I organized the photos in categories for the website and brought them again to Otmar. He'll send them to Yukari in Japan. Last night some of Chrysanthi's students—a nice family about to go to Greece, friends of Manita's—treated us to supper at the Inn. They can now say Θέλω νερό! . . . We drove to Saratoga and attended the ballet's opening night, the high spot being of course "Apollo" with Hubbe and Darci Kistler, Boudier, Weese. Brilliant, both music and dance. Stravinsky/Robbins "Circus Polka" came first, danced entirely by children (all girls) in three waves of decreasing height. Then "Stravinsky Violin Concerto" with Soto, Borree, and finally "Cortège Hongrois." Stephen Hanna, whom I'd heard speak in New York, was brilliant. So was Jennifer Ringer.

Supper with Tom Akstens and Susanne Murtha, and Don Kurka and Maria (newly married). Susanne has a beautiful new studio for yoga classes, with a cork floor, all built expertly by Pinky O'Dell. Chrysanthi starts yoga with her on Monday. . . . Earlier, Direct TV installed a satellite dish, so we now have television in order to watch the Athens Olympics. A few days ago Radio Shack failed to get a signal; trees in the way. But Direct TV's satellites are higher, so it works. The technology is amazing.

Tuesday, July 13, 2004

Shapiros came for supper. Fran is 90+ and amazing. They still go canoeing.

Thursday, July 15, 2004

We celebrated our 49th anniversary a little early by going to the ballet and then eating steaks at a restaurant in Queensbury. Program: Hindemith/Balanchine "Four Temperaments." Difficult, abstract, but a breakthrough for 1940. Then Wheeldon's new "Shambards," especially nice in its last movement, with lively fiddle and square dance motifs in James MacMillan's score. Finally, the most fun: "Four Seasons" (Verdi/Robbins) with spectacular dancing especially by the men. Pure joy. . . .

The other day, visited Donna and Ed in their new property in Johnsburg. They have built a picture-book outhouse. Nothing else, so far. They sleep in a camper. I'm glad that I pioneered when I was in my 20s rather than 60s or 70s.

Friday, July 16, 2004

Amazing! We unloaded a huge pile of junk at the dump, gathered laboriously from the top of the small barn. Included was all my childhood photographic equipment, including the Omega enlarger, my flood lights, etc. for the puppet show for TB relief when I was probably eight years old, the long fire hose given us by Elmer Pitkin when we had a pump by the pond, bits of roofing, bits of asbestos siding, old lamps, etc., etc., and four metal cots. Good riddance to bad rubbish! Lots of room upstairs now. We plan to clear the downstairs so that a vehicle can be stored there this winter. . . . This evening, to the circus in town. Elena was dancing to the rhythmic music. Amazing woman with hula hoops, twenty at a time. . . . Our anthology got a full-page review (along with Maskaleris's) in the latest TLS: positive but really not very perceptive.

July 21, 2004

Two speckled fauns visited me in my office this morning, each about a meter long only, staring at me, without fear, from a distance of ten feet. They disappeared eventually into the forest. Mother was still in the field, apparently not very interested. . . . I finished "Spain." Working now on "Report to Greco." Was invited yesterday to a lecture at the Donnell Library in NYC on Scorsese's film. . . . Alec had some friends, Barbara and Doug (his senior principal at Friends Select). They, Monica, and I climbed the ledges on Alec's land, up over boulder and boulder to a place finally with a view. I was fairly exhausted, with beating heart (which calmed after a rest), but I made it—not bad for a 74-year-old. Afterwards, Monica's curry and fritters, and then hot fudge sundaes at Stewart's.

July 22, 2004

Took Alec and family to ballet matinee, very good program for children (and adults): "Interplay" (Morton Gould/Robbins), "Fancy Free" (Bernstein/Robbins), and "Stars and Stripes" (Sousa/Balanchine). Delicious and joyous. Afterwards, supper in our favorite Sicilian Spaghetti House. Anna's friend, also from Poland, is there again waitressing. Anna is working in Ireland and still hopes to go to Australia. . . . I finished my chapter on “Prometheus,” also on “Spain,” and am progressing on “Report to Greco,” which I rather like. . . . UPNE sent a sample CD for Greek Today for me to check, but it was blank. No sound.

July 25, 2004

Finished mowing the south field. Quite early this year. Got a sapling (balsam) to use as a railing for the staircase in the cabin. Daphne arrived with family. Andrew’s first words: “Can I have a ride on the tractor?” Steak on outdoor fire for supper, then marshmallows for everyone. . . . We’re enjoying our television. Tomorrow the Democratic convention begins.

August 5, 2004

Nice visit from Ignat Solzhenitsyn, Caroline, Dmitri, and Anna. They came on Sophia’s birthday, and we all ate chocolate cake together. Ignat loves the Schubert Andante I’m trying to learn. Maybe I can have a lesson on it from him in Kinhaven next June. Caroline finished her internship; she’ll start a residency in psychiatry at U. of P. But they may move to Cavendish, in which case she’d transfer to Hitchcock. Ignat told me that his father had an office less elaborate than mine! He nailed a board between two birch trees and used that as his desk in good weather. . . . I’ve been weeding the pond; today was the fifth afternoon, a big job but never done before, so really our pond is behaving very well.

August 13, 2004

Olympics began and we saw the opening ceremony on our satellite television: amazing. The ceremony was boring—an attempt to project the greatness of Ancient Greece but done through multimedia magic, which obviously interested the producers more, it seems, than the subject matter. But the parade of nations, 202 of them, was impressive. And Greece is receiving wonderful attention.

August 14, 2004

We rose at 5:45 in order to say goodbye to Alec, Monica, Theo, and Elena as they drove off to JFK in order to fly tonight to Hong Kong and then Bangkok. Theo promised to bring me a large Thai umbrella next summer, preferably made from chocolate! They reached the airport in a record five hours.

August 15, 2004

Alec telephoned and e-mailed from Bangkok. They had a restful, pleasant trip, the children preoccupied with personal television screens and games.

August 16, 2004

I finished weeding the pond, an extensive job that took more than a week. Now it looks beautiful, and large. Let's see what grows back, and doesn't, next summer.

August 17, 2004

Tarred the seams in my office roof, which has been leaking. . . . Working now on the Zorba chapter; entering the Greek and the documentation is the tedious part. I like the text. . . . Contacted the (new) humanities editor at Princeton University Press, and will meet her in NYC in November. She seems to be honoring our contract. . . . Lori, Clive, and three daughters were here last week, very pleasantly. They're placid children, unlike Leander's Sophia. Clive rebuilt Daphne's screen door, beautifully (they lodged in Daphne's house). Then Daphne, Greg, and children came for the weekend, supposedly to walk the forest with Steve Warne, but Greg was sick and it was canceled. They've decided to keep the house. How nice! . . . The other day I received the Greek Today Workbook and CDs. They look fine, except on the captions for one of the cartoons we somehow lost three iotas, so it reads Μα σήμερα δεν έχε νέφος. Ένα από χθεσ. Ugh! I'm going to try to add an errata section to the website. There will be more errors, I'm sure. . . . Chrysanthi is taking some very good art (painting—watercolor) classes in town and is pleased. We have only Leander's family with us now, but their children are loud and selfish. Deanna does nothing to help. Chrysanthi and I are keeping calm.

August 25, 2004

The RCPA forestry group met at John Sullivan's log cabin off Loon Lake. He has a nice rustic banister from which I got good ideas for our own. And he filled cracks in his tabletop with epoxy glue mixed with "wood powder." Biggest surprise was to find my Deerfield classmate Bill Knox there. I remember him so well, including the visit to his home in Manhattan. He's the one who simply dropped his clothes on the floor when he changed or undressed and a servant picked them up. He had a nervous breakdown at Princeton, finished at Colgate and apparently has had a good career teaching. We saw Sullivan's saw mill, solar kiln, transept. All very instructive and pleasant.

August 26, 2004

Drove to Elizabethtown to lunch with Mary and Maureen. Mary is aged and walks now only with two canes. Maureen seems fine. Both are mentally alert and very liberal politically. Poor things, they're surrounded by Republicans where they live.

August 28, 2004

To Queensbury to visit the Shapiros, who took us for a splendid dinner in the Heidelberg Restaurant on Quaker Road. Irv's paintings adorn all the walls. The full basement is now a studio and archive. They're very comfortable, with everything they need close by. But what happens when debility arrives? Fran is 90, Irv over 85. Apparently Al and Mary Zalon are interested in Kendal on Hudson. . . . Earlier today Martha Klironomos telephoned about my visiting professorship at San Francisco State. But Chrysanthi pleaded that this four-month visit mustn't happen, reacting emotionally and strongly against it, saying how could I desert her (she won't come) and what if one of us died during that period, etc. She was so distraught I telephoned Martha on the spot and told her to forget the entire arrangement. So, no teaching in San Francisco.

August 29, 2004

We were shocked a week ago to read in the North Creek paper that Warder Cadbury had died. We saw him in Stewart's just a few weeks ago and were hoping for a visit. Today we went to the memorial service, held at the Adirondack Museum in Blue Mountain Lake, where he was involved for decades. The service was half Quaker, half programmed, and very nice, with many fine messages about his virtues, a video of part of a lecture on naming the Adirondack peaks, and some music. Emphasis was on his service as an amateur historian of Adirondack lore, and a collector of relevant items. He was greatly appreciated, clearly. In the Quaker silence, I was one of the many who spoke. I said that he "smiled under his mustache," especially when he had such fun showing me the outhouse at Backlog that they call the Oval Office. There was other testimony about this sort of whimsy. We drove back in a furious storm: lightning, thunder, drenching rain, and found ourselves with no electricity at home, thus missing the final, closing ceremony of the Athens Olympics on our satellite television. . . . Earlier today we telephoned Alec and spoke at length with him and Monica. They seem very happy so far. Theo is so eager to attend school that he wants to go to bed right after supper so he won't be late getting up. Alec has begun his tasks at school and is learning the ropes. He's very comfortable so far with the administrative team.

September 3, 2004

Finished installing a banister for our rustic stairway up to the sleeping loft. The main post I made a bit fancy with the router. The banister is a balsam pole very assiduously sanded. Chrysanthi will paint it with polyurethane tomorrow.

September 18, 2004

Pendle Hill

A somewhat contentious trustees' meeting. Kenneth Sutton angry at Steve and Joe Rogers angry at everybody. I congratulated Steve on his patience, which he appreciated. He had two small strokes over the summer, but now seemed fine. Niyonu is beginning to interact nicely. Elizabeth Ellis gave a stirring report on the Chester project and showed us poetry (good poetry!) written by some of the ex-convicts she nurtures. Joey Roger spoke well about the Peace Network. But Steve, very emotional, confessed that he failed last year, his first failure in a long career, since we have a 1½ million deficit. Next time we'll need to choose whether to abandon some programs or take the risk of leaving things alone a bit longer.

September 19, 2004

Fred Berthold gave me his new book on theodicy. Today in Meeting Mary Ellen read queries that seemed so naïve and benign that David Montgomery objected to them vigorously, and I stood and ministered about theodicy and process theology, which seems a better solution than the free will defense.

September 20, 2004

Mother died tonight, peacefully. This is what I wrote for the Kendal Times:

HARRIET BIEN

January 17, 1905 – September 20, 2004

Harriet Bien died peacefully on September 20th, four months short of her 100th birthday. She grew up in a lovely brownstone on Monroe Street in Brooklyn, getting around town in her parents' horse and buggy. After graduating from Adelphi College, where she prepared for a teaching career, she married a young pediatrician who opened a practice in Sunnyside, Queens County, in 1927. They resided there until the 1960s and then moved to Madison Avenue in Manhattan, where they spent 15 happy years enjoying concerts, theater, and a circle of friends not to mention Christmas visits from children and the first crop of grandchildren. She served as a guide in the Metropolitan Museum of Art and as an award-winning volunteer in New York Hospital. In the 1980s she came to Hanover with her husband, becoming after his death a founding resident of Kendal, where she was blessed with many active years: painting, playing the violin, giving detailed reports in numerous ILEAD classes, attending theater locally and in Boston, and maintaining a lovely apartment in Dyer. As aging began to diminish her energy, she voluntarily moved to Assisted Living in Barclay, where she and Richard Eberhart formed an inseparable duo at mealtimes. Skilled Nursing in Vining came next. As always, Kendal's care was expert and compassionate. Her mind eventually wandered, but she was always comfortable in body. Indeed, on her final day she walked to supper, ate well, returned to watch television, and then quietly expired in her chair. She is survived by Peter Bien of Kendal and Alice Buseck of Tempe, Arizona, as well as by seven grandchildren and ten great-grandchildren. There will be a memorial concert in the Gathering Room on April 2nd.

September 26, 2004

Alice came and stayed with us for three days, which was very helpful. I had to go to the funeral home to arrange the cremation, to the bank (with Alice) to learn about distribution of the trust and custody account; we needed to clean out Mother's room. Furniture went to storage, clothing to Listen, odds and ends to the Attic, some items to us or the farm, some to Alice. Lots of family pictures and other memorabilia; some of Mother's writings, paintings, a lovely picture of her in her wedding dress. Many people here wrote kind letters. I did an obituary for the Kendal Times (see above) which got printed as well in the Valley News, so the whole town seemed to know. . . . Alice and I also found a few moments to try our new Warlock duet, which is fun.

September 30, 2004

New York

I spoke at the Foundation for Hellenic Culture, first on the Foundation's activities, then on the Farm School, as an introduction to Brenda Marder's talk on the European context ca. 1904–1948. Then I introduced Manny Stefanakis, who was there with his wife, as was Phil Foote. A good event.

October 1, 2004

New York

To Astoria with Yannis Fakazis for another radio interview, on Life in the Tomb, with Vangelis Calotychos also. Forty-five minutes in Greek, then thirty minutes in English. They want me again, for Kazantzakis. . . . Spent the afternoon in the 42nd Street library, which amazingly has back issues of Nea Estia plus other sources I need for proper documentation. I gazed for minutes at the marvelous painting of blind Milton dictating to his daughters. Then to Daphne's. Met her and Christina on 84th Street, returning from Christina's swimming. Latest news: Christina says they are going to get a dog. Who will care for it? Greg sees himself walking the critter at 11:00 p.m. Peter full of Pappou and Ah (a tractor). Andrew busy with a train set. Greg, Daphne, and I went out for a leisurely dinner on 84th Street and Madison. Then to Princeton via bus, arriving at 11:30 p.m.

October 2, 2004

Princeton

Breakfast in the Nassau Inn with Tom Gallant. Full of new ideas for MGSA including symposia every three years instead of two plus collaboration with MGSAs of Australia and Europe. Mrs. Souloyianni wants us to interact more with the non-academic Greek-American community. For our Chicago symposium I suggested bringing Trahanatzis. . . . Lots of talk with Mike Keeley at the reception. I'm going to help honor him in NYC in November. He's still suffering from the radiation treatment of his prostate cancer. Nice to see Mache again, and Dimitri, and Karen Emmerich.

October 3, 2004

Rode back to NYC with Peter Allen, who dropped me in Washington Heights. Long subway ride to Grand Central. Flew to Burlington. Home at 9:30 p.m. to a warm greeting by Chrysanthi.

October 6, 2004

Today Chrysanthi and I went to the cemetery to watch Mother's urn being buried in the family plot, where there is room, we were assured, for both of us as well. . . . Music with Dick in the evening. Someone wrote to me asking for memories of the Baden Street work camp in Rochester. I checked my 1953–54 diaries. Nothing. All about girlfriends and intellectual pursuits. . . . The other day Andrew telephoned. "Is Yiayia in heaven?" "Yes, I think so," I answered. Then: "Will she come down from heaven and become a new baby?" "Yes! Yes!" How remarkable from a five-year-old, who somehow understands the mystery of reincarnation.

October 15, 2004

Pendle Hill

Ministered at Pendle Hill Meeting about Andrew and Yiayia. This was much appreciated according to people's comments afterwards. I thought we'd be making the crucial and difficult decision about Pendle Hill's future, but now it's postponed until December 4th. . . . Played four-hand piano with John Smith, who is an excellent sight-reader: Schubert, Husa, Debussy, Ravel, Townsend, Warlock, who committed suicide, Smith told me. Met the Australian who came, finally, to be Cadbury Fellow. He knows Tourek Meeting, the Doricks, etc.

October 16, 2004

Julien O'Reilley spoke about her work with youth. She's charming. I hope that her appearance in Hanover next weekend will go well. . . . Steve, in today's trustees' meeting, bared his soul, recounting a near-death experience, and his delight at being at Pendle Hill instead of the corporate world of jets and limousines. He wants to stay another six years, making ten in total, leaving when he's 60. Amen! But if we continue with the same deficits we can last only 20 more years.

October 21, 2004

Black tie dinner at Kendal followed by social dancing. I wore my tux (from the Deerfield prom). It fits! Danced to 1950 tunes. They picked a queen and king by lottery and I was king, complete with cardboard crown. Nice!

October 23, 2004

A 1964 grad, Pat Heir, who did English 2–3 with me, took me to lunch with his daughter, who is applying to Dartmouth. Amazing that he remembered the course. More amazing that he knew and greatly admired Paul Davidoff (Pat is a town planner). Paul was a superstar in the profession, apparently. I was sent his daughter's essays, which I filled with red ink, just as Pat remembers his being filled.

October 24, 2004

Julien came last night. We had supper at Kendal with five Quakers. She spoke very well at Meeting and then I gave her a tour of Dartmouth. So nice to see a person of this age (about 26) so devoted to Quakerism.

October 28, 2004

New York

Farm School centennial banquet, black tie, at the Waldorf-Astoria. A huge crowd, very good meal, net profit about $150,000. But the band played so loudly that one could hardly talk to one's neighbor. I sat between Mary Keeley and Tad Lansdale, and managed to converse with both somehow. Tad agrees that a CCRC is badly needed in Greece. She worries about Λάκωμα as a location: no university, no beach. True . . . but . . . She and Bruce have no plans to move, except to go in with Christine if necessary. Ditto for Mary and Mike. Mary is relieved to know that a Quaker service provides people who'll give care in the home. . . . Nice talk with Vergos beforehand and with Chris Minoutis. Also with Sperry Lea. . . . The materials sent by our new president, Manny Stefanakis, in advance of the meeting are superior to what David used to send. . . . Did speak at some length with David. He has a year's severance pay, is sitting tight at present, fixing their house in Vermont. He might look later at the School for International Studies, or Antioch, in Brattleboro. . . . Chrysanthi and I danced a bit at the Waldorf. She said she enjoyed the whole affair, which was dedicated to Aliko Perroti.

October 29, 2004

New York

Waiters at the Yale Club breakfast, knowing my sympathies, hoped that Kerry would win, in a landslide yet! Chrysanthi went off to 91st Street, Daphne's new apartment, to help. I went to the AFS offices for a long day of committee meetings: the mission statement (with Mike K. and Manita), post-secondary with Vergos, Mike, Dimitri, and Crunkilton, secondary with Annie, Dimitri, and Gail Grant. Phil Foote asked me to serve another three years. I said I hoped I'd find my particular niche as a trustee. Previously, it was to get Marder's book published and well written. . . . Walked home, admiring the Empire State Building. . . . To the City Center with Chrysanthi to see the American Ballet Theater, so different from the NYC Ballet. Two Mozart/Kylián ballets, both very humorous. Then a long one by Berio/Forsythe, interesting but static. Finally, spectacular choreography to Philip Glass's repetitive music, by Kirk Peterson: ritualistic, bombastic.

October 30, 2004

Exhausting board meeting from 9:00 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. Phil Foote will be the new chair; that's good. We are leaning toward recommending expansion of the College to three years, with an affiliation with a British or other EU university. Taxi with Seth Frank up Madison to Daphne's new apartment on 91st Street, very spacious, 5 bathrooms. But not looking its best right now because they've just begun unloading. Yesterday, found Theotokas's Πνευματική Πορεία in the 42nd Street Library and xeroxed the pages I need. . . . Tonight to Greenwich Village to the Cornelia Street Café to hear something arranged by Gail Holst: Theodorakis's songs.

Kendal at Longwood

Annie Levis and I took ΑΜΤΡΑΚ to Wilmington, where John Diffey met us. On the trip down, Annie told me the worst things about Manolis Stefanakis, that he is arrogant, egotistic, insensitive, and is using funds for his own benefit, etc., and worse. Ditto for Minoutis. Apostolidis and Voutsas are demoralized, convinced that Manolis is not interested in education. Αλίμονο! The only solution, at least at first, is for Phil Foote, the new chair, to be apprised of this and take action. What a shame! Everyone wishes that David Buck were still there. At Kendal, John gave us the expected tour. Of course, Longwood is so unattractive compared to Hanover. We saw health center rooms, severely frail people being fed, and an apartment (very small). Lunch with two residents who are native Greeks. The husband feels that we'll have difficulty in convincing Greeks to sell real estate, and also that retired Greeks won't want to be on committees, actively involved, since they lack the Protestant work ethic. But they agreed that a Kendal is truly needed in Greece. On the return journey, Annie and I discussed strategy. She feels that location in Lakoma would be a mistake. We should try to convince AFS to use its land. This means convincing Stratos Constantinidis first and foremost. Annie, however, will speak first to Takis Litsas, who knows all about land—we need to be sure that residences are permitted on the School land; then to Stratos, who is a trustee of Anatolia as well as AFS. The principal cohort is likely to be Anatolia grads; thus Dick Jackson will be crucial. Diffey says that a project needs to be 70% pre-sold before money for construction can be raised. In operation, a facility should be 95% full. At 90% one needs to worry; 85% is the real bottom. Kendal communities range from 66 apartments to about 290. We should expect the entire process to take 10 years. . . . To 91st Street afterwards for supper with Daphne and family (cooked by Chrysanthi). Peter talks continuously and is very advanced. The apartment is still unsettled, except for the kitchen.

November 5, 2004

New York

To NYC for Mike Keeley's award. Black tie event at the Hilton. Nice to see Constance there and Nehamas and Chiolis, Varvitsiotis, Faka-zis, Gondicas, and of course Mike and Mary, Simonides, and the girl who conducted our Myrivilis interview at the radio station, dressed in a slinky gown revealing all curves, and more. I was seated at table #1 with Cathy Vanderpool, the Keeleys, the Greek consul. I had John Brademas to my right and Senator Sarbanes to my left, with his wife to his left. Nice chance to speak to both of these luminaries. Mrs. Sarbanes was outspoken about Republican hypocrisy: all their so-called "values," are masks for greed and the craze for power. Cathy, in her eulogy of Mike, quoted Pericles and at table agreed with me that we should all be reading Thucydides, especially the Sicilian expedition, to truly understand our invasion of Iraq. Sarbanes was very interested in my account of Odysseas's 30-odd years in Tashkent, and especially regarding what happened after he and his family repatriated to Greece. Brademas, typically, reminded me of his importance. I was first on the program, speaking briefly about Mike as the rare academic whose creativity was not drained away by his professorial service. I then read three of his translations, all from Sikelianos: "On Acrocorinth," "Caiques," and (of course) "Agraphon," stating how difficult Sikelianos is to translate and how these English texts may actually be better than the original Greek ones. Mike himself read Ἀπολείπειν ὁ Θεός Ἀντώνιον in English, then Greek, followed by two nice excerpts from "Inventing Paradise." Later, he read Elytis and Seferis lyrics that had been set to music and these were then sung very well by an old friend of his and a Greek band. Lastly, after filet mignon, a dance troupe, beautifully dressed in national costumes, performed. The consul wants to organize something else with me in the future. Mike was in his element, a gracious honoree.

John Radebaugh sent me his memoir about pediatric practice. Fascinating but very badly written. I'm trying to clean it up for him. At least it's only one-fifth of Marder's 500 badly written pages.

Hanover

A nice, unusual Sunday. Meeting, mostly lamenting the election. I ministered by reciting the story in Sikelianos's "Agraphon," very appropriate for this situation. Then to John and Mary Lincoln, who took us out to a fancy restaurant in Orford for a pleasant brunch with lots of good talk despite poor John's speech impediment owing to his stroke. Then to Ken Yalowitz's open house. Shepherds there and new people to meet, and more good food. Then home to practice Scarlatti a little. Then Jeff Murphy and son Kieran arrived and took us out for supper at the Norwich Inn. Again lots of good conversation even though Jeff voted for Bush. Then back to Kendal to give them a tour.

November 8, 2004

Telephoned Alec in Bangkok to say hello to Elena on her 3rd birthday. All is well there, but it's very hot—over 100 degrees. Visit of Monica's parents went well.

November 10, 2004

New York

Drove to Burlington. Beautiful scenery, like Switzerland. Mountain peaks covered already with snow. In Yale Club by 12:30. Roast beef buffet lunch. Walked to Donnell Library on 53rd for my lecture on Kazantzakis's films as part of the library's Hellenic Festival. Introduced by Elizabeth McMahan, a vivacious redhead, all gush. Lecture went well, with enough questions and good ones afterwards. People will have a chance to see Scorsese's The Last Temptation of Christ and Cacoyannis's Zorba the Greek next week and the week after. Celui qui doit mourir will be screened next spring, with luck. Elizabeth videotaped the lecture and promises to send me a copy. . . . Arrived back at the Yale Club by 4:30 in time to meet Hannah Winarsky, the new humanities editor at Princeton University Press, very young and pleasant. She seems fully committed to publishing both my volume 2 and the Selected Letters. Hooray! We discussed technical details over drinks, then lamented George Bush's re-election (his portrait hung above us, alas). She grew up in Princeton, where her father was in the Institute of Advanced Studies. Very nice to have a face-to-face meeting with someone who is going to be playing a large role in my life over the next few years. I projected volume 2 for early 2005 and the Letters for early 2006. Θα δούμε . . . Miraculously, I made the 7:10 return flight at LaGuardia, just. So, this time it was Hanover–New York–Hanover all in the same day.

November 16, 2004

Breakfast with Andy Lewin, former student, who has endowed the Lewin Fellowships at the Tucker Foundation. He surprised me by saying I was responsible because of the piece I published in the Alumni Magazine about Ann Armbricht and Elise Boulding, stressing how important service should be in everyone's life. One never knows.

November 20, 2004

Ned Perrin died today. Sarah brought him home a few days ago; he had fallen and broken his thigh bone. So he died in the house he loved (too much). Peter Saccio and Nardi Campion went the day before and read the Episcopal service for the dying. Sarah slept the last night in bed with him. His ashes will be scattered on the property.

November 24, 2004

I took a nice bicycle ride with Leander, Nicholas, and Sophia throughout the neighborhood with houses houses houses, no center, no stores, but attractive tree-lined streets and an occasional park. Leander and I went out for lunch at an Indian restaurant, not very good, followed by a delicious Starbucks coffee. . . . I continued fixing John Radebaugh's autobiographical memoir, interesting but poorly written, 125 pages long. I've spent many hours for this interesting friend.

November 25, 2004

Thanksgiving turkey, etc., etc. Alec telephoned from a beach on the Gulf of Siam (!), using his cell phone. Amazing. Leander helped me with my Scarlatti piece. Yesterday for supper they had a neighbor who works in the World Bank and is very pessimistic about George Bush's huge deficit.

November 26, 2004

New York City

Train to New York. To Daphne's new apartment, still mostly unsettled. Another turkey dinner, very pleasantly. We delivered some of Harriet's paintings to Leander yesterday and Chrysanthi's latest, of the farm pond, to Daphne today.

November 27, 2004

7:00 a.m. train. Home at 1:15. At 2:00 run-through of the harpsichord recital. My Scarlatti went fairly well.

November 28, 2004

Harpsichord recital. I got through the Scarlatti without too many mistakes, although piano-trained fingers tend to hit more than one key on the harpsichord. People find this a relaxing three quarters of an hour in mid-afternoon. . . . Supper with Lili Paxson, who has just arrived, and Rose Miller.

Pendle Hill

Unexpectedly, I reached Pendle Hill just before the Forum at Swarthmore. John Smith invited me to go with him and others, so I did. And it was remarkable: devoted to Chester. Speakers included the black mayor of Chester, a remarkable man, formerly a policeman, with a twelfth-grade education only; a black professor at Swarthmore, like the mayor born and raised in Chester; Brother Robb Carter, a black youth-worker in Philadelphia; and our own Elizabeth Ellis. Carter arrived late because he was just involved with two youths, one of whom pulled a gun, but luckily no one was hurt. He was weeping at the hopelessness of these lives and the system that almost guarantees failure, but concluded, "We must keep trying." The mayor, too, told of the hopelessness of blacks in Chester, but also of some success stories, including one where he had taken a boy into his own home to live and thus escape a dysfunctional family. I thought of James McBride's mother, raising 12 children successfully. In the question period I asked if they had anything like the citizens' council that Chrysanthi served on in Hanover for youthful first offenders. They do not, and seemed interested.

Pendle Hill and Philadelphia

Pamphlets committee. We accepted the essay on Pierre Cérésolle, after much debate. Also one other. Remarkable. Donna McDaniel's copyediting of the Henry Cadbury essay was still unsatisfactory. I seem to have to correct all her "final" texts. . . . Played four-hand with John Smith for an hour: Satie, Starer, etc. Then, in tuxedo, drove to the Hyatt Regency in Philadelphia for Haverford's celebration of its successful $200,000,000 capital campaign. Very fancy: lamb chops and caviar with drinks, then huge dinner, obscenely wasteful. Tritton said "Thank you" in 45 languages, representing the linguistic diversity of Haverford (his Greek was 50% correct). Emma Lapsansky spoke well about her fears that Haverford would not be diverse, after Temple, but her delight at teaching there. I was able to say hello to Steve Cary's wife, who immediately thanked me for naming the Cary Room at Kendal. All this seemed very unlike Haverford, very unQuakerly: too posh and profligate.

December 4, 2004

Pendle Hill

Long board meeting in the new all-day format. Huge deficit again. We're giving the Peace Network two years to raise their own money, or quit.

December 24, 2004

Terpni

A quick trip to the farm just to get some books for my courses in January and to leave some goodies for Leander, who'll be arriving in two days. How lovely it is! Chrysanthi just as enthusiastic as I. The lake frozen. Snow, just one inch, on the ground. Deer tracks. Peace.

December 25, 2004

Christmas dinner at Dick's. Our trio played Reger's Weihnachten badly. I played Christmas carols for singing. Very festive. Lots of telephone calls from Greece, including one from Vouli to say how horrible Stefanakis and his wife are (I relayed all this to Phil Foote), and a brief call from Alec, who is in Indonesia. . . . At 11:00 p.m., Ulli telephoned to convey the shocking news that Steve Scher died last night in his sleep, aged 68, from a heart attack. At least he was unaware. They had champagne and a nice dinner, watched television, and he went to bed fine. At 4:00 a.m. he was essentially dead. I had lunch with him recently, and he was planning to do one more foreign study to Berlin, then to enjoy full retirement, out of which he is now cheated. But at least he didn't suffer at all.

December 28, 2004

To Andover Inn for a memorial to Mother, organized by Alice. Her entire family was there: Peter, David and Lynda, Susan and her partner Ellen (very nice), Paul and fiancée Dana, and a cousin. None of ours. Some music, a poem, then free testimony. I spoke about bacon and eggs for breakfast every morning, and about the years going to the New York Philharmonic children's concerts followed by Schrafft's ice cream soda. And the trouble of getting father and mother to leave 74th Street to come to Hanover. Chrysanthi spoke about mother as her best friend when she first came to America, her good nature, humor, cooking lessons. Paul Buseck and David both spoke well. Peter read a doggerel poem. Alice added memories. Then a handsome lunch, after which we all went to Lori and Clive's house. Alice and I tried out Warlock—at half speed, of course. Alice assembled a loose-leaf book with memorable photos of mother and dad, Monroe Street, all the brothers and sisters and grandchildren. Amy Bernstein sent me mother's marriage certificate. A day of warm memories. . . . But all this time Chrysanthi was terribly worried about Alec since he's in Indonesia and we've heard nothing from him since the terrible earthquake and tsunami that happened on Sunday, two days ago. We did find out that Java was not affected. But Chrysanthi now thinks that Alec has been abducted by a Muslim terrorist! Lots of people have called: George, Vouli, Barbara Doyle, Dick Williamson, Dimitris Giannakos, someone from Friends Select, Jerry McLane. . . . I sent a telegram to Monica's parents. No answer. Fiona's e-mail is no longer valid. No phone numbers . . .

December 29, 2004

Finally Alec telephoned. He's in the mountains enjoying himself with family, Fiona, Edwin. I chastised him for making Chrysanthi frantic for three days, not sending us a complete itinerary. But we know that he and the family are fine.

December 30, 2004

West Lane Inn, Ridgefield, Connecticut

To Daphne's in South Salem. Peter Tebbe is a dynamo, incessantly wriggling and talking in his unintelligible manner (but Daphne understands). Greg is increasingly involved in Brazil, where Goldman Sachs wants to establish itself to capitalize on that emerging economy.

December 31, 2004

South Salem, Ridgefield

New Year's Eve dinner at Daphne's with Leander and family. Alec telephoned. Four families in his school were killed last week by the tsunami. We're all contributing to Doctors Without Borders to help with relief. . . . The children were excited by presents. I gave Chrysanthi Howard Zinn's A People's History of the United States and biographies of Lincoln and Benjamin Franklin. Alec gave me a Thai umbrella (small), promising a big one when they return in June. I gave Greg a book about globalization. . . . Worked on, and finished, evaluating about 120 abstracts submitted for our MGSA 2005 symposium, most of them entirely acceptable in my view. We'll see now what the other committee members say. . . . We walked down Ridgefield's main street with its enormous eighteenth- and nineteenth-century houses, and all had a hot dog from the (apparently) famous vendor.

South Salem

We all went ice-skating in the afternoon in an indoor rink, using rented skates. Daphne is of course an expert, given all the lessons she had as a girl. Christina did well; Sophia is a beginner. I started rather tentatively, staying near the railing. Ankles bent. But gradually this stopped and I became more adventurous until—a fall on my backside. So, back to the rail, more slowly. But considering that I haven't been on skates for probably 30 years, not bad. Leander fell and hurt his shoulder again. He has a torn ligament. He also told me in confidence later that he might have a benign tumor in his bad ear. He goes back to the doctor on Monday. He may need to have it removed surgically. Scary. . . . I finished a pile of TLSs, and all the MGSA abstracts.

January 8, 2005

Cambridge

To Cambridge early, to avoid snow. Read more of chapters 1 & 2 of Joyce's "Portrait," which is so extraordinary, in the main reading room of Widener, now restored to its original grandeur. What a difference between this and our totally uninspiring new Berry Library at Dartmouth! The show at A.R.T. was different: 1¾ hours of a single actress, also the author: Pamela Gien in "The Syringa Tree," about growing up in South Africa when Apartheid was in force, and specifically about the lovely relationship between the six-year-old white "Miss Elizabeth" and her black nanny. Gien is brilliant, playing five or six different roles with different voice timbres and different accents: very exuberant and moving. In the discussion afterwards she came out answered questions, most of which came from fellow South Africans in the audience expressing their own grief and remorse over what had happened in their country before Mandela's miracle of unification.

January 9, 2005

Robert Binswanger and wife took us out to lunch at the Canoe Club. He had worked four months for Kerry in Ohio. "The Republicans simply outdid us in getting out the vote," he confessed. The Binswangers still hope to enter Kendal and are waiting for an apartment.

January 10, 2005

My first ILEAD class. I'm doing Joyce's Ulysses: 8 weeks, meeting each Monday in the Card Room at Kendal. A few former students, from previous ILEADS taught by me, are in the class, which is nice. Why did I do this? Mostly owing to Avery Post's prompting. . . . We had Ulli for supper. Poor Steve Scher died on Christmas Eve of a massive heart attack. She is "coping."

January 16, 2005

Our monthly Kendal interfaith service was led today by Don Sheehan and Carol, doing an Acathist service written by a Soviet dissident priest in jail, praising all the beauties of the world despite his desperate situation. Very moving. Don came at my invitation and seemed to be appreciated. Maybe again next year?

January 22, 2005

Service in Rollins for Ned Perrin. A Thetford neighbor was the best speaker. A good picture of his humor and his devotion to electric cars. Good to speak to Reeve Lindbergh. And Ginia Allison had been sort of a girlfriend when Ned was very young. Amy was there with husband and child. But no Elizabeth. A sad time.

January 27, 2005

Dinner with Margaret Fraser in Ardmore, where she now owns a house. One daughter is living there, working in Starbucks. Margaret is flourishing as the director of FWCC. We had a delicious Thai meal.

January 28, 2005

Pamphlets committee did not accept John Radebaugh's submission but asked to see it again after some suggested revisions are made. Fingers crossed! I've spent many hours fixing his English and trying to highlight the Quaker element.

January 30, 2005

I conducted the adult education class after Meeting, on the subject of Light (of course).

February 1, 2005

Providence

My first class at Brown. 40 students. I have a nice office, an ID card, a salary check already. Charlie Auger in Comparative Literature has been very helpful. Also Carol Wilson, the secretary. Elsa Amanatidou took me out for supper afterwards along with Dimitris Livanos, who teaches history. We'll set up a time for me to give a public lecture later.

February 5, 2005

Memorial in Rollins for Steve Scher. Several students spoke beautifully. Info about his life in Hungary. Some music (obviously). Poor man, cheated of his retirement.

February 8, 2005

Providence

Prof. Kurt Raaflaub, a distinguished classicist, took me out to supper after class. Very approachable, pleasant. Nice to talk about Homer.

Friday–Saturday, February 11–12, 2005

New York

With Chrysanthi for Laura Bernstein's wedding. To the ballet on Friday: "Apollo," my favorite, beautifully danced. Then three we'd never seen: "Chichester Psalms" with full chorus and boy soprano, music by Leonard Bernstein; "Andantino" (Tchaikovsky/Robbins); and "Shambards" (MacMillan/Wheeldon). On Saturday morning we went to Daphne's. Andrew enlisted me at once to put together his latest "bionic man," hard but we did it. Then I played electric hockey with him for a while, finally escaping to go to the Reubens show at the Met: his drawings in preparation for paintings. Such energy and talent! And today the "Gates" by Christo opened in Central Park, saffron cloth everywhere, also on some schools, etc. in a spirit of camaraderie. . . . The wedding at the Essex House was moving, especially Jill's speech to her (younger) sister and best friend. Fancy. Black tie. Greg and Daphne were there, so we spent some time with them during the hors d'oeuvres period (1½ hours). But at dinner the band was so loud no one could speak to anyone else. At 10:30, with the main course still not served, we left, as did Daphne and Greg. Did manage to speak with Amy a bit despite the noise. They'll be coming to our 50th on August 13th.

February 19, 2005

Cambridge

A strange A.R.T. production featuring a French-Canadian mime and actor. Benny Hill is a better mime. But some of this was interesting. Fortunately, Chrysanthi thought it was wonderful.

February 21, 2005

Showed the Ulysses film in ILEAD class. Barbara Taylor said to me afterwards, "You are changing our lives."

February 22, 2005

New York

Ballet again. Pure joy. "The Bleu Necklace" and "Makin' Whoopee," both choreographed by Susan Stooman, music by Irving Berlin in the first, Walter Donaldson in the second. Both with amusing story lines, spectacular dancing, especially by Damian Woetzel in "The Bleu Necklace."

Children, a dancing dog, comic turns, parodistic sentimentality. A perfect way to forget all one's cares in the real world.

February 24, 2005

New York

Long talk with Annie Levis, staying in a nearby hotel, again about the arrogance of Stefanakis and his wife, too. Then to AFS office for executive committee meeting in which I and others spoke directly to Stefanakis. I said that I couldn't possibly give him a vote of confidence. He acted well, saying that honesty is valuable. But the meeting was tense. Afterwards, mission statement meeting chaired by me. I'd made adjustments suggested by John Cleave, and the result seemed to work. . . . Then to Daphne's briefly and the children. Greg absent. But his negotiations with the Brazilian bank have led to success; on April 1st the bank and Goldman will officially join. . . . Then to E. 79th for a reception by Greece's ambassador to the UN, a pleasant short, fat man who assured me that the UN is healthy.

February 25, 2005

New York

Post-secondary Committee chaired by John Crunkilton, ably. We're headed toward a three-year B.A. program at Perrotis. But not yet. First there has got to be some affiliation with an EU university, preferably a UK one. . . . Then Secondary Committee, chaired by me. Again, we hoped that the School would recruit from immigrant communities, which it seems loath to do. . . . Spoke to Stefanakis, shook hands, and said "Let's be friends, that's best." He agreed. After the meeting, which he attended, he smilingly said, "Now I wasn't arrogant, was I?" Evangelia was there, too, disturbed because so little is done for learning-disabled children. . . . A little rest at the Yale Club (where I continue to work on my Saint Francis chapter. Then to the reception at Phil Foote's. Then with Mike Keeley to the Orthodox Cathedral on 74th; met Peter Constantine there, also one of my students from the Columbia class, also Vasos Papagapitos. Hugs & kisses. Met the Dean, Stefanopoulos. With Constance Tagopoulos chairing, as in Washington, we read from our A Century of Greek Poetry (after signing dozens of copies) and answered questions. I did "The Moonlight Sonata," of course. And some Harkianakis and Tagopoulos. Large audience, very responsive. Then Fakazis took all of us out for dinner at a Greek restaurant on 2nd and 71st. Fine food, but music so loud conversation impossible.

February 26, 2005

Full board including executive session about Stefanakis's failings. Greek trustees connected by speaker phone. Stefanakis's report to us was very professional. Everyone likes what he is doing but wishes he wouldn't alienate so many fine people. (Cf. Jean Brophy.) He has a one-year contract. There'll be a review before August and then a decision whether to keep him or not. Afterwards, Evangelia took me aside at length and poured out her misery—how students have severe difficulties that no one treats, so they come to her, and the staff resents her "interference." A mess. . . . Then to Columbia to MGSA executive, most of which I had missed. They wanted me to chair the nominating committee and I said No. My term ends in October, finally. Nice to see Mache and Karen, who's about to take her orals and, like me, says the Ph.D. at Columbia is such a pleasure: all one is supposed to do is read and read. How nice! . . . Supper at Un Deux Trois.

Hanover

My last ILEAD class. Joyce's "Penelope" with expected complaints from some of the women students, but not all. One student brought in Joyce's reading of Anna Livia Plurabelle, which was a good way to end. Also, some stayed to see the newer Ulysses film, called "Bloom"—OK except that Molly is portrayed as much too young. Students seemed happy. I'll see their evaluations at some future time.

March 1, 2005

Manchester-Philadelphia

Worry that we'd never fly, owing to snow. But it stopped and we got to Philadelphia easily. Long wait spent in the US Airways club (thankfully) working on Saint Francis still. Then only one more chapter to go: Report to Greco. Plus four short appendices. Routine flight, business class. Slept even.

March 2, 2005

Penn Club, London

So cold here. Rain mixed with snow. But we had a lovely day, very full and different. To Euston to buy train tickets for the week. Then to Charing Cross, commuter train to Greenwich, very crowded at 5:00 p.m. Found the pub that contains the theatre, but no one there until 7:15. Supper next door in Sofitel Hotel served by a 19-year-old Lithuanian beauty, here with her boyfriend, she told us. Expensive; we should have stayed in the pub for an £8 hamburger! At 7:30 the "theatre" opened.

Tiny, maybe 50 seats. We were in the first row, two feet away from the actors. A moving, splendid performance of Strindberg's "Miss Julie," so well made and powerful about class differences, decadent aristocracy à la Faulkner. Vibrant peasant class. Superb acting by all three characters. I discovered that I was seated next to the director, a woman who looked about 25 years old. She said that playing in such an intricate fashion on top of the audience is wonderful training for actors, forcing them to use all of their skills, which is what happened. A wonderful opening to our stay. And these young actors are really better than any we see at the A.R.T. Afterwards, trying to get back to London, our train was delayed, then another delayed. We waited about  $\frac{3}{4}$  of an hour in frigid winds on the platform (station closed). Finally made it back to London Bridge; changed; to Charing Cross; the tube to Goodge Street. And a fine night's sleep. No jet lag thanks to the miraculous feast-fast formula.

Thursday, March 3, 2005

Birmingham

Our first Penn Club breakfast: eggs and bacon, toast and jam, stewed prunes. Worked on Saint Francis a bit. Then to the British Museum, beautifully filled with school children. Saw the Rosetta stone (again) and of course the Parthenon Marbles, each of which now has a helpful explanatory placard. One of the pediments depicted the contest of Athena and Poseidon for Athens, Poseidon creating a spring, Athena an olive tree, which won her the verdict, of course. What a miracle these sculptures are! Also looked into the Reading Room, which arouses much nostalgia in me since I spent enough time studying there. . . . Then to Euston and Birmingham. More nostalgia. We walked through the new Bull Ring, completely rebuilt and very fancy. Central streets now are fully pedestrian. But we found the 61-62-63 buses in the same place for Bristol Road. The upper deck is smoke-free now; before it was a fog. University looks the same: Barber Institute, tower, library, Arts building. Tziovas on the 4th floor, near Ruth Macrides and the American who does Ottoman studies. Everyone very friendly and welcoming, especially Bryer, who showed up with the first volume of BMGS (Bumgas!) with his, Nicol's, and my signatures on the contents page. "We invented this in Staff House," he reminded me. "And we divided MGS and JMGS peacefully, in good Quaker fashion," I reminded him. My lecture, in the usual room, went well, I think. Harry came with his wife (Katerina), too. Old friends. And Marianna. But in the question period I couldn't remember the name of the British ambassador who in effect invited Kazantzakis to England. Afterward we all drove into town to eat in a very good Chinese restaurant. Hong Kong style, very different. 9:30 train back to Euston. . . . Interestingly, we did not go to Woodbrooke. The pain of 1995 is still operating.

Friday, March 4, 2005

Finished vetting Saint Francis and started Report to Greco, my final chapter. Outside: snow. Late morning, to an internet café to check e-mail, some of which was urgent. Then to Tate Modern to see the Turner–Whistler–Monet show for which we had to buy tickets and wait, but we spent some time in the regular collection seeing other gorgeous Turners and also Constables. What was clear from the exhibit was that nineteenth-century London was severely polluted owing to industrialization. But this produced smogs and brilliant sunsets that the artists (except for Whistler) rather liked. This seems to be the source of Turner’s fogs. In the show, I particularly liked “Sun Setting Over a Lake” (ca. 1840), just color, no definite shapes, and “Junction of the Severn and the Wye” (ca. 1845). In the regular collection the most astonishing masterpiece we viewed was Blake’s “God Creating Adam,” God seated in a chariot of fire. . . . We walked along Millbank past Parliament and the Abbey, up Whitehall (where guards were changing)—stately official London—to St. Martin’s Lane. Ate spaghetti, strolled in Leicester Square, then saw Macbeth. RSC production beautifully acted and directed, and so modern, for the theme of overweening ambition is applicable everywhere.

Saturday, March 5, 2005

Finished vetting Report to Greco chapter. Only the three short appendices are left. Went to the National Theatre and, hooray, were able to get tickets (returns) for Dream Play for Tuesday. Leisurely lunch in the restaurant there, hearing the jazz concert below. Then walked along the embankment with St. Paul’s rising on the opposite bank, to Tate Modern to see the Strindberg exhibit. Good to learn something about this talented man: playwright, painter, and photographer. Of course, he outraged bourgeois elements and was embittered, went through three marriages, had nervous breakdowns, recovered, painted foreboding canvases, all black, but Turneresque, with fog, no clear outlines. Truly foreboding. We'll see two of his plays this time: Miss Julie (middle period) and Dream Play (late). Apparently there's an interesting movie of Miss Julie. When the play opened in London in the 1960s the lead was Maggie Smith. . . . Across Bankside Bridge to Bankside Station, then to London Bridge for the train to Catford Bridge. Like yesterday, full. Catford is a depressing suburb largely populated, it seems, by blacks. The theatre, like the one in Greenwich, combined with a bar, opened only at 7:00. Full house for a very lively performance of Twelfth Night. Very intimate; we were in the second row. Wonderful to see the facial expression of these talented, well-trained actresses and actors. The comic scenes—Toby, Malvolio, the Fool—hilarious. The sentimental ones . . . sentimental. The boy-girl confusion delicious. . . . Easy trip home, not like the long, cold wait at Greenwich.

Sunday, March 6, 2005

Another big breakfast. Then to Friends House Meeting at 11:00. Completely silent. Spoke afterwards to an Englishman who lives in Thailand, two hours south of Bangkok. "Why do you live there?" I asked. He answered, "It's cheap. My lodging costs £30 per month. Wonderful food." "Do you speak Thai?" "No, of course not. Everyone wants to speak English." Introducing ourselves, I said that we had come here from New Hampshire to escape the cold. (It's been about 3 or 4 degrees Centigrade here every day, with snow, sleet, and hail.) Everyone laughed heartily. . . . Returned to the Penn Club and vetted three of the four appendices. Then tube to Knightsbridge, near Harrod's, and walked along Kensington Gardens to the Albert Memorial, now shining in gold, and to Royal Albert Hall opposite to see Carmen. The Albert Hall itself is extraordinary (as is the Russell Hotel, built in 1900, that we peeked into this morning, all marble, walnut paneling). Carmen in the round was so vigorous, so passionate, so thumpingly rhythmic, with a beautiful tenor and soprano, and an excellent Carmen (alto). Three hours of perfect staging. Sung in English, although we could understand perhaps only 10% of the sung words, but the plot was clear enough in any case. Chrysanthi was enthralled. . . . Back to Russell Square. Hamburger in a pub, very good, except for the smokers, all women, at surrounding tables. . . . In Russell Square Station a gust of wind blew off my beret, which landed on the tracks. There it stayed, of course.

Monday, March 7, 2005

To “Turks” exhibit at the Royal Academy in Piccadilly. Not much of note, really, except probably the carpets. Too much related to the sultan (all from Topkapi), very little to the common people. Beautiful ceramics, but copied from China. Conclusion: the Greeks were better! . . . A stop in the National Gallery to see its only two El Grecos, and a whole gallery of marvelous Rembrandts. . . . At 4:00 p.m. met Anna Rosenberg at the Maugham Library, Chancery Lane, now part of King’s. She bore a letter from Don Nielsen. Her father is Nielsen’s best friend, apparently. She interviewed me for half an hour in Greek for the local Greek radio station. Then Roddy came, and David Ricks, and Alix MacSweeney and Rowena Loverance (!) and Sir Michael Llewellyn-Smith, and lots of others, to hear my talk on Kazantzakis’s “action” ca. 1944–46. Good questions afterwards both as part of the event and then privately during the reception. Then Roddy, David, Chrysanthi, I, and Judith Herrin had a leisurely supper with lots of good talk about Meg, George Thompson, MG Studies, Peter Mackridge, etc. A nice evening. Judith walked us “home” to the Penn Club.

Tuesday, March 8, 2005

Started with my now obligatory fifteen minutes at the internet café. Then walked to the National Gallery to see the extraordinary Caravaggio exhibit. Amazing realism for his time. Amazing attention to common people. Amazing latitude of interpretation—for example his “John the Baptist” is portrayed as a languid, sexy, mostly naked adolescent boy, probably Caravaggio’s homosexual lover. He was a maniac, murderer, brawler, but extraordinarily gifted, as all these paintings show. The exhibit brought together a pair of depictions of Christ as Emmaus, one with Christ shown as almost a boy, the other as the usual bearded mature man. The first light, the second dark, somber, probably reflecting Caravaggio’s own circumstances. . . . We then spent an hour or so in the permanent galleries, especially enjoying various docents explaining canvases to school children. . . . Then to the National Theatre to see Strindberg’s Dream Play. As in Joyce’s Circe episode, perhaps modeled on this play, the main character has delusions of grandeur (he is knighted) and (many more) delusions of abasement: his wife has numerous lovers, he is accused by various women, and so forth. A phantasmagoria evoking in a convincing manner the craziness of the dream state.

Started correcting Brown papers. The first an “A,” well written and imaginative. The second thoughtful but illiterate: C+. I’ll give her the drills I did for the Composition Center, now happily on line. . . . Walked to the Royal Academy and spent two hours with Alix MacSweeney, no longer at the TLS, married, painting. Her interest in Greek things continues, of course. . . . Then walked back, to the British Museum to spend an hour with Rowena Loverance in her splendid office in the East Wing overlooking the entrance court. She is off to Bombay on Friday to join a Swan’s cruise going to Petra and St. Catherine’s. She’s been involved in preparing the BM’s e-learning programs used worldwide. We talked a lot about Woodbrooke, for she was on Council during the bad days there. She agreed with me regarding the ineffective Council, the improper leadership, etc. We also talked about Kendal (Rowena is a Quaker); she has visited the Quaker CCRC in York, done by the Rowntree Trust and very attractive. She now lives with her 86-year-old mother, whose mind is failing. Difficult. But at least she has a stimulating job in her area of expertise. . . . Then walked to the National Theatre, stopping for a sort of supper at a café filled with smoking women. The play was Lorca’s last, “The House of Bernarda Alba,” about a tyrannical mother of five unmarried daughters who messes things up so seriously that one of the daughters hangs herself. Lots of bitter social commentary about class and especially about bourgeois propriety. But in my view, at least, the play lacked any technical interest. It is simply a well-made play: characterization, action, emotion aplenty, but nothing experimental. Saw Anna Rosenberg afterwards on the way out, the student who interviewed me, doing a thesis on Lorca’s influence on Greek poets (not dramatists), and she agreed.

Cambridge

Met Lewis Owens, who now works in a sixth form cram college for rich kids who failed their A-levels. He does placement: getting them into university afterwards. He took me round to his principal, dean, etc. All very cordial. Then to the Cambridge University “union” room, very fancy, where the famous debates are held, for my poetry reading. I introduced Cavafy, doing Η πόλις & Απολείπειν ο Θεός Αντώνιον (in English, of course), then “The Moonlight Sonata,” “Agraphon,” and Stylianos’s “The Twentieth Century.” Attentive audience for 1½ hours. Some good questions. Monica came in and we adjourned for lunch. They're still not married—together for 14 years—but recently bought a house, a step forward. She teaches computer technique for the university, a good job. . . . Then walked past King's College and Queen's to Selwyn. Lovely to be in Cambridge again. An hour with David Holton in his suite. He's engaged now in a large project: a proper grammar of Medieval Greek, a five-year project with several collaborators. He still uses my early book on the language question. How nice! We went to the Classics Faculty for my talk, again on Kazantzakis in 1944–46. About 30 people, some students, some adults. Afterwards one of the students said that I, unlike most lecturers, seemed actually to care about my subject. Good! To Selwyn bar for a beer and more talk. Students came in for “uncorking” before dinner in Hall. They bring their own bottle of wine, pay £1.50 to have it uncorked, and carry it into supper. How civilized! Then with ten others, including Anne Holton, to Grantchester and the Rupert Brooke restaurant. Nice supper with good conversation. Then David drove us past the Grantchester Church, but we couldn't see if the clock was still at 10 past 3, and the old Vicarage, and the pool where Byron bathed. Overnight very comfortably at Selwyn.

Cambridge–London

Breakfast in Hall. Joined by an economic historian who also spoke last night and who visited Greece in 1955, also by a man doing a Ph.D. in theology and preparing for the Anglican priesthood. Lots of good talk about ordination of women, Bishop Gene Robinson, etc. He said he knows of no biblical argument against ordination of women in the Anglican Church, as bishops, but would vote against it now (not in the future, he hopes) simply because it would split the church all the more. . . . Back to London. Stopped at the British Library with its spectacular statue of Newton (à la Blake) in the courtyard, to see the exhibit of treasures. . . . Lunch with Stuart Morton in the Friends House restaurant. He is involved in peacemaking in northern India, trying to bring opposing factions together under Quaker auspices. Marjorie Sykes' work in the past gives them credibility. But his family situation is not great. Wife Willemina, from Zimbabwe, has experienced color-prejudice. But life in Zimbabwe is far worse than life in Birmingham. He seemed very happy to see us and to renew an old acquaintanceship. We heard about Chris Lawson, Tony Brown, David Gray, David Abbott, and others from our past at Woodbrooke. . . . To Islington, Almeida Theatre, to see Hedda Gabler, so well acted that the actors and actresses seemed truly to be the personages portrayed. What a horror Hedda is! What a destructive personality! At least in the end she destroys herself as well, not still another innocent victim. Such a powerful play! This visit we seemed to have specialized in horrible women: Miss Julie, the mother in Lorca, Hedda, Lady Macbeth.

Hanover

Home at 10:30 a.m. Immediately to Quaker business meeting because the budget was on the agenda. Later, back home, a distressing telephone call from John Rassias to report that Stelios Orphanoudakis is dying from his cancer. Later I spoke with Ava. Stelios is 56 years old, at the height of his career. But the cancer metastasized everywhere and he's a goner. He was being treated in Cyprus; they flew him back in an ambulance plane so that he could die at home. Now he's on heavy doses of morphine. She put the phone next to him and he said, groggily, "Hello, Peter"—that's all. Ava seems strong. What a shame! Such a good, useful person!

Friday, March 18, 2005

Stelios died in his sleep.

March 26, 2005

Cambridge

Fine production of Marlowe's "Dido, Queen of Carthage" at the A.R.T. Strange how everything seems to relate to my course at Brown. Aeneas's long, impassioned speech about the Fall of Troy is so moving. And of course Aeneas does not make the mistake of Antony with Cleopatra; he leaves Dido and fulfills his "manly" obligations to rule, and to found Rome. Dido in her final agony, deserted, broke into Virgil's Latin, very movingly.

March 27, 2005, Easter

Very good Meeting today. Dave Montgomery started it all off by saying that he couldn't believe in the resurrection and that those who do are horribly conservative politically. I told the story of Stylianos's whisper to me that they tell the common people about the afterlife because they need it. I said that to be remembered for something done well, something created, something given, is really enough of an "afterlife." Kesaya spoke beautifully as did Chris Dye and others. Afterwards, when the clerk asked for joys and sorrows, I told the sad story of Stelios's death. . . . Later we telephoned Crete and spoke at length with Eleni and Ava. Their home is now so empty. The Forth website has a beautiful obituary that I'll give to the Dartmouth Alumni Magazine and Thayer School also. . . . Easter lunch at Kendal with the Wilsons, Sapirs, Nicholsons.

Buffalo, NY

In Buffalo for a lecture on "Inventing Greece." My host, Jean Botsoglou, kindly arranged to take me to see the Joyce collection at the University of Buffalo library. And what a treasure it is! One of the curators brought out just a sampling—he said it was perhaps a fraction of 1% of the full holdings. What happened was that when Joyce needed to leave Paris precipitously to escape the Nazis, he and Nora left everything in the apartment as is. The apartment was looked after during the war by friends. After the war (with Joyce dead, of course), Nora decided to sell off the manuscripts, galley-proofs, etc., etc. These things were listed for auction and Buffalo was the only bidder! They got the whole lot for $10,000! (Recently, several items were purchased by the National Library in Dublin for many millions of euros.)

He showed us:

- An early printing of Finnegans Wake with typographical errors noted, many just commas inserted or deleted.
- Corrected galley proofs for FW, with numerous changes and additions in the margins.
- Holograph MS of Joyce's essay on the Portrait, in a very fair hand, with very few changes. Probably a fair copy.
- Notebook with ideas for FW, using Joyce's system of different colored crayons to indicate which ideas had been used, or needed to be used again.
- Sylvia Beach's copy of the first printing of Ulysses, with a dedicatory poem by Joyce inside, and the cover the pale blue and the white of the Greek flag. Apparently Joyce had insisted on this, despite the printer's difficulties in producing the blue. A handsome volume, obviously printed as a sort of luxury edition. This copy bound in leather by Beach. People were meant to bind, themselves, the paperback book, converting it to hard cover.

- Joyce's early version of the Ulysses chart, in Italian, with not much filled in regarding the Nostos, which Joyce hadn't begun to write yet.
- A notebook with ideas for "Stephen Hero."
- Holograph MS of the Proteus episode, looking quite similar to the final printed text, and beginning of course with "Ineluctable modality . . ."

The curator was of course very familiar with Michael Groden and also with his difficulty (and Buffalo's) owing to Stephen Joyce. He was impressed when I said that Groden had been introduced to Ulysses in my class at Dartmouth.

All in all, a rare, unexpected pleasure!

My talk, "Inventing Greece," was loudly opposed by one of the audience, who fulminated against Jews (!) and said that I should be describing how wonderful Greece is. But most in the audience disagreed with him and were embarrassed. Very lively question period. Afterwards, folks came up carrying ancient copies of Demotic Greek 1. Also, many purchased Life in the Tomb and the poetry anthology, all of which I had to sign. A good experience.

April 1, 2005

Hanover

Leander and family here, but Daphne couldn't come because all the children are sick. We went swimming (not me) in the pool. Sophia is now expert. Nicholas is still frightened, but trying.

April 2, 2005

Alice now here with Lori and the three girls. More swimming. Alice and I practiced the Warlock, which is coming along nicely, though I still need to learn all the notes. Run-through of harpsichord concert went fairly well. Eleven people at supper in the Kendal dining room. Leander and Deanna's concert was lovely. Mozart's sonata K. 526, amazing (Mozart's Kreutzer, as Leander calls it), then Prokofiev's Five Melodies; then Leander played Schumann's Träumerei in memory of mother, followed by some moments of silence; finally Brahms' sonata op. 90. Leander was so moved by playing the Schumann he could hardly concentrate on the Brahms, he told us later, but it didn't show, of course. . . . Afterward, lots of gracious people expressing their pleasure. Kingsley said it's the best concert he's ever heard at Kendal. Muncks came and Dick and Suzanne and Hunters and Shepherds and Bill Niles with Matthew. A good, appropriate tribute to Harriet Bien.

April 3, 2005

I played the Aria and two variations from Bach's Goldberg Variations at today's harpsichord recital. Not bad. Also accompanied Joan Wilson in Loeillet. That went very well.

April 4, 2005

Participated in choosing a student to receive $12,000 Lewin money to do a service project next year. My favorite was chosen by a 4 to 3 vote.

April 6, 2005

Driver's test and eye test. Passed. OK for five years.

April 7, 2005

My physical with Dr. Chris Allen. All's well. Cholesterol at 169. Prostate antigen zero. Liver function OK. He recommends colonoscopy in 2006.

April 8, 2005

Christian and Holly Wolff joined us for supper. He's interested in Kendal, probably more than she is. They've invited us to their farm.

April 9, 2005

Appropriate memorial service for Bart Cadbury, who died a few days ago. (I saw them bringing him out in a body bag when I went down to the garage.)

April 10, 2005

Kathy Shepherd and I did a mediation simulation in First Day School with kids about 10 years old, and wow! are they sophisticated, especially Frank Miles's grandchild.

April 11, 2005

Fred Berthold spoke at our professors' colloquium on theodicy: the problem of evil. Too much attention to St. Augustine. But he agrees with process theology. . . . Met Gail and Ruth Schoppert at Peking-Tokyo. Gail is so discouraged by Stefanakis that, like me, he's not going to the May board meeting in Greece. Stefanakis is clearly telling lies about Mimi Cobb, who sent all of us an anguished account of her tribulations.

April 12, 2005

Providence

I showed the Ulysses film in class and really watched it this time, very emotionally.

April 14, 2005

Philadelphia

A lovely five hours with Peter Mackridge, who came down from Princeton and met me at the Art Museum. We spent the next 2+ hours in the extraordinary Dali exhibit there. Such talent! As always, in this type of retrospective exhibit, one could see his growth, from representational subjects to a bit of cubism, a bit of Picasso-like exaggeration, and then, slowly, to his forte: surrealism, in which madness is always represented not with fog but with meticulous detail; finally back to semi-representationality spurred by the Spanish Civil War and then World War II. One of the Civil War paintings is fully as moving as Picasso's famous Guernica. We both liked in particular his view of a woman, seen from behind, leaning on a windowsill and looking out to the vista of the Mediterranean beyond. . . . Afterwards, supper at Pietro's, where we used to go with Alec and family. Also, I showed him the Kimmel Center.

April 15, 2005

Pendle Hill

Pendle Hill's fruit trees in full bloom, magnificent. I was moved to minister in Meeting: "Arriving here last night from frozen New Hampshire, where our lakes are still covered with ice, and seeing the magic of Pendle Hill's grounds this morning, I remember a story about St. Francis. Francis left his hermitage one morning and stood before a tree, still bare. "Speak to me of God," he said to the tree. And the tree blossomed. . . . At pamphlets committee I failed to convince the others to say Yes to John Radebaugh's rewritten memoir. So, lots of effort with no result. But we happily approved Janeal Ravndal's account of her seven days in prison. Earlier, we heard that Bill Tabor had died. . . . We had a special trustees' meeting about finance, with Steve again requesting our full support and discernment re: whether to keep trying the "vision" (Chester, Peace program), or to return to the "traditional" (resident program, short courses, pubs). We favored the former. . . . At 4:00 some of us were taken to Chester, to a meeting in a church with about fifteen Afro-American teenagers all of whom are on parole. Two leaders led them (and us) through various exercises and games meant to emphasize sharing. Fun. Pendle Hill is paying for all this, which is splendid. The kids get an evening meal also, which apparently is more than they often get at home. . . . The evening meeting enabled various students to describe their projects. As always, the spirit here is infectious. After 10:00 p.m. I played piano until midnight: Warlock and Schubert.

April 16, 2005

Pendle Hill

Cadbury Committee over breakfast. We chose a scientist for a change, which is nice. Then Communications Committee with Gay as acting chair. Mike Heller very useful, also Anthony Manousos. Staff person Shirley Dodson, of course. I keep reminding them that we ought to start publishing books again at some point. Trustees met briefly over lunch. We told Steve that we want to give the “vision” a bit more time. Then Communications again, airport, hotel.

April 17, 2005

Pendle Hill

Edwin Butenhof’s Interfaith Gathering consisted of a sermon mostly against pacifism. But we all stay friends, and had a cordial lunch afterwards.

April 18, 2005

I posted Kazantzakis’s Politics of the Spirit, volume 2, to Princeton University Press!!!

Providence

Chrysanthi came along this time. Good class; students spoke about plans for their final paper and selected a favorite poem from the packet I gave. A candidate for the post next year, Marinos Pourgouris, attended also and contributed usefully. Afterwards, a nice dinner with Elsa, Marinos, and Livanos. . . . I gave NH-VT brochures to the Bonanza bus driver who told me she wants to tour our region on her holiday.

Riparius

To the farm. Sunshine. Planted peas, beets, carrots. Placed batteries in the John Deere and the White. Rescued Mann’s “Death in Venice” for Chrysanthi to read. No leaves yet, but beautiful nevertheless. . . . Home by 6:30 in order for me to go to Norwich Inn for a “stag party” honoring Chris Dye, who’ll be married next Saturday. His lawyer friends, Lafayette, Bob Daubenspeck, David Rakyta. Lots of good talk, especially with the lawyers, one of whom, a reformed alcoholic, recounted his experiences. He is now recovering also from evangelical religion! . . . I received $60,000 from Mother's custody account. Gave $11,000 each today to Leander and Alec.

April 25, 2005

Dear Gay [Berger],

Yesterday, in Meeting, Leonard Cadwallader ministered so beautifully about his dedication to community, and in a way that evidenced his spiritual connection so vividly, that suddenly, and really for the first time, I felt that we had made a real mistake in choosing Steve Baumgartner to direct Pendle Hill.

The essential difference between Steve and the rest of us is that he has no Quaker qualities—nothing that evidences itself in either the spoken or (more importantly) unspoken manner so apparent yesterday in Leonard.

I hadn't thought this before, but I do now: Maybe the prime reason that I'm eager to sever all connection with Pendle Hill since I'm rotating off the board (in other words, resigning also from the pamphlets working group) is my lack of pleasure in working with Steve. I supported him, of course, in recruiting Niyonu, and feel good about that. And I think the Chester program is marvelous (I'm not at all sure about the Peace initiative). But he doesn't light a spark in me the way Dan Seeger did or Margery Walker before him, both so effortlessly Quakerly in their personalities.

Oh well . . . just some thoughts . . .

Back now (appropriately!) to my essay on Light.

Providence

Another good class, this time on Kazantzakis's Odyssey. Afterwards, to Susan and Peter Allen's for supper with them and daughter Eveline and her friend Mara from Romania. Family style, around the table, very nice. I made a pitch with Peter for a Kendal in Greece since he's on the Anatolia College board of trustees.

April 28, 2005

Ken Yalowitz spoke well at Kendal about why the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991. He was there, in Moscow on the very day. We had supper with him and Judy beforehand, together with Howard and Sally Wriggins, Dick and Karen Sheldon, and Charles McLane, for obvious reasons, given their careers. I introduced Ken, speaking about the Dickey Center.

April 29, 2005

Supper with about fifty people at Hanover Inn on the eve of Kesaya Noda's wedding to Chris Dye. Afterwards, Chris asked each and every person to stand and describe his or her relationship to the bride and/or groom. Fascinating. Chris's sister from Dublin with her Irish (lady) partner. Das and wife from Tokyo. Another Dartmouth grad who said he'd taken Comparative Literature from me in 1968. Lot's of Kishis from California. When my turn came I mentioned my vetting of Kesaya's book on Livingston and my good word for her when President Wright was looking for an assistant.

