability to respect or work with Rose, the head of school. He is looking domestically, but also in Singapore, Hong Kong, Kuala Lumpur. We haven't heard anything more about a possible opening at the Pinewood School in Thessaloniki.

December 31, 2003
 Snails with the Rassiases, as always. Vasilopita with two quarters for Athos's two children.

Supper at Dick's with Roger Soderberg and the Brauns. Very nostalgic about old times at Dartmouth. . . . I've been learning and practicing a Scarlatti sonata to play on the harpsichord later this month. But the harpsichord is so limited. No dynamics are possible, no pedal. Leander gave me a lesson last Monday on his digital keyboard at the farm, emphasizing articulation (staccato, legato, portamento).

January 6, 2004

Pendle Hill

Last night, immediately after arrival, I went to play piano, found someone playing and suggested duets. She's Tricia, from Perth, Australia, and a very good sight-reader. We did Schubert Ländler, the Virgil Thompson waltz, and some of the Satie. Then came epilogue conducted by her husband, Roger, reading a poem by Rilke, followed by worship sharing as we do in our Quaker 8s. . . . This morning at breakfast I sat by accident with the Jacobsens, here to be interviewed for the dean's job. He's a Dartmouth grad and she was a dean at Dartmouth. The interview went very well. I'll be happy to see them here. But on Thursday we'll interview the other candidate: Spann. . . . Steve has hired Joey Rodger to head the Peace Network. She starts in August. . . . On the train yesterday, despite very rough tracks between WRJ and Springfield, I finished the first draft of my translation into Greek of my lecture on Kapodistrias. Now it needs to be corrected and shortened. Also read Κωμωδία (brilliant) and early essays—Η αρρώστεια του αιώνας, Η επιστήμη εχρεωκόπησε;—and began Ξημερώνει. Kazantzakis was extraordinarily precocious. All of these were done in his twenties.

January 7, 2004

Princeton

Worked all day with Dimitri. Numerous changes in lessons 7–12. Will I be able to enter them? Lunch at Prospect talking about strategies for MGSA: maybe Drexel for the next symposium, or a smaller affair. I'd like it to have a definite theme, perhaps Greece and the EU. Saw Mike at the βασιλόπητα party. Almost $1,000,000 was embezzled from the Farm School. He is meeting with the Finance Committee on Friday. Alex Drapos is paralyzed, more or less, and should resign. Phil Foote is willing to chair the board but not until October. . . . Returned at 9:27; epilogue at 9:30. Then did four-hand duets with Tricia: Schubert and Virgil Thomson (which she has learned beautifully), then Satie, which I still cannot play accurately.

January 8, 2004

Pendle Hill

Interview with Spann; very engaging. She was at Oberlin Conservatory when Leander was there, and taught at Friends Select. We'll have a difficult time choosing tomorrow. Off to visit Alec and family for supper. Read lengthy books to Theo and of course Elena wanted her turn—her favorite books, about zebras. When Alec returned we telephoned John Magagna, whom I had last seen in Jakarta in 1990. He might help in the AFS search for a new head. He has already placed a head in Greece, in the Athens community school. Alec will be going to his job fair in Boston in February; he is determined to leave Friends Select, alas. We also telephoned two long-term staff at Friends Select to ask about Spann, and both responded very positively. . . . Back to Pendle Hill at around 10:30 p.m. Played piano until 11:30: Scarlatti and Satie. Read some of Stylianos's theology in bed until 12:15 a.m.

January 9, 2004

Pendle Hill–Lumberton

Long meeting of the Search Committee. Mickey all for the Jacobsens; Steve all for Niyonu Spann. Carol, Steve, and I are less doctrinaire, although I favored Niyonu throughout but repeated that I'd be satisfied with the Jacobsens. Steve argued strongly for the presence of an Afro-American not only in her own right but also because of others she would presumably attract. We ended favoring her provided a dinner with her partner went well. . . . Off with relief to Dan's. We still haven't brought the Satie up to the level where it can be recorded, but it's getting better. Nice supper in . . . Friendly's (of course). Our "recreational" sight-reading was Beethoven's quartet opus 132. Amazing! One needs to play these marvels, not just to hear them, in order to appreciate the complexity.

January 11, 2004

Kendal

Our harpsichord concert. Large audience. I did my Scarlatti sonata. Nervous, but no disasters. People seemed to like it. I saw Sandy Sanderson clapping vigorously.

January 12, 2004

John Hennessey presented an interesting case at our professors' colloquium: Vermont Law School's policy of prohibiting government recruiters because of the army's position regarding gay soldiers. Should this be upheld or not? The policy prohibits Vermont Law School from receiving federal funds. Those attending, although divided, voted to keep the policy. I said that the school was better off without government funds and the compromises they inevitably entail.

January 13, 2004

Saw Dr. Allen again. It's OK to continue with Lipitor.

January 14, 2004

Long lunch with Ron Edsforth, who feels he is being made redundant at Dartmouth. Mastanduno has appointed Al Stam to teach Ron's course next year, without consulting the War/Peace Steering Committee. Students are rallying for Ron, as are certain faculty. . . . Music with Allan again, back from New Zealand. We were very rusty on the Debussy.

January 15, 2004

Lunch with Anthony Bramauto, a student who says his life was changed by Ron's course and who will write a long piece on War/Peace Studies for a student newspaper. I filled him in with some of the history: Bakers, Elise, Leonard. . . . Supper with Felitsa Makedon and Otmar Foelsche, at Kendal. She is fat and egocentric.

January 17, 2004

Cambridge

Lunch with Dia and Wim, very pleasant. Then to A.R.T. for a fine production of A Midsummer Night's Dream directed by Martha Clarke, with Tom Derrah very funny as Bottom. Angelo flew all over the stage on cables. But Puck, instead of being an angelic youth, looked like a bum who had just slept on the Bowery. Strange.

January 18, 2004

My turn to do the monthly Interfaith Gathering at Kendal, on the Greek Orthodox Church. I used recordings of the liturgy in English (done by Stylianos's group in Australia) and the Gospel and Χριστός ανέστη in Greek. Spoke about the filioque and also about icons, showing some icon-like portraits by El Greco. People seemed pleased; one commented that what I did was "churchly," which of course was my purpose.

January 19, 2004

Another meeting of the Pendle Hill Dean Search Committee, with me on the telephone. Chris and Mickey now definitely for Jacobsens owing to bad vibes from the dinner with Niyonu and partner. Carol leaning that way. Steve still utterly opposed, and arguing eloquently for "affirmative action." After about 1½ hours of discussion we veered again to Niyonu. I'm not even sure how that happened. Now Steve needs to discuss salary, etc. to see if she'll accept.

January 20, 2004

To NYC

Off to NYC on AMTRAK. Met Burt Pike at the Pearl Theatre, St. Mark's Place, and saw a superb production of Aeschylus's Persians directed by Shepard Sobel. They did the chorus especially well—with masks, and a general feeling of "an added dimension." Of course the most amazing part is Aeschylus's willingness, after the great Greek victory at Salamis, to write about the defeated rather than the victors. Xerxes is portrayed as an inexperienced, arrogant youth filled with hubris, yet even he is seen with compassion. . . . Where is our dramatist to write "The Iraqiad"? . . . Afterwards, a leisurely supper with Burt at Mitali on 6th Street, a fine Indian restaurant. He has embarked on a somewhat new career as a translator. Nice to see someone my own age who is equally active, and also a survivor of prostate cancer.

Wednesday, January 21, 2004

NYC

Worked in the Yale Club library on my translation of Ο πρωτομάστορας, which I hope to finish in time for the Columbia class. Then with Chrysanthi to Columbia. Met with Jerrie Visco, the department administrator. Her office a total mess, piled high with miscellaneous papers. But she has her wits about her and was able to locate what was needed to get me paid the miserable $800 I'll be earning for this course (less deductions, of course). I received a key to an office with three desks and three occupants. I'll have ½ of one of the desks. Also an ID card. And the secretary is going to prepare xeroxes for tomorrow. Then to Butler Library to visit two pleasant librarians regarding my reserve book shelf. Then back to Hamilton Hall to see Karen Van Dyck, who showed us a photo of her Leander, aged 3. She told me the sad news that Vangelis Calotychos has been refused his appeal at NYU. . . . Back to the Yale Club for supper in the new grill on the 3rd floor. Then to the library to hear a liberal journalist decry all the misrepresentations by the conservative media. Interesting for such anti-Bush sentiments to attract a large, appreciative audience at the Yale Club. . . . Then to Lincoln Center for the NYC ballet, part of the festival celebrating 100 years since Balanchine's birth. They did "Chopiniana" choreographed by Fokine because this and other Fokine ballets convinced Balanchine, while still in Russia, to do ballets without a story. Next came Harlequinade, in two acts, first performed in 1965, very rich, with colorful costumes, children's choruses, and exquisite dancing by Yvonne Borree, and a huge cast. Balanchine at his most extravagant.

Thursday, January 22, 2004

NYC

More translation of Ο πρωτομάστορας. Then to Columbia for the first meeting of my class. About 14 students, more than expected: 2 men, all the rest girls, including Karen Emmerich. I had everyone introduce him/herself and say why they were interested in the course, whether they read Greek, etc. I described my own very long apprenticeship to Kazantzakis. Then we did a bench reading of Comedy. We'll see how many return next week. Spoke to my office-mate and emptied the three drawers that will be mine in half a desk. . . . To Lincoln Center for a very special evening of ballet. “Apollo” done magnificently by Hübbe, Yvonne Borree again, Somogyi, and Rutherford. Surely the purest, most delicate of the Stravinsky/Balanchine collaborations. So moving! Done first in Paris for Diaghilev in 1928, premiered here in 1951. Next: “Serenade” (Tchaikovsky), Balanchine’s first ballet after his arrival in New York, premiered in 1935, choreographed originally for his students at the School of American Ballet. Mostly formations of girls in long dresses. Finally, “Prodigal Son” with Peter Boal and with Darci Kistler as the Siren. Magnificent. Prokofiev music, of course. Totally different exhibition of Balanchine’s genius. And tonight they celebrated his 100th birthday by giving everyone in the theater a drink of vodka and a piece of birthday cake. On stage, Peter Martins drank a toast to Mr. B., while the entire company assembled in front of a huge photo of Mr. B. dancing. And dozens of balloons descended from the balcony. Lovely!