April 30, 2005

Eight-hand piano in the morning: Smetana and Bach, with Joan Snell, Joan Wilson, and Co Emlen. Afterwards Joan Wilson and I tried the Warlock, which she sightreads beautifully. . . . At 1:00 p.m., off to the Dartmouth skiway (named for the McLanes and designed by Treat Arnold's partner) for the wedding, Quaker style. Two hundred twenty-five people. I started the worship by describing the nature of silence to the group, most of whom were not Quakers. In ministry, I said, rise out of the silence and sink back into it. Think of all of us as covered by a large blanket or tarpaulin. When you rise you stretch that cover, give it a sort of bump, but do not break through it. Then, when you sit, it returns to its original shape, as though undisturbed. The Meeting went well. Chris and Kesaya said their vows faultlessly. There was much ministry, including Lafayette speaking at length about Kesaya's girlhood. Then everyone signed the certificate, and two hundred twenty-five people were fed a catered dinner, followed by songs, a fiddler, etc. Home at 9:00 p.m.

May 3, 2005

Next to last class, devoted to students' presentations of their final papers. So many were imaginative, ambitious, and successful. I can't remember having such a talented class. Let's see now if these papers read as well as they sounded orally.

May 5, 2005

Since I'm going off the Pendle Hill board and Publications Committee, I thought it would be interesting to make a résumé of my Pendle Hill service. Here's what I found:

PETER BIEN'S INVOLVEMENT WITH PENDLE HILL

Providence

My last class. Students presented their final papers, some exceedingly good. One did paintings of the Odyssey & Ulysses, using power point to project them. Lots that I had never seen. Another did Virginia Woolf's reactions to Ulysses, again using material new to me and important. Class went until 7:10. At 7:30, friends picked me up for a farewell dinner at Milona's house: Elsa, Dimitris, Milona, her husband and daughter, and Ott from admissions (who'd known Alec when she was at Bryn Mawr), and a grad student. Leisurely dinner with lots and lots of talk. To bed at 12:30 a.m.

May 14, 2005

Izzy Ganz here with her young pianist, Charles Tauber; we picked them up in Rutland last night; the train arrived at 12:10 a.m. (!), an hour late. Bed at 2:00 a.m. Supper today with Lisa and Connie. Then the concert: musical comedy songs by Gershwin, Kurt Weill, Tom Lehrer, Bernstein. Audience sing-along for "Those were the days." Izzy vivacious and very professional. Charlie a superb pianist. Yet, really, Mozart or Brahms are better. How clear it is that these songs are ephemeral, whereas the great classics are not. And Izzy's voice, although technically accomplished, lacks magic. She's not a Lotte Lehmann. . . . Their friends the Duphtys joined us for drinks afterwards and then took both musicians home, in Strafford.

May 15, 2005

Gordon Browne conducted the ecumenical service, speaking about his visit to Hiroshima, movingly. I hope that he can expand this into a Pendle Hill pamphlet and that the result will be better than Radebaugh's. We met Izzy and Charles in Woodstock and returned them to AM-TRAK in Rutland, then continued on to the farm. Supper in our favorite restaurant in Lake George. The owner recognized me at once, told me that Anne, the waitress from Poland, will be back in 2007. Her friend from Romania was working again and very friendly. She's married to an American now, and lives in Glens Falls.

Riparius

Planted 40 seedling evergreens given us by Lafayette. Tilled the garden and put in the 2nd planting. Fixed the grape vine better and added additional posts. Read and marked one more Brown final paper (I've done all of them now, but one still has not been submitted). Got the tractor off its blocks but couldn't start it. Starter goes click-click-click, that's all. I'm charging the battery overnight to see if anything better happens tomorrow. We're both hungry and tired after so much physical activity.

May 19, 2005

New York

Flew down last afternoon and had a full roast beef dinner at the Yale Club: salad, wine, dessert, coffee, for free because May is my birthday month. Amazing. This morning: to the Roosevelt Hotel to be interviewed by a Hollywood company, on film, regarding Scorsese's Last Temptation. Started with the make-up expert who greased and powdered my face, improved my eyebrows, etc. Then answered questions for an hour, on Kazantzakis, the film, myself, Schrader. Should be lively. . . . Back home in time to dine with the Webster committee, including Sally Pinkas, who was very lively. She hopes to furnish us a marvelous Bulgarian violinist next season.

May 20, 2005

A huge lunch at the Inn honoring John Rassias for his contributions to Dartmouth alumni. John spoke in his usual exuberant manner, not saying much. But a standing ovation followed. Former student Mosenthal told me he remembered Comparative Literature 47 with great pleasure, as have other students. That was probably my best course: Joyce, Kafka, Mann, Proust. We had also sent him to Birmingham to work with Paul Morby, very meaningful in his life. . . . Flew in the late afternoon to Philadelphia. . . . Managed an hour in my office this morning, adding more good quotes from Gregory Palamas on light, all of which insist that it is not "created."

May 21, 2005

Pendle Hill, then to NYC

Long trustees meeting with Niyonu reporting on her initiatives to get the Resident Program in better shape, and other projected changes —e.g., making Tom and Charlie redundant, not replacing Denny, promoting Carol Sciaira, etc. But chiefly, should we keep destroying the endowment (another $2,000,000 between now and 2008) or go back to the "traditional" Pendle Hill, in which case Steve said at first that he would resign (although maybe Mickey convinced him otherwise), or hope that Joey can raise funds by next year to keep Chester, Youth, and Peace going. We expect to decide on June 19, God help us.

May 22, 2005

NYC

Met Howard Dossor at the Yale Club. He's in New York, from Melbourne. He gave me a play he has written but cannot produce because Stavrou never answers his letters. I didn't know that he was an ordained Congregational minister who left the ministry in disgust and then became a teacher. We talked energetically about Kazantzakis and the film, etc. for 2½ hours. I then rushed to Columbus Circle to hear a recital of new music benefiting Classical Action. Nice to see Charlie Hamlen again after a long time. One of the first selections was a setting of Molly Bloom's last words, for mezzo-soprano. Very nice. Splendid singer. New music very accessible.

May 23, 2005

Jay Parini is here. Old friends! So easy, as though no time intervened. He read poetry in the Gathering Room most effectively, and was applauded for his anti-Bush verse. Introducing him I said how nice that he is here as a poet, which is how I first knew him, before all the novels, biographies, and critical writings. His book on Tolstoy is still perhaps going to become a movie, starring Anthony Hopkins.

May 24, 2005

Mats Lemberger brought eight Green Key Dartmouth students and they dined with 30+ of us in the Steere Room: emeriti professors and alumni. Each person stood up and told his or her story briefly. So many of the alums had been in World War II. One of the students is of Turkish parents. A very moving experience, to see how all of us are connected with Dartmouth.

May 25, 2005

Visited Christian and Holly Woolf and youngest son on their farm in Vermont. Inherited from her parents. Three houses, two big barns, sheep, horses. They grow all their own hay. Mostly Holly's work. Christian is often in Europe, very active as a composer. Chrysanthi took a shine to Holly.

May 26, 2005

A team from Woodbury College, including their president, came to do a presentation on mediation at Kendal. I invited Michael Levengood, Kendal's acting executive director, to sup with them. The simulated mediation was so-so, the mediator one of their students. She forgot some of the elementary techniques, alas. Very small audience: embarrassing, partly because our advertisement had said meditation instead of mediation! In my introduction, I told about Bob Reich's remark to me: "Litigation never changes anyone's heart; mediation has the chance to do this."

May 27, 2005

Farm. Started the tractor this time, after cleaning battery terminals well with steel wool. But I broke the Ford mower almost instantly. The brackets holding the pitman rod sheered off, instead of the pitman rod breaking. Bud Ruddick, amazingly, says he has a replacement part. Next time. Fertilized the garden. The trees we planted are still there. Saw Donna and Ed, whose cabin is now erected. Met the padrona of Sicilian Pizza in Warrensburg, when we were both buying flowers. She calls me "Professor."

May 28, 2005

Back to Hanover in time for supper at the Muncks'. Chrysanthi gave me a cap as a birthday present. Tedious conversation over dinner, except with one of the guests who is in the Vermont legislature. Kendal socializing is better—supper until 7:00, then home.

May 29, 2005

John and Mary Rassias for supper in the apartment. Chrysanthi will be teaching ALPS in July and maybe a three-day intensive course August 1 to 3. John invited me to do the three-day refresher in French, gratis.

June 1, 2005

Met the new War/Peace Fellows at the Dickey Center. Some contemplate peace-advocacy after graduation. Tom Corl will host them at the Red Cross next May if we wish. . . . Dick and Allan for music: our last Wednesday until next September.

June 2, 2005

Long lunch with Jack Shepherd. He'll be going to Africa in the fall. We're planning another lunch in early September before he leaves.

June 3, 2005

Events Committee. We're planning for Bishop Robinson's talk in early September. Ginia Allison chaired her last meeting. . . . Warm pot-luck at the Meeting House to say goodbye to Christine Linares and Ellis. Too bad none of us knows the Pendle Hill farewell song.

June 4, 2005

Supper at the Marders'. Lots of gossip about the Farm School. Everett wants to be a trustee. I submitted his credentials to T. Jewett. The news is that Stefanakis is still antipathetic, as is his wife. They removed their son from Pinewood School and brought him back to Boston. Rumor has it that Stefanakis wants to leave. But the board, of course, will turn coward and do nothing, I predict.

June 5, 2005

Three-hour lunch at EBA's, after Meeting, with Nodas, Sydney, Hunters—our "gang." Sydney told about Bill's death at age 47, from emphysema. He was a heavy smoker and drinker. Had only  $\frac{1}{3}$  of his lung functioning. Lafayette is 90.

June 6, 2005

Finance Committee. They're following my suggestion that we pay the $38,200 needed to retire the entire mortgage. Business Meeting will decide on the 12th.

June 7, 2005

Boston

Drove to Boston. Parked under the Common. Got settled in Beacon Hill Friends House. To Cambridge. Supper in the Charles Hotel, very ample. Then a marvelous performance at A.R.T. of Eugene O'Neill's Desire Under the Elms, a masterpiece. O'Neill was influenced at first by Strindberg, then by Sophocles and Aeschylus. The Greek element very evident in this production, which by lowering the lights effected something like choral interludes. And of course Abbie's infanticide recalls Medea's. Raymond Barry a very persuasive father: Ephriam Cabot. Mickey Solis a fine Eben. The theme of rocks so meaningful to us from our own experiences in the Adirondacks. Also the theme, indeed obsession, of possessing what one has created by oneself, in this case the Cabots' farm, threatened to be stolen from them by Abbie. Wonderful acting, indeed just as good as British.

June 8, 2005

Boston–Manchester

To South Station after breakfast in Palmer House hotel. Chrysanthi to Washington via AMTRAK. I then drove to Manchester airport to wait for Alice's arrival at 7:30 from Phoenix. But her plane was grounded at Chicago owing to bad weather. At 8:30 I drove home. She arrived, finally at 11:00 p.m. and stayed overnight in a hotel.

June 9, 2005

Kinhaven

To Kinhaven with Alice. We started practicing our piece: Peter Warlock's "Capriol Suite." And I'm trying to get my Schubert andante ready for performance on Saturday. Wonderful solo recital by David Abbot: Beethoven Opus 31 #1, Chopin, Rachmaninoff, and Bach as an encore. Very powerful, controlled playing. Afterwards, as I was talking to him, he remembered Daphne, a student here 20 years ago when he was a teacher. He lives in Switzerland and has a good job, but is recently divorced from his Swiss wife, and misses America. I told him about Cheever's story about the woman living in Europe who suddenly discovers why she is not content: she cannot get a BLT. . . . Nice to see Ignat again, and Nigel, and Mrs. Shin, and Nancy, and Bruno.

June 10, 2005

Kinhaven

Very hot. I bought a fan at the Vermont Country Store. Lots of practice with Alice on the Warlock, and alone on the Schubert. The highlight of the faculty four-hand recital was Leander and Ignat doing the Schubert Fantasia in F minor, magnificently. Wonderfully moving, with great pianissimos. I kidded Ignat afterward, because I remember him saying when he and Leander did an all-Schubert program in Washington that he'd never include the Fantasia. He explained that it is overdone, to the exclusion of several other Schubert compositions of equal quality.

June 11, 2005

Four-hand coaching from Leander, very helpful especially regarding my technical difficulties. In the evening, the solo recital. I was first and did the Schubert quite well, I think, with only one little technical glitch that I think I covered over fairly well. Mrs. Shin, Nigel, Leander, and Nancy all told me afterwards that it was very well played. And why don't I take lessons?! Alice did two Mendelssohn Songs Without Words, the first exquisitely, but the second, technically more demanding, didn't work so well. . . . Nice talk with Charlotte Armstrong yesterday. She's reading the Iliad and Ovid. I'll send her my notes. Also long talks with Bill Rhoads about his work at the Fairbanks company in St. Johnsbury and his reading to the blind. . . . The heat continues. I've spent the day barefoot and in shorts. The fan helps.

June 12, 2005

Up early to have 7:00 to 8:00 a.m. on the concert hall piano, with Alice. Then a private lesson with Mrs. Shin on the Schubert, which was excellent. As always, it's the details that count, and she showed me details throughout. Lots more practicing of the Warlock with Alice, with moderate improvement, lots of problems remaining. Master class conducted brilliantly (as always) by Ignat, for Steve Kline, who was impressive in playing a demanding sonata by Scriabin, then for Mrs. Lawson, who did Beethoven. Ignat's diagnostic ability is extraordinary, as are his powers of articulation. Among other things, he told us that all Schirmer editions of Beethoven, etc. are garbage, but the Schnabel Beethoven is OK because Schnabel's suggestions are good and are always labeled as his, not Beethoven's. . . . After supper, Alice and I tried the Warlock some more and then began sight-reading some possibilities for next year, specifically Rachmaninoff and Moszkowski (Spanish Dance). We also tried to revive some of last year's Townsend.

June 13, 2005

Very good coaching in the morning from Nancy. What a difference it makes! She said everyone is talking about my Schubert. Mrs. Shin keeps saying, "You're so musical." And: "Why don't you take lessons?" "My last lesson," I keep repeating, was when I was 22 or 23 years old. 53 years ago." . . . Lots of practice today with Alice, incorporating what Nancy suggested about tempi, accents, dynamics. Given a miracle, it will be OK tomorrow. . . . Quick trip to Weston to use the free computer terminal offered by the Country Store. In the evening, a stirring recital by Nigel: Beethoven Opus 10 #2 and Opus 31 #2 (Tempest) separated by Six Little Piano Pieces, Opus 19, by Schönberg, very nice. And the Beethoven was noble. Then a very jazzy piece by his colleague at U-Mass, followed by Liszt's "Les Jeux d'Eaux à la Villa d'Este" and a gorgeous Liszt "Liebestraum" as the encore. So delicately played. . . . Before the concert, Leander addressed everyone about the Kinhaven spirit: non-competitive, non-judgmental. He told me afterwards that there had been an unfortunate incident. . . . Nice conversation again with Charlotte Armstrong over wine and cheese.

June 14, 2005

Kinhaven

Alice and I performed the Capriol credibly, although one final chord came in two parts instead of simultaneously together. We did a run-through at 6:45 a.m. that helped, probably. Lots of other really musical duet pieces, and some not so musical. Fun to hear people play selections that I did in the past: the Barber, Dvořák, Poulenc, for example. . . . Fond goodbyes, “see you next year.” Home with Alice, who took a 5:00 p.m. bus to get to Lori’s. Piles of mail, e-mail, phone messages, as always.

June 15, 2005

Hanover

Spent the afternoon, supper, and part of the evening with John Tallmadge and his two daughters, Rosalind and Elizabeth. Ros is looking at colleges. I gave her a good tour, stressing art history and studio art, her interests. John is 58 years old and now once again unemployed, although he sees this as an opportunity for diversification. His wife, Pam, has a steady income, health insurance for the family, etc. A lovely reunion. He kept repeating that I was his “Nestor” at Dartmouth, exemplifying a life style as well as scholarly attributes. . . . After supper we picked up Chrysanthi from AMTRAK. In the apartment I played my Schubert and the Capriol and John tried a Chopin Nocturne, which he murdered. But it’s good to try.

June 16, 2005

Hanover–Riparius

Breakfast with John and daughters. Then we drove to Riparius, which is very wet. Road washed out in places but still passable. Impossible to mow. We tended the garden a bit, opened shutters, organized. Wonderful to be here.

June 17, 2005

A miracle. The phone company installed Ethernet service for my computer, which now accesses internet and e-mail speedily, with no dial-up to a modem. Marvelous. But the television doesn’t work, perhaps because of all the rain. . . . I mowed a little, in between showers. We went to North Creek to shop. Saw Mrs. Schaffer, who reported that Don, aged 68, has heart disease. Treated ourselves to pie from the NC bakery. Lots of mail. I played the piano, which actually sounds and works better than some of the Kinhaven grand pianos. . . . Doug Gwyn responded helpfully to my Quaker Light essay, but worried that I use only the Greek approach with John's gospel and say nothing about Hebrew influences. I'll try to fix this. Paul Lacey also responded favorably. I'll quote some passages from his own lecture on light.

June 18, 2005

To Philadelphia

Lunch at the Shapiros', where Chrysanthi will stay during my absence. Fran, aged 91, had both knees replaced and is doing quite well, although still experiencing pain. Irv is painting more and more, better and better. . . . AMTRAK from Albany to Philadelphia, then SEPTA because the Avis place closes early on Saturday. A long trip, but I worked on Quaker Light, and the Pendle Hill materials (dire!), etc. I do not look forward to tomorrow's board meeting, although I hope to see Dan Seeger, who's there for AFSC. . . . Speaking of boards, Vouli telephoned to speak again of how horrible things are at the Farm School. Then the NYC fundraiser resigned, sending us all a long letter detailing how Stefanakis made his job impossible. I am repeating to Phil Foote that we must save the School from another year with this disastrous leader. If we don't, the School's pain will be our fault as much as Stefanakis's. But Phil, so far, is not willing to take this step. Among other things, Stefanakis apparently masterminded a contract that would extract about $200,000 from us if we fire him. . . . Arrived late at Pendle Hill, walking from Wallingford SEPTA station. Immediately met our friend from Australia, the Cadbury Fellow, who has actually written something on Quakers and Catholics. Then played the beautiful Yamaha piano: Beethoven and Debussy. Slept in the "Museum" room in Chace of one of the staff, who occupies a suite. Saw Schyler Cunningham, who said he'd meet me at breakfast to talk about the Chester program.

June 19, 2005

Schyler never showed up for breakfast. Met a woman who lives in Cobb Hill, the commune established by Donella Meadows. We talked about Ann Armbricht, who left the community. . . . After Meeting for Worship, saw Paul Lacey and thanked him for his lecture on Light; saw Dan Seeger and arranged for lunch; saw Don McNemar, now living in Boston, teaching, and serving on the AFSC board. And others. . . . Then the time of truth: the board. We met from 10:00 a.m. until 4:00 p.m. with an hour off for lunch. Steve recommended the “severe” option: cutting Peace, Chester, Youth program, reducing the staff by 10 to 2, basically acknowledging his (and our) failure in achieving the Vision. Everyone lamenting, only Gay and Pat seemed willing to take the risk of drawing another two to three millions out of our $9,000,000 endowment. I was convinced that to do this would be truly bad management, and reluctantly concurred with the motion to curtail the Vision. Steve thinks he can now reduce the 2006 deficit to $250,000. We’ll see. . . . Nice quick lunch, at Wendy’s of course, with Don Seeger, who apparently really will leave San Francisco in a month (maybe). We caught up on children, his foster son and family, and San Francisco, which he loves. He’s already been asked to lead the Democratic Party in Lumberton, and said No. . . . Read Dodd on the 4th Gospel. Not much. I need his earlier book. AMTRAK to Albany. Late. Got to Shapiros at midnight. Overnight there, then breakfast on the 20th. Fran at age 91 is doing beautifully after two knees replaced.

Got Dodd’s “The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel” from Dartmouth. Exactly what I needed. Incorporated information, thanks to him, on Philo, the Corpus Hermeticum, Wisdom literature, and more on Stoicism and Neoplatonism. Finished this draft today, working most of the day in intense heat and humidity. But in the afternoon Bud Ruddick’s man came and fixed the Ford mower, miraculously finding a used part. The other day I started Alec’s Pathfinder and also the Jeep, removing both from the barn because I wanted to stand on the roof of the Jeep to try to reach the branches that are obstructing our satellite television. But they were still too high. So I contracted with a tree company to come and trim those plus other branches that are too close to various roofs. Just around the house I’ve mowed first with the Troy-Bilt, then with the White, trimming with the line trimmer, and everything looks splendid. Fields have very high and thick hay owing to all the rain in past weeks. Garden doing well so far. Ants in office beam but my spray seems to be killing them since my table each morning is covered with shriveled corpses. . . . Long Pendle Hill conference call yesterday. The board decided to restore the Youth programs and a modified Chester program. Deficit will be $500,000. Strangely, I was one of the most conservative, warning against future bankruptcy. Gay Berger admitted that I convinced her. The other side was represented chiefly by Ted Brinton, who felt we should maintain the Vision and all go out and raise money for it. So we compromised. . . . The Farm School is in a real mess. Apparently the TEE and Lyceum teachers have called for Stefanakis's immediate dismissal. Today we all received an unsigned letter detailing Stefanakis's accomplishments (Minoutis probably). John Cleave and Waring Partridge have reacted strongly against Phil Foote's evaluation that calls for dismissal. Tomorrow the board will indulge in a conference call that promises to be tempestuous, but interesting.

June 28, 2005

Surprisingly, Zannas reported that even the Greek trustees, with two exceptions, say that Stefanakis must go, not because he is so terrible but chiefly because things have gone downhill so far already that no remedy is possible. Just about everyone on the phone agreed. So he'll get notice shortly, and then we'll see if we can get rid of him for less than $300,000. . . . Bud Rodick's man came again and fixed the Ford mower for $500. But it works. I finished the north field.

July 1, 2005

Proofs of my Renan article for Darren's book arrived. Filled with typographical errors and faulty copyediting. It has taken me two days to set them right. . . . Mowed Alec's field, which now looks lovely. . . . Chrysanthi and I have been watching an interesting video on Alexander the Great showing Kabul, Samarkand, the Indus, etc., the localities he traversed, and making him out a war criminal, sadist, egomaniac, as well as a sort of driven genius.

Sunday, July 3, 2005

Camp Backlog

Judy Cadbury invited us to come and be present for the interment of Warder's ashes. Joel met us with the boat. The first person I greeted when we arrived was Tom Brown, now 93 years old and sound in mind and body. He ministered well, in a firm voice, at Meeting for Worship in front of the backlog, about 25 people present. Judy ministered too, about Warder. Then we all went to a young balsam prepared for the interment and Joel and Judy poured ashes into holes around it. We all sang a hymn before and another after, two of Warder's favorites. Judy spoke again about him and their marriage. She's Canadian, was not a Quaker, and said, humorously, that she helped prevent hemophilia owing to all the intermarriage of the Cadbury, Brown, and Borton families. Chrysanthi and I then spent probably  $\frac{3}{4}$  hour with her at her tent, listening to her incessant monologue about Warder's depression, their marital troubles, his electric and shock therapy, his lying on the couch all day long, and the difficulties with Joel, who also is subject to depression, as was Henry Cadbury, she said. So it's in the genes also. Henry was a deficient father, too busy being a great, famous man. Warder suffered. He tried to do better, and he and Joel had a close relationship, although Joel seems very troubled, 40 years old and not yet finished with his Ph.D. Finally the bell rang for lunch: turkey and all the trimmings. Tom Brown elaborated on Plato and Aristotle as dinner conversation and said that death is necessary and actually sweetens life. I told him about my "On Retiring to Kendal (and Beyond)," which says the same; I'll send him a copy. After lunch Joel returned us in the boat, with Judy, too. She walked us to our parked car and then kept us for an hour with another interminable monologue. No wonder Warder had depression! Driving home we both felt enervated by her, but, poor thing, she means well. She's just very lonely. Said she couldn't bear to enter the Indian Lake house for a year after his death.

July 4, 2005

Chrysanthi's Hoover vacuum doesn't suck. I spent the whole afternoon taking it completely apart to check for blockages and found none. Miraculously put it back together properly. One belt is broken. We'll replace it and see what happens. . . . Watching Britten's "Death in Venice" video, which is inferior to the staged production I saw. . . . Chrysanthi said I was like Henry Cadbury, always busy and working, not spending enough time with the children. Perhaps. But we did lots together here at the farm. . . . Leander is such an attentive father that he doesn't fulfill himself as a composer. That's the other side of the story.

July 7, 2005

Yesterday and today watched Peter Sellers' video of Don Giovanni. He's made Giovanni and Leporello Hispanic slum-dwellers. At the final banquet they eat big macs and when Giovanni praises vino he drinks a McDonald's milkshake. But beautifully sung. On the 5th we saw Balanchine's "Midsummer Night's Dream" at SPAC, celebrating the 40th anniversary of the NYC ballet at SPAC, beginning with "Midsummer Night's Dream" in 1966. Not as imaginative as other Balanchine ballets, except maybe for the donkey. . . . Finished Renan proofs for Darren's books.

July 9, 2005

To Hanover yesterday so that Chrysanthi could start the ALPS program in Greek. Stayed away from supper yesterday in order to avoid watching John do his customary antics. Went today. Nice group of students, including one who will be an intern at Anatolia starting in August. . . . Finished vetting my proofs for David Holden. Practiced. Tried my Goldberg on the harpsichord. . . . Eagerly awaiting news about Stefanakis's reaction to our devastatingly negative evaluation.

July 10, 2005

Alec and family arrived safely at JFK from Bangkok. He's going to South Salem as first stop and then, if not too tired, to the farm. . . . At Meeting today, long talk with Mats Lemberger, whom I'm trying to interest in becoming a Farm School intern for 2006–07.

July 11, 2005

Randolph, NH

Long drive from Hanover to Randolph. Very beautiful, especially near Randolph itself, which sits directly in back of Mount Adams. Welcomed by Avery and Peg Post, then Jim and Harriet Baldwin, the Hortons, and others. I lectured on "Death in Venice." Afterwards, a man came up and said he'd been on the second floor of A-entry, Lowell House, when I was on the fifth floor. Amazing. But neither of us for the moment could remember the name: Lowell. Another man said he'd run the Open University Seminar at Dartmouth, which was sabotaged, he said, by the humanists. Afterwards, leisurely lunch at the Baldwins', with about a dozen of the group. They want me back next year, but it's a very long way from Riparius, as I discovered on the return trip—four hours, over the Port Henry Bridge. But I returned early enough to greet Alec and Monica.

July 15, 2005

Alec and I have been re-shingling the small roof over the connecting room. We finished today and rewarded ourselves with dinner at Hall of Springs and ballet: "Octet" (Mendelssohn/Martins), "Agon" (Stravinsky/Balanchine), and "Union Jack" (Balanchine), none of which I'd seen before. "Agon" is of course very pure and cerebral. "Union Jack" is the opposite: a wonderful show: costumes, scenery, 70 dancers on stage, humor, acrobatics, pure fun. Martins' "Octet" very satisfying, too.

July 16, 2005

Long visit by Don and Maria Kurka, here for only five days because Maria has to return to Tennessee for a green card interview and to care for her ailing father. Don has sold some of his land. But they hope to return for a longer period next summer. . . . Telephoned Chrysanthi to wish her happy anniversary (tomorrow). She said she'd completely forgotten. It's only the 50th!

July 17, 2005

Drove to Kinhaven for lunch catered to present and former trustees. Nice to see Bill Polk again, and Jonathan Richmond and John Austin. Then a marvelous concert, starting with the orchestra doing a Shostakovich symphony. Caroline is still there, and Peter Schultz and Mary Watt, and Jerry is walking with a cane, suffering from arthritis, but he conducted beautiful madrigals. A treat, as always.

July 21, 2005

Alec is placing cedar shingles on the playroom wall, finally, after 30+ years. I'm making a window frame so that we can have a glass window for that room. 45-degree corners secured by dowels, rabbited with the router. Pretty bad result, I fear, but usable. . . . Today Dan Fones, wife, and son arrived and spent all morning trimming the ash behind our cabin (to facilitate television and to remove branches overhanging the roof), the cherry next to the barn, then several pines overhanging the Guest House. Finally they took down two large dead trees in the rock pile in Leander's field. Then everything was fed into a chipper; thus we now have a large pile of chips. And television!

July 22, 2005

Hearing that Alvin Millington was dying, at age 81, with a brain tumor, all of us went over the Millington district to pay our final respects. He reacted minimally but perhaps was aware. Mrs. Millington has Alzheimer's and was all smiles. The youngest daughter was feeding her father a little and looking very pretty. We stopped to see Dale, whose new, young wife, Monica, is a vivacious beauty. Then David arrived. I wanted to see him because he is child number 2, after Roy, and the one I knew best in the 1950s. I remember him climbing the greased pole at the Warrensburg fair. But now he is immensely fat and he told me that he has an incurable lung disease the result of driving a cement truck. He can't work, and has no resources except social security. Poor man! Alvin, who fathered ten children and was nothing much in life, now obviously achieved his true role as paterfamilias, with the whole clan gathered round (except Billy, the youngest, who's a hopeless alcoholic). Very touching.

July 23, 2005

Alvin died last night. . . . I'm very sick, with some sort of flu and a temperature of 101. Alec drove me with Chrysanthi to the Warrensburg Health Center and I had a good examination, being instructed not to try to get better by shingling roofs, mowing, raking, and constructing window frames.

July 29, 2005

Leander arrived with Sophia and Nicholas in time for Alec's 47th birthday supper, topped off with a large blueberry pie made by Chrysanthi from our own blueberries. We finished the playroom wall. I made the window frame and screen-frame. Alec did the shingles, caulking, etc. I still need to make a shutter. It looks very nice indeed, after decades with tar paper. Also finished mowing around the pond with the John Deere, Troy-Bilt, Leander's rotary, and the scythe.

July 31, 2005

To NYC

Drove to the AMTRAK station in Rensselaer but couldn't go the usual route because the bridge collapsed. I got shunted into Empire Plaza where luckily a parking attendant told me, more or less, an alternative route. Luckily I had time to spare. In NYC went straightway to MoMA for the first time since its renovation. Lovely to see a Debra and Leon Black gallery on the 5th floor, filled with delicious Picassos, Giacomettis, Matisse's, Mirós. The special exhibit on the 6th floor graced the close friendship and partnership of Cézanne and Pissarro for about twenty years as Cézanne, especially, was developing his distinctive style. . . . To Izzy Ganz's apartment on 22nd and 9th for supper with her and Abbie at a very good Chinese restaurant on 9th and 24th. Abbie is a character. He even wrote a fake "personal" in one of the papers advertising for a female sexual partner, and got 35 replies. He is a student of Stalinism and had heard of Victor Serge. He's 84; Izzy must be 60+. Their daughter, Gaby, the truck driver, just got divorced in order to pursue a Lesbian relationship and raise her daughter with two mothers, so to speak.

August 1, 2005

NYC

Hooray! We voted overwhelmingly to end Stefanakis's presidency by September 1, either by termination or, we hope, his willingness to resign. Only two voted no: Kravvas and Drapos. It's all hush-hush now until our lawyer and his lawyer negotiate. This may cost us up to $300,000, but keeping him would be far worse.

August 5, 2005

Finished the new roof on the shed. Galvanized. Done very quickly. . . . Brittles (James McBride), Stephanie, and their youngest visited for four hours. He's hoping to write a novel on the Civil War from the viewpoint of blacks. I told him about the Penn School, John Woolman (whom he had never heard of), Hal Weaver's proposed anthology of writings by black Quakers, and Donna McDaniel's critique of Quaker actions concerning blacks. . . . Telephoned Bridgit McCarthy Sullivan, Marie McCarthy's granddaughter. She hopes to write a biography of Marie, and earn enough money to buy Daphne's house.

August 6, 2005

Cooperstown

We saw a splendid production of Britten's opera Death in Venice, very moving, marvelous music, a gang of young boys dancing and prancing as Tadzio's playmates and satyrs, a resplendent "Lady of the Pearls," a fine baritone doing the fop at Pola, the gondolier, the hotel manager, the barber, and the ha-ha singer. I hadn't remembered that Britten actually has Apollo and Dionysus on stage debating who will win von Aschenbach's soul. It was such a moving show, and perfectly consistent with Thomas Mann's hope that an emotion can have the precision of thought and thought the power of an emotion. . . . Supper at the Sicilian Pizza restaurant, waited on by Kate, the Polish girl who is friendly with Anna, whom I got to know there several years ago. The owner always greets me as "Hello, Professor."

August 7, 2005

Finished mowing the south field. Και του χρόνου! Leander has been mowing the "beach" and path to the pond with the White and his rotary. Never looked so nice. . . . Pendle Hill conference call regarding the interim director. The interviewing committee recommended a dual directorship: Niyonu and Barbara. Ted Brinton said this never works. I strongly recommended John Calder and was joined by many others, including Gay. Tom Corl in effect threatened to resign if we didn't appoint Niyonu, thus saving $80,000 (Calder's salary). No decision possible. Another conference call is scheduled for Wednesday.

Wednesday, August 10, 2005

Again no decision possible. New possibility: Dan Seeger. Hal Weaver was obstinate and obnoxious, insisting on Niyonu. Oliver Rogers favored her too, but politely. All the rest of us were for John Calder. But we agreed to interview Dan on Saturday and have another conference call on Sunday.

Thursday, August 11, 2005

Paul Buseck came with his fiancée, Dana. He'll be teaching in a two-year Native American junior college in Arizona. She works in a food bank in Tucson that provides free food to the poor. Nice people!

Friday, August 12, 2005

E-mail today from Hanne Winarsky: Princeton University Press has accepted my volume 2. I'll need now to remove all the Greek and do the other corrections. I told her that I could probably deliver a manuscript by Thanksgiving. Wonderful!

Daphne and family came yesterday, too. And immediately Andrew of course asked for a tractor ride. As did Christina, but this time could she do it by herself, without me? I showed her how to press the clutch pedal, and off she went, solo.

Today David and Linda arrived, and Lucia, and eventually Alice, Peter, Susan, Ellen (her partner), Lori, Clive, and their three girls. A circus. We somehow fed them all: hamburgers on the fire. And of course everyone needed a new tractor ride, including, this time, even Peter. . . . Anniversary greetings from Dan Seeger, Annie Levis, Deanna's father, Dia Philippides. . . . I'm almost finished with the translation into Greek of my talk on Ritsos's "Moonlight Sonata."

Saturday, August 13, 2005

Our big day. Everyone here: Peter and Susan Schweitzer, Amos, Linda, Martha, Amos's son Pablo, Rhoda and Marin + wife and children, all the Busecks, Linda's three sons and some family, Amy and Roy. Lots of children. All at Terpni until about 3:30. Then to the Garnet Hill Lodge. The children ate and then played. We all gathered on the porch for supper. Alec read a poem. Leander presented us with a beautiful stained glass depiction of the farm. I spoke about Harriet. Amy spoke about Clarice.

August 20, 2005

I started removing the Greek from the version going to Princeton UP. The fascism chapter lost 28%, travel books chapter 22%. Very encouraging. If the average is 20% then the resulting length should be OK.

August 23, 2005

Leander and family left. The children were very sad to go. We're looking forward to next summer. I promised to set up the telescope first thing. . . . Pruned the lilac bush severely and surrounded it with black paper covered with chips. . . . Chrysanthi and I went to Queensbury and bought ourselves a new bed, a "double," like the one in Hanover, to replace our two singles, which are going to a North Creek church group that distributes things to the poor.

September 5, 2005

To Hanover

To Hanover on Labor Day, early, in order to hear Bishop Robinson tomorrow. Putting Terpni "to sleep" is sad, as though the house and property were dying. But with luck there will be a resurrection next spring.

September 6, 2005

Supper with Bishop Gene Robinson followed by his talk. He is young, totally un-pompous; drove himself up from Concord, dressed in the bishop's purple shirt, nothing fancy. At supper I asked him about evolution vs. "intelligent design." He replied: Evolution, as science describes it, is miraculous; surely God is pleased." He is totally against fundamentalist Christians. His talk was splendid, very personal, very broad. He spoke about his own childhood in poverty, about his status as a gay male, which, he said, helps him to understand the feelings of all marginalized folk. At his inauguration he had to wear a bulletproof vest. He has received numerous death threats. Said he was ready to die because afterwards he'd be in the bosom of the Lord. In the question period I asked why the mainline churches were not a strong public voice in this country, a counterbalance to the evangelical. He agreed that they were not and could only hope that somehow that would change.

September 11, 2005

At Meeting, I ministered about Bishop Robinson (as did Barbara Gilbert), saying that he exemplified the truly Christian position of involvement with things of the world yet without needing such involvement (I didn't mention Kierkegaard but obviously was thinking of him). . . . Today and all last week, watched the US Open tennis matches. Agassi, age 35, lost today in the finals, after winning spectacular five-set matches in the semi and quarter finals. All these players are so skilled; they're almost like ballet dancers.

September 13, 2005

I had a colonoscopy at the hospital. Three years ago there were two polyps, both pre-cancerous but benign. They were removed. This time there was only one, very small. I'm now on a five-year cycle instead of a three-year one.

Phoenix-Oracle

Flew yesterday from Boston to Phoenix, rental car to Alice's, arriving at 10:30 p.m. their time, 1:30 a.m. our time. Morning breakfast there with everyone: Lori, Clive and the three girls, David & Lynda, Susan & Ellen, Peter & Alice. Played a bit of Warlock on Alice's seven-foot Steinway. Then we all drove in a caravan of three cars to Oracle, near Tucson. Susie driving with us. Lots of desert. Cacti of various sorts. New developments near Mesa, hundreds of homes, trailer parks, etc. We're told they're mostly for retirees. More going up near Oracle. What will they do all day? Play bridge? Golf? Watch television? Get drunk? The C.O.D. ranch, where the wedding will take place, is a sort of retreat center that houses about thirty people. Altitude 4500 feet. Marvelous mountains in the distance, some like moon-surface, some all granite weathered smooth. Peter took us to Cherry Valley Ranch, our B&B. A gorgeous mansion owned by a former mining engineer (copper mines) whose daughter now runs the B&B. Beautiful room for us. Cool. Large fan, reminding us of Tahiti. Siesta. Then back to C.O.D. for buffet supper. Met interesting people, including one who plays duets with Alice. They have a "piano club"; six or seven people prepare a piece each month, either solo or duet, and meet in one of the homes, where they perform for each other. Very easy-going and non-competitive. Good idea for Kendal. After supper, we worried if Leander would ever arrive and find the place, but he did. In the “barn” we were treated to a power point presentation of Dana’s full life: photos of babyhood to the present, and then ditto for Paul. Next, skits, songs, memories by Peace Corps colleagues.

Oracle

Lovely sleep. Woke to find our door locked from the inside. I crawled out a window and opened the door from the outside. Sumptuous breakfast. Conversation with the other guest here, who turned out to be the daughter of the novelist Hervey Allen (Anthony Adverse) and a Quaker in Tempe Meeting. I’m working on Politics of the Spirit, volume 2, removing the Greek, and am up to Kapetan Mihalis right now. . . . All the women came here to have a premarital party for Dana with poems, wishes, etc. and then dancing led by a belly-dancer, on the patio. Leander arrived. We all went to the State Park opposite and were taken through the Kannally Ranch House. Fascinating and beautiful, a glimpse into the life here eight years ago, with ranching and mining and lots of money and dinner parties and trips to Europe. Drove along the road toward Lemmon Mountain to see more views of the stark landscape. Then back to C.O.D. for the wedding, timed to start after the full harvest moon rose “obediently” in the clear sky. A Jewish wedding under the chuppah, with a female rabbi officiating rather effusively. Very long. Paul (unbelievably) in a tux. Innovations: the rings were sent around to everyone for individual wishes (I wished them healthy and happy children); herbs were sent around for us to smell (there was no smell by the time they reached me); loaves of bread were sent round for each of us to break off a piece. No music. Breaking of the glass at the end. Mazel tov. Guests were asked to sign a “rolling pin” that will hang in their kitchen. Afterwards, a meal with more health food grown by local growers. We sat at the “family” table, of course. Then various folks extended wishes to the bride and groom. Then the wedding cake and dancing. We left around 9:30 and returned to our sumptuous Cherry Valley Ranch and a lovely sleep. Leander was with us throughout. We’ll see him again next Sunday, in Amherst.

September 18, 2005

Tucson, Marriott University Park Hotel

Chrysanthi has the flu. Running nose, aches, maybe temperature. We drove to Tucson, awed by the sharp bare mountains. She slept all afternoon in the hotel. I worked on Politics of the Spirit and talked with Martha Klironomos about my lectures in San Francisco. At 7:00 p.m. Gonda Van Steen called for us and we went out for supper at a Mexican-style restaurant. Terrible food (for us) but everyone else raved. Our host, Mary Voyatsis, turned out to have a son at Groton whose roommate last year was Alison Clarkson's son. Small world.

September 19, 2005

Tucson–Boston

I lectured to about 50 people on The Fall of Constantinople. Very emotional. But most of the questions were about the Turks, and of course I couldn't answer. They needed Speros Vryonis.

September 25, 2005

Amherst

We drove to Amherst to hear Nigel Coxe and the flutist Susan Rotholz perform Leander's "Blackbird Variations," beautifully done (and twice: they repeated it as an encore). Nigel loves the piece. The flutist was with Leander and Alec at Kinhaven and spoke warmly of the experience. Nigel also played the Moonlight Sonata, excitingly. . . . At supper in Sweet Tomatoes we saw Father John, the priest who works in the hospital. He joined us and we spoke animatedly about the Jesuits, Sheila Harvey, Gene Robinson, Larry Harvey. He studied Latin and Greek (ancient more than koine) and loved the classics.

September 27, 2005

Athens, Hotel Eridanos

Routine flight: Manchester, Charlotte, Frankfurt, Athens. There's a train now from the airport. Eridanos Hotel very grand and comfortable, a boutique type. Everything paid by the Ministry. At 7:30 I met Dia and Wim at "To Kouti" opposite the entrance to the Thiseion. Wim looking very old and tired. Trouble hearing. Dia lively although having crises with her 100-year-old mother. They're driving tomorrow to Yannena for a conference. Very nice to sup my first night with friends. Zero jet lag thanks to feast-fast. Afterwards: internet café near Monastiraki, up five flights of stairs. Two euros for twenty minutes.

September 28, 2005

Athens

Opening of the Ritsos symposium in the Benaki's new building at Peiraios 138, a long walk. Warm greeting from Angelos Delivorrias, the director; we were together at Princeton. Warm greeting of course from Christos Alexiou. It's lovely that we never feel any time has elapsed between visits; it's as though I were here yesterday. Nice to see Jenny Mastoraki again after many years. She very much likes our Anthology. . . . In the afternoon break I visited Kastaniotis, father and son, to see if they might be interested in publishing my volume 2 in translation. They said I should definitely try first to have the University Presses of Crete do the 2nd volume since they did volume 1. If this doesn't work, come back to Kastaniotis. Or perhaps they could collaborate somehow with Crete. . . . Very nice also to see Mario Vitti, who chaired the evening session. I brought along the photo of him, Chrysanthi, me, and Raïzis taken at Princeton in 1969. . . . Also had loukoumades in the Aegean on Panepistimiou. While there, my kinito rang. It was Chrysanthi. "How are you?" "Fine. I'm eating loukoumades!"

September 29, 2005

Spending lots of time with Christos. Pavlos is being moved to a new home in Liverpool and Christos is in constant touch with him and Meg. Aspasia-Maria is in the final year of the Lykeio and is preparing for university exams. She wants to do theater. Roddy spoke today on modernism, very nicely. Christos advised me to telephone Sifakis in Thessaloniki regarding the University Presses of Crete. Sifakis says he'll support the book. I need to write now to Trachanas, the director. Sifakis advises me to try to retain copyright so that Crete won't have to pay Princeton a large fee for translation rights. (Not likely.) Christos's paper on Τέταρτη Διάσταση very fine, and very close to my own feelings about the Σονάτα του σεληνόφωτος. . . . In the afternoon I visited Patroklos Stavrou for two hours. Very friendly. Showed me the αποθήκη where the entire oeuvre of Kazantzakis in new editions is stored (but he doesn't seem very good at selling). He's working now on a new printing of Οδύσεια, re-set. Willing and eager to help me with information regarding the selected letters. Advises me to deposit my archive at the University of Crete, Rethymo (never at Varvari). David Ricks says: investigate the Vikelaia Library in Iraklio also; they have Seferis's archive. Stavrou described Eleni's last days; she died peacefully, still somewhat aware mentally. Age about 101. His biggest problem is: What happens when he dies? There is no successor to manage Kazantzakis Publications. . . . I skipped the evening session and instead met Don Nielsen and Lia. Supper in a Cretan restaurant (not very good, actually). Don explained at length his two projects: the Athens Free School and another. He still wants Kazantzakis quotes from me for fortune cookies. He also explained the idea he has for the Farm School, very exciting and profitable. I'll keep reminding McGrew.

Friday, September 30, 2005

I gave my paper in the morning session: Το τελετουργικό στη Σονάτα του σεληνόφωτος. I had practiced it a few times and I think it went well enough. Christos chaired the session. Rita Papatheophilou showed up; she's 83 and walks with a cane but still has her nice smile. So did Peter Mackridge and Jackie, here on an Onassis grant, splendidly housed in St. George Lycavettos. And, amazingly, so did Aglaïa Lipourli. Mimis is OK, although still worried about prostate (as is Christos). A good actress read poems to guitar accompaniment at the end of the day. Then dinner in a nearby tavern, Christos and I sitting with Ksenija and Ivan Gadjanski, from Belgrade.

Saturday, October 1, 2005

Athens

I chaired a session with David Ricks on translating Ρωμιοσύνη, Ivan Gadjanski on Ritsos in Serbia, and Amy Mims on Ritsos and Joyce's Ulysses, very interesting. The last event was a round table with big names: Kazakos, Douka, Kontos, Patrikios, all of whom knew Ritsos and most of whom seem to be KKE. Lively, argumentative. But Eri Ritsou calmed the waters at the end by virtue of her warm thanks to the Benaki and all the speakers. At lunch, Christos and I sat with Patrikios, who very much likes our Anthology. Talk, also, of torture under the junta and before that under Metaxas. I said in the session I chaired that both Ritsos and Joyce suffered: υπέφεραν, είδαν βρώμα, αλλά στο τέλος-τέλος φώναξαν «Ναι».

October 5, 2005

To Montpelier for lunch at Woodbury College hosted by Larry Mandel, president. I'm hoping that we can involve Kendal with them somehow, perhaps by instituting an ombudsman who'll do the course in mediation. Toured the Vermont State House afterwards, for the first time.

October 6, 2005

A good lecture by Monteagle Stearns followed by supper at the Inn with him and his wife Tony, the Rutters, Marders, Yalowitzes.

October 7, 2005

Lunch at the Marders, again with Stearns, who was very friendly. I gave them my translation of "The Moonlight Sonata." In the evening, good concert by a quartet playing a wonderful Debussy quartet, experimental, offbeat.

October 8, 2005

To Cambridge in heavy rain. Bought a Harvard cup to replace the one strangely missing at the farm. To the A.R.T. to see "Carmen" accompanied by two pianos. Well done, but after an hour or so the alarm sounded, the show stopped, and everyone had to vacate the building. We waited 15 minutes and decided to return home because of the heavy rain. Later I discovered that all this was caused by a light bulb exploding and that the show resumed and finished. So we drove five hours to see one hour of "Carmen."

October 11, 2005

To San Francisco

Flew first class from Philadelphia. Some trouble securing keys for 265 Buckingham Way but eventually succeeded with Martha Klironomos's help. Beautiful quarters: a small apartment with everything. Three blocks from a good mall. Fifteen minutes from the university. Mexican dinner with Martha.

Wednesday, October 12, 2005

A full day. Managed to get a wireless connection on the computer. Exciting. Amazing. Sat in on Martha's Greek language class, using Greek Today. Excellent students, well prepared. She teaches with lots of κέφι. Then from 6:00 to 9:00 I led her class in discussion of Zorba. I lectured, followed by enough questions and informal discussion. Then dinner in a restaurant where the waiter turned out to be half Greek. But everyone else in this neighborhood seems to be either oriental or Mexican. . . . Beautiful surroundings, marvelous weather, the magic of San Francisco. And the university is huge. 30,000 students, impressive buildings, a large "Quad" (green) in the center, fine bookstore and student center. And Martha has thirty students in elementary modern Greek!

Thursday, October 13, 2005

I finished a draft of the Heroism lecture for Washington. Also vetted another Pendle Hill pamphlet, fixing all the things overlooked as usual by Donna McDaniel. Worked in SFSU library, found Kenneth Clark's "The Nude," which has good comments on Donatello's "David" for my lecture. Met Martha and we supped in a fine restaurant before my lecture on "Inventing Greece." Good audience: lots of questions, no vituperation or anger (as in Buffalo). Zeese Papanikolas came (we'll see him again on Saturday), and the cultural attaché in the consulate, who knows Terpni-Nigrita, and Roland Moore, the MGSA computer guru.

Friday, October 14, 2005

A three-hour lunch in the Cliff House with John B. Vlahos, who has come to all my lectures and has been working with Richard Martin at Stanford on Homer. He believes that Penelope recognizes Odysseus earlier than is generally thought, and expounded his evidence. Lots of good talk about this and lots more. . . . Read more Magic Mountain. . . . Supper with Martha, this time in a Turkish restaurant run by a Palestinian, very good indeed.

Saturday, October 15, 2005

An unexpectedly full day with Roland Moore, visiting his home in Oakland. Nice garden, fruit trees, grapes, flowers. Then meeting Zeese Papanikolas for lunch in another Turkish restaurant in Oakland, then to Zeese's home. Meeting his wife Ruth, daughter, son; supper there; then to a cello and piano recital in Berkeley with them. Then home on BART with Martha. Zeese's garden: bougainvillea, running water, lemons, oranges. They're thinking of moving to a CCRC. Lots of talk about Kendal. He is writing a book on talented folk who considered themselves failures: Henry Adams, Gertrude Stein, Hemingway. . . . Ruth is a psychoanalyst with a practice. Roland studies alcoholism among Navahos, etc. . . . Nice to have experienced MUNI and BART.

Sunday, October 16, 2005

To San Francisco Friends Meeting on 9th Street. Two folks ministered on silence, and I was moved to minister on God is silent. Lots of people asked to be remembered to Dan Seeger, whose office was upstairs. . . . Then to Eleni Tsacopoulou, walking for an hour on this very hot day, uphill. She's on the ninth floor with windows overlooking San Francisco in three directions: Golden Gate Bridge, the Bay, Alcatraz, a bit of the Oakland Bridge. Beautiful. Her husband publishes a political newsletter. They have two small boys both going to a school run by Chinese, with four hours a day of instruction in Mandarin. Greek maid. Eleni builds huge developments, 700 houses at a time, including “segregated” housing for the elderly. I told her about Kendal, of course. They’ll be going to Beijing in 2008 for the Olympics there. I hope they’ll meet the Chinese Greek-speaker whom I met in Iraklio. Would they perhaps be interested in building a CCRC in Greece?

Monday, October 17, 2005

A little sightseeing downtown. Saw a cable car depart. Embarcadero, Ferry House, promenade, Oakland Bridge. Beautiful. Then had supper on Folson and 3rd with Susan Buseck. She, a lawyer, was very interested in copyright issues affecting translations. She told me that she and Ellen want to adopt a baby, perhaps from China, but have hardly begun the process yet. She just returned from Tempe where the family gathered for Peter’s 70th birthday. She realizes that her father is frightened at aging and really has no plans for the future.

Tuesday, October 18, 2005

More research at the library for my Washington, DC, talk. Then to Martha, who recorded me as part of a sort of oral history project. Then met Stavros, who teaches the third and fourth semesters from our book. He’s now doing lesson 8. We projected the website on a screen and introduced the students to its benefits. But the videos didn’t work. Stavros alas is not a good teacher: no zest. So the class sort of limped along. One of the students afterwards, a mature adult, thanked me for the book especially compared to what he was exposed to in the Greek Church. . . . Also arranged via telephone for Nigel Coxe’s recital at Kendal.

Wednesday, October 19, 2005

My last day. Worked on the D.C. talk some more. Continued to read in The Magic Mountain, which is so long! Then to Martha for more oral history followed by my three-hour class on The Last Temptation, half on the novel, half on the movie. Then a final supper with Martha and fond farewells. She’s been a wonderful host.

Friday, October 21, 2005

New York City

Breakfast with Annie Levis in the Grand Hyatt Hotel. This was useful, since we really did just about everything needed for the Secondary Committee's meeting later today. Post-Secondary came first, with Bill McGrew present. We quite obviously did not authorize extension of Perrotis to three years, but we encouraged further feasibility studies leading possibly to a decision in June. The Secondary Committee was greatly helped by Costas Kravvas, who knows all about the regulations governing removal of livestock. Everything, except three categories, must go by 2009. The three categories can be, for example, one cow, twelve chickens, six rabbits (more or less). Our minutes stressed the continuing importance of the practical program despite the removal of livestock. . . . What a difference with Bill McGrew as president instead of that disaster, Stefanakis! Everyone was relaxed, hopeful. I've been renewed as a trustee for another three years. Nice to see Dimitri Gondicas, who wants me to come back to Princeton sometime. He's worried about the lack of advertising for Greek Today, and some teachers saying it's too difficult. . . . Cocktails at Phil Foote's. Then to Daphne's. All children very talkative and friendly. Christina is proudly knitting a scarf for Chrysanthi's birthday. The new Steinway grand looks truly grand. Andrew is doing well in school. Peter is already more "mature." I of course brought a packet of chocolates for everyone.

Saturday, October 22, 2005

NYC-Philadelphia

AFS full board in the Cosmopolitan Club on East 66th, which is only for women. Most of the discussion concerned money with some real possibilities for steady income. Nothing is left for a Kendal except a plot of seven acres which I fear is too small. . . . Arrived at Pendle Hill just in time for supper. During the meal, Wil, chair of the General Board, stood up and made a very nice speech about my multifarious services over many years. Then, in the barn, before the final meeting, Barb playfully "crowned" me as valued trustee emeritus. Everyone was very pleasant and friendly. Tony Manousos has a scheme to help us resume publication of books. Shirley says that, yes, my Light essay will be accepted in revised form. Let's hope. . . . At 11:00 p.m., after everyone left, I played the Yamaha for  $\frac{3}{4}$  hour. It's a beautiful instrument.

Sunday, October 23, 2005                      Philadelphia–Manchester–Hanover
Spoke to Chrysanthi. She says she has missed me. I've missed her. Time to go home. And I'm glad I'm finished with Pendle Hill after so many years.

October 25, 2005
Quaker 8s at the Feustals. They chose a quote by Don Cupitt about brightness. Hard but evocative. I spoke about the Light that preceded sun, moon, and stars.

October 26, 2005
Lunch with Robert Binswanger. He'll return to Dartmouth in 2006–07 to teach a course but still has no encouragement from Helène at Kendal regarding an available apartment. I inquired on his behalf and also had no encouragement. She says there will be a two-year wait.

October 27, 2005
War/Peace committee choosing the next group of student fellows. Al Stam is doing much better as director. A new faculty member, teaching Spanish and interested in the civil war, invited me to coffee. I told him about Jacques Grunblatt in the International Brigade and about the Spanish refugee who gave me carpentry lessons when I was a child.

October 28, 2005
Phi Beta Kappa meeting with Walter Sinnott-Armstrong and Kate Soule. We have to recommend faculty members for honorary membership plus one alumnus from the reunion class. A candidate was Ambassador Briggs, Ellis Briggs's son, but we chose someone else. This is my last year on the committee, thankfully.

October 30, 2005
I amused folks at Meeting by ministering about my new discovery, Johnny Cash. His sad song when he could hardly sing: "Nobody." The importance of community. . . . At 3:30, early music concert at Kendal. I did three Goldberg variations, numbers 6 and 30 went well. At number 2 I began to be nervous, but managed. Joan Snell sang off-key again. . . . I'll try Scarlatti for next time.

October 31, 2005

Julien O'Reilly from Pendle Hill. Dinner with the Wrigginses and Gordon Browne and Pat Ballou. Julien charmed everyone. We had a nice time in the apartment afterwards. She runs a monthly cabaret in Philadelphia. I gave her $5000 for the Pendle Hill youth program.

November 1, 2005

Dinner with Becky Smith, the new Kendal director. She's trained in music, choral conducting, and comes from Maine and a family of Baptist ministers. She seems lively and gregarious. We've had five directors in fourteen years. Four were asked to leave. Let's hope that she'll do better.

November 3, 2005

Chicago

At MGSA symposium, the 19th. Nice to see old friends: Tom Doulis, Stratos Constantinidis, Olga Broumas, Mache Karanika, Dimitris Tziouvas, Vasillis Lambropoulos, Victor Papacosma, Tom Gallant, Elsa Amanatidou from Brown, Marinos Pourgouris, now happily at Brown, the graduate student I met in London working on Lorca and Greek poetry. Broumas read original poems and Elytis translations in her keynote speech, very nicely.

Friday, November 4, 2005

I eulogized George Pilitis in the session I chaired, which went well. Short visit to the art museum, huge, with a lovely collection of impressionists and some good El Grecos. Lots of time at meals with Tom Doulis, who is happily active in retirement, as am I.

Saturday, November 5, 2005

I eulogized Evro Layton at 8:00 a.m. at the librarians' session but then went to hear the papers on the Olympics, including one by Roland Moore on volunteering. Long lunch today with Tom Doulis. Yesterday's supper was with Dick Jackson, talking mostly about a possible CCRC in Greece. He now says that the Farm School land is not good since that area will be too noisy and busy, with a huge mall, super-highways, etc. Thus I should try to keep in touch with Dr. Barich regarding the project in Lakoma. If Barich comes to the USA, try to have him meet John Diffey. Also perhaps speak to AHEPA people here. Last night, also, we all went to a Greek movie, very episodic and non-linear, on the plight of migrants: women forced into prostitution, etc. Pretentious and overly long. . . . MGSA business meeting, followed by a martini with Tom Doulis very pleasantly.

November 7, 2005

Hanover

Howard Mitchell gathered us together to plan our meeting with Becky Smith next week—who goes first, second, etc. The whole point is to develop better ways of treating staff. We'll stress peer review and suggest an ombudsman. . . . In the afternoon, Dickey Center lecture in Filene, full house, standing room only, on intelligence and terrorism, with Judge Silverman, co-chair of the presidential committee on intelligence reform, and John McG., deputy director of Intelligence. Very lively. They claimed that everyone truly believed that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction. They weren't so sure, they admitted, about some connection between al-Qaeda and Iraq. A Dartmouth professor, Le Bow, was much more liberal, calling the intelligence community "criminal." Afterwards, a long, lively supper at the Inn, about fifteen of us with lots of questions. I asked if we should allow torture if we capture an al-Qaeda leader. Le Bow agrees that arrogance is rampant and suggests the reading of Thucydides, as do I.

November 8, 2005

I voted against the multi-million bond issue for playing fields. In the afternoon, I led an ILEAD class session on retirement, speaking first about CCRCs and then about our attitude toward death, using my pamphlet. Joan Wilson, responsible for my invitation, said it went well. . . . At supper we joined Joan and her guests, a jazz pianist who had just married an Indonesian woman. They met on the internet. She's very aware of New Hampshire temperatures, since 80 degrees Fahrenheit for her is cold. At the concert, he played old jazz and big band tunes with zero musicality, banging and banging. We left before the end.

November 9, 2005

To Washington

Arrived early at the Carnegie Institution and discovered that the Center for Defense Information is housed in the same building. So I visited them and was taken around very graciously and then introduced to the woman who recruits interns. We talked of course about Admiral Gene Carroll. I'm hoping to convince Al Stam to bring our Peace Studies Fellows to the CDI on their Washington trip next May, also to get some of the Fellows to apply to be CDI interns. . . . Lectured on "Pagan and Christian Heroism Reconciled” to about 35–49 people. James Alatis introduced me very kindly. His wife, Penelope, came, as did Alma Rhodes and her husband and also Judith Tomero from Kinhaven. Some good questions afterwards. Lots of time to talk to Sperry Lea about the Farm School. Anna Lea seemed pleased with the lecture. Lelia Washburn was there too, among old friends. And Leander, who drove me home afterwards.

November 10, 2005

Washington

Leisurely morning at 9 Lopa Court. I’m reading Walter Arndt’s translation of Faust, Part One. In some ways, it’s very Kazantzakian. We picked the children up at noon (half-day school today) and went all together for lunch and to the airport. Leander has canceled his trip to Bangkok.

November 12 & 13, 2005

Dover

To East Dover, Vermont, to visit David and Patti Buck, together with Gail and Ruth Schoppert. They’re in an eighteenth-century house with a spectacular view to the East and someone else’s cows across the way. We talked talked talked, about the Farm School of course but also about Alec’s career, David’s prospects (nothing yet), Patti’s reluctance to be a headmaster’s wife again. I brought Benny Hill and Johnny Cash for entertainment. The most extraordinary moment was the dog’s. It suddenly began to howl in a soprano voice and then went into an epileptic fit for two minutes followed by exhaustion and then return to normalcy. Apparently this happens about once a month. . . . On Sunday we left early in order to get to Hitchcock hospital in time for flu shots.

November 15, 2005

I spoke to the Professors’ Colloquium at Kendal with John Hennessey, about challenges to the humanities in tertiary education, and stressed the good work done in international baccalaureate programs, which David and Gail told me about the other day.

November 17, 2005

Finished shortening and fixing volume 2. I’ll print it tomorrow. I cut about 15%.

November 18, 2005

Nigel Coxe came to play a concert at Kendal, at my invitation. Supper with his friends Jerry and Muriel King and (of course) Lisa and Connie.

Introducing him, I said how skilled he was in master classes. He played beautifully: Haydn, Beethoven (Moonlight Sonata), Schoenberg, a Chopin nocturne, Liszt, then Mendelssohn's Capriccio, with appropriate remarks before each. Many in the audience told him afterward, and me, that it was the best piano playing they'd heard at Kendal. Yet Nigel himself felt the audience not responsive enough to warrant an encore. Too bad. He's getting forgetful (not of music), doesn't drive at night, has gout and other illnesses, is very worried about his future and aging. Becky Smith, our new executive director, attended (at my urging). I'll speak to her again about some way to get Nigel into Kendal, perhaps by reducing the entry fee.

November 19, 2005

Eight-hand piano: Mozart operatic overtures, with Stan Udy, Joan Snell, Co Emlen. In the evening we went to Hanover to see the Johnny Cash movie "Walk the Line." Not bad, yet never showed his great social conscience, only his drug addiction. But the actress who played June Carter Cash is electrifying.

November 20, 2005

Joan Wilson did the ecumenical service, reading a sermon preached by her father, short and sweet. For lunch afterwards we joined the Nodas, Sydney, Roger Soderberg, and the Arnolds at a catered meal arranged by Audrey Logan.

Washington

Last night to Leander's via AMTRAK. Today I went to town to lunch with Daniel Carson. Arriving early, I visited Ford's Theater, where Lincoln was shot, and the house across the street where he died the next morning. A ranger in the theater explained everything, minute by minute. I hadn't realized that it was a conspiracy to kill not only Lincoln but also the vice-president, secretary of war, etc. However, only Lincoln was hit. Booth, a Shakespearian actor, saw himself as a Brutus dispatching a Caesar (tyrant). A full museum in the theater basement offers photos, cartoons, the assassin's small pistol, bits of Lincoln's clothing. Very moving. . . . Daniel and I lunched for two hours in the Chop House on 7th Street. He's been in the GAO for thirty years. Will retire soon. His latest novel is about the sexual temptation of a Protestant pastor. I read a chapter a few days ago. Not bad, but alas not really distinctive in any way, especially linguistically. Poor Daniel. He'll probably remain unpublished. His wife tells him that his writing is an addiction, like smoking. We talked about his classmate John Smith, whom Daniel considers almost a criminal, money-mad, unscrupulous. I told him all I know about John, his art collection, his benefactions, the reasons for his father's suicide. . . . Afterwards, again for two hours, a nice visit with Jim Warren, sitting in his small study at the back of his garden. He has prostate cancer and was told by one doctor that at 78 he is too old for the "radical." I urged him to visit Johns Hopkins, which he had already arranged to do, for another opinion. He remembers the piece I wrote about my own "radical." Lots of talk about the Farm School, Bill McGrew (an old friend of Jim's), etc. He had a grandfather who was a weighty Friend. I'll send him my talk on Quakers and the Farm School. . . . At Leander's afterwards, practiced Scarlatti in his new studio and received some good pointers especially on trills. Then we all watched "Planes, Trains, and Automobiles," with much laughter.

November 24, 2005, Thanksgiving

Alec telephoned from Bangkok, Daphne from New York. More Scarlatti. Also, I listened to my favorite Johnny Cash songs again and began to arrange them in some meaningful sequence for a possible Kendal program. Over-ate pleasantly: turkey and all the trimmings. Then a cold walk at the lake. Afterwards we watched Steve Martin again in the very fine "Father of the Bride," a satire drawn from common experience. Earlier, thanks to Nicholas's urging, the men went on a bike ride to his school and back.

November 25, 2005

To Hanover

Leander, Sophia, and Nicholas rode in with us on the Metro so that, getting off at Dupont Circle, Nicholas could ride up and down the extraordinarily long escalator to the street. Chrysanthi and I had the usual leisurely trip on AMTRAK back to Springfield, Mass. and then home by car.

To Jordan Hall to hear Veronica Jochum do her Mozart program with a narrator reading from the letters and giving elements of the career. Veronica began with Opus 1, written when Mozart was five years old. She also played the great Opus 309 sonata. A delicious event, much appreciated by the large audience. I got various ideas for my own turn as her narrator here at Kendal in March.

Cambridge

All this week: preparing for my class at Patana on Goethe's Faust, Part One (only, thank God). A colleague in the German Department, Ellis Schookman, helped me considerably with handouts and good advice; he had just finished a Comparative Literature course on the Faust theme. Also helped by Ulli Rainer, who says she knows the German text by heart. Walter Arndt's translation is monumental, a remarkable achievement. It took me about three readings, plus lots of dipping into commentaries, to begin to feel comfortable with this work. Poor students! . . . Today we met Eva Constantellou in Cambridge, lunched grandly at "Harvest" and saw a very imaginative, well-acted performance of Chekhov's Three Sisters directed by a Polish director, Krystian Lupa. The play, of course, is splendidly philosophical at the same time that it is so emotional. Poor Masha! Poor brother, who reminded me of Bill Rawson in North Creek, who dreamed of getting a Ph.D. in history and of teaching in a college but ended up clerking in his father's hardware store and is now Town Clerk (just as Chekhov's unfulfilled "brother" is on the County Council).

To NYC

Long AMTRAK trip to New York but I worked some more on Faust, read tourist brochures on Thailand and, most importantly, prepared three chapters of volume 2 for Crete University Press by removing the English translations following Greek quotations and making other necessary adjustments.

To Bangkok

Thai Airlines non-stop, seventeen hours, JFK to Bangkok. Happily, no lines at JFK either for boarding pass or security. And the plane wasn't full, so I had an empty seat next to me. First meal about 12:30, vegetable and salad. Then I slept as much as I could in what was Thai night, until the next meal, around 6:30 p.m., which is Thai 6:30 a.m. So I had meat, breaking the fast. In the remaining ten hours I worked a lot on the computer, read the Economist and TLS, and snoozed a little more sleep. Alec and children at the airport. Long ride in this ugly city to Patana School. Their apartment, five minutes from work, is fully adequate: three bedrooms, three toilets, living room, kitchen, balcony. I felt fine thanks to feast-fast anti-jetlag regimen. But didn't sleep well.

Bangkok

A full and busy day, my first in Bangkok. Up at 5:45 a.m. after a night mostly lying awake. Breakfast on cereal and croissant. To school, which is a five-minute walk, literally next door. At 7:50 to David McGrath's (pronounced McGraw) drama class, which I conducted on Goethe's Faust, emphasizing the fact of translation, the entire Faust story, starting in Germany, going to England in Marlowe's Faust, then to Germany again with Schiller and Goethe, Schubert's "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel" etc. Gounod, etc. Finally Thomas Mann's Dr. Faustus, linking the theme to Nazism. Spent time on Faust's rewriting of Ἐν ἀρχῇ ἦν ὁ λόγος: word → deed, and stressed Goethe's view that we learn moral choice through action. Linked his play to Genesis and Job (few students had ever read anything in the Old Testament). Spoke about the felix culpa. Stressed ambiguity. Is Faust guilty/evil? Yes and no. What about Gretchen? How and why can she be "saved" at the play's end? Some of the students (as usual) responsive, others not. But generally, I think, a good class. . . . In Alec's office, then, I met with a grade 11 student already thinking of university in the US in film studies. She's Thai, her father's a film director here, and she's already done editing. I explained our liberal art's system in the first two years, the fact of "distributives," and encouraged her to apply to NYU, which was news to her. . . . Then Monica took me on a tour of the primary school, a separate complex, beautifully functional, and also architecturally lovely, as is everything here (bougainvillea, pond with goldfish, swimming pools, playgrounds, greenery everywhere). Monica knows everyone (no surprise). Saw Theo's class and Elena's, met their teachers. Then went for lunch at the primary school cafeteria, joined by scores of children and their teachers. Wide choice of meals, including delicious Thai curries, sandwiches, soba noodles. Children so well behaved, neat. Posters saying "We always say please and thank you." "We always eat everything on our plate." "We always clean up afterwards." . . . Back to the apartment. Two-hour nap. Computer work. Then to school again for outdoor festival for Christmas: singing, instrumental music, a gifted teacher accompanying expertly on a keyboard. Very joyous. Then an indoor concert in the auditorium. Audience singing Christmas carols. School choirs of different ages doing Christmas-oriented selections.