Friday, January 23, 2004

Pendle Hill

Early train to Philadelphia. Books Committee with McCoy, Densmore, Stratton. We are developing a strategy to go forward with a new history to supplement Tom Hamm’s. Then Pubs Committee with Tricia and Roger Walmsley plus a student and one of the young activists—no regular members. We accepted the essay on eldery and rejected the one purportedly on Bosnia. Then Bob and I interviewed two candidates for the part-time editor’s job, Donna McDaniel and Cassie somebody. We chose Donna. . . . After supper: trustees. Executive session at the end, without Steve. Agonized discussion of his misuse of the Search Committee, browbeating Mickey regarding the necessity to hire Niyonu instead of the Jacobsens, etc. He and we should have considered the committee advisory, allowing him to disregard its recommendation, but he needed the committee to acquiesce to his choice. We finished at 11:00 p.m.

Saturday, January 24, 2004

More board. I’m the recorder, an exhausting job, but at least it seems to be appreciated. Earlier, very good Meeting for Worship, with John Calder ministering beautifully about the children in Camden whose lives are so dismal and no Jesus to come to heal them. And a visitor was the Nobel laureate for peace from Belfast, who had addressed the forum on Thursday. She was given the lovely going-away song with everyone gathered in a circle. And she came into the board meeting and shook all our hands. We finished at nearly 3:00. I drove to Dan's. We're getting better on the Satie. Also did Thomson, and Beethoven's next to last quartet as "recreational" music after supper at Friendly's—the whole piece. Dan will be leaving on February 16 for a year in San Francisco heading the AFSC office there—a mess, he says. And his airport situation in Lumberton is also a mess, threatening to decrease the value of his home. But at least for a year he'll have extra income from AFSC. So, no more piano enjoyment until he returns in the winter of 2005.

January 27, 2004

I voted for Kerry, Chrysanthi for Dean. Kerry won; Dean came in second. Nice Quaker 8s at Anne Baird's with everyone present: Biens, Cadwalladers, Foestels, Pettingill, and Dr. Don. The quotation was on valuing this life.

Wednesday, January 28, 2004

Played eight-hand piano with Joan Wilson, Co Emlen, Barbara Rice: Bach's 3rd Brandenburg, Smetana, and some junk.

Thursday, January 29, 2004

NYC

To Columbia. Very good class. I worried beforehand, but there was no need. Then to ballet, an extraordinary "Swan Lake" choreographed chiefly by Peter Martins. Daniel Ulbricht spectacular as the jester, Jennie Somogyi as Odette/Odile. A feast of bravura dancing.

Friday, January 30, 2004

To Karen's office in the morning for the first meeting regarding her search for (a) an assistant professor, (b) a one-year replacement while she is on leave next year. Calotychos has applied, and Gourgouris, and even Karanika, not to mention Martha Klironomos and others. I have to read dossiers next week. . . . Received a strong letter from Richard Abel at UPNE saying "No more changes" and that I had submitted 1600 since August, when the "completed" manuscript was delivered. Let's see what happens with Dimitri tomorrow.

February 6, 2004

To St. David's School at 9:30 a.m. to read a pirate story to Andrew's class. He introduced me to the class as "My Pappou. He likes chocolate." . . . Good class again yesterday. Better than Princeton because the students are older and have much more experience. . . . Read job dossiers for Karen. I hope that she will offer the job to Calotychos, whose appeal has failed at NYU.

February 9, 2004

Supper with Ned Perrin and Sarah and Nardi Champion. Ned has put his home up for sale. Very sad. This winter the pipes froze and at one point they had no heating oil. He wants to come to Kendal, without Sarah. Three- to five-year wait for an apartment. I spoke to H el ene and Karen: the best chance is assisted living, maybe in less than a year. . . . Learned that Thomas Laaspere cannot stand, is in hospital, and Suzanne has cancer and will be undergoing chemotherapy. What a shame that all these people aren't in Kendal. We are so privileged.

February 10, 2004

Met with four members of the War/Peace Steering Committee to prepare our meeting with Mastanduno. We want the Steering Committee's primacy to be recognized and Ron Edsforth to be restored the core course. . . . Lunch with Irene Kacandes. The Modern Greek course is no longer one of the prerequisites for Greek foreign study. She nevertheless hopes to teach it well, and with rigor, attracting students not necessarily going on the foreign study trip. . . . Brenda Marder, just back from Greece, had a wonderful experience talking about her book at various venues. But David and Patti Buck are despondent, and the Greek trustees are antagonistic. In any case, both the English and Greek editions of the book are here, on time, and well done. . . . Alec went to the Magagna job fair and apparently has secured a new job in the Bangkok Patana School in Thailand, a British international school. He and family will fly there shortly to complete the arrangements. So . . .

February 12, 2004

Class on Ασκητική. And the Greek group meeting beforehand is going to translate Καποδίστριας collectively. To ballet afterwards: Balanchine's "Jewels," part 2, to Stravinsky's music, was scintillating. Parts 1 and 3 less so, but 3, "Diamonds," has interesting formations by the entire troupe. Miranda Weese and Nikolaj H ubbe were grand in part 2, "Rubies."

Friday, February 13, 2004

An interesting day. To Columbia early. Interviewed by a reporter for the National Herald, half-Greek, who told me that his grandfather was an αντάρτης in the Civil War. Then with Karen and Debbie to choose a short-list for the two jobs, which we did, including Calotychos. . . . Then to Wall Street for a long, warm lunch with Selen Ünsel at an expensive restaurant. She's flourishing and is now a mother. Her parents come frequently; we'll try to see each other soon. Talked about the need for a Kendal-type facility in Greece and also in Turkey. . . . Then to ΤΙΑΑ-CREF for a long discussion about transferring MGSA's endowment there with an officer who dreams of going to Greece. Supper at the Yale Club. Then to 51st Street for a lecture by Kitroeff on the Olympics. Saw Mrs. Myrivili shortly before her departure. . . . Bus to Princeton. Arrived 10:10 p.m.

February 19, 2004

Emerging into NYC at Penn Station is always "different" after the cold whiteness of New Hampshire. Today there was a full Dixieland jazz band blasting away in the station, with a marvelous black pianist, a Chinese marimba-player, and a colossal trumpeter. . . . I had another good class, this time on Toda-Raba, which most of the students rightfully considered rather defective. The two hours go amazingly quickly. Then to Lincoln Center to meet Chrysanthi (here at Daphne's for a few days) and to see King Lear starring Christopher Plummer, directed by Jonathan Miller. The best Lear in my experience since Devlin's at Harvard in 1949. All the American actors spoke their lines with British expertise.

February 26, 2004

NYC

"Sleeping Beauty" at the ballet, beautifully danced by Ashley Boudier as Princess Aurora and Damian Woetzel as Prince Désiré, with Merrill Ashley, a surprise, as the wicked fairy Carabosse. Woetzel is amazingly suave. A treat! . . . Yesterday, Book Committee at Pendle Hill, with very little agreement about sponsoring a new history of twentieth-century Quakerism to balance Tom Hamm's discouraging one.

March 4, 2004

Good class on Zorba. Then Rentzou's talk on Greek surrealism, very professional. Supper with Karen, Rentzou, and Karen's husband, but rushed off to meet Darren Middleton at his hotel. He was in for the Jesus Seminar. His book on The Last Temptation is progressing. He'll be Crete in April.

March 5, 2004

Farm School committees and then plenary session for three hours discussing whether David should stay through June or leave immediately. This in executive session, of course. We favored June, thankfully. He assured me that he'll do his job scrupulously to the end. . . . Trustee dinner at Thalassa Restaurant on Franklin Street to honor Brenda for the book. Her children were present. I spoke first about publishing vicissitudes, Shawcraw's photos, Randy's work. Brenda spoke very well. Toasts, applause.

March 6, 2004

Full board, with Greek trustees via telephone. They want David gone tomorrow, but we opted for June. Bedjian, a new Greek trustee, present in New York, argued strongly for the crisis needing immediate solution, good manager, etc. I tried to mollify him. He could be a candidate for the presidency, but his behavior today is a good indication for us to beware. I don't think he ever listened to anyone else. . . . Home at 10:00 p.m. to learn that Barbara Rice, age 88, is about to be married to Bill Wilson, aged 93. And our Anthology was here, well done, indeed a handsome book.

March 8, 2004

Last week, and today, I've been putting in final corrections for Greek Today, working at the Press (they won't let the MS leave the premises for fear it will get into Dimitri's hands). Some of Theano's errors will remain, alas. . . . The CD arrived from Tasos Apostolidis, and is fine. The Press is now excited as publication becomes a reality. . . . Practiced a Loeillet sonata with Joan Wilson and Madith Hamilton, I playing the harpsichord. Also tried my two Goldberg variations on the harpsichord, with meager success.

March 10, 2004

NYC

Went to New York on Wednesday this week in order to hear Vangelis Calotychos's presentation, which was excellent. Followed by a long dinner.

March 11, 2004

After class, Koutrianou's presentation, which put me to sleep. Then to the Met, late of course, to hear "L'Italiano in Algeri" (Rossini). I finished out the first act in the theater, watching on TV, second act in the hall. An opera full of fluff and nonsense, a jeu d'esprit, performed with lots of verve and humor.

March 12, 2004

Met Karen and Debbie Steiner at Columbia to choose the winner, and of course it was Calotychos, which pleased me greatly.

March 13, 2004

Fancy supper with Allan and Claire Munck at the Quechee Club, my payment for reciting poetry there. Very pleasant, especially because on the house.

March 15, 2004

Trying to get Ned Perrin into Kendal. Sarah is desperate and cannot cope. He put the house on the market, sadly. No luck here. But something may open up in Whittier (Alzheimer's unit) in a few months.

March 16, 2004

Margery Walker is leading the effort to hold some sessions on Quakerism. I'll lead off on the subject of silence, to be followed by Gordon Browne on everything else. . . . In the evening Hanover Monthly Meeting Finance Committee reviewed my draft budget for FY 05. The level for contributions is up a few thousand, alas. But we can give $20,000 toward the mortgage, saving lots of interest over the next 14 years.

March 17, 2004

Played Bach adagios with Joan Wilson. They really don't sound very good on the recorder. Dick's flute is better. Oboe would be even better. . . . To Care Meeting for Mother. I reported Dr. McKinley's feeling that Mother is depressed and angry. They didn't think so, but they'll have a geriatric psychologist look at her. Sometimes she looks like a corpse, staring expressionless.

March 19, 2004

Otmar has found a young Japanese woman, Yukari Itsuki, to do the website for Greek Today. We met today, and I'll see her again on Monday. She wants to start work immediately. . . . Karen Lester, the admissions assistant, is leaving Kendal after 13 years' service. I said a sad farewell to her. She's been the salvation of the admissions office.

March 20, 2004

Cambridge

Harold Pinter's The Birthday Party at the A.R.T., vigorously acted by Will Le Bow as Goldberg, Remo A. as McCann, Karen MacDonald as Meg, and Tom Derrah as Stanley. The discussion afterwards confirmed what everyone felt: that one is not meant to understand what is happening and why. Indeterminacy rules.

March 21, 2004

Very good Meeting today with heartfelt ministry. Then I rushed back to Kendal to attend J. C. Colton's interfaith service, this time on his personal view of Catholicism. It seems that there are very few Catholics here, maybe fewer than two dozen. Strange. . . . Alec and family are now in Bangkok to see the school where he'll be working next year. Daphne is on vacation with family in Jamaica, Bahamas. Leander declared that he and Deanna will play a recital at Kendal on April 2, 2005.

I ministered last week about the Hubble Telescope out in space. It has delivered a photo of one small patch of sky that is seen to contain 10,000 galaxies, each with millions of stars and numerous suns and planetary systems, just like our Milky Way. And all this is so far away that the light recorded by the telescope took fifteen billion years to arrive, traveling at 186,000 miles per second. Thus what is seen is not too far from the "big bang" that created it all. This discovery should confirm to all of us our utter insignificance in the cosmic scheme. It makes human greed, power-hunger, and violence all the more nonsensical. Instead, we should marvel every morning at the mere fact that we exist in a world that can be both beautiful and comfortable (at least for some of us).

March 23, 2004

Went to Woodstock to have lunch with Pano Rodis, the old friend whom I haven't seen for several years. He is remarried, with a third child by the second wife. The girls are amazingly 16 and 14 now; I remember them as toddlers. He is no longer connected with the Education Department or indeed with Dartmouth. He trained as a clinical psychologist specializing in childhood and adolescence, and has a thriving practice. . . . The same night, John and Mary Rassias came for supper, which Chrysanthi cooked, so we ate in the apartment. John brought a video dedicated to the former archbishop, Spyridon, which I found disgustingly egotistic with its shouts of ἄξιος, ἄξιος. He's trying to develop a foundation that will aid Greek education, but his views are excessively chauvinistic; he sounds almost like the “Citizen” in Joyce’s Cyclops episode—every element in secular and sacred civilization derived from Greece! . . . Listened to several more recordings of the Goldberg Variations, including Glen Gould’s. Anything goes, it seems. Tempi vary exceedingly from artist to artist, as does articulation (use of staccato, legato, etc.). I perform my two variations at the run-through on Saturday, then at the concert on Sunday. . . . Visited Lee Huntington in Hanover Terrace Nursing Home, where my father died. Horrible place. What a difference at Kendal! She, poor thing, broke ribs in a fall. She won’t be able to live in her house in the future, so, just like Ned Perrin, she’s stuck. We are so lucky to be in Kendal. . . . Visited my mother. She was in bed, but awake with eyes wide open. No response. She seemed just like a corpse. . . . Alec sent an e-mail from Bangkok. They like the school very much. Their home will be right next door, within walking distance. He was about to go to visit the US ambassador, arranged by Ken Yalowitz at my request.

NYC

Fakazis and Peter Constantine met me at the Yale Club and drove to Astoria to the Cosmos FM studios for an interview on the new Anthology, with Karen and Mike on the telephone. I read “31 B.C. in Alexandria” in Greek and English. Then to Columbia for the class on Christ Recrucified. The Greek novelist in the class said it wasn’t his cup of tea. . . . To the Met for Madame Butterfly. So moving. A real tear-jerker. Beautifully sung by a Chinese soprano, Liping Zhang, as Cio-Cio San, making her Met debut. Thunderous, prolonged applause at the end.

March 26, 2004

NYC

To 22nd Street and 9th Avenue to visit Izzy Ganz in an apartment she has kept in New York. Long breakfast together. She knows and has performed with Joseph Kubera, doing Cage. She’ll urge him to respond to me regarding Kendal. Also, she could come in May 2005 with a pianist to do a show of Gershwin and other musical comedy songs, re-arranged. That would be marvelous. She’s a successful survivor of breast cancer as I am of prostate cancer. How nice! She’s performing on Sunday across from the street where she grew up. . . . Then lunch with Michael Groden, in NYC for six weeks to teach a course on Ulysses at the YMHA. He says they’d like to invite me again to the Dartmouth Club of Toronto. His Joyce archive has been stymied by Steven Joyce, who considers Michael an “enemy.” I told him about Patroclos Stavrou, à propos. Michael is going to receive an honorary degree in Dublin on Bloom’s Day.

March 28, 2004

I performed Goldberg Variations #s 19 & 22, preceded by some remarks about the Urtext, which has no tempi, no dynamics, no phrasing marked, no articulation. Thus full interpretation is left to the performer. And the various recordings I’ve heard are totally different in tempo, etc.

March 29, 2004

Two hour War/Peace meeting still stewing about what happened to Ron Edsforth. Ross Virginia came up with a good idea toward the end, and he and I will try to draft a statement. Our hope is that the College can somehow offer Ron another course, or a section of Social Science 1, as opposed to trying to restore him to our core course.

April 1, 2004

NYC

Surprising class, because everyone liked Fratricides. Registered students described ideas for term papers. One wants to write a series of poems. . . . To the Met for Rigoletto, beautifully sung by Olga Makarina as Gilda. Sad, but fortunately not a tear-jerker like Madame Butterfly last week.

April 2, 2004

NYC

Long lunch at the Yale Club with Constance Tagopoulos. John Rassias hoped that I’d convince her to join with him in the Spyridon effort, but she views this as futile and hopes that John himself will abandon Spyridon. Later, I conveyed this view to John, who vows not to change. I told him that I could no longer support him and withdrew from the committee. Apparently the Patriarch has announced that he will defrock Spyridon if he persists in these efforts.

April 5, 2004

With Otmar Foelsche, sent our proposal to Peter Patrikis for funding of the website. Yukari Itsuki has begun work already. . . . Back at Kendal, I spoke on the nature of silence at the first of a series of meetings to acquaint people with Quakerism.

April 8, 2004

NYC

After class, met Jeff Murphy at Four Seasons, another frightfully expensive restaurant. Poor man, he earned $1,000,000 last year, but is lonely and bored at work. And he commutes four hours a day. I'm trying to interest him in Kendal.

April 10, 2004

Piano practice all day today and also last night, with Alice, perfecting our four Townsend pieces for the Kinhaven workshop. We made considerable progress. The pieces are brilliant. Also, for two hours, attended the celebration honoring Richard Eberhart on his 100th birthday: children, grandchildren, neighbors, friends. I read three poems at the start, and then ended the event by reading "The goal of intellectual man / Striving to do what he can / To bring down out of uncreated light / Illumination to our night . . ." How nice that we celebrated the arts in this way, as we did in NYC for Balanchine's 100th a few months ago!

April 14, 2004

NYC

To Martha Graham ballet at the City Center, filled with memories of our many nights ca. 1956–60 watching Balanchine's ballet. Graham style is so different. Long skirts, jerky movements, political innuendoes, preponderance of women. Tonight's program: "Satyric Festival Song," short, for a single dancer. Then "The Owl and the Pussycat," which is whimsical. Then "Cave of the Heart," which begins and ends with dancing to silence, à la Cage, I suppose. Good music by Samuel Barber. Finally "Chronicle": anti-war, all women in black. Interesting, but everything lacked the Balanchine magic.

April 15, 2004

NYC

The class was very moved by The Last Temptation. Again, good discussion. The two hours go so quickly, so easily.

April 16, 2004

Pendle Hill

Again, Pubs did not select any of the pamphlets submitted. And we have no more waiting to be judged. No submissions—strangely. Is this just a quirk, or is there a reason? We are mystified. Some good additions to the committee, especially Jim Rosen, the man who voluntarily is putting all the out-of-print pamphlets on the web.