Alec's string orchestra performing the last movement of Beethoven's 5th Symphony (Alec told me afterward that some of the children couldn't even read music, others had to play everything on open strings; he did maximal arranging). The acting head wished everyone at the end a happy and peaceful 2006. I thanked him afterwards, also spoke at some length with the faculty pianist, a Swede who is leaving school in July to return to a new adventure, as yet unknown, in Sweden. . . . Ham and potatoes offered by parents. . . . Back home. Then to the supermarket with Alec to buy raisin bran (!) and more milk. A market just like ours, all signs in Thai and English.

Bangkok

Attended Steven Brooks's class in Intellectual Baccalaureate: theory of knowledge, concentrating on language. Can we think without language, for example. Students working in groups preparing answers to set questions. I didn't have much to add and the time was short, but it was good to see teacher and students performing so well. Then I helped Alec set up for his strings class, after seeing the fifty-meter Olympic swimming pool and squash courts. His students gathered. He showed me the state-of-the-art computer projection that allows music to be written and projected beautifully. Monica came and we went to the primary school with all classes gathered for a lunch provided by parents. Children—again—very organized and competent in selecting and loading their plates. Spoke with the Senior Teacher of this level; met more of Monica's numerous acquaintances. Then back to Alec. I accompanied the group's selections on the electronic keyboard—little pieces from a violin method book. Alec counted, got them started, set the tempo. Everyone very cordial. Then to lunch with two students interested in studying in the USA, one in fashion design, the other in musical composition. The real surprise was the presence there, also, of a Patana graduate who is now a sophomore at Dartmouth, a native Thai. I promised him a lunch in the Hanover Inn in January. He took English 2-3, voluntarily, last year. . . . Siesta. More Kazantzakis on the computer. Played with Theo and Elena a bit. It's easy to conclude about this place: Why would anyone ever want to leave?! . . . At 5:00 p.m. two Thai friends came to Alec's apartment for dinner: mother and daughter, both teaching Thai to natives and Thai to foreigners in the school. The mother did most of the talking, about teaching techniques, lack of adequate textbooks, etc. I told her about

Greek Today. I asked especially about Buddhism. Her husband is very active in a temple. She proposed to take us to a temple complex next week, but nothing she said gave me any indication of Buddhist “spirituality.” I must ask the Thai Dartmouth student when we meet in Hanover. He did some service as a monk.

Bangkok

To school for 8:00 a.m. all-school assembly—all 2000 students arranged perfectly in rows or sitting on the floor of the basketball court, on colored rugs. On the stage a chimney for Santa. Music: jazz band, Christmas carols, the acting head in charge. But will Santa find us? Smoke from the chimney. “Ho ho ho!” from somewhere. We’d better sing another song, loudly, so he can find his way. Children very excited. Finally he appears in full costume, and with an Irish accent (a parent). He will go to primary school classrooms to distribute gifts afterwards. A joyous occasion. A good mixture of impromptu fun (all well-planned, of course) and complete order. . . . Afterwards, Monica showed me still more of this immense physical plant. The school’s own post office; the central office, where the director of “services” said that they have 300 service employees, and about 200 faculty. Cost averages about $20,000. There is no endowment. Everything comes from students’ fees. Later, from the registrar, I got the complete schedule. Obviously, this is for the rich, or for foreign employees whose companies pay tuition as a fringe benefit. Met some more Americans. All in all, they are about 8 of the 200 total. This man is working here in the regional office of the Center for Disease Control. . . . Another full lunch provided by parents in the primary school area. Nice conversation with an Indian woman who is a piano teacher. Then at 1:00 p.m. the Awards Assembly in the auditorium. This was very formal, with the Thai national anthem first, everyone standing while the dignitaries paraded in and sat on the stage (including Alec in black suit and academic gown). Awards for math, progress, service, debating, model UN, sports, etc., punctuated by choral singing and twice by Alec’s string ensemble, which performed well. Lots of applause for those honored. Nice words about the acting headmaster, who will return to his position as deputy head in January. (He movingly asked for silence at the 8:00 a.m. assembly for those killed last December by the tsunami.) As Alec and I discussed later, it’s interesting that although prizes are given for excellence and individuals and groups are ranked first, second, third, generally the spirit is one of cooperation rather than competitiveness. We wondered about Quaker schools, which frown on all forms of competition. . . . At 5:00-ish went upstairs to Belgian friends. He works on rural electrification, now in Vietnam, but wife and four children are here, she teaching French in the Patana school and the kids are students there. His work is sponsored by the European Commission, interestingly. Some colleagues of Alec's were there also, delighted to learn that I am a Macintosh user, as they are. A group of Filipino Roman Catholic girls and boys was the hit of the evening, brought in to sing Christmas songs accompanied by guitars. . . . We left in order to drive all the way downtown on the expressway in a taxi to attend the Bangkok 2005 jazz festival. A huge outdoor affair sponsored by Heineken beer. The "acid rock" music was certainly not my taste, but it was fun to be among so many Thais, mostly young, and to sit eating popcorn.

Bangkok

We telephoned Daphne (it was still December 16th in the USA) to wish her happy birthday. Drove this morning outside of Bangkok to "The Ancient City," gateway to Thailand's cultural heritage: 320 acres shaped just like Thailand containing 116 buildings plus Buddhas and statues representative of each region, mostly in teak. One building housed probably fifty statues, life-sized, of Buddhist worshippers in prayer position. Another had an obese laughing Buddha. Elsewhere was an immense retching Buddha. I bought some hammered leatherwork similar to what is done for Karaghiozis puppets. We ate in a pavilion, sitting cross-legged (or trying to) on the ground. . . . At 5:00 p.m. some friends came, a couple, both American, both physicians, both employed here by the Center for Disease Control: Dr. and Mrs. Michael O'Reilly. He studied Latin and Greek at St. Mark's School and loves the Odyssey, about which we talked at length. I'll send him my reading notes for the Iliad, which so far he does not appreciate. Their daughter and Theo played joyously; she was in his class at Patana school. Nice people, very lively and simple, and about to go on a holiday to their father-in-law's in New Hampshire.

Sunday, December 18

River cruise to a 200-year-old temple complex. The river is very different in Bangkok: fancy hotels, villas, numerous temple complexes. At the temple we knelt and saw Buddhist devotees doing obeisance just like Greek Orthodox, but before Buddha as opposed to icons, offering a candle or flower, or affixing gold leaf to the small Buddha in front of the central, large one. All Buddhas are in gold (color, at least). Yellow-robed monks in evidence. Outside, in a hall, monks seemed to be preparing a ceremony, perhaps a funeral. Everywhere an atmosphere of peace, quiet, everything in order as Buddha stares down at you so contentedly. Otherwise the site is very touristy, but we saw a skilled potter making jars on the wheel, about thirty seconds for each rather beautiful small jar. On the way back a bad meal. But upon return we all went to the Oriental Hotel, which is super-deluxe. Another world. Social dancing in the lounge. Beautiful waitress in Thai dress serving tea. Unbelievably, a ceremony by Bangkok Jews (300 strong) attended by the princess. We then went to a large central park, filled with joggers, bicyclers, people doing t'ai chi, etc., to listen to the Bangkok Symphony Orchestra's outdoor concert: pops—Offenbach, William Tell Overture, music to “Star Wars,” and the like. Folks with food baskets, wine, champagne, enjoying a respite. But we left in the middle to go to another complex, touristy, with stores and restaurants of all types, and had an Italian dinner. On the way to the car, Alec saw one of his colleagues at Patana, there with his in-laws. Aside, this man told me how much Alec is appreciated there—“a breath of fresh air”—, the third person to do so since my arrival. . . . I forgot to mention a beautiful sleeping Buddha we saw on the river cruise, eyes barely opened, reposing very peacefully.

Bangkok

We took the Sky Train from the terminal at On Nut to Chit Lom Station, adjacent to a gigantic department store, very upscale, with a fabulous food court on the top floor. Separate places for Thai, Indian, Chinese, Italian, Vietnamese, Japanese food, also coffee, also desserts. You order by pointing to a model plate; they prepare it in front of your eyes, and run your charge card through a machine. At the end, leaving, you pay the total on the card. I had Vietnamese noodles in soup with fish balls, very nice, then café latte and cherry crumble (!) heated and placed on melted syrup. Cafeteria style, but lovely young people in uniform to carry your tray, clear dishes, etc. Total luxury. We then re-boarded the Sky Train for one station, Siam, to go to the new aquarium, Siam Ocean World, in the Paragon Mall, which had a movie theater with five titles, etc. A wonderful aquarium, complete with divers feeding the sharks. Home. Nap. Then Mr. Thornhill, the acting headmaster, came to visit and stayed an hour. We talked about competitiveness, the Quaker view versus (perhaps) what happens at Patana. He said that my reaction—my feeling that the “awards” do not really create a hostile atmosphere—is very clearly planned. Awards for effort, for improvement, for group activity, all cut across the individual ethos that otherwise could dominate. He says that he will stay in Bangkok after leaving the school in July and will seek another job. I mentioned Gail Schoppert’s difficulties in returning “home” after a professional life abroad. Thornhill has been here for sixteen years. He says he understands about 60% of the Thai he hears, which is advanced. He went yesterday to a woman who deals in Tarot cards. Tomorrow he heads off to Burma with a friend, to the beach, then to Rangoon. Such is life for ex-pats. . . . Long talk with Alec about the children’s future: will they feel baseless? Doubtful. Video of Elena’s ballet class, singing assembly, Theo’s soccer instruction. Elena donned her necklace and bracelet. She’s all woman! I read a fine book to Theo, about a dragon who loves his voice.

Bangkok

Forgot to note, yesterday, that we started the day by going to Sukhomvit Soi 93 to the Jim Thompson outlet store and bought a lovely silk blouse for Chrysanthi for 1200 baht (about $30). Today we took Monica to the dentist’s downtown, near the Nana Sky Train stop. A beautiful hospital that, in a way, makes Mary Hitchcock look provincial. Like a hotel inside plus a mall. Starbucks, Au Bon Pain, McDonald’s, a huge indoor car park, a sort of hotel for patients and families to stay overnight, the nurses in starched all-white uniforms, smiles everywhere. . . . From there we went nearby to the Jim Thompson house, where in the store the same blouse I bought yesterday for 1200 baht was now 2400. The house is beautiful, all in teak, with works of art everywhere, gardens, etc. Thompson settled here after World War II and developed the Thai silk industry, very profitably. We ate in the house’s restaurant, outdoors in front of a pond. . . . In the evening, went to a traditional puppet show. Three people, young men for the male puppets, young girls for the female, dressed in black, are perfectly coordinated, dance as they manipulate the puppets with sticks attached to head, arms, etc. The play was a version of an Indian epic, rather silly, but with lots of fun: ogres getting hit over the head, a magical finger that turns into a weapon, etc. Afterwards, the two head puppets were taken by their operators through the audience, the woman embracing and kissing women in the audience, the male shaking his fist at us. Very fine (and very oriental) music throughout, the text mostly sung, really, on a CD, not spoken by the operators. . . . Afterwards we checked out the very active night life in this area: huge open market (I bought a silk tie with elephants for $2.00), a rock band, hundreds of people, mostly young, eating at outdoor tables surrounded by a sort of food court. Fireworks in the distance. . . . I should have mentioned the car wash we had on the way home this afternoon: two employees washing everything with soap before the machine, then drying everything with towels afterwards, all for $2.00.

Bangkok

This was our most interesting and memorable day, thanks to the teacher of Thai in Patana School, who arranged everything. We met her in the north part of the city and were joined by a Thai couple and the wife's sister, two of the three speaking good English. Together we drove about 60 kilometers further north to the world headquarters of the Dhammakaya International Meditation Center, whose motto is "World Peace Through Inner Peace." There we were joined by our accompanying couple's son, a full-time monk, about 30 years old, a university graduate who renounced the world. Very pleasant, but no English. That was provided by the guest-master, who brought us in to a hall to meditate, then loaded us all into a vehicle to see the entire complex. They sometimes host 300,000 people at a time, to meditate together and achieve inner peace. 1200 monks live there. Shortly before 11:00 a.m. our accompanying monk left us to prepare for lunch. We were then brought to the monks' dining hall, a huge shed with open sides and numerous "tables" on which monks crawled on their knees, then sat and then were offered food by us (the food having been provided; and a hearty meal it was). Seeing 1000 monks doing this was extraordinary. Before, however, there was extended chanting, with all guests in meditation position and a row of monks sitting immobile as they sang. The goal of the foundation is to facilitate a higher level of consciousness, uplifting the quality of the human mind. They hope that this will transform the culture of war and violence to a culture of peace and nonviolence. There are branches worldwide, including seven in the USA. . . . We then went to a nearby university for a snack in the refectory. This university uses English as the language of instruction and caters to foreigners. Then we visited the Bang Pa-In Palace, the king's summer palace, with a beautiful throne room all in gold, marvelous trees and bushes shaped like elephants, rabbits, deer. Finally to a floating restaurant for a late lunch. . . . Returning, we went to an impressive mall, just like anything in the US, with everything available and crowded with shoppers. Then supper in a Japanese restaurant in the mall. Total price for three adults and two children: $17.00.

Bangkok

Alec and I took the Sky Train and then a river boat to the Sleeping Buddha compound and then to the Grand Palace. The Sleeping Buddha is immense, holding his head with an extended arm. Jewels everywhere. The compound is resplendent in jewels, marvelous trees, golden buildings, an interesting standing Buddha. The Palace, across the street, is huge. The "Emerald Buddha" was too small and distant to see well, except later in the regalia museum where a replica is displayed. The throne room is "magnificent" of course. But all this is really overblown. The regalia museum is a bit like Topkapi in Istanbul: golden swords, jewels, etc., but also some good photos of the current royal family. . . . Home for tea. Then back into town to the theater: "Siam Niramit, presented in a magnificent modern theater seating 2000 and equipped with every possibility for rapid scene changes, a channel of water on the stage, human figures flying through space, realistic lightning and hell-fire, etc. The show: a sort of ballet plus illustrated Thai history, although one would hardly know that without the program explaining each scene. A cast of thousands! Loud, interesting music. Special effects. Actors coming into the audience. Wow! We spoke afterwards with the executive producer, who said it was an effort to counteract the large transvestite and other pornographic shows that Thai directors seem to favor. This one had two elephants on stage plus goats and chickens, aside from lots of attractive young humans, but the audience was meager.

Bangkok

Back to the hospital by 8:45 a.m. for Monica's additional dental appointment. We stayed in the pediatric area, complete with an interior playground for kids plus a children's video, and at one point a visit by Santa distributing presents to everyone. Then horrendous traffic to reach the Vimanmek Mansion, a former king's residence built of teak. Lots of wealth, lots of china, etc. from England (the king studied in Oxford) photos of Queen Victoria, a gorgeous grand piano. Wealth galore, also good taste. Back to a mall for a large meal (it's my "feast" day) in Sizzle, a western-style restaurant: steak, baked potato, salad bar. . . . In the evening, next door to a restaurant very much like a Greek κέντρο, outdoors, filled with large and small parties of diners, all Thai. Very good food. And along comes an elephant with a boy on its back selling packets of food to diners who want to feed the beast. Many did. Later, a blind singer with recorded music, guided by a friend or relative—a sweet tenor voice. Alec and family come here often and are well known. The waitresses love the children, very obviously. We finished with ice cream for everyone.

Bangkok

My fasting day for jet lag. Unbuttered toast, fruit. In the morning, to King Rama IX Park. Huge and beautiful. The children brought their bicycles. We walked extensively. Flowers everywhere, including a Chinese garden, Japanese, Spanish, Italian, English. Impressive central building housing a large auditorium. On the exterior, displays of the king's hobbies: playing saxophone, building rowboats, with photos and artifacts. Snack in the park's restaurant, which offers full American breakfasts: pancakes, bacon and eggs. I had fruit only. In the late afternoon we took the Sky Train into town to meet Monica's aunt, uncle, and children, who are here on a tour from Indonesia that will take the group afterwards to Hong Kong and then China. We met them in another huge department store, near the National Stadium, packed with people, as usual mostly young. Then to a large restaurant with young servers in their snappy uniforms. A large meal (I eating vegetables but cheating with two fried shrimp). The two cousins, ages 13 and 16, didn't talk much, although both are in English-language schools and the eldest will be going to Monash University in Melbourne. The father's English is good, so we could converse a bit. He told us that Bangkok's extraordinary development is fairly recent, within the last ten years. Nothing comparable in Indonesia owing chiefly to instability and corruption in government. Returning home, we telephoned Chrysanthi in South Salem and wished her happy birthday.

December 25, 2005, Christmas

Bangkok

Lots of fun opening presents in the morning. Our view-master is a great hit for both children. I received another Thai elephant necktie, this one brown (the one I bought is blue). At noon we went into town again, easy, no traffic on Sunday, to a superb European-style restaurant called Crêpes et Cie. The owner, born in Greece, is fluent in English and French. Waiters are dressed French-style. Mediterranean cuisine. I had Moroccan lamb, the tenderest, tastiest lamb I've ever eaten. Alec had tzatziki and mousakas. A lovely final meal on my feast day.

December 26, 2005

Lucky! I was in a row of four seats, all empty, on the return flight, so I stretched out at full length and slept. Met at JFK by Greg's limousine driver, who drove me to the new house in South Salem. Large and comfortable. Leander there, too. I showed Bangkok photos on my computer. Christina rather distant, not Andrew, and Peter talks continually and is frenetic. Alec manages his children better than Daphne and Greg do, I fear. Chrysanthi is fine and very loving. We'll return to Hanover on the 28th by train from Stamford.

December 31, 2005

Snails at the Rassiases', with Buck and others. Mary now has heart disease and seems very old.

January 1, 2006

Nice New Year's dinner with Weezie and Bill. And I finished preparing my volume 2 for the Greek publisher, doing a lot in Bangkok and on the flights there and back.

January 11, 2006

Started ILEAD class on "Death in Venice" and The Magic Mountain. Also spoke to a reading group on The Sound and the Fury. Yesterday started working again on the Selected Letters of Kazantzakis.

January 21, 2006

Cambridge

All the past week I reworked my essay on Mann's séance, first written in 1984, sent to Burt Pike, Werner Hoffmeister, Walter Arndt, and Steve Scher, then abandoned. Now I've incorporated most of their suggestions. Will try to publish it, belatedly. . . . Today to Cambridge. Saw Sartre's No Exit nicely acted by Will LeBow, Remo Airaldi, Karen MacDonald, and Paul Plum. So strong. Hell is other people.

February 2, 2006

New York

Farewell dinner at the Yale Club for Constance Tagopoulos, with Burt Pike. Very pleasant. Her son has MS, requiring her presence in Athens. But she'll help me in the 2007 Kazantzakis conference here.

February 3, 2006

NYC-Pendle Hill

Visited Ambassador Tsilas to see if Onassis will sponsor the Kazantzakis conference. He's in favor but must get permission from Athens. Also very interested in Kendal-type for himself and agrees that CCRCs are needed in Greece. One of my students from Columbia works here at Onassis. They want me to go around again to several universities. . . . Train to Philadelphia. I bought 65 pieces of baklava for tomorrow's desert. Started my Zorba course. A pleasure to have John Cary as one of the students and also Jack and Ruth Hunter.

February 4, 2006

Pendle Hill

Showed the Zorba film to everyone in the evening, followed nicely by Jack Hunter's "Epilogue" in silence.

February 11, 2006

Cambridge

Interesting but defective Romeo and Juliet at the A.R.T. Hard to understand because the "stage" was in the middle of the theater and the actors often had their backs to us. Yet, still moving, especially because the private affair was conditioned by a public affair. Shakespeare's message, as always, is very clear.

February 13, 2006

My old computer (OS 7.2) died and I bought a new Mac laptop (OS 10.4.4.), very fast, of course. . . . Jim Sheridan asked me to write another piece on the beginnings of Kendal. I went back to my 1991–1992 diaries, which are extensive. And it's all there, especially the huge problem with Jean Brophy, the firing, alas, of Carol, the faulty sprinklers flooding apartments, the leaking roofs pouring water into the place, the ceilings that had to be replaced because of faulty sound insulation. How can I print this and still be discreet, especially retarding Jean? Oh yes, also the Town tax imbroglio.

February 14, 2006

I did my "Celebration of Johnny Cash" in the Gathering Room. Earlier today, in the clinic for blood-taking, the technician told me that Cash's daughter had complained about the movie, just as I do, saying it is so negative, omitting the positive side. I had a full house for the presentation, including Kesaya and Chris, Lafayette and Mayme, and Mats Lemberger and a friend from Dartmouth. Ralph Mayer's machines produced marvelous fidelity. I had to struggle to hold back tears on stage, but managed, with much nose blowing. And Johnny Cash sang out, full and strong.

February 15, 2006

Last ILEAD class. Finished The Magic Mountain, playing the music that Hans listens to, thanks to a disk lent by Bruce Duncan.

February 19, 2006

Very busy. I'm continuing with the Kazantzakis letters. Just finished 1943; doing 1944. Lots of words remain indecipherable. But now Chel Avery has sent me all the comments on my "Light" essay, with suggestions for shortening, eliminating footnotes, etc. A big job. On top of this, Jim Sheridan asked me to write again for Kendalights about the early days of Kendal. I looked at my 1991–1992 diary entries, which are quite full. But of course I can't print much of what I found, especially all the negatives about Jean Brophy. With care and discreet erasing, however, it's going to work.

March 2, 2006

New York

Cocktails at Sheila Baird's. Walked there with Annie Levis; heard all the Farm School gossip. Then to Broadway to see the Johnny Cash show "Ring of Fire." Delicious. Just song after song, some I didn't know, many favorites that I did know. Sung by many male and female voices recruited from Nashville. Wonderful band; scenic effects; a little acting to support themes. But mostly just the songs. A treat.

Friday, March 3, 2006

Post-Secondary Committee gave the go-ahead for expansion of Perrotis to three years. I wonder if Vergos will be an adequate director. Good meeting later re: Secondary and also re: Strategic Planning with Gail Schoppert. At 5:00 met Michael Groden for 1¼ hour at the Yale Club. He's still stymied by Stephen Joyce but will probably do his critical thesaurus now without quoting the text, just referring to it. I hope that Bob Bell will speak to him about reading Ulysses for the very first time in my class. . . . Then briefly to Daphne's. She had won a lottery at St. David's providing a catered dinner for ten. It was tonight. She didn't lift a finger. Waiters distributed drinks and hors d'oeuvres. The table was beautifully set with our Limoges china. I met some of the guests: Dartmouth alums, colleagues from Goldman Sachs, a mother from St. David's, etc. . . . Then to Marymount College on East 71st for another cocktail party hosted by its president, now an AFS trustee.

Saturday, March 4, 2006

Full board. Happily, we voted to purchase 75 acres far enough outside the city to accommodate our cows. A woman willed $4,000,000 to the school. And Betty Godley left $1,000,000. Nice to see Dimitri Gondicas and Mike, of course. . . . Over the weekend, I read the first of the two books on Buddhism lent me by Taveephol Chardtumrong. I draw the line at reincarnation, I'm afraid. But some other passages are worth quoting:

¶ (p. 9) There are two foremost lights in the world: the light of the sun and that of the moon. . . . They, however, . . . cannot illuminate the inner world or the human mind.

¶ (p. 43) . . . The meditator realizes that everything in this world is transient, subject to suffering and uncontrollable because it is non-self. Thus, the mind abandons the desire to acquire, the desire to have, and the desire to be.

¶ (p. 89) Nibbana is the goal of Buddhism. . . . Nibbana is not nothingness. That Nibbana is total cessation does not mean it is nothing. But it means complete extinction of suffering . . .

¶ (pp. 122–123) Life begins and ends with cries and moans. . . . Babies cry with closed fists—a symbolic indication that they are born to hold and cling. But when we close our eyes to take leave of the world, we spread our palms as if to remind those left behind as witnesses that we cannot take anything with us.

March 5, 2006

Today I was told that I was elected president of Kendal's Residents Council for 2006–2007. At least it ends after one year.

March 21, 2006

Very nice celebration at Kendal for Lafayette Noda's 90th birthday. About 60 people for dinner in the Steere Room. Toasts (with sparkling apple juice), testimonials, a chronology, photos from babyhood onward. I made everyone laugh by saying (after Mayme told of being stopped by police while driving), "Next time you're stopped for speeding, Lafayette, and the officer asks you for an explanation, just say 'I'm 90 years old and I don't have much time.'" . . . Busy recently preparing "The Mystery of Quaker Light" for Pendle Hill publication with a new editor, Chel Avery. Progressing on the Kazantzakis letters. Preparing a lecture for Rochester. Going to the Armstrongs' for supper tomorrow because they'd missed my Johnny Cash celebration and wanted a "private showing." Wilsons will come, too. Pat Porter gave a beautiful recital this afternoon on Kendal's organ, which I brought here, negotiating with its owner, Carleton Chapman, and the Kendal architects, who needed to modify Gathering Room design in order to fit in 50 loudspeakers.

March 23, 2006

Chrysanthi played Jackie Kennedy and I played Thoreau in Joan Williams's "Who Am I?" Chrysanthi read beautifully, ending with lines from Cavafy's "Ithaca." At the very end, as the audience was leaving, Steve Crary collapsed and died, aged 93, a nice way to go. Tomorrow Bill Summers will lecture on Mozart. On Saturday comes Veronica Jochum's and my Mozart program.

March 25, 2006

Our three-day Mozart festival. Last night Bill Summers lectured well on Mozart's theaters, with clips and music. Tonight Veronica Jochum and I presented "Mozart: a Journey." I read from the Mozart letters and eye-witness accounts of the wunderkind. Veronica played music appropriate for the year and circumstances, and showed slides. We rehearsed yesterday for three hours and this morning for two. Trouble with the power point slides in rehearsal but perfect in performance. And Veronica played masterfully. I had to read sometimes in German, French, and Italian. Lisa helped my German. Full house. It went very well, and was videotaped.

March 26, 2006

Completed our Mozart festival tonight with the film "Amadeus," which is so strong, mostly because of the music.

April 1, 2006

Rochester

Spoke on "The Last Temptation as Post-Christian" to the Hellenic Society. The nicest surprise was that the lady who hosted me in Buffalo drove all the way to hear this. How nice! A retired Catholic priest was a fine member of the anticipatory dinner and then the audience. A Platonist. And he didn't object to what I said about Saint Augustine.

Sunday, April 23, 2006

Mayme Noda died Friday night. Kesaya called me earlier on Friday saying that it was hopeless. Lafayette called early Saturday to say that she had "expired" and to thank Chrysanthi and me for our friendship. At Meeting this morning, David hugged me and wept profusely. Later Kesaya the same. Lafayette very stoic. I played piano for hymns, replacing Mayme, and folks sang her favorite hymns. I ministered in Meeting about Mayme's diversity: wife, mother, cook, farmer, musician, and citizen, Quaker activist. I should have included "speaker"—almost monologist. Others ministered movingly. Kesaya visited later in the afternoon trying to plan the memorial service here at Kendal. . . . This morning we also heard our Kendal service with Alan Horton officiating, speaking on "reason" (Darwin) vs. "faith (creationism) very expertly. Lively lunch afterwards. Then at 3:30 early music concert. I played Scarlatti's Sonata in D major, terribly. Nerves. But I got through to the end without breaking down totally. Frozen fingers.

April 24, 2006

Andrea Useem was meant to arrive today to speak at Dartmouth at 4:00, at Kendal at 7:15, and tomorrow at a War/Peace lunch, all painstakingly arranged by Fred Berthold and me. But all flights were canceled at Dulles owing to fog. She couldn't get another booking, everything full, and we canceled everything. She was going to speak about her conversion to Islam and the role of women in the American Muslim community. We'll try to re-book her for next autumn.

April 27, 2006

Ithaca, Hampton Inn

Drove to Ithaca with Walter Reeves, 6½ hours, but easy because we talked interestingly most of the way. He, of course, is the current president of the Residents Council whom I will replace for 2006–2007. 3:00 p.m. meeting at Kendal at Ithaca of Resident Council members from all eleven communities. Lots of good ideas. Nice reunion with John Diffey, but I had to say that not much has been done about a Kendal in Greece. Supper in Kendal at Ithaca's dining room with some of its residents. Hanover is nicer, and has better food.

April 28, 2006

Plenary sessions in the morning, first mostly about baby boomers and their effect on CCRCs in the future. Lovely reunion with Gay Berger; we lunched together. She says that Pendle Hill is not doing well. Huge deficit. Weak interim director. Niyonu alienating people. Hal Weaver a disruptive influence on the board. Alas! But Dan Seeger is in charge of plans to refurbish Friends Center on 15th Street. Second session on IT and other improvements for health care. After lunch, small groups on strategic planning. Then dinner in Cornell Ornithology Lab, sitting next to Gay Berger. Opposite, a man who taught Greek and Latin at Oberlin. Lots to talk about.

April 29, 2006

Ithaca–Riparius

Our Hanover group met to discuss how we would act back home. We'll summarize these lessons to the residents and each of us will submit a reaction to Becky. At the end they brought out the entire kitchen staff that had fed 200 guests so well. Applause. I heard that Ithaca has an ombudsman. Interestingly, when I asked Lorraine Deisinger about it she said it didn't work; no one used it (she also said that peer tutoring never worked because the aggrieved party didn't want peers to know everything). So I went to Dan, the executive director of Ithaca and of course got the opposite news: the ombudsman (actually they have two) works very well indeed. Consultation is often. There's a dedicated telephone and e-mail. The individuals are appointed by the board upon recommendation by the council. Alternatively, two council members can serve. The ombudsman can often help solve a problem, or can refer it to the proper person. But personnel firings are out of bounds for the ombudsman. What I learned from this is what I already knew: don't trust Lorraine Deisinger. . . . Drove to the farm. Chinese supper. Everything fine in our house, but Alec had three large trees blown down in back, with top branches landing on his woodshed roof. Minimum damage, probably.

Riparius

Put books away. Picked up a huge number of fallen branches—to the pile. Got the tractor ready. The new system of jacking didn't work because the cement blocks sank so far into the ground that the wheels were no longer elevated. Next year must put a plank under them to spread the weight. Tractor wouldn't start; no battery power. Strange, because it's fully charged, and I cleaned the terminals with steel wool. I used jumper cables from the car, and it started. Let it run 90 minutes. We'll see what happens when I try again on the next visit. No time to fertilize fruit trees or till the garden. Next time. The ash next to the house seems to have ants again and needs re-tarring.

May 2, 2006

Nina McCall now reports that Jay Pierson, Kendal board chair, thinks that I shouldn't serve as council president because I'll be away too much. I explained to her the willingness of Betsy Sanderson, vice-president elect, to serve during this period. I also spoke with Pierson, who seemed to soften his objection. We'll see what happens.

May 11, 2006

New York

Christina's play in the Marymount School: Li'l Abner. She played Moonbeam McSwine. She sang one song and said a few lines. Marrying Sam was excellent; real stage presence. The lead roles were grade 5. Christina is grade 4. Singing, dancing, dialogue, scenery. Costumes. A real show. Nice young woman playing the piano very expertly. Afterwards I asked her where she trained: Cincinnati and Mannes. Also spoke to Nancy Prosser's granddaughter, who does music in the upper school. Concepcion Alvar, head of school, came over to say hello. She seems to know Christina. . . . A few hours afterward with Greg, Daphne, and other children in their apartment: Daphne explained more about the contemplated move to Santa Barbara. "I don't want to raise my children in New York." That's partly the reason. Everything here has to be planned. The kids cannot just go outside and play. So they return home and watch television. But Andrew paints, makes ceramics, and collects baseball cards. Peter asked me if my tractor was green.

May 5, 2006

New York

To the Guggenheim Museum for the David Smith show. He's the one who lived and worked on a farm in Bolton Landing. Remarkable sculptures and paintings. How I wish I could stand one in the fields at Terpni. Asking one of the guards if the Smith farm was open as a museum, I discovered that she is a graduate of North Creek High School, lives in Johnsbury, and studied with Paul Little. Small world. Also saw exquisite Kandinskys and Cézannes. Then to Marymount for Christina's grandparents' day. Grades IV and V again, this time singing Irving Berlin songs plus Chattanooga Chou Chou and a Joplin rag. Part singing; syn-copation. Excellent. Concepcion Alvar, head of school, spoke well afterwards, saying that the school supports the arts. She was the one person seated on the floor during the singing. Then Christina took us to her desk and to a monopoly-like game fashioned by the students consistent with their study of the Westward movement: covered wagons, buffalo, etc. Also saw a paragraph she wrote very excellently. Then by subway to Grand Central and the Yale Club, where Daphne met us with Andrew and we all had a sumptuous lunch. Walked with them four or five blocks up Madison Avenue in 80-degree sunlight. They're off later to South Salem. Daphne worries about our Biedemeier dining room table, meant to go to Alec, but how? It would be a shame to lose it. . . . To Penn Station and home.

May 11, 2006

Lunch with David Wykes, who wanted my advice about retiring. Dinner with Ethan Foster and Constance Littlefield, CPA; then long session about Quaker budget, which we're going to simplify.

May 12, 2006

Those who went to Ithaca met to plan our presentation to everyone. I'll speak about all the other Residents Councils and the advantages of being part of a system. I hope to speak at the 15-year celebration in September, maybe repeating some of my remarks at the 5-year celebration in 1996. . . . Then to the English Department's "Fish Dinner" to honor Bill Cook upon his retirement. I spoke about our visit to Mina Shaughnessy at CCNY, our reading of anti-war poetry as a sort of Amos and Andy team in the Core Course for Peace Studies.

May 13, 2006

Rehearsed Titus and the Mozart sonata in the morning. Then the first meeting of my council officers: Betsy Sanderson, Pat Burnham, Kingsley Ervin. We chose Joan Wilson to be our fifth member. In the afternoon, performed the sonata with Joan (four hands) and Titus with Joan, Joan Snell and Bill Clendenning (eight-hands), not too badly, in the Cary Room, for health center people.

May 14, 2006

To a fancy house in Etna to celebrate Walter Arndt's 90th birthday. He is still full of good humor. Nice to see Prue again and David. Then a fancy supper with Allan and Claire Munck.

May 19–20, 2006

Terpni

Despite gentle rain and black flies, I tilled the entire garden and we planted lettuce, scallions, potatoes, peas, string beans, cucumbers, squash, and tomatoes (covered with Reemay against possible frost). Turned the water on without any problems. Mowed with the White. Fertilized the three plum trees (all full of blossoms), two cherries, and the apple tree. Picked up lots of fallen branches around my office. The big problem is a large pine that fell directly into the pond. I managed to saw off the bottom six feet of the trunk with my small Stihl, which doesn't cut straight. Tried to pull the tree out of the pond with the John Deere, but couldn't get traction because the ground is so wet. Will try again in June. Supper at Sicilian Pizza in Lake George, greeted by our friend the owner.

May 24, 2006

The eleven of us who went to Ithaca lined up on stage in the Gathering Room, each pair with one of the new microphones just purchased for $9000, to tell the community what happened at Ithaca. My assignment was, in five minutes, to describe our feeling that it's better to be part of a multi-site system like the Kendal Corporation than to be a stand-alone single-site CCRC. I also said something about the advisability of an ombudsman and also of a Kendal at Home. The day before, I attended the health committee chaired by Harriet Baldwin, and the task force considering changes in council chaired by Tedd Osgood. . . . Supper with Dick, then played Poulenc and Bach violin-piano sonata, and the marvelous Prokofiev sonata, which is very hard for me.

May 25, 2006

Practicing the Alberti bass on the Mozart D-major sonata which we'll be doing at Kinhaven. Very hard. Trying to learn Mozart's "Little Gig" to do on the harpsichord next fall. It's a marvelous fugue, really, with the subject upside down in the second part. . . . Council's budget committee in the morning; Weezie Pietsche's "Kendal Stories" in the evening. I described how we got the organ from Carlton Chapman.

May 27, 2006

Cambridge

A marvelous show at the A.R.T.: Marivaux's The Island of Slaves with a bravura performance by Fiona Gallagher as Cléanthis. The idea is transformation: masters becoming slaves, slaves masters. To extend this, Robert Woodruth, the director, introduced five "islanders"—transvestites all, dancers, singers, etc.—from Boston and, of course, Provincetown. They were very funny, interacting with the audience. But the play's moral, that the aggrieved slaves needed to overcome vindictiveness, was beautifully done, and solidified at the end when they all began to sing Mozart, from Così fan tutte. . . . We had additional fun listening to Car Talk on the way in, Prairie Home Companion on the way back, plus Greek songs including our favorite about the divorcee who needs to tell her ex-husband that the cat has just had kittens. Supper at Sweet Tomatoes.

May 28, 2006, my birthday

Good Meeting. I ministered about Marivaux combined with Stuart Lord's message last Sunday about lifestyle. Pong came, at my invitation, and told everyone that in his service as a monk at age 12 the idea is that every good deed helps one's parents. Brunch at EBA's, free because of their birthday policy. Then at 4:30 the marriage of Phidias and Alice Dantos's beautiful daughter Maria to a Greek boy from Athens in a full Greek wedding with three priests, stefana, χορός του Ησαΐα, Christos Anesti 3 times. All in Rollins Chapel, with un-Greek organ before and after. Then reception and dinner and dancing at Hanover Inn for 300 people. We were with the Marders mostly. Spoke to the groom's parents, just arrived from Athens. They don't speak English. At the dinner, American band (too loud, of course) until 10:00 p.m. Then, happily, a fine Greek band from Boston with bouzouki. And everyone danced, led by Phidias and Chrysanthi at first. Syrtos, tsamikos, etc. I couldn't believe that this was happening in Hanover, New Hampshire.

Sunday, June 4, 2006

Terpni

Rain-rain-rain since we arrived on Friday. Supper in the Route 28 diner, enough to take home for a second dinner. Saw six large wild turkeys out front and three large deer near my office who just watched me as I advanced slowly, but eventually turned and ran. Tomatoes survived but lettuce and peas seem to have been washed away. Chrysanthi will plant more lettuce tomorrow. And I'm going to dig up the rhubarb plant and fill its hole with cow manure, then replant it, with hope for revitalization. We went to the Black Hole this afternoon to see Mill Brook at its fullest cascading over the rocks with immense force. Despite the weather I've done some mowing with both the White and the John Deere. I also set up my office and began work this morning, still translating 1923 letters using the new laptop, whose battery is very long-lived. Also am using the larger of the two "lazy susans" I built for jobs like translating that require three or four books at hand; the smaller and better one has been very well used in my study 705 in Baker Library. The Shapiros came for supper last night. Fran, aged 93, looks 70 and acts 70. She's better than ever, with a new knee. I played them the Mozart D major sonata that I'll be doing with Alice at Kinhaven, using the CD, which of course goes faster than we'll dare. Irv's WWII photos from France are on exhibit in Glens Falls. We'll go on Thursday on the way to Kinhaven. Demetrios Liappas telephoned from Los Angeles about my week there as Onassis visitor at the end of September. Three lectures, dinners, receptions. . . . I've written to Stamatis Philippides about booking a hotel in Rethymno for 18 March, 2007 until the end of May. Must work now on the Kazantzakis symposium I'll be running at NYU in March 2007. What first? And much to prepare for the Farm School trustees not to mention Kendal's Residents Council. And early in July Kazantzakis volume 2 arrives and I'll need to do the index.

Tuesday, June 6, 2006

To revitalize our rhubarb, I dug under it and we deposited compressed cow manure underneath. That should help. Leander arrived last night and regaled us with the accomplishments of Nicholas and Sophia. Today he mowed around his house; he doesn't want me to do it with the John Deere because I don't rake the cut grass. Chrysanthi and I put more black paper, heavy gauge, on the borders of the garden. This seems to work as a weed-preventer, whereas the old system, hay mulch, doesn't.

June 7, 2006

Today on my way to the office one of the wild turkeys was right in my path, followed by two very tiny chicks. Instead of running away, she came toward me, honking and obviously encouraging me to turn around and disappear. I didn't. Eventually she flew onto an overhanging branch. I didn't know that these large, heavy birds could fly, but they obviously can, at least short distances. . . . All packed now for 5½ days at Kinhaven followed immediately by the trip to Greece. Rain again today and predicted until Sunday. Too bad.

June 9, 2006

Kinhaven

Alice and I have already spent many hours doing our Mozart. No lesson yet; we begin tomorrow morning with Leander. It sounds good (although I still can't do the Alberti bass at sufficient speed) but we need help with trills and other nuances. Also did some sight-reading of Gershwin, Mendelssohn, and more Mozart. Some familiar people here: Mrs. Patterson, who turns out to be related to Jerry King; Bruno Repp of course, who gave me one of his "scientific studies" of how four-hand pianists relate to the timing of each other (imagine!); Robin Williams, Charlotte, and Leander's other regulars but not Alma and Bill this year. David Abbott joined the staff. He told me he left Kinhaven because of Jerry Bidlack's mediocrity and praised me for being practically the only one who tried to remedy it by having him step down as conductor (of course he didn't, until recently owing to age and arthritis). The place looks very bad; even the once-lovely living room in Main House is a mess. Chrysanthi and I are in the Da Capo trailer. Lights don't work; no heat; dehumidifier overflowed and flooded the carpet; ants in the bathroom. But we're managing. Chrysanthi sits and reads in Hale House, which is clean and heated. I brought a computer and have kept abreast of e-mail. Stamatis Philippidis just booked us a suite at the Jo-An Palace in Rethymno and wants me to produce an 80-page booklet on Kazantzakis to be ready by October! That means working the whole month of August, after I finish the index to volume 2. The Kazantzakis letters will be delayed once again, alas.

Saturday, June 10, 2006

Kinhaven

Excellent lesson with Leander exclusively on the first movement, which will now be played slower, enabling me to get the Alberti bass better. He had me do lots of exercises to get things in unison. In the evening, faculty four-hand recital with a lovely Beethoven, a Cherubini not so lovely, and a great Mozart—with Leander, Nigel, Mrs. Shin, Nancy, and David Abbott (that was Friday night). On Saturday, the solo recital by lots of fellow students. But I didn't play this year and neither did Alice. Most interesting was part of Ives' Concord Sonata.

Sunday, June 11, 2006

Kinhaven

Still cloudy and cold, the 5th or 6th straight day. Very good lesson with Nancy this morning, exclusively on the 2nd movement, which she got us playing a bit faster than we had, and thinking in three rather than in six. Alice and I had a half hour warm-up on the concert hall piano at 7:00 a.m. Then another lesson with Leander.

Tuesday, June 13, 2006

Kinhaven-Philadelphia

Alice and I were first on the recital program and I think we did the Mozart musically. I wasn't nervous, but I made one slip and Alice made one—nothing serious. We benefited greatly from all the coaching: Mrs. Shin yesterday on mostly the 2nd movement, Leander on Sunday afternoon on the 3rd movement. Everyone laughed when I announced that the sixteen-year-old Mozart wrote this to play with his sister. Last night we heard a splendid solo recital by Nigel: Mozart Fantasy played better than ever, Bartok Microcosmos, 4 Schubert impromptus done beautifully, the same Mendelssohn Rondo Capriccio that Charlotte played the other day, again perfectly done. He is such a consummate musician. After Alice and I performed, Chrysanthi and I left immediately to drive to Albany, park the car at the Marriott, and catch our flight to Philadelphia. On the US Airways flight to Frankfurt I was upgraded to business class, strangely, and actually slept a few hours.

Wednesday, June 14, 2006

Frankfort–Thessaloniki

By virtue of my business class seat, US Airways treated us to a room for the day in the Sheraton Airport hotel. What luxury! We slept another two hours, showered, sat and read, had a very expensive mid-afternoon meal. Then flew via Aegean to Thessaloniki. I've started to re-read The Sound and the Fury. The Benjy section is really quite clear if you look for the guiding signs that Faulkner includes. So far what's all too clear is Benjy's helplessness yet deep understanding, Dilsey's solicitude, the mother's self-accusations, Jason's meanness, Caddie's tenderness: "She smelled like trees"! . . . Met by Pelagia Voutsas and her husband at the airport, now greatly expanded. First conversation: how good it is to be rid of Stefanakis. Agreed. She was very pleased with the three interns this year and looks forward to the new three next year. We're housed in the brand new Niarchos dorm in a nice room with air conditioning.

Thursday, June 15, 2006

Slept finally after two hours lying awake. Saw Thanos and talked about interns, then Phil, John Cleave, David and Gail at breakfast. Everyone very friendly. Secondary Committee with Annie, Tasos, Bill and Phil sitting in. We will report on the new division of T.E.E. into the Technical Lykeio and the Technical School. Then Post-Secondary ably chaired by John Crunkilton. We voted unanimously to recommend expansion to three years. Bill McGrew's conclusion: "What the hell! Let's do it!" We worry about Vergos as president of a much higher operation. He'll need to be replaced. . . . Dedication of the lovely πλατεία outside Princeton Hall, with an interminable religious blessing, short speeches, and then lovely dancing by students. Dimitri Gondicas and I sat for a time to catch up. Princeton is flourishing, but he worries very much about MGSA, including the journal. A long lunch (two hours) with the three interns, two girls and a boy, very happy in their assignment. They assured me that Pelagia always offered support. Also, they were regularly assigned the 4th hour in the week of English language instruction—conversation, which they handled through games. . . . I typed up the Secondary minutes for tomorrow and checked e-mail. Don Nielsen, to satisfy Lia's conservatively Christian family, is going to be baptized Greek Orthodox and assume the name Damian. He noted how intolerant his instructors have been, insisting as they do that Orthodoxy is the only valid faith. . . . Long walk around the grounds with Chrysanthi, who went out for lunch with George and Efthymoula. When George was alone with her for a moment he asked if she was happily married, then said "Look what I have!" Poor man! . . . College graduation with a lovely valedictory speech by a student from Macedonia (FYROM), stressing how marvelous it was to be with Bosnians, Kosovans, Greeks, etc., and to feel the predominance of human brotherhood over nationalistic differences. The 29 graduates were from all the Balkan countries, from peoples that had been killing each other for centuries. Now they were one family in Perrotis College. How nice! And of course Albana was present, both in various videos shown at the graduation and in person, looking very pretty and beautifully dressed. But her situation is not good. Her poor twenty-two-year-old brother is seriously injured after an automobile accident and now cannot work. She has a bad job in a video store. The solution, she thinks, is to go back to A.C.T. for the MBA degree, one year if she goes full-time, two years if she goes part-time. She's accepted, but has no money and is waiting to see if they'll award financial aid and how much. I guess I'd better continue to subsidize her. I'll write to Dick Jackson and offer to pay half.

Full board. We passed the College proposal for a three-year program offering the B.S. degree—very risky, but probably less risky than continuing with the two-year College, whose numbers of students have remained about the same, without growth, for ten years. The finances look much better. Some bequests have come in, and we'll begin to receive regular income from leased land. Saw David Willis at lunch. They're fine, but Bruce Lansdale is very frail; can hardly walk, although he manages to get to the water, David says, holding on to a rope. Sad. If they only had a Kendal here! . . . In the evening, to Stratos and Loretta Constantinides' house for supper. Mansion in Panorama, great wealth.

Lots of time talking to Tasos and especially to his wife, a Ph.D. in mathematics teaching at the university. Marder very resentful of Charlotte Armstrong, who doesn't appreciate him, he feels. Had a chance to praise and appreciate Stratos's art collection, which includes two stunning portraits by Tsarouchis. . . . Before this we were driven out about thirty km. toward Polygyros to the land that the School may purchase: 160 stremmata in one piece, to which we hope to add another 150+ to make a bit over 300 total. Beautiful wheat fields in a totally rural area, but it took us 45 minutes to arrive. If we buy the land and eventually decide not to use it for our livestock (200+ cows and bulls, hens, turkeys), we can presumably sell the land again. Cost now, about €750,000.

Farm tour led by the Thomases. Large Case tractor sold advantageously to the school by Paul Condellis. I sat in the cab (air-conditioned, with CD player), then next to the driver at first, others snapping photos. Thomases explained the use of every building: abandoned piggery, slaughterhouse for 20,000 turkeys, milk production unit, egg production, tractor maintenance. We finished by meeting the farm staff directors and tasting tsiporo and Omega 3 eggs and receiving a few stalks of wheat. It's very inspiring, all-told. . . . Then driven by lovely Dora to Annie Levis's summer house on the second finger of Halkidiki. Ate with her husband mostly: Aris, our gracious host. Bruce there, hardly able to walk. Brenda Marder drew me aside to complain about the physical appearance of the School and to emphasize the College's role as a place where Balkan nationalities could intermingle peacefully. Amen. . . . Waiting now to hear back from Dr. Barich regarding a meeting on Monday or Tuesday. . . . To town to visit Odysseas and Eleni. Very emotional reunion. The best news is that Toula now has a "partner," Γεώργιος, whom they like very much. He is a divorcee with prior children who are with the former wife. He is very handy and helpful in many ways, but Toula still has many problems (chiefly payments on huge loans taken out by Stavros) and she smokes. We didn't see her; however, Takis and Brini came, he looking very handsome without a mustache. She teaches in the Τεχνικό Λύκειο στο Πολύγυρο, a long commute. He is in charge of public works for the city. Η κατάσταση, λέει, είναι χάλια. But he always says that, like Vouli. We stayed until 11:30 and were happy to get back to Niarchos Dorm, our temporary "home."

Delicious Greek honey for breakfast. No electricity all morning. Went to Cincinnati Hall, where it was cooler, and read more of The Sound and the Fury, part 2, Quentin's, which I am discovering is even more difficult than Benjy's part 1. Also read Bruce Lansdale's beautiful poem "Metamorphosis" about his life in Greece, generally, and at the School in particular, a perfect expression of the School's idealism. He includes touching tributes to Litsas and to "the lady in the tower," Joice Loch. . . . George picked us up around 1:00 p.m. He's very opposed to the legislation to permit private universities, which has got all the university students and faculty out on strike at the moment. He says the rich will go to the private universities and the rest to the public, and that's what the present conservative government wants. I explained about financial aid. We went to a fine restaurant in Kalamariá and were joined by Andreas and wife and son (Γεωργιάκης) and later by Dimitris and Tilda, and of course Efthymoula was there. Good chance to talk with Andreas, who was eager to hear about Alec and Leander. He says he is no longer interested at all in the theater, indeed doesn't even like to go as a spectator. Too bad! The child is extroverted and clearly very smart. He told jokes, little stories, etc. with κέφι. I asked Dimitris about Albana's hope to do better with an MBA and he agreed; it's the only way, he asserted. I also asked him if a CCRC in Lakoma would be too far away and he thought not, provided the institution had its own bus, which of course it will, not to mention private cars owned by the residents. . . . Arranged with Dr. Barich for Tuesday night at 6:30, here. Called Takis Litsas to come. Called Bill McGrew. Trying to reach Annie. Called David Willis but no way to see them on Tuesday. They're coming to the USA next summer. Will try to get them to the farm. Daughter wants to go to university in the USA perhaps. Spoke at length with Ruth and Dimitris Gounelas. I'll see him tomorrow. . . . To Cincinnati Hall to meet Tasos and his wife Dora. We went to the κέντρο "Miami" with Bill McGrew, Vouli, Phil Foote, and the woman who was in Sydney with me many years ago, Lina Stefa. Our table was next to the water. A huge fish (συναγρίδα), octopus, salad, ouzo, wine. Lots of good conversation. Phil and Bill asked me about Everett Marder. Why is he so pushy? Difficult to answer. Ditto re: Brenda. Lots of talk about the university strike, of course.

To the city by taxi. Aegean Air office on Οδός Νίκης, by the port. Then Germanos, which couldn't replace my battery—the κινητό is too old. Then to Τράπεζα Εγνατίας to take out €525; then to Τράπεζα της Ελλάδος to deposit it to the Hotel Jo-An, which Stamatis now says is “worn out,” but we'll give it a try. Then to Λουκουμίδης for coffee and a briki. Then to Vouli's. She has a Georgian woman living with her now and helping, a very attractive young lady who explained that she crossed the border into Greece secretly, was caught and sent back to neighboring Bulgaria, paid for a false passport, crossed again, secretly, was not caught, got a job illegally, eventually was allowed to apply for legal status as a resident, which she now enjoys. Her son is back in Tbilisi with the grandmother. Poor soul! . . . I went to the Kamára to meet Dimitris Gounelas. Vouli told me a good joke à propos: Δεν μπορεί να περάσει κάτω από την Καμάρα. It means that a man's wife is so unfaithful that his horns of cuckoldry grow so large that they prevent him from passing beneath the Kamára. Dimitri had never heard it, but laughed vigorously. We talked and ate from 2:00 until 4:30, then walked through the university, now on strike with students guarding every entrance to prohibit anyone from entering. Problem: the proposed legislation for privatization. I suggested depositing my Kazantzakis archive here; apparently they now have a responsible archival department. Dimitris will inquire. Also, he wants to propose me for a doctorate. Unlikely, I think. After that, I met with Vladimir Bošković, again at the Kamára, and we sat for an hour. He has a translation of my Introduction to Cavafy, Kazantzakis, Ritsos, already done, in Serbian, to be published in maybe 200 or 300 copies and also on the internet. I asked for no money in effect: 5% of sales after 1000 copies, which means zero. Pleasant man who said that students in Belgrade still have a great shortage of books. I'll send Greek ones if someone responds to my catalogue. . . . Back to Vouli's, then to AFS, and to dinner with Pelagia Voutsas and her husband, Γεώργιος, a professor at the university. Bill McGrew and Phil Foote again plus Vouli. Delicious home-cooked food on the veranda of their large, luxurious house. We overlooked the bay. Pelagia loves to talk. Tasos stopped by to say a final farewell and promise to come visit us in Rethymno, with Vouli. Μακάρι.

Tuesday, June 20, 2006

Long talk with Joann and Randy about Albana. Both stress that one really should have work experience before going to an MBA program, also that she'd be better off eventually going to a program other than the one at A.C.T. I'll see her at 4:00 p.m. today. Read in the newspaper that Θάνος Βερέμης, chair of the committee recommending changes in the universities, has received death threats. The questions are obviously very serious. . . . Out to lunch again with George and Efthymoula. She didn't scream too much. A relief. Afterwards, George gave Chrysanthi €500 and asked her to buy herself something very nice. She bought a jacket for €20. . . . At 4:00 p.m. I met Albana in Cincinnati Hall and we talked energetically for 1½ hours. She'll contact guidance and placement people at Anatolia with the hope of landing a better job. If she returns for the MBA two-year part-time program, with luck she'll work in a meaningful job during that time. Meanwhile, at Joann's suggestion, I'll contact Costas Kravvas to see if he could possibly employ her in his translation business; she knows four languages: Albanian, English, Greek, and Italian. I told her that if she gets married at some point I'd like to be at the wedding. "You'll be my κουμπάρος!" she replied. At 6:00 p.m. Dick Jackson came and I pressed him to award her half tuition if I paid the other half. He did not promise, but hopes that this might be possible. Annie came at 6:15 as promised, and Alfred Barich and three cohorts at around 6:30. Takis Litsas also came, at my invitation, as did Bill McGrew and the Marders. Dr. Barich brought us up to date. They hope to acquire another 2500 stremmata (about 600 acres) in a village 8 kilometers from Lakoma, one with hot springs and other attractions. On the two properties (neither of which they actually own yet) he hopes to build: hospital, Kendal, villas, shopping center, golf course . . . and more! I think he expects that the Kendal Corporation will do much more than John Diffey has in mind. I tried to alert him to the realistic situation. He wants 600 apartments. I told him that we have 250 and the largest Kendal has 290. Why? Because the major desire is for community. And how will he fill so many? Diffey says a project should be 70% pre-sold before construction. "Oh," he answered, "there's no problem, because we'll put others— younger people—in those empty apartments until older people sign up for Kendal." Of course a major problem is the medical insurance one. Also, if Americans sign up, will they get residence permits? Maybe the most unrealistic part is Dr. Barich's expectation that his Kendal could be low-cost. After they left, Takis Litsas expressed his total scorn. "Pie in the sky!" One of the AHEPA cohorts also, who remained silent for the 1½ hours we convened, drew me aside afterwards and explained that he, as a banker, was very skeptical. I promised to bring John Diffey and Dr. Barich in touch: let them work out what happens next, if anything. Diffey will be in Europe next June and perhaps could come to Greece. Barich travels two or three times to the US every year but current plans won't bring him anywhere near New York or New England. Θα δούμε . . . Lastly, to Θέρμη for yet another full meal, with Bill McGrew and the Marders. Brenda talked too much, very negatively. Bill expressed the huge difficulties of trying to do things right while needing to conform to Ministry of Education regulations. We all worry about leadership in the new college. How can Vergos be shifted aside?

Thessaloniki-Albany

Up at 6:15 a.m. Pelagia and George drove us to the airport. Good flight on Aegean to Munich. Rest in the Lufthansa Business Lounge. US Airways to Philadelphia. I'm still reading Faulkner's Quentin chapter (#2), very difficult, more so than Benjy's chapter.

June 26, 2006

Riparius

The Shapiros came with Al Zalan, fresh from Apple Hill. Lots of good talk, a nice lunch, and then some flute and piano: Handel, Bach, and Lili Boulanger, which he particularly liked.

June 27, 2006

Bob Bell here. He interviewed me for a piece he is writing on me for the Dartmouth Alumni Magazine. I'm embarrassed. He has collected memories from Michael Groden and Jeff Murphy, among others. . . . I wrote a short introduction, in Greek, for the Serbian translation of my introductions to Cavafy, Kazantzakis, and Ritsos. Now I need to write another introduction for the reissue of my volume 1 of Kazantzakis, Politics of the Spirit in paperback. . . . Rain, rain, everything soft and soggy. The road still passable—just.

July 3, 2006

Randolph, NH

I lectured to the Randolph Colloquium on Faulkner's The Sound and the Fury using the Kierkegaardian analysis. Large audience, lots of questions, lunch afterwards at Hirsch Cross's mansion with the mountains in front: Adams, Jefferson, Madison. The Posts, Crosses, and us. He's very lively at age 92 and will be teaching an ILEAD course in the fall on globalization. The house is immense, wrap-around porch, wrap-around garden tended by a full-time gardener, all started by his grandfather, then his father, in different locations in Randolph. Drove to the Posts' much more modest abode, but another full, winterized house with two or three guestrooms. Full of books on theology, philosophy, literature. Welcome nap in the afternoon. . . . Yesterday slept late after driving from the farm, supping at Sweet Tomatoes in Rutland. I spent the afternoon mowing the east field in hot sunlight. The transfer from that to the elegance of our Kendal apartment was striking. We lead such a rich and varied life. Today it's more and more. . . . Supper at the Posts' with Jim and Harriet Baldwin and Allan and Joan Horton. Very pleasant, out on the porch with the looming mountains in the background. After they left, more conversation with Avery and Peg until 11:00 p.m. Lovely people.

July 4, 2006

Randolph–Hanover

We detoured to Bretton Woods to see Mt. Washington in the distance and especially to wander through the Mt. Washington Hotel, built in 1902 and filled with families and young children. Reminded me of the Grand Hotel des Bains on the Venetian Lido, as in "Death in Venice." To Kendal. Dinner with Weezie and Bill and the Griffens. Again, very friendly, pleasant company. Bill gave me his new book. I promised him "The Mystery of Quaker Light."

July 5, 2006

Hanover–Riparius

My first agenda meeting with the executive committee. 2½ hours. Pat Burnham is especially diligent and helpful as secretary, and so is Betsy Sanderson as vice president. Kingsley reminded me that the first meeting, next Wednesday, will set the tone for my administration as president, so I'd better prepare. Howard Mitchell and Bob Stambaugh came to brief us on the buddy system proposal. Lots on the agenda. . . . Some shopping, dinner at the Sicilian restaurant in Lake George, waitress from Chestertown just graduated Hobart studying Islam. Back to the farm early enough to go through the pile of third-class mail retrieved at Kendal; it included my new pamphlet on Quaker Light with a very nice blue cover including the word Λόγος correctly printed.

July 6, 2006

Started letters again. Lots of tree removal on Alec's field. Fixed garden gate with a turnbuckle and cable, very fancy. . . . Dick wants to perform Trimble again and has found a suitable soprano. . . . Viewed the end of Scorsese's "Age of Innocence," very sensitively done: a total exposé of a false society. . . . I'm now booked to go to Colorado College for a week in November.

July 10, 2006

Dan Fones here with wife and daughter (not son, who apparently is a troublemaker and school dropout). They cleared the mess behind Alec's house, chipping everything except the largest trunks. Two oak trees needed to be cut, alas. Then, with great difficulty, Dan pulled the large pine out of the pond. Finally, various other blow-downs. And a bit of thinning just south of the garden, to admit more sunlight. Lots accomplished in four hours. Cost $600.

Hanover

A full day. 9:00 a.m. orientation of new Council members by Ella Erway. 10:30–12:30, Council, I presiding. It went reasonably well, I think, although I must try to end at noon in the future. Jim Sheridan is the most outspoken councilor, but helpfully. I managed an opening and closing silence, plus decision by consensus, not voting. We discussed political behavior, smoking, and each councilor introduced himself or herself. . . . Drove back to the farm and directly to North Creek for a forestry meeting with the new RCPA forester, Dan Gilmore. Alec was already there. Gilmore is smart and articulate. He promises to do more than his predecessor. We'll invite him to supper. . . . Alec and family are here now, the children lively as always. Alec is doing well at Patana and is serving on the Strategic Planning Committee with the new head of school.

July 14, 2006

Barber of Seville at the Seagle Colony. We went because the female lead was sung by Jennifer Lien, the Dartmouth student who graduated JIS and hosted us in Singapore. A sweet voice. No orchestra—two pianos expertly played. Took Theo and Elena, who lasted through the first act. Theo appreciated the humor.

July 15, 2006

Ballet matinee again with the children. Lawn seats. All new, different ballets we hadn't seen before, but nothing special musically.

July 19, 2006

Dan Gilmore, the new RCPA forester, here for supper. We walked Alec's land for two hours. Harvest possible. We're talking about a thinning operation on the Terpni property. He can mark the trees.

July 20, 2006

Burned the very large brush pile and kept adding more brush all day; very satisfying. . . . Alec drove his Jeep to Dale Millington's with me in the Pathfinder behind him flashing blinking lights. Visited Mrs. Millington; she's 76 and looks 96. Alzheimer's; no teeth; sits all day and watches television. Alone.

July 22, 2006

Wonderful ballet with Chrysanthi, our anniversary treat. "Russian Season" with interesting choreography by the new head of the Bolshoi. Then extraordinary Stravinsky/Robbins "The Cage," where the girls, dressed as alluring insects, destroy two men. A lovely Tchaikovsky/Robbins "Andantino," so different from Robbins's "The Cage" because so traditional. Then Prokofiev/Lavey "Romeo and Juliet" to that extraordinary music. And finally, "Firebird"! . . . A whole group from Kendal was there; nice to say hello. We then supped in the Montcalm: lobster bisque with sherry, as we remembered it. . . . But opening a letter from Leander afterwards we learned that both hands and wrists and forearms are in great pain, diagnosed as De Quervain's tenosynovitis, curable apparently, but how long? He had a big chance to play in North Carolina in November, but will probably need to cancel. Right now he's been told to avoid all activity with his hands. He's chagrined because on Wednesday he'll be here at the farm wanting to do so many projects and won't be able to do any. We telephoned and told him not to worry, certainly, about the farm. He will probably want to see a rheumatoid specialist in Hanover, to discover if there's more to this than the tenosynovitis.

July 25, 2006

Visit by Gail and Ruth Schoppert plus Patti Buck and dog Essa (David is already in Windhoek, Africa). Lots of talk about the Farm School, Stefanakis, Alex Drapos, George Draper, and far-away places: Bali, Malaysia, Bangkok. Gail will be visiting Bangkok in November and will see Alec and family. At the same time, Tom Wood arrived with his driver, Dan, a college student 6'6" tall and very good with Theo and Elena. Tom slept in Leander's house, Dan in the Guest House, the Schopperts and Patti and Essa in Daphne's. Quite an arrangement.

July 26, 2006

Gail made pancakes for us all. Poor Tom Wood is mostly blind from macular degeneration. Can't drive or read. But obviously still travels, although only with help. Everyone departed around 11:00 a.m. with warm expressions of gratitude. . . . I made a list of author's alterations for Princeton University Press, then mowed more of the south field, and then James McBride arrived. He stayed for supper. Will return most likely on August 4th with family. He is finishing a novel about a slave and slave-master. He spoke about his own tendonitis and the expert treatment he had received in St. Luke's/Roosevelt Hospital in New York. Leander should go there, it seems. I found more on the internet. . . . Dick sent the score for Trimble, which I'll now need to learn again.

July 28, 2006

Don Gilmore, the new RCPA forester, took Alec, Leander, me, and Theo and Nicholas to John Sullivan's to see an exemplary logging operation. Sullivan is 4th generation on the property, first farmed by his great-grandfather in the 1870s, who arrived from Ireland. We sat first in his cabin, all cedar logs, then toured the woods, mostly in heavy rain. The two youngsters behaved well, no complaints. We were all soaked through at the end, but didn't seem to mind.

July 31, 2006

I drove to the Seagle Colony to fetch Jennifer Lien, who came for supper. She told me that she took singing lessons at Dartmouth, performed in various ways, etc. Then did her required eight years with the Singapore newspaper. And now is trying to make a career as a soprano. She was lovely the other night as the lead in The Barber of Seville. . . . I'm doing the index to volume 2. Meticulous, boring work, but necessary. The "corrected" Greek came back, still filled with errors. And Stamatis Philippidis in Crete is giving me a hard time regarding my book for the students there. He wants me to revise and update previous writings.

August 3, 2006

Finished mowing the south field, early this year. Trimmed the low branches around one of the rock piles and thus started a new brush pile; we burned the large one last week. . . . Rosine Gardner Leloir came and we played four-hand piano: Mozart, Weber, Beethoven. Dick sent me Trimble, which I'm trying to learn again. Very difficult. Helped Alec load gravel from a pile on the road, to make his muddy road more passable. . . . James McBride returned, this time with Stephanie and Asher (daughter), now a teenager, very pretty, about to start 9th grade, and his young son, on their way to parents' day in Canada where their other son is in a camp. He wants Leander to go to the therapeutic center in New York for musicians. I doubt that Leander will. The daughter is obviously acting like a "difficult" teen. Talk about Ms Walker, Leander's teacher in Oberlin. She has written an autobiography in which she mentions Leander, saying that he liked to play too fast but eventually learned to play musically, and remembering going to my father when her son was always crying. . . . I'm to be one of the three speakers on September 7 at Kendal's 15th anniversary, the others being the board chair and John Diffe. I think I'll do John Donne's "Ask not for whom the bell tolls"—but yes, we also do ask for whom the bell tolls. Time: 3 minutes maximum. Pins will be given to all staff who have been with us for 15 years; 15-year residents will also be recognized. Sadly, the other day, Becky Smith telephoned to discuss dismissal of a 15-year nurse's assistant who apparently falsely accused another of being on drugs and then repeatedly denied doing this. I suggested mediation, without success.

August 6, 2006

To Bolton Landing, Sembrich Museum, to hear Diana Fanning's piano recital. I invited her to Kendal in March but will be in Greece when she comes. A very long Schumann but some wonderful Debussy and Janáček. The Museum is on a promontory surrounded by Lake George. Very fancy. Returned via the Hague and Brant Lake, where the general store just burned and is a pile of rubble. Lots of memories. . . . Rosine was here a few days ago, as noted, and will come again. I wonder if Alice will do Kinhaven again.

August 11, 2006

Dan Gilmore took Alec, Leander, Greg, and me to Newcomb to the SUNY Environmental Center where the forester walked us through part of the twenty acres they had just logged with huge machines that grab the tree, detach it, and saw it into required lengths, the operator sitting in a cab, air-conditioned or heated, with music playing. No chain saws, no skidders. No injury to other trees. Dan says that even we can do it this way. A buck approached, six pointer, very tame and just stared at us and ate, not frightened. The forester told how they'd removed 1000 deer to a nearby forest, all with electronic devices pinned to them, and they all died because deer need familiar bedding grounds in winter. Afterwards we hiked a bit to a lovely pond and had a sumptuous lunch at Marsha's in North Creek.

August 13, 2006

Daphne's family left today. Peter is remarkable. A talker. Christina is developing breasts already. She drove the tractor readily. Andrew is expert at catching with a baseball glove and throwing. He knows the batting averages of all major league stars. . . . I'm trimming trees around the pond, to keep fewer leaves from falling into the water. Much help from Alec. Leander offered but I urged him not to compromise his hands, now incapable of playing because of tendonitis, but getting better. He has a big concert with Ignat in November. Will he be able? . . . Took everyone for supper at Sicilian Pizza in Lake George at the season's height. . . . I'm reading over all lectures for Crete, updating them for the Kastaniotis booklet.

August 21, 2006

Tom and Joan Wilson here for lunch, with spanakopita, of course. Nice to have Tom now on the Kendal board and Joan with me on council. We felt free to gossip. . . . Afterward, Leander took us all on a short hike near Severance, to a secluded pond on state land, very peaceful, with large hemlocks and pines straddling rocks.

August 22, 2006

Yesterday I finished the revision of "Kazantzakis's Religious Vision" and today the revision of "Tempted by Happiness," prepared for the translator in Rethymno. . . . Scott King at Red Dragonfly Press wants to republish all my Ritsos articles and translations.

August 25, 2006

Dear Leander, Alec, & Daphne,

Mother and I spent three hours this morning with four people from Niagara Mohawk and all of our Morris and Millington neighbors, including Derek and his wife Courtney, who will be Alec's direct neighbors when they build their house.—very nice people, with three children ages one to four.

Niagara Mohawk is going to construct another high-power line about 10 feet west of the existing line, on new poles (single poles, not double ones). It will be about 30,000 volts, if I remember correctly—the existing one is 115,000 volts! To the west of the new line they'll need at least 10 feet clear and they will also need to remove any “danger trees” up to about 20 feet from the line. This means that trees will be cut on Alec's property (and on the properties of our neighbors). They promise either to chip the slash or to pulverize it with their powerful mower. The logs will be left, and can be used by the owners for firewood or whatever. I told Earl that he should feel free to collect any useful logs from Alec's property. The woodcutters will not be removing any wood for sale. Everything will be left. Unfortunately, some very nice, large trees will need to be cut. The idea is to minimize the possibility of a tree or branch landing on the wires owing to wind or an ice storm.

A NiMo forester will supervise the entire project, which starts in two days. All the Morris & Millington boys will also be watching carefully, and will keep an eye on Alec's land as well as their own.

There is no payment whatever for any of this. NiMo owns a 100-foot swath and in the deeds apparently has the right to eliminate “danger trees” beyond their actual property.

That's the story! It was nice being with all our neighbors, who seem a good lot.

Love,
Dad

August 30, 2006

I creosoted the north-office table, saving it probably although there's some rot. Also put more chips around the fruit trees. And finished typing the Kapetan Mihalis chapter for Crete. I did the Zorba one a few days ago. All the others have been sent.

September 1, 2006

Finished Richard Dawkins's The Selfish Gene. He is an enthusiastic Darwinian. Interestingly, in many ways his view coincides with the neo-Darwinism of Bergson and thus with Kazantzakis. For example, evolution is via material until it reaches human consciousness, which then takes over in some respects. Page 207 ff. on "the idea of God" is relevant. Also pp. 210–211: "I have emphasized that we must not think of genes as conscious, purposeful agents. Blind natural selection, / however, makes them behave rather as if they were purposeful. . . The idea of purpose is only a metaphor, but we have already seen what a fruitful metaphor it is." He ends (p. 215) by hoping that although our genes are selfish, we may in some cases practice altruism.

Hanover

Agenda meeting yesterday with Betsy, Pat, and Kingsley, a splendid group. . . . Today, Kendal's 15-year anniversary. Splendid lunch under a huge tent, for 400 people. We sat with Audrey Logan, Frank Miles, and Dick Nolte, who is doing much better after his devastating stroke. In the program, Becky introduced first John Diffey, then Jay (board chair), then me. I spoke about John Donne's "Ask not for whom the bell tolls, because it tolls for me. But we also do ask, since we value individuals here. The perfect sight is to see both the mask (life) and the abominable face behind it (death); indeed, awareness of Nada enhances the vigor of our participation in life." . . . Last night we all saw Edie Gieg's video of the 15 years, with good shots of construction, deceased founders (including Harriet Bien), my talk about cutting the ribbon, plus activities, e.g., Alan Walker's songs with me at the piano, and of course Mozart: A Journey. And Chrysanthi and Weezie in the latest Follies, dancing gracefully with their walkers. . . . At the luncheon, after the speeches, Becky, Brent, and other managers introduced staff who had been here fifteen years—e.g., Sherry Buckman—and read the names of the 85 (!) founders still alive.

Riparius

Back for Arthur Perryman's wedding on the top of the mountain Art bought, the one with the Morrells' shed. Beautiful weather all day until late afternoon when it poured rain. Nice to see Mr. Smith again, who works on a construction job at Donnemora Prison, a five-story hospital. And Paul Little, retired biology teacher in North Creek. Spoke with him about evolution vs. creationism. He is religious and believes, up to a point, in creationism but certainly not that God did it all in six days. Long talk with Hans, Art's former brother-in-law, now remarried and in a new job but still living in Wevertown. And of course nice to see Ann and Eileen and Michael and Ann's husband again. Good service, very Jesus oriented but at least the minister did not read St. Paul's comments urging women to be subservient. Afterwards we drove around the Antler Lake properties with vivid memories of Carl and Ora Sibling when they owned the entire property. Then to Bedford, south of Wells, to Arthur's home by the Sacandaga River, for lots and lots of food. The fiancée's father is a commercial fisherman. She, Megan Cash, is a senior at college, working now at Adirondack Community College. Art Perryman did not look well. I think that he disapproves of the bride's father. He spoke forcefully about the odds against success, 50% divorce, and of course hoped that these two would "make it." . . . Back home, Chrysanthi and I fertilized all the fruit trees, plus Leander's balsam, with stakes. And again I fixed the lock on the front door so that it would catch. . . . The Greek in the bibliography for volume 2 came back again, with new errors introduced by this incompetent typesetter, so intent now on fixing each  $\chi$  that he typed as  $\kappa$ —for example making Πέτρος Χάρης into Πέτρος Κάρης. So I spent another two or three hours going over everything once again. . . . Am reading Brenda Marder's novel, "The Greek Dream," about diplomatic derring-do in Greece and Bulgaria. It's not bad, really.

September 13, 2006

Council today went well. Thanks to Jim Sheridan's eloquent presentation against smoking, Council agreed to a complete ban everywhere, including apartments, although current residents are grandfathered to the status quo.

September 22, 2006

Heard today from Roddy Beaton that he is planning a fancy "book launch" for me in the Great Hall at King's for October 2007. And heard from Dimitri Gounelas that the faculty at the University of Thessaloniki has approved me for an honorary degree. My oh my!

September 27, 2006

Los Angeles

Demetrios Liappas drove me to the University of Southern California's Annenberg School of Communication to hear Brady Kiesling and two other diplomats who, like him, resigned over the forthcoming invasion of Iraq speak about anti-Americanism. What good fortune to be in LA just when he did this! I'd read most of his book by this time. It's amazing what a full life he had during his twenty years at the State Department. The other speaker, a woman, was even more impressive. She is now a peace activist, arrested for protesting at Congress, the White House, etc. They're all convinced that the current administration's policies are totally counter-productive. Brady spoke well, as always, and signed my book graciously. I hope to see him when we're in Greece next spring. . . . In the evening, I did the first of my presentations at Loyola Marymount: a poetry reading—Cavafy, Ritsos, Seferis, Elytis, Anagnostakis, Karyotakis, Harkianakis, featuring of course "The Moonlight Sonata." All this went very well indeed; the audience was fully attentive throughout. Lots of interesting people, including a man in whose arms Eva Palmer Sikelianou died at Delphi in the midst of a performance, another man who does Greek theater here, and, afterwards at Jerry's delicatessen eating the best pastrami sandwich imaginable, a lady who raises money for Loyola Marymount and knows all the Greek millionaires in the vicinity, most of whom give nothing.

September 28, 2006

Demetrios drove me down to center city to see the new concert hall and theater and opera complex. Lovely. Then Little Tokyo, Chinatown, the old center city. As in Philadelphia, redeveloped offices have been accompanied by apartment houses, which makes all the difference. Lunch on chopped chicken liver in a deli, very decadent. In the evening I gave my "Kazantzakis's Religious Vision" talk. Over 100 people. Very good questions after. Father John, dean of the Cathedral, was there with his class in Orthodox theology. He's the one that showed John Rassias and me around the cathedral when we were here for the archbishop's commission. I expected that he would ask a question or make a comment but he didn't. Hamburgers with Demetrios and Katherine afterwards.

September 29, 2006

Demetrios took me on another tour, this time to Venice, Santa Monica, Pacific Palisades, and finally to Loyola Marymount University. Lunch in a fish restaurant in Venice, the best swordfish I've ever eaten. I left my MasterCard there, discovered when I rented a car later, but they kept it and we retrieved it. Phew! Walked to Venice beach and watched people surfing. I'm glad I don't live in this city. Everything is too far from everything else. Car necessary at all times. Traffic. But beautiful beaches. Sunshine. Also fog. In the evening, supper with Demetrios, Katherine, and the teacher of Greek language here, Christina, and her husband, who turned out to be very interesting because he's an agriculturalist raising tomatoes commercially. We talked about the Farm School. He says that agriculture in Greece will be essentially dead in 10 or 20 years except for huge, mechanized farms. No hope for the Farm School to continue as it is, except perhaps if it specializes in some niche market. What's really needed in Greece is marketing, not production. I hope that he will visit the School when he's next in Greece.

September 30, 2006

San Diego

Long drive to San Diego on the ugly freeways. But no traffic, thankfully. Met Steve Stephanou, son of Papastephanou. He gave me an offprint from Nea Estia about his father and Kazantzakis and showed me that in some photos of Kazantzakis as a schoolboy the boy next to him is Papastephanou. Everyone very gracious and pleasant. Full lunch in USC Faculty Club, then something about the $3,000,000 they've raised for three academic chairs: in ancient Greek history, Byzantine history, and modern Greek history. I predicted great difficulty in filling them, especially the modern Greek one, and also warned about universities (e.g., Harvard) accepting money for chairs and then not filling the position. Lecture went well, with people asking good questions and coming up afterwards, as usual, to say that they'd never realized that Kazantzakis's novels are really the filling out of a full philosophical system. And why should they? Actually, Kazantzakis would probably have been a better artist if he hadn't done this. . . . Long drive home. I went off the Freeway several times to try to see more of the ocean and of villages. Back by 7:30 p.m.

October 1, 2006

Taxi to Westwood to attend Quaker Meeting, only to find no Meeting there any longer. I was stupidly using information photocopied probably ten years ago. So I ended up with a $60 taxi fare and nothing else. Returned to Venice Beach. More surfers but no “entertainment.” Sumptuous Sunday buffet in the hotel. Read the New York Times. Finally Demetrios came at 4:45 for my final performance, “Inventing Greece,” preceded by dinner at the university. This went well. Most importantly, I met a former president of AHEPA, who seemed interested when I told him about building a Kendal in Greece. Signed lots of copies of our Anthology and also of Life in the Tomb. Surprise: Mache Karanika showed up; she’s now teaching at the University of California, Irvine.

October 3, 2006

Hanover

Dan Connolly here. We updated our powers of attorney. We should be OK regarding estate taxes because we’re “too poor” with only $4 million in assets!

October 4, 2006

Played Satie with Stan Udy, a very good sight reader.

October 8, 2006

Julien O’Reilly here for Pendle Hill. Although I feel quite distant now from PH, I gave her $500 for the Youth Program, which I have always enjoyed supporting.

October 9, 2006

Lunch with “Pong,” the Thai student who graduated from Patana. He reassured me that life now goes on in Bangkok, despite the coup d’état, as though nothing had happened.

October 10, 2006

Eight-hand piano at 8:15 a.m.; Farm School conference call at 9:00 a.m.; Professors’ Colloquium at 10:00 a.m. A busy morning.

October 11, 2006

Council, spent almost entirely on smoking again. I managed to emerge with a minute to go now to board and administration. It was a circus but at least people talked. At one point I suggested voting instead of sense of the meeting; the result was 8 to 7. “You see what happens when you vote!" I declared, which pleased the Quakers in the audience. . . . Afterwards, leisurely lunch at the Inn with Tom Corindia. He'll retire in June, very early. The two adopted children and especially the girl are still causing Nancy and him great pain. We are so fortunate by comparison. . . . Tom Norton, clarinetist, came for the first instrumental rehearsal of Trimble. Not bad. Next, the soprano.

October 12, 2006

After four years, Hélène finally asked me to speak about Quakerism to the waiting list people, and gave me seven minutes. People seemed especially to like my description of "subtraction."

October 14, 2006

Nice lunch with Mary and John Lincoln at Isabel's in East Thetford, before they drive off to Florida. John is walking with a cane and struggling to enunciate clearly. I actually understood almost everything he said.

October 15, 2006

Tom Wilson officiated beautifully at our first Interfaith Gathering, recalling three persons who had changed his life. . . . Yesterday, in the Cary Room, Joan Snell, Bill Clendenning, Stan Udy, and I played the eight-hand version of Beethoven's joyous Septet Opus 20. But Bill told everyone that Beethoven wished he had burned it.

October 17, 2006

Quaker 8s here, a very good session based on George Herbert's marvelous poem "Love," one of my favorites.

October 18, 2006

E-mail to the children:

We spent a pleasant and productive day at the farm yesterday, luckily without rain. Don Fones + wife and daughter worked from 7:30 a.m. until about 3:30 p.m. and did the following:

- cut Leander's trees as indicated. Trunks are sawn into 4-foot lengths (mostly) and left in place but will be easily moved next summer.
- cut all branches overhanging the guest house
- cut  $\frac{1}{3}$  of the cherry tree just in back of the small barn, and overhanging the roof of the barn. The log is on the ground still, left there because it is the best possible firewood. We can cut it up this summer.

—trimmed all branches overhanging the pond, clear around. These are small and have been left on the ground because the ground was still too wet for him to bring his truck down or the chipper.

We can easily bring them to the pile.

—trimmed various trees hitting electric or telephone wires

I think that's it. I paid Dan $1000 from the Terpni Partnership fund. His regular full-day price is $1200; he gave us a discount!

And, by the way, just before we arrived, Earl Millington apparently accosted Dan, wondering why he was felling trees on our property. Dan explained. And we waved to Earl as we arrived.

I pruned the apple tree with Chrysanthi's help.

The new electric line is up, wires and all, at least in our sector, but they're still cutting trees at the edge of the woods to give a sufficient open space to the left of the wires. Directly where our crossing was they now have a large parking lot paved in gravel. At least we won't need to mow there any more, for a long time.

Leander's house looks fine. Even your flowers in the half barrel are still alive, despite some cold mornings.

Alec's house is fine, although we found some very clean shavings from the ceiling in the middle of your living room—your friendly ants at work.

Daphne's house is also fine. Water is turned off, I'm glad to report.

On the way back to Hanover, we had supper in the Farmer's Diner in Quechee because—imagine!—Chrysanthi won a raffle giving us $25.00 worth of free food there. Our bill came to $25.05, so I paid 5 cents plus tip. They specialize in produce from local farmers, especially organic ones.

October 26, 2006

To NYC

What a day! 8:30 a.m. with "Group of 6" in Becky's office encouraging her to adopt non-hierarchical management styles. I printed up my essay on Quaker management. Bill Pietsch has joined us (Dan Dandon died) and is encouraging us to have an ombudsman. Becky doesn't want to move fast on any of this. She in effect usurped the meeting by talking non-stop for an hour, everyone else silent (except me). Pam Mayer brave because her husband, David, died two days ago. . . . Then drove fast to Springfield, arrived on time in NYC and walked immediately to 26th Street stopping momentarily to buy a nice fedora in the garment district. 4:30 p.m.: Secondary School Committee with Annie, Gail, Bill McGrew. We prioritized some of the School's needs, emphasizing recruitment (as always). Then, still with our valise, to Metsovo Restaurant on West 90th for trustees' dinner, mediocre and over-priced as usual. But I sat next to Bill and was able to tell him about Eleni and Angelos Tsakopoulos. He hopes now to visit Eleni in San Francisco. Phil Foote has agreed to add Dimitri Gondicas to the Secondary Committee, at my request. Gail is going off. Dimitri agreed, happily.

October 27, 2006

Post-Secondary Committee. Lots of problems at Perrotis but we keep hoping. Then to Daphne's. Christina always starts by having me squeeze her hand. Andrew is speaking very well now. Peter ebullient as usual. I had Daphne sign the new power of attorney forms. . . . Then to Phil Foote's cocktail party. Long talk with Mike Keeley.

October 28, 2006

Full Farm School board. The financials look very promising owing to income from land. But no progress on the Kendal project. Relaxing trip home on AMTRAK. Very good Chinese supper in Greenfield.

November 4, 2006

Andrea Useem arrived with her ten-month-old son Moses, after calling me from Dulles airport to say that her plane was delayed. Last spring we had to cancel her talk because all flights were canceled. Better luck this time. We went to the Tafts' at 5:00; their grand-daughter had done a thesis on Islam. Supper with Fred Berthold, Dick and Jeanne Nolte, Kevin Reinhart (her Dartmouth instructor in Islam). Ron Greene, her thesis adviser came also, with Mary Jean. I introduced her to a large crowd. She in effect told her personal story of religious awakening, dissatisfaction with the empty rituals of the Episcopal Church of her upbringing, meeting Muslims in Kenya, Egypt, Zimbabwe, and finally converting as a sort of leap of faith above and beyond rationality. (Yes, she had read Kierkegaard!) Then, interestingly, about marriage: the anguish of a failed love affair in Kenya with another Dartmouth student; then, in Cambridge, the more-or-less arranged marriage to Justin, whom she hardly knew. A better way, she affirmed. Finally, a little about progressive Islam, which hardly exists. She no longer wears the head scarf. She would like to worship in the same section of the mosque as the men do, and so forth. It was all very genuine and honest, and much appreciated, I believe. The real question is: Will it last? Will the marriage last? Will her allegiance last? She is very intelligent and thus is bound to keep on asking questions.

November 12, 2006

Harpichord concert. I played Mozart's "Little Gig." Less fright than in previous performances, but again I made some mistakes and therefore was too frightened to do the repeat at a faster temp, as I had planned. But it was OK—just. Dinner afterwards with Phil and Pat Porter and a guest of theirs, a professor of English who had gone from school to school setting up humanities programs.

November 13, 2006

Colorado College

Flying in, one sees flat brown land, like wasteland, desert, yet sprinkled with houses, and then to the west, rising suddenly, the Rocky Mountains, with Pike's Peak the highest, 14,110 feet. The town has 500,000, including 30,000 soldiers plus the Air Force Academy. Colorado College has 1900 students. Owen Cramer met me at the airport. Later, dinner at his house with his wife Becky and English teacher Lisa Hughes, who is studying Modern Greek from Greek Today. Very pleasant, knowledgeable people.

November 14, 2006

Huge breakfast at the Inn. Then coffee with Owen and the English teachers whose poetry class I was about to lead. I did the four versions of "31 B.C. in Alexandria" and Harkianakis's "A Lemon Tree," talking about whether or not to use rhyme when translating rhymed poetry, and citing Walter Arndt. Students read the translations nicely and asked good questions. Pleasant to be in a class again, especially since I don't need to give grades. In the afternoon I practiced well for several hours in the Music Building on a lovely Steinway grand. Trimble, Warlock. Alan Walker's songs, and the Messiah organ part, all for Kendal performance in December. Supper then with David Mason (English, a poet who lived in Greece, knows Katerina Angelaki-Rooke), and Marcia Dobson (Classics). Then my poetry reading: "MG poets and ancient Greek themes."

Good audience, most of the students from this morning's class, plus others.

November 15, 2006

Large breakfast. Another guest is a Burmese political refugee from the military regime there, here to lecture on that situation. We talked for half an hour at breakfast. He thinks of Spain under Franco and hopes that when the Burmese leader dies there will be a restoration of democracy. The innkeeper told about this house, originally a single family dwelling—the owner ran a gold mine. Lots of tourism here; lots of military, which helps everyone commercially. Still lots of mining in Colorado, including gold. Vail, where Daphne goes, is “high end” in his words. Of course! Spoke with Chrysanthi, now at Daphne's. She had a good trip yesterday by bus and train. Friday morning she goes to Andrew's grandparents' day at St. David's School. . . . Two students particularly liked Ritsos's poem “Stones” and are going to use it in their class. . . . Practiced in the morning. Then gave my talk on the γλωσσικό ζήτημα at noon with lunch (γύρος) again, some students but mostly teachers. Informal; good discussion. Then more practice. E-mail: they want me now to come to Germany in July to give a paper on Kazantzakis and Germany. I thought to speak on his letters from Berlin. . . . Supper with Owen Cramer, very pleasantly. We are compatible and always have lots to talk about. He took me then to a lecture by Carl Rubino, professor of classics at Hamilton College, on “Reflections on Science, Ethics, and Humanities.” Very interesting and well delivered. He started with Plato and the conception that the truest essence of life is stable, ordered, unchanging. Achilles seeks this and can find it only in death. (I'd add Jesus.) We all have this passion for order and fear disruptions to it. But the conception is a fundamental mistake. Read Aristotle, Goethe, Einstein. Motion governs all, motion, not stability, even though some of Newton's regularities are true. But they aren't the whole story. We speak of following God's will. But God's will must be multiple; thus we always need to choose—that constitutes our ethical freedom. Which one of God's wills is right for us this time?

November 16, 2006

Owen took me to the Garden of the Gods, an amazing group of enormous sandstone megaliths with Pike's Peak in the distance. They were originally the sand beach of the inland sea here hundreds of millions of years ago. The plain now at 6000 feet descended, leaving these mounds thrusting their jagged shapes above. He says that there are photos on the Colorado College website. Then more practice. I'm learning the Alan Walker pieces very slowly, alas. Then my Kazantzakis and demotic talk, again over lunch, to a small group, now mostly teachers. Then a phone call from Becky and Betsy, our usual fortnightly meeting. Then more practice. Then at 5:00 David Mason picked me up to have supper with the poet Dianna Thiel (pronounced Teal), whose husband is Greek and who knows Katerina Anghelaki-Rooke. She read beautifully: poems full of humor, pathos, serenity, wisdom, and all totally comprehensible. Lots of students in the audience, almost all female. In a dormitory complex with a full café serving pizza, coffee, etc. Again evidence of the great wealth of this college. I'd like to see Thiel read at Dartmouth, maybe at Kendal also.

November 22, 2006

Washington

A real treat this morning. Drove to Kennedy Center with Deanna in the morning and was allowed to view the rehearsal, the only one in the hall. They did Rhapsody in Blue with a brilliant pianist, Kevin Cole, a specialist in Gershwin. Very jazzy and scintillating. Such marvelous music, played with verve and gusto. The conductor stopped the orchestra mostly to refine difficult entrances at the end of various pianistic cadenzas. Next they did Gershwin songs with a harmonica soloist who gyrated his pelvis a bit like Elvis Presley. I left. Taxi to 7th Street NW to the District Chop House to meet Daniel Carson for lunch. He is now retired but he says it's a mixed blessing because he had a girlfriend (Platonic so far) at work who is a stimulating conversationalist, which his wife is not. So he now makes excuses to get to town (to the library, supposedly) in order to see this woman, who of course is married, unhappily. What happens next, if anything, is the question. He is writing yet another novel and says, as usual, that this is the very best. I've been urging him to publish with a vanity press as a start. But he resists this. He wants me to send him my Kazantzakis volume 2; says he read volume 1. And Leander told me he gave my "On Retiring to Kendal" pamphlet (imagine!) to one of his students, who greatly appreciated it. What a surprise! . . . I practiced the Alan Walker songs, thank goodness, on Leander's very bright Steinway in the new studio. Take-out Chinese for supper and then we all watched a DVD of Nannie McFee, a take-off Mary Poppins starring Emma Thompson as the magical nanny, so imaginatively done, and with marvelous child actors.

November 23, 2006, Thanksgiving

More practice. The trick, really, is to memorize, which I do very slowly and very badly. Daphne, Greg, and the three children arrived around noontime. We had our turkey feast at 4:00 p.m. Delicious, with all eleven of us around the enlarged dining room table. Afterwards to Daphne's hotel where the children all went swimming in the indoor pool. Greg is still determined to leave Goldman Sachs after he receives his 2006 bonus—very soon. They seem to want to offer him a new job coordinating expansion in the developing nations of Eastern Europe, and probably based in London. But he'll most likely say No, because such a job would require constant travel. Also, he's thinking now of abandoning finance entirely to do "something else." But what? He'd like to gain some involvement with the Nature Conservancy, for example. They are pretty sure about moving to Santa Barbara but will keep the South Salem house for the summers. They're already investigating schools for the children. . . . We returned to 9 Lopa Court and enjoyed, once again, "Planes, Trains, and Automobiles." Then talked until 12:30 a.m. after the children went to bed.

November 24, 2006

Some more early-morning practice. Leander likes two of the three Walker songs but wishes that Alan had known more about proper notation. All of us took the Metro to Washington and we said loving good-byes as the others got off at Metro Center to spend a few hours on the mall as sightseers. On our AMTRAK trip back I continued translating from Greek to English my "Αντίθεση και Σύνθεση στον «Φιλοκτήτης» του Πίτσου."

November 25, 2006

Performed three Alan Walker songs with Susan Cancio-Bello, soprano, in the Gathering Room to start the memorial service for Alan, whose heart gave out last week. Afterwards, Quaker-style, all the children spoke, including Douglas, whom I had last seen in 1972 in Kingsmead Close. I wasn't nervous playing, and all went well. At one point Susan skipped a measure, but I easily caught up with her and no one knew the difference. The extensive practice in Colorado helped immensely.

November 26, 2006

Supper at kendal with “Pong” and another Thai student, Vorapat, a senior, whose uncle was the former Thai ambassador to the US and is now foreign minister in the caretaker government. This lad also went to prep school in the US. “Pong” will take maple syrup and some T-shirts to Alec when he returns for the Christmas holiday.

December 2, 2006

Eight-hand rehearsal of Beethoven at 8:15 followed by Joan and me rehearsing Warlock. Then at 10:00 Susan, Tom, and Dick arrived to rehearse Trimble, which went very well.

Sunday, December 3, 2006

The big day! Susan arrived at 2:00 with her electronic keyboard. Everyone else at 2:30, and we rehearsed a little. Concert at 3:00. Large audience. Trimble first. We got through to the end without stopping but often were out of time with each other, especially Dick, who cannot count. At one point Susan hesitated, waiting for a chord that didn't come. But none of this was apparent to the audience. As with the Walker songs, I was not nervous. Warlock went well. The two Joans played a jazzy Pavane by Morton Gould for two pianos. We ended with Beethoven's Septet Opus 20 for piano eight hands, played very well. Done!

December 4, 2006

Jason Lewallen, an MA student in Comparative Literature, wants me to help him with Joyce's Portrait. We had a pleasant lunch and I started him off with relevant bibliography. No one is teaching Joyce!

December 6, 2006

Did the New Orleans oral exams this time via video conferencing, which worked very well from them to us but not so well from us to them—my voice and image “crackled” occasionally. Otmar says it's because they use PC instead of Mac. This sort of thing can be done anywhere in the world.

December 7, 2006

Attended Hugh Taft's Financial Advisory Committee. They decided to recommend to the board, via the council, that fee increases be limited to the average increase in expenses over a five-year period. But at the board's finance committee in the afternoon this was rejected. So we'll have no presentation of it in council, alas.

December 18, 2006

My Kazantzakis: Politics of the Spirit arrived today, looking very nice indeed. . . . At Kendal Board I was disheartened by the corporation's marketing chief, who spoke of fancier apartments, fancier amenities, etc., etc., totally materialistic, and not a word about our original hope and dream for a caring community and for simplicity. I voiced my concern, emotionally, and of course everyone asserted that they really did believe in all this.

December 25, 2006

Christmas at Daphne's in South Salem. Multiple gifts for the children; A few for the adults. I gave Greg a book on the history of the Nature Conservancy since it seems now, since he has retired from Goldman Sachs, that he'd like to become involved in environmental work. I received, of course, chocolates. Greg feels greatly relieved. No more tight stomach owing to trades of millions of dollars. He'll stay on at Goldman until May as a sort of consultant. Then, who knows . . .? Daphne is thinking of course of health insurance, schools for the children if they move to Santa Barbara, etc. I played ping pong with Christina, who is quite good. Also with Andrew and Chrysanthi. I can still play, it seems. Lots of good food, of course, including the traditional roast beef dinner on Christmas day. Alec telephoned from Peckalongan, where everyone gathered for Edwin's wedding yesterday. . . . I wrote most of my future lecture on Kazantzakis in Berlin, working from the 1922 and 1923 letters. But the latter are translated only through August, so I've got to do the rest now. . . . Another frighful letter from Patrokos Stavrou, who calls me a Brutus and demands I return all the notebooks that Mrs. Kazantzakis allowed me to photocopy in Geneva. I wrote him a conciliatory letter. . . . I signed a contract with Club Quarters, a hotel used by NYU, for our March 3rd event, promising speakers that they'd be reimbursed 50% of the cost. This will derive from my pocket unless Mrs. Myrivilis comes through with support from the Foundation for Hellenic Culture. . . . Volume 1 of Kazantzakis, Politics of the Spirit arrived in the new paperback edition, looking very nice. Kastaniotis's volume with my eight Rethymno lectures is almost ready. And a publisher is bringing out all my writings on Ritsos. How nice!

Αγαπητέ Πάτροκλε,

Συγγνώμη που άργησα να γράψω. Ταξίδευα επί τριών βδομάδων και ήταν δύσκολο να φροντίσω για την αλληλογραφία μου επειδή ήμουν μακριά από το σπίτι.

Τί να σου πω; Πρώτ' απ' όλα, και πιο σπουδαίο: Παρ' όλο που λες για μένα, συνεχίζω εγώ να σε εκτιμώ και να σε ευχαριστώ για την εκτενή προσφορά σου σε καθετί που συσχετίζεται με τα γραψίματα και τη σταδιοδρομία του Καζαντζάκη.

Όσο για μένα, η γυναίκα μου επιμένει πως είμαι παραπολύ αφελής και ίσως έχει δίκαιο. Έτσι, όταν μου ήρθε η πρόταση να οργανώσω κάτι στην Αμερική στα 2007 για να γιορταστούν τα πενήντα χρόνια μετά το θάνατο του Καζαντζάκη, ούτε καν σκέφτηκα «Πάω με τον αντίπαλο του κυρίου Σταύρου και γι' αυτό τον πληγώνω» ή «Έπρεπε να υποστηρίξω τον κύριο Σταύρο και νά τους πω Όχι»· μονάχα σκέφτηκα «Τι ωραίο να πάω με τον Καζαντζάκη!» και «Ποιοί επιστήμονες να προσκαλέσω να τον τιμήσουν αποτελεσματικά;» Αν ήταν σφάλμα αυτό, να με συμπαθάς!

Το συνέδριο μας θα είναι υπό την αιγίδα του Πανεπιστημίου της Νέας Υόρκης και (ελπίζω) του Ιδρύματος του Ελληνικού Πολιτισμού (θα αποφασίσει σε δεκαπέντε μέρες). Το πανεπιστήμιό μας δίνει την αίθουσα, μερικούς καφέδες, το μεσημερινό και το δείπνο τζάμπα· άλλο κονδύλι δεν έχουμε (εκτός αν αποφασίσει να δώσει κάτι το Ίδρυμα Ελληνικού Πολιτισμού). Δε δίνουν δραχμή οι λεγόμενοι Φίλοι του Καζαντζάκη. Ας προσθέσω ότι εγώ ποτέ μου δεν έδωσα δραχμή σ' αυτούς και τώρα τελευταία όταν με ζήτησαν να γίνω μέλος της εκτελεστικής τους επιτροπής, αρνήθηκα.

Οι δυσκολίες που είχες και έχεις—η κλοπή, η δίκη—είναι φρικτές, θλιβερές. Αλλά εγώ, ως επισήμονας, όχι πολιτικός ή νομικός, αισθάνομαι κάπως μακριά από αυτές. Το ενδιαφέρον μου και (ελπίζω) η αρμοδιότητά μου βρίσκονται μονάχα σε κείμενα. Γι' αυτό συνεχίζω στα λίγα χρόνια που μου παραμένουν (πλησιάζω τα 77 χρονώ) να προσπαθήσω να συνεισφέρω κατιτί στην καλύτερη κατανόηση των έργων του Καζαντζάκη. Επειδή ο κύριος σκοπός της δικής σου ζωής είναι ο ίδιος, είναι κρίμα να τα βάλουμε. Πάντως, καθώς δήλωσα νωρίτερα, συνεχίζω να σε εκτιμώ και να σε δω ως φίλος και συνάδελφος.

Στο πρώτο σου γράμμα δεν μίλησες για την επιστροφή των φωτοτυπιών που έλαβα από την κυρία Καζαντζάκη. Πρόκειται για διάφορα τετράδια. Θα σου τα στείλω ευχαρίστως. Επειδή θα χρειαστούν ένα πολύ μεγάλο δέμα, θα πρέπει πρώτα να ρωτήσω στο ταχυδρομίο πώς να πάνε πιο ασφαλισμένα.

Τα καλά νέα είναι ότι το βιβλίο μου Kazantzakis: Politics of the Spirit, volume 2 τυπώθηκε και θα εκδοθεί το Φλεβάρη. Μόλις πάρω αντίτυπα, θα σου στείλω ένα. Και ο πρώτος τόμος του ίδιου βιβλίου θα ξαναβγεί χαρτόδετος.

Σου εύχομαι να είναι το δικό σου 2007 ειρηνικό, υγιές και καρποφόρο ! Και να πάψουν τα βάσανα.

Arrived at 10:30 a.m. Dan Gilmore already there. He, Leander, even Nicholas went to a patch of forest on the logging road going to the balsam stand and marked trees for stand improvement. Nice to be with Dan as he did this, since he explained his reasoning in each case. We want to enhance this tree, but this other one is competing with its crown, so let's mark this other one for girdling or felling. A break for lunch. Then returned and did some more, perhaps an acre all told. After Dan left we exchanged Christmas presents and all went to Queensbury to share supper. A lovely day. Back to Kendal around 9:30 p.m. Yesterday I convinced Becky and Brent to allow Barbara Taylor to sublet to a second tenant without paying the $800 surplus. Good. Now I'm trying to help Mary Lou Burgess to stay here, following Bob's death. All this comes because of my presidency of the Residents' Council.

December 31, 2006

To Lori's in Andover to visit Alice and Peter. Alice likes the Satie "La Belle Excentrique" that we are preparing for Kinhaven. They'll be traveling to South Africa in the summer to see Clive's half-brother. . . . Then we continued on to Cambridge to the A.R.T. to see its production of The Importance of Being Earnest, done entirely by two male actors playing all the roles most amusingly. Then to the Rassiases' for snails, lamb, champagne. Long, good talk with Bill Miles, and with John.

January 1, 2007

Kendal lunch with Weezie and Bill Pietsch and others.

January 6, 2007

Beautiful “medieval fest” at Colby-Sawyer organized by Susan, with Pat Porter directing the choir. Madrigals, acrobatics, costumes, and a delicious dinner.

January 11, 2007

Barbara Gilbert and I met with Jay Pierson, board chairman, about the Mary Lou Burgess case. We, and many others, are hoping that Kendal can bend its rules a little to allow her to stay. Also spoke to John Diffey about this, to Brent, Becky, Jack Hunter.

January 15, 2007

Visited Jeff Horrell, Dartmouth's head librarian, to enlist his aid in securing my study, since I've been warned that I might need to vacate. This would be a disaster for me. He seemed to understand.

January 18, 2007

Memorial for Henry Terrie at Sanborn. Nice to see some of my former colleagues. I said nothing. Others spoke at length (of course).

January 21, 2007

Ralph Mayer gave his Interfaith Gathering, all music that gave him a “high” in the past. All this at my urging. The music was nice, but as a service this was not very appropriate.

January 22, 2007

Kendal board. I presented the Council's and Residents' Finance Committee's recommendation for a 3.5% increase. Gordon McCouch, naturally, spoke against. The board voted for 4%. Regarding smoking, they approved Council's slightly revised program, but one of the trustees accused me, and Council, of being "mean spirited" in not allowing future residents to smoke. Steve Marian saved the day by noting that the hospital is about to adopt a similarly restrictive policy.

January 27, 2007

Margie Patterson's piano recital, again my responsibility. It was terrible: Schumann's "Carnival" excruciatingly long and dead. Ravel's "Valse Sentimental" a bit better. Bach's Toccata full of memory lapses, no spirit. At least it's over. Never again. Jerry McLane on accordion in the afternoon at least had spirit and accuracy.

January 28, 2007

To the Pastoral Care group at Meeting to ask for $5000 for Mary Lou Burgess. Patricia Higgins and Craig Putnam offered objections. I couldn't believe this. If our own Quakers are so non-charitable, what can we expect from others?

February 2, 2007

"Pong" and a Thai student at Deerfield came for supper here. These upper-class Thais are so suave, in the best sense. Too bad that Alec can't learn the Thai language. Alec and family will visit us in Greece in April.

February 3, 2007

Racine's Britannicus at the A.R.T. Extraordinary acting in a classic play about the arrogance of empire, directed against George W. Bush. A wonderful adventure for the audience.

February 8, 2007

Feeling depressed because I'd done something I thought was helpful and good for Mary Lou Burgess and it backfired. She's disturbed because some Quaker telephoned her asking how much money she had. But then this nice letter arrived out of the blue:

Subject: Greetings from a former student

Dear Professor Bien,

My name is Scott Nancarrow, and I was a student of yours in your seminar "Odysseus Through the Centuries" during the spring of 2001 at Princeton University. I'm writing because recently I've been reminded of several of the books we read and I've had several fond recollections of the seminar. When I took the class, I was a freshman and had very little stability in my life; I had moved far away from home for the first time, was sick for nearly the entire semester with mono and then a cold that was eventually diagnosed as pneumonia. So, at the time, I don't think I was fully able to appreciate how wonderful the literature was and how well the discussions illuminated the reading. However, now that I've been out of academia for nearly three years, I often find myself thinking about Ulysses, the Odyssey, a beautiful poem you gave us called "The Lemon Tree," and the selections from Kazantzakis we read.

I'm not writing to ask for a recommendation or some kind of favor. I just wanted to express my grossly belated gratitude for the wonderful seminar you taught. It was one of the highlights of my college experience and I feel very fortunate that I had a chance to see a glimmer of beautiful literature. Thank you very much for being an excellent professor and for unflaggingly conveying your passionate enthusiasm for the material to a seminar full of freshmen who didn't give you nearly as much positive feedback as we should have.

I hope you're doing well and that your work has been rewarding. I also hope that in your work you still have time to teach undergrads. Thank you again!

Sincerely,

Scott Nancarrow

Saturday, February 10, 2007

A nice day in Boston. We drove in, lunched pleasantly at the Parker House, and then saw the powerful play Doubt starring Cherry Jones. Really about a legalistic mind versus a compassionate mind. But at the very end the legalistic mind, for the first time, has "doubts." And the curtain falls. . . . Prairie Home Companion on the way home, always amusing. Nice Chinese dinner. And return to Kendal in time for a marvelous violin & piano recital by two Japanese students: Brahms, Liszt's Mephisto Waltz (piano solo), and lots of virtuosity. But the violinist was so musical. A great pleasure.

Sunday, February 11, 2007

I ministered on legalism vs. compassion, speaking about the play Doubt but thinking of course about the situation at Kendal with Mary Lou Burgess. The Business Meeting agreed to send a good letter to the Kendal board but not to pledge money to help Mary Lou. I called the argumentation “sophistic” when speaking afterwards to Jack Hunter, who is on the committee that will make a final recommendation.

February 14, 2007

A long, intense Council meeting chiefly because of Hugh Taft’s persuasive rebuttal of Jay Piersoll’s reasons for the 4% increase. Gordon McCouch of course got very disturbed at what we were doing, and said so. I concluded by declaring that all this forthrightness had been “healthy.”

February 16, 2007

I impersonated Albert Schweitzer in another of Joan Williams’s “Who Am I?” evenings, playing part of a Bach fugue, first, on the organ. Afterwards, Pat Porter, our trained organist, complimented me for holding all the sustained notes, which pianists usually don’t do, since they can rely on the sustaining pedal.

February 17, 2007

Practiced Satie with Stan Udy. It’s very whacky. Alice and I will need to do it with lots of exaggeration. In the afternoon, Daphne, Greg, Christina, Andrew, and Peter, arrived like a cyclone blowing through our house, especially Peter. Christina has orthodontia permitting her to eat only mushy foods (like ice cream!) and liquids. They all went out in the snow, got soaked, and we put their clothes in the dryer before supper.

February 18, 2007

To Meeting to play piano for the hymn-singers, then back to Kendal for Stan Udy’s Interfaith Gathering, a lecture on sin! He quoted from Psalm 118: 8–9. This spoke to me, feeling as I do so pessimistic about the outcome of the Mary Lou Burgess case: “It is better to take refuge in the Lord than to put confidence in man. It is better to take refuge in the Lord than to put confidence in princes.”

Here’s the letter I sent yesterday to the chairman of the Kendal board;

Dear Jay,

This letter concerns the case of Mary Lou Burgess. Although I don't like to do this, I'm going to say, in this case, that I'm writing not only as a single resident of Kendal at Hanover but also as the current president of the Residents' Council, and as chair of the Board of Overseers from 1989 to 1995, when the Board of Directors was in Kennett Square, Pennsylvania, and chair of the Board of Directors from 1995 to 1996. I was also very involved in the conceptualization of Kendal, in bringing the concept through the regulatory processes in State and Town, in specifying architectural needs, etc., etc.

I say all this, regretfully, simply to indicate the depth of my feeling that the Mary Lou Burgess situation is a perfect test case of whether or not the "values and standards" for Kendal that I helped write and establish at the start will be upheld. Among other things, we pride ourselves in claiming that no resident will ever be forced to leave Kendal owing to financial stringency. This proud statement is repeated in "New Beginnings," the excellent DVD just distributed by the Kendal Corporation. I know that perhaps Mary Lou will not be considered a "resident" since she never paid the entrance fee. But note that Values and Standards, page 15, after repeating the claim that no resident will be forced to leave, states: "New residents who cannot afford the full fees may be admitted with assistance as well." Furthermore, Values and Standards, page 4, under "Financial Design," states that we aim "to make our communities affordable to the largest possible number of people."

There is no question here of the value of this individual. She is loved and respected by a large group of her fellow residents, in part owing to the excellent care she provided when she worked here professionally as a caregiver. The question is whether strict financial criteria will win over broad humanitarian criteria. If they do, and she is therefore forced to leave, everything we claim about our values and standards, our charitableness, our "need to feel a sense of community" (Values and Standards, page 6) will be a mockery and the Board of Directors will rightfully be accused of valuing business considerations over all others. Let me add that, paradoxically, the perhaps "non-business" decision to welcome Mary Lou into full residency is likely to enhance the business side of our operation, because it will send a strong message out to the wider community of people considering application to Kendal that we really are what we say we are in the Kendal Corporation's Mission Statement (Values and Standards, page 3)—namely, an organization meant “to lead a system of communities . . . for older persons, in accordance with the principles of the Religious Society of Friends.”

I repeat: This is a test case of whether we pay mere lip-service to such principles and to all the fine language in our various publications. Since you are the current chair of the Board of Directors, I am hoping that you will exercise leadership in assuring that Kendal's professed mission, professed values, and professed standards are real.

February 19, 2007

I spoke on Quakerism at Kendal, joined by Margery Walker and Jim Sheridan. But Howard Mitchell brought up the subject of Mary Lou and Jim ruled him out of order. This soured the proceedings. At the end, H el ene complained to me bitterly because I had denied that peer review was in use (which of course it is not). Too bad.

February 22, 2007

NYC, Club Quarters

Met at 5:00 in the Yale Club with Scott Nancarrow, the student I'd had at Princeton. He was eager to do a Ph.D. in philosophy but got frightened after his favorite philosophy professor at Princeton was denied tenure. . . . Then to Sheila Baird's for Farm School cocktails. Planned tomorrow's meeting a bit with Annie, then back to the Yale Club for supper with Michael Groden, who knows a lot about copyright and might be able to help me if I have trouble publishing the Kazantzakis letters because of Stavrou. Canada, for example, limits copyright to 50 years, whereas in the USA it is 70 years.

February 27, 2007

Secondary and Post-Secondary committees. I totally forgot that I'm also now on the Finance Committee, and missed it. At Post-Secondary we voted to ratify the agreement with the University of Wales Institute. George Koualizides took the Farm School to court for unfair dismissal and has won the case. Annie told me in confidence that David Lansdale and Joann Ryding are leading candidates to replace Bill McGrew as president. Dinner at Kellari on 44th Street. John Borovidas sat his daughter Christina, a high school junior, down next to me because she is interested in Dartmouth. So I answered her questions and gave what advice I could about admissions.

February 24, 2007

Full board. The latest land arrangements might include some space for a Kendal. I've just about given up on Dr. Barich and AHEPA. Dimitri Gondicas, who's on the land committee, said he'd be supportive.

February 26, 2007

Margo Johnson, head of the Gifts and Bequests Committee, called me to her apartment because she says my collection for Mary Lou Burgess should have gone through the committee and gotten its permission. So now, ex post facto. I've applied. We have collected over $16,000. . . . Yesterday, at A.R.T., a moving adaptation of Oliver Twist, very imaginatively directed and superbly acted. . . . Later: now over $21,000 for Mary Lou.

March 1, 2007

New Haven

Lectured at Yale, for George Syrimis, on Kazantzakis's religious vision in The Last Temptation. Interesting conversation with a professor teaching Ottoman history about Muslim thinkers who are very much like Kazantzakis. I wish someone had written about this—not me. I told him, Θέλω να γλιτώσω από τον Καζαντζάκη. Nice dinner afterwards at a hotel in New Haven.

March 2, 2007

New York

Came down on AMTRAK. To the Guggenheim Museum to see the very unusual exhibit on Spanish painters from El Greco to Picasso, arranged not chronologically but thematically and especially showing how influenced Picasso was by his Spanish predecessors. El Greco's "Vision of St. John" is among the masterpieces included. . . . Then to Daphne's. Andrew's birthday party is this evening. . . . In the evening, to Astoria, invited by the Pan-Cretan Society to their club for a full dinner, and a very good one, too. Nice to see old friends: Darren, John Anton, Andrea and her husband, Vassilis, Constance, and to meet new ones: Kyriaki Petrakou, and Αθηνά Βουγιούκα.

March 3, 2007

The big event. 9:30 a.m. to 6:30 p.m., 9 hours, but it went well and wasn't a bit tiring. Perfect venue supplied by Katy Fleming and her assistant Niki. Good presentations, all cut down to the 15-minute limit, all except John Anton's. Simonides recited portions of Kapodistriais in Greek with much passion. And we ended with Linda Orphanos and a marvelous guitarist doing five Theodorakis songs (I think). Then a leisurely dinner in a hotel on the Square, subway ride back uptown with Darren, and a very welcome bed. Everyone seemed pleased. We had questions after each paper and kept to the timing. Much helped by Nikos Metallinos, whom I asked to chair the second half. Audience always awake and attentive. Jeff Murphy showed up. Also Burt Pike. Jeff wants to quit the law and get an MA in English literature. I told him about Greg resigning from Goldman.

March 13, 2007

Yesterday the board, in executive session, agreed to allow Mary Lou Burgess to remain. Thank goodness! The $22,000 I collected will help make her entry fee possible. So, even though I was told that what I did was illegal, because one cannot solicit at Kendal without prior permission, I'm glad I did it since it helped the fortunate outcome. I gave $5000, some others gave $5000, $4000, $2000, lots of $500, and one $10.00.

March 14, 2007

Thanks to Betsy Sanderson's willingness to take charge, I skipped Council today so that we could get the 11:00 a.m. bus to Logan Airport. Routine flight to Frankfurt.

Athens

Routine flight to Athens. Met by Nikos Mathioudakis, sent by George Stassinakis. By car to Εθνική Άμυνα, then Metro owing to traffic. Nikos helped with the large valise all the way to Hotel Achilleas (Λέκκα 21). Simple but OK. Out for a walk to get a tyropita, amazingly we saw Constance Tagopoulos on Ερμού. Hugs and kisses. Lots of gossip about all the strikes and demonstrations (we saw nothing all day long, luckily, but traffic was largely diverted from the city center, also because Putin is here to sign an agreement for a pipe line). A nice nap. Then Nikos met us again and walked us to the Γαλικό Ινστιτούτο on Σινά. Nice to see Katerina Anghelaki there, and Christos, and the two from the New York event: Petrakou and Vouyoukaki. Katerina very low, misses her husband terribly—he died 1½ years ago. “I'm an old lady!” Stavrou refuses, or at least hesitates, to publish Kazantzakis's letters to her father. I fear for my letters. How can I get permission? Dimitris Gounelas tells me that the University of Thessaloniki is ready to award me the honorary degree in October or November; we'll need to fix the date. Stassinakis there of course. I sat on the stage with ten others and was next to last to speak, around 9:30 p.m. Miraculously I stayed awake throughout. One of the speakers was the nice woman who invited me to Rio. Apparently this is for real. Another from Moscow, one from Italy, another from Germany, all speaking Greek. I gave mine on translating into English, ending with the epic of ὄρτσα and producing many laughs. Last came Gounelas, who was very complimentary about my translation of The Last Temptation. Actually, I like the passage he read. Afterwards, everyone wanted to say hello, to exchange business cards, etc. Most important was a woman called Yolanda Hatzi, niece of Elli Lambridi, who has the Lambridi archive, including letters from Kazantzakis. We'll meet tomorrow, luckily. At 11:30 p.m. walked to the hotel with Christos, who related at length his difficulties with, and now estrangement from, Margaret occasioned by his desire to move Pavlos to Birmingham, which she opposes. Terrible mess. They are no longer on speaking terms. To sleep at 12:30 a.m. No jet lag at all, thanks to feast-fast.

Athens

Yolanda Hatzi came at 10:00 a.m. She is going to publish Kazantzakis's letters to Elli Lambridi, in Greek of course, but will let me include some in the Selected Letters. She'll prepare photocopies and we'll meet again when we return to Athens in April. At 11:00 Christos came and we talked steadily for two hours about all sorts of topics and luckily not primarily his vicissitudes with Margaret and the children. He described steady and slow progress being made regarding care for autistics owing mostly to EU policies and a little to UN policies. He has become emeritus director of the Autistic Society and thus is spending more time as a φιλόλογος, editing Θέματα Λογοτεχνίας. Wants to do a special issue on Ritsos, to include Ritsos's letters to me. But where are they? . . . At 1:00 p.m. Iakovos Tsalicoglou came and we went to the restaurant on Mitropoleos called Ο Τζιτζικας και ο Μέρμηγκας, where his lovely daughter Elina was waiting for us. She's a new mother with a 1½ year old son and Iakovos is a new and apparently excellent παππούς. Christos accompanied us for the first half hour. Elina is collaborating with Karen Van Dyck, Peter Constantine, and Mike Keeley on a new anthology of Greek poetry from ancient times to the present. Iakovos has retired from LaVerne University and hopes to write a manual instructing young Greek scholars on the mechanics and ethics of research. Back to the hotel at 3:30 for a short siesta. At 5:00 Agatha came with a photographer and assistant. We went to the Παλαιά Βουλή, Οδός Κολοκοτρώνη, where they posed me for probably 50 shots; then to the Grand Britannica (saw Lucas Tsilas right away), where we sat and had coffee and she interviewed me for Kathimerini's magazine while the photographer took numerous other photos. She also gave me the name of a friend in Rethymno who runs a very good restaurant there. We'll see what she does with the interview. Luckily she'll send it to me for approval. . . . At 8:00, to Monastiraki to meet Don Nielsen and Lia. They took us to a square with a very special restaurant with a beautiful view of the Acropolis from the upstairs dining room. A lovely meal that he allowed me to pay for (€80) since he has no money now. He explained his Kafkaesque problems. He cannot get a residence permit because he cannot show adequate earnings in Greece ($ from USA don't count) and he cannot earn enough in Greece because he doesn't have a residence permit, which permits employment. Of course, όλα γίνονται στην Ελλάδα με τα μέσα, and someone offered to fix things for him for a fee (bribe) of €10,000, which of course Don doesn't have. Also, every time he completes multiple required forms then the law changes and those forms are no longer valid and he needs to start with new ones. More Kafka. Also, he cannot get married until he has the permit. He thinks a miracle may happen in a few months . . . maybe. Φρίκη! But we had a nice meal and much good conversation about more pleasant things. And in walked Jason Demos (Dartmouth grad whose father supplied some photos for Greek Today). "Hello, Professor Bien!" Thankfully, I remembered him. . . . Afterwards, internet café in Syntagma.

March 17, 2007

Leaving the hotel, I checked regarding our reservation for April 13 (OK) and Alec's (no record). I'll try to reach Alec later today. Metro to the airport, half price for seniors, €3 each. At Kazantzakis Airport, Iraklio, we were greeted by Severios, Stelios's fellow Dartmouth student and close friend, who had come with his wife Marianthi from Cyprus. She is very nice, born in South Africa of Greek parents, raised speaking Africaans. Ava was waiting for us outside. Warm reunion. Then fish dinner in a seaside restaurant. Then drive to Rethymno. Our double room in Jo-Ann Palace is very dark. We changed it for a lighter single room. Siesta. Then Stelios's friend Pandelis drove us to a village high in the mountains where Stelios used to play as a child with relatives there. Supper with about 12 people including an interesting professor who had studied and taught in the US. Very traditional style peasant house, of course done up beautifully. Lots of talk about Stelios and his virtues.

March 18, 2007

Drove with Severios and Ava to Stelios's grave, again in a village quite high, where Stelios used to play as a child. On the way, stopped at his aunt's, 80 years old and a bit infirm. Four generations in the house. Daughter preparing the κόλλυβα. Παππούς lively, drove with us in his pick-up truck bringing a large bag of his own oranges. At the grave, about 40 people, including Ava's daughter Eleni, who looks very much like her father. He got her a job at the Institute. Beautiful, statuesque young woman. The priest chanted appropriately, swinging the incense censor. Some tears, not many. Eleni spread more incense afterwards. Lovely photo of Stelios at the head of the tomb, with his gray beard. A physician friend and his American wife took charge of us, sort of, and spoke of the small lump Stelios showed him in his leg. The whole crew then drove to a seaside taverna for raki (of course) and more raki, and a full meal. No speeches, just a warm welcome by Ava. Talked with Stelios's successor at the Institute and his wife. Voluble professor (history of science) from last night. . . . At Jo-Ann, we changed our room yet again; this one is a bit longer and has a kitchenette. Walked in the neighborhood. Γύρος for supper; Chrysanthi feasted on spaghetti. . . . Discovered to my surprise and pleasure that Jo-Ann has wireless for the computer.

March 19, 2007

Went to the university in the morning, in Γάλλος, high on a hill overlooking the blue Mediterranean. Attended to details of payment, etc. with Roula Kritaki, who had helped me so often and well via e-mail. Then to the library, where we were shown the Prevelakis Collection, all the 400 letters from Kazantzakis and all other correspondence, kept in manila envelopes in locked cupboards (thankfully—I told the librarian about the Επιστολές προς τη Γαλάτεια, which were “borrowed” (stolen?) from the Ιστορικό Μουσείο. I'll be able to view the letters I need on microfilm, to discover what Kazantzakis wrote in the passages that Prevelakis censored. Returned by bus. €30 more in my kinito. Mousakas for lunch. Amazingly, the Jo-Ann has wireless internet, so I get my e-mail here with no trouble at all. The manager reduced our tariff from €420 to €400 per month because we're in one room, not two. But she'll need to add for breakfasts. . . . Practiced my lecture yet again. Stamatis came and we walked to the Περιηγητική Λέσχη. About 125 students plus a few dozen adults, including Alexis, whom we met at Stelios's memorial. Stamatis ran a class on Ο Καπετάν Μιχάλης first, distributing a handout with a list of characters and recounting the plot, etc. Very sterile. The rector introduced my part, mentioning the donor. I spoke for 50 minutes and I think it went well. The audience seemed attentive throughout. Afterwards, mercifully, there were quite a few questions including the inevitable one about Kazantzakis and women. Someone asked me to explain Bergson's philosophy at length. I talked about the gushing fountain. Now all this needs to be repeated in Iraklio on Wednesday.

March 20, 2007

Walked to the sea and ate in the harbor. A man with bad eyesight asked me to dial a number for him on his kinito, which I did successfully. Afterwards, in the restaurant, he paid for my wine. Looked for an electric piano keyboard, so far without success. Started cataloging the specific Prevelakis letters that I need to check, a tedious job, and checking will be even more tedious.

Iraklio

What a day! A graduate student, Stavros, drove us with Stamatis, to Iraklio. We took pajamas, etc., planning to stay over in order to go to the bank tomorrow. Three quarters of the way there I discovered that, unbelievably, I had left my attaché case in the room, and the lecture inside it! What to do? Find someone to bring it from the hotel, immediately? Several attempts failed. Then Stamatis had a brilliant idea. His daughter, at home, could send the electronic copy to our e-mail and we'd access it in Iraklio. She did this, following detailed instructions. Stavros and I found an internet café. Try as he might, he couldn't access his e-mail. So we telephoned the daughter again; she sent it to my e-mail, which I accessed immediately via <http://basement.dartmouth.edu/blitz>. So we started printing. At page 7 (of 12) the printer ran out of ink. Consternation again. But the attendant said that we could continue in blue rather than black. This worked. So, at 8:20 p.m. I had the lecture in hand, for the 8:30 scheduled event. But Greek events never start on time. Thus I was able to shorten it a bit, although Gareth Owens came to say hello as did Κυρία Λυδάκη from the Cretan University Press. The Rector took some time, too, with introductory remarks. Actually, it went better than last Monday since by now I was so familiar with the text. And there were good questions afterwards. As Stavros said, we brought the “thriller” to a happy ending. Afterwards, the Rector and his wife took us out to a very fancy restaurant for a super delicious supper of swordfish. His wife very lively. Will run for parliament as a PASOK candidate. She posed me, half joking, many basic questions about Kazantzakis and life. She’s related somehow to Kazantzakis’s mother’s family. Trusty Stavros drove us home. To bed at 3:00 a.m.

To the university to discover the words that Prevelakis censored. With the help of Ελένη Κωβαίου we made some progress, but the photocopies the university made (on film) are sometimes so bad that the words cannot be read. Thus Eleni will produce several originals for me next week. . . . For coffee to Stamatis’s. Wife Katerina is very nice and the 14-year-old daughter Φωτεινή is the one who saved us on Wednesday by sending the lecture via computer. She played “Für Elise” and Kabalefsky for us on the piano—not bad. She’s preparing to compete in a contest in Athens next month. Stamatis has the text of my book from Kastaniotis, and has already discovered errors. I now have it to check. But I also need to practice, and shorten, the Odyssey lecture for Monday. Lots to do.

March 24, 2007

Alexis Politis and his charming wife Angela Kastrinaki had us home for a supper of snails, raki, etc. She has written on Zorba, he mostly on folksongs, but he is in charge of the impressive computer thesaurus of Modern Greek materials. Very pleasant people.

March 25, 2007

Watched the Independence Day parade in the morning: nurses, coast guard, soldiers, and lots of schoolchildren, many rather fat. Patriotic rhetoric, of course. Nice to see some children in national costume. . . . Telephoned Leander to wish him happy birthday and happy anniversary. In the evening, to Andreas’s and Jane’s amazing home of the top of a mountain in the village of Αγίου Πνεύματος. Crazy, but 360-degree views of sea, mountains, sky. He wanted to know how to translate Kazantzakis's Τέντωσέ με, Κύριε. I said "Bend me" instead of "Stretch me." Later, on the internet, I learned that the official translation is "Draw me." Two graduate students joined us. And of course, food food food, his own olive oil, his own raki.

March 26, 2007

To university ΕΑΚΕ to get my first check (€14000). Then one of the officials there took us downtown to complete the paperwork for insurance and taxes, all done rather quickly and easily. Tried to xerox for tomorrow's lecture in Iraklio but all machines were being used by students (all girls) copying entire books and defying copyright. Back to town on the bus. Lunch. Siesta. Then to university with Stamatis for my Odyssey lecture. Stamatis first for two hours, non-stop talking, without preparation. I tried to be less "official" (pompous), joking with students, looking at them, ad libbing during the lecture, etc. Enough questions afterwards.

March 27, 2007

To Iraklio

Drove to Iraklio with Stamatis listening (sort of) to a Haydn quartet. Huge difficulty parking in Iraklio but by sheer luck and after many wrong turns Stamatis found a parking garage near our venue, Αίθουσα Ανδρόγεω, Πλατεία Λιονταριών. He held forth again for 1½ hours; we walked in the square, then sat in the anteroom. Gareth Owens came, and some others including a newspaper reporter for an interview. Beautiful Bechstein piano on stage. Lots of photos by newspaper people. Lecture went well enough although bad lighting made it difficult to read. Best part was when I suggested that the truest example of the "aesthetic man" is the γυναικός and, in the second row of the audience, a young man pointed to his friend in the next seat, who smiled smugly. "Ah!" he sighed, «βρήκαμε έναν». Much laughter. Ava came. Afterwards, she, some friends of hers, Gareth, Chrysanthi, and I went to a favorite taverna for supper. Got back to her home at 1:00 a.m. Nice to see lovely daughter Eleni there, and the two very "human" dogs and the two rather sleepy cats. Ava had a catalogue of an art exhibit by Sarah Kafatos, who now, Ava told us, lives in London with Fotis.

March 28, 2007

Το Πανεπιστημιακές Εκδόσεις to collect my translation from Ειρήνη Λυδάκη, all 700 pages of it. I have to go through it now and respond to the translator's queries. Irene says they'll take care of typos and the index. Appendices and bibliography still to come. . . . Then to Knossos to meet Gareth and follow his guided tour through the palace given to his 27 Erasmus students from five or six different nationalities. He was very lively, as one might expect. I didn't know that the Thira explosion has been dated to an exact year: 1628 B.C. if I remember correctly. Ava picked us up and we went for a rather good lunch at a restaurant favored by Eleni: special omelet with potatoes, fried mushrooms, etc. Then to the new Natural History Museum to see (a) the Yale University exhibit about the animals and insects and birds of Connecticut, beautifully done as multiple installations, and (b) Ava's imaginative exhibit meant for children, very interactive, about turtles, owls, snakes, trees, fish, and everything else, all done in very fine installations with computerized control and involvement. This was two years' work for her, producing an impressive result. . . . Chrysanthi to hair dresser. I managed a one-hour siesta from 5:00 to 6:00. Then we picked up Chrysanthi downtown and drove to a village where there is a very fancy convention center. There we heard Professor Grammatakis give a long and very fine lecture on Το Σύμπαν: big bang, expanding universe, dates of inception, etc. Predictions for the future (next multiple billions of years). I understood about 90%. Very encouraging. Then downstairs to a fine art exhibit including a collage by Ava and a fiery fantasy by Christine, whom we met, an American, resident for decades here. She said she came at first because of Kazantzakis. . . . Very nice all these days to be with Ava. We talked freely about Stelios and the possibilities for Ava's future—maybe an MFA in Vermont. Hope to see her in America. She goes to Guilford each spring and summer.

March 29, 2007

To Thessaloniki

Vouli met us at the airport and we drove to the Farm School and were installed in the top floor apartment of Hastings House. Huge, because intended for all six of us when Alec comes. Lunch in Princeton Hall with Mats, Tom, and the third intern. Tom's report about teaching of English not very encouraging. Mary Chism missed multiple classes. No real energy or initiative. Mats is going to run the Marathon on Sunday, starting in Pella and finishing at the Statue of Megas Alexandros. Saw Chris Minoutis, who worries about deficits. Saw Randy. Long talk with the librarian. Bill McGrew asked me to attend the management team meeting but I told him that the nicest thing about emeritus status is the ability not to go to meetings. In my case I had to meet David Wisner at 2:45 to be taken to Anatolia College, very fast on the new roads, to lecture on "Inventing Greece." Bissell library first. Albana came. Hugs and kisses; her big smile. I donated the book of the Rethymno conference to the librarian and showed David and her the new data bank created by Alexis Politis. The lecture went well. Bill McGrew came and asked good questions. And it was nice to see Peter Baiter again after many years. He learned his Greek from our book. . . . With Bill to a taverna and two hours of conversation about how corrupt Greece is and what he hopes I'll do with the strategic plan. . . . Amazingly, the school brought me a computer that connects to the internet. So I'm all set with e-mail "at home." . . . To town on the 66 bus from Thermi to Charilao and the number 10 bus down Egnatias. To Egnatias Bank to deposit my check for €14000 and make application for a card to use in cash machines. Then to Vouli's. Back at School, Stylianos telephoned from Australia. Very lively. If I go at the end of June he says he is likely to be there. . . . Started correcting my volume 2 and telephoned the translator. Alas I don't have the book here or even the computerized text. At 8:30, downstairs for the big party that Bill organized in our honor. Everyone! Randy and her artist husband. Mary Chism and her husband. Vergos, Vezyroglou, who said we have probably found land for the cows, except that it is expensive. Stavros. Joann. Pelagia and George. Tasos and Dora, and many others. Lots of food, wine, tsipouro.

March 31, 2007

Worked in the morning. George came and took us to a nice restaurant with Efthymoula, Andreas, Dimitris, Tilda, and Evi. I talked at length with Andreas, who seems still very leftist and cynical. He thought a school like Patana that mixes students of 50 nationalities is very bad, a consequence of the awful globalization foisted on the world by the rich. Afterwards we went to Valdari to see a splendid atrium skylight created by Dimitris, a beautiful eleven-story office building. Then, after intense arguments among the family, to the harbor for coffee, a café we didn't know existed. Right on the water. . . . Short rest. Then to Odysseas and Eleni. Toula's daughter came for 30 seconds and left. But then Takis, Brini, and Eleni came and stayed. Both girls are in the last year of the lyceum and are preparing for the Πανελλήνιες εξετάσεις. Both have declared architecture as their desired field. Eleni, a real charmer, a woman already. Easy to talk to. . . . I forgot to note that at Bill's party yesterday I also met the Perrotis student I'm not supporting, an Albanian, Haxhire Myrteza, called Xhini (pronounced "Jiri"). I also met Nurjhan Manjunosova, from Kyrgyzstan, who is finishing and hopes to go to Brandeis (she's Muslim), which has offered her a 50% tuition scholarship. But where is the rest of the money going to come from?

April 1, 2007

George and Pelagia Vourtsa drove us to Annie and Aris Levis's country home in Halkidiki. Tasos and Dora came. Tasos sat with me for an hour with a very complete chart explaining precisely every detail in the old programs in the secondary School and in the new ones. Very useful. The Farm School actually designed part of this for the ministry. But the ministry has been preoccupied with the problems in the universities and has done nothing to advertise the new programs. Annie, Pelagia, and I had our first discussion about the strategic plan, which Bill wants substantially revised and made much more adventurous. They are not very supportive, alas. We'll meet again tomorrow morning. . . . Lovely lunch. Lots of talk. And George telephoned to say that Obama had withdrawn from the presidential race. April fools! Long walk afterward along the beach and through the huge hotel grounds next to Annie's house. Drove back via Polygyros, on the old road.

April 2, 2007

Worked well for two hours with Pelagia and Annie on revising the strategic plan for the Secondary School, mostly using the extensive revisions prepared by Bill McGrew, but adding a bit here and there, also subtracting. Pelagia will type it all tomorrow and give it to me to check. . . . Albana came to join us for lunch. Her impasse here leads her to hope now to settle in the US. There's a lottery that gives green cards to 50,000 individuals each year from third world countries. She has applied. I encouraged her to come if possible. We talked about Kendal (she is very attached to grandparents) and showed her the Kendal Corporation CD, which she found very moving (as did I) and "amazing." "We desperately need something like this in Albania!” Μακάρι να χτιστεί στην Ελλάδα! . . . I discovered that chapters 5, 6, and 7 are missing in the translation I’m vetting.

April 3, 2007

Irene Lydaki restored chapters 5, 6, and 7, and sent as well the four appendices and the bibliography, totaling now 611 pages that I need to vet. I’m up to page 100 more or less. Slow work, and doubly difficult because I don’t have the English text. . . . Nikos and Liana came with their two children, Christina aged 2½ and Kostaki, ten years old. Christina a little charmer who recites the capital cities of 20+ countries. I took them to see cows, and newborn calves at this marvelous school. . . . To Thermi for a very bad and expensive lunch, by bus. At 8:00 to church, full to bursting. A young man offered me his seat, thankfully. Ψάλτες singing in full voice, the priest very logical and dignified. Sermon about μετά-voia. I understood some of the Bible—John on Jesus and Lazarus—but none of the chanting, which was the most important, of course. Nice to see men as well as women in church, and some younger people, too. Everyone, on entering, lights a candle, crosses himself or herself, and kisses the icon of Christ. One man did a sort of half-obaisance repeatedly, bending and touching the floor.

April 4, 2007

I corrected Pelagia’s typescript of the Strategic Plan, mostly minor corrections but a few substantive ones. Chrysanthi is helping ladies prepare the epitaphios with flowers. Chris Minoutis took us out for lunch to a very nice fish restaurant by the sea. Conversation for 2½ hours about his adjustment to Greece (he is a Farm School graduate who went to university in California and stayed 15 years and speaks only English to his ten-year-old son). Also about a future Kendal, which he says is desperately needed here. And about Stefanakis and the wife (the real problem, according to Chris). Then, overstuffed with food, we went to a dinner party hosted very beautifully by Pelagia and George Voutsas, with Bill McGrew, Tasos and Dora Apostolides, Annie Levis, and us. Conversation from 8:30 until 12:15 a.m. non-stop, all in Greek, of course. Tasos told me that all Greek publishers are corrupt, including Kastaniotis, but maybe not the University Presses of Crete. He wants to do Kazantzakis in comic book form. At the end of the evening I read everyone the following delicious passage by George Orwell that I had copied out from the translation of my volume 2: Αν κοιτάξεις μέσα στο μυαλό σου, τι νομίζεις ότι είσαι, ο Δον Κιχώτης ή ο Σάντσα Πάντσα; Σχεδόν σίγουρα, είσαι και οι δύο. Το ένα μέρος του εαυτού σου θέλει να γίνεις ήρωας ή άγιος, αλλά το άλλο είναι ένα χοντρό ανθρωπάκι, που βλέπει καθαρά τα πλεονεκτήματα του να μείνει ζωντανό με ολόκαιρο το τομάρι. Είναι ο ανεπίσημος εαυτός σου, η φωνή της κοιλιάς, που θέλει τη σιγουριά, το μαλακό κρεβάτι, την τεμπελιά . . . Whereupon Bill ended the evening deliciously by declaring, Αχ! Το μαλακό κρεβάτι, αυτό θέλω τώρα!