April 17, 2004

Pendle Hill

The first meeting of the new Communications Committee, clerked well by Kenneth Sutton (he managed to keep me quiet). Bob McCoy stunned me by declaring that in the new governance system the Pubs Committee is only advisory to him; he can act as he pleases. Tom Corl came in and confided that this is true. I was close to announcing my resignation, convinced that this is a sabotage (wished by Steve B., of course) of Quaker process. Afterwards, however, Bob pledged that little would change. Obviously he won't veto or override the committee unless something awful happens. I informed everyone of the lack of new submissions for pamphlets and of all future prospects for books. . . . In the short trustees' meeting, Steve announced that Denny O'Brien had overlooked some $200,000 that will swell the deficit. Denny tendered his resignation, which Steve refused to accept. I pleased everyone when I compared this to the Farm School's embezzlement of almost $1,000,000. . . . Yesterday in Meeting I ministered on the 10,000 galaxies discovered by the Hubble telescope and the extraordinary meaning this should have for all of us.

April 18, 2004

Pendle Hill, Crosslands

Practiced Townsend a bit. Much work still needed. Drove to Crosslands with Tony Manousos, who was scheduled to interview Yuki in connection with his book on the Brintons. I spoke to the Crossland Quakers on the Hubble telescope and Epictetus and Kierkegaard's three stages, an approach to a philosophy of living and dying. Lots of questions afterwards. Margaret Hope Bacon was my host, and I even got an (unexpected) honorarium of $100. . . . Then to Philadelphia for supper with Alec and family. Lots of books read to the children. Talk mostly about the forthcoming job in Bangkok, storage of belongings at Daphne's and the farm, and Alec's final chore to have a will drafted. I urged him to get some life insurance as well. . . . Chrysanthi telephoned, very worried, as expected, by my flight tomorrow.

April 19, 2004

Pendle Hill—flight to Frankfurt

Unexpected meeting with Rebecca Mays at Pendle Hill and long talk after lunch. She's still trying to return to Pendle Hill in some capacity, and so far has failed to land another job. She explained that the change I experienced in the Communications Committee was precisely what caused the break between her and Steve, he insisting that the Pubs Committee be merely advisory and she refusing to accept that owing to her continued faith in Quaker corporate process. She has good ideas for putting some oomph back into the pamphlet undertaking. But will Steve allow her to return? Doubtful. They have an appointment on Wednesday.

To Athens, Hotel Akropolis House,

April 20, 2004

Kodrou 6, 210 32.22.344

Even on the bus from the airport my cell phone rang: Ritsa. We'll meet tomorrow. Then on the subway it rang again: Christos. We'll meet at the hotel in half an hour. So, hardly settled as I was in this old-fashioned hotel that costs only 50 euros a night (with breakfast), Christos arrived and we had a good chance to talk. But then Don Nielsen arrived with his girlfriend Lia. He took me to a tiny restaurant run by a Frenchman. Communal tables (like those in the Deerfield Inn). Excellent non-Greek food. Lots of good talk. Among other things I discovered that Don has a long acquaintance with Manny Stefanakis, the newly elected president of the American Farm School, plus a relationship with his wife. He says we did very well. He also works with Ambassador Miller's wife and hopes, through her, to get invited to the AFS dinner at the embassy on June 25. I hope he'll help me with my Kendal scheme. Lia, although at first saying Greeks don't do it that way, came round quickly to agreeing.

April 21, 2004

Athens

A very full day. To the Ίδρυμα Ουράνη, only to discover, of course, that they don't write checks (why didn't they tell me this before?) but rather send money by cable. They need the name of the bank, tracking number, etc. I telephoned UPNE later, got the information, and will return to Ouranis tomorrow. To the Benaki Museum to say hello to Angelos Delivorrias, the director, friend from Princeton. He wasn't there. I left a long note and then proceeded to photograph many of the portraits in the museum, although I fear that the reflected flash will ruin many of the photos. . . . To Monastiraki. Deposited 750 euros in the bank, added μονάδες to my cell phone, visited Christos in his office. He has a computer there, so luckily I was able to check e-mail. Filitsa asked me to write a reference for Popi, her daughter, which I did in Christos's office and then mailed. Δολμαδάκια with Christos in a fine old-fashioned restaurant on Stadiou. At 5:00 Ritsa came. We talked for 1½ hours very freely and easily, then walked a bit in the Plaka to show me where the children's museum is. After 8:00 Iakovos Tsalicoglou came with Ersi. We went to a tavern in the Plaka called Platania, which used to be the haunt of Katsimbalis, Seferis, and many other literary lights; their names are displayed in the upstairs room, and there's a nice photo of Katsimbalis and Seferis and Leigh Fermor. Don Nielsen came, too, plus several other Dartmouth grads: an interesting man, class of '52 but much older since he skipped many years; Stephanakis (?), who invited me once to Minneapolis, where, he remembered, I read Ritsos's "Moonlight Sonata." Plus another whom I remembered slightly. A very fine evening, until midnight.

April 22, 2004

Athens-Iraklio

Breakfast at the hotel with a nice American couple I met yesterday. Then back to the Ouranis Foundation with all the numbers they need to wire the money. Lots of talk with the two women there, Καραθάνου and one other. . . . Then to Θεανώ, who gave me various materials for realia. She no longer has the commission to do the new Acropolis Museum; the award was made illegally, she admitted. She's waiting anxiously to see the finished Greek Today. Stopped at the Μέγαρο Μουσικής to get a brochure that might be useful for realia. (I've been photographing everything of interest I see.) Then to Patroclos Stavrou way way up on Harilaou Trikoupi. He talked non-stop for 1¾ hours about the Cyprus mess, how good he was to Eleni Kazantzaki, how horribly both Anemoyannis and Stassinakis have behaved toward him, cursing him, accusing him of nefarious motives, etc., about the Selected Letters (I explained and tried to justify the delay), about Mrs. Kazantzakis's letter of permission that no longer has validity, he claimed. But he insisted that he would issue his own permission. I said I hoped to complete Politics of the Spirit, volume 2 in three years. Then come the letters. Finally he had photos taken of him and me, with and without his assistant in the shop. The rooms he showed me next to the shop are chaotic. Piles and piles of Kazantzakis's publications and manuscripts lying on the floor. Huge boxes from Geneva still unopened. He said that he hopes to undo the Varvari Museum, claiming that Anemoyannis has the best materials in his house and never gave them to the museum. What a mess! Finally in the street as I was departing he said he hoped I would say some words of appreciation regarding him when I speak tomorrow at the symposium.

Θα δούμε . . . In Iraklio, Ava met me at the airport (how nice) and drove me home. Stelios very open about his cancer, which seems very serious: a large tumor pressing on the liver. But it has responded well, so far, to chemotherapy. It started, apparently, in his knee, which was operated on some years ago. But obviously something remained, and traveled. He's in good spirits, working normally, and optimistic. But . . . ! Local bus to Rethymno, arriving after 11:00 p.m. We're housed in Το Σπίτι της Ευρώπης, owned by the university. Luckily, I was placed in a ground floor room to which the deafening music of the bar next door did not penetrate. Το Σπίτι is opposite the entrance to the μικρό λιμάνι, the Venetian harbor. The sea is out front. Lovely.

April 23, 2004

Rethymno

I spent most of the morning, after a leisurely interval talking with a colleague from Moscow and his wife, searching for the post office, which allowed me to walk through a good part of the city center, swarming with tourists, very picturesque. Mailed various presents given me, including a beautiful album of photographs from one of the Dartmouth grads. The symposium, very much part of the πολιτιστική Ολυμπιάδα, began at 7:00 p.m. in the Οδείον Ρεθύμνου, actually a Venetian building with beautiful vaulted ceilings, which became a mosque and is now a cultural center. After tons of "greetings," one of which was by the eloquent mayor of Varvari, whom I remembered, of course, and who greeted me effusively later, Stylianos Alexiou opened the proceedings, noting at first that Galatea Alexiou was his aunt and that of course he had met Kazantzakis. He is somewhat infirm (maybe had a stroke) but still fully lucid. I followed with my talk on Kazantzakis's play Καποδίστριας. He and I, as keynote speakers, were given 30 minutes instead of 20. Then the whole gang went next door to the museum, which had an exhibit on the Kazantzakis-Prevelakis friendship, with lots of photos, manuscripts, etc.

April 24, 2004

Rethymno

By bus to the new university campus at Γάλλος. A full day of talks, with lunch in the faculty cafeteria and a siesta in the hotel. In the evening a full meal in a village, very festive, followed by four young musicians, including a vivacious priest, singing traditional Cretan songs: lyra, guitar, drum. Beautiful young waitress. I sat between Roddy Beaton and a professor from Ghent who discovered that Kazantzakis plagiarized his Ph.D. dissertation on Nietzsche from French sources. Across the table, a gentleman from Χανιά whom I met when we had the symposium there and who wrote the προσωπογραφία του Καπετάν Μιχάλη that I have. Excellent talk earlier by Αγγέλα Καστρινάκη on the anti-nationalism of Zorba, very much like my “mellowed nationalism,” which I’ll send her. We had a comfortable talk at dinner. She’s very feminist, of course. Home at 12:30 a.m. but thankfully the café music, which apparently continued until 5:00 a.m., didn’t penetrate my room.

April 25, 2004

Rethymno–Iraklio–Athens

More talks in the morning, including by Έρη Σταυροπούλου, Π. Ροϊλός, and Δημηρούλης, who was especially good. Then Δημήτρης Γουνελάς and I went by taxi to the bus station and by bus to Iraklio, but I, having been in touch with Stelios and Ava, got off a bit before the town and was promptly met. Again to their home, with a friend from Paris. Time to check e-mail. (An Athenian newspaper wants to interview me; it will have to be by telephone on Tuesday.) My spiel again (earlier to Gounelas, now to the Parisian friend) about Kendal; apparently there are no CCRCs in France. They all see the need. Sweet Ava drove me to the airport, and we parted, wishing that Stelios’s cancer will subside and not return. Μακάρι! . . . Stelios got me a discount at the Sofitel, 198 euros instead of 245. Very comfortable and obviously much better than going all the way to town and returning at 5:00 a.m. . . . In the airport, and everywhere, I took photos for the website with the digital camera lent me by Otmar—several hundred. Many, I fear, will be unacceptable because I used flash when I shouldn’t have. . . . Throughout the symposium, speaker after speaker referred to my writings on Kazantzakis, usually to agree, sometimes mildly to disagree. I seem to be considered by all (including Patroclos Stavrou) to be the leading Kazantzakis scholar. Lots of people said they are eagerly awaiting volume 2 of Politics of the Spirit. Will I ever finish it? Judging by the pace achieved this year, it will take a quarter-century and I’ll be 105 years old. I told Stavrou three years. Then the Selected Letters. Unlikely.

April 26, 2004

Athens–Munich–Philadelphia–Manchester–Hanover

What a trip! I started in Athens airport at 6:30 a.m. Arrived in Hanover at 12:00 midnight. Total: 24½ hours.

April 29, 2004

A disappointing class, because two of the three students meant to report conked out, leaving only Joanna, who did well. This leaves six for next week—too many. But afterwards I was happy to go to a talk before the ballet, by Hanna, a new soloist, who described his training (he came to NYC at age 12), his thrill at being elevated to soloist status, etc. This was held in the “Rose Building” next to Juilliard. Nice to see the rehearsal rooms for ballet, to meet two young aspirants, and to see scores of other young folks pursuing ballet and other arts. The program began with “Walpurgisnacht,” which had nothing to do with the title but was all serenity and grace. Then came “Liebeslieder Waltzer,” the only Balanchine ballet that ever bored me. The dancers were too fully dressed to be attractive, and Brahms’s interesting four-hand piano music was spoiled by the four singers who drowned it out. But the final ballet, “Symphony in C,” was delicious, both soloists and corps performing the accustomed Balanchine miracles.

April 30, 2004

AMTRAK delayed three hours. My return took nine hours. Dan and Penny Southard (from the Alumni cruise last May) visited and joined us for supper at Kendal followed by a tour.

May 3, 2004.

A long two-hour lunch with Steve Scher, who looks very old and is walking with a cane and has balance problems. Next week he is going to have surgery: an artificial hip. But he is still excited about opera, music, and literature.

May 5, 2004

A long day. Up at 5:30 a.m. Drove to Amherst for Greek exams: one rather poor student, another brilliant, hoping to do a Ph.D. in linguistics, already learning Chinese and Swedish besides Greek—an easy “A.” . . . Then to NYC. Yale Club supper. Then ballet at 7:30. Another Balanchine gala, complete with vodka toast. The idea was to present all the elements of his talent. Thus Plácido Domingo sang, Wynton Marsalis played Gershwin on the trumpet, players from the Philharmonic performed as did singers from the NYC opera. Very interesting were numerous film clips in which Balanchine spoke, or Balanchine and Stravinsky kidded around. And of course there were dances: “Harlequinade” done by children of the School of American Ballet, "Dance Concertante" done by my favorites, Yvonne Boree and Peter Boal, "Brahms-Schoenberg Quartet," the gypsy rondo done spectacularly (of course) by Damian Woetzel and Wendy Whelan, an excerpt (thankfully) from "Liebeslieder Waltzes," which I again found boring, the 2nd movement of "Concerto Barocco" danced beautifully by Maria Kowroski, "The Man I Love" with Nilas Martins, and then the Rosenkavalier finale from "Vienna Waltzes," spectacular with the stage filled with beautiful women in long silk dresses, all white, waltzing merrily. A treat!

May 6, 2004

New York City

To Daphne's. Heard more about the imbroglio concerning their Riparius house. With luck they can buy out the purchaser, who threatens to sue them. What a shame! In any case, Daphne advises us to remove anything we desire this weekend, including the canoe. . . . To Patelson's to buy Schubert sonatas. I listed to Dino Lupu playing two of them yesterday and want to try. . . . To Columbia for lunch with Karen Van Dyck. Next year the Columbia program will have Mazower, Calotychos, Gourgouris. Splendid! She asked if my students now know more about how to approach a work of literature. She needs to ask them. We never did anything in class expanding critical techniques, but of course I gave them many examples of my own writing, which perhaps can serve as models. . . . Class had 4 of the 6 meant to present their papers today, which meant that we did get through with everything by 6:00 p.m. The presentations were really quite fine, and included a series of poems by a nice man, an actor, who is a bibliophile and brought for my signature first editions of the Kazantzakis novels, my Politics of the Spirit, and even my L. P. Hartley. . . . To the ballet again. First a talk about Balanchine's extraordinary authority among the dancers; then about individual works. These works, all by Austrian composers, show the huge diversity of Balanchine's styles: Mozart's Divertimento no. 5 with the girls in tutus, traditional; then Episodes, music by Webern, dancers in leotards and tights, very abstract; the finale, based on Bach, being the best, both musically and as danced by Kowroski and Askagard. Finally, and amazingly, the complete Vienna Waltzes, all five; as always, a bravura performance.

May 7, 2004

New York City–Hanover

Up early to get to Andrew's school, St. David's, at 8:15 a.m., walking along Park Avenue, watching all the little rich kids being brought to school, in order to read a story to the class, this time about a mosquito. The children remembered that last time I read a pirate story. Andrew introduced me again as “chocolate man.” Then some more strolling on Madison Avenue before arriving at Marymount at 9:30 a.m. for grandparents’ day. Auditorium filled. The 1st, 2nd, and 3rd grade girls, all in identical uniforms, marched to the stage and then sang beautifully, with excellent enunciation, so that every word could be understood, many fun songs and many about conserving water, which is the school’s project at the moment. The conductor is a young girl obviously well trained. Some choice remarks after a “peace song” about how appropriate that is today. The head of school, Sister Fagan, spoke nicely about family values and the importance of the extended family. Then to Christina’s 2nd grade classroom to see her writing—little stories she composed—, some drawings, etc. Next, she led us to the science room to see what they’d been doing regarding worms and larvae and moths. A lovely experience. . . . Brunch at the Yale Club. AMTRAK, late as usual, back to Springfield. We had planned to drive to the farm but it was too late, so we headed back to Hanover. I was fine, but just two miles from home, ascending West Wheelock Street, I fell asleep and swerved to the right, hitting the curb and slashing the tire. A policeman pulled up and called AAA. So, finally the spare was affixed and we got home at midnight. Fortunately I didn’t hit anyone else! Also, it didn’t happen somewhere on Interstate 91, where we would have been out of touch, since in addition my cell phone’s battery was exhausted. So, all’s well.

May 8–9, 2004

Riparius

Arrived at 1:00 p.m. Greg and Alec already at work at Daphne’s emptying things and making trips to the dump. We transferred much to Terpni: aluminum canoe, tools, a large crowbar, tiller, etc. I started the White mower, tilled the garden for potatoes and string beans, started the John Deere, nailed our “Stop” sign back on to its tree, fertilized all the fruit trees, propped up a garden fence-post.

May 10, 2004

Spoke to the Professors’ Colloquium at Kendal on the Fall of Constantinople. Learned that Patrikis’s consortium denied our application for $4000 for the website. What to do now? Tested 3 New Orleans students via telephone.

May 13, 2004

Washington

To DC by plane, leaving at 6:15 a.m. Taxi to Georgetown University, now very familiar. Luckily, Jim Alatis was in his office, together with Ai-Hui Tan—so nice to see her again. He was the perfect host, introducing me to Κυρία Πασιά, the teacher sent by the Greek government, who prepared students to read poems at our presentation. Then a comfortable lunch with him in the Faculty Club in the Leavey Center. I kept accessing my e-mail to see if Ioanna M. had sent her essay. Nothing. Nor has it arrived by post to Hanover. Found an empty classroom and worked several hours entering financial data in my Assets file. Then soup and apple pie in the Faculty Club. At 6:30 p.m. we gathered in the ICS auditorium. Constance Tagopoulos, Peter Constantine, and Yannis Fakazis arrived, sweating after a six-hour car ride with no air conditioning, Constance walking with difficulty, using a cane. At 7:00, no audience. They arrive at “Greek time,” a half hour late. So we began. Jim introduced Constance, Constance introduced the two Peters. The students read in both Greek and English, not too badly. Then Peter and I responded to questions. I was able to read “31 BC in Alexandria” and to summarize my article on rhymed translation. But I never had a chance to do “The Moonlight Sonata” although I was fully prepared. Luckily, my former student at Harvard, Peter Forbes, came. We finished at 9:05. I called Deanna’s cell phone as pre-arranged, and Peter drove me in 10 minutes to the Kennedy Center. Good coordination. Sophia and Nikos of course stayed up. Hugs and kisses. Both played their piano pieces, very well. Both have perfect pitch. Then Nikos read aloud an entire Dr. Seuss book, “Green Eggs and Ham.” He’s a precocious reader. Lots of talk afterwards with Leander and Deanna about the Tebbe mess at the farm, and about Deanna’s forthcoming sabbatical. Last look at the computer to see if Ioanna had sent her essay. No. My grades are due tomorrow. To sleep at midnight.

May 14, 2004

Washington–Philadelphia

Up at 6:10 a.m. Leander drove me to the Rockville Metro station. AM-TRAK to Philadelphia. AVIS to Pendle Hill. Nice to see John Punshon again. Steve startled me by noting that he hopes to replace Bob McCoy (but also to help him find another job) with Paul Razor in charge of pamphlets, and perhaps to upgrade Donna. A manuscript edited by Donna still had lots of technical errors. Discouraging. Books are suspended for at least three years unless a Cary-type windfall occurs. In our board meeting and afterwards in the trustees' retreat, Will Stratton got hot under the collar, threatening to quit the board, etc., mostly because Tom Corl accused him of disrespect toward Steve. Steve spoke at length about the Peace Network and, as usual, requested our full support. After he left we discussed at length this method of his, to present something that he alone has concocted, without consulting us (like the scheme to replace McCoy with Paul Rasor), and then to solicit unswerving support or "ownership." I called it a red herring. Why "own" something that we have not helped to generate?