April 5, 2007

Chrysanthi went shopping with Dora in a marvelous mall nearby, “better than America.” Then George came and brought us to his lovely apartment for a fine lunch spoiled only by Efthymoula’s loud voice. Discussion of the 6th grade history text that “smooths” what happened to the Greeks of Smyrna in 1922 and is being contested by the archbishop, the right wing, and strangely also by the KKK. . . . Then to Dick Jackson at beautiful Anatolia: new theater, new playing fields with a track just like Hanover high school’s. I played the Kendal video for Dick. He’ll arrange for me to speak to Mr. Bissell, chair of their board, when we’re all here again in May. My hope is that Anatolia will become a sponsor, even if no money or land is forthcoming. He fears that Pinewood may close. Told me that Dragoumis was interviewed for AFS presidency but rejected because not American. Candidates now seem to be Joann Ryding and David Lansdale. He’s sorry that Bill doesn’t support Brady Kiesling. . . . Then to church for the service of the twelve gospels, 3½ hours (I stayed 1¼), until the 11th. Beautiful soul-wrenching psalmody for the crucifixion. I could again understand maybe 50% of the gospel readings, none of the psalmody. Too bad I don’t have the little book used by many others to follows the words.

April 6, 2007

One and a quarter hours with Bill McGrew discussing the Strategic Plan, which he still finds inadequate, plus Kendal, Brady Kiesling, Jini . . . A Kendal here would be very difficult because Greece is generally weak in private institutions, everything relating either to the State or the family. His goal is to make the Farm School better than the State schools; otherwise why should it exist? . . . To Odysseas and Eleni for lunch on the terrace. Eleni said interestingly that during the Πείνα of 41–42 είχαμε να τρώμε in their village. Lots of ouzo. Then we walked to Nikos's apartment, very far, about where the Μέγαρο Μουσικής is. The park along the παραλία is now very lovely, and more work is being done on a long stretch toward the end, after the Yachting Club. I was able to talk quite a lot to the eleven-year-old Constantinos, about the different account of the Μικρασιατική Καταστροφή in his father's sixth grade history and in the one being used today. Nikos drove us back to the Farm School in time for the Επιτάφιος περιφορά, with Chris Minoutis in front holding the large cross. Very beautiful Επιτάφιος with candles on the roof guiding us through the night.

April 7, 2007

Bill McGrew kindly drove us to the airport to fetch Alec and family, who arrived right on time at 11:20 a.m. and seemed wide awake despite a ten-hour plane ride from Bangkok last night. Hugs and kisses all around. Chrysanthi cooked a lunch for all of us. Then visits: George came with Andreas and his wife but not their son. Nikos came and took us downtown. Returned luckily in time for the Ανάσταση service at the School. All candles extinguished. Δεύτε, λάβετε φως. Candles lighted. Then everyone left the church and gathered outside. At midnight Χριστός ανέστη εκ νεκρών . . . and the church bell ringing happily. Everyone kissed: Χρόνια πολλά ! Home with lighted candles. Cracked the eggs, Chrysanthi winning every time until the very end. Sleep at 1:00 a.m.

April 8, 2007, Easter

Yesterday, Alec and I went to the airport to rent a car from Avis. Couldn't because they require international driver's licenses. But Hertz said OK and offered a much better rate. The clerk was a young woman from Χανιά, Crete, impressed that I'm professing at Rethymno. Today we started at 9:30 a.m., heading for Takis's house at the FYROM border. Got lost, headed toward Turkey but called him on the κινητό and were told to turn around, go back, head for Edessa and then Ευζώνας. Takis met us at the border station and guided us to his house in Ειδομένη. About 40 family members present, mostly on Brini's side, but Takis's two daughters were there: Eleni, whom I'd met, and Evi, age 15, looking about 18, about to enter the Lyceum in September. Toula absent, alas. Lots of interesting people, including a man who'd been taken to Poland in the παιδομάζωμα and stayed there 30 years; he told me that he's not a believer in all this Easter nonsense. Also a university student at Athens, in economics, very opposed to nationalism and pleased when I told him I agreed. Also an older man full of κέφι (he ate the goat's head) who danced alone or in groups with energy. We ate and ate, μεζές first, τσίπουρο, finally the goat, very tasty; then lots of dancing—Takis first and foremost and the daughters and Chrysanthi, and even I a few times. . . . We walked in the village itself, talked to a farmer going on his tractor to his fields; he grows wheat and corn (for the animals). Saw a large, old John Deere tractor and were scared away by a huge watchdog. Houses in FYROM (Skopje) visible in the distance, as well as snow-covered mountains. . . . Alec drove us back. I was very sleepy. Then we returned the car to our "girlfriend" at the Hertz desk in the airport; she gave us a big discount. Then went by cab to Vouli's. She took us all to Πλατεία Ναυαρίνου for γύρος, σουτζουκάκια, etc.

April 9, 2007

Monica helped me negotiate the «tables» format on Word and I typed in those parts of the Strategic Plan that Bill McGrew wanted added, and sent the newly revised plan off to Pelagia and Bill. But Bill still wants changes. George and Efthymoula came; more of her screaming voice. Then Dimitris Gounelas drove us all to his lovely home in Panorama with views of mountains and the new nunnery, new clinic for the aged. Ruth is well, her eyes stabilized. Delicious lunch followed by long walk to the cemetery. Saw boxes where bones are placed after five years. When Dimitris dug up his father, the body was not yet decomposed. Horrible. Ruth told me about David Lansdale; his career has been with the aged, he has a degree in geriatric care. If he becomes the Farm School's next president he might be my best ally for a Greek CCRC. If . . . Elena tumbled down  $\frac{1}{4}$  of a flight of stairs but miraculously did not injure herself. Dimitri told me that at the degree-awarding ceremony I should deliver a scholarly paper of about 20 minutes. Maybe I'll do my paper on Ritsos, with handouts. And don't bring my Columbia gown. I'll be given a Thessaloniki gown. A lovely visit, as always. . . . Home. Then to town. Τοστ. Then to Odysseas and Eleni. Odysseas very emotinal in his reunion with Alec and Alec in seeing again the apartment where he lived as a very young child.

April 10, 2007

To Bill's for further talks about the Strategic Plan. He is wary about the call for an experimental (petting) farm. I typed corrections to what I hope will be the final version. At 12:30 we all left with Bill for Halkidiki: Casandra, Sani Beach, not too far from Μάλτεπε (Καλλιθέα). Big resort, but beyond it a deserted, beautiful beach with a Byzantine tower at one end and debris containing shards of ancient pottery, some of which we collected. Pellucid water, beautifully turquoise. Then lunch by the seaside in the next village, Bill allowing me to pay. Home at 6:00 p.m., tired. Takis came and drove off with Alec and Monica while we kept the children, well occupied with computer games. I continued my vetting. I'm now up to page 184.

April 11, 2007

To Τράπεζα Εγνατίας to withdraw money from my €14000 salary and to collect my ATM card. The person who helped me turned out to be an American long resident in Greece, graduate of Pinewood School. I left with €1000. Spent the rest of the day on the Kazantzakis translation. I'm now around page 200. Irene Lydaki wants me to wait until I finish, then compare with the changes stipulated by her copyeditor.

April 12, 2007

Last day at the School. Long talk with Joann about a Greek Kendal. She recognizes the necessity. Printed the latest Strategic Plan for Bill and Tasos. Alec and family visited Kostas, who again wept, thinking of Lola's death. I went to the School's managers' meeting from 1:00 p.m. to 3:45 p.m., chaired by Bill, very professional, with reports by Tasos, Vergos, Petsas (buildings), Joann, Chris. Interesting discussion on how to name the ΕΠΑΛ and ΕΠΑΣ in English: "vocational," "technical," "lyceum," "high school"? Afterwards, Chris took Chrysanthi and me for lunch at Carrefour. Long talk again about a Greek Kendal. . . . At home afterwards, George, Efthymoula, Andreas, Georgaki, Dimitra, Takis, all talking at once. Georgaki played "football" with Elena. At 8:30 p.m. Tasos and Dora picked us up and we all went, also with Bill, to "Miami" in Krieni. Delicious and very compatible, and managed not to overeat. We were marvelously cared for by the School, and in exchange I pledged another €5000 to help a Perrotis student in the 2007-08 academic year.

April 13, 2007

To Athens

Chris drove us to the airport in the Perrotis bus, very comfortably. Installed comfortably in the Achilleas Hotel. Very good lunch in Δελφοί in Οδός Νίκης. Watched the strange changing of the guard in front of the parliament, where we encountered Tom Coppert and parents. Dropped into the Grande Bretagne to show it to Monica. Walked down Ermou and visited the eleventh-century church halfway down, a well-preserved example of Byzantine architecture and design. Walked through the Plaka. Exhausted, back to the hotel for a bit, then to Panepistimiou for loukoumades. Kids to bed.; Chrysanthi and I to Apollonos 21, Central Hotel, to meet Alf Vincent, who took us to the Plaka—Adrianou, teeming with people. Sat for French coffee and ice cream. Alf described his extraordinary project of the moment (and the last ten years), a critical edition of a memoir, never published, by a Greek who observed the siege of Kastro (Iraklio) by the Ottomans and its fall, then fled to Venice and in his old age wrote 200-odd pages about life in Crete in the seventeenth century: food, commerce, politics, sports, etc., under the Venetians. Alf has done a translation and full annotations for a bilingual edition now in press. We spoke also about the Stavrou-Stassinakis problem, the forthcoming Kazantzakis sessions in Sydney and Adelaide, and about one of his student's dissertation on Darwinism that I'll soon be evaluating. He hopes that I'll encourage republication of the JMGs Australia issue on Kazantzakis that was so extraordinarily filled with errors. Walked home past the Παιδικό Μουσείο and the hotel nearby where I once stayed.

April 14, 2007

Athens

To the Acropolis with 10,000 other tourists. Lots of scaffolding. Saw the new museum down below, huge, being built. Hard to appreciate the Parthenon with such crowds. Chrysanthi couldn't go through the Propylaea owing to acrophobia and waited for us down below. Then to the Children's Museum, where I left everyone so that I could go to Syntagma to meet Manolis Aretoulakis and collect his two translations of my lectures: "Berlin," and "Why Read Kazantzakis." We spent 2½ hours together talking easily about his work (he teaches English literature) and mine. Glad to hear that he approves of private universities for Greece. . . . Siesta. Then to Christos and Eri's, where we saw Dimitris for the first time in probably twenty years. He is much the same, but improved in that he says I when he means I, whereas he used to use He for I.

He spoke somewhat connectedly about his grandmother's death and remembered his aunt's death. Every West Midlands bus driver knows him and never charges him for rides. Even Christos, once identified as Dimitris's father, got a free ride recently. He'll be visiting Meg and Michael after he returns, soon, to England. Here he visited Christos's sister in Volos. The star of the evening was Aspasia Maria, studying English literature at the university but theater, her first love, separately in a private school. She recited—rather, performed—the story of the butterfly and the cockroach for the children with professional grace. Let's hope that she can find her way as an actress. Right now they're doing Medea at the school. But she seems to be in favor of students closing the university again. I asked why. "It's to show the Ministry that the system cannot work unless they rescind the new law." Eri filled me in a bit about the November 1–2–3 conference. I'm to be the keynote speaker on November 1, for 45 minutes. I suggested a lecture on Kazantzakis's letters and she thought that would be fine. In Greek, of course. Christos expanded to Alec his past history, explaining what I had not known: that he almost had the contract to publish Kazantzakis's Ἄπαντα until Eleni reneged because she wanted all the money and thus decided to publish everything herself. But of course the civil war destroyed Christos's publishing capability in any case. . . . A full meal. Lots of photos by Dimitris. Fond farewells. A welcome coffee on Omonia.

Athens

To the archaic agora first. Marvelous to see the Theseion early in the morning with no one else there. It was even better than the Parthenon yesterday because of the crowds there and all the scaffolding. And the agora museum in the reconstructed Stoa is probably the best in Greece. I remembered the child's potty. Also of interest: water-clock for timing orators' speeches to six minutes; system of ostracism; system of choosing jurors; jar with four huge octopuses painted on it; cooking utensils. . . . To Kerameikos for renewed experience of the grave carvings, with emotional farewells extended to the departed. The Metro again to Victoria for the Archeological Museum. Chrysanthi remembered the marvelous bronze jockey on his racing horse, and of course Zeus (or Poseidon) ready to toss the thunderbolt (or trident). Final meal in Monastiraki. Alec and family accompanied us to Syntagma to wave goodbye. The best part of all these days together was the two children's complete compatibility with both Chrysanthi and me, something that needs to be renewed, and certainly was there the last ten days. . . . We treated ourselves to a taxi ride from Iraklio airport direct to Jo-Ann Hotel in Rethymo, well worth the €60 fee. Souvlaki for supper amazingly only €3.00 after the huge expenses in Athens.

April 17, 2007

A lucky event. Walking toward the harbor we wanted a better look at the mosque being repaired, and suddenly heard someone playing classical music on a piano inside. We entered and discovered that it's the Rethymno Odeon and that the secretary knew my name because Philippidis had considered this place for our lectures if the university were still closed. So, I was invited to practice piano in the hall, on a huge new concert grand, a Siena, from 2:00 to 3:00 p.m. Mondays through Fridays. Wonderful! . . . Yesterday, lectured for the first time with Roddy and had a nice supper afterwards with him and Fran. . . . This was in the Economist: Arnold Toynbee said that civilizations proceed from bondage to spiritual faith; from spiritual faith to courage; from courage to liberty; from liberty to abundance; from abundance to selfishness; from selfishness to apathy; from apathy to dependency; and from dependency back to bondage. (Where are we?)

April 18, 2007

To Iraklio

By bus to Iraklio with Roddy, Fran, and Stamatis. I lectured again, on the political interpretation of Zorba, Roddy again on Odyssey and Palamas and Zorba and Myrivilis. A nice surprise was to find Tsoucalas in the audience; he'd come to Iraklio for a cataract operation performed by the famous Rector, who took us all out again for dinner afterwards. He is a great friend of Stylianos's and wants to award him an honorary degree, but other professors object. Back via taxi paid for by the Rector. To bed at 2:30 a.m.

April 21, 2007

To Angela Politis's birthday party (10:00 p.m. to 1:30 a.m.). From there an immense surprise: Aglaïa Kasdagli, who played Maria in the video that John and I made in the 1970s in Birmingham, her face quite unchanged but her legs very infirm, so that she can hardly walk. Lots of reminiscing about those days. Must try to send her a CD with the videos, which she has probably never seen.

April 22, 2007

Two-piano and four-hand recital at the Odeon: Clementi, Infanti, Shostakovich, Debussy, Grieg. The Grieg was very lively (Four Norwegian Dances, opus 35).

April 23, 2007

Lectured today in the Περιγητική Λέσχη. Smaller audience, but Alexis Politis came and also Ava's friend where we had dinner on the two-year memorial. Afterwards to a really good restaurant with Roddy and Fran. The place is filling up: tourists. Our hotel is booked solid. The beach has umbrellas, etc.; reminds me of the Lido in "Death in Venice." Roddy is staying at a very fancy hotel: Porto Rethymnon, on the promenade. I'm doing better with the Satie, beginning to learn it. Skipped ahead to the appendices in the Bibliography in my translated book. In the text, now up to chapter 21. 200 pages to go. Mail came from the Kendal Corporation. They want to revise Values & Standards. I've found it repetitious, somewhat bloated, and needing considerable correction.

April 29, 2007

A very nice presentation at the Odeon by Rethymno school children dedicated to Kazantzakis: readings from various novels, special readings concerning music and dance in his works, and then—imagine!—quotes from the Odyssey set for chorus and orchestra, all students. Too long, but full of enthusiasm. The hall full. Parents, presumably. Obviously the teachers who drill these students seem to have no interest in our lectures. But they did announce our series very quickly when no one was listening.

May 1, 2007, holiday

Agatha, who interviewed me in Athens, arrived with her new husband George on the first anniversary of their marriage. She wanted to show us the fabulous restaurant ΑΒΑΙ, owned and run by her college friend Katerina and designed by her architect husband Costas Iliapoulis. Beautiful place, carved out of the Venetian walls. Costas appeared. He was just elected αντιδήμαρχος (vice-mayor) of Rethymno. He wants me to meet the mayor on Thursday and to discuss the possibility of my introducing a Kazantzakis program by children sponsored by the municipality at the end of May. Then we all followed him to his fabulous home about 11 km. east of Rethymno. He keeps horses (also rabbits, chicks, goats).

He leapt up on the Cretan horse (a breed that doesn't trot), bareback, riding expertly, but the Arabian, very young and not ready yet to support such weight, went out through the gate that had been left open when we entered. So Costas pursued on the older horse, found the beautiful black Arabian and led it back. Lots of good talk meanwhile with his wife Katerina, very lively, and his sister who is also an architect in his firm, specializing in restoration of historic buildings. Eventually we all went out to eat "lunch" at 5:00 p.m. Costas got me drinking the raki the proper way, all down at once. Nice to meet George, who is in marketing and turns out to be a schoolboy friend of Christos Galinopoulos, who spoke at NYU on March 3rd.

May 2, 2007

Iraklio

Early bus to Iraklio, where I deposited my second check (€4000) in the Egnatia Bank. Then taxi to Forth to see Irene and go over her queries, not many. Then an hour or more with the director, Stephanos Trachanas. Very lively. Lots of good talk about Kazantzakis, including my hopes for the Selected Letters. Lunch; then the Historical Museum where Alexis Kalokairinos's secretary welcomed me effusively and assigned a lovely curator to take us through. She did this very energetically and was going strong when closing time (5:00 p.m.) arrived. They have two early El Grecos. . . . To the Lions Square, our favorite place for coffee and a bit of a nap, much needed.

May 4, 2007

Athens, Hotel President

Taxi to Χανιά airport: €50 + €5 tip. To Hotel President near Ambilokipi. Nap. Then sat in the lobby of the Grande Bretagne and worked on shortening my lecture. To Στοά του Βιβλίου at 7:30 p.m. for one event, sponsored by the Cretan Society. Full house. 200 people at least. Nice to see Iakavos, Don, Manolis, George, and Agatha, Christos, Kyriaki and Athina Vouyiouka, maybe Amy Mims (who left a book). I spoke for my required 15 minutes on Γιατί να διαβάζουμε τον Καζαντζάκη στον 21<sup>η</sup> αιώνα. Stamatis took 45 minutes to do his 15. Unorganized, unprepared, as usual. Good discussion afterwards. Dallas was there; he spoke at length. People gave me books and said nice words, although no one really spoke about or questioned Kazantzakis's religious vision, the subject of my talk. Big, endless supper afterwards with lots of laughter, jokes, good fellowship. Christos wants my text for Θέματα Λογοτεχνίας.

Agatha told me that I'll be speaking at the event organized by the mayor later this month.

May 5, 2007

Hectic breakfast with the hotel full of Spanish, German, Chinese, etc. visitors. I worked again on shortening a lecture, something required by Stamatis, who himself speaks for 45 minutes when he's been allotted 15. Oh well . . .

May 6, 2007

Received the official letter from the University of Thessaloniki about my honorary doctorate on November 7th. And wrote to Vras that I cannot come to Australia in July. Chrysanthi much relieved. 95 pages to go in the translation.

May 7, 2007

After our lectures at the university, we were driven home by a man who turned out to be a retired school inspector who had a talent for μαντινάδες. He regaled us in the car on the way home with various examples. He and our friend Andreas and a few others meet fortnightly in the Jo-An to discuss philosophy, literature, etc.

May 11, 2007

We were driven to Χανιά, Roddy, Stamatis, I, and Chrysanthi, and the three of us lectured on Zorba σε φιλολόγους (high school teachers). Nice to see the man who produced the "proceedings" of our Congress here, in the same room, ten years ago. Beautiful meal afterwards by the sea. . . . In the evening, a graduate student interviewed Roddy and me at length for a new project, a "blog" on the internet concerned with Modern Greek literature.

May 12, 2007

7:45 p.m., finished my vetting, all 611 pages, of the translation of volume 2. What next?

May 13, 2007

Φαιστός

Bus to Αγία Γαλίνη, marvelous scenery. Met there by Gareth Owens, who showed us the lovely harbor with statues of Daedalus and Icarus, with Psiloritis in the background. He drove us to Φαιστός, where we met some British guests of his. Toured the site with his expert commentary.

He showed us where the Phaistos dish was found. Gareth is working on Linear A still and has theories, but of course not a full decipherment. He then drove us to his wife's village, Vori. Lovely lunch: παϊδάκια (lamb chops) plus, just for me, Shepherd's Pie made by his wife. Then to their home for coffee, ice cream, and a tour of the garden. Finally, about 6:00 p.m., tired (it was quite hot all day), found a taxi back to Rethymno. A nice excursion.

May 14, 2007

Managed to reduce my Last Temptation lecture to about 35 minutes. Practiced piano, happily. Γύρος for lunch. Then Jason Lewallen's MA thesis arrived, so I had to spend all afternoon vetting it before going off to lecture downtown at 8:00 p.m.

May 16, 2007

Iraklio-Thessaloniki

Lectured on The Last Temptation in the Androgeo. Good questions. Gave last pages of the Kazantzakis translation to Irene. Then to Thessaloniki. Big party at McGrew's. New trustee Joel Polk very nice; in financial markets in NYC, like Greg. Another new one, Barbara Heming. And a new Greek trustee: Hatzigiannakis. Nice to be back in the upstairs apartment of Hastings House.

May 17, 2007

Farm School

Committee day. I started with finance, my first time. We have an endowment of $40,000,000+, 80% in equities, 20% in bonds, which Sheila and others defended. Then Post-Secondary Committee, thinking about the new three-year program and hoping for the best. Then my Secondary Committee with the agenda devoted exclusively to the relation between schools and animals if the animals need to be moved to a remote site. Thankfully Tasos, who I thought would say that the practical program would collapse if the animals moved, did not. Instead, he reported that the Ministry allows "excursions" once a month to a remote site. Hurray! I wrote up the minutes with all the possible eventualities. Then I spent an hour in one of the College classes answering questions or explaining how the practical program came from Father House's experience of the Penn School's program for freed slaves. These students seem uninterested in farm animals; they want business, management, etc. They're from Albania, Bulgaria, Kosovo, FYROM. I said that friendship and fellowship develop best owing to a shared work experience. Then to the Farm Committee's endless debate about whether to purchase 700 stremmata for possible transfer of the cows. Pendelis very opposed. David Acker in favor. Finally they compromised. We'd look for cheaper land in the Kilkis area, and if this fails, we'll buy the 700 stremmata. . . . To the Stavros Constantinidises' for supper. Amazing: Dartmouth's ex-dean Carroll Brewster was there among the Anatolia trustees. Nice reunion. I spoke at length to Anatolia's vice-chair about a Greek Kendal. He'd actually visited Crosslands. Bissell hadn't come. The president of Anatolia's alumni association gave me a book by Lorin Riggs' mother that he'd published very handsomely, to bring to Lorin.

May 18, 2007

Farm School-Iraklio, Hotel Astoria

Four trees planted in memory of those who'd died, starting with Alex Drapos. Father Kyriakos officiating. A brief eulogy by a friend, then moments of silence for each. At the end, Father Kyriakos summarized beautifully, praising our silence. Then a very long board meeting from 9:00 a.m. until 3:30 p.m. Big problem is the question of land purchase. First vote: a tie. More arguments. Second vote, the yeas won, just. I voted Nay. Dimitris Zannas, when we were discussing all the arrangements for leasing land, said he feared we'd become a business whereas we should be offering something constructive to society. I then spoke at length about the possibility of doing this through a Greek Kendal placed on the 70 acres of plot C2, which still remains open for use. Afterwards, Phil asked me to submit a written proposal, and Annie suggested I do so as a letter to Zannas. Will do. Spoke to Kravvas about Albana. He can hire her as a "farm worker" no matter what she actually does, and this gives her a permit for a year, which can be renewed. . . . George Koualizides drove me to the airport. He's very much in touch with folks at the School despite being fired, and is pursuing a Ph.D. at the University of Crete on the subject of the Open University. Nice to see him flourishing, without bitterness. . . . To Iraklio. Met Zetta at the airport, going like us to Iraklio for the symposium. Arriving at the Astoria Hotel, we went to the reception for symposiasts and who was there but Patroklos Stavrou. Chrysanthi approached him and he hugged her. I approached him. Smiles, hugs, kisses. Πήτερ, ήμουν τόσο άγριος προς εσένα επειδή σε αγάπησα τόσο πολύ. Έτσι, είπα, όλα περασμένα. Ναι ! So that's nice. He said he had received the large packet I'd sent with the τετράδια and my book but had never opened it. I hope he now opens it and finds the book. My other book, Οκτώ διαλέξεις, was distributed earlier to everyone and I received my first copy. Quite an evening.

May 21, 2007

Stassinakis telephoned to say that Agatha is a traitor and please have nothing to do with her. Then the Αντιδήμαρχος telephoned: come to the Δημαρχία today. So we went at 4:00 p.m. The scheduled program is canceled. We were in the Mayor's office. Outside, angry voices, shouting, worse and worse. The Mayor raced in, furious, saw us, left. Eventually the outburst stopped; police escorted someone outside. The Mayor wanted to say hello. Amazingly calm. Invited us to dinner tomorrow. And the other vice-mayor, Costas, invited us to his name-day at AVLI tonight. . . . To Gallos. My final lecture. Full house, every seat taken, standing room only. Roddy came next, then a good talk on male bonding in Kazzantzakis; finally Stamatis on Kazantzakis and Dostoevsky. Lots of questions and discussion. . . . At 10:15 p.m. we showed up at AVLI, warm greetings by all three "assistant mayors for civilization"! Mezedakia, raki, etc. with interesting folks. One was a neighbor of the Orphanoudakis family and another a cousin. And they all know Stylianos. Small world. The Mayor came a bit later. Warm hello. . . . I'm preparing for a visit tomorrow to the Kazantzakis Museum at Varvari. Leventis saw me the other day at the symposium and we arranged the visit.

May 22, 2007

To Andreas and Jane Drakonakis's with Roddy and Fran. He is a proud gardener, she a proud cook and painter, but very isolated high on the mountain above Atsipopoulo. Lots of good talk. Back at 5:00 p.m. Nap. Then the Αντιδήμαρχος Πεπή Μπιρλιράκη-Μαμαλάκη fetched us, picked up the Mayor, Γιωργής Μαρινάκης, and we went off to a tavern where we were joined by Alexis Politis. The Mayor gave us lovely presents as a remembrance of Rethymno. Apparently all this started with the famous Agatha, now Stassinakis's enemy. The Mayor lively, simple, very approachable and friendly. The whole group wants to make Rethymno better and better, with pedestrian streets, the longest promenade in Greece (12 km.), etc. Lots of food, of course. Home at 12:30 a.m.

Iraklio, Atrion Hotel, Chronaki 9, Herakleion

May 23, 2007 712 02, 2810 246 000, info@atrion.gr, www.atrion.gr

Up early to get the 8:45 a.m. bus to Iraklio. Taxi to Μυρτιά past marvelous vineyards owned by Boutaris. Barbara Tsaka and Andonis Leventis helped me at the Museum, deciphered some illegible words, and introduced me to their website that lists all the letters in their possession. Eventually these will be scanned and thus available on line. Not yet. But they can photocopy any that I need. Also they're thinking of doing a meeting in 2008 on the Scorsese film, which has never been shown in Crete, and rarely in Greece although it's available in video form. Andonis drove us back to the Atrion Hotel, in back of the Historical Museum. Nice lunch there. Siesta. . . . Final lecture before a smaller audience. Lots of questions. Fond farewell to Irene. At the end I introduced Alf Vincent, a third non-Greek scholar, to the audience and he spoke briefly. Then a poem dedicated to Kazantzakis was read, and we all went out to a tavern, including Roddy and Fran for lots of food and talk until 12:30 a.m.

May 24, 2007

Iraklio–Rethymno

Tried to buy some of Tasos Apostolidis's comic books but the store had none. Then asked a policeman how to get to Kazantzakis's grave and he said "We'll take you." So we rode there in the patrol car. The tomb doesn't seem to have his name, but it does have Δεν φοβούμαι τίποτα, δεν ελπίζω τίποτα, είμαι λεύτερος. Back to Rethymno by bus, which included a furious argument between the driver and a woman regarding a ban on standees. Alf was in the same bus, headed for a day at the university.

May 26, 2007

Finished Maria Zarimis's very interesting dissertation on Darwinism and Greek literature, especially Xenopoulos, which I'm vetting for The University of New South Wales. If I'd known all this some years ago, I would have written very differently about Kazantzakis because he now seems to have been doing pretty much what everyone else was doing. . . . Supper with Roddy and Fran at Λεμονόκηπος. Later, I discovered that Greg Nagy was eating there at the same time, at the other end of the garden, with a group of symposiasts. We never saw each other, but communicated afterwards by e-mail.

May 27, 2007

Roddy, Fran, Chrysanthi, and I treated Stamatis, Katerina, and Photini to lunch at Lemonokepos, very pleasantly. Long and repeated “Thank yous” all around, in both directions.

May 28, 2007

My birthday. Warm e-mail from Daphne, telephone call from Alec, nothing from Leander as usual. In the evening, Chrysanthi treated me to a “tost” and a chocolate sweet. At 11:00 a.m. we met Jane and Andreas in Atsipropoulo and they drove us toward Sitia and then to marvelous gorges and volcanic mountains and a secluded beach on the south coast, a tourist town and non-tourist villages, and to a village tavern owned by a man with a marvelous white beard. Exquisite scenery everywhere, cultivated patches interspersed between βράχους. A huge flock of sheep with swollen utters, wanting to be milked. Goats high on the mountainside, stripping it bare of all trees and shrubs. When we returned, I gave Andreas a copy of my volume 1; he’ll read it, I think, and we won’t have its weight in our luggage on the way home. . . . Tonight, walked to the harbor. The huge ferryboat for Piraeus just arrived. Cars and trucks pouring out of it. Others waiting to go in. The one experience that we of course denied ourselves was the trip to Crete by sea. . . . I’m trying now to fix the translation of my “Kazantzakis in Berlin.” The translator did my English but did not incorporate any of the Greek quotations, which I now need to do.

May 30, 2007

Χασιά-Αθήνα

Taxi to Χασιά. Sofitel Airport Hotel. Then to Metro to meet Lia and Don. Italian restaurant. Don expanded on his multiple schemes that might involve the Farm School, where actually he’d like a job. I was discouraging about the job, but he’ll send his proposal on to Bill with a covering letter from me. Lia’s work involves translations of business materials from multiple languages. No word about their forthcoming (?) marriage. Don still doesn’t have a residence permit. A bit of an adventure on the way back to the airport, since we missed the last train. But we lucked into a taxi for the long ride.

May 31, 2007

Το Τράπεζα Εγνατίας, deposited €1000. With my Greek Visa card I can withdraw a maximum of €2000 a day. I should get $1.30 for every €1.00.

Constance picked us up at the Grande Bretagne and drove us down Λεωφόρος Συγγρού to Βούλα, to Athina Vouyiouka's splendid private home there surrounded by a garden with fruit trees and flowers. Η Κυριακή Πετράκου joined us, and a Scottish lady who has been thirty years in Greece, plus a gentleman in publishing. Lots of talk, lots of gossip about Stavrou. Athina is going to a conference in Beijing with Stassinakis. Kyriaki will be with me at the University of Athens in November. There from 12:30 until 5:00. Then back to Syntagma and the Metro to the airport. Spent some time viewing the interesting Venizelos exhibit there. Tennis: French open, on TV.

June 1, 2007

Athens–Frankfort–Boston–Hanover

Up at 3:45 a.m. First flight at 6:00 a.m. Everything normal except Dartmouth Coach, which was 30 minutes late owing to traffic, so we missed our taxi at Hanover Inn and waited half an hour. Home at 7:15 p.m., 23½ hours later. Then Chinese restaurant.

June 3, 2007

Meeting. I played hymns. Nice lunch at EBA's with Jack and Ruth Hunter and their son Edward, now unemployed and unmarried. Sad. Lots and lots of mail to go through.

June 4, 2007

Exchanged 1000 euros for $1,250. Better rate in Greece: 1.31. But it's still nice to have the gain. Minimal jet lag, indeed zero. Leander here for lunch.

June 5, 2007

Farm

Eight-hand piano with Bill Clendenning, Stan Udy, Joan Wilson: Schubert Trout. Then to the farm. Leander still here. Huge infestation of ants in his electrical box. Wind storm caused lots of damage, including a heavy branch fallen into the garden destroying the south fence. Happily nothing in the pond this year. We had enough garden left to plant tomatoes, beans, cucumbers, lettuce. No damage to buildings, although a white birch branch is resting on Alec's porch roof and a heavy limb is resting on the Guest house roof, just resting.

June 6, 2007

Executive Committee meeting in our apartment to plan the June 13 Council meeting and Association meeting. Mel on Monday, also, with Becky and Betsy. All's well. They are delighted that Tedd Osgood's New Era Task Group will now be disbanded. I promised not to talk about cows. They worked diligently in my absence, especially Betsy Sanderson and Pat Burnham. . . . Then drove to Boston, parked under the Common, got key to Beacon Friends House, T to Cambridge, pot roast dinner in Charles Hotel, then a superbly acted performance of Pinter's No Man's Land at the A.R.T., although Chrysanthi kept falling asleep. Vintage Pinter, about aging, the confusion of reality with fantasy, the futility of existence.

June 7, 2007

Drove back to Hanover in time to meet Laird Barber for lunch. He has a cousin in Norwich whom he visits. Luckily, he's healthy and able to travel, most recently to Portugal. Ditto for us, so far. Then drove to Kinhaven, where Alice and I will play Satie. Our first try was rather encouraging. Nice to see old friends, especially Charlotte. But Bruno is missing. Ignat is here with Carolin and the two children, all looking very handsome. Housed again in the Infirmary, somewhat refurbished although without hangers or even a mirror. Managed to reach Chrysanthi on telephone (not cell, which doesn't work here). She's off tomorrow to New York to see Daphne. Alice and Susie last week visited Sunnyside (3902 and the office), Atlantic Beach, Little Red. In all our former houses, the current occupants remembered Doctor Bien. My room in 3902 is unchanged as is most of the rest of the house, but the courtyards have been invaded in some cases and all the front doors are no longer green.

June 11, 2007

Kinhaven

Splendid lesson from Nigel, who really knows a lot about Satie, whom he explained chiefly as an anti-Wagnerian. And a splendid solo recital by him: Bach, Mozart, Bartok, Mendelssohn, all played masterfully. Long, nice talk with Ignat after lunch (Dmitri's birthday cake) on Russian and world politics. Paul Buseck and Lori arrived for supper and overnight.

June 12, 2007

Kinhaven-Hanover

Our Satie was OK, I suppose, although I left out some notes (especially at that difficult page-turn), but people liked Satie's zest. Trip home included my obligatory chocolate milk shake. Chrysanthi returned from her visit with Daphne and family, the last time in New York, since they're moving to Santa Barbara in August. Andrew successfully caught a fly ball in his baseball game. Hooray. Better than I ever did.

June 13, 2007

Kendal-Terpni

My final Council meeting and Annual Meeting. Full house. I summarized the Council's accomplishments; will repeat this for the Board on the 18th. Car in garage for new brakes, available at 5:00 p.m. We headed straight for Riparius but got only as far as Woodstock, when everything went dead in the middle of Route 4. No battery. Called AAA by a miracle (very bad cell-phone service). Waited one hour 20 minutes for the tow truck to arrive, meanwhile trying to reach Leander to cancel our supper appointment in Lake George. A helpful, talkative man kept us company, advised me to call police to help push the car out of Route 4, which happened. When the tow truck arrived he said, "Let's look under the hood." He immediately found the wire connecting the alternator to the battery, which the garage technician had forgotten to reconnect. So, after starting with jumper cable, we were fine, and continued to the farm, arriving at 12:30 a.m.

June 14, 2007

Tractor battery doesn't work. Started tractor with jumper cables, hoping to charge the battery. Leander has done yeoman service mowing not only around his house but around ours. Wonderful! We all went out to our favorite Sicilian Pizzeria in Lake George and feasted on escargot and shrimp scampi. The owner's daughter is studying literature, doing an M.A. at Boston College. Her mother's worried that she'll never get a job.

June 15, 2007

Long talk with Earl Millington. He says that Gary is very lax regarding Daphne's house. Leander hopes to employ Earl as caretaker for all of us. . . . Shapiros visited. They're selling their Florida property. Fran is still canoeing at age 93.

June 18, 2007

Back to Hanover for my final meeting with the Kendal board. This is the report I gave:

REPORT TO BOARD, 6/18/07

Peter Bien

Since the board last met, on March 12, the Residents' Council has met six times. I presided only at the last meeting, in June, owing to my ten-week residence in Crete. Betsy Sanderson, the council's vice-president, presided splendidly in my absence.

I will give the highlights of each meeting.

March 14. Our fund appeal for the council's activities came in at $29,322, exceeding the 2006 result by $2000. We were pleased to award a college scholarship to Ivana Kovacikova (known to all as "Aka"); she will receive from the council $1500 per year for four years and $2500 per year for four years from the administration. She is expected to return each summer to work in the dining room. Our previous recipient, Ashley Parker, will be helping in admissions this summer. We hope that the 2007-08 council will increase the council's award from $1500 to $2500 per year.

April 4. This was a special meeting convened to receive the report of the New Era Task Group (Hoke Brissenden, Dick Cherin, Barbara Gilbert, Mary Jenkins, Rose Miller, Tedd Osgood [chair], Walter Reeves, Betsy Sylvester, and Bill Tate), with the understanding that no action would be taken at this time. Council was supplemented by five special guests—Gordon McCouch, Ella Erway, Becky Smith, John Hennessey, and John McCall—each of whom commented on the report. Council agreed by consensus to receive the report.

The NETG's original charge was to improve the council's interface with residents, directors, and administration in order to evolve a more participatory and cooperative relationship. Its major recommendations were:

Council should hold closed sessions as well as open ones. The chairpersons of the Residents' Health Committee, the Financial Advisory Committee, and the Facilities Liaison Committee should be members of council. The secretary as well as the treasurer should be appointed for a two-year term. The president and vice-president, although continuing with one-year terms, should be eligible for re-election for a second year.

The outgoing president should be appointed to the next nominating committee. The nominating committee should serve year-round. The executive director should be able to call special meetings of council to address a limited agenda. Council members should be invited to attend directors' meetings. Council should be more involved in selecting those residents who will serve as directors or as members of administrative committees.

April 11. Discussion of the NETG report continued. Council agreed that more experienced residents should be nominated to serve on council and that better orientation is needed for new residents concerning the council's role. Council expects that the nominating committee will know best whom to select. It was clear that yet another meeting on the report was needed.

April 26. At this final meeting, each speaker was limited to a maximum of two minutes, with Kingsley Ervin keeping strict time. The final sense was that there will be no need to change council's bylaws; however, the 2007–08 council may wish to revise council's guidelines.

May 9. The nominating committee revealed that it had received suggestions from eighty-eight residents concerning appropriate persons for the next council's members and officers. Council agreed that the nominating committee should work year-round, concerning itself with committee chairs and members. The NETG report was received with thanks with the expectation that the committee's hard-working members will now be relieved of their duties.

June 13. Council's budget stands at a healthy $68,397. At the Annual Meeting that followed council's brief session, the names of residents who arrived since June 2006 were read aloud, and all were welcomed once again. Harte Crow summarized the board's major concerns for the near future. The bylaws were changed so that the Health Services Committee will henceforth be named the Residents' Health Committee. The president summarized council's major activities since last July as follows:

After much discussion, and some dissension, we formulated a radical non-smoking policy for Kendal. This was approved by the board and is now being implemented by the administration.

Responding to the initiative of the Facilities Liaison Committee, we sent to the board the hope that board and administration will find ways to limit CO<sub>2</sub> emissions and will enhance Kendal's "greenness" in additional areas. Board accepted this proposal and agreed to set up a relevant committee in due course.

We approved the Financial Advisory Committee's proposal concerning a method for determining annual fee increases as well as its suggested increase for fiscal year 2008. This was brought to the board, which responded with thanks but could not accept the proposals. Nevertheless, the extensive dialogue between residents and board that took place over this issue may make future cooperation more possible.

We instituted a new Welcoming Committee that will be more effective in orientating newly arrived residents.

We heard reports from most of our major committees.

We have in hand annual reports from twenty-two standing committees and task groups.

We utilized "sense of the meeting" most of the time as the preferred way to make decisions, therefore avoiding the possibility of "we win," "you lose" that may happen when voting is utilized.

We began and ended each meeting with silence as a way of expressing the collectivity that, one hopes, transcends our members' multifarious individuality.

The Annual Meeting ended with council's new president, Ginia Allison, introducing herself and hoping for an active, constructive council in 2007-08.

June 22, 2007

Saw a ewe and the smallest possible faun on the road. And, mowing near the pond, saw a partridge with about six tiny chicks. Tomorrow Chrysanthi begins a nine-day teaching stint for ALPS in Hanover.

June 30, 2007

Drove to Riparius to get mail and saw various people outside a house "reconstructed by Greeks." So I stopped to say hello and yes they are very much Greeks: Stelios and Anastasia. The invited me to return at 3:00 p.m. for lamb roasted on the spit. I did, and of course the lamb wouldn't be finished until 5:00. But in the meantime there was lots of talk with them and their friends, Arabs, grandparents born in Jordan, son born here married to a lovely girl born in Jordan. Very pleasant people. They're Christians: Catholics practicing the Greek orthodox liturgy. Stelios is a contractor, but former owner of Symposion restaurant on 113th Street. He has poured $350,000 into this house, which he now regrets; wants to sell it but of course the price is very high. . . . I bought a Stihl gas-powered trimmer, which is very powerful and will help especially around the pond. Yesterday I got Alec's Pathfinder off its blocks and started it without trouble. Also cleaned lots of branches near the pond and mowed there. Lots more to clear. Am reading Harry Mark Petrakis's Shepherds of Shadows for which I agreed to write a foreword. It's quite interesting: a novelistic treatment of the Greek revolution.

July 6, 2007

Still cleaning up all the blow-down in the fields. Pile after pile. . . . Serious rain as we traveled to Saratoga to see Peter Martins' new production of "Romeo and Juliet." And went to hear him talk beforehand about simplifying the scenery, finding a Juliet who looked 14 years old (he did), removing repetitions from Prokofiev's score. A large undertaking, lacking the magic of Balanchine, but a very fine balcony scene, amazing sword play, and very moving at the end.

July 7, 2007

Elena telephoned from JFK, where Alec and family arrived at 6:30 a.m. We have their house aired, their fridge well stocked, the Pathfinder outside and waiting for use. . . . Finished Shepherds of Shadows. How now to devise the foreword?

July 14, 2007

Finished all the necessary cleanup from the blow-down, a huge job, helped of course by Dan Fones and crew, who spent a full day here. We still want to grind down existing stumps. Visited Fones this evening, to deliver for their daughter, who is expecting, Peter Tebbe's crib, no longer needed. He and his wife and some friends were drunk on beer, or "happy" rather. Wife very talkative, proud of a little table she made from the burl on our cherry tree. Son, the one who was in jail last year, quiet but civil. I kidded him about becoming an uncle. He smiled (rare). Kelly, the man who worked on the crew, was there with his brother, who proudly showed me his uncut hair down past shoulder length, a ten years' growth. . . . Finished a draft of the Foreword for Petrakis's novel, stressing the truthfulness of his account of the Greek revolution: patriotic rather than nationalistic, to use Orwell's terminology. . . . I've been rotating Alec's photos that need rotation, hoping perhaps to prepare an illustrated talk on Greece for Kendal.

July 17, 2007

Worked very hard with Alec today, our 52nd wedding anniversary. We rented a stump grinding machine. I chain-sawed the stumps as low as they could go. Alec then ground the remains. We finished his plot, did three on our plot, two next to the garden, the large spruce destroyed by ants, then started Leander's and did maybe  $\frac{1}{4}$  when the machine broke and had to be returned. The sawing was very strenuous because always horizontal.

July 20, 2007

Yesterday and today, Alec and I marked the entire Terpni Partnership property with fresh blue paint. Many fences are still visible. But of course we couldn't mark the southwest corner, which is in the middle of the swamp.

July 21, 2007

Marvelous ballet matinee with Alec and family. "Circus Polka" (Stravinsky/Robbins), which is all children, one stream followed by several others each of younger ones. Delicious. Then "Jeu de cartes" (Stravinsky's marvelous music with so-so choreography by Peter Martins). But then Balanchine's 1940 masterpiece "The Four Temperaments" (Hindemith), which shows his extraordinary imagination. Not a single cliché. Finally "Aurora's Wedding" (Tchaikovsky's Sleeping Beauty music, choreographed by Martins copying Petipa), as a marvelous demonstration of what ballet used to be like in Russia, with cat, puss in boots, little red riding hood and the wolf, marvelous court jesters, and pageantry galore. Afterwards we gorged ourselves at the Chinese buffet.

July 22, 2007

Surprise: an e-mail from Ole Amundsen saying that on Friday, listening to public radio, he heard Cornell West say that his number one summer reading is Peter Bien's volume 2 on Kazantzakis. Imagine! . . . Big problem with my Quicken file of Quaker finances which showed a deficit where there is none. Luckily I had a correct backup and was able to fix everything. . . . Finished mowing the south field, which means everything. Και του χρόνου! But how many more years?

July 24, 2007

Marked Alec's southern border. Very strenuous, climbing up ledges with Alec and Leander (who arrived yesterday). Then we went more or less northwest through difficult terrain (downhill this time) and arrived at the beaver pond. Two lodges and double dam very visible. Also numerous trees felled by these amazing creatures, one tree totally debarked. Spaghetti dinner as a reward followed by ice cream at Stewart's.

July 25, 2007

Burned the pile, to which Alec added five or six loads of brush from his field. . . . I've shortened Ο Καζαντζάκης θρησκομανής for Athens on November 1st. . . . Troy-Bilt sickle bar mower needed a new set of knives, which I was able to order. The existing ones are half broken and all very dull and nicked.

July 26, 2007

Daphne and family arrived for supper—steak on the wood fire outdoors. Christina's first words to me: "I'm taller than Monica!" Peter's: "Where's the tractor?" Greg explained his probable involvement in the future: in a new company that will encourage businesses to lower their CO<sub>2</sub> emissions thanks to certain benefits provided by the company. He'd do the financial part, thanks to his experience and his many contacts in the financial world. The other partners are in London, Hong Kong, China. He'd travel, but intermittently. . . . Alec and I managed to cut several high branches with the rope-chain-saw. Amazing. These had impeded Chrysanthi's best view from her favorite chair on the porch. . . . I finished shortening Ο Καζαντζάκης στο Βερολίνο for the University of Thessaloniki on November 5th. I can say a lot more in English in 20 minutes than I can say in Greek, apparently.

July 28, 2007

Würzburg

Flew yesterday from Albany via Philadelphia, business class. Then train from Frankfurt to Würzburg; stupidly sat in a smoking permitted apartment, empty, but later occupied by two women, maybe Hungarians (train's terminal: Budapest) who struck me as Lesbians and who smoked continually, when they weren't eating cold sausages for breakfast. Würzburg is green. Flowers, trees, gardens, parks. A small city apparently 90% rebuilt after being bombed by the British in 1944. Hotel, then to Die Residenz, very ornate, for the conference. Nice to see Darren, Roddy, Fran, Tziovas. Met Niki Stavrou, Patroclos Stavrou's daughter (!). She teaches with Constance at Indianapolis University in Athens. Very friendly. Told me that they just lost a court case against Stassinakis for supposed libel. He wants Eleni exhumed to prove that Stavrou killed her. Good papers, generally with simultaneous translation of the German ones into English. Lunch downtown pleasantly. More papers. Then a sumptuous Greek dinner. Most of the restaurants here seem to be Greek.

July 29, 2007

Würzburg

Sunday. Church bells. Deserted streets. Eleni Kouvaïou (Rethymno library) said she'd read a simultaneous translation of my paper into Greek, so I prepared the Greek text for her in the early morning, laboriously crossing out all the deleted material from the original lengthy essay. . . . Beautiful formal gardens in back of the Residence and viewed from the ornate "Saal" where we are speaking. Yesterday we also all went to the Town Hall where the mayor greeted us with champagne and a long talk about Würzburg in German, of course, which naturally I didn't understand. But I feel that if I lived in Germany and studied a bit I would manage the language fairly rapidly. Lots already seems familiar, at least to read, less to speak. . . . This morning's session was excellent. Dimitri Tziovas spoke about "Being—Becoming," the possibility of reading Kazantzakis's novels as "closed" (Being) versus the possibility of reading them as "open" (Becoming). Interestingly, the sort of discussion initiated by Darren Middleton for Kazantzakis's theology is now being applied to considerations of Kazantzakis's literary style. I came next with my paper on Kazantzakis in Berlin with Eleni rendering the translation into Greek. Then Niki Stavrou spoke very well indeed on existentialism in Kazantzakis, again picking up from Middleton on Whitehead, etc. Afterwards there was extensive discussion of all three papers. The major question, for me, as expected, regarded Kazantzakis's communism. . . . Around 1:30 p.m. we all walked to the river to board an excursion boat that went up-river (the Main) very slowly so we could see some villages, lots more greenery, vineyards, striking churches, then entered a lock, exited, reversed direction, and returned. I sat mostly with Darren, Niki, and her friend who is a tenured administrator at Indianapolis (in Athens, of course), and a friend of Constance's. Niki is adjunct only. Lots of beer and food. . . . I walked back to the hotel, again in the rain, then walked back to the river and across to a large church for an organ and choral concert of Mendelssohn's sacred music and some secular rounds, all done a capella, and nicely sung. But alas Mendelssohn is not Bach. . . . Met fellow symposiasts and spent another few hours in a nice restaurant where I spoke chiefly with Zdravka Mihaylova, a Bulgarian scholar and government official, very sympathetic, and a Greek man who turned out to be from Rethymno, actually Atsipopoulo, where Andreas and Jane live, and a very nice retired German theologian and protestant minister who wants to enhance German theological discussion of process theology and who told me that he always accompanied C.O. applicants when they went to the tribunal. Back to the hotel at midnight, to find Darren, Niki, and Niki's friend still talking and drinking good Würzburg wine.

July 30, 2007

Würzburg-Albany

To bed last night at 12:30. Up this morning at 6:00 a.m. 6:56 train to Frankfurt. The trains are on time, clean, fast, with lots of amenities. . . . I'm reading Berdyaev's The Destiny of Man en route. He almost makes one believe in Christianity! Some of this may be useful for Kazantzakis as θρησκομανής.

August 2, 2007

We marked Alec's north border, after crossing below the second beaver dam. Wonderful view of one of the beaver lodges, right against the shore. Hard climb in 90–95 degree humid heat. Theo and Nicholas were with us, doing fine. Hard to know where State land begins (eastern border), but we did find a stake. . . . Troy-Bilt mower broke: metal fatigue. Hope to have it welded by Bud Roddick. . . . I started thinning trees that Dan Gilmore marked. . . . Nigel Coxe here; lots of good talk about his past acquaintances, e.g. Larry Adler the harmonica player, who could do even Rhapsody in Blue. . . . Leander very worried about hordes of hunters on our land. We conferred with Art Perryman, who suggests a gate and says that Waddell Road is famous among locals for baiting and jacking deer. I keep resisting posting. In Berdyaev's The Destiny of Man, p. 218, there is a good expression of my reason: "The maximum of freedom and the minimum of tyranny is achieved when God is recognized as the absolute owner, and man merely as a steward and a user."

Sunday, August 5, 2007

A very social day. Started by going down to Matt and Deana's, with Alec. Matt restored a broken part for the jeep clutch. Long talk with Deana. They're married now. He had cancer of the esophagus and almost died, both from the cancer and the chemotherapy. But he's in remission and working at a new job in South Glens Falls. Then, back at Terpni, Derek Millington pulled in on his four-wheeler, with two children. He's the grandson of Daisy and Earl Allen, and will be our full-time neighbor when he builds his house in a year or two. He works as an automobile mechanic at Della Honda on Quaker Road. Nice to have someone close with such skills. He recommended a deep cycle battery for the John Deere; it might survive the winter. Then Alec's family and we drove to Lake Pleasant to visit Gary and Wendy McGinn, who are now installed in a large religious site that is being refurbished to serve as a refuge for churchgoers undergoing divorces, missionaries in furlough, etc. Huge lodge with bedrooms, pond, fields. Former horse barn. Gary is 59 and expects to retire from Murphy's in three years. No pension, no health insurance then. . . . Back home to get a bottle of champagne given us by Greg, then to Tom Akstens and Suzanne Murtha's for a good meal followed by dessert around the fire outside. Tom is negative re: Don Kurka, whose son intends to build on part of Don's land while Tom buys another part in order to prohibit anything being built on it. A mess, alas. Home at 10:45 nicely lubricated with champagne and a cordial.

August 6, 2007

James McBride arrived, alone. His Italian novel is very likely to be made into a movie using his own screenplay. "The boys" went out, and then Leander and he slept at Daphne's or, rather, stayed up all night talking. He entertained the children with stories, jokes, grimaces. . . . Earl Millington has apparently fixed my Troy-Bilt mower, which needed lots of welding.

August 7, 2007

Finished my lecture, "Καζαντζάκης ο θρησκομανής" for November 1st in Athens. Went to town to be treated to lunch by Peter Bauer and Bob Harrison of RCPA, who obviously wanted to enlist my financial support. I promised $1000 a year for five years, expecting to still be alive at age 82. I hope that Peter could somehow meet Len Cadwallader and learn about Vital Communities. . . . Stassinakis wants me to lecture again in Crete, but how? . . . The students of a lyceum in Iraklio have sent two pages of interview questions that I need to answer.

August 31, 2007

Two men came with a jeep fitted with a post-hold auger, cement, etc. and installed our new gate—Leander’s great (!) addition that Chrysanthi and I never wanted. So, presumably trucks will no longer invade the property during hunting season. But I expect retaliation in the form of vandalism or worse. We’ll see.

September 5, 2007

Nice 1½ mile hike with Evelyn and Don Greene to a secluded pond on State land near Garnet Lake. I asked Don about the gate and posting. He doesn’t post. Several times when he did post signs they were all torn down and obscene messages were left for him. . . . Late this afternoon we saw a small black bear run across our entire east field to the far side of the pond. . . . I’ve sent my three lectures in Greek off to Vouli to vet the Greek. And the talk in English for the book launch is also ready. So I did do something this summer, although nothing alas on the Kazantzakis letters.

September 23, 2007

Had lunch at “Harvest” in Cambridge with Nurjhan Mamajunusova, the young woman from Kyrgyzstan who finished #1 at Perrotis last June and is now doing an MA at Brandeis, partly with my $5000 support. Poor creature, she went to Greece chiefly to avoid being trapped in an arranged marriage. Her liberal father understood but her mother refused to speak to her for five days. (Things are better now.) Then we went to an extraordinary production at the A.R.T., Nurjhan’s first time ever in a theater: an updating of Don Giovanni combined with Molière’s “Don Juan,” complete with lots of Mozart’s glorious music beautifully sung. A moving aesthetic experience.

October 4, 2007

Lunch with “Pong,” who graciously brought me a present: a Jim Thompson Thai necktie, of course with elephants. This summer he spent another month as a monk, accruing “merit” for his parents. He wants a career in high finance. Interesting that in his Buddhist context this and the monkish service can coexist without difficulty.

October 5, 2007

Lecture by Orhan Pamuk in Rollins Chapel. He is so genuine; nothing pompous or fake or pre-programmed. Profound, brilliant, funny. He read from "Other Colors," a delicious vignette of a child not wanting to go to school. And he compared his work as a writer to a child's utter absorption in a favorite game.

October 13, 2007

I organized a dinner in the Penn-Morley room, with wine (!), for the new Pendle Hill president, Laurie Perman, and local Quakers: William and Sally Wriggins, Gordon Browne (who has Alzheimer's), Pat Ballou, Rose Miller, Chrysanthi, and myself. Relaxed, with real conversation. I wish her well, telling her Dan Seeger's classic remark about his work at Friendly's Restaurant: "It's easier to manage ex-convicts than to manage Quakers!"

October 4, 2007

Long lunch at EBA's with Laurie and Jack and Ruth Hunter, with more chance to interact meaningfully with Laurie. Useful since I'm about to return to the Pendle Hill board. Yesterday, before her arrival, I performed two movements of the Trout Quintet for 8-hand piano in the Cary Room with Joan Wilson, Bill Clendenning, and Stan Udy, the Dartmouth sociologist. Of course I muffed a few passages but at least didn't get lost.

October 18, 2007

Yale, Omni Hotel

I spoke at the MGSA symposium, the 20th, on "Kazantzakis in Berlin 1922-23." Nice to see old friends and colleagues: Eva Constantellou, now doing JMGS book reviews; Dia Philippides, Marinos Pourgouris from Brown, doing well there, and Elsa Amanatidou; Brian Joseph, John Iatrides, Dimitri Gondicas, Peter and Susan Allen, Gunnar de Boel (Göteborg), Dimitri Papanikolaou (Oxford, we met at Iraklio & Rethymno), Constanza Güthenke (Princeton), Constantine Tsoukalas, last seen in Iraklio after his cataract operation by the Rector; Karen Emmerich, now teaching at Barnard; Vangelis Calotychos, George Syrimis; Mache Karanika, now at UC Irvine; Tom Gallant, now at UC San Diego; Gregory Jusdanis, and lots of time with Everett and Brenda Marder and Martha Klironomos. We couldn't stay beyond lunch on the second day, too bad because the program is extremely rich: lots of new, young scholars. MGSA very alive. . . . Last Wednesday, lobster supper at Kendal with Avery and Marge Post and Weezie and Bill Pietsche. Lots of shared experiences and concerns. Avery regaled us with his stories of meeting the Pope and the Patriarch. I told the lovely story of Patriarch Bartholomew and Veronica Rassias. . . . Have spent the last two weeks vetting the March 3 submissions for possible publication in JMGS. John Anton's is almost gibberish. Constance Tagopoulos's has all the documentation confused. Dan Dombrowski's is perfect. Others are so-so, but needing lots of correction. I've been thrown back to the nine years of editing JMGS when I did this regularly. . . . At the Inn the other day, lunching with Tom Corindia, a man came up to me: "Professor Bien! You taught me Freshman English in 1982-3." He was a Native American, freshly off the reservation in 1982 and now is here to give a public lecture. Apparently I'm still recognizable after 25 years.

October 21, 2007

Penn Club, London

A wonderful first day in London. Good flight last night, happily business class. Gatwick train, sitting across from lovely English children—girls, so typically "mature" in their conversation. Fine room at the Penn Club, which seems to have been painted and has new carpets. Lunch in Russell Square. Then by tube to Earl's Court to the Finborough Theatre, tiny, maximum 50 seats, for a superb performance of "Little Madam," an evocation of Maggie Thatcher as a child, wonderfully acted especially by Catherine Skinner in the leading role. The author, James Graham, is 25 years old. Clever use of the child Margaret's fantasies as a group of phantoms who appear and disappear and then turn into real people like Edward Heath. Thatcher of course becomes increasingly rigid, doctrinaire, and self-righteous. One couldn't help thinking of George Bush, but also perhaps of Hillary Clinton, despite many differences. Wet sat in the second row and could appreciate the mastery of facial expression as well as voice production of these extraordinary actors. . . . Then to Leicester Square for a spaghetti dinner and back to the Penn Club for coffee and some time for reading the latest TLS.

October 22, 2007

London

To the National Gallery, rooms we'd not seen before, all Christian subjects, reminding one, I suppose, of the utter centrality of this religion for European peoples of older times. Only two El Grecos. Wonderful Rembrandt self-portraits. . . . Bought one-week "oyster cards" for the tube: unlimited journeys. Descended 175 steps at Russell Square station owing to crowded elevator. To King's at 6:00 p.m. for the book launch. A woman interviewed me for radio. The Great Hall full, every seat taken, mostly by Cretan Association members. Lovely to see Dimitri Tziovas, Peter Mackridge, David Holton, Lewis Owens plus wife (a pianist) and baby, Alix MacSweeney, Rowena Loverance, and of course Roddy and Fran Beaton. I spoke first: "Getting Unstuck from Kazantzakis," after Roddy's introduction and something from the Cretans' president. Then Lewis, then Peter Mackridge, and finally Dimitri. All very complimentary, of course. Afterwards, people came up with books for me to sign. Long talk with Alix and with Rowena, who also came with the speakers to supper at Sofra afterwards. All in all, a moving occasion. Walked back to the Penn Club at 11:00 p.m. with Roddy, Fran, and Dimitri.

October 23, 2007

Dimitri Tziovas spent the night here, so we had a long breakfast together talking about Brum, Meg, Roddy's estrangement from her because she wrote a negative review of his book on Modern Greek literature, Bryer (sick with arthritis), the future of MG studies in England. . . . Sent a birthday card off to Elena with six $1.00 bills. . . . Another long talk, this time with Joseph Keith, the librarian at Friends House who appreciates everything I gave him about the Quaker school in Greece. He reminded me that Friends House has meeting spaces that can be rented out to outside groups like the American Farm School. . . . Saw an interesting play in the Royal National Theatre: "Rafta Rafta," about Indian immigrants to England and father-son troubles. Beautifully acted and produced, as always. . . . Then to LSE to hear Kostas Simitis's lecture on the health of democracy, or lack thereof. A bit abstract, but better in the question period. He is very rational and also very learned. In citing failed attempts at a true third party in Greece, he went all the way back to Σβώλος in 1945-46.

October 24, 2007

Canterbury–Walmer

To the British Library. My reader's ticket expired in 2003. I renewed it to 2010. But will I ever use it? We met Judith Herrin at the library at 12:30 and had a leisurely lunch together until 2:15. Previously, went through the Treasure Room again. 2008 is a Miltonic anniversary. Listened to the Beatles. Judith is just back from New York, where she went to celebrate her 65th birthday. Her latest book was reviewed, miraculously, in The Economist. (Roddy told me that my volume 2 will be reviewed in TLS by Dan Dombrowski.) Judith and I have many memories, going back to her student days at Birmingham. We learned why Meg and Roddy had a falling out (not healed); she wrote a negative review of his history of MG literature. She walked us back to Euston. We went on the tube (using my marvelous oyster cards) to Victoria and entrained to Canterbury. Roddy met us. We walked in town a bit, in the precincts of the marvelous cathedral, a miracle. Then to Fran and their new residence, a little outside town, lovely, with a long high wall filled with books. And Fran's mother's collection of fine china. Then all four to Meg and Michael's in Wellesley House, Walmer. They now have not only Flat 1 but also the upstairs flat, where we ate and slept, after sherry downstairs. Michael gruff and sweet together—a "character." Meg very glad to see us (and vice versa). A long leisurely supper lasting until 11:30 p.m.: smoked salmon, lamb, fruit and ice cream, and lots of wine. Meg open about her mother's death. I played her mother's eighteenth-century spinet, recently tuned: my Scarlatti sonata, and an Irish song that Meg sang (it was done at her wedding).

October 25, 2007

Walmer–Charing Cross

Slept well upstairs in Wellington House. Coffee with real cream. Meg gave me her latest, Απόκοπος, with her translation, which I've begun to read with interest. She expanded on the quarrel with Christos over moving or not moving Pavlos, who is doing well, she says, in Lancashire. He may have bipolar disorder as well as autism—rash shifts of mood. She told of her horrible time in 2005: breast cancer, double mastectomy. Then a viral disease contracted in hospital, then her mother's decline and death, afterwards concern about her father's books and archive, since the parental house would need to be sold. Efforts to place George Thomson's Greek books at the University of Thessaloniki, which I warned her against. No scholarly or intellectual project at the moment because of all these previous concerns; she has given up the hope to write her father's biography. Someone else can do it better; she's too close and hesitant to reveal, for example, her mother's naïveté regarding political factors. . . . Taxi at 9:50—showed us the ancient church in which Meg and Michael were married (because, Meg noted, of her severe illnesses and fear of possible death). Train to Charing Cross. Lunch. The matinee of "Shadowlands," about C. S. Lewis, a wonderful drama beautifully played: how can a loving God permit pain and death? Lots of fun at first with Mrs. Gresham's American accent (played by a British actress) but soon her cancer turns everything to sorrow. Lewis's faith is severely tested. He believes that the future is all; this life is a vale of tears, but his experience shows him the inadequacy of this. . . . A very good Italian dinner. Then a very sterile play even though by Schnitzler and adapted by Stoppard, "Undiscovered Country," about rich Viennese involved in adultery. Well, we've done very well so far: three good out of four.

October 26, 2007

Finally some talkative people at breakfast, an American professor who knows David Roberts and an English meteorologist active in East Africa before retirement. . . . To internet café, where I needed 1½ hours to deal with all sorts of e-mails, including notification from Eirini Lydaki that the Greek translation of my volume 2 has been released. . . . Then to the British Museum. Got some sense of the amazing Chinese terracottas simply by leafing through the catalogue. We viewed the Greek exhibit much more thoroughly than in the past, going all the way chronologically from the Mycenaean to Alexander the Great, concentrating as always on the Elgin Marbles. But the frieze from Bassae is also extraordinary, although not so monumental. Also paid some attention to the sculptures taken from the temple of Νίκη, which I'd not viewed before. . . . To the Coliseum for Monteverdi's "Coronation of Poppea," strangely unlike Verdi, Puccini, Mozart, of course, but with wonderfully expressive music and singing, the orchestra mostly just continuo with harpsichord, but occasionally filled out with strings, even brass, harp, and, at the end, organ. Fanciful costumes; gods and angels on cables flying across the stage. Seneca's death scene very moving (and ethical). Nero a stinker (played by a female soprano, strangely), but nevertheless redeemed because he values love over everything else (including morality). Poppea slinks and poses, insuring her elevation; yet she, too, ends as an emissary of love and is therefore exonerated from all else. A fitting conclusion to our week in London.

October 27, 2007

Up at 5:30 a.m. to get to Heathrow on the Piccadilly Line, still using our marvelous oyster cards. To Thessaloniki via Frankfurt. Met at the airport by Tasos and Vouli. Installed in Cincinnati Hall, recently refurbished. Then supper at Tasos's, with Dora, Vouli, and Joann. Learned that a new hospital now exists near the Cosmos Mall, apparently the best in Thessaloniki, which has attracted various physicians from abroad. This sounds like it would be perfect for a Kendal-at-Thessaloniki. But Stavros Constantinidis wants to build a hotel on the "C" property, the one that's large enough for a Kendal. Tasos advises me to deal with one of many companies here that have architects, lawyers, etc., all ready to plan such a facility. But how to pay them is the rub. Tasos showed us a good film about El Greco using text by Kazantzakis. And my volume 2 in Greek has already arrived, so I saw it tonight for the first time. Didn't say anything to Joann about the presidency, from which she has apparently withdrawn her candidacy. Better when we're alone.

October 28, 2007

Worked on Καζαντζάκης ο θρησκομανής, fixing it, shortening, revising, and speaking it out loud. Lunch with two students at Perrotis from Kyrgyzstan, a man and a woman, very sweet, able to converse in English. One more girl will come in April. They lack computers, which makes life difficult when the library is closed. The girl's dormitory room is a quadruple, with toilet, etc. outside in the hall. She says she doesn't mind. . . . George came. He has had another prostate operation but says he's now fine. Efhymoula not so fine, either in spirit or body. Spoke to Joann via telephone about the presidency. She vows continued service to the School but family reasons (always!) dictated withdrawal of her name for the presidency. Too bad. I'll talk to her son tomorrow about Dartmouth. . . . To Odysseas and Eleni in the evening. He's always very emotional when seeing Chrysanthi. She has serious arthritis in one leg and cannot negotiate stairs very well. Their summer holiday was very short because of a flare-up. . . . Met the professional archivist, Nancy Birk, who is here for three months putting the School's archives in order. I'd like to do something about lack of computers for Perrotis students unless they come with their own.

Monday, October 29, 2007

Assembly. Prayers. Announcements by Tasos. He introduced Chrysanthi and me but I wasn't called on to speak. Then we shared a cup of coffee with him and Thanos Kasapidis. Then walked along Σαρανταπόρου to see if number 11—Chrysanthi's home, where I spent half a year—is still there. It is, the only remainder on the street, and looking very well maintained. Walked on την παραλιακή Οδός Βενιζέλου and bought plane tickets to Athens and back. Then went to the publisher of Tasos's Olympic games comic book and bought a copy to give to Andrew Tebbe. Home via the #10 bus to Χαριλάου and then the #62 (Thermi) bus to the School's fence entrance. Saw the dig for the new subway, along Egnatias. Bus hugely crowded with people all crushed together. . . . Went to Joann's to talk to her son Alexander about Dartmouth and other colleges. He has a very strong CV from Anatolia's IB program and has applied early decision to Yale. Nice boy, studying Turkish, perfectly bilingual in English and Greek. Then to Salonika, fetched by Vouli in her favorite taxi. Went to movie "El Greco," very well done, moving and exciting. Nice to see scenes of Venetian Crete after having lived there. And Cretan dancing and music, not to mention El Greco's paintings. Whether his terrible vicissitudes with the Inquisition are totally historical I do not know. Or his relationship with two devoted women. Must read further.