May 16, 2004

Pendle Hill–Hanover

On the last day of the retreat we said nice things to Gay Berger about her clerkship, which is now taken by Tom. I called it "rational." In the silent worship preceding our final session, I ministered using the French push-pull coffee pot as a metaphor. We put in the coffee (subject matter), then pour in boiling water (discussion, divergent viewpoints); all this churns around a bit; then we depress the piston, pushing the coffee grounds into quietness and stability (silent worship), and it's only then, after the cohesiveness of worship, that the coffee is ready to pour. . . . Stupidly, returning the Avis car, I left the keys, but together with them also all my own car keys. Will I ever get them back? . . . Twice I spoke to Wendelee O'Brien about Denny's mistake. We decided to restore the self-imposed salary drop of $10,000. She was so appreciative of the restoration but also of the openness, the chance to talk frankly about his chagrin.

May 17, 2004

Dan Connolly, our lawyer, came for a review of wills and trusts. Everything seems in order. And we probably won't be exposed to estate tax since the threshold is rising and our worth is falling.

May 18, 2004

Joe Mehling, the College Photographer, did some lovely portraits of me, prompted by Joan Williams's wish to do a sculptured bust working from photos. . . . To the Fleet Trust Department for a review of our finances, down to about $3,000,000, but more than enough to keep us comfortably at Kendal.

May 19, 2004

Met with Yukari, who is doing our website (no money from Patrikis, but Otmar has pledged $1500). She'll make a "gallery" from the photos I took in Athens and Rethymno.

May 21, 2004

Dickey Center lunch with a journalist back from six months in Iraq. He said that the New York Times never pressured him not to publish something.

May 22, 2004

Cambridge

To the A.R.T. for Oedipus, with Mike and Elaine Antonakes. John Campion, a splendid actor, played the lead. Stephanie Roth-Haberl was a beautiful, although perhaps overly frantic, Jacosta. Tom Derrah led the chorus, which recited in Greek (!) accompanied by supertitles, a brilliant ploy that allowed the chorus to sing and at the same time to be understood. All voices were enhanced electronically, which I found annoying and unnecessary. . . . Nice dinner afterwards on Mass Ave. with the Antonakides, who are busy and productive in retirement. Overnight at the Beacon Hill Friends House, a Bulfinch structure built in 1803, once very grand, now a mixture of grandeur and shabbiness. Lovely library, where I worked on the photos for our website.

May 23, 2004

Breakfast at a hotel to avoid the filthy kitchen at Beacon Friends. Then to Park Street Church (where I'd last been in 1949, with John Harvey, to hear Billy Graham). We witnessed a children's cantata on Nicodemus, followed by a rousing sermon preaching the need to be born again. Congregation repeatedly applauded the children. Disgusting. A performance rather than a liturgy. . . . Then Friends Meeting, a very lively young group. Kenneth Sutton was there, plus some Dartmouth grads. Ministry about gay marriage (of course). . . . To the Malliotis Center for another presentation of our Anthology, with Peter Constantine. So nice to see there the Metaxases, Dia, Eva, Lily, even Alex Drapos bringing Manny Stefanakis, the new president of the American Farm School, to meet me. I was able to read "The Moonlight Sonata" this time, plus Sikelianos's "Agraphon."

May 24, 2004

Chinese supper with the Nodas, Arnolds, Hunters, and Sydney Jarvis to celebrate her 80th birthday and my 74th. Also Roger Soderberg. . . . Earlier, met with Yukari Itsaki to do more on the Greek Today website, a new adventure for me. I've made "screen shots" (i.e. graphics) of pages with Greek text on the computer. These she can place directly into the site.

May 25, 2004.

Supper with the Mitchells, always interesting. Then to the Bairds' beautiful house in Lyme for Quaker 8s with the Feustels, Cadwalladers, and Judith Pettingell. Don Stacey absent, alas. They picked one of the slips I had placed in the basket. Epictetus. We had lots of fun with Stoicism and rationality

May 26, 2004

To UPNE to go over errors again in the Greek Today proofs. We're finishing . . . slowly. Tonight, music with Dick alone, Allan busy. Did the Prokofiev sonata and some more modern music.

May 27, 2004

Supper with the Nicholsons. She had asked me to recruit eight officiants for the Sunday interfaith services at Kendal next year. I was able to give her the list.

May 28, 2004

Happy Birthday from Chrysanthi and a present of two new shirts. Retirement luncheon at the Hanover Inn for David Montgomery with several of his former Ph.D. students eulogizing him fondly. Ag Pytte was at my table, and Roger Soderberg and Bill Doyle. David spoke well in response. The whole thing was very dignified. . . . In the evening I put on my tuxedo to go to Sanborn for the retirement dinner for Alan Gaylord and Jim Heffernan, which was less dignified because the testimonials were so exaggerated and because neither retiree responded very meaningfully, Heffernan doing a parody of Wordsworth. But it was nice to interact with former colleagues like Lou Renza and Peter Cosgrove (the Irishman).

May 29, 2004

Terpni

To the farm. Planted tomatoes, covered with Reemay against frost. Mowed. Set up my office.

June 1, 2004

Pendle Hill

Pubs meeting. Miraculously, we said Yes to two of the three submissions. Fewer and fewer manuscripts are arriving, perhaps because we no longer have Rebecca to cultivate authors. Played the Yamaha here last night. Today went to Janeal's exhibit resulting from her seven days in prison for civil disobedience. What degradation!

June 2, 2004

Another full day. To Otmar early concerning the website. Then Dickey lunch to select new War/Peace Fellows—a good panel of applicants, making me proud of Dartmouth. And, big surprise, Al Stam announced he'll be teaching his regular government department course, which means that Ron Edsforth will do the Introduction to Peace Studies after all—a final resolution for a problem that has plagued us all year. . . . Music with Dick and Allan at night. But news that Classicopia advertised that their June 4 concert at Kendal will be selling tickets at the door for $10 each. Against Kendal policy. Huntley Allison demanded that the concert be canceled, joined in this, alas, by Gordon Browne, president of the Residents Council. All my work organizing this, for nothing. Small-minded, legalistic people.

June 3, 2004

Marcia Colligan, Classicopia's manager, asked for a hearing. So she, Huntley, Gordon, Nancy Prosser, and I gathered. Marcia apologized, said it was just an error, and that it has been corrected (today's newspaper withdrew the $10 notice and Kendal performance). Nancy and I pleaded to let the concert occur. I spoke about the difference between act and intention. Here the intention was pure. Gordon's reaction: "Don't get intellectual." They wouldn't budge. A rule's a rule. So I returned the $500 check to Kendal. (Nancy and I agreed to pay $125 each out of our pockets, and later I gave them another $250.) I contacted three lawyers subsequently, all of whom said that we had broken a contract and that if Classicopia sued us we'd lose the case. Oh well . . . My first disagreeable experience at Kendal.

Saturday, June 5, 2004

I performed at Kendal: "Odysseus Across the Centuries." Full audience. Amazing that Kendal people come out even for poetry.

Sunday, June 6, 2004

Good Meeting this morning. Then pleasant lunch with the Nodas, and Kesaya and Chris Dye, who seem to be living together now. Very nice! In the afternoon I went to the Classicopia concert that we had canceled. This time at the Roth Center: a program of Jewish composers: Block, Milhaud, Kreisler, etc. Lots of verve and fun.

Thursday, June 10, 2004

Terpni-Kinhaven

Moved to Terpni on June 7th. Refrigerator doesn't work. Sears man came. Faulty compressor. More $$ to fix than to buy a new one. So today we went to Sears in Queensbury and ordered a replacement. Met Irv Shapiro at the Buick place where we went for an oil change. Arrived at Kinhaven in time for a delicious supper prepared by Sue. Lots of old friends have returned. Alice is here, having had a two-hour lesson with Douglas Townsend in New York. He gave her a cassette with one piece played in his arrangement for orchestra.

Friday, June 11, 2004

Lots of practice with Alice and alone. We're still quite unsteady on the Townsend. Lovely faculty four-hand recital with Leander doing some very interesting modern pieces by Robert Russell, playing with Nancy Breth, and then Mendelssohn's spectacular Andante and Allegro Brilliant, opus 92, playing with Chonghyo Shin. Mrs. Shin wants to play at Kendal in September. I'll try to arrange it.

Saturday, June 12, 2004

Very good coaching by Leander on the first Townsend piece: a world of difference just by observing details. In the afternoon, Nigel Coxe played a solo recital masterfully: Haydn sonata in C, Beethoven sonata, opus 26, and Liszt: Sonetto 104 del Petrarca, Waldesrauschen, Soirées de Vienne #6. He has total control: such marvelous pianos and pianissimos. The Haydn especially was exquisite; also the Liszt Soirées, based on Schubert, perfect for a Balanchine ballet. I asked Nigel if he'd repeat the program at Kendal and he said Yes. . . . Then at 7:15 we did our solo recital. I was first with Goldberg variations #s 22 and 19. I made new mistakes in places that never troubled me before, but kept going each time and did not make errors when I did the repeats. Lots of people afterwards said they appreciated the interpretations. Alice played very musically: Six Preludes by Paul Bowles. Steve Kline was ambitious: some Scriabin preludes. A new man, Victor Dyni, attacked the Brahms Capriccio in G and the Liszt Sonetto 104 del Petrarco like an intelligent gorilla. What a travesty, especially compared to Nigel's Liszt earlier. Bruno Repp played well, as always. Alma Rhodes did the famous Schumann "Aufschwung"; Charlotte Armstrong did a lovely Chopin nocturne, etc.

Sunday, June 13, 2004

Chrysanthi and I went to the Priory. No service because the brothers are on retreat. I bought a bookmark with a portrait of Dorothy Day on it. The monks are dedicated to peace. All war, the Pope has said, is a defeat for mankind. . . . I had a lesson with Chunghyo that didn't amount to much: basically a question of raising and lowering the wrist to get smoother sequence of notes. We enlisted Robin Williams to turn pages for us, a big help. Alice is still getting mixed up in some sections, and I'm still "cheating" here and there. . . . Nigel did a fine master class with Susan Alexander playing a Chopin nocturne and Margie Patterson the Chopin Ballade in F minor, which is extraordinary. In the evening, at wine and cheese, I had a long talk with Nigel about Kendal. Alas, he cannot come, even though he put in his $1000 and has been in touch repeatedly. The problem is Massachusetts, which has its own pension and health system (both inadequate) for State employees, which means that he doesn't have either Social Security or Medicare. Horrible! He sees no solution at the moment. Again, I realize how blessed we are to be in Kendal and able to afford it.

Monday, June 14, 2004

Practiced with Alice on the concert hall piano (Miss Mann's) at 6:00 a.m. and had a run-through with Robin turning pages. Lesson with Nigel at 9:00 a.m., very helpful. He wants us to make this lovely music less ponderous. After supper, splendid solo recital by Ignat Solzhenitsyn, a demanding program: Brahms' variations on a theme by Schumann, Webern's Variations, Beethoven's sonata opus. 7, plus a lovely Mozart rondo as an encore. Played with superlative technique wedded to sympathy and lovely musicianship. Nice to visit with him a bit at the reception.

Tuesday, June 15, 2004

Our day! Lots of good four-hand music, especially "Dolly" (Marty Starr and Judy Risch), Mendelssohn's "Andante and Variations" (spectacular: Addie Edelson and Alan Robinson), Smetana's "Moldau" (Margie Patterson and Robin Williams), Reger Waltzes (Michi Tashjian and Steve Kline, perfect for a Balanchine ballet), Bizet “Jeux d’enfants” (Alma Rhodes and Bruno Repp, including those I’ve tried to play), and of course Townsend’s “Four Fantasies on American Folksongs” (Peter Bien and Alice Buseck). Of course I made mistakes, some in places never troublesome before, but we covered them fairly well. The piece was very well received. . . . Back to Terpni. Leander arrived at 6:30 and we went to the Copperfield Inn for a nice dinner. Saw Jerry Gardner’s lovely daughter there. Talked about poor Nigel’s situation.

Wednesday, June 16, 2004

Albany–Philadelphia

To Albany after fetching a new wheelbarrow tire. Garage people most impressed that I’d had the old tire 52 years. Also got 60 Lipitor pills from the North Creek pharmacy. All set to go. Routine flights Albany-Philadelphia (met Charlotte Armstrong in the Albany airport’s McDonald’s). But Philadelphia stormy. Sat in the plane for three hours until the weather cleared. Happily in business class.

Thursday, June 17, 2004

Frankfort–Thessaloniki

Missed our connecting flight, of course. Booked for a 6:30 p.m. flight. Spent five hours in the United Air Club, very comfortably. Met at Thessaloniki airport (which is doubling in size) by George Koualizides. Our quarters in Cincinnati Hall are fine: a corner room with cross ventilation and a balcony on which I am now sitting. Gail Schoppert and Ruth are here. Also saw Patti Buck and told her how beautiful Vermont is now, to cheer her up. Our total trip took 28 hours door to door.

Friday, June 18, 2004

Vouli came for breakfast. Lots of talk about Farm School people and activities. David Buck came to greet us. Talked more about a possible Kendal here. He sees no problem with the incompatibility with Farm School mission, or indeed with the presumed lower income than from, say, a supermarket. Must convince Stavros Constantinidis. To town with Vouli and Chrysanthi to the κομμωτήριο and I to the bank and to Germanos for 36 more μονάδες for my κινητό τηλέφωνο. Saw Κυρά Στέλλα, now 96 years old and unable to walk. But quite sound in mind. She is looked after by a live-in woman from Romania. . . . Then to Kostas to pay our respects. He broke down repeatedly in sobs and tears recounting how Lola died. Nikos is very attentive, telephoning every midday and visiting every evening. And the eight-year-old Constantinos comes to watch soccer with his Παππού. But Kostas's life now must be very lonely and perhaps desperate. What a shame that the rest of the family never warmed up to him. Back to Vouli's for lunch in a restaurant; tasteless. Taxi to AFS and siesta. I wanted to check my e-mail, but the library is closed until Monday. The whole place seems deserted. . . . David and Patti came again. Christine Willis came to say hello and to repeat that Pinewood would be looking for a head for 2005–06. Peter Baiter is leaving finally. There may be an interim head for one year. More interchange with Gail and Ruth Schoppert. . . . Finally Anthoula (Toula) arrived, after getting lost and going to the wrong “farm school.” She seems very strong, not at all devastated by Stavros's death. They moved the Odeon further down the same street, also shifted their residence to the large house built in what seemed to me the edge of the city. This, plus Stavros's sudden death, kept her on her toes. She still dreams of a summer music camp at the property in Χαλκιδική. She wants to come to America in July, to see Kinvhaven in action. Μακάρι ! Έτσι, αντί να δούμε μια ταλαιπωρημένη, κουρασμένη, απελπισμένη γυναίκα, είδαμε κάποια που γεμάτη ήταν κέφι και σχέδια για το μέλλον. Ωραίο! To bed at 12:30 a.m.

Saturday, June 19, 2004

Checked e-mail at David's beautiful house, full of relics from Kuala Lumpur, Prague, and Greece. Called Dick Jackson. I'll visit him on Monday, regarding Kendal and also Albana, whom I propose to support next year. Then I joined the staff at their “environmental cleanup.” With a plastic bag and a surgical glove I went around the buildings picking up odd pieces of paper, candy wrappers, beer bottle tops, lots of cigarette butts, bird feathers, etc. Met Tasos Apostolidis, who was busy painting at the main gate. Lots of thanks for the CD, which he said was a pleasant experience for all concerned. Also saw Randy Warner and thanked her for all her efforts concerning the Marder history. Long talk as well with Thanos Kassapidis about the interns. He said they were very helpful but found difficulty applying the Rassias techniques in the classroom. Also, the one who spoke Greek, as soon as the students learned this, elicited Greek from them instead of English (as I had predicted). . . . Chrysanthi had gone off meanwhile with George and Odysseas to Lola's grave, where they placed flowers, picked weeds, and listened to a priest intoning prayers. Then George and Chrysanthi returned and George and we had a lively extended conversation on our Cincinnati Hall porch. Then to his apartment, where Dimitris and Tilda had already arrived. Efthymoula served a splendid meal, as always. Lots of talk about education, politics, etc. Efthymoula related at length her episode being mauled by a huge wave while swimming last August. George still has prostate problems but takes medication and endures the side effects. Otherwise, both seemed relatively well, although Efthymoula seems somewhat depressed. 'Όταν της είπε η Χρυσάνθη, «Πες μας τα νέα σου», απήντησε, «Δεν έχω νέα. Ζω . . . » . . . Back at the school, we met Peter Schoppert and his Singaporian-Chinese wife. He heads Singapore University Press; she heads the Singapore historical museum. Both are around 40 years old. A Dartmouth grad, he studied Greek with Chrysanthi, then got a Fulbright to Singapore, where he met his future wife . . . and the rest, as they say, is history. . . . Ruth and Dimitris Gounelas came to get us around 8:00 p.m. His and Ruth's home in Panorama is more beautiful than ever, overlooking Χορτιάτης. Ruth's eyes are stable, but becoming very gradually worse with age. But she can still function well. Dimitris is no more comfortable in his department than before, but, like Ruth, able to function well enough. The brightest students go into medicine and engineering, others into philology. But maybe 30% are truly interested. One in 30 finds a job in public education; the rest make do somehow in φροντιστήρια, ιδιοτική εκπαίδευση, etc. The ND minister of education opposes ιδιοτικοποίηση των πανεπιστημίων, contrary to the party's pre-election platform. Their son Frankiskos was there, very tall now, and about to go off to do computer studies at Imperial College, London, although his parents wish he'd stay in Greece. We passed along our general wisdom: "Never give advice." Ruth thinks that my Kendal idea won't work in Greece because everyone will assume it's a γεροκομείο. Lots of education needed. Actually, we saw that the university's Department of Music now has a building on the road to Θέρμη precisely near my ideal site for a Kendal; and other university programs are building there, including a theater. And there's a technology museum, too. In short, next door to the hypothetical future Kendal will be a cultural center. . . . Back late; to bed at 1:00 a.m.

Sunday, June 20, 2004

Chrysanthi said that this is the first day she ever remembers doing nothing. Not quite. We had no plans and went nowhere. But I took 65 photos for the website, talked a lot to Gail Schoppert, read the newspaper (which has a beautiful section devoted to the Farm School), and got materials in order for the board meetings. We walked around the campus in the morning. Chrysanthi was delighted to discover a mulberry tree (μούριά). I ate a huge black mulberry and some small white ones. Very juicy. . . . With Gail and Ruth to an ouzeri in Thermi for supper. Chrysanthi said this was the first day in our married life that she observed me doing nothing. But I did take 65 photos.

Monday, June 21, 2004

David Acker lectured at 10:30 about new possibilities in agriculture, very effectively, with power point. Vouli then drove us to town. I took another 60 or so photos, mostly in the αγορά, of fish, fruit, and meat, with the labels. Then to Odysseas's and Eleni's for lunch on their porch (Kolokotroni 11). Lots of talk about Stavros and Toula. . . . Then taxi to Anatolia College to meet with Dick Jackson about Kendal. Anatolia won't invest, but it will aid in various ways. He called Dr. Barich; we arranged to meet tomorrow. He also called Albana, who turned out to be in Athens but expects to see us in Thessaloniki before we leave. Jackson spoke of pending legislation in the EU that would legalize British-affiliated colleges here, but might mean the end of American colleges unless they "become British." Therefore our Perrotis College should not change to a three- or four-year degree granting institution, but should remain a two-year institution, since these are not affected. . . . Out to a taverna by the sea with trustees and others, including beautiful Amber Kumera. Ducks and ducklings below.