October 30, 2007

Dimitri Gounelas came at 8:00 a.m. to get addresses for invitations to the doctorate ceremony. I listed some trustees and our relatives and those we know locally. Let's see if anyone comes. Spent most of the day in class, morning in the School, afternoon in Perrotis College. Did Mary Chism's English first. Again, she uses computer exercises, which the students do well enough. Then to a sort of composition class: how to organize an essay, very abstract, without much student participation. Then the same materials in another class composed of students with learning difficulties: slower, smaller class; again, too much talking by the teacher, not much by the students. . . . Then to history, half of which was occupied by me, the teacher having asked me to talk about trustees, my career, my translations, etc. I told them the όρτσα story, among others. . . . Went to Perrotis and talked with the new head, Don Schofield. Asked about Vergos. It was hard for him to be demoted, but Don is sure that he will do well in his new position as head of LLL. . . . In the afternoon, I met the Kyrgyzstan student who gave me a present, a local hat, very high-rise, made of sheepskin and worn in both summer and winter. Went then to a College class in English grammar for first year students, beautifully taught by a young Polish woman married to a Greek whom she met when she was a student at Perrotis. Πολύ κέφι. The students responded very well to the exercises, all of which concerned various forms of the future. . . . Chrysanthi and I took a taxi to Cosmos, the new, huge mall. I was not impressed. Lots of fancy stores but not much else. . . . Then for supper again to Tasos and Dora, who had invited the famous educator Tsolakis, also another professor of mathematics (Dora's colleague). Very nice to meet Tsolakis, who brought me a letter by Kazantzakis to Kriaras, still alive at age 102, and in good health, mind and body. He says he'll talk to people about publishing the Kazantzakis Selected Letters in Greek after I finish, and wants to publish my lectures in his periodical. Very nice! He is universally respected, so Dimitris tells me. One of the books used by students in the class I observed earlier was by him. He sees himself as continuing the contribution of Delmouzos. . . . Tasos read my Θρησκομανής lecture and corrected various typos and solecisms, thankfully.

Θεσ/νίκη-Αθήνα

Halloween. At student σύναξη there were wonderful costumes: a cardinal, a superman, a rabbit, and many more. One of the students we met yesterday spoke well about trick and treat. The rest of the morning, until 11:00, I struggled with the e-banking for Marfinegnatia, which I still cannot make work. Then we flew to Athens. Installed in the Farm School's apartment at 8 Μαυρική in Εξάρχεια, which Don Nielsen tells me is the neighborhood for anarchists. Lovely supper in a nearby taverna with Don and Lia, who happily announced that they've been married, or sort of, since his lack of residence permit prohibits marriage. But they went to an island and had there a civil wedding whose certificate still hasn't arrived, but they're hoping it will. I delivered the usual pharmaceuticals to Don plus this time an ingenious device to enable him to put on his socks without bending over, which he can no longer do. His Free School project has some new hopes. We talked a lot about depositing archives, since Lia just finished a large translation job for ELIA.

November 1, 2007

Easy to go to the center via bus via Ιπποκράτους. Went to Marfinegnatia Trapeza on Panepistimiou to get them to show me, finally, how to work the e-banking. And they did. Let's see now if I can do it on my own. . . . To Goulandris Cycladic Museum for a very fine exhibit about El Greco, his painter-son, his chief apprentice, and others (his workshop) who produced canvases meant to be El Grecos but lacking his "spirituality." Yes, we saw the difference when an original was hung next to an imitation. . . . Then to the Benaki Museum for a good photographic exhibit, most interesting to me because of photos of railway bridges blown up by the Germans as they left Greece in 1944. A nice lunch in a restaurant I knew on Nikis near Plaka, the Delphi now being, sadly, closed for good. On the way back we crossed paths with the schools and university demonstrating again (!) against the government's proposed legislation to allow private universities and therefore to change article 16 of the Constitution. The ironic thing is that they argue for "free education" whereas their so-called "free" education is so deficient that all families need to spend huge amounts on φροντιστήρια. . . . "Home," rested, washed, changed into black suit. To the university. Nice to see old friends: Christos, Eri, even Ritsa Papatheofilou, Katerina Anghelaki-Rooke, Kyriaki Petrakou, Athina Vouyiouka, Constance Tagopoulos, whose son is worse and worse. She's very unhappy in Athens and misses New York. Patroklos Stavrou was supposed to be on the program to give greetings, followed by Petrakou representing Stassinakis (!!). Fortunately, he (Stavrou) is in Washington today at the Library of Congress, where I sent Middleton to replace me. The Rosenberg girl came as well. Lots of official welcomes from deans and provosts. Then I spoke: Καζαντζάκης ο θρησκομανής. Chrysanthi said that I did well, the best Greek she can remember. No question period because they needed to show a very long film afterwards, new, on Kazantzakis's life, quite accurate, with interesting visuals, including photos of Elli Lambridi. Afterwards, on the way out, we learned that they had feared that the student demonstrators today would try to occupy the building, and they locked the door. But, happily, the students did not appear. Afterwards Christos, Eri, Constance, Chrysanthi, and I went—of course—for loukoumades at our favorite στέκι στο Πανεπιστημίου, near Omonia. To bed by midnight.

Friday, November 2, 2007

To Panepistimiou. Saw Christos again and autographed his copy of my volume 2 in Greek. But then had to leave to get to Οδός Λυσία in Plaka, the Ioniko Kentro, to hear talks on Kazantzakis, including Dia's. Luckily, I found a young, pleasant, cooperative taxi driver who brought us there, too far to walk especially in this heat. The Ιωνικό Κέντρο is a beautiful neoclassic building totally restored, with large spaces for lectures. Today, people from Finland, Denmark, Germany, Sweden, and the USA described the extent and nature of translations of Kazantzakis into their language. Bo-Lennart Eklund was the Swede, but didn't show, and his paper was read. From the Finnish representation, I learned how to pronounce Börge Knös. It is not Knes, but Knös with German ö. And Bér-ye. Speaking about translations in UK and Ireland was David Connelly. We had a very pleasant reunion and he surprised me by announcing that he'll be present on Wednesday for my doctorate; he teaches now in Thessaloniki although he still lives in Athens. Dia's presentation for USA and Canada was from her "Census" and was all graphs and percentages. . . . We then walked the short distance to Χαϊρέφωντος to visit Brady Kiesling and his partner. Saw his lovely flat, with view of the back of the Acropolis, five minutes walk from Acropolis Metro. He described his investigations of November 17, how most of what he originally thought he knew is false, how the confessions of the perpetrators were very "cooked" in a way that saved certain guilty individuals. He has three chapters ready and has sent them to his agent in New York with the hope of finding a publisher. Of course the avid readership will be here in Greece once the book is translated. His first book, on diplomacy, has just been issued in translation. We then walked to his favorite restaurant, which turned out to be the same one on Nikis that we ate in yesterday. Eventually his partner joined us, a Brazilian lady who works (without a permit) as a "therapist" in clients' homes. Very pleasant and lively. We talked about Don Nielsen's situation. Brady says that there are lots of young lawyers who can fix this sort of thing for a reasonable price. . . . We finished at 3:30. More lectures didn't begin until 5:00. So we went to the Grande Bretagne and ordered a cappuccino and frappé (which cost €16!) and sat comfortably on the hotel's couches. Very good talks this afternoon, especially the one on the failure of Greek academics to teach Kazantzakis by Πύργος Κεχαγιόγλου. At 8:00 p.m. came the Round Table. Lovely to hear Katerina describe her childhood awareness of Kazantzakis, and then Rhea Galanaki, who at age 10 in Iraklio marched in Kazantzakis's funeral procession. Generally, she and others confessed that they earlier had dismissed Kazantzakis as not for them, but are now changing their minds. One of them even declared Αναφορά στον Γκρέκο the finest book in Modern Greek prose. . . . At 9:00 p.m. Dia and Wim came to fetch us by pre-arrangement. They took us to a very lively restaurant just off Panepistimiou near Omonia. Saw Professor Walter Puchner and his wife there. I had μήδια in a cheese sauce, very pungent. It turns out that Wim received an honorary doctorate from Thessaloniki; he warned me to remove my suit jacket because the doctoral robe is so hot. Home at midnight.

Saturday, November 3, 2007

Back to the conference, beginning at 10:00 a.m. Very good papers, including one by a young professor, Εύη Πετροπούλου, on Kazantzakis in Germany. She'll be speaking in Thessaloniki also on Monday. Petrakou fine on Μέλισσα. Κεχαγιόγλου also fine. Went to late lunch with Constance and Αθηνά Βουγιούκα, to the same restaurant on Nikis. Αθηνά very negative about PASOK although she's a leftist, indeed a communist. Fond farewells. We returned to the apartment, the met Christos and Eri at Ακαδαμίας 48 (γωνία Σίνα), which turned out to be the university staff house: very fancy rooms for conferences, talk, coffee, etc. plus a restaurant with beautiful service, fine menu, and very low prices. A sort of Athenian Yale Club (except for the prices). Christos very excited about the horrors committed by the USA. The abject poverty he saw in Washington, etc. Eri worried about Aspasia-Maria's typically young-girl behavior, going out at 11:00 p.m. and returning at 3:00 a.m. But she's very good about calling her mother at whatever hour to establish where she is. We spent three hours of non-stop conversation, over spaghetti and ice cream and espresso. To bed at midnight. At lunch, Alike and Constance gave us lessons in the latest Modern Greek slang: μπάχαλο = χάλια· μανούλι = ωραίο νέο κορίτσι· πρώτη κάλπσα = πλούσιος show-off. Christos said, interestingly, that he used to spend time with Markos Avyeris and Galatea and that she was pleasant—i.e., that the nervous tantrums, fainting spells, etc. that Kazantzakis refers to in 1923 when she was still married to him were really his fault, that he demanded much from her (and from Prevelakis) but gave nothing to either. Obviously, like many geniuses, he was totally self-centered and ambitious, despite all the fine language about serving the Πιοή.

Sunday, November 4, 2007

Back to Thessaloniki. Catching up on e-mail. At 9:00 p.m. Don Schofield met us and we went with him to a good restaurant in Themi, where we were joined by his partner, of Greek parents who were in Romania because of the civil war. Don recounted his own protracted troubles with Greek authorities over residence and job permits. He recommended a specific lawyer for Don Nielsen. He became a Greek citizen, which helped. He gave me a print-out of his latest translations of a Greek poet who had a stroke and now cannot write. Schofield himself is now an admired poet. He awakes at 5:00 a.m., writes from 5:30 until 9:00 a.m., then pursues his duties as head of Perrotis College.

Monday, November 5, 2007

Assembly with Nancy Birk, who wants me to recommend her for the board of trustees. A student spoke at length, mumbling, about the EU. Father Kyriakos warned students that the Καινή Διαθήκη is a contract by which they will be judged. . . . Then to a class on the EU, specifically on regulations governing the welfare of workers. One of these regulations involves the possibility of mediation. I'll bring this to Kendal. . . . To the new library on Εθνικής Αμύνης for yet another Kazantzakis symposium. Saw Aglaia Lypourli. . . . Albana telephoned and we arranged to meet at the Καμάρα for lunch. She related her tale of woe: no job. She'll finish her MBA course work in June, then write a thesis, and graduate in October, after which, unless some miracle happens, she'll be forced to leave Greece. She despairs of returning to Albania, which she says is totally corrupt. Her mother, a teacher, earns €200 a month, her father €220 a month. I suggested Costas Kravvas, but she was not treated well by his secretary and in any case his work location would require a 1½ hour commute each way. I suggested America, but she feels responsible to stay near her parents, her brother being still a semi-invalid in Italy. I'll talk to Dick Jackson about some work-study employment for her at Anatolia. . . . Back to AFS on #10 and #66 buses, then taxi back to town. The closing session of the symposium very fine: Gounelas brilliant on Plato and μονιμότητα, Κεχαγιόγλου repeating his interesting lecture given in Athens, Εύα Πετρόπουλου fine on Kazantzakis and German literature (but she didn't know about Report to Greco being based on Goethe's autobiography). I spoke on Kazantzakis in Berlin 1922–23. It went well; I actually got the audience to laugh. Lots of questions afterward that fortunately I understood. Lovely to see in the audience Tasos, Dora, Joann, the mathematician and wife whom we met last week at Tasos's, Aglaïa, and scores of students—full house. Annie Levis also; she told me that Phil Foote has been replaced by Charlotte Armstrong as board chair: a disappointment. We all went afterwards to the Pan-Cretan Λέσχη for a meal, speeches, photos, and Cretan music with lyra and voice and guitar. 50,000 Cretans live in Thessaloniki.

Tuesday, November 6, 2007

Assembly. Father Kyriakos spoke beautifully about time: every day is lost, so make it worthwhile, without regrets. Two French girls, exchange students for a short period, voiced their thanks and their invitation to the Greek students to come to France. Very sweet. Of course their common language is English. . . . Met the two Kyrgyzstan students in the library and tried to arrange with Thanos to have them come to the Doctorate ceremony tomorrow. Also had our photos taken, I wearing the tall hat, to send to Nurjhan. Tasos told me that Tsolakis reported that his committee approved the publication of the Kazantzakis Selected Letters in Greek based on my work in English. . . . We watched a group of students, maybe thirty, rehearsing dances for Thanksgiving, done to American country music and taught by the young woman who also does secretarial work, Zina Pantazi, and is the daughter of Pantazis, who used to make the trustees dance. Wonderful exuberance and precision. . . . George came, brought us to Kalamaria, picked up Efthymoula, and we ate a full meal, enduring Efthymoula's objection to the restaurant, the food, etc. Then to a zacharoplateio for dessert and coffee. Stuffed! Back to Cincinnati Hall at 5:00 p.m. . . . At 8:30 Tasos came, with Dora and Annie Levis.

Wednesday, November 7, 2007

My big day. Started with breakfast, really brunch, at Lena Stefa's spectacular apartment overlooking the harbor. Vouli there and another former teacher at Anatolia. Then met Dimitri in his office; nice to see the department secretary again, who very much remembered me. With some difficulty, but not too much, we collected the €1200 payment owed me. Then to the beautiful new library building and the “special collections” accompanied by three librarians. It’s very real, with archives already in hand (Delmouzos, Triantafyllidis, etc.) and apparent ability to take care. I’ll tell Meg. And they have a few Kazantzakis letters that they promise to send me. Lunch with Dimitri despite the large brunch not too far behind. A nap back at Cincinnati. Change into black suit and shirt with French cuffs. Dimitri and Ruth fetched us at 5:45. To the original University of Thessaloniki building, with its huge Great Hall. Lots of friends came: Aglaïa and Mimis Lipourlis, Albana (big hug and kiss afterward), Tasos and Dora, Pelaghia and George, Don Schofield, Gertzis and a few other teachers, Randy, Joann, David Connolly, Zeta (in robes, representing the department), George, Efthymoula, Odysseas, Andreas and son Γεωργάκι, Tilda and Dimitri, Nikos, Toula, Takis. I gave Toula Leander’s phone numbers. Two students from my class with Dimitri some years ago, Vouli, Lena, her friend from brunch, Professor Sifakis, who inspired the central library at Rethymno, the wonderful man, Tso-lakis, who is arranging for the Letters to be done in Greek, Frairis from Monday’s conference, and lots of others I didn’t know, plus the Kyrgyzstan student from Perrotis, and a whole gang of students currently studying at the university. Of course Dimitri and Ruth, the vice-provost, dean, head of classics. The vice-provost gave some of my background; then Dimitri spoke at length about my books, translations, textbooks, etc. Then I stood up. The official dedication was read, I was “dressed” in robe and hat. Applause. Then I gave my talk, Καζαντζάκης ο επιστολογράφος, which apparently went well. I had no difficulty, it seems, with the Greek. Afterwards, a long line of people offering congratulations, a buffet upstairs, and home with Tasos and Dora.

November 9, 2007

Up at 3:40 a.m. Taxi at 4:15 a.m. Alitalia to Milan. US Airways, envoy class, to Philadelphia. Home after 26 hours.

November 21, 2007

Leander’s

Went to see the new art’s center at Strathmore. Beautiful hall, all in birch and maple. Then to a supermarket catering to Hispanics and orientals. We were the only Caucasians there. Very funny video later, of a health-food freak serving “tofu turkey” for Thanksgiving. Leander took us all to a good Greek restaurant in Bethesda and I had μιάμ μπαϊλντί. . . . Vetting Constance Tagopoulos’s essay again from the beginning because she revised it. Ugh! Agreed to pay for a computer for the Kyrgyzstan student at Perrotis, about €60.

November 22, 2007, Thanksgiving

Nice turkey dinner, as always, topped by Greg’s superb wine (Cohn’s). Daphne telephoned, as did Monica and Alec. Afterwards, we all laughed heartily at the Disney animated film “Ratatouille.” . . . I worked on vetting Tagopoulos’s revised essay (still very confusing) and on writing up my adventures at the Farm School, in order to distribute to trustees.

December 1, 2007

Brenda Marder asked for a translation of the doctorate proclamation for an article she’s writing on me. So here it is. It sounds just like the exaggerated rhetoric of the Hellenistic proclamation regarding Octavian and Antony in Cavafy’s poems. Plus ça change . . . !

VOTE

of the Department of Philology of the Aristotelian University of Thessaloniki for you

Peter Bien

Professor Emeritus of Dartmouth College, USA

The teachers of the section Medieval and Modern Greek Studies and its chairwoman Georgia Farinou-Malamatari said that you have fulfilled fifty years of fertile intellectual work and have dedicated a large portion of it to the study of the demotic language and of outstanding authors of modern Greek literature, especially the work of Nikos Kazantzakis, scrutinizing archives, translating his novels, analyzing the religious and philosophical basis, and composing the first complete two-volume biography.

The Department of Philology of the School of Philosophy, wishing to honor you, the sensitive translator, the skillful anthologizer, the tireless student who approached modern

Greek literature critically, historically, and comparatively, and the energetic ambassador of Greek literature who with modesty and results contributed in various ways to its promulgation, especially to the English-speaking world, has decided unanimously to award you the honorary degree of Doctor of Philosophy and to grant you all the accompanying privileges.

Atlanta

I spoke on “Kazantzakis’s Religious Mania” at a beautiful museum at Emory University, sponsored by the Greek Consulate and the local Greek (maybe Cretan) community. Good audience; lots of questions and comments. A priest, Father Panayotis, spoke interestingly about Orthodox wisdom that goes against the Augustinian-Platonic-Aristotelian insistence on God’s immutability. Consul Lambros Kakissis was an exemplary host, as was Maria Doiranlis, who studied art history at Columbia and knew Sean Hemingway. Wonderful Greek restaurant afterwards.

December 4, 2007

Atlanta

Consul Kakissis drove me around the city. Then brunch with Father Panayotis. Then more sightseeing, the highlight of which was the tomb of Martin Luther King, next to the Ebenezer Baptist Church, where he preached. He was killed so young, only 39 or so. Atlanta unimpressive; no public squares or great parks, just nondescript streets, but with interesting architecture. . . . Read Dan Schofield’s translation of Nikos Fokas along the way, very fine, maybe better than the Greek.

December 9, 2007

Pendle Hill

On the way down on the train on December 7th I thought, “Why am I doing this again?” However, being at Pendle Hill has changed my mind. What a stimulating place! Strong Meetings for Worship, lovely conversations at meals, lots of friendly people glad to have me back. Fascinating account from Denis, from Rwanda, about how and why the genocide took place. Mary Ann, a Unitarian pastor, showed me a very useful magazine article on Darwinism, process theology, etc. Another told me of a relevant book on the same subject. Friend in Residence, Jennifer, described how Woodbrooke has renewed itself very successfully. Pendle Hill still has a $500,000 annual deficit. Should we change or abolish the resident program? It's possible, for 2008–09 but not necessarily the best idea. Laurie Perman is a strong director, and also personable. I congratulated her for not sitting on the facing bench during Meeting for Worship; she appreciated this. During prayer requests at Meeting I asked for prayers for us who will vote on January 8 in the New Hampshire Democratic primary. . . . Drove to Dan Seeger's in Lumberton. He's very busy in various Quaker activities, but not writing much. Alan and Bev Gaylord came for tea; they are neighbors. Louise Frankenbury teaches at the University of California, Santa Barbara, as does, maybe, her husband Dick Corum. Alan has privileges at Princeton as an alumnus. Lots of exchange information about children.

December 20, 2007

Played piano for the Kendal read-through of the Messiah, part 1, plus Hallelujah chorus, Becky conducting. I got lost a few times but generally did well enough. Switched to organ for Hallelujah.

December 22, 2007

A marvelous tour de force at the A.R.T.: "No Child," written and acted by Nilaja Sun in a one-woman bravura performance that brought the entire audience to its feet in a standing ovation. The subject: the rigors of teaching in a slum school in the Bronx, especially under "No Child Left Behind" legislation. She, the teacher, decides to entice the obstreperous students into performing a play. "You're thespians," she tells them. "What, Lesbians?" is all they can reply. But in the end, they do perform, more or less, and probably fail their Regents exams.

December 24, 2007

South Salem

Here at Daphne's and Greg's substantial home, which they will now occupy perhaps two months a year. Strangely, I'm reading Cathy Wilkerson's (Audrey Logan's daughter's) book Flying Close to the Sun, all about her rebellion from the middle-class values and wealth of her parents and class, and her involvement in radical anti-Vietnam War movements like SDS and eventually Weathermen, ending in the explosion of homemade bombs destroying the Wilkerson home in Greenwich Village and killing three of her companions there. To read this in the ostentatious wealth of South Salem is indeed strangely disconcerting. Chrysanthi and I walked in the neighborhood this afternoon, viewing one oversized mansion after another. . . . Christina is psychologically very maladjusted, it now seems—always angry and non-communicative. It's interesting that Sophia, earlier a mess, is now apparently quite OK whereas Christina, earlier OK, is now a mess. What a shame! Last night at supper she sat with her head down on the table, repeatedly commanded by Greg to "sit properly." It's painful to watch. . . . Greg is involving himself in various environmental initiatives but always as a consultant or board member, not "buying in." He also is thinking of running a training institute for young tennis players. . . . Vetted Dennis Carroll's "Prologue" to a book of vituperation against America's obsession with victory. Strong but, as always with Dennis, too long. . . . Did I mention here the lovely review of my volume 2 by Don Dombrowski, full-page, calling the work "magisterial"?

Arrived late: midnight our time, 10:00 p.m. their time. Paul is with Peter and Alice for the weekend. Alice in good spirits. No hair owing to chemotherapy. Her cancer, she told us, is incurable, because spread throughout the body, but in about 90% of cases it goes into remission after treatment. She's been very bad on certain days and fine on other days. Once, she fell on the way to the toilet during the night and was too weak to get up. So, we'll see what will happen with her lymphoma in the next four or five months, when the chemo treatment is meant to end. . . . Read Dennis Carroll's extended essay about Americans' obsession with victory. It's brilliant, the best thing he has written. I'm going to send him a lengthy commentary. He writes movingly about his father, Admiral Carroll, and scathingly about Leon Black.

Tempe

Played Dello Joio with Alice, who finds the piano difficult because of her illness. But she likes the piece. Paul is here through lunch. Lots of good talk about his teaching on the Indian reservation. In the afternoon, went to the Phoenix Botanical Gardens with Peter and Alice. Marvelous cactuses of all kinds beautifully displayed. The miracle of adoption to a dry, hot environment. I then took everyone out to dinner at a good Italian restaurant. Alice today had her very best day, as though nothing was wrong.

Tempe–Santa Barbara

To a bird sanctuary with Peter and Alice. Large egrets and blue herons. Xeriscape vegetation. Very open and quiet. In the afternoon, Peter took us to Arizona State University, his office, etc. 60,000 students, a whole city in itself. Alice in good form today, too. She has her fourth chemo soon. Total is meant to be eight. Previous treatments caused great trauma, including hysteria. But her white blood cell count is now much lower—a good sign. . . . Flew to Santa Barbara. Daphne and Greg live in a former estate built in 1916, called Villa Rosa to remember a manor house near Lake Como. Truly baronial. Huge rooms, too many. A wine cellar at 58 degrees Fahrenheit, a guesthouse where we are housed, immense patio, swimming pool, two Jacuzzis, one outdoors, one indoors, majestic oak trees, fountains, statuary, etc., etc. Three hugely expensive automobiles, a cleaning lady, a gardener, someone washing the cars.

Montecito

Drove to Peter's school, run by the Episcopal Church. Young mothers all in jeans, blond hair. Then to the beach: surfers, gorgeous beach-front homes, oak trees, eucalyptuses, bougainvilleas. To the village stores. Orchids for sale. A ride part way up the mountainside. Then further up to Christina's school. . . . Trying to respond to Dennis Carroll. Also to put Katy Fleming's corrections into my vetted March 3 papers, before sending them to Peter Allen for JMGS.

Wednesday, January 16, 2008

We drove over the mountains to Los Olivos to visit the Firestone Vineyard. First, wine tasting, 5 or 6 varieties, each explained by an employee. I particularly liked the 2004 Syrah Estate. Then a full tour of the facility: vineyard, process of squashing the grapes, process of fermentation, oaken barrels for maturation. Then to Beckmen Vineyards, much smaller, for another round of tasting. Then lunch in a village looking like a movie set for a John Wayne western. On the way back, drove along the beautiful Santa Barbara waterfront and harbor and the famous wharf. Palm trees, green grass, volleyball courts, tennis, lots of bicycling. . . . I'm reading over my February 6 lecture on Οδύσεια.

Saturday, January 19, 2008

To the University of California, Santa Barbara (UCSB) to "Reef," a demonstration of sea life on the Santa Barbara reef. We were special guests of the director, who had us handle sea urchins, starfish, a baby octopus, and see small sharks, shark eggs, and other fascinating creatures. Picked up Christina, who had "slept" overnight at a school friend's and was, happily, not as solemnly offensive as usual. Maybe lack of sleep helps her. Peter had a tantrum screaming at Daphne "I hate you" and hitting her. Andrew, as always, the angel of the troop. Christina is a terrible mess; we haven't exchanged three consecutive words all week. She answers in monosyllabic sentences: "Yes," "No," "Nothing," and the like. Disappears as soon as she returns home or dinner is over. Interestingly, Leander's Sophia, who started as a problem, now seems fine. The reverse is true for Christina, alas.

Sunday, January 20, 2008

Drove Greg's BMW to central Santa Barbara to attend Quaker Meeting: small, entirely silent, very friendly. Older people but also young couples with children, and a man next to me reading a Pendle Hill pamphlet by George Peck. . . . In the afternoon we all went to the painting and handicraft exhibit on the grass along the seafront. Most interesting, at the start of the Stearns Wharf, was an "installation" by Veterans for Peace: 3000+ grave-markers for those killed in Iraq, plus an indication of the number of Americans wounded and the number of Iraqis killed and wounded. . . . Last night on TV, a moving special on the life of Martin Luther King, whose birthday is celebrated tomorrow. Christina has a friend with her and is much less morose now, at least with the friend. . . . Watching lots of very exciting tennis: the Australian Open. Out for supper at a Mexican restaurant.

Monday, January 21, 2008

Working on the JMGS issue doing our March 3rd symposium, integrating Katy Fleming's vettings into my own. . . . Off to Sea World on the Wharf, very good for children (and adults), amazing to see an octopus up close, and jellyfish propelling themselves. . . . Watched Andrew's tennis clinic, a dozen nine-year-olds actually hitting the ball and racing around the court. Lucky children! . . . Supper in a fancy hotel with Oran Young and his wife Gail. I wanted them to meet Greg because Oran is head of the Bren School at UCSB, doing graduate degrees in environmental science, and his wife is an environmental lawyer. Lastly, watched the Democratic debate: Obama, Hillary, and Edwards. Hillary and Obama punching each other disgracefully. Edwards speaking more to the issues.

Tuesday, January 22, 2008

Finally saw the other side of Santa Barbara. Went with Daphne to Storyteller, where she hopes to volunteer. It's a school for deprived children aged eighteen months through five years, mostly Hispanics from non-functional families and/or harmed in the womb by mother's drug-taking. They stay from morning until 5:00 p.m., for free. Biog grant from the owners of Kinkos. All the teachers are bilingual in Spanish. All signs are in both English and Spanish. We got a full tour by the director and a member fo the Advisory Board. I'll send them a contribution. I was told that the population of Santa Barbara is mostly of the very rich and trhe very poor, with those in between needing to live 20 miles away and commute to work. . . . Nice lunch in Montecito afterwards, with the very rich. . . . 4:00 p.m. tea with the immediate neighbors, who invited us as well as the children. The husband is a good amateur photographer. The redwoods he planted about 30 years ago are now huge. Oprah Winfrey's property adjoins theirs and is somewhat visible.

Wednesday, January 23, 2008

Heavy rain. Cold. Working on "Science and Faith" for my Kendal Interfaith Gathering in March. Also finished vetting, again, Galanopoulos's impossible essay. . . . Dinner at a good Italian restaurant; Then to a huge theater on State Street to hear Pinchas Zukerman play the Bruch violin concerto and conduct Beethoven's 5th, both magnificently. Huge theater full and appreciative.

Thursday, January 24, 2008

Visited Andrew's school, where the lunchtables, etc. are outdoors (although today it is raining). Children all in recess outdoors. When the bell rang, they all reentered classrooms instantaneously. Huge computer lab, with the newest Apple computers. Full library. Lucky kids! . . . Lucia came at 11:30, to take Chrysanthi out to lunch. She has markedly aged since we last saw her. Greg and I met Brock Brower in town for a long talkative lunch. Brock seems to know everyone, including several people that he hopes to introduce to Greg. He told, at length, about huge difficulties regarding 200,000 acres of forest. He's just finished a novel set in Norwich and involving the Norwich Inn (renamed) and Sally. . . . Greg's former boss at Goldman in London is now living in Santa Barbara. He came to say hello. Amazingly, they've been to North Creek and know David Moro and Jackie. . . . Warm goodbyes to Peter and Andrew and Daphne. Christina says that she'll be up at 5:00 a.m. tomorrow and will drive with us and Greg to the airport. We'll see. . . . Just about finished my sermon on Science and Religion for Kendal in March.

Saturday, January 26, 2008

Cambridge

Overnight at Friends Center. Marvelous production of Frayn's «Copenhagen» at the A.R.T. with Will LeBow as Bohr. So moving and at the same time so intellectual—just what I like. Better than the original production we saw in England in 1998. And useful, a bit, for my Science and Religion sermon.

February 1, 2008

Pendle Hill

At one gathering in the evening I told the other trustees about my Science and Religion ideas. Lindelee thinks it really does apply to Quakerism. I should write to John Punshon and ask, and then perhaps enlarge the current text to become a Pendle Hill pamphlet.

Saturday, February 2, 2008

Meetings all day and evening. Very pleasant, cooperative board now. Hal Weaver is gone, thankfully, and Laurie as director is much more genuine than Steve Baumgartner, who bludgeoned us into supporting all his crazy ideas. I'll serve on the Education Committee. We should add literature and social justice (activism) as regular courses, like Woodbrooke. I spoke with a man here for a year completing a five-volume (!) history of poetry and autobiography. Who will read it is the question. Practiced on my Yamaha, which continues to be lovely.

Sunday, February 3, 2008

We finished with lunch. Mike Heller, Gaye from Haverford, and I will try to get college students to intern at Pendle Hill. . . . Drove out to Longwood Gardens, beautiful as always. Special emphasis now on orchids. . . . Pendle Hill library has an interlinear Greek-English New Testament. I photocopied the Gospel of John to begin studying it, and found that the Greek is almost modern and quite comprehensible most of the time. . . . It's very nice to be here again; one's life is stretched. Rebecca Mays will be teaching here in the summer. I telephoned her and found her daughter Anna, who was very ebullient, but so far I haven't found Rebecca at home. . . . Tried Dello Joio with Sara, a cook here, but she couldn't sight-read well enough to do much. Played solo for an hour afterwards on the lovely Yamaha.

Monday, February 4, 2008

Attended Marcella Martin's class on prayer, very intense and informative. We practiced mantras tied to breathing. I did Δόξα σοι ο Θεός, which coordinated well. She taught about icons and light, so I was able to contribute a little. By lunchtime I was very hungry. This must be "active learning." . . . Went to potluck supper at Chester Meeting to meet the group walking from Boston to Washington in the cause of peace. Leader: an American woman who is a Buddhist nun—hair shaven off, yellow robe. Another American. The rest Japanese. They sang a mantra for us that they use while walking, complete with drums. Showed a CD film about leukemia in Iraqi children caused by our explosives using “depleted uranium,” which also injures the American soldiers who handle these materials, not knowing. I suggested letters to the Times, ideally written by Nobel laureates, whom we might be able to find with the help of Cambridge Meeting. The problem is that depleted uranium is hush-hush. One of the Chester group sang protest songs with guitar, quite well. Another world: men with long hair and pigtails. . . . At the supper, Janet Shepherd was present. Nice to catch up with her regarding Pendle Hill.

February 5, 2008

Leander's

To D.C. by train. Leander picked us up at Rockville and we went to the community center where Nicholas was having his weekly lesson in basketball. The teacher is a former professional and he thinks the world of Nicholas, who really is remarkable, learning to dribble all different ways (sometimes with two balls at once), to do lay-ups and reverse lay-ups, to shoot from the three-point line (he can get the ball all the way and often makes a clean basket). Also: running sideways. Then we met Deanna and Sophia and had a feast in Legal Sea Foods. Watched TV to see the results of the super-Tuesday elections, but it was too early for California.

February 6, 2008

Cosmos Club and Georgetown

My talk on Kazantzakis's Odyssey apparently went very well, judging from lots of comments afterwards. Nice to see Jim and Penelope Alatis there, and especially Deb Tannen, who wants to meet for supper with Chrysanthi and Michael Macovsky when we're next in town. Dennis Carroll came but rushed off afterwards to visit his mother, who's in hospital and very ill. Jim and Marge Warren came, Jim looking considerably older; he's 80. My co-hosts couldn't have been nicer. And there was a woman who wants to organize a remembrance of Kimon Friar. I promised to cooperate. Afterwards, supper at McLean, Virginia. I had μύμ μπάλντι. Lots of talk with my co-host, young and attractive. Back to the Cosmos Club at 12:30 a.m.

February 7, 2008

Jim Warren came at 10:30 and we talked non-stop until 12:30 about the Marshall Plan, Nick Burns, Brady Kiesling, the Iraq catastrophe, State Department teaching of Greek, Psacopoulos, cherry blossoms, dogwood. He promised to show us spectacular dogwood if we come in the spring. . . . Checking out, I passed Hank Paulson, who was with a group going in for lunch. But by the time I turned around with intent to speak to him, he had disappeared into the dining room. Too bad. I would have opened with, “I’m Peter Bien, Professor of English, Dartmouth College, and father-in-law of Gregory Tebbe.” It would have been interesting to hear his reaction.

February 8, 2008

“I am a practicing Christian but not a believing Christian. To me, to worship God means to recognize that mind and intelligence are woven into the fabric of our universe in a way that altogether surpasses our comprehension.” —Freeman Dyson, reviewing John Polkinghorne’s The God of Hope and the End of the World (The New York Review of Books, vol. 49, no. 5, March 28, 2002, page 6).

February 12, 2008

An extraordinary concert by Sally Pinkas and Evan Hirsch, two pianos and percussion for Bartok’s sonata. But the highlight for me was the Brahms “Variations on a Theme by Haydn,” which can be all fire and brimstone at one moment and then immediately peaches and cream at the next. They also did Milhaud’s “Le creation du monde,” very jazzy owing to Milhaud’s experiences in Harlem

February 21, 2008

Pendle Hill

Just finished a four-day course taught by Chris Ravndal on the Gospel of John. Very well done both because of his good spirit and a diverse, stimulating group of students. And how nice for me to be simply a student, without the worries and apprehensions of the teacher! Part of the pleasure came from reading a lot of the text in the κοινή Greek and discovering that I really can do this. John’s Gospel, at least, is easy. The Greek is almost modern. 90% of the words are the same. The differences in grammar—datives, for example—don’t bother me because of my acquaintance with katharévousa not to mention the study I did of κοινή at Selly Oak Colleges and my rudimentary study of ancient Greek with L. A. Post at Haverford and then Prof. Kitto at Bristol. What I discovered in this course was that even I, a Quaker universalist, liberal, and skeptic, can find Biblical study engrossing. And I appreciated the literary skill of the author(s) of John. What stood out for me was the repeated contrast between a physical manifestation and the creative spirit behind it. This begins in the Prologue with the difficult term ο λόγος. Yes, it is the “Word,” but more importantly the creative power that produces words. Jesus, each time he performed a miracle, gave a sign (σημείο), showing that the spirit behind the material accomplishment was what mattered. Very Quakerly: compare our replacement of the physical, material aspects of the sacraments with the spiritual meaning behind them. We had lots of fun with Pilate’s “What is truth”? Students included Ann, who raises llamas; Barbara, thirty years a Methodist pastor but recently dismissed by her bishop; another Barbara: a Unitarian pastor; a black lady, Sharon Knox, with a huge laugh, who spoke of her slave great-grandmother; an ex-Roman Catholic now drawn to Buddhism; Lauri’s husband; a man from Missouri; the current Friend in Residence, Marian Fuson, remarkably agile in mind at age 87; and some Pendle Hill staff and students. . . . I treated everyone to baklava tonight. For lunch today, Maria Χναράκη, who teaches at Drexel, came and we talked in Greek about Kazantzakis’s theater. She’s interested in Kalomoiris’s Πρωτομάστορας especially.

February 23, 2008

Cambridge

An interesting modern-dress production of Julius Caesar at the A.R.T., complete with a jazz trio doing the musical interludes. I missed Shakespeare’s transcendent language.

February 24, 2008

Hartford

Went to Hartford Quaker Meeting in the morning. Some good ministry about the spirit behind words. I thought of course of John’s Λόγος. A man remembered my name from Haverford. Then to the Mark Twain house, very grand. He made lots of money by marrying well, and then of course from royalties, until he lost it all in a bad investment. He regained it and paid off his debts thanks to a worldwide lecture tour. . . . Then to the Harriet Beecher Stowe house, much more modest. We must read Uncle Tom’s Cabin again to see how it stands up. In 1852 it was a worldwide sensation and very responsible for the attitudes that made civil war essential. Then to Park to Park Street Playhouse in West Hartford to see Gail Schoppert in a play about a millionaire who recognizes no right or wrong, only “I can, I must.” Well acted, compelling performance. David and Patti Buck came also, and we dined together and then saw them at the Schopperts' house afterwards. They think I should continue to press for a Kendal in Greece. Perhaps I could interest Charlotte Armstrong. Others were there from various international schools in Beirut, etc.

New York City

Rode down with a Kendal group by bus all the way. Looked for 8-hand music at Patelson's. Nothing. Attended Paul Taylor ballet at the City Center. Delicious, especially his "classic" Aureole (Handel) followed by the hilarious spoof "Troilus & Cressida (reduced) to Ponchielli's Dance of the Hours, full of sequences about dancers who supposedly cannot dance. "Counterswarm" to electronic music by Ligeti was harder to take but the final number, "Arden Court" (Wm. Boyce) was pleasantly traditional. Marvelous dancers, many of whom performed in two or even three of the evening's ballets. I bought a CD-ROM so that Chrysanthi could see something of what she missed.

Thursday, March 6, 2008

Began by translating, for the Secondary Committee, the new rules for technical education, sent me by Bill McGrew in Greek. Yesterday, on the bus, worked on Maria Zarimi's failed proposal for a fellowship in Australia to turn her "Darwin and Literature" thesis into a book. As in her thesis, which I vetted in Crete, her English here was so bad that it's no wonder the committee said No. . . . The only member of the Secondary Committee present was Manita. But lots of visitors attended. I wrote up the minutes afterwards, then went to Strategic Planning and fell asleep during most of it. Walked back with John Crunkilton, stopped at the Empire State Building to see the lobby, with its plaque indicating Al Smith as president, and then visited the 42nd Street Library: special exhibit on Kerouac showing his scroll of On the Road, and a small exhibit celebrating John Milton's 400th with some first editions. This city is very stimulating! Then to cocktails at Sheila Baird's. Long talk with Gail about expatriation, thinking of course of Alec. Joann Ryding, while speaking to me, sank to the ground—fainted. We took her into the bedroom and seated her, whereupon another attack ensued—lack of breathing. Then better but very pale. Called 911. Ambulance came in 10 minutes. Examination showed her heart OK but variable blood pressure, and she went off to hospital with Bill McGrew in attendance. Bill Tsoucalis invited me to accompany him and his wife and Jud to a Japanese restaurant where we had a leisurely supper with much good conversation about academia, Democratic politics, faculty salaries, and the like.

Friday, March 7, 2008

We met on Exchange Place, next to Wall Street, in the conference room of a foundation. I attended Finance Committee for the first time and listened to the presentation by two officers of the Bristol Company that manages our investments. They do it on the long-term basis, avoiding big swings because of market fluctuation. Not a very good speaker, but the financial results are OK. Then Higher Education Committee. Everyone is committed to keeping Perrotis largely a residential campus, which will mean building a new dormitory or some equivalent. Charlotte told me, regarding a Kendal on Farm School land, that I'd have to produce a feasibility study. But how? I also attended the Farm Committee to hear the latest about our cows and poultry and the land, which is still not purchased although we should be able to close the deal soon. Then back to the Yale Club for a break. Then back to Exchange Place. Bus to DeKalb Avenue in Brooklyn to Vince's favorite restaurant. Lots of wine and good cheer, toasts to Phil Foote, the retiring chairman. I told the story of the man I met in Sydney who was expelled from the School by Bruce for leading a student revolt and who told me that Mr. Foote was the only one who defended him and argued against expulsion. I sat between Daisy Pappou and Barbara Heming, convincing Barbara that a CCRC is not such a bad thing. Back to the Yale Club via the same bus, at 11:30 p.m.

Saturday, March 8, 2008

Down to Wall Street early. I walked to Bowling Green. The lovely Customs House is en face and the water is visible. Old Dutch New Amsterdam plus huge skyscrapers. AFS full board from 9:00 to 1:00 without a break. Charlotte Armstrong now in the chair. I of course gave my Secondary Committee report and answered questions as best I could. No major changes noted except perhaps to cancel the June meeting (good!). We'll meet next in Greece in October. . . . Got to Beaumont Theater to be informed that South Pacific lasts until 5:00. (Our group thought 4:00.) But I've got TLS's to read and Brittles' new novel. Bought manouri cheese in Grand Central market; they're carrying it again after several years when they had only kasseri. . . . Met the Dartmouth group at the Beaumont Theater, Lincoln Center. Bus to Kendal on Hudson, where Gay Berger was waiting for me. She proudly showed me her apartment on the third floor, with full view of the Hudson River at its widest, with the Tappan Zee Bridge visible on the left. Lovely. But the apartment seemed cramped and small. Ours at Kendal is much better. Nice to see Horst again. We then ate in their “café” downstairs. Nothing special. Met a Greek-American lady who lives there and serves on Pendle Hill’s general board. Gay says she’s appalled that Rebecca Mays will be teaching again at Pendle Hill. I told her about Rebecca’s “inability” to return my telephone call. Par for the course. Back home at 1:30 a.m. and we had to advance the clocks for daylight savings, which made it 2:30 a.m.

March 12, 2008

Long lunch with Mats (Matthew Lemberger), who is trying to plan his life. Law school? Comparative literature? Another B.A. at Oxford? I’m putting him in touch with Bob Donin about law and Dan Dombrowski about studying philosophy and especially Spinoza and Leibnitz. Also contacted Oliver Goodenough about Vermont Law School, but he didn’t answer.

March 14, 2008

Don Connolly did our taxes, since poor Frank Currier has cancer of the esophagus. Lots to pay this year, over $20,000, but gross income was well over $200,000.

March 16, 2008

I spoke at today’s Interfaith Gathering on Science and Religion, highlighting Don Cupitt. Lots of people asked for written copies afterwards.

March 27, 2008

Chrysanthi had a freak accident but luckily is OK. Trying to put gas in the car she suddenly was showered by gasoline, which got in her eyes, hair, and saturated her coat. People in the service station called an ambulance and she was well treated in the “poison center” of the emergency room with the eyes flushed out, etc. Luckily she reached me by telephone and I fetched the car, still parked at the station, and brought her home. We were supposed to go to the Kendal dinner-dance that evening. No way. She rested. The entire apartment smelled of gasoline from her clothes. The lucky thing of course is that no one was in the vicinity with a cigarette.

March 28, 2008

Took Chrysanthi to an ophthalmologist at the hospital. He pronounced the eyes unharmed. Later we heard that Charlie Boren, a Kendal resident, had been killed this morning in a car crash occasioned by black ice on the road. I saw him yesterday looking happy and vibrant. This bad luck highlights Chrysanthi's good luck, of course. . . . Bob Fagles died of prostate cancer, age 74. . . . I discovered the actual contract awarded me by Princeton University Press for the Kazantzakis letters, plus all the relevant correspondence, including Mrs. Kazantzakis's permission statement. Will send this now to Hanne Winarsky at the Press with hopes that we can bypass Patroclos Stavrou.

March 29, 2008

Read the remarkable following passage by Walter Benjamin, from the Prologue to his "The Origin of German Tragic Drama" (in TLS 21 March 2008, p. 14): "In empirical perception, in which words have become fragmented, they possess in addition to their more or less hidden, symbolic aspect an obvious profane meaning. It is the task of the philosopher to restore, by representation, the primacy of the symbolic character of the word, in which the idea is given in self-consciousness, and that is the opposite of all outwardly-directed communication. Since philosophy may not presume to speak in the tones of revelation, this can only be achieved by recalling in memory the primordial form of perception. . . . Ultimately, this is not the attitude of Plato, but the attitude of Adam, the father of the human race and the father of philosophy. . . . Ideas displayed, without intention, in the act of naming, must be renewed in philosophical contemplation."

April 9, 2008

Finished translating (first draft, of course) all letters from 1902 to 1957. The last was four pages of scrawl to Stavridakis. I enlarged it to double size and worked with Chrysanthi to try to decipher lots of illegible words. What remains now are the new letters to Elli Lambridi, to Papastefhanou, and to Martinu. Of course the major problem remains Patroclos Stavrou. Is he going to be friendly and supportive or, as usual, paranoiac? I've approached Hanne Winarsky at Princeton about the contract I received twenty years ago.

April 17, 2008

Washington

To Leander's yesterday via AMTRAK. Today met Dennis Carroll for lunch after walking a bit in beautiful downtown DC, now filled with tulips and blossoming trees. Dennis is adjusting to retirement. Still unpublished. I suggested a book based on his work in the General Accounting Office (GAO) but he felt he was never high enough to know what really was going on. Afterwards to the Phillips Collection's special exhibit of more recent acquisitions, including a Benton, the museum's first. They also have a Raphael Soyer and a beautiful large Dufy, all painters that my father bought. Nice supper with Leander, Deanna, Nicholas, and Chrysanthi (Sophia is away on a school trip) in a restaurant with very authentic Adirondack décor. Leander corrected my trills in the Bach fugette. I started to practice the Alan Walker songs again plus our next 8-hand piece, the Thief of Baghdad overture, very simplistic, especially compared to the amazing first movement of the Trout Quintet, which we did in the Health Center last Saturday, without too many gaffes. Last Monday War and Peace Studies held its first University Seminar in a new series arranged by me, with Ken Yalowitz presenting very interestingly on how he helped prevent the Russians from invading Georgia during their war in Chechnya. Old friends attended, like Graham Wallis. . . . Read Bowen's book on boards of trustees, sent to all AFS trustees by Mike Keeley. Lots of good and necessary ideas.

April 18, 2008

Pendle Hill

Arrived just in time for the Education Committee. Nice to see Vince Buscemi again. Teachers have lots of plans to revitalize the Resident Program. I warned that possibly nothing will be done, as happened frequently in the past, or that too much will be attempted, as happened with Steve Baumgartner. . . . Jack Hunter has been elevated to Executive Board, which is nice.

April 19, 2008

At Meeting afterwards, when the Steve Cary Lecture was announced, I got up and explained how we produced the book, with Jack Coleman's intervention, the financial help, and the decision to include photos and Steve's essays. In the evening, just before George Lakey's Cary lecture, with the family present, and also one of the donors, I was asked to repeat this story. Lakey spoke with lots of energy about nonviolent ways to counteract terrorism. . . . Lots of talk at meals with Alec's friend Max Carter. And I drove to Route 3 to buy baklava for tomorrow, and indulged myself at Macy's: new shorts for the farm. Also finished reading Lewin fellowship applications and made a selection of four for the shortlist to interview.

April 20, 2008

Difficult session on finance, although I sweetened everyone with baklava. Once again we will exceed the budgeted deficit and approach $500,000. Several of us argued that this is unacceptable and that Lauri will need to reduce the size of the staff. She seemed to agree, reluctantly. . . . Lots of talk with Tony Manousos, who hopes to write a biography of Howard and Anna Brinton. And had a nice talk with John Cary, who looks amazingly young. All signs are that Haverford is trying to be more Quakerly, although, or perhaps because, all the top leadership is now Jewish.

April 21, 2008

Telephoned Tom Wilson to ask how the Binswanger Interfaith Gathering went yesterday. He said it was fine, although the audience was smaller than usual. All the regulars came, however. Robert B. apparently has visual problems and had to read from large-type print. He and Penny are seeing Lisa Tuesday about an apartment. . . . Met Chrysanthi in the Business Class wagon from Washington to return together to Springfield and Hanover.

April 24, 2008

A visit from Andreas and Jane Drakonakis, our Rethymno friends. I showed them Dartmouth, had supper together at Kendal, listened to Hannah Putnam on owls and hawks (with live examples) in the Gathering room, did the Kendal tour. Lots of good talk.

April 25, 2008

Long breakfast with Andreas and Jane with more good talk with Andreas who, like many physicians, has a vivid interest in philosophy and literature. In the evening, to Newport for the Επιτάφιος service, bringing Andrew Klein and Despoina. Very moving service nicely amalgamating Greek and English.

April 26, 2008

Practiced my two Goldberg variations on the harpsichord and then rehearsed Dello Joio with Joan Wilson. Saw Robert Binswanger yesterday. He's measuring all dimensions of the apartment offered them in Brinton, which he first thought to reject but is now reconsidering. . . . In the afternoon, "Daughter of the Regiment" in a Met broadcast in Loew Theater. It was my first opera, with my uncle Bill Schweitzer in top hat. Lily Pons starred. We went backstage afterwards to congratulate her.

April 27, 2008

At our Early Music Concert, I played Goldberg Variations 19 and 10. Nervous, but not too much.; Sop, no really serious mistakes. Then to the Rassias for Easter lamb dinner with Athos and family and Helene and family. Athos, I learned, is now a Hanover Selectman.

May 16, 2008

Terpni

To the farm. Turned on the water and found it all gushing out of a broken pipe in the "basement" under the bathroom. Called various plumbers. Then, luckily, Earl Millington drove in one his new four-wheeler (baby will come by Caesarian on June 4) and said he could fix it. So we raced down to Murphy's before 5:00 p.m. closing and secured the new part, a 90-degree corner plus a drain (much needed apparently). Earl did a beautiful job with propane torch, flux, and solder. . . . Good to see no large trees down, although a branch crashed again into the garden fence. Started the tractor easily but couldn't start the White: weak battery and I don't have a 6-volt charger (actually this was a mistake; the battery is 12-volt). The office looks good. Alec's house is fine, also Leander's. Earl says that the gate really helped.

May 18, 2008

Mary MacCracken's Interfaith Gathering, the last of this season. Next season is all full. . . . Then Rachel Walker came with the soprano, Betsy Brigham, and we went through all the Walker songs, making lots of mistakes despite all my practice. We'll perform next Sunday, but probably not all of them.

May 23, 2008

Stanton Burton's trio performed in our Webster series. Piano–oboe–bassoon. He had included Ligeti on the program but changed his mind. I had prepared some introductory remarks about Ligeti, about the piece for 100 metronomes, for examples. So Stanton said, yes, say them, and I'll give just a few samples on the piano with some explanation. Then they played Beethoven, Previn, and Poulenc, with me turning Stanton's pages and therefore really appreciating the skill and artistry of a very talented pianist.

May 24, 2008

To the Museum of Fine Art in Boston for its splendid El Greco exhibit, with stunning paintings: a Saint Jerome, an Annunciation, Laocoön, and a marvelous portrait of a Spanish poet. Then to the A.R.T. for "Cardenia," a sort of Shakespearian spoof, very alive and clever, good entertainment but nothing more.

May 25, 2008

Rachel Walker and Betsy Brigham here all day to record the Walker songs, with Ralph Mayer the engineer. We did all the Noda songs in the morning and all the R. L. Stevenson ones in the afternoon plus one by Getty Gilson. Ralph had me play very softly, but the piano sounded just right on the played-back recordings. We'll do the remaining songs sometime this summer. It was fun to play the lovely Yamaha C-3 in the Gathering Room.

Sent this to Lauri Perman after trustees approved the budget with a $350,000 deficit necessitating job cuts:

Dear Lauri,

I felt, and I believe that all the trustees felt, that your plan for amelioration is both sensible and do-able, although of course painful—also that it is entirely consistent with trustees' wishes. So, brava!

I've been reading about a new book called "Out of Eden" whose opening sentence is "Evil makes us Human"! The author continues: "No life ever realizes its full potential; no state policies or actions are a full realization of a state's sovereignty; no work of art is adequate to the artist's full aesthetic vision. . . . The problem of evil has to do with the problem of a finite will that seeks to realize an infinite meaning.”

Obviously, this applies to Pendle Hill. We all have a vision of PH that I suppose may be called “infinite.” But the nature of human life legislates that the infinite cannot be achieved. Yes, evil makes us human. In dealing with this, the author continues, Christianity teaches us to use love and self-sacrifice. Your salary reduction is a beautiful indication of self-sacrifice, as will be, I hope and trust, the salary reductions of several others. The love in your approach to those who must relinquish their jobs will be another “human” response to the inevitability of non-infinity. Maybe it’s all summed up in the story of Adam and Eve. When Eve ruins everything, Adam, although at first angry and self-righteous, comes to realize his own involvement in non-infinity (i.e., in not being God), and this unites these two. As they are expelled from Paradise, they go “hand in hand” to live like true human beings in a world in which evil makes them human. Let’s think of Pendle Hill now as “Paradise lost,” which really means “humanity gained.”

June 5, 2008

All set to go to Kinhaven to play Dello Joio with Alice but she got sick again (herniated disk) and had to cancel, so I stayed home. Discovered this extraordinary poem by accident:

THE TOWER (excerpts)

William Butler Yeats

WHAT shall I do with this absurdity—
o heart, O troubled heart—this caricature,
Decrepit age that has been tied to me
As to a dog’s tail?

It seems that I must bid the Muse go pack,
Choose Plato and Plotinus for a friend
Until imagination, ear and eye,
Can be content with argument and deal
In abstract things; or be derided by
A sort of battered kettle at the heel.

It is time that I wrote my will;
I choose upstanding men

That climb the streams until
 The fountain leap, and at dawn
 Drop their cast at the side
 Of dripping stone; I declare
 They shall inherit my pride,
 The pride of people that were Bound neither to Cause nor to State.

I leave both faith and pride
 To young upstanding men
 Climbing the mountain-side,
 That under bursting dawn
 They may drop a fly;
 Being of that metal made
 Till it was broken by
 This sedentary trade.

Now shall I make my soul,
 Compelling it to study
 In a learned school
 Till the wreck of body,
 Slow decay of blood,
 Testy delirium
 Or dull decrepitude,
 Or what worse evil come—
 The death of friends, or death
 Of every brilliant eye
 That made a catch in the breath—
 Seem but the clouds of the sky
 When the horizon fades;
 Or a bird's sleepy cry
 Among the deepening shades.

Andover

To the Wyndham Hotel, where we met Alec and family. They arrive from Bangkok yesterday and came here to attend Rachel Bolton's Bat Mitzvah, as did we. This was in a large restaurant installed in a former mill building in Lawrence. A long, disparate ceremony very ineffective although there were some nice moments. Rachel's talk was incomprehensible because of bad diction; most of the other talks were incomprehensible because of bad (or no) microphone. But Clive spoke beautifully and audibly, the only one to do so. Alice broke down in tears and couldn't continue. Lots of Hebrew: Baruch Adonai ad infinitum (and ad nauseam). But nice to see all the Buseck children and the Ecksteins (he is McCain's personal physician). Alice alas has a recurrence, or continuation, of the lymphatic cancer contrary to previous news that she was in total remission. She is much diminished, but still brave and cheerful. They to to a cancer center in Tucson next week for a second opinion. Fun to be with Alec, Monica, Theo, and Elena. Many children considerably taller.

June 29, 2008

We all drove back to the farm. Alec got his water operating perfectly but couldn't start the Jeep. I did more mowing in the south field. Supper together marred by Theo screaming at Elena and Elena in tears. But this was smoothed over fairly well.

July 9, 2008

Finished mowing. Και του χρόνου! But at age 78, how many more years will this be possible? Ten? Unlikely. Five? Perhaps. . . . Ballet last night, all Jerome Robbins. Afternoon of a Faun delicious. Also Glass Pieces, although I don't like the music. The rest, nothing memorable. . . . Alec, with Pinky O'Dell's help, is building a pole barn, 16' × 24'. Nice to see this happening. There'll be a 2nd floor for storage, much needed. The ground floor will house Jeep and Pathfinder.

July 12, 2008

Ballet matinee with Alec and family. Prodigal Son performed better than I ever remember, with an exciting lead, Daniel Ulbricht, and a seductive Siren.

July 15, 2008

Pinky O'Dell and Adam were here for four hours to put up the trusses on Alec's new pole barn. I helped, nailing the floor for the second storey. Marvelous workers, all jokes and good humor, and of course skill.

July 16, 2008

Lovely evening at ballet preceded by supper in Saratoga with Don and Maria Kurka and Jane ? from North River. Maria is running an on-line course in art history, sitting at her computer. Sixty students. She says that there is lots of individual contact, always of course via computer. Ballet was varied: “Brahms-Schoenberg Quartet” (Balanchine). Lovely and stirring, except I prefer the piano quartet as originally written and not as orchestrated by Schoenberg. Then “Interplay” (Gould/Robbins). Then “River of Light” with interesting music by Charles Wuorinen (4 marimbas or xylophones, etc.), choreography by Peter Martins, the best of his that we’ve seen. Finally a new ballet, “Concerto DSCH,” by Celexei Ratmansky with music by Shostakovich, excellent, very different. A treat, as usual. . . . I have a strange rash that itches. Shingles, maybe?

July 24, 2008

Beautiful ballet again: Balanchine/Stravinsky “Divertimento for Le Baiser de la fée.” Robbins/Prokofiev “Violin Concerto.” Bernstein/Robbins “West Side Story Suite,” that stirring parody of Romeo and Juliet

July 25, 2008

Alec’s barn is advancing. The roll-up door works, thanks to Pinky. Alec and Monica work until 7:30 p.m. The siding is on, the roof, pebbles around the edges. Luckily, the Jeep just fits; it’s the highest vehicle.

July 31, 2008

Daphne and family arrived finally. Christina smiling and in good spirits. We played a vigorous game of ping pong that she won in overtime 24–22. They’re about to sell the McCarthy Road house to the neighbor. No regrets. We’ll salvage various goodies. Alec has already moved the harmonium to his cabin. . . . Frank Currier died, poor man: cancer of the esophagus. Alice Buseck’s lymphatic cancer has returned. Bad news for her. Miraculously, we’re still healthy. . . . Kazantzakis letters a pain. Those around 1926–1932 are filled with mistaken translations and missing words. Did I do these myself? Sometimes I wonder. Much reparation will be needed. But things get better in later years. . . . Greg explained his multiple connections with environmental activities: fisheries, forests. CO<sub>2</sub>. He also hopes to revitalize Santa Barbara’s municipal tennis facility. Tells me that his former Wall Street colleagues are all in a funk. He’s so glad to have escaped this culture of greed.

August 3, 2008

Some of the Kazantzakis letters are really remarkable. Here’s a good definition of liberal theology: “The highest good, I believe, is heroically to contemplate this fruitful, wonderful life and to agree with it. No optimism, no pessimism, no lip biting, just understanding and bearing it.” (Letter to Leah Dunkelblum, November 1932.)

August 23, 2008

Finished second draft of the letters. Βρήκα τον μπελά μου, αλλά αξίζει ο κόπος. Πολύ δουλειά όμως παραμένουν σχόλια, λέξεις που δεν διαβάζονται. Good that I received the Onassis grant, enabling me to spend the entire month of March in Greece.

September 20, 2008

Cambridge

To the A.R.T. for Anna Deavere Smith’s moving one-woman show on “Grace”: about AIDS, holocausts, deficient medical care, and other assorted horrors, beautifully acted. . . . I’m vetting Dennis’s new play on Lawrence vs. Russell, a fascinating project in which he is trying to outdo “Copenhagen.” . . . Working now again on the Prevelakis letters, asking help from Ελένη Κωβαίου for problematic words. . . . Bicycling every day into town, which is refreshing. . . . Played Dello Joio four-hands in the Cary Room with Joan Wilson. Working now on Haydn eight-hands for November performance there. . . . Jim Sharpe left UBS and we’re joining him now in Merrill Lynch, transferring everything and hoping for the best.

September 26, 2008

Heard Bartok’s 2nd string quartet played at the Hop. Such passion, power, anger, frustration! And so much better than the Schumann that followed it, in which the passion struck me as “manufactured,” fake.

September 28, 2008

Saw James McBride’s novel “Miracle at St. Anne’s” in Spike Lee’s film version. So much killing! Horrible. Very good acting, but too long, exhausting. Best scene: where all three armies—American, Nazi, Italian—are praying to the same Jesus. . . . I wrote a short piece on Kazantzakis’s “Darwinian Ethics” for the Melbourne periodical “Etchings.”

September 29, 2008

Senator Mitchell lectured brilliantly at Dartmouth and then about twenty of us had supper with him at the Inn and could ask more questions. I asked whether, if the Israeli-Palestinian problem is ever solved, terrorism will decrease. His answer was an emphatic “No.” He explained that Al-Qaeda was founded in Egypt owing to different problems and is not a reaction only, or even primarily, to the Israeli situation, despite what we hear.

October 5, 2008

The head of Fulbright-Greece asked me to write an account of my three grants. I started by reading my 1987 journal of the time in Greece when we were collecting Kazantzakis letters. Extraordinary how vigorous we were, how many people we met, how many dinner parties we were invited to, how much we collected! In addition, Alec came, and Daphne. I'll need now to look also at the journal pages for the English Fulbright (1958, I think) and the Australian one (1983). Also, I was a very vigorous journalist then, not so now. . . . Lovely dance performance at the Hop: Armitage troupe. Excellent choreography, dancing, and music: Ligeti, Bartok. In the discussion afterward I asked Armitage if Balanchine is passé. "No, indeed," she replied. "we are all in debt to him." . . . I've resolved to read the Aeneid. It's about time. I tried many years ago and was bored. Let's try again. My Fulbright journal reminds me how bored I was by Kazantzakis's Odyssey, which I was reading in Greece in 1987.

October 7, 2008

Long but uneventful trip, including an eight-hour wait in Frankfurt. Farm School placed us in the basement of the home of Θάνοϋ Κασαπίδης, which Chrysanthi found depressing, so we transferred to the Ambassador Hotel in Πλαγιάρι, where others were staying. Buffet in Hastings House. Nice to see Bill McGrew again and fellow trustees.

American Farm School

Café meeting very interesting regarding the so-called "model farm," with a computerized presentation by David Acker illustrating various land possibilities. We still haven't purchased anything, but expectations exist. During the part on LLL, I spoke about Vergos, whom I had talked to earlier: how hurt he was when he was removed from the Perrotis deanship. But LLL is very important, and he has adjusted, realizing, he says, that his devotion and obligations are to the School as a whole rather than to a single entity such as Perrotis. . . . Met the interns, two of whom, of course, are from Dartmouth. We'll share a meal later. Secondary Committee at noon; managed the entire agenda somehow: (1) $600,000 to extend and renovate Massachusetts Hall with new classrooms; (2) fact that the model farm will be of no educational value to the schools—what they need, if we lose the campus animals and birds, is a small “demonstration farm,” a Noah’s arc of three cows, three pigs, three hens; (3) whether the Strategic Plan is being implemented (it is, we learned), including worry about Tasos Apostolidis’s retirement in three or four years; (4) thanks to Moskalaides for the new wing of the boys’ dormitory; (5) thanks to Tasos and staff for excellent recruitment results: 253 students; (6) worry about campus security—narcotics, etc.; (7) student life enhanced by the three new interns. . . . I lunched with Andrew Klein and three students, two of whom spoke English with some fluency (probably because they live in Thessaloniki and had better schooling than village kids). Andrew has a scheme to encourage recycling via a kind of game. Joined later by a student who had been to NYC for a meeting and whose English was much improved there. Andrew says that the instruction here is entirely adequate, but many students show no interest. . . . In the afternoon, I wrote up the minutes and went to Tasos’s office with the items on Massachusetts Hall and the model farm to Pelaghia, who translated my English easily into Greek for Tasos, making good changes and additions. . . . During all this, further news of stock market crashes in the US and around the world. Sheila Baird and others advise: sit tight, don’t panic, don’t sell unless you’re desperate for cash (which I am not). . . . Big dinner party in the Hastings House ground floor suite (where the king and queen stayed). This was for Alik Perroti and her large group of friends. We expect her to announce tomorrow support for the new College dormitory. Moschalaïdis was surrounded at table by two attractive ladies, and seemed very lively.

Higher Education Committee met with David Acker chairing in John’s absence. Need for action required by the new legislation legalizing private tertiary education groups. Hopes for new dormitory if Mrs. Perroti gives the money. Big “Perroti Day” ceremony starting with church service. Father Kyriakos, I learned, has cancer; his voice is much weakened. Vouli was present, also Lena Stefa. Lots of talk about Stylianos. Then we gathered outside of Perrotis College. Talks by Bill McGrew, Don Schofield, then a good student in English, then another student in Greek, then Alik herself, who pledged funding for the new dormitory (!), then Thanos Veremis. Met the Kyrgyzstan student from last year (the boy; the girl left before taking final exams last year) plus two new ones and his cousin and a friend. Limited English but I think we communicated some of the time. I pledged to get two more computers for them. We lunched together pleasantly, outdoors. . . . Evening party at Stavros Constantinidis's house, an annual ritual. Sat with Tasos, Dora, and others. Lots of talk with Dora especially about defects of the university (she's a professor of mathematics), and the advantages (maybe) of private universities.

Full board meeting, interrupted at 10:30 for a celebration honoring Moschahlaïdes for the new boys' dorm, followed by tour and reception. I'd been worrying about Albana because I had no word from her. But during this event my cell phone rang and it was her, just back from Albania seeing her sick mother. We'll meet her early tomorrow and will be the only people at the graduation ceremony for her, as though we were her parents, since her own parents cannot come from Albania. Very sad, but how good it is that we, at least, will be there. . . . The board resumed. Again we have a deficit. Talk about limiting capital expenses. But when in my report I asked for $600,000 to enable us to expand Massachusetts Hall, the board agreed. Phew! Regarding my subsequent item about the Model Farm's irrelevance to the Secondary School, however, there was no real discussion. Too bad. Charlotte Armstrong, the new chairman, was weak; no leadership, no indication of any vision. Her major goal, it seemed, was to finish the full agenda on time. Very discouraging. I had a sinking feeling about the board, although nowhere as bad as under Manny, when things were so evil. But we're lacking now in shared vision, and certainly in leadership. Afterwards, talking with John Cleave, I discovered that he felt the same. And we went back to what happened to poor David Buck, who was crucified by a cabal in the board, unjustly. Another problem was the great secrecy about the presidential search. Are there any candidates? We're not sure. Did the consultant help? Not much. We've spent $200,000 on this with no result. I and others (Frank, for example) stressed that the board should not be presented (as we were with Manny) with a single candidate, to accept or reject, but with at least two candidates. No promises, since they may have only one to present. And it seems that all the candidates so far are Greek, which is problematic unless they were education in the USA. . . . I lunched with the three interns, who explained their involvements. Webb is coaching both the girls' and the boys' soccer teams. All are helping with English. . . . The board went to Souli's ouzeri for late supper, in 40 Εκκλησίες, near our apartment in 1987. Mediocre food, accompanied by two fine instrumentalists (both with a guitar) and singers, both male, whereupon Souli herself began to sing at the top of her voice in a microphone, deafeningly, and shaking her behind and breasts in the intervals before the next verse. Κέφι. She said σ' αγαπώ to poor George Legakis, who is far gone with Alzheimer's and depressed, and he smiled and actually sang along with some of the words. That was nice. Best of all, the farm director, Thanasis Giamoustaris, sat next to me before Souli's deafening songs began, and explained at length, answering my questions, why a model farm would be good to have. He stressed the College's potential involvement rather than the schools' (although the College has not used the Zannas farm) and felt sure that the schools will be able to have their demonstration farm. He also stressed how important the model farm will be to numerous groups of adults who visit (quite apart from LLL). To bed at 1:30 a.m.