Tuesday, June 22, 2004

Intensive sessions of the board, organized by Gail Schoppert. I was in charge of the break-out group on computers, library, Greek summer, and secondary schools. We came up with a dozen or so goals that we conveyed and discussed in the plenary session that followed. Then Annie Levis drove me to town (Λευκός Πύργος, «Ζύθας») to meet Dr. Barich, president of AHEPA. He has plans to build a medical facility plus an Alzheimer's unit on land just donated in the town of Λάκωμα, 4000 στέμματα. Two of his colleagues attended also, one a banker, the other a businessman who drove me back to the Farm School. They seem very interested. The plan is for me to speak now to John Diffey to see what the Kendal Corporation can and cannot offer. . . . Yesterday evening Stylianos telephoned from Athens. He's coming to Thessaloniki but not until after we leave. He is very pleased with the Anthology and was glad to meet Peter Constantine in Sydney. I said that I hope to translate the three new poems that Peter brought back for me.

Wednesday, June 23, 2004

More on the strategic plan in the morning, led by Gail and by John Crunkilton. They distributed 20 little self-adhesive dots to each of us, and we placed as many as we wished on yesterday's goals we wished to prioritize. A good trick! Lunch was provided by the College's international students, from Kosovo, FYROM, Albania, etc. I had hoped to meet the Albanian, Elona Kaxhaj., whom I am sponsoring, but she wasn't there. At 6:30 we left in a car provided by AFS (with driver) to go to Lakoma. Interstate-type highway most of the way. The village is a mix of traditional agriculture plus new industrial development. The surroundings are still mostly χοράφια, αμπέλια, etc. I was told, however, that it is becoming a suburb of Thessaloniki—i.e., people live there and commute each day to the city to work. Nothing much to offer: a café, church . . . But Kendal would attract more, probably. We clocked the return to School at 18 minutes & 25 kilometers. To the city center should be about 35 km. . . . At 4:30 I met with Thanos Kassapidis and the four interns. They complained about under-utilization in English-language instruction but approved the Rassias training, especially the games, more so than the finger-snapping technique. . . . At 5:15 Everett Marder drove us to the swanky Hyatt Hotel to meet with Brenda and the two women from the New York office: Sandra Vassos and Amber Kumera, about their plans (or lack of plans) to promote Brenda's centenary history. They haven't done much so far, but they had ideas about giving a copy to everyone at the Waldorf banquet. At 6:30 our ad hoc committee to revise the mission statement met around a table near the Hyatt's pool. Manita, Mike, Kostas Kravas, Waring Partridge, and myself. Waring had already prepared a text and generally was assertive about each phrase. Kostas was mostly silent. Afterwards, as we drove to Stavros Constantinidis's home for supper, we in a taxi, Costa and Manita in Costas's car. Costas complained that he was intimidated by Waring and that the revised mission statement lacked "magic." By this he meant that it emphasized the School's work in agricultural instruction rather than emphasizing its values: integrity, internationalism, community rather than individualism, etc. Well said! . . . At the dinner party I had a long talk with Frank Bedjian about financing a Kendal-type CCRC, also with Chris Minoutis. Both think that banks will lend provided they have collateral. Dick Jackson was there; I told him all about the meeting with Barich.

Secondary School meeting with Tasos and Pelagia largely conveying their needs and replying to questions we asked last July. I took notes and typed up everything later on the library computer (with difficulty: loss of saved document when the electricity cut off—they do this to prevent students from wasting memory with games). At 12:30 our mission committee met to revise in Costas's spirit, adding "magic"! Then at 1:00 I ran to Cincinnati to meet Albana, the Albanian Perrotis graduate whom I'm supporting at Anatolia's A.C.T. Hugs and kisses. Thousands of thanks. She is radiant, happy, industrious. She's been caring for her brother, hospitalized in Athena. When I had to meet briefly with Tasos and Pelagia over lunch, she spoke to Chrysanthi, assuring her that I am a καλός άνθρωπος. She now speaks Greek fluently. After three more terms at A.C.T. she hopes to come to the USA for a master's degree. I suggested that she go to Δημήτρης Ντούτης for help regarding US university programs. At 2:30, post-secondary committee, with Vergos giving a boring presentation during which I napped a bit. . . . At 6:30 p.m. a journalist preparing an article for Odyssey Magazine interviewed me about the School's trustees. . . . Then a fancy outdoor supper in the olive grove. Then commencement at 9:00 (supposedly): an extravaganza dreamed up by Tasos. The usual speeches by "dignitaries": one, looking at Bruce (who is very frail), said, Βλέπω τον Μπρους, που προσέφερε στην Ελλάδα περισσότερο από όλους τους πρέσβεις της Αμερικής. But, thankfully, these speeches were interrupted by προβολές: video scenes of students (mostly on the farm, very little in the classroom) in four series—fall, winter, spring, and summer—accompanied by classical music (Bach, etc.). Very nice. Then there was a "presidential pageant" with Father House and wife (Vouli!) on the balcony, then Charlie and Anne, then Bruce and Tad (for real), George and Charlotte Draper (for real), David and Patti Buck, and finally Van Stefanakis and Manolis, each group accompanied by a recital of chief accomplishments. (Manolis complained to me later that he was called Dr., which he isn't, whereas Van, who is a Ph.D., was not.) Tasos Apostolidis spoke very well about the phenomenon of a 100-year history. Students received their diplomas "on video" (!), two at a time, to speed things up. The major talk was given by Hélène Glykatzi-Ahrweiler, now rector of the University of Europe. I slept through most of it because it had no relation to the AFS centenary, was about the evils of technology, whereas of course the school is attempting to make proper, constructive use of technology. Finally, prizes were given first by Vangelis Vergos for the College, then by Pelagia Vousa for the Eniaio Lykeio and the Techniko Epangelmatiko Ekpaideftirio (TEE). The calf produced a good laugh, as usual. One student received a full scholarship to Marymount College in the USA. Finally, the assembled students sang the Ethnikos Ymnos, horribly off key. Midnight. A lovely event, all-in-all.

Friday, June 25, 2004

Full meeting of the board. Alex allowed me to say something about my Kendal project. I explained the AHEPA possibility but hoped that the AFS possibility remained. I was told to bring in a business plan, indicating especially how much money would accrue to the School each year. My Secondary School report was vigorously criticized by Gail and others because it was mainly a wish list for the budget, something inappropriate for trustees. I tried to emphasize the hope to recruit minority students but didn't receive much support. In sum, this didn't go well at all. Even Annie, privately later, said she regretted my including Tasos's and Pelagia's dismay because only one resident trustee attended the Μέγα Μαϊού. We also had a debate about recruiting students from the entire extent of Greece instead of chiefly from Macedonia. John Cleave maintained that this was not a proper subject for trustees. I felt that it is a policy issue and thus very proper. In the middle of the morning I was called out because Tasos and Pelagia, very agitated, needed to show me what they called a "libel" just printed up by the three interns, who intended to distribute copies to all trustees. David vowed to prevent this. They said they received no support from Tasos and Pelagia, nor from the English language teachers, nor on the Yearbook project. Tasos told me that one of them had offered narcotics to students and had had sexual relations with one of the girls, as attested by her diary. Should he be sent home at once? That's in David Buck's hands. David isn't convinced. . . .

This is how we ended the week at the School. . . . At 3:00 we were bussed to the airport and flown to Athens, to the Andromeda Hotel. An hour for a shower and shave. Then to Ambassador and Mrs. Miller's residence for a ceremonial dinner. Nice to find Don Nielsen there (he knows Mrs. Miller). Both Millers seemed very young, not at all pompous, very approachable. After dinner and the requisite (short) speech, Miller invited everyone to watch the great soccer game between Greece and France. (As we were walking home from the residence, huge shouts in the street confirmed that Greece had scored a goal, and indeed they won 1 to 0.) I brought Don up to date on the Kendal project. He says he might be able to help because he knows people who specialize in obtaining EU grants. I introduced him to Manolis, too. And Manolis and I, sitting next to each other at supper, had a chance to talk at length. He wants a copy of my AFS Quaker lecture and Greek Today (he needs to improve his reading and writing abilities and to extend his vocabulary). He said that he likes to operate "outside the box," which in this case might mean ending the secondary schools and replacing them with a program attracting students from other secondary schools to visit, and work at, AFS for short periods, something like the Mountain School in Vermont, which I described to him.

Athens–Munich–Philadelphia–Albany

To bed last night at 11:30 (stayed up to watch Greece win the soccer game). Up this morning at 5:15. Taxi to airport. Routine flight to Monaco. Then to Philadelphia and Albany. Overnight in the Albany Marriott Hotel.

Wednesday, June 30, 2004

Terpni

How nice to be here again! The new refrigerator came yesterday. Today Alec and family arrived in a huge U-haul truck pulling their car behind. We unloaded everything into his cabin and onto the porch, floor to ceiling. Hard work. They scarcely have room to walk in the house. Tried to get a mattress upstairs to the new bedroom but couldn't. He'll remove the banister tomorrow and try again.

Thursday, July 1, 2004

To Hanover

To Hanover with Chrysanthi so she can start her ALPS Greek course tomorrow. Brought my new 110 photos to Otmar to remove from the digital camera.

Saturday, July 3, 2004

To Cambridge

Brilliant production of Molière's The Miser at the A.R.T. I want now to read L'Avare in French. Will it be quite so raunchy?