An important day. We left the hotel and settled in Cincinnati Hall, thankfully. Talked a bit with Bill McGrew about what I learned from Thanasis last night. Bill says that Thanasis is not capable of very deep understanding of the total situation. Bill must in any case continue with efforts to purchase the land, since this is what the board directed, and the land can always be sold again. Bill also supports only two trustees' meetings a year, saying that each meeting is a huge burden on him and the staff, too much. I fear this because then an executive committee gains strength and can actually usurp the board's power. As always, there are arguments on both sides. . . . Long walk to see μισχάρια και αγελάδες. In the evening, taxi to Anatolia College to meet Albana Fejzo. At the gate, Dick Jackson drove up with his daughter, who'd been at the stables horseback riding, lovely girl, originally from Finland, presumably an adopted daughter. Albana came looking lovely in a black dress from the MBA graduation ceremony. Tea with Dick and lots of conversation about horrible McCain and Sarah Palen. The graduation was in the new auditorium. They sat us in the front row. Greetings by Panos Kanellis, Anatolia's vice-president (who was a candidate for the Farm School presidency and was told on the eve of an interview that he was no longer a candidate!). Address by Yanis Katoulidis, poet/journalist who runs an advertising agency. He spoke well about being humanistic in business. Then Nikos Kourkoumelis, MBA director, citing special awards, announced that Albana was chosen for the MBA award for outstanding service and he asked me to come to the stage and present it, which of course I did with pleasure and then said a few appropriate words to the audience. Dick Jackson afterwards told everyone that Albana had been supported by Info-Quest (where she'll start work on Monday) and by Professor Bien. Nice reception afterwards, everyone very friendly. Then we took Albana back to Cincinnati Hall and sat for an hour or so, hearing about her warm feelings for Perrotis College (as opposed to ACT). The essential difference is the College's residential nature, precisely what I emphasized in the citation I wrote for Mrs. Perrotis. Albana's commute each day to Info-Quest (whose building's glass was all done by Dimitris Yannakos) will take her, happily, through the Farm School and Perrotis. Let's hope that they pay her decently (she's been embarrassed to ask, so far) and utilize her skills. How good it was that the graduation was coordinated with our presence here!

To Καλαμαριά for lunch at a restaurant with George and everyone. But George came first, alone, to Cincinnati Hall and gave Chrysanthi €500 that he asked me to turn into dollar checks, one for Evi, who is starting university, the other for Georgaki, who is starting gymnasium. Silly not to give euros, but apparently the dollar still has some glamour here. At the restaurant, Andreas and Georgaki were there first and I was able to speak well with the boy, who is amazingly mature for a 12+ year old, much more than either Christina or Sophia, whose conversational answers consist of one word only. Then came Andreas's wife with Efthymoula, and finally Dimitris, Tilda, and Evi. Unexpectedly I had a good exchange with Efthymoula about her teachers at university: Kakridis, Politis, Papanoutsos, Kriaras, all the big names. And she and George are old friends of Tsolakis's. Back to school to fight with the antiquated computers here. Discovered that the priest has cancer, bad, lost lots of weight, his voice is weakened, lost one lung via an operation, has refused chemotherapy. Κρίμα! More talk with Tom Thomas about the remote farm and cows. Very difficult decision. Also about candidates, or lack thereof, for the presidency. Then to Tasos's and Dora's to see Tso-lakis—and eat, of course. I was able to show him the four or five letters to Galatea in 1922 that I have already annotated, giving him an idea of my style and the sorts of annotations required. He seemed pleased. His Greek version will be published under the imprint of the Aristotle University. Τους είπα ότι θέλω να γλιτώσω από τον Καζαντζάκη και ίσως να ξαναπάω στα ποιήματα του Στυλιανού Χαρκιανάκη. Tsolakis has a lecture series on Mondays and wants me to give one in March, probably on the letters. He needs to know by Christmas.

Thessaloniki–Iraklio

Up early in order to go to Assembly. Four students, all girls, spoke about the Macedonian struggle, the subject also of an interminable church service at Αγία Σοφία that we saw yesterday on television. It's the 100th anniversary—1908–2008—of the end. Photos of Pavlos Melas, etc. Tasos spoke with passion against the students who set fires in the dorms and asked them to confess to him, in confidence, stressing the importance of fellowship in the school. Then he asked me to speak and I told the 250 gathered students, in Greek of course, what trustees do, especially choose the president. . . . Then to the airport. Chrysanthi will go to stay now in town with Vouli. Forgot to note that after the assembly we audited a mathematics class. Fine teacher, difficult equations that these first-year students seemed able to do well enough. Lots of give and take in the class, which was encouraging. . . . In Iraklio, the Hotel Atrion is fine, except that I haven't been able to make the wireless internet connection (promised) work. They'll send someone to help tomorrow. Walked to Πλατεία Λιονταριών. The fountain is finished, but the Βικελαία Βιβλιοθήκη is still covered in canvas, under renovation for two years or more. Apparently some of it is functioning in Πλατεία Αγίου Ματθαίου, which is a bit far. Luckily I took a look at the exhibit (old books) in the Βασιλική Αγίου Μάρκου and discovered that this Friday there will be a symposium on Βικέλας (who died 100 years ago) with speakers including Alexis Politis, Angeliki Kastrinaki, and Dimitris Tziiovas. So I'll go and say hello to them all. . . . Very bad γύρος again; perhaps they've eliminated fat, for health, and with that goes the taste.

Tuesday, October 14, 2008

Still no luck with the wireless in the room, but it works nicely in the lobby. They'll keep trying later. Went to the Historical Museum. Mrs. Daskalakis expected me, brought out the full collection of letters to Galatea immediately. She'll do xeroxing for me, too. And suggests that I include some in the book as illustrations. I'm improving the translation here and there. Discovered an entire paragraph in the printed version that isn't in the manuscript. Manuscripts help sometimes with dates because the post office stamp is sometimes visible and even (quasi)legible. . . . To Marfinagnatia Bank. I still have 3600 deposited. Stocks rose markedly yesterday and are rising again today, so far, owing to government action worldwide. Mrs. Daskalakis helped remarkably with the illegible words and other queries—for example φιλώ τη δεξιά σας, a common expression for φιλώ το δεξιά σας χέρι, but using the ancient Greek, feminine, χείρ, which is understood. She found some other words also, in a full dictionary of the idioms and dialect of Eastern Crete. . . . I discovered a foreign language bookshop on Χάνδακας and bought something on Heracles for Christina (in English, of course). Ate in a big taverna near the Historical Museum. I went in at 8:00 p.m. Place just about empty. Ενωρίς ακόμα, μπορώ να πάρω κάτι να φάω; Παναγία μου! he answered, and showed me the full menu. I ordered παιδάκια and red wine. He brought an entire bottle. At the end of the (very good) meal I said I thought I was getting a glass, not a bottle. Ωραία, είπε. Θα το κάνουμε ποτήρι. And then he brought me ρακί (to aid digestion) and ρεβανί and παγωτό, on the house.

Wednesday, October 15, 2008

Finished going through the Galatea manuscripts, all of which are being photocopied for me so that I can check in detail. Also went through all the Diamantaras ones, which involved illegible words all of which, with Georgia Katsalaki's help, I deciphered. But most help came from the actual letters as opposed to the photocopies. Alexis Kalokairinos was at the Museum today and we had a long and friendly talk, using the ενικός. He wants me to give my Kazantzakis archive to the Museum, which already has Kazantzakis's office, library, and many letters, etc. They really don't seem to have a good set-up for archives judging from what I've experienced—very limited workspace. But things seem well organized, each (original) letter in a separate cellophane envelope, all in chronological order. It does make sense, I suppose, to have Kazantzakis materials in his birthplace. And I have more faith in the Historical Museum in the long run than in the Kazantzakis Museum in Myrtia. . . . Spoke with Gareth Owens. We'll meet over the weekend. Ate supper in a Vietnamese restaurant. Saw the splendid exhibit on Kazantzakis's travels in the Historical Museum, beautifully and richly done.

Thursday, October 16, 2008

Finished up at the Historical Museum. Supper with Gareth. I explained all the possible placements for my archives—Dartmouth, Princeton, EΛIA, Thessaloniki, Rethymno, Historical Museum, Kazantzakis Museum, each of which has some pluses and just as many minuses. He felt that the archive should be in Greece, not the USA, which of course makes sense. And he finally recommended Thessaloniki (a) because of my association there (teaching, honorary degree), (b) because they seem to have a professional archive department, which certainly the Historical Museum does not although perhaps the Kazantzakis Museum does, but its location is a demerit. Also, if I gave the archive to either of the museums here, the other would feel cheated. With luck I can speak to the librarians at Thessaloniki on October 27, if they are not closed for the October 28 holiday.

Friday, October 17, 2008

Went to the permanent Kazantzakis exhibit at the Historical Museum, which has been expanded usefully. Lots of electronic material added. Next to it is all the horror of the German occupation. . . . Worked on pronouncing my lecture for Rethymno. Spoke to Leventis and Tsaka of the Kazantzakis Museum; they advised me not to come now; it's chaos, with workmen everywhere. It hopes to open on March 1. Tsaka says that they don't have any letters to Eleni; Stavrou has them. And he of course doesn't answer my letters. . . . Ben Petre, whom I met yesterday at the Historical Museum (he does all their translations into English, and very well indeed), sent me his excellent article on the mistranslations of Καπετάν Μιχάλης because not done from the Greek and/or because of changes/deletions imposed by the German publisher. . . . Saw Alexis Politis and Angela Kastrinaki, who came for the two-day symposium on Vikelas. Sadly, Tziovas isn't going to show. Politis lectured interestingly on the actual novel Λουκής Λάρας and the text (non-fictional) on which it as based. At one point he said, Αφήστε τα μεγάλα προβλήματα και απασχολουθήτε με τα μικρά. Well said!

Saturday, October 18, 2008

Breakfast with Alexis Politis and another speaker today, Βασίλης Σαμπατακάκης, who teaches at Lund in Sweden and knows Bo-Lennart and Anita Eklund. He's a great talker. We talked about Mt. Athos, the film of Zorba, etc. . . . Returned to the Βασιλικό of St. Mark's to hear Angela, who spoke well on Vikelas's atheism: Ήταν Χριστιανός που δεν πίστευε στο Θεό. He projected this in his short stories, meant for intellectuals, but not in Λουκής Λάρας, meant for τον κοσμάκη. I told her afterwards about (a) John Milton, liberal in his Latin treatise but conservative in Paradise Lost, (b) Stylianos's comment to me about teaching the "common people" about the afterlife, (c) that Kazantzakis, like Vikelas, learned very much from Renan. Indeed, Vikelas seems a precursor of Kazantzakis. Another speaker was Cristiano Luciani, from Rome, who told me he sees Mario Vitti regularly and that Mario is fine. . . . Γεμιστά for lunch in the nice restaurant I found overlooking the Koules Fortress. In the evening, Gareth and Kallia took me to a very high-class restaurant on Evans Street, just beyond the section of the Venetian walls where the municipality will construct a permanent Kazantzakis exhibit sponsored by the Ministry of Education. Saw the Owens's boys also; they're bilingual, of course, and interested in soccer and basketball. Sounds familiar.

Sunday, October 19, 2008

Read and timed my Rethymo talk, after much oral practice. 21 minutes. Walked all the way to the Archeological Museum, which is still basically closed except for two rooms with marvelous treasures going chronologically from about 3000 B.C. to the first century A.D. (Roman period). Among those on display, the Phaistos Disk, which dates from the new palace period, 1600–1400 B.C. I didn't remember that it has two sides. Does my replica?

Monday, October 20, 2008

I forgot to add that on Saturday at the Vikela conference I met Stylianos Alexiou. He told me that Lefteris, his father, destroyed all of Kazantzakis's letters to him when their friendship ended. Stylianos wrote about this (I believe) and says he'll send me an offprint. . . . I wrote Nancy Birk and Darren Middleton asking for advice on the placement of my archive. Also to Dimitri Gounelas and Roddy Beaton (who suggest the Gennadion).

Tuesday, October 21, 2008

Found the temporary Βικελαία Βιβλιοθήκη στη Πλατεία Μαθαίου and spoke to the director, Dimitris Savvas. Oh my, does he want my archive! Ready to receive it tomorrow! Will pay for shipping. To soothe the two museums here, he will make microfiche copies for them. But Roddy says the Seferis materials were not even catalogued when he looked in the 1990s. . . . A stranger at Aghiou Markou the other day gave me several books, a lovely portfolio, and a special Vikelas stamps worth about fifteen euros. Why? Because “You are Peter Bien.” Well, I used the stamps today to send a package of books, etc. back home; they covered most of the total cost of €16,70. . . . Asked about Avis rental car for March and was told it’s cheaper to book it in the US. Found that the parking lot in back of Atrion could take my car for €12 a day. Not bad. Spoke to Eleni Orphanoudaki on telephone. Ava will be here in March. . . . Another disappointing γύρος for lunch. No one makes it any longer in the old, much better, way. I asked the waiter, who responded, Καλά, όλα τα πράματα χειροτερέουν.

Wednesday, October 22, 2008

General strike yesterday, but it didn’t affect me. Finished going over the Levi letters using the manuscripts. Am in the middle of the Diamantaras ones. I’m correcting mistakes all the time, some very embarrassing. This morning I became a tourist, went to see the Venetian fortress, the Koules. What an amazing building, showing the genius and energy of those people. Four-square: all stone, all with huge arches giving large rooms beneath. I can’t imagine how the Ottomans ever took this fortress and was told that the siege ended because they sank Venetian and French warships in the harbor. The Venetian aesthetic is of course displayed in the Lion Fountain, constructed under Morosini in the 1600s. . . . I put on jacket and tie (for the first time) to go to the interview at the Historical Museum. Lots of photos in the library, some together with Georgia Katsalaki, and a long interview about my work and why I got interested in Modern Greek literature. They promised to send me the text and photos. Θα δούμε . . . as Kazantzakis liked to say. At the same time there was a presentation by two brothers, Germans, of the diary, paintings, and photographs that their father had made while serving as a German soldier in Crete in 1943–44. At least something good came out of the occupation. He was a professional artist who luckily returned briefly to Germany before they left Crete; thus most of his drawings, etc., were preserved. Afterwards he was taken prisoner in Yugoslavia and spent several years in prison. Other drawings that he had with him then were lost. But those given to the Historical Museum are a great treasure. The brother who spoke, in German followed by translation, was near tears. Very moving, the whole business. There will be an appropriate exhibition, but not before 2010. Also will be included in the permanent exhibit being prepared on World War II. . . . Fond goodbyes to Georgia Katsalaki, who helped me today with αρχίζω να πλαντώ, which she found in Kriaras's dictionary. The verb is πλατάζω or πλαντώ. I translated it, "I was ready to burst." . . . Started to write my lecture for Chicago, using materials on religion and science already on the computer, plus appropriate passages from the letters ca. 1923 to Galatea and Papastefanou. About to leave Iraklio, I've actually found it a rather nice city, small enough so that one can walk everywhere, full of trees and squares and parks, and with a relaxed life-style, the κέντρα full every evening, young people playing σκάκι. The one thing missing is a παραλία along the sea-front. And of course it's impossible to park, unless one uses a motorcycle or Vespa.

To Rethymno

By bus to Rethymno. Kriti Beach Hotel, far from the old town and generally antipathetic. I found the responsible young lady at the Ινστιτούτο Μεσογειακών Σπουδών and she transferred me to the university's Σπίτι της Ευρώπης on the waterfront near the Φρούριο, where I'd stayed my first time in Rethymno. But this time luckily I was given a room at the back, away from the noise of nightlife. Opening ceremonies included greeting by the mayor, who was joined by the vice-mayor, Pepi, now (I think) married to him. She beamed with delight when she saw me; he turned to shake hands. Nice. I had hoped to see and hear Moullas, but his wife died recently and he didn't come. Angela Kastrinaki read his very good paper about the theatrical contests. Earlier, around 2:00 p.m., I had lunch in "our" restaurant, but the familiar waitress was no longer there. Still OK, and very non-touristy.

Friday, October 24, 2008

The Σπίτι της Ευρώπης is an old Turkish house redone: interesting architecture with a large courtyard, hanging balconies, etc. Walked to Εστία, where all the lectures now are. Mine was second in the morning and, I think, went well. Many questions afterward and many compliments: “You taught me things I never knew.” Then I presided over the second session. Five speakers, but I stayed awake and didn’t even yawn. Μεζεδάκια. Then a journalist and photographer drove me back to the Σπίτι and conducted a long interview that will be part of a documentary on Kazantzakis in which his enthusiasts answer questions in their own language; thus all of my part was in English. I doubt that Patroclos Stavrou will be pleased with everything I said, but both the journalists and I agreed that “we don’t want hagiography.” In the talks today there was a deliciously funny one about a Karaghiozis play in which beautiful Eleni is pursued by a Turk and by an Englishman, both of whom use Karaghiozis as a go-between. Stamatis Philippidis appeared and gave a good paper but then left because, he told me, he can’t sit for a long time owing to pain; he takes cortisone. I was reassured that Foteini is still playing the piano. And I visited the Odeon and had a nice conversation with the secretary there, who remembered me and thanked me for sending the CD of Alice and me playing our duet. Then had λουκουμάδες in “our” usual place. . . . Tedd Osgood e-mailed to remind me that I’m speaking to the Professors’ Colloquium on November 3rd. More to prepare.

Saturday, October 25, 2008

Leander sent an e-mail that a truck crashed into our farm gate, destroying it. But luckily no damage to buildings. Well, it lasted one year. . . . Went to Fortezza this morning; disappointing compared to Iraklio. Built in late 1500s. Turks occupied Rethymno in 1616. Couldn’t see any of the underground structure. Just the battlements on top, and what was the mosque built by the conquerors (with minaret chopped down). Visited Jo-An. Nice reunion with the director, but the kitchen and dining room girls weren’t there. Andreas and Jane Drakonakis picked me up there and we drove off, with another friend, a lovely Cretan man full of memorized poetry, μαντινάδες, and Ancient Greek quotations, to a village, Argyroupolis, with abundant flowing water, near Andreas’s mother’s village, about half an hour from Rethymno. Ate next to rushing water with snow-white geese washing themselves. Dramatic mountains in the background, the impressive wildness of the Cretan landscape, all volcanic. This was a great treat. . . . But there was more. Eleni Kovaïou picked me up at 8:00 and treated me to a fish dinner and three hours of steady conversation. She wants me, of course, to donate my archive to Rethymno. Suggests I speak to Alexis Politis about finding money to pay for the staff to put each and every detail on the computer, and also suggests that I give the archive bit by bit, waiting until this is actually done before submitting more. She apparently has Kazantzakis letters (all in manuscript) that I don't have, and will send them. She needs my list of needs. She has written very interestingly about Kazantzakis's obsessive identification with Nietzsche. I said I'd try to get it published in JMGS if someone (Ben Petre for example) could translate it into English. Must contact Peter Allen about this. . . . Chrysanthi telephoned. She's back in Cincinnati Hall, ready, very ready, to go home. So am I, although I'm totally comfortable in Greece and speaking Greek. I keep telling everyone that I need to go home to vote—for Obama, of course.

Sunday, October 26, 2008

Heard Eri Stavopoulou's talk and another rather good one on Kalomoiris's opera of Πρωτομάστορας. Then Andonis and Jane picked me up again for another lunch, this time in town, with pleasant conversation, and delivered me to the bus terminal. Met some others from the symposium there; coffee together in Iraklio airport. Fast flight to Thessaloniki. Lovely reunion with Chrysanthi, who told me how worried she is about Vouli, who seems to have the beginnings of dementia. We'll write to Stylianos à propos.

Luckily, the Thessaloniki University library was open until 1:00 p.m. although this is St. Demetrios's name day, with parades, etc. Dimitri Gounelas met me and we were shown by the archival people exactly what they would do if I sent my archive here: everything, piece by piece, on the internet so that anyone, sitting at home, can read manuscripts, see photos—whatever. And, unlike Rethymno, I won't need to raise money. Storage on climate- and humidity-controlled shelves, with lots of empty space. It's a fully professional operation. I said, of course, that I'm not going to decide now and in any case that the transfer won't take place for several years. But I could begin further negotiations at any time, and to have everything here would obviously help Tsolakis in the Greek publication of the letters. Long, good talk with Dimitri afterwards in Starbucks. Then to Vouli's, where Chrysanthi was waiting. Vouli seemed OK to me, not demented, but Chrysanthi says that she repeats herself very badly. . . . We learned that "Julian" by Kazantzakis is playing at the Βασιλικό Θέατρο and got tickets. Then to George and Efthymoula's for stifado and a chance to talk with George while Efthymoula was in the kitchen (otherwise impossible). . . . Siesta. Back to town for the play. First to Odysseas and Eleni briefly, to say goodbye. The play didn't start until 9:35 p.m. because they waited for Papoulios, President of the Democracy, to appear, surrounded by photographers. Audience clapped and rose, briefly, but really without much enthusiasm. We left after the first act. The play was heightened emotions without stop. Well acted and produced but, as usual with Kazantzakis, "overdone." Also rather bad acoustics in the theater. Hard to hear sometimes and to understand. I didn't think much of this play when I wrote my chapter on it. Must read that chapter again and perhaps also the play.

Travel

Home! Business class from Munich to Philadelphia. What a pleasure! Seats become beds, just about. Finished the Aeneid. Book 6, the underworld, is the best. 7 to 12 are rather disappointing, and Aeneas at the end is a murderer rather than a forgiver. Also read the full program for Julian; very helpful. Also some of Clint Gardner's book on liberal theology. Everything fine until we learned that all flights from Philadelphia to Boston were canceled owing to weather. One flight still going to Manchester, but no seats. Standby. But then, miraculously, we were given two seats. Called Tom Wilson, who was planning to pick us up from the Boston bus at 11:45. We'll miss the last Manchester bus, will stay overnight in a hotel. "No. I'll come and get you at the Manchester Airport," which he did. Thus we arrived home at 9:30 p.m. instead of midnight. First experience with Kendal's locked doors and the magic wand that opens them.

Wednesday, October 29, 2008

Hanover

Mail. Phone messages. Meeting about Kendal's doctor. Supper for Chrysanthi and dancers honoring the caller's last evening after seventeen years. Dick came and we played Prokofiev's sonata very badly. Muncks now at Kendal two days. Allan exhausted from emptying boxes, couldn't play. Flu shots.

Thursday, October 30, 2008

Practiced Haydn for 8 hands. Eleni Kovaïou sent some more manuscripts. Started planning Monday's talk to the professors here.

November 4, 2008

Election day. Audrey Logan died at about 10:00 a.m., peacefully. Kesaya and a daughter were with her. Audrey, of course, had voted by absentee ballot for Obama. Kesaya told her, although rather prematurely, that he had won, and she then closed her eyes and expired.

November 15, 2008

To Chicago

I've learned how to do Power Point, partly, and am loading photos onto it for our Greek night at the Meeting on the 21st. We'll also play some Greek songs, especially our favorite one about the cat that had kittens. . . . I'm now annotating the letters to Galatea, using of course annotations done by Elli Alexiou for the most part. . . . Played three movements of Haydn's 88th Symphony, 8-hands, last Saturday in the Health Center. We're now rehearsing the first movement of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony and will also try the Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody. . . . Asked Art Perryman's opinion about what to do regarding our sabotaged gate at the farm. "Rebuild it! Don't let those bums get away with anything." Leander and Alec agree. . . . Terrible fire at Montecito, destroying hundreds of homes. Daphne and family evacuated. Their home has escaped, but not by much. Other mansions are just chimneys and rubble. . . . In Chicago, Van Economou picked me up at O'Hare and drove me to his home for supper with lots of family and guests. Chief among the latter was the daughter of Marinatos, the archeologist who excavated Acrotiri on Santorini. She teaches Ancient Greek here. The site is closed. The roof caved in, doing damage to the site, and has never been repaired. She's very bitter, of course, and generally cynical about things in Greece. And here, too, since the African-American dean at her college wants to eliminate the Classics Department and replace it with Afro-American Studies. We had lots to talk about. Others, from Thessaloniki, knew about the Farm School (milk, turkeys). A very nice evening. Their son, a high-school senior, has mastered Modern Greek owing to a good Greek school here and good teaching. He is applying to the University of Chicago and wants to go into archeology. Good luck! . . . I've followed the Montecito fire on the internet. It seems to be fairly well contained, although fires have burst out in other California towns nearby. With luck Daphne and family will be returning home tomorrow.

November 16, 2008

Chicago

Chrysanthi on the telephone told me that Audrey Logan's memorial service was beautiful. Lots and lots of testimony, Quaker-style, especially from all her adopted children (Japanese, etc.) and from lots of Kendal people. Too bad I had to miss it owing to this Chicago trip. . . . Van Economou picked me up again to take me to the 57th Street Quaker Meeting, near the University of Chicago. Along the way we tried to see Obama's house in the Kenwood section but the street was blocked off by police cars. Big beautiful houses in an area that was once grand, then degenerated, and is now reclaimed. The 57th Street Meeting is small, in a private home, about 30 people. I was told afterwards that it had been reduced to about 6 people some years ago owing to Friends moving out to suburbs and establishing new Meetings, e.g. at Evanston. A woman "off the street" rose and spoke at inordinate length about St. Paul and (somehow) cats. After a silence she was about to rise again, saying "I have another inkling," but fortunately a Friend came over to her explaining that we speak only once and she sat down. No other ministry. Afterwards, during Joys and Sorrows, I expressed joy for Daphne's house being spared. Since she's next to Oprah Winfrey, every time the news confirmed that Oprah's house was intact, I felt relieved. Pot luck lunch afterwards, where I spoke with a man who said he had served as a surgical technician in the Navy, so we exchanged surgical technician stories. Then Van retried me (he'd been at the Greek cathedral where, as he says, he goes "to be seen," not out of much religious conviction. More sightseeing, through the University of Chicago's beautiful campus, Frank Lloyd Wright's Robee House, the Midway museums, the park where Obama gave his acceptance speech (Van was there with 20,000 others). Back to the very busy hotel, all sorts of bridal showers, etc., plus of course my talk, which seems to have gone very well. Lots and lots of questions, and congratulations. Nice to meet various people, one teaching Greek using our Greek Today, another using our anthology of twentieth-century poetry, another whose daughter had studied with Chrysanthi, another who knows the Damianos family, another who wants to use our Πτάμενος Θάλαμος. A very upscale group of highly educated well-to-do Greeks and Greek-Americans. Dinner afterwards with Economou, Tsakos and one other in, of course, a fancy Greek restaurant. Lots of good talk and fellowship. And I received a check for $400. Very nice.

November 18, 2008

I've revived the War/Peace University Seminar. We met tonight to hear Tom Powers warn that the war in Afghanistan is unwinnable and will ruin Obama if he pursues it. Alas! A very good turnout, lots of questions, wine and good food. In sum: a success.

November 21, 2008

Presented a talk on Greece at the Meeting with slides and Power Point, plus Chrysanthi's loukoumadhes. Power Point didn't work at first, but thank goodness Scot Drysdale appeared and made a necessary adjustment on the computer, in the "Display" area, and then everything was fine. People were amused when, displaying my Phaistos Disk, I said I won it because I was an Olympian in 2004.

November 26, 2008

Leander's

I was a tourist all day in Washington. First to the National Archives to see the Declaration of Independence, first draft of the Constitution, with penciled changes, the definitive Constitution, bill of Rights, and later documents relating to the civil war, women's suffrage, etc., all displayed in the beautiful rotunda of the building. Luckily, few tourists. This and other buildings all seem to combine Greek and Roman architectural influences, using Greek columns but generally a Roman vaulted ceiling. Then to the West Building of the National Gallery. I was able to follow a docent who spoke interestingly about selected paintings: a Giotto, a da Vinci, a Vermeer, a van Dyck, a Cézanne, and others. Then I visited the fine El Greco paintings, including Laocoön, and Rembrandt. . . . Long walk then to the World War II memorial, past the Washington Memorial on the Mall. Good excerpts from speeches by Roosevelt, Truman, MacArthur, Marshall, Eisenhower. Two sections: Atlantic and Pacific. Lots of fountains. . . . Then another long walk to the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, which I found architecturally disappointing. Actually there is no architecture at all, just the famous long wall with names of the dead inscribed thereon. . . . Then to the Lincoln Memorial with the marvelous Daniel Chester French statue of the seated Lincoln, based on the seated Zeus from the temple at Olympia, and the Second Inaugural on one wall the Gettysburg Address on the other. Very moving. Then to the Korean War Memorial, a series of statues of soldiers armed and advancing, and a good statement to the effect that we fought to aid a people we never knew. Then another very long walk to the F.D.R. memorial covering many acres, all outdoors, beginning with "Prologue": statue of him in a wheelchair and an inscription of Eleanor's thoughts about the disease really making him the man he truly was. Then a separate section for each of the four terms, showing unemployment and depression, the public works, then Pearl Harbor, then his sudden and untimely death in 1945. A wonderful tribute. In the shop, I saw part of a video on his career and bought it. Interestingly, he, like Obama now, campaigned in 1932 using the slogan "Change!" . . . Back for Chinese food dinner and a funny movie, after hearing Sophia, and then Nicholas playing the clarinet, producing very attractive sounds.

November 27, 2008, Thanksgiving

Leander and I sight-read some Godowsky four-hand pieces, sounding very Polish. He thinks that Alice and I should play a four-hand arrangement of Britten's "Playful Pizzicato." Lovely thanksgiving dinner, turkey and all the trimmings. Both Sophia and Nicholas wrote out a page of what they are thankful for, and Leander did the same at table orally. Mostly family. Afterwards saw the sequel to yesterday's film. And then went into town to the Verizon Center for a basketball game, Wizards vs. Magics. Our seats were at the very top of this huge stadium and Chrysanthi said "No. No." owing to acrophobia. Luckily there were many empty seats and we managed to exchange our tickets for seats down below and of course much closer. Wizards lost, not even close. Every time they shot a basket it missed whereas the other team's shots generally went in. So, minimum of the excitement produced by a close game. But lots else: dancing girls, T-shirts dropping down in parachutes, a kissing game as the video focused on various couples, sometimes on people who didn't even know each other. And noise! And dancing in the aisles. And a child's team playing during the half, very expertly.

November 28, 2008

On the train back to Springfield I worked more on my Vancouver talk about BMGS and JMGS. Home at 10:00 p.m.

December 9, 2008

I played the organ part (without pedals, of course) for the Hallelujah Chorus of Kendal's Messiah read-through, without nervousness, and reasonably accurately including simulated trumpets. Fun!

December 13, 2008

A lovely day with Nurjhan and her husband Chad. He was in the Peace Corps in Kyrgyzstan and that's how they first met. Lunch at Au Bon Pain, A.R.T. theater, a circus show, very ingenious, then to the family hosting Nurzhan, the Cohens, with two talkative children and a super-smart dog capable of tricks. Superb lamb dinner cooked by Dr. Neil Cohen. Tomorrow Nurzhan moves to Washington to be with Chad, who works there for an NGO helping developing nations to establish small businesses. She's finished her course work at Brandeis and now needs to write her MA thesis on Women's Rights. I told her that she looks younger every year. . . . Chrysanthi and I spent the night very comfortably in the Sheraton Commander hotel.

December 14, 2008

Would have gone to Cambridge Meeting, celebrating today Andy Towl's 98th birthday, but needed to return to Hanover because we'd planned lunch at Kendal with Ruth and Jack Hunter. Bob Daubenspeck joined us.

December 15, 2008

Lunch with Alan Rozycki, who has agreed to become co-coordinator with me of the War/Peace University Seminar. How nice! Like us, he has a very international family, one child married to an Indian (Asian), another to a Finn. We had lots to talk about. Saw Ron Edsforth, who just finished a history course like the one he used to teach for War/Peace before Ken Yalowitz "fired" him. And he is now enjoying a three-year contract instead of the one-year contracts he'd had in the past.

December 19, 2008

Telephone from Greece saying that the Εταιρεία Συγγραφέων wants to make me an honorary member. I suspect that Christos has something to do with this!

December 25, 2008, Christmas

Santa Barbara

Opened presents this morning. Daphne gave me a new fax machine for the farm to replace my antique. Spent time here starting an index of persons and topics treated so far in my annotations to the Kazantzakis letters, a huge, long list even though I've only done 1902–06, 1922–24. I'm reading an anthology of sayings by Epicureans and Stoics. Here's a good one by Lucretius (Bk. III, 931): "Why groan and weep at death? For if the life that is past and gone has been pleasant to you, and all its blessings, as though heaped in a vessel full of holes, have not run through and perished unenjoyed, why do you not retire like a guest sated with the banquet of life, and with calm mind embrace, you fool, a rest that knows no care?" Why not, indeed! Today Harold Pinter died at age 78—my age. Conor Cruise O'Brien died last week. I remember his dinner parties so well. But he was 91 and still working on a new book. My hope, of course, is that I'll be able to finish the Kazantzakis letters and see them published by 2010, with luck—age 80. . . . More from Epictetus, Handbook 41: "It is the mark of a want of natural talent to spend much time on things relating to the body, as in exercising a great deal, in eating and drinking a great deal, and often emptying one's bowels and copulating. These should be done in passing; and you should turn all your attention to the care of your mind."

Epictetus Fragments 8: "If a man endeavors . . . to persuade himself to accept of his own free will what cannot be avoided, he will live a measured and harmonious life."

Marcus Aurelius Meditations, book XII.1: "Begin . . . to live with Nature. You will then be a man worthy of the Universe that gave you birth and will cease to be a stranger in your own country, surprised by what is coming to pass every day, as at something you did not look to see." XII.23: "By the changes of her parts the whole world continues ever young and in her prime. . . . Therefore for each individual the cessation of his life is no evil, for it is . . . neither of his own choosing nor without relation to the common good."

To the A.R.T. for a very interesting production of The Seagull, making the play entirely easy to understand. Chekhov, complaining bitterly about the drivel in the theater, was like Kazantzakis in 1906, but what were the forces, besides mere talent, that enabled Chekhov to develop so well as a dramatist whereas Kazantzakis's career was aborted, more or less?

January 20, 2009

Spent the entire day at home watching the Obama inauguration on TV. Everyone, even the Fox News people, seemed enchanted. But the stock market went down another 300 points.

January 28, 2009

Philadelphia

After the Pendle Hill meetings, I met Dan Seeger for lunch, together with Jack Hunter. Dan, surprisingly, is moving. Medford Leas says he doesn't have enough money to enter, so he's going to Folkways, next to George School, entering in April. His huge problem of course is downsizing. How to deal with the amazing collection of documents in his basement? He hasn't touched the piano since going to San Francisco (where he'll soon be returning for another month). As lively as ever. Very involved in Quaker affairs, including the "greening" of Friends House in Philadelphia. . . . Yesterday, squeezed between Pendle Hill board and meetings, I gave two talks at the Greek church in Media with one, in Greek, about writing Greek Today, and what we found on the Spyridon Commission, the other on the work of Myrsiades, especially the Ritsos translation. He and Linda were there, to be honored for a very productive career.

February 14, 2009

Played eight-hand piano: first movement of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, which we rehearsed for probably six weeks, and didn't make any serious mistakes. The others were Joan Wilson, Bill Clendenning, Pat Porter. We'll do Haydn's Military Symphony in April.

February 15, 2009

Played two Goldberg variations as prelude and postlude for Stan Udy's Interfaith Gathering, not perfectly, but I was able to cover over the mistakes pretty well.

Cambridge

Lunch in Au Bon Pain with Dia and Wim. Her mother died at age 103. Was librarian at the American School in Athens for decades. Dia suggested two good restaurants for me in Athens. Then to the A.R.T. for a splendid production of Beckett's Endgame with Will LeBow and Tom Derrah in the lead roles. Such a depressing view of life and death, mostly death (written soon after Beckett's experiences in WWII), yet sweetened with some macabre humor, which leads us to accept everything after all—well, almost everything or, well, half-accept.

New York

Saw D. H. Lawrence's The Widowing of Mrs. Holroyd at the Mint Theater. Such a strong play about a dissolving marriage. Husband in the coal mine, wife better education; the typical DHL situation. And very Kazantzakian in a way, since "Should she go away with a true lover (and a better educated one) or follow her 'duty' and continue to suffer?" The dates are similar; Lawrence finished this one by 1910; Kazantzakis's Ἐημερώσει was 1906. Lawrence's play apparently relates to the short story "Odor of Chrysanthemums," which I must re-read. Apparently Martin Meisel gave a lecture on the play at the theater, from his book How Plays Are Made, which I must now read when I get back to Dartmouth. Dennis Carroll is so anti-DHL in his play on Lawrence and Russell, but I feel now, as I did when teaching, DHL's great talent and power. . . . Supper at the Oyster Bar, oysters Rockefeller for nostalgia's sake, but I really didn't like them that much.

February 25, 2009

9:00 to 11:00 a.m. with the president-elect of the Farm School, Dimitris Kyriakou, together with a dozen other trustees. He's impressive, very smart, a linguist, lots of good experiences on the EU Commission, a good listener, a lucid answerer of questions. We were all impressed (except, I heard, Brenda Marder—oh, well). Lunch at the Yale Club with Michael Groden, who found a copy of my "Linguistic Revolution" in the Strand Book Store in perfect condition and asked me to autograph it. He hopes to return to his Joyce Thesaurus project after copyright expires in 2012 and Stephen Joyce can no longer refuse permission. He is hoping to publish three books, one a memoir of living with Joyce (I should do an essay about living with Kazantzakis). . . . Two and a half hours with trustees, being taught how to approach prospective donors for large gifts. I slept through some of it, happily. Supper at the Yale Club with Tom and Joan Thomas, served by my friend, the woman from ? (where). She honored my happy birthday card and gave us a bottle of Coen burgundy (!) for free. Then to Lincoln Center for wonderful ballet: Swan Lake (Balanchine's abridgment with a gorgeous Sara Mearns dancing like an angel; then the Bizet-Balanchine "The Steadfast Tin Soldier," music “Children’s Games” that I played four-hand piano. Very funny, very childish (for adults). The Prokofiev-Lavery “Romeo & Juliet” with lovely Janie Taylor. Finally “Slaughter on Tenth Avenue” (Balanchine/Richard Rodgers), from the Broadway show, not as good as the Bernstein show, but lots of tap dancing and some humor. A scintillating evening, together with the Thomases.

E-mail from Dimitri Gondicas, who is smoothing the way for me to leave my archive to Princeton, not only the Kazantzakis letters but other aspects of my work and career. I’ll see him this afternoon. Down to Charleton Street for lunch with Burt Pike, meeting first at his apartment and then going to a nearby restaurant for my lunch of salad (fast day in anti-jet-lag regimen). Like me, he continues to be productive, having just published a new translation of Rilke, which he gave me, and working on two additional books besides serving on P.E.N.’s translation committee. He misses Constance Tagopoulos and asked me to send warm regards (which I did by e-mail promptly). He sees Peter Constantine often. Peter is “the same,” scraping by financially despite his linguistic genius. . . . Returned to the Yale Club to meet Dimitri Gondicas, who gave me some good contacts in Athens and invited me to spend a week or so at Princeton (subsidized) to finish my annotations; they have up to date encyclopedias, prosopographic resources, etc. Also, of course, to deposit my archive there. He has spoken to Don Skemer and they’ll take my photocopied letters with the proviso that they may not allow the photocopies to be photocopied. OK. They already have Mario Vitti’s archive, and Keeley’s, and some Seferis, and half of Friar’s. They’ll even want any Kazantzakis novels, etc. with my penciled annotations in the margins. I have lots of them! . . . By bus to 79th Street to the Greek Consulate to hear a good lecture by David Acker on the future of worldwide agriculture and how the Farm School can participate, followed by a reception. Nice to see Ruth Schoppert, also a man who’s a member of the huge club near North Creek—we talked about forestry. Sheila Baird said that the Bank of America is firing 40,000 employees. (Nothing in the newspaper about that so far.) We’ll see if Jim Sharpe and Michael at the Hanover office survive, not to mention my investments. . . . Harry Mark Petrakis has written a good story, “The Grandmother,” based on what I told him about the German soldier in Crete in WWII who painted portraits of Cretan peasants.

Friday, February 27, 2009

My big day for committees. Higher Education and Secondary Education. Before that, Land, which happily delayed once again the purchase of a remote farm, requesting further study and information. So, the fate of the cows remains, as we said, a “moo point.” Higher Ed routine. Secondary not quite routine, since we needed to thank Pelaghia for her service; she’s retiring. We also praised Tasos for being placed again on an important committee to advise the Ministry. My idea that we shouldn’t always be hoping to recruit “better” students did not fly at all, and won’t appear in the minutes. But my desire to have Tasos’s declaration in the minutes did pass. I mean his declaration that cows 65 km. distant will serve no educational purpose for the secondary schools. . . . At 7:30, fancy dinner at the Harvard Club honoring Bill McGrew. Cost: $120. But it was very fine. Big surprise: all his children were there, a son, several daughters, and one fiancé. I had a chance to talk to the daughters, one of whom teaches in a Rudolph Steiner school in Manhattan, the other who is an architect in Washington, DC. Several good speeches honoring Bill and then Bill responded well. One of the testimonies was by Brenda Marder, revealing how she, Everett, and Bill were all studying together at the University of Cincinnati.

Full board. It started with tributes to Bruce Lansdale, first by Bill, then by Mike Keeley (their boyhood together, and an appropriate Seferis poem, from Μυθιστόρημα), then by me: first with Hodja’s story about Ποιος κάνει κομάντο, then a portion of Bruce’s poem “Why I Love Greece.” Main problem in the meeting was of course finances: excessive drawdowns on the endowment, lack of the expected income from land leases. But we voted in the new president, Dimitris Kyriakou, and heard very professional financial reports from the new financial officer, Yannis ?. I left a bit early to catch the bus to Newark Airport for my flight. Waiting, I read lots and lots of pages by Dennis Carroll and prepared some reaction. One of his pieces is very movingly about his remarkable father, Admiral Eugene Carroll, whom of course I remember well.

Athens, Hotel Achilleas

Routine flights, Newark–Frankfort via Lufthansa, business class. Good food. I slept a little. Then Lufthansa from Frankfort to Athens. Train from the airport not running. Took the bus to Syntagma. Amazingly little traffic, probably because of the holiday weekend and tomorrow (Καθαρά Δευτέρα, the beginning of Lent). Hotel Achilleas the same as always, minimal but clean and quiet. Don Nielsen telephoned. He's in bed with a virus infection that Lia caught as well. So our dinner is canceled. He's been promised his residence permit. I supped on λουκουμάδες στο Αιγαίον στην Οδό Πανεπιστημίου, followed by a cappuccino. Up until midnight without apparent jet lag.

Athens

An exhausting day. Started by going, as arranged, to the Onassis Foundation on Αισχύνου, in a lovely neighborhood near Plaka and the Acropolis. Frédérique Χατζηαντωνίου was there despite the holiday, a French woman resident for decades in Greece, very pleasant. She gave me my check for €4500 and deducted the 800+ for my share of the business class flight. Onassis provides some office space for its fellows, near Ευαγγελισμός. I must investigate. She also gave me an extensive booklet giving details of the foundation's activities and its board, all sons of former officers. Their projects are diverse. Might they build a Kendal in Greece? Should I ask? . . . The exhausting part came next. I walked from the Panepistimiou Metro to Εκδόσεις Καζαντζάκη, 116 Χαρίλαου Τρικούπη. Patroklos Stavrou kept me there for four hours, from 11:45 a.m. to 3:45 p.m., without lunch. He talked non-stop mostly about himself, his virtues, his accomplishments, the evil ones who do not appreciate him (like Vassilis Vassilikos). He has no manuscripts! Thanks that someone (!) is hiding them until they come out of copyright in nineteen years. Regarding my archive, he favors Kalokairinos's Historical Museum. Then, to prove how wrong Vassilikos and the other detractors are, who claim that he has destroyed Kazantzakis through inactivity, he took me (again) to the αποθήκη behind the office, filled with piles of unsold books that he has reprinted. The problem, obviously, is not production (each new edition is with an attractive binding and an introduction by him) but sales. He prints 5000 and sells 250. He insisted on giving me titles I desired: the new Prevelakis 400 Letters, Σπασμένες ψυχές, the two children's novels (nicely illustrated), etc., etc., and then the best of the lot, the new Οδύ- σεια reproducing exactly the original 1938 edition—a treasure. I carried all these, somehow, back to the hotel. Must mail them home. Then made up for lack of lunch at 5:00 p.m. with McDonald's French fries and milkshake (most everything else closed today because of Καθαρά Δευτέρα). Then Metro to Christos and Eri, another three hours, but very pleasant. Christos recovering, slowly, from his broken hip. Walks carefully with a cane and without if on level ground. Works at home. He's continuing with Θέματα Λογοτεχνίας and indeed plans a double issue on Ritsos (born 1909, 100 years ago) and wants me to contribute and to find suitable others. Will not continue with the autistic society, which requires too much travel abroad, and domestically. Is in good relationship now with Meg, who'll be coming with Dimitris for Easter and staying in the apartment. Says she feels her life is now in Greece mostly: her English connections are now mostly gone. Eri expatiated on how unbelievably bad many of the private universities are, really immoral imitations. She criticizes Veremis's legislation as hopelessly naïve. Also expatiated on the impossible bureaucracy here that stymies everything. Happily, I was able to correct her English on a short précis she needs to submit. They'll come to dinner at the Gennadion after my lecture.

Athens

Beautiful weather. 65 degrees, clear sky. I deposited my €4500 and investigated regarding envelopes to post Stavrou's books. Prepared for my class at College Year in Athens on Kazantzakis's Darwinian ethics, a good paper that I suppose I gave somewhere in America (can't remember where). Could have used it for the lecture I'll be giving next week, which is perhaps too dense and long. . . . News on e-mail about the Keeley Prize in MLA. Do I qualify? Not sure. . . . The school sent a car to pick me up and bring me to the new location: two fine buildings in Πλατεία Σταδίου, right next to the Stadium built for the revival of the ancient Olympics in 1896. Phylactopoulos, the owner and head, greeted me with a huge smile and hug. I remember his father. We ate in the cafeteria with students, all American college students,  $\frac{2}{3}$  girls,  $\frac{1}{3}$  boys. I was surprised to find all 180 students seated for my lecture, and lots of faculty: full house, obviously a sort of important event. I think the lecture went well. It was clear, and fairly short, always a virtue. Two brave students asked good questions. Afterwards a group of teachers gathered round with more questions and discussion, and finally the same two students, one with a lovely smile, who wanted to ask more. All very pleasant, topped off by a surprise honorarium of €100. Afternoon coffee in a shop with wi-fi. Then at 8:00 p.m. met Iacovos Tsalicoglou at the hotel. Walked to Μητροπόλεος to the same restaurant at which we ate several years ago: Ants & Crickets. Joined by his wife and the lovely daughter who is an Oxford grad and has been translating English poetry into Greek; she's included in the new anthology being prepared by Keeley, Peter Constantine, etc. Then, a surprise: David Connolly joined us. He'd written that he'll miss my lecture because he's going to England, but here he was, newly appointed to be a full professor of translation studies at Thessaloniki and with a State prize. But he lives still in Athens and spends usually three days a week in Thessaloniki. Lots of reminiscing about Dartmouth. Iakovos remembers his delight hearing me say, in 1963, that I learned Greek in bed. His son, rejected by Dartmouth, graduated from Connecticut College and is prospering. One daughter is divorced (after two months) with a child, but coping. A lovely evening to finish a much more relaxing day than the one with Stavrou's four-hour monologue.

Athens

Spent two full hours and about €138 unburdening myself of the Οδύσεια (which cost €48 to mail) and the other 10 or 11 books by Kazantzakis. Had to buy bubble envelopes, stout paper, and packing tape. At the post office when I told the clerk that the huge packet was Kazantzakis's Οδύσεια she replied with a huge smile, "Kazantzakis is my favorite." Then to the Benaki Museum to look at Sikelianos manuscripts only to discover that the Sikelianos archive is now in Kifissia. A librarian helped me by telephong Kifissia (which can't be reached now by subway because anarchists burned the entire train yesterday morning in the Kifissia station, first, however, telling the passengers to leave). The curator there looked up my dates and reported that none of the letters I wanted is in the archive. So I was saved a trip. Then telephoned the Palamas Archive (Ασκληπιός 3). They'll investigate. If my desired dates are there, I'll need to make an application that goes to the board of governors. Probably nothing will come of this either. So the only positive result from today's efforts is that I learned the year of Elli Lambridi's death, from the recent encyclopedia in the Benaki Museum's library. . . . Lunch in Kentrikos Restaurant, Stadiou, where Christos once took me. Then met Constance Tagopoulos at 8:00 p.m., again in Ants and Crickets, Ο Τζιτζικας κι ο Μέρμηγκας. Fortunately she continues to have contact with Queens College and directs a summer school each year. I say “fortunately” because her situation with the American college here, Northeastern, is terrible. She’s an adjunct teaching one or two courses that she cannot choose. Very poor students. No benefits. The full catastrophe. On top of this, she has her 40+-year-old son with muscular dystrophy, unable to hold a job, requiring nursing care and therapy as his condition continually worsens. But she is brave and does the best she can. What a shame! In New York she was appreciated and stimulated. Here, neither.

Athens–Thessaloniki

Went to investigate one of the places provided by Onassis for its awardees. Not much: a room with computers and xeroxes. No help for me in the library downstairs, which is devoted to science. . . . Routine flight to Thessaloniki. At the Farm School, Cincinnati Hall well prepared for me, same room as before. Fridge full. Met Andrew Klein and Amanda in the library. They’re doing fine. Also saw the Kyrgyzstani student from two years ago, who is also doing fine. The two from this year not so well. Both are in the Foundation Program (remedial mostly for English). One of them graduated from Lower Foundation to Higher; the other did not and is continuing in Lower. So it’s unclear whether he’ll be able to enroll in Perrotis next year.

American Farm School

Very full day, starting with the Assembly. I spoke to the student body, announcing the new president. They applauded when I noted that he is Greek. Then coffee with Tasos. He knows who will replace Pelaghia—a mathematician that’s been second in command under her. Also knows who will replace himself when he leaves after two more years. In sum, unlike some people (e.g., Tsolakis), Tasos has prepared successors. He repeated that he cannot stand τεμπελιά. He admires McGrew because Bill works so hard, and well. Then I went to three classes. The one on Roman history was about Actium, Cleopatra, Alexander, Octavian. I reminded the teacher about the relevant Cavafy poems, which I hope to find for her. Told the students afterwards that nationalism is a curse (they were taught that ancient Greeks were devoted to theater and art, whereas ancient Romans were barbarians who copied the Greeks). I reminded them of Alexander's remarkable saying about Greeks vs. barbarians recorded in the Thessaloniki Airport. Next: chemistry taught by Pelaghia. Of course I understood nothing. She's very strict, but apparently (Tasos told me) a mother, especially to the female students, and he is sorry that her replacement will be a man. Lastly: animal husbandry, all about cows and pigs, keeping them healthy, inserting sperm to fertilize the cows, proper nutrition, the various breeds of sheep, etc. The teacher asked me to speak and I told them about the trustees' concern: what to do with the cows. They had no idea that all livestock must go. All her students are EPAL. Also saw Pelaghia discipline a student who has been threatening girls, sending him out of the dormitory to live at home (his parents work for the School, live on campus) with threat of expulsion if he doesn't change. The three classes were fine, especially because all three involved the students. No monologue from the teachers, contrary to what I had experienced in previous years. . . . Telephoned Vouli and went in a taxi to Tsimiski 87. She already had guests: a woman who had graduated from the School, which she adored, and her husband, a farmer in rice and corn, she a compulsive talker in a hugely loud voice, he silent (until she left the room, whereupon he became garrulous). Peasant type, very friendly. Later came one more guest, Loukia's daughter, Vouli's godchild, and we all ate together in the apartment, reminding me of dinners there in the old days—e.g., with McGrew. I showed Vouli computer photos of our farm. Vouli looks considerably older, but is still mentally OK. . . . Back to School in the late afternoon; short nap. David Willis fetched me at 7:30. Long drive to his village home, over badly rutted dirt road—no, not village home, because it's in the middle of a large olive grove, not at all in the village. A beautiful home designed by David and Christine, with views of the far-away city and of Mount Olympus. The house was full of six University of Virginia students on a week-long educational excursion with Christine concerning pottery. Lovely young people, including an Indonesian-Chinese from Sumatra. Lots of talk about the Farm School, Bruce, Quaker girls' school, civil war, Kazantzakis. The Lonsdales so far seem to approve the Αμυδαλιά quote. Tad is in California, diagnosed with breast cancer, but the latest news is that it may be a false diagnosis. They'll know more in a few days. The School priest has severe cancer but is under treatment in Ohio by a new "wonder drug" and is determined to survive. Christine's daughter is about to start the IB program at Anatolia. They asked about their son Bruce. Should he be enrolled in the Farm School's EPAL and then perhaps do the last two years at Anatolia for the IB? I suggested questioning Mats. The oldest daughter is now at Haverford on full scholarship and very happy there. David agrees with me that we should not buy the remote farm for the cows, or even just buy the land, because he fears a prolonged recession or even depression that will lower the land's value if we decide to sell it later. . . . Our own situation is precarious. Tony at Bank of America telephoned Chrysanthi to say that he'd been let go and indeed the entire Hanover office is closed. We're supposed to deal with someone in Manchester. I'll look into transferring everything to the Ledyard National Bank.

Saturday, March 7, 2009

American Farm School

Mount Olympus brilliantly clear across the gulf, snow-capped. Washed clothes; practiced Britten. Rehearsing my lecture. Then to town, stopping in the public library, which has internet capabilities. Met Albana at the Καμάρα at 2:00 p.m. Hugs and kisses. She appreciates the fact that she has a job even if the take-home pay is only €700 a month (miserable) and the duties secretarial mostly. After a year's stay (already six months) she can look for something else, but given conditions today that will be difficult. . . . In the evening, supper at Tasos's on Doras' (Theodoras') name-day, with George and Pelaghia Voutsas, and Vouli, and the presumptive successor to Tasos, Yalomas, who seems a bit shy and certainly doesn't have Tasos's "presence." George reminded me that some years ago he told me that I would be the best president of the Farm School. Είπα: Αμάν, γέρασα! We talked lots about Macintoshes, which he favors and owns, and of course about Κυριακού, and about the remote farm, which they all agree with me is a mistake. And of course χαίρετισμούς στη Χρυσάνθη. . . . While in town I experienced "The Web," a huge internet café with probably 100 machines patronized by boys and young men all playing video games in which someone is shooting someone else.

Sunday, March 8, 2009

The only unpleasant day, because of Eftymoula. But in the morning I practiced Britten and adjusted the lecture still some more. George fetched me and, happily, sat and talked before we returned. He's a Hillary Clinton fan, like Chrysanthi. But as soon as we picked up Eftymoula and drove off to the ουζερί, ugh! She screams; she accuses; she directs—like the British Madame Hortense, only it isn't funny. Poor George. He has a back-seat driver of the worst sort in the front seat. But we had a nice swordfish dinner (fasting! no meat) and a bit of peace as he drove me back without her.

Monday, March 9, 2009

Assembly, then class supposedly on the European Union and the Marshall Plan, which turned out to be a monologue on communism vs. capitalism. Knowledgeable teacher but minimal interaction with the students, and no discipline regarding the lesson plan. The next was much better: a Λύκειο class on Thucydides. Very nice, with lots of interaction. I told them my view that everyone should read Thucydides to discover how little human beings have progressed since then. We're just as bad as they were. . . . Then to the College: class by Mr. Girtsios on agricultural machinery, 28 students from Greece, the Balkans, Kenya, in English of course, with good use of power point. Gertsios complained to me afterwards that he cannot do research owing to the teaching load—six classes a year with a threat to go to eight. . . . Nice visit with Don, who of course wanted to know all the gossip about Kyriakou. . . . On my way to lunch at Princeton Hall, a man waylaid me to help him translate a prospectus for a machine he has invented to help clean the plastic sheets that are used in greenhouses. That took an hour, and I didn't know the terminology in either Greek or English. . . . More piano practice. . . . Tasos and Dora drove me to town. Beautiful lecture hall in the Archeological Museum. Full house, about 300 people, standing room only. Annie came, and Vouli. A teacher at university, doing Kazantzakis's Ταξιδεύοντας, brought her class. The widow of Ανδρόνικος introduced herself. Head of the museum gave a short introduction, then Tsolakis a long one, quoting Kazantzakian passages (Ανέστακας and Η αμυγδαλιά άνθισε) and saying flattering things about me, promising to make me an honorary member of Φιλόλογος next time I come (with Chrysanthi). I felt fully at ease reading my Greek and didn't stumble very many times. Afterwards, lots of people came up to give congratulations. Then with Tsolakis, Vouli, Tasos, Dora we walked to Διαγώνιο, a well-known restaurant specializing in γύρος και σουτζουκάκια—nothing special, but a pleasant, quiet place. We walked Vouli home and then back to Tasos's parking garage across from the Museum. Back to Cincinnati at 12:30 a.m. Tsolakes says that many people asked him for a copy of the lecture to be able to digest better its thought. He'll publish it in Φιλολόγος.

Tuesday, March 10, 2009

Thessaloniki–Athens

Up at 5:45 a.m., a bit tired. Nice to be back at Achilleas, where I seem to be a “regular.” Good luck: went to Ίδρυμα Κωστή Παλαμά when the director, Professor Kasinis, happened to be there and the secretary produced two manuscripts for me plus the periodical in which Kasinis published them plus a third for which there is no available manuscript because the letter was sent not to Palamas but to Ο Νούμας. Kasinis very cheerful and friendly. Knows Stavrou, Eri Stavropoulou, Christos, etc. Then to Gennadeion. Very impressive buildings. The director, Mrs. Georgopoulou, very pleasant. Large auditorium practically full. Lovely to see many of my friends: Ritsa, Christos, Eri, Kyriaki, Athena Vouyouca and her Norwegian friend. Among those who came up afterwards was the widow of Andronikos the archeologist, and a vice-president of the Ouranis Foundation, and Frédérique was there, too, of course, and various souls who claimed they had met me, say in Buffalo (!) at some point, and even a Dartmouth grad. A few questions afterwards. Athina asked about Kierkegaard, and I was able to answer that with ease. But a gentleman in the back complained that Kazantzakis really could never have downgraded Plato because he actually translated some dialogues. This was more difficult and I probably sounded a bit wishy-washy. Mrs. Georgopoulou saved the day by inviting everyone to the reception just outside the auditorium. Afterwards, in her palatial quarters she gave supper to us: Eri and Christos, myself, Constance, and some fellows of the Classical School. Her husband came later; he teaches economics at one of the private colleges. We talked politics, American and Greek. Home at 12:30 a.m. So the two lectures are now over.

Wednesday, March 11, 2009

Iraklio, Hotel Atrion

A fruitless morning. Went to see the new Acropolis Museum, but it's totally closed, can't even get near it. The outside is very different, and attractive. Then went to Kastaniotis's store and office at Zalongou 11, with the idea for a new book, a collection of my various essays. But I was told to telephone and make an appointment. . . . So, to the airport. Ava met me accompanied by a biologist who is giving a lecture on Darwin tomorrow. Later, Ava and I met for supper, a very nice meal of non-Greek food. And lots of good talk. She's going to Athens tomorrow but will be back next Wednesday and we'll share another meal.

Μυρτιά.

Taxi to Venizelos Hospital, where Barbara Tsaka met me and we drove to Myrtia, stopping by a τυρόπιττα for lunch. The Museum is really a mess. Leventis there in his coveralls working; she, happily, spending most of the day finding manuscripts for me. A very fruitful day: examined all they had for Kakridis, Anghelakis, Knös, Eleni Samiou—only the last producing no results (as expected). More tomorrow. She drove me back. At 7:00 p.m. to Ανδρόγεω, where I lectured in 2007, for the Darwin talk, the first of a series of four, the second next Thursday. Excellent! A biological-cum-philosophical defense of Darwinism done extremely well.

Friday, March 13, 2009

Myrtia

Another very fruitful day, especially regarding Stavridakis manuscripts, even the one that I worked so hard to decipher, and now found clearly written out by George Anemoyannis. Home again with Barbara, her baby son screaming and kicking in the back seat and she remarkably calm.

Saturday, March 14, 2009

Iraklio

No Museum on the weekend. I spent most of the day in front of the computer, doing all the chores I had saved up from the two past days at the Museum. Good progress. At 8:30 p.m. Ben Petre came and we drove out of the city to a fine restaurant high up, with a view of the entire city below. Very good food, and even better conversation until midnight. He works as a free-lance translator, Greek to English, and as a corrector of scholars' English. Greek wife, 2 children. He's been here about 15 years. Regaled me with splendid information about the (mis)translation of the Kazantzakis novels by those who did not know Greek.

Sunday, March 15, 2009

Continued to work in the hotel. Barbara Tsaka picked me up at 5:30 and we went together to the village of Χερσόνησο, maybe 20 km to the east of Iraklio, for an Αφιέρωμα στο Καζαντζάκη, held in the hall of the village church, with the priest seated in the chair of honor. After greetings, a chorus of women sang beautifully. Then I was asked to say something.

I spoke about the Επίλεκτα Γράμματα and said that Kazantzakis had a μανία για την ελληνική γλώσσα. Then the Museum's video was shown, the one written by Stavrou, but narrated well by an actor. Barbara asked me to note the errors, which I did; nothing serious. Then two ladies read interminably from Ταξιδεύοντας. Finally Αντώνης Σανουδάκης spoke very well on Διδακτικές παροιμίες και σατυρικά ποιήματα στον Καπετάν Μιχάλη—very interesting, showing what a careful writer Kazantzakis was. I told him afterwards that now I understand better why the novels written in French are so dead, because Kazantzakis couldn't make use of the demotic wealth of his own language. Then the priest rose and with a φωνάρα declared that he agreed with Κύριο Πήτερ regarding Kazantzakis's mania, etc., and stressed Kazantzakis's true religiosity. Then he insisted that I accompany him to his home to taste his own wine that's been 50 years in the barrel. I talked with the παπαδιά. Both she and he were born in this village. The wine, actually, was nothing special. He brought two large bottles-full for me to take back to America (I gave them to Barbara) and also picked a branch of laurel (δάφνη) for me. Home at 10:30 p.m.

Wednesday, March 18, 2009

Worked Monday and Tuesday at the Museum, always with very good results. Yesterday Andonis printed up all the manuscripts I'd indicated, so I now have a huge pile of work to do, completing uncompleted letters. Tsaka and Leventis couldn't have been nicer and more cooperative, and all this in the midst of their ongoing renovations and their need to be ready for a symposium at the end of June. . . . This morning, conversing with the ladies who clean my room, I asked if they were perhaps Romanians because I detected something strange in their Greek. "No, no!" they protested. "We speak Cretan dialect." I was most embarrassed. They say oshi for όχι and tsi for της. . . . Kazantzakis's epigraph in the small Dante he always carried: servus diabolicus Dei. . . . Out for supper with Gareth and Kallia. He hopes to get a subvention from the Onassis Foundation to give him more time to work on the Phaistos Disk. I joked with Kallia because the water is now running in the Lions' Fountain (when last here she explained why it was not running). She'll take me tomorrow to meet Stefanidis's progeny.

Thursday, March 19, 2009

Nice long breakfast with an American young lady whom I saw yesterday reading the Iliad at breakfast and spoke to her about how nice this was. Today we sat together and had much to say to each other about Greece, Australia, New York. She's going off to Santorini tomorrow. I told her about Akrotiri, which of course is closed, alas. . . . Met Kallia at 10:00 a.m. and we went together to meet Γεώργιος Στεφανίδης, son of Demosthenes, who was Harilaos's nephew. The Stefanidis archive remains with the family. They don't want to give it to an institution που θα το βάλει σε δουλάπα. I agreed. . . . In the evening, the second lecture on Darwin, only it wasn't on Darwin. The speaker, minimally prepared, but all too fluent, lectured us on the virtues of Karl Marx. As for Darwin, he agreed that the human being is a βιολογικό ον. Thanks a lot! He argued, strangely, that human violence and other defects are not biological (perhaps that's Marx's view) and can be cured (by socialism, of course). I learned nothing about Darwin, alas.

Friday, March 20, 2009

Beautiful sunny day. Called Kastaniotis and made a rendezvous for next Friday, but I doubt they'll want to accept my proposal of a book collecting my lectures and occasional printed articles. I listed them today from the Vita; there are many. . . . Visited the Historical Museum, newly re-opened, and saw Georgia, and Alexis, and the others I know in the library, all very friendly. Georgia believes that Stravou is lying about the manuscripts of letters to Eleni. . . . Off to Ανδρόγεω again for an evening on Dimakis. But in the afternoon I must record that I had a truly American donut and a superb coffee made in a push-pot. To Ανδρόγεω again for the λογοτεχνική εσπερίδα για Μνηά Δημάκη. Nice to see Stamatis Philippidis again and to hear him give by far the best of the presentations: a "new criticism" analysis of two poems, very fine. He takes cortisone to fight pain but manages, obviously, to work in his retirement, although some days he cannot. Foteini is still playing the piano, I was glad to hear. Right now, Beethoven's Sonata no. 1. My new friend Αντώνης Σανουδάκης, who greeted me with kisses, also spoke. And he edited a collection of Dimakis's poems, which I purchased. The first speaker was the poet Χριστόφορος Λιοντάκης, who said that we are honored to have the presence of Peter Bien, the translator and best commentator on Kazantzakis, etc., whose books unfortunately are not being handled satisfactorily by the κληρονόμος (Stavrou), etc. Then a good speaker recited some poems. Then students of the local λύκειο recited and then sang poems to a guitar accompaniment, very nicely indeed. It was fine also to see Κώστας Μουτζούρης, whom I remembered from Χανιά. And of course good to learn more about Δημάκης, some of whose letters from Kazantzakis I'll be publishing. . . . At 9:00 p.m. Ava came and we went to a fine restaurant with a lady who teaches English privately in Iraklio and a couple, the wife an English teacher in the university who cooperated when John Rassias and I were here, and her husband, a retired professor of physics. Big topic of conversation: the fact that early today the office of Citibank on 25 Αυγούστου had been blown up by anarchists and completely destroyed. . . . Saw Βαρβάρα Τσάκα at the Dimakis event, and finally asked if I could address her in the singular as Βαρβάρα. Of course!

Saturday, March 21, 2009

At the Dimakis event, a newspaper reporter asked me to write some reminiscences of Pandelis Prevelakis, also born 100 years ago. So I did that this morning, telling how he always knew the words that even Mrs. Kazantzakis didn't know, because typically he was the one who gave those words to Kazantzakis. . . . Ava came again and we ate fish in a seaside restaurant very pleasantly. Then I walked to the Θεατρικός Σταθμός and saw an honest-to-God Καραγκιόζης play, live and real. But it was quite poor. He couldn't modulate his voice sufficiently to make each character sound different, and the play, what there was of it, was incoherent, without an outcome. But there was a bit of fun, naturally, and he involved the children in the audience very nicely. . . . Then to Αγίου Μάρκου for the Ritsos evening—three hours, no seats, but Ben Petre saw me and put me in the first row with the dignitaries. Very bad lecture, completely inappropriate for the occasion, because totally professorial in the worst sense, by Maronitis. No one was listening. But then lots of goodies: an adult chorus singing Theodorakis's settings of Ritsos, Eri Ritsou reading part of "The Moonlight Sonata" beautifully (I said hello; she said she's no longer corresponding with the Marders but respects them; also said that she's oppressed and worried). Maronitis smiled and said hello also. The best part was the 5th Gymnasium students singing, reciting, dancing, all connected with Ritsos, and some recordings of Ritsos himself reciting, plus a short video of his life. All in all, a lovely tribute not only to Ritsos but also to what is happening at least some of the time in Greek schools.

Athens, Hotel Arethusa

Traveled with Ava and her friend Mr. Stefanidis (no relation), a computer scientist who is in Stelios's job at the Institute. They treated me to a taxi ride to Syntagma and also told me that a woman in the Ministry of Economics wanted to meet me. She apparently governs the Ministry's aid to the Kazantzakis Museum. The Arethusa Hotel is "minimal" but the price is only €55. I'm getting used to it.

Monday, March 23, 2009

To the Benaki library. Worked well with their up-do-date Greek Larousse encyclopedia, solving may aporias. Found an internet café and ate at the Kendrikon restaurant again.

Tuesday, March 24, 2009

Alas, the Benaki is closed always on Tuesdays and will be tomorrow also: 25 March. But I worked in the hotel preparing my queries. Saw Don Nielsen for two hours in Starbucks (smoke-free). He's in a bad way. Lia is depressed, hasn't spoken to him for three days. He's been fined €2000 for some irregularity owing to marriage away on an island and doesn't have the money, which may delay the residence permit. But he also has a new scheme with the Archbishop of Cyprus (Chrysostomos) that should produce some income and also perhaps a considerable charitable sum for the American Farm School. Is it, however, just another of his many schemes? . . . Ate in a Chinese restaurant. Never again owing to the high cost. But I've discovered that Everest makes really good τорт for €2,60. . . . Chrysanthi reports that the Binswangers are at Kendal looking at two apartments. More news tomorrow.

Wednesday, March 25, 2009

Chrysanthi tells me that the Binswangers have chosen an apartment. Hooray! Today I watched the parade, all military. And the larger the tank, the more the people clapped and yelled παληκάρια. Horrible. And all those machines of destruction are supplied, I believe, by the USA. Interesting to see women in all the services. . . . Finished reviewing all the Stavridakis letters and in reading Anemoyannis's entire collection, just to get a better understanding (which I did) of the issues raised. But I need to be extremely careful. In one of the letters I translated Τραπεζόντα (Trebezon) as “bank” (τράπεζα)!! . . . Met Constance at 3:00 for “lunch.” Poor thing, she’s stuck in this horrible college as an adjunct. Her elements of salvation are the programs she still directs for Queens College.

Thursday, March 26, 2009

Worked six steady hours in the library of the Benaki Museum, fearful that I wouldn’t be able to check all the people I needed to in my fixed time, today and tomorrow. But actually I got through quite a bit more than half and thus should be fine tomorrow. I also found a twelve-page letter from Sikelianos sent to Kazantzakis (I think) before he answered in one of the letters I’ll print. Sikelianos, judging from this, was far more prolix than Kazantzakis. Very hungry, I had dinner at the usual place, rested a bit, and then met Βασιλική Κολυβά at 6:15 together with—surprise—Anna Rosenberg, whom (thankfully) I’d remembered from London. Apparently they are related. Kolyva is in charge of a program stimulating effective use of the computer, and will be going to Myrtia this Tuesday to give a prize to the Kazantzakis Museum for its excellent scanning, etc., all of which benefited me. But it’s just an honor, no money involved. Anna works in Comparative Literature with Spanish and English and has the usual adjunct jobs in several places. She volunteered to help me translate Spanish if need be. . . . Chrysanthi thinks that the Binswangers have chosen an apartment, finally. She told Joan Wilson (recently back from Egypt) that I’ll be at eight-hand piano on Tuesday and Allan Munck that we’ll be having music on Wednesday. Also need to refurbish the Bach Goldbergs for the early music recital later in April, on the harpsichord, and to learn the two pieces for Kinhaven, since Alice says that she is still planning to come although she has begun a new treatment regime for her cancer. Leander reports that he has sleep apnea, but that it’s treatable by a machine that increases the oxygen he breathes while sleeping. . . . I’m ready to go home. It’s been a rather long but very full and profitable time in Greece: Athens–Thessaloniki–Athens again–Iraklio–Myrtia–Athens.

Friday, March 27, 2009

Happily, I finished researching all my queries in the Benaki library by about 1:45 p.m. Walked to Goody’s for a salad (fast day today). Then to Kastaniotis's to talk about a new book. We decided that it would be better to collect my writings on Ritsos, rather than those on Kazantzakis, since this is the Έτος Ρίτσος. I'll need to send all information quickly next week. Saw father and son Kastaniotis again. Father said that the USA caused the financial problem and I agreed. But he also said that his firm, and generally book publishing, is doing better than ever. People in distress apparently like to read more. His sales are increasing. . . . Looked at my e-mail in the coffee shop that includes wi-fi. Learned that Chauncey Loomis died. Born in the same year as I was. "Cancer."

Saturday, March 28, 2009

Sofitel

I chose to spend my last morning in Athens by finding the museum where Ava has her painting. That was difficult. I walked to Monastiraki to get the Metro to Thiseion, only to be told that Thiseion was now closed but only "minutes away." The five minutes turned out to be thirty through a section of Athens I'd never seen: second-hand furniture stores and the like. From the closed station to the museum, another thirty minutes, but I found it finally thanks to asking people. It's Το Πολιτιστικό Κέντρο Δήμου Αθηναίων, very nice, with the art exhibit upstairs and downstairs a Karaghiozis exhibit complete with a current player explaining everything to a group of children. The art upstairs was environmental, about trees. Ava's was the only one that was just pretty: four seasons of a sort of abstract forest in different shades. Lovely. The others were not pretty, but often interesting. Examples: a unrolled roll of toilet paper all covered with words—title, Ο λόγος ανακυκλωμένος. A valensa with a sheep rising out of its own wool. Insides of a clock shaped like a spider. A butterfly made out of machinery, showing I suppose that the real butterfly is also a machine. Downstairs the Karaghiozis exhibit had some posters, one entitled Καραγκιόζης υπουργός την Κυριακή. In front of him various protestors with signs as follows: σύνταξη στα 35, έξω οι κλέφτες, εσένα θέλουμε, προστασία στο περιβάλλον. Reminded me of Mr. Bloom in Circe: Mayor of Dublin for a day. . . . Traveled to the airport, Sofitel Hotel, and began entering into the proper letters the data I collected at the Benaki library. Also on television some really fine bouzouki playing, αμανέδες και ρεμπέτικα, making me sorry to leave Greece (but glad as well). Also, bought Athens News for the first time and realized, thanks to it, how very much does go on in Athens culturally.

Sunday, March 29, 2009

Travel

Up at 4:45 a.m. to catch the flight to Munich. Then a seven-hour wait for the Boston flight spent in the business class lounge where I was able to enter almost all the remaining data from the Benaki, to check e-mail (e.g. from the head of the Athens branch of the British Council whom I never had time to meet), and eat. On the flight, sat next to a man from Vienna who now teaches math at Harvard and was reading the Bhagavad Gita. Lots of interesting talk about Harvard, Larry Summers (whom he supported), etc. Watched tennis on TV, both Nadal and Federer eliminated in semi-finals. Murray the champ.

April 7, 2009

Hanover

What a day! 8:15 a.m., eight-hand piano rehearsing Haydn for Saturday's performance. 10:00 a.m., Professors' Colloquium, with me introducing the speaker. 1:00 p.m., my annual physical exam with Dr. Dacey. 3:30 p.m., conference at the Ledyard Bank with J. T. Underwood and Larry Draper and Stephanie Hart about transferring our accounts from the Bank of America. 6:30 p.m., John and Mary Rassias for supper in the apartment. 9:30 p.m. as John and Mary were leaving, he begins to bleed from the mouth (recent dental work) in the hallway. Quick return to the apartment. Bleeding continues. We call the Kendal nurse. She asks if he takes a blood thinner. Yes. That's the problem. I drive him to the Emergency Room. 10:30 p.m., he's in Emergency under care. We return home.

April 11, 2009

Christos telephoned to say that I'd been elected Επίτιμος Μέλος της Εταιρείας Ελλήνων Συγγραφέων (or something like that). He's a member and so is Meg. Meg will be coming to them for Πάσχα, which means that he and Meg are on better terms now.

Friday, April 17, 2009

Philadelphia

To the Art Museum to see the Cézanne show. His paintings are very spiritual, ethereal. Next to most of them they placed paintings by other artists—Picasso, Matisse, Braque, etc.—influenced by the Cézanne painting in question. All acknowledged Cézanne as their ultimate guru and the inventor of modern art. Nice to see again especially his still lifes with the table and floor all out of proportion. And the three card players accompanied by an art photograph of three biddies playing cards, their faces rapt in concentration. I purchased a small reproduction of the three card players to take home as a memento. . . . Then to Pendle Hill in time for supper. General Board meetings and trustees Friday, Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, centering on the report of the Visiting Committee, which turned out to be to eliminate the General Board and continue with only a single board: the trustees. Good idea. Miraculously everyone agreed, and it was approved. Details to be worked out: change of by-laws, committee structure, etc. I spoke about my negative view of Haverford's Corporation, a comparable board, which was essentially just a show; also of my time as clerk of the General Board struggling to make the meetings more than a show. Nice to see Vince Buscemi and other old friends. Also John Cary, who came for the Cary lecture given by Paul Lacey on the need for confidentiality. While speaking to John afterwards, my left leg suddenly fell asleep and I tumbled to the floor, luckily not hitting anything. This has never happened before. Strange. No damage done. I'm also noticing certain mental slippage. . . . Jennie Keith, a new trustee, is a pianist at about my level. Good sight-reader. On both Saturday and Sunday nights we played duets: Persichetti, Britten, Copland. The Copland is beautiful. She's eager to do more in July if I come. Trustee sessions were also devoted to financial problems: ten years of deficits. I called for zero deficit in two years. Not much support, alas. Perhaps undoable without great injury to Pendle Hill, so they say. But a greater injury would be to go bankrupt and close down entirely, like Antioch College. . . . With so many hours of meetings, I felt unable to concentrate toward the end.

April 23, 2009

In a TLS review of a volume of Beckett's letters, they quoted from the amazing letter to Alex Kaun that I used to cite in my lectures, probably in connection with Molloy. How nice to see it again, especially so soon after seeing all those Cézanne paintings in Philadelphia: "It is indeed getting more and more difficult, even pointless, for me to write in formal English. And more and more my language appears to me like a veil which one has to tear apart in order to get to those things (or the nothingness) lying behind it. Grammar and style! To me they seem to have become as irrelevant as a Biedermeier bathing suit or the imperturbability of a gentleman. A mask. It is to be hoped the time will come, thank God, in some circles it already has, when language is best used when most efficiently abused. . . . Or is literature alone to be left behind on that old, foul road long ago abandoned by music and painting? Is there something paralytically sacred contained within the unnature of the word that does not belong to the elements of the other arts? Is there any reason why that terrifyingly arbitrary materiality of the word surface should not be dissolved, as, for example, the sound surface of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is devoured by huge black pauses, so that for pages on end we cannot perceive it as other than a dizzying path of sounds connecting unfathomable chasms of silence? An answer is requested."

April 26, 2009

Played a Goldberg Variation on the harpsichord at an Early Music concert in the Gathering Room. Huge audience because the concert was dedicated to Gerry Tayler, who died last week. It went well. I'm getting less nervous.

May 1, 2009

Yale Club

To New York via the new Dartmouth Coach service. Left at 6:00 a.m. and arrived at 11:00 a.m. They have wi-fi. I read Tony Manouso's first half of the book on Howard and Anna Brinton, keeping track of errors, typos, etc. Brinton had a truly interesting life because of Orthodox vs. Hicksite divisions, the liberal tendency in Earlham College vs. mid-Western evangelicalism. . . . Went to Patelson's for the last time; it's going out of business, alas. Not much left, but I found a Debussy Petite Suite for Music Minus 1, and something for Dick and me, something else for Allan and me. Stopped at the Onassis Center to see the exhibit on ancient Greek women. Left greetings for Tsilas, who wasn't there. Ballet in the evening: Mozart-Balanchine "Divertimento no. 15," which we've never seen. A scintillating masterpiece of choreographic originality and versatility, and of course beautifully danced. What a pleasure! Then a surprise: "After the Rain," choreographed by Christopher Wheeldon to music by Avro Part, an Estonian. Again: original, inventive, moving, and beautifully danced by Wendy Whelan. Finally "Firebird," which of course is a spectacle, with its Chagall sets and costumes, and a seductive firebird danced by Maria Kowroski, whose hands were continually expressive.

May 2, 2009

New York

In the morning we went on a tour of Harkness House, 1 East 75th, a Fifth Avenue mansion now occupied by the Commonwealth Foundation set up by Harkness. Interesting man who was very philanthropic, but indulged himself with this sumptuous building. I thought that the Commonwealth Foundation, which concentrates on health, might be interested in a CCRC in Greece, but was told that they only operate domestically. . . . We then went to a ballet matinee, again splendid: Bach/Balanchine “Concerto Barocco” with Wendy Whelan again and Albert Evans. Very pure. Then Tchaikovsky “Pas de deux,” athletic extravagance. Then what I was waiting for: Ravel/Balanchine “La Valse” (but mostly “Valse Nobles et Sentimentales”). The music of “La Valse” is haunting, the choreography so-so. Finally: Stravinsky “Symphony in Three Movements,” which we’ve seen in the past. . . . Another supper at the Yale Club (last night, free entry because it’s my birthday month). Then back to Lincoln Center for “Coppélia,” exquisitely danced by Megan Fairchild. Hadn’t expected to like this as much as I did. Spectacular dancing—varied, expressive, virtuosic. A treat.

May 3, 2009

New York–Hanover

Went to 15th Street Meeting. Morningside Meeting, where Vince and Ernie go, was too far because we had to catch the bus at 2:00 p.m. Four mentions of Jesus during the ministry, very different from Hanover. But generally a good Quaker feeling. Home with Dartmouth Coach, 5½ hours from Yale Club to the Hanover Inn.

May 5, 2009

David Watts, director of Human Resources, briefed me on the article coming tomorrow on Jacques, the French dishwasher who writes symphonies. He feels that he has been denied rehiring unjustly. Watts says simply that there were better people. . . . In the evening, Stan Myers, Tom Wilson’s brother-in-law, asked my explanation of problems between Kendal at Hanover and the Kendal Corporation regarding payment of the annual fee. I found lots of appropriate archival material—letters from John Diffey and John Hennessey, etc.

May 6, 2009

Only one student doing Greek at U-Mass, this time, so they asked me to do the exam on Skype instead of driving all the way. It worked well enough.

May 7, 2009

Talked by telephone with Peter Mackridge, who's at Princeton for a month. Can't go to see him, alas, and probably will never return to London. (I haven't renewed my Penn Club membership.) He helped Katerina Anghelaki with Kazantzakis letters to her father, which Stavrou is meant to publish—but when? . . . After supper, Ralph Mayer did an interesting musical program on Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," including a two-piano version of "Petrushka."

May 8–9, 2009

Riparius

To the farm. Good shape. No blow-down. Home clean. Started John Deere and White easily.

May 14, 2009

Joan Wilson came to play the Britten duet with me, preparing for Kinhaven. But several hours later I received e-mail from Alice that she is back in the hospital with relapsed lymphatic cancer and will most likely need to cancel Kinhaven—again. At least her relapse was detected before she traveled east. She needs now to resume chemotherapy treatment. Doesn't look good. I told Leander that neither of us will be coming. Poor Alice had wanted so much to be able this year, unlike last year, to do the Kinhaven workshop. Almost made it . . . but not enough.

May 16, 2009

Cambridge

A.R.T. did Mamet's "Romance," a brilliant satire attacking the judicial system, racial/religious prejudice, homophobia. Wonderfully acted. Marvelously funny, while at the same time serious.

May 17, 2009

After Meeting I gave my talk on "Quaker Light." Large audience. Good questions.

Terpni

Jeff Murphy sent me this testimonial he had apparently sent to Bob Bell:

Professor Bien was the hardest teacher I had at Dartmouth. In his seminal "Modern Novel 1" course, students began by reading "Portrait of the Artist," then Joyce's "Ulysses," Mann's "Death in Venice" and "The Magic Mountain," Proust's "Remembrance . . .," and Kazantzakis's "The Greek Passion." And that is just the beginning, as his lectures—and these books themselves—inspired/forced the student to bone up on those vast pieces of Western (and non-Western) civilization that had somehow theretofore escaped our educations (from Hermes Trismegistus to Nietzsche’s “Birth of Tragedy” to the structure of a fugue to the nature of montage to György Lukács to the Bible and Homer to transubstantiation to epiphany . . .), many of which were not even mentioned in any other College courses. One had the sense of being immersed in culture. But “inspired” is the key word: it was joyous torture. Moreover, the “torture” continued for life, as he answered every letter and e-mail that I have sent to him in the 30 years since my graduation.

His own life is itself an inspiration, including his “retirement,” which is more productive than my “active years”: indeed, I still get tired hearing of his schedule. And yet he has time for former students trying to reignite the spark of inspiration from our memory of him. I am a lawyer, and there was a time when I had several associates who were interested in serious books. So, some 20-plus years after I left Hanover, I proposed to Bien that we would read, say, “Mrs. Dalloway” and he would come to my firm (then in The World Trade Center) and give a one-hour lecture and answer questions, and we would buy dinner and pay a (far too modest) honorarium. He did this four times, on four different books!

Over my 35 years of collegiate, graduate school, and professional life, I have almost never encountered anyone who was able to balance genius/achievement and humanity as does Professor Bien. I only hope that my children encounter such a teacher.

June 13, 2009

Driving to the post office on Waddell Road, I saw a doe with the tiniest fawn I’ve ever seen—no more than two feet tall, if that—but it was fully capable of running along with its mother. . . . Finished annotations this morning for the 1928 letters. Fewer than 30 more years to go.

June 27, 2009

Alec and family arrived in New York this morning from Bangkok and drove to Leander’s for a few days. . . . Mowing this afternoon on the strip on the west side of the pond with the Troy-Bilt, I slipped on the grass and the mower went into the pond, fully submerged. Chrysanthi thought it was very funny. We got it out with a rope and back to the barn with the tractor. But will it ever run again?

July 10, 2009

Alec and I removed the old fencing around the garden and installed new fencing, fixing all the cedar posts, most of which needed to be held in place by metal posts. Two days' work, morning and afternoon, very tiring. But it's done, and much needed.

July 12, 2009

Long e-mail from Dimtri Kyriakou indicating that Charlotte Armstrong and Jud Shaver have told him that he is no longer going to be the Farm School president. Astonishing. No word to the board. I telephoned Mike Keeley in Athens. He said that Kyriakou required that he not be a resident of Greece, be paid in Spain or Austria, not pay Greek taxes, not be subject to military service, etc. They (rightly) refused. So, we now have no president.

July 13, 2009

Very nice visit from Gail and Ruth Schoppert and David and Patti Buck (and their epileptic dog). Lots of talk about Kyriakou (Gail knows nothing). Lots of camaraderie with Alec because all three are involved in international education. Happy hour with ouzo, of course. Dinner with spanakopita and Turkish coffee. Lots of good talk until 10:00 p.m.

July 14, 2009

Our guests treated us to breakfast at Marsha's, 8:25 a.m. until 10:30. Such easy and compatible visitors! Gail, having lived and worked abroad for his entire career, felt ill at ease when back in America. He agrees that Alec, because of his annual six weeks here, and his home, may not suffer the same consequences when, finally, he does return. Alec has turned down offers of promotion that required reduction of his six weeks here. Good! So far . . . Bought a new lock for the repaired gate. Let's hope. I wonder if it might be best to close the gate but leave it unlocked.

July 15, 2009

A rare sunny day, no rain. Worked on letters until 3:30 but then mowed (Leander's, then the south field) until 6:30. Supper at Alec's: salmon.

Chrysanthi and Theo then played chess. He's learning. I played hymns on the harmonium they brought from Irv and Fran's.

July 18, 2009

For our 54th anniversary (yesterday) we went to the ballet matinee of "Coppélia." How nice to see it again, this time starring the extraordinary Tiler Peck and Gonzalo Garcia (in NYC we saw Megan Fairchild). Such fun, such sheer pleasure! Nothing serious, an event magnificently artistic, and just a display of what the dance can do. Before, there was a demonstration workshop with tiny children: first position, plié, and the like, very well taught by one of the principal male dancers. Afterward we went to Lake George and feasted in the Sicilian Pizza, Alec treating; then strolled through Lake George Village, the children insisting on experiencing Frankenstein's Chamber of Horrors. Next: ice cream at Stewart's (of course). A very nice outing.

April 29, 2009

Alec's 51st birthday. Leander came yesterday, Daphne today. We all had supper together, very pleasantly. And, miracle of miracle, this afternoon I finished the annotations, feeling very emotional as I approached Kazantzakis's last letters shortly before he died. What remains now are the queries—annotations where I need information.

August 2, 2009

Finished mowing the south field. Και του χρόνου! . . . Lovely visit the last three days from Daphne and family. Christine much changed for the better. Charming and beautiful.

August 22, 2009

Finished putting up the tractor; still difficult. In the evening, went with Donna and Ed to the Hall of Springs for a lovely leisurely dinner and then the Philadelphia Orchestra. Huge videos inside as well as outside, showing close-ups of instruments soloing at each moment, a great enhancement, especially with the "Bolero," which concluded the program spectacularly. Russian pianist Kirill Gerstein, a marvelous soloist in Rachmaninoff's "Rhapsody on a Theme by Paganini." "Peer Gynt Suite" boring, but de Falla's dances from the "Three Cornered Hat" a good show-off piece for this splendid orchestra.

September 5, 2009

A varied day. Pruned the apple tree in the morning. Then Tom and Joan Wilson came for lunch, returning from Lake Pleasant to Hanover. Tyropites and dholmadhakia. Then supper of delicious spaghetti and scallops with homemade bread with olive oil and garlic. Then to North Creek for a concert, very fine, by a group of Russian a cappella singers, all very professional. First half: Orthodox Church music. Second half: folksongs. Then a little tennis on TV (US Open) and finally, of course, "I Love Lucy," which has been entertaining us for a month.

September 7, 2009

Fran telephoned to say that Irv Shapiro died last night. We knew it was imminent; he was under hospice care. Apparently he thought of us as "inmates" because of our residence at Kendal. But what a shame for Fran, especially, that he denied them residence in a CCRC. I hope that she will now move to one. . . . Dismantled my office today. Sad. Mowed down Chrysanthi's flower garden. Sad. But I'm already booked for eight-hand piano at Kendal next Tuesday, which is nice.

Jeremy Caggiano, the RCPA forester, visited and we walked extensively through Alec's land and the Partnership. I learned a lot. On Alec's there are numerous burls on black cherry trees. There's a man in North River who buys burls from certified forests (like ours) and makes bowls out of them. We'll ask if he is interested. Lots of good trees. Lots and lots of water in the beaver dam, more than ever. Then we walked up Waddell Road to see the white pine stand about halfway up to the north border. Very nice, commended Caggiano, but the regeneration is not pine but balsam. If you do nothing, you'll have a balsam forest there in 40 years instead of a pine forest. Remedy: thinning, to allow more light to reach the ground so that pine can seed themselves, as they do in an open field. Walking up the north logging path, he felt that my thinning there (many years ago) made a difference since that area had mostly valuable trees and no birch or poplar. We examined beech trees, some healthy and some very sick with the beech bark disease that leaves the trees all pimply. If you cut down a sick tree, it regenerates through root suckers and you end up with 5 or 6 new sick trees. Thus when you cut the tree you need to poison the cambium (the living circumference). This goes down to the roots and prevents the unwanted regeneration. Finally, along the southern logging path we found many beautiful oaks and ashes, some with 5- or 6-foot logs in them, but not quite ready yet for harvest. He will return using aerial photography to get a better sense of the entire property. We agreed to do about two acres of thinning a year, which he will mark. It's senseless to harvest now because the price of wood is so depressed, except for veneer. An idea is to ask Irwin or Jim Morris, who have outdoor furnaces that burn soft woods as well as hardwoods if they'd like to remove some of the trees I girdle. Another idea is to contact someone who deals in firewood, again to remove certain trees that I girdle but do not fell. Let's hope that we'll be healthy and vigorous next summer to do some thinning as planned. And let's hope also that with the locked gate we won't have disturbances by David Millington or others of his sort. I'm worried. We'll contact trooper Swan, who says he'll keep a look-out.

Drove to the farm. Beautiful color in Vermont. The purpose was to get all my materials for Milton and Paradise Lost, since I'll be giving a talk on PL for the Professors' Colloquium in November. Everything is exactly as we left it, including the locked gate. Very peaceful. A lovely outing.

October 18, 2009

It seems that I'll need to have cataract surgery on both eyes, says Dr. Brannon. Dr. Desey recommends a second opinion, which I'll get in December from Dr. Miller at Hitchcock. So far I don't have any diminishment of vision.

October 12, 2009

Playing Schumann's E-flat major piano quartet, first movement. So beautiful, but difficult. And with Joan Wilson I'm rehearsing the Britten "Playful Pizzicato" and the Donizetti.

October 15, 2009

Tempe

Routine flights to Philadelphia and Phoenix. Alice met me, driving a pick-up truck. She's feeling OK right now after what she hopes will be the final chemo treatment, but realizes that she has a chronic illness that will never be cured. She's playing piano again. We tried Britten and Doni-zetti, also some Bizet and Dello Joio, all very satisfying but also needing much practice. I tried Goldberg no. 1 for her and it went fairly well.

Vancouver

Arrived last night after 11:00 p.m. Took the new sky train into town. To bed at 1:00 a.m. here, which means 4:00 a.m. New Hampshire time (I rose at 5:15 a.m.). Cell phone dead, but had it fixed. Distressing e-mails from Greece. Yannis Vezyroglou has now resigned from the board. Like Pantelis, he wants Joann to be interim president, then a new search to find an American president. Also another e-mail, from Kyriakou detailing all the money he can find for the school, etc., and why don't we install him as president after all. . . . At the symposium, so nice to see old friends: Tom Doulis, (who has had several minor strokes, but is finishing an old book and planning a new one, and whose son married in France and soon after divorced), Dia Philippides, Andromache Karanika (doing well on a sabbatical in Harvard's center in DC), Martin McKinsey, who has gained tenure at UNH despite opposition by the dean and the department chair, Katerina Anghelaki-Rooke, Victor Papacosma (we talked about Meg Alexiou, who happily is doing research and writing again, on Πτωχοπρόδρομος), also Martha from San Francisco State, Peter Allen, who encourages the Farm School to try Anatolia's no. 2 candidate (who was no. 1 for Peter), Karen Emmerich, Dimitri Tziovas, the nice young man from Brown that I helped: Marinous Pourgouris. . . . Then met Shelagh Ballard and went together to a good Italian restaurant, where we talked with animation from 6:30 to 9:00 p.m. about Geoff (it was his birthday today), about the new house she'll be moving to in a few days, about her three boys and their spouses and children, about the sad fate of Geoff's last business, which never attracted sufficient capital and was sold—the business concerned with the distribution of hydrogen; then about our three children and spouses and their children; and of her loneliness after Geoff's death; and of the problems in the Anglican faith (she still goes to the St. Francis church here); she wants a copy of my Quakerism and Darwin essay when it's published. A lovely reunion. . . . On the way back to the hotel, I met Martin McKinsey on the street. He wanted a beer and I accompanied him, drinking only water. He has tenure at UNH, happily, although he's not fully happy there, and is getting divorced. Reminisces about my course at Harvard, which he attended. Questions about Scott King, who's meant to publish my Ritsos writings. A long day.

October 17, 2009

Vancouver

A very good opening session, with Emmanuela Kantzia speaking on Βιζυηνός and then Dimitri Tziovas speaking excellently on Ritsos's "Philoctetes," deemphasizing the political aspect and emphasizing the individual/psychological one. It was fun for me to revisit material on which I had worked so long ago. In the question period I related Ritsos's reaction to my Penguin prologue: "I'm not a political poet. I'm a poet!" Saw Michael Herzfeld, who is still spending time in Thailand. Nice reunion with Elsa Amanatidou, who has gained tenure at Brown and treated me so well when I was there. Also nice to see Gonda Van Steen again; she has moved to Gainesville, Florida, from Tucson, and is happier there. A man named Christopher Brown introduced himself. He's teaching Greek language at Ohio State, using our Greek Today, and he had been to Dartmouth to do a Rassias program. Good to hear that our book is being used. And he has lots of students every year. . . . Fascinating session hosted by André Gerolymatos demonstrating "the Odysseas Greek Language Tutor" for teaching elementary Greek on line, even in China with grammar, etc. in Chinese. At Simon Fraser they have increased student enrolment in Modern Greek threefold. I thought of the backward, old fashioned teaching of English to Greeks at the Farm School. What a difference! I also thought of our somewhat amateurish website for Greek Today. They would like to look at it, and borrow. . . . Marinos Pourgouris spoke well on the student revolt in Athens last year. Devin E. Naar of Stanford University gave a brilliant paper on "A Chief Rabbi of Greece? Defining 'Hellenic Judaism' between the World Wars," using Ladino newspapers as sources. The difficulties in choosing a leader remind me of the current difficulties of the American Farm School.

Princeton

Nice to be in Palmer House again. Young man at breakfast teaching computer science in Singapore, just arrived with jet lag. I instructed him in feast-fast for his return. Breakfast at the Nassau Inn with Dimitri, who has orchestrated my three days in his usual excellent manner. Great worries about the Farm School board, which is riven by enmities, resignations, etc. Got my key to the Modern Greek Reading Room in Firestone, level A and settled in, but couldn't find the Larousse Encyclopedia that was so helpful in the Benaki library. Later I learned that Dimitri has ordered it but that it hasn't been shipped yet. Good meeting with Don Skemer about my archive. He's fully willing to accept it but warned me that Princeton does not permit photocopying unless all permissions are received. Also, he cannot use my 3 × 5 card file and wants all that information transferred to computer, where it will be easily accessible. Lots of work for me (or somebody) but understandable. What this would be, Dimitri hopes, is a Bien archive containing Kazantzakis, not just a Kazantzakis archive. I'd need to send my Ritsos letters and the letters from Kimon Friar and anything else I have. I was very pleased, obviously. . . . Hard to work in the library because Dimitri has scheduled me so heavily, but I found some useful Who's Whos and literary encyclopedias and was helped by the MG cataloguer, Jeff. Lunch in Scheide Caldwell House. This happens every Monday. All of Dimitri's "harem" are present—the various lucky Fellows supported by Princeton's ample funds. Met briefly with Nicholas Panou, a post-doctoral Fellow and then, very happily at 3:00 p.m. with Marina Brownlee. Kisses and hugs. She is Professor of Spanish here; Kevin teaches medieval French at the University of Pennsylvania and they still live in center city, Philadelphia, where I visited with them when Alec was still at Friends Select. She is involved in some comparative projects involving Spanish and Greek. Lots of good memories of Dartmouth, Chrysanthi, etc. And Marina came to my talk later today. Perhaps she can help me with Spanish queries for the Kazantzakis letters. . . . At 6:00 I returned to Scheide Caldwell House for my lecture on "Kazantzakis in Berlin 1922–23." Full house, no seats. Dimitri gave an exhaustive and embarrassing introduction. I delivered satisfactorily, I suspect, because afterwards there was a barrage of questions and comments, including one from a young scholar who concluded that Kazantzakis was "a faker." Alexander Nehamas told me afterward that the lecture was successful because it was so easy for everyone to understand my personal involvement with the material. Touché! Afterwards, as always, full supper. I joke with everyone here: You're always eating. Mike and Mary came even though, as he always repeats, he doesn't like Kazantzakis, not even Zorba, any longer. Lovely to see Carol Oberto, who remembers Chrysanthi's vivacity so well. So endeth the first day.

Tuesday, October 20, 2009

Princeton

In the morning, met with Constanza Güthenke, who of course I remember from previous meetings. She couldn't attend last night and of course was interested in the German element. Happily she's now a tenured associate professor in Classics and Hellenic studies, very friendly and cordial. Time for some more work in the library, then lunch at Prospect (faculty club) with Dimitri and Mike and Mary Keeley. Conversation mostly about the Farm School. Mike strongly supports Panos Kanellis (so does Annie, but Tasos is strongly opposed). I learned from Mike, for the first time, that Kanellis had been no. 2 when the search committee recommended Kyriakou as no. 1. That's encouraging. I'm squeezed between Manita, who expects me to vote No, and Mike and Annie, who of course will vote Yes. Nice to see Mary looking well and participating in a lively manner despite all her illnesses. . . . Then back to Firestone and the Rare Books section to have Kalliopi Balatsouka go through all Kazantzakis's letters to Kimon Friar (1951–57). I indicated those that I'm printing. She noted dates of all the rest. At home I'll see which of the remaining ones I have in the archive and she'll send me any that I lack. Apparently the Friar archive (which she is civilizing) includes my letters to him and even copies of his to me. He was very systematic, for example copying out the Kazantzakis letters, fortunately, because the originals suffered water damage in Chicago and are partially unreadable. . . . I skipped the lecture on Greek health care in order to complete the agenda for AFS Secondary Committee, which meets on Friday. Tasos has been trying to reach me via telephone, unsuccessfully so far.

Tasos did reach me early in the morning. Surprisingly, he said that he is not worried about fewer hours teaching English, which Bill McGrew views as a major problem. Regarding the president, he is surprised that he disagrees with Annie, since mostly they agree on everything. But he has a low opinion of Kanellis and says that everyone in Thessaloniki does as well. And Kanellis is going round saying that he's the next president of AFS. I don't know what to do. He said that Vouli is sinking fast. Can't walk. Uses a wheelchair. Frail. No faith in the man who promises to reissue my Selected Letters. Είναι στα καλά του; είπα. Όχι! . . . Two items arrived from special collections: Prevelakis's To δέντρο (with autographed presentation to Mario Vitti), which totally solved one of my queries, and Katsimbalis's bibliography of Seferis, who provided step 1 toward solving another query. But when three volumes of Nea Estia also arrived from storage, they turned out to be the wrong ones. . . . Met with David Jenkins, new librarian for classics, Hellenic studies, and linguistics. He learned Greek from Demotic Greek 1 and Ο ιπτάμενος θάλαμος. I encouraged him to buy Greek Today for himself and the Κοραΐς dictionary for the library. . . . Then in the early afternoon, saw Efthymia Rentzou, whom I knew as a graduate student and is now assistant professor of French and Italian, and a mother. Final meeting was with Alexander Nehamas in his office in the Department of Philosophy, 1879 Hall. Talked about my lecture, Nietzsche, Kimon Friar, and how Peter Mackridge refuses to be in the same room with Vassilis Lambropoulos. He also asked about Meg and Roddy, who were enemies, but I told him about the dinner we all had at Meg's home with Roddy and Fran and Meg and Michael. All these enmities are sad. . . . Across from his office: the music building, which of course I remembered. So I asked if I could use a practice room and was given a key without any difficulty. Returned there after supper (in a new restaurant called "Zorba's Brother") and went systematically through the 1st Goldberg variation, which I had luckily brought along the music for). I'm scheduled to perform it on harpsichord this Sunday. Very helpful practice.

Princeton–New York City

Another good practice session in the Music Department. Then the Dinky and New Jersey Transit to Penn Station. Lectured for Jeff Murphy at his new law firm: Sonnenschein et al. in the McGraw Hill Building on 6th Avenue and 48th. Lovely to see his son there, a new graduate looking for a job in New York, so far unsuccessfully, but he had an interview today and is hoping. Jeff explained that his previous firm, Thatcher, is dissolved. Its largest clients were Bear Stearns and Lehman Brothers, both of course non-existent. Thatcher simply had no business, no income, and was put down. One hundred of its lawyers and support staff transferred to Sonnenschein. My audience was about 20. No questions afterwards except one that I couldn't answer: "What made the ancient Greeks so remarkable?" But friendly talk with individuals. One roomed in the same big house with Leander at Oberlin. Another read the Iliad in college. Another is currently listening to Joyce's Ulysses on tape as he drives to and from work each day. Then to the Greek restaurant Kellari on 44th near the Harvard Club, with Jeff's closest colleague and his uncle and wife of the uncle's deceased brother. Good food and talk. I also had a full buffet lunch at the Yale Club in midday, for free because I still used a birthday card.

Friday, October 23, 2009

New York City

To the Guggenheim for Kandinsky retrospective. I'd seen the one they did 25 years ago. This was equally impressive although the commentary by "experts" on the cassette distributed was rather fatuous. . . . To AFS office for College Committee and then Secondary. Nice that Pantelis came this time. Nothing really difficult, but we resolved that the outlying farm not be bought. Even Bill McGrew is of this opinion now. Kellari Restaurant on E. 20th is OK but nothing special. I sat next to Joel Post and opposite Link Jewett, who gave me a position paper he wrote against decreasing CO<sub>2</sub>. Also spoke to a guest who has been helping to find someone for learning deficiencies.

Saturday, October 24, 2009

Full board. Not as bad as predicted. People were courteous and civilized, unlike sessions several years ago. I was furious because Charlotte did not put the Secondary Committee on the agenda. Just an oversight, she declared. Also, last February's Secondary minutes were not reproduced in the minutes as I had written them. (Gail's fault, he later confessed.) Lots of speeches against Kanellis, especially from Pantelis. Others felt that the fractured board should be healed first. But the vote was 14 to 7 in favor. I voted Yea, encouraged by Dimitri and Mike and Annie, although with hesitations especially because Tasos telephoned me a few days ago to express his strong opposition. But at least we have somebody now. . . . Subway with Marders to Brooklyn Heights, where they'd left their luggage at Cindy's house. Drove home with them in driving rain.

October 29, 2009

Finished preparing a talk on Milton and Paradise Lost for the Professors' Colloquium on Monday. Half from old material, half new. It's fun to write a lecture again. And Milton is truly amazing.

October 20, 2009

Greatly helped today by Miguel Valladares, a reference librarian who happens to be Spanish and who carefully researched one of my queries, and solved two more, all concerned with Spain. . . . Lovely concert tonight by the Ling Quartet, finishing with the 3rd Rasumovsky—the extraordinary fugal 4th movement that I loved so much when I was studying music at Haverford.

November 16, 2009

Really finished the Selected Letters. Printed everything downstairs in Academic Computing. Made a copy for myself at Gnomon. Notified Hanne Winarsky at Princeton University Press. She asked for names of possible readers. I gave her Beaton, Mackridge, Philippides, Gounelas. What remains is another trip to Widener Library to check the Papyrus-Larousse Greek Encyclopedia for additional dates of birth and death. I'll do that on December 3, when we go for the talk at the Maliotis Center on Quakers and the Farm School. Then everything goes to Princeton, hard copy plus disk.

November 21, 2009

To Dartmouth Symphony to hear Bonnie Thron do the Shostakovich cello concerto. During the interval three men came up to me and announced that they'd had me for a Frosh seminar in 1971. They remembered the books, etc. Amazing. All three had children now at Dartmouth and playing in the orchestra. . . . Finished reading Ian Barbour's "Religion and Science," the perfect primer for my forthcoming essay.

November 23, 2009

Working now on "Quakerism and Darwin." Interesting. For the first time I've investigated some of the actual writings of Giordano Bruno and Galileo, using them to stress how advanced thought was interpreted as heresy long before Darwin. It's good to be writing something original again instead of translating Kazantzakis's letters or annotating them. A propos, Lia Mehan finally found an address and even an e-mail for Linos Benakis. I've written him about the mysterious "Loukia" in the letter to Elli Lambridi. Let's see if he answers.

November 24, 2009

To Washington

Surprise. Met Rhoda at Springfield AMTRAK station and talked steadily all the way down to New Haven. . . . Deana didn't get home until midnight because she was playing at the White House for Obama's State dinner for the prime minister of India, which included the entire National Symphony. They did Bernstein's "Candide" and the like, but didn't see the guests or dinner, which was in a separate tent. They did, however, see Obama, who came to thank the orchestra.

November 25, 2009

Washington

I went in via Metro and was picked up at Dupont Circle by Mache Karanika, who drove me to the Harvard DC complex, a group of buildings on land donated by Mellon: residences for the Fellows, offices for each, a full library, and a lovely lounge. She's doing well there but not, alas, at her home university, UC Irvine, where the senior people in the department seem to be against her. She needs to find a publisher for her expanded dissertation, then to produce a second book to have a real chance for tenure. But at least she has a job, which is very rare now for classicists. Then to Dennis's favorite chop house to lunch with Nurzhan and Chad. She has no job and has received only one invitation for an interview. He works for an NGO that helps charitable types and other businesses in developing countries get going. They may move to Trinidad in six months to concentrate on this work in the Caribbean area. I told her about difficulties at the Farm School with respect to animals, the presidency, etc. Very pleasant visit. . . . Then met Leander, kids, and Chrysanthi at the National Geographic Museum to see the exhibit of Chinese terracotta figures dug up recently, all meant to accompany and protect the first Chinese emperor in his afterlife. He apparently was a horrible tyrant, and much admired by Mao! Then to the mall to see the World War II memorial, large and grandiose, of course, with some good statements carved into the rock, including "We came to liberate and not to conquer." . . . Dinner in a spaghetti place, very fine. Movie: "Tootsie."

November 26, 2009, Thanksgiving

Practiced Haydn, Scarlatti, and Donizetti. Played the Donizetti duet with Leander, who says it can be effective only if played truly Presto, as indicated. My part is easy enough. Good turkey dinner with all the fixings. Children dressed nicely. Greg's Coen wine! Nicholas played saxophone jazz with Leander, very well indeed, and Sophia played guitar, her new choice. Nicholas is no longer enthusiastic about basketball. Leander thinks he pushed him too much. He's a natural on the saxophone, it seems. Good tone, good rhythm. Watched "Planes, Trains, and Automobiles," still with great pleasure and laughter—a brilliant film. I worked a little copyediting Manouosos's book on Howard and Anna Brinton, read TLS, entered Linos Benakis's info on Loukia in the 1924 letters. Drank B&B as a nightcap.

December 1, 2009

Cambridge

Working in Widener again. This time with the Papyros-Larousse Encyclopedia, and I did find one solution to a query. Then to Hellenic College using our directional aid, a huge help. Lovely to see the Drapers after many years, and the Bucks, after many months, and Charlotte Armstrong, who apologized about the mix-up with the Secondary Committee minutes, and a woman who hopes to publish the Macrakis festschrift at Hellenic, and William Howard Taft IV, Judy Richardson's "partner," it seems. Draper spoke well, as did a recent graduate who is now at Mt. Holyoke, and I gave a very short version of my paper on Quakers and the Farm School. Lots of good food, of course, and good feelings.

December 4, 2009

Cambridge

Back to Widener. Found one more solution to a query, this time from the International Who's Who. Then to Roilos's Medieval and Early Modern Greek Symposium. Jan Ziolkowsky was the introducer. Lovely to see him again after 25 years. He says that I haven't changed. Also lovely to see the Jeffreys; the last time was in Sydney; and Roddy, who says he'll be happy to vet the Selected Letters, and Dia, and Wim. Good talks but not really in my field. Spent 1½ hours with Dia and Wim in the evening in their apartment.

December 5, 2009

Leisurely morning. Then to a splendid discussion at the A.R.T. with Prof. Graber of Harvard and Diane Paulus, the new A.R.T. director and current director of the Public Theater in New York City, about how to do Shakespeare in the twenty-first century, and why the A.R.T. is having its current Shakespeare festival. In the question period I asked which plays they'd favor if they were teaching in high school or middle school.

One answered King Lear—oh, the students need to play the role of Cordelia! Then at 2:00 p.m. the marvelous adaptation of A Winter's Tale, transformed into an opera with an all-black cast and a jazzy orchestra. Moving, funny, energizing.

December 6, 2009

In the mail, my new book on Ritsos, needing proof-reading.

December 7, 2009

Vouli died this morning after ten days in hospital. Joann sent me the news via e-mail and Chrysanthi then telephoned and spoke to Katerina in the apartment, which is full of people. Funeral tomorrow. I first met her in 1955, 54 years ago. I sent a fax to Stylianos: Χάσαμε τη Βούλη σήμερα το πρωί. Πόσα φαητά είχαμε η Χρυσάνθη κι εγώ γύρω στο τραπέζι της, πόσους φίλους γνωρίσαμε στο διαμέρισμά της! Φαντάζομαι πως και σένα, εκεί πρώτα ανταμώσαμε, στη Τσιμισκή 87. Χάσαμε μια φιλία που βάσταξε μισο αιώνα. Κρίμα.

December 12, 2009

Good poetry is magical, for example these verses in Thomas Hardy's "Afterwards" that I read today in the TLS:

When the present has latched its postern behind my tremulous stay
And the May month flaps its glad green leaves like wings, Delicate-filmed as new-spun silk, will the neighbours say:
'He was a man who used to notice such things'?

The trick, of course, is the juxtaposition of highly poetic diction with the ordinary speech of the last line.

December 16, 2009

Horrible! Kingsley Ervin, whom I chatted with two days ago about piano playing and Adirondacks and his singing at St. Thomas's, today is dead. Sudden and unexpected. . . . But Daphne celebrated her birthday (43rd) beautifully, with Greg cooking all the meals, taking all three children to and from school, etc. So, pluses and minuses. Also, tonight I played Haydn and Debussy and Frank Bridge with Allan and Dick, and Mozart before that with Dick. At least the Mozart was well done. . . . Amazingly, I'm in touch with Ian Barbour. He read my new essay on Quakerism, Darwin, and Process theology and seemed to approve except for my use of Don Cupitt, whom Barbour considers promoting “a purely naturalist view, though a rich naturalism that makes extensive use of symbolism.” He worries about a clash between Cupitt’s emphasis on transience and Hartshorne’s dipolar view. I need to rethink my essay a bit and will try to make some adjustments tomorrow. . . . Very nice supper yesterday with Jim and Carol Armstrong. He is 90 and beginning to feel old, but still drives his tractor, although Carol worries about his balance when getting on it and especially off. I think of my own jumps when I descend the John Deere. How will I manage if I survive to age 90? . . . Am proof-reading my new book on Ritsos, which reprints all my old essays and translations. The translations are printed with the original Greek side by side. The Greek, of course, is horribly done; everything is wrong.

December 21, 2009

Good talk with Fred Berthold about process theology, which he favors and hopes to write a book on. He told me Tillich’s definition of God: that which is worthy of our ultimate concern.

December 30, 2009

I’ve been haunted the last few days by thoughts of Dietrich Bonhoeffer. He was imprisoned by the Nazis owing to his anti-Nazi activities, culminating in a failed attempt to assassinate Hitler. In prison he had access to books and wrote a remarkable series of letters that were eventually published. But after about two years being held without trial, he was subjected to a summary, false trial, condemned to death, and executed cruelly the next morning by hanging, with wire around his neck, not even a rope. Apparently he went to his death calmly, praying fervently. What a horror! He was, I think, 41 years old. . . . Lunched with Andrea Useem and her husband, Justin. She’s now employed by the Washington Post’s Leadership blog, mostly editing other people’s submissions. She said that she got tired of concentrating on Islam. I asked about liberal Islam. Yes, it exists, she and Justin replied, but not in open discussion. Liberals keep quiet, or whisper to like-minded Moslem friends. Nothing further. Moreover, the mosque does not provide fellowship. You rush over five times a day, often in the midst of work, pray, rush out. They haven’t gotten to know a circle of compatible Moslems through the mosque. Happily, Quakerism is very different.

December 31, 2009

Received this today via e-mail. Govostis publishes Christos Alexiou's periodical Θέματα Λογοτεχνίας. The author illustrated must be Dostoevsky, who definitely is not laughing.

Dec. 29–30, Riparius

January 8, 2010

Went to Freya Von Moltke's funeral at the Norwich Congregational Church. Veronica played a Mozart adagio. Grandchildren and the surviving son spoke about the Countess's modesty, humor, etc., and about the estate, now restored as a reconciliation center. Full house; very moving, especially when the coffin was moved out by the family at the end, for burial. . . . Then to Meriden for lunch with Kesaya and Chris, Lafayette, the Hunters, and Sydney Jarvis. Kesaya then took the ladies into the main house in order to distribute to them elements of Mayme's wardrobe, so Chrysanthi returned with various pieces, in a snowstorm, driving at 25 mph. Kesaya couldn't feel comfortable with the new Dartmouth president, Jim Kim, and is leaving on April 1st, but with nine months' continuing salary plus 93% of her medical insurance bill for life. . . . I'm translating various poems from Stylianos's latest collection, Παίδων και εφήβων. Difficult, but I'm able to do some of them, at least. . . . Very nice letter from John Tallmadge, who marvels that we've known each other for 45 years.

January 18, 2010

Princeton University Press says that my Selected Letters is far too long. I've got to reduce it. I'll probably remove the incomplete letters to Eleni Kazantzakis where the manuscripts are missing. Too bad. Started the re-reading. The positive aspect is that I'm catching various errors, adding some annotations, etc.

January 23–24, 2010

An interesting weekend in Cambridge. Saturday lunch with Peter Wilson, the student who lived near us. He writes novels and has a child adopted from China. Then to the A.R.T. at 3:00 p.m. for part one of "Gatz," a show comprising a full reading of The Great Gatsby plus dramatic action, very well done but seven hours long. One hour for supper, in the theater. Then another three hours, 7:30 to 10:30. The major point seems to be: money is a curse. Slept at the Quaker Center. Nice to see Andy Towl, now 99 years old and very sprightly, also several people from Pendle Hill: Alec Kern and a former student.

January 25, 2010

ΒΟΥΛΗ ΠΡΟΥΣΑΛΗ (1924-2009)

Η Βούλη Προύσαλη, κρητικής καταγωγής, γεννήθηκε στη Θεσσαλονίκη και σπούδασε στη Φιλοσοφική Σχολή του Α.Π.θ. Προσλήφθηκε ως φιλόλογος στην Σχολή το 1967, στην τότε Οικοκυρική Σχολή θηλέων, και από το 1978 δίδαξε στα σχολεία του Δευτεροβάθμιου προγράμματος, ως τη συνταξιοδότηση της το 1995. Η Βούλη, άτομο ιδιαίτερα «δοτικό» ήταν αφιερωμένη σε ό,τι αγαπούσε: τον σύζυγό της, που δυστυχώς έφυγε πολύ νωρίς, την μητέρα της, τους συγγενείς, τους φίλους της... Γαλουχημένη με το πνεύμα «Lansdale» αφιερώθηκε στο έργο της Σχολής, πιστεύοντας στην αποστολή της και την υπηρέτησε πιστά και από ποικίλες θέσεις. Λάτρευσε, φρόντισε και βοήθησε με κάθε τρόπο μαθητές και συναδέλφους. Την Βούλη δεν θα τη θυμόμαστε μόνο για την πολύχρονη και πολυσχιδή εκπαιδευτική της προσφορά ή για τα πολλά φανερά καλά που έκανε. Θα τη θυμόμαστε κυρίως για τα πιο πολλά κρυφά καλά που έκανε! . . .

Santa Barbara

Arrived last night after a routine non-stop flight from Boston to Los Angeles, where Greg and Daphne met us. Luckily I have Ethernet communication to the web in their guest house and was able to deal with 70-odd e-mails including important ones: four letters protesting the breakup of the King's College Modern Greek department, sad and unexpected, for lack of enough students. I've been able to continue reviewing the Kazantzakis letters, finding very few to remove, but correcting various mistakes along the way. Have also been able to practice, using Daphne's Steinway, doing the Bach F-minor prelude, Book 2, that I hope to do on the harpsichord in May at Kendal. I'm also learning my 8-hand part for the overture to Don Giovanni. Most of our time here has been spent watching the boys' athletics. First Andrew's basketball game at the YMCA. He's not very good and was allowed to play only 8 minutes. These are 5th graders. Some are quite remarkable and fun to see, as was the entire phenomenon of the Y's activities—lots of teams, volunteer coaches.

Saturday, February 20, 2010

Today it was Peter's basketball game, also at the Y. First graders, lacking the skills of the fifth graders, but still full of energy and speed. Peter is better coordinated than Andrew and more competitive. Interestingly, Daphne seems to know lots of people and lots know Greg from his early days in this town. We next went to Peter's tennis lesson at the adjacent club, full of very expert players. And a marvelous machine that throws out tennis balls exactly where the instructor wants them, and can even produce topspin. In the afternoon, Andrew's tennis lesson. He hits quite well, looks like he could develop into a fairly good player. He is not meant for rough competitive team sports. Greg went to coach the high school team. One of his best is accepted to Dartmouth for next year. Tonight Greg and Daphne went to a dinner party involving wines contributed by growers, all proceeds to charity. And Christina went off to Los Angeles to play in a volleyball tournament. Some life! The privileged few.

Sunday, February 21, 2010

Walked in the woods. Met a woman on a horse that she coaxed to step sideways to let us pass. Then to movies, to see the film of a series of books read avidly by Andrew, a way of bringing Greek myth into modernity. Very fanciful, with the Lotos Casino in Las Vegas, for example, being the Lotus Eaters. Saw the chief shopping center of Santa Barbara, which is architecturally beautiful and very appealing, of course. Jazz band outside of Borders. Shop selling eight different flavors of frozen yogurt. And so forth. In the evening, we went to the theater: "Souvenir" by Stephen Temperley, about a singer who is tone deaf. Two characters, the singer and her accompanist, the latter played expertly by Edwin Cahill, a graduate of New England Conservatory of Music and Manhattan School—pianist, singer, actor. Very funny as she sings everything hopelessly off-key, but becomes a cult and performs in Carnegie Hall.

Monday, February 22, 2010

Daphne took us to see the remarkable Santa Barbara Law Court building, constructed in 1925 after the previous building was destroyed by an earthquake. Modeled on Mediterranean originals, it is quite amazing for its beauty, grandeur, imagination, and style, surely like no other law court building anywhere, and full of murals, calligraphy, gardens. Even the jail, adjoining, is beautiful. . . . In the afternoon, I spent considerable time practicing my Bach, which is advancing. Read a story to Peter before he slept, about a crocodile and a hen who discuss that they are brother and sister because, despite their differences, they both lay eggs.

Tuesday, February 23, 2010

Daphne took us for a long walk along the Montecito beach, where a very wealthy man built a huge mansion, created bike paths, and purchased the Biltmore Hotel. His fortune came from toys for children. Nice to see the beautiful Biltmore, built in 1926, like the Courthouse, after the earthquake. Lots of tile-work and luxury. Then more luxury next to the Biltmore in the club where the Tebbes are members. Huge swimming pool, longer than Olympic length, gym, ping pong, sauna, decks for sunbathing, a nice outdoor lunch (with electric heaters overhead) that we indulged, a fancier restaurant, etc., and of course the sound of breakers and the view of the adjacent Pacific Ocean. Met a friend of Greg's, a Dartmouth grad of '93 named Matthews who now is a visitor for the Rockefeller Center. Spoke with him about Michael Gazanniga, who is now at UCSB. Also about President McLaughlin, business ethos versus academic ethos, two cultures. The luxury and wealth here are of course extraordinary. . . . After supper we went to a meeting at Christina's school meant to encourage parents to have their children stay there for the 9th grade instead of transferring to 9th in a high school. The school is typically progressive. I asked the teachers if they knew the origins—i.e., previous schools of this nature. They really did not. I think of the Wynken School near Weimar described by Kazantzakis. When they spoke of their student council, I asked if they ever thought of peer review, and the headmaster answered, "That is our desired goal." Christina's history teacher graduated from Dartmouth. He spoke very highly of her, saying that she's scholarly and friendly. One of the fathers came up to thank all the Tebbes for Christina's good friendship with his own daughter, who is having difficulties. Yet at home she is horrible. Refuses to talk, eats and excuses herself immediately to disappear. She casts a pall over the entire household. Yet apparently at school she is an entirely different person. She will need to decide now whether to stay another year in this fine progressive school or to start 9th grade in Santa Barbara High School. Before that she'll go on one of the school's usual trips, climbing Mt. Whitney, and will continue playing volleyball to see if her team qualifies for higher competition. Of the children, Peter is the most outgoing. Andrew is sweet but silent compared to Peter (but not to Christina). And Andrew, not good at team sports like basketball, is quite good at tennis, as we observed the other day. . . . Shirley Dodson says that she wants to print my "Quakerism, Darwin, and Process Theology" in the Pendle Hill pamphlet series. Good. But she suggests revisions, all of which I find entirely reasonable. She says that I am too categorically negative about Quakers; they don't always subscribe, as I claim, to complete Platonism. I just found in a Kazantzakis letter a statement that "eternity" must be considered qualitative, not quantitative. I'll use that. Also, she wants me to be more personal, so I think I'll talk about my marvelous Plato and Aristotle course at Harvard. This is a revision that I'm happy to do. I'll be able, as well, to use some of the material in the essay I wrote for the Seeger festschrift, about which I had completely forgotten.

Wednesday, February 24, 2010

Raining, but we kept our appointment at Lotus Land and went around for two hours under umbrellas, guided by a docent. An extraordinary garden, very diverse, with plants from everywhere in the world. I thought continually of Darwin—the profusion of species, each specialized. Walking through this wonderland, one truly senses the extraordinary natural world of which we are one small part.

Thursday, February 25, 2010

A nice visit with Professor Apostolos Athanassakis of UCSB, chairman of the Department of Classics there. He remembers being in our house in Hanover, something I do not remember. We share many acquaintances: Meg Alexiou, Kimon Friar, Bill Scott, George Thomson, Andonis Decavalles, Greg Nagy. He is now editing The Charioteer and wants me to contribute. I queried him about perhaps lecturing if and when we return here—for example a reading of poems by Modern Greek authors treating ancient Greek materials. He took me to yet another beautiful seaside restaurant near the university. I had mussels and clams. We had two martinis, plus pasta. He is well known there, introduced me to several men at the bar, one of whom said proudly that his father attended Dartmouth. . . . Also spent considerable time today practicing my Bach prelude and even the fugue a bit. Christina's report card arrived. A or A+ in everything plus excellent for attitude, deportment. Strange, because at home she's a horror.

Friday, February 26, 2010

Nice visit from Lucia, looking much older but still very lively. We talked about CCRCs. She has found nothing attractive here. . . . My Bach prelude is beginning to sound like real music. And I'm progressing a little on the fugue. With Lucia we ate lunch in the next town; breakfasts all day.

Saturday, February 27, 2010

To Peter's basketball game again. Very exciting; they lost by 2 points. Peter got one basket. Lovely to see these first graders exercising as a team. Greg in 8th grade coached the 3rd grader who is now the grown-up coach of Peter's team. Small world. Drove through Westmont College, advertised as for "students of faith." Presumably girls there are not drugged, as they are at Dartmouth.

March 9, 2010

Hooray! Hanne at Princeton said I could send the Kazantzakis Letters in their "shortened" state, still about 800 pages worth. . . . And I finished revising "Quakerism, Darwin, and Process-Relational Theology," greatly helped by Shirley Dodson's critique.

March 12, 2010

I booked tickets to Greece for June 21–28 shortly before we have to fly to Arizona on July 2nd, and put the tickets on hold for 24 hours, not paying. At supper, it suddenly occurred to me, and I said to Chrysanthi, "You know, we really don't have to go to Greece." She burst into total joy, saying "Wonderful. Let's stay home." "But you won't see your family." "No matter. Let's stay home." So I canceled the tickets.

March 15, 2010

Posted Kazantzakis Letters (reduced) to Princeton. Chrysanthi asked me later, "Well, what will you do now?" The answer was easy:

1. More work on the letters after Princeton gets back to me, not to mention the index.
2. Prepare the deleted letters for the website of Ekdoseis Kazantzaki. Niki Stavrou is thrilled at the prospect.
3. See my Ritsos book through to publication.
4. Translate more of Harkianakis's poems.
5. See Quakerism and Darwin through to publication. That, too, in revised form, has been returned to Pendle Hill.
6. Write an introduction to the JMGS special issue on Kazantzakis; revise papers given in the NYU symposium, and adjust my own short paper given there.
7. Learn the F-minor Well Tempered (Book 2) fugue. I'm doing well on the prelude.

Peter Schweitzer telephoned to say that his wife, Susan, died last night after a long, debilitating illness. Death was for her—and him—a release.

March 16, 2010

Chrysanthi had the first of her cataract operations. Dr. Miller, who spent time in Greece first as a teenager in Greek Summer and then as a counselor for that program, greeted us with Καλή μέρα, and noted that he would operate on the αριστερό eye. Everything went well. She now has a bandage over the eye. He'll remove it tomorrow morning and then she should have the pleasant surprise of greatly improved sight.

March 22, 2010

Met Norvell Reese and his wife at Corinne Johnson's. He's the one who subsidized the publication of the Steve Cary book. A jolly man, very rich it seems, and very involved since his youth in Quaker activities. Ditto for his wife. . . . Urged by them, we are going to sign up at Pendle Hill to attend the anniversary celebrations in November and hear Parker Palmer give the Steve Cary lecture.

March 31, 2010

Kendal is producing a book consisting of accounts by residents of their experiences in World War II. I asked Chrysanthi to contribute and she agreed, writing the first half of what follows and then discovering a previous bit of writing that we added as the second half, fixing things a bit to make the chronology work (it isn't fully accurate). The next day, after I had submitted her text, she had misgivings about the second part, feeling that it was far too personal. Thus I resubmitted this time only the first part. But then, the following day, she became very agitated about that submission as well, complained of stomach cramps, etc. So we withdrew everything. But I add the script here:

THE GERMAN OCCUPATION OF THESSALONIKI,
GREECE—APRIL 1941 TO OCTOBER 1944

Chrysanthi Bien

I was eight years old in April 1941 when German parachutists invaded my home town, Thessaloniki, Greece. At 7:00 a.m. a Greek officer came, knocked at our door, and told us to leave town immediately. We did not know for how long. My mother took six pillow cases, one for each member of the family, and filled them with things that we might need. My parents, my two brothers, my sister, and I each took one of these. We started walking. Many people joined us. We didn't know where we were going—just out of the city. Very often we had to lie down owing to bombs that filled the air and made a horrible noise. The sky was full of beautiful yellow, orange, and green parachutes—especially orange. I remember how beautiful it was but also how horrible. We kept walking and walking, falling down each time a bomb sounded. I don't remember how far we walked, but it was a long way. Finally we arrived at a village. We did not know anybody, but my father somehow found some flour to buy and we children went out in the fields to collect dandelions, which my mother made into a sort of puree. I remember how delicious it was. (We were exceedingly hungry!)

We stayed in this village for two or three months, after which they told us to go back home, again walking. On the road home, we saw many people tearing the parachutes in order to use the material for clothing or to sell it. When we returned home, the streets were full of tanks and our house and neighborhood were occupied by Germans. My father, an elementary school principal, managed to find us a place to stay with some of his students, until we found our own home. Our lives were not pleasant: no food, no playing outside in the street, as we used to do. Also, the advice we received every morning, very strongly, was not to trust anybody, not even friends, neighbors, or even relatives. The German "soup committee" gave us some "flour"—the chaff of the wheat. I remember that every Tuesday and Saturday I went with other children to the soldiers' dormitory because the soldiers threw old pieces of bread to us, which we ran to collect. Many times older children took this bread out of my hands and I returned with nothing. People were dying in the streets. The community oven cooked some of the chaff-bread but we had to stand in line to get it. Very often beggars who were nearly dead grabbed the bread from our hands. The little bread we did secure was hidden by my mother beneath her bed. We received one piece a day so that it would last longer. Life became worse and worse.

Some Greeks sold themselves to the Germans. These collaborators made our lives still worse. Suddenly we saw them all loaded down with guns, walking with Germans and spying in various neighborhoods. Odysseas, my younger brother, was in the second year of law school. One day the university students decided to demonstrate against the Germans. They demanded food, homes, and jobs. The demonstration was horrible, and very unsuccessful. The next night at 2:00 a.m. our home was filled with Germans and collaborators. Two Germans pulled off my blankets. Putting a gun against my face, they demanded that I tell them where my brother was. At the same time, other Germans began hitting my father, whom they confused with my brother. After that unforgettable night, our family life changed forever. We lost my brother, not knowing if he were alive or dead. Our family life was never the same. The Germans used to come two or three times a week, at any hour, to ask questions about my brother. Whenever they came, the collaborators helped themselves to whatever food was in our home and took it away. My parents never complained about losing their belongings; they tried to be nice to the collaborators in the hope that the collaborators would be nice to them. But that student demonstration started a new era of suspicion. The Germans and collaborators, working together, used every means to spread fear everywhere. People were no longer the same; no one smiled; everyone was afraid to talk with others. The Germans started to arrest people or whole families because of a brother's action in a demonstration. They came very often and demanded that we confess our knowledge of where our brother was. The prisons were full of completely innocent people because of a brother, sister, or neighbor. My family had this same history.

Three years later, my brother Odysseas was in the mountains with a communist unit of the resistance forces. The Germans, although clearly losing the war and soon to leave Thessaloniki, continued to persecute families of those in the resistance. At that time I was one of the children recruited to help gather up newborn babies abandoned on doorsteps by their Greek mothers because fathered by German soldiers (the mothers having received ample food and clothing as thanks for their "services"). One day at 2:00 o'clock in the afternoon I was informed that the Third Police Precinct required me to appear immediately. I was in the suburbs, six kilometers from city-center. I put on my coat at once and ran all the way. . . . Out of breath, I had a sudden idea to go quickly to ask my parents what was happening. I climbed the stairs and what did I see: a haunted house, empty, all the doors open, cold. Hateful. My blood froze. I dashed quickly into every room, called out and called out again, but the entire apartment, devoid of everything that resembled a family's home, smelled of informers' boots, Gestapo, collaborators. When I looked in one of the bedrooms, what did I see: my sister stretched out, half dead, gazing at the ceiling with tearful frozen eyes. She didn't say anything to me. I grew frightened. Sweat and shivers froze my bones, my knees gave way, my entire being wept for everything I was seeing and undergoing at that moment. I didn't have any idea what was happening; I was acting mechanically, quickly. I ran to our neighbor, who told me that the collaborators had come and taken the whole family but had left my sister because at that moment she had suffered a nervous breakdown. The neighbor didn't know anything else, or any details. Besides, I didn't have time to wait; I needed to go as quickly as possible to appear at the police station. I went. I knocked on the door, proceeded inside, and greeted the officer politely with a smile (that's what we were taught: always greet them with a smile). Like a god from top to bottom, he looked at me severely, without saying anything. He called another policeman who led me to a large cell whose chain-tied doors he had to open with two huge keys. He shoved me in and departed. The space was filled with women standing, some kneeling. As soon as I entered I heard "Poor thing! A young girl!" (I was eleven years old.) I stood where I'd taken the first step without uttering a sound, bereft of words and feelings, and unable to sense what was happening around me. A new world was in front of me. Suddenly I felt myself a part of this new world of mine: two tiny holes with iron-barred windows, weeping women of all types whom I had never seen until then. They told their stories and exchanged information, introducing themselves in the hope of someday finding each other again in the world outside. There in the midst of the sad and aggrieved female voices I made out the voice of my mother. Disappointed and humiliated, I pushed my way left and right and came near her. She saw, hugged me, and I heard "Κορίτσι μου!" (My daughter!) among her maternal sobs. That's all. The poison blocked my throat and I didn't say anything. What could we say? Our situation said it all. My mother stood there like a pillar, always unbending, always beautiful, patient, tender, active, brave, unselfish. Now, however, this goddess of mine had descended to being imprisoned; she became in my sight like all the other women. That tormented me exceedingly: that this higher, precious, rare woman who was my mother, my ideal individual, my adored person whom I believed unconquerable—that she had descended in that cell to be handled as they pleased by the police and was unable to show her pride and integrity. That thought broke the wings of my existence. Many times I did not even want to see my mother when I laid my head on her breast and slept. We didn't speak at all. Although I wondered what she was thinking, what could we say with a bitter mouth in that suspicious atmosphere? All this, and more, tormented me, without a word to utter.

After forty bitter and tormenting days, the chains were heard. We all curled up, petrified, and fixed our eyes on the door. A policeman shouted my name fiercely and commandingly. I got up in a flash and, jumping over the seated women and pushing aside the standing ones, I obeyed his commands. "Follow me!" When I emerged outside I saw the American Farm School's Quaker director, who had heard of my plight because of my work collecting orphaned newborns. It was October 1944. The Germans were leaving Thessaloniki and he had just arrived from Cairo. He hugged me with tears in his eyes and patted me. While I was still in his embrace I heard him saying to the Greek police officer, "I'll be responsible for everything. I promise you that Chrysanthi will be under our protection and supervision and she will remain at our school without outside contacts." He placed me in his car and we left. At night when they put me to sleep with blankets, a hot-water bottle, and a cup of chamomile with honey and lemon, when they all had left and I was alone, it was only then that I came to myself and began to cry. I had forgotten to say goodbye to my mother, my goddess, she who had given me so much, had sung me so many songs, had lain awake so many nights and had deprived herself for my sake. For a moment I did not know where I was, who I was. I had lost my mother, father, two brothers, and sister. I was alone.

But there may be something positive emerging from this distressing history, since Chrysanthi now says that she wants to write a long memoir starting with her time at Woodbrooke in 1955 and continuing with her life in the United States at farm and in city. Μακάρι! She also summarized her life: lovely early childhood, then horror from 1941 to early 1950s, the joy from 1955 onward!

April 4, 2010, Easter

Επιτάφιος service in Newport on Friday. Brought Evelyn Spiegel and Carrie Rosenblum, the Dartmouth student who'll be going to the Farm School in September as one of the new interns. I started tutoring her in Greek last week. Today: Kendal Easter lunch with Spiegels, Pyttes, and Suzanne Laaspere. Tonight we're having Rassias, Marders, Spiegels, and Penny Binswanger for τσουρέκι and cracking eggs.

April 17, 2010

Lawrence, Massachusetts

To Lawrence, Massachusetts for Amy Bolton's Bat Mitzvah, which means "daughter of the commandments." Amy, a tall, beautiful lass of 13, was very poised and secure. The best talk, as at Rachel's a few years ago, was by Clive. The text of the ceremony, to me, is revolting because unbelievable gibberish from the Torah (Leviticus, etc.) with a few good moments calling for peace (Shalom). The rabbi was very lively. Amy is fostering various charities through all this, so it's not all in vain. Lovely to see Alice there, looking quite well. She says that her white blood cell count is normal after the last chemo treatment; however, she has platelets, something in the blood that promotes clotting, giving her black and blue marks on the skin. Obviously she is still very ill and the disease is incurable, but perhaps this treatment can control its development. All the children were there, including Paul and Dana with their new baby. David's business is thriving (it's health care). So is Clive's. Susan and Ellen have decided to get married, on September 5th. It can't be legal in California but they don't care. Ellen proposed and Susan accepted. Chrysanthi says that she's willing to go. Leander came with Sophia. Sophia, also 13, seemed so tiny and shrunken by comparison with the Bolton girls, all three. Leander will run the Kinhaven duet workshop this summer despite significantly reduced enrolment and vows that this will be the final year.

May 6, 2010

New York City

Since we canceled our June trip to Greece, I suggested that we spend two days in NYC and go to the ballet. Today we traveled by Dartmouth Coach, arriving at 11:30 a.m. Went to MoMA in the afternoon to see the exhibit of photographs by Henri Cartier-Bresson, big spreads he did for Life Magazine on war scenes, Soviet Russia, Indonesia, 1948 China, American vulgarity. Also old favorites, especially the Picassos. Supper at the Yale Club, no cost because it's my birthday month. The ballet was all Balanchine: "Concerto Barocco," where the two lead dancers follow the two solo violins and the corps does the tuttis; "Duo Concertant" (Stravinsky); "Four Temperaments" (Hindemith), and "Symphony in Three Movements" (Stravinsky). As always: moving, beautiful performances, especially the "Concerto Barocco," one of Balanchine's early ballets (1941).

May 7, 2010

Tonight's ballets were all Robbins. "2 and 3 Part Inventions," just piano, lovely to hear; "Opus 19/The Dreamer" (Prokofiev), using his lovely first violin concerto; "I'm Old Fashioned" (the Fred Astaire ballet). The music of the first two splendid; Morton Gould's arrangement of Jerome Kern in the Astaire ballet boring and unimaginative (I'm a snob, surely). But Fred Astaire is always wonderful to watch. Interestingly, of the dancers on stage I always watch the girls not the boys, but with Astaire I watch him and not his partner (Rita Hayworth this time). . . . Earlier today we went to the Met to see the Picasso retrospective, an extraordinary opportunity. His very early work, representational, shows his large talent. Ditto for the Blue Period. Everything was there: the entire career step by step. Then, the show called "American Woman: Fashioning a National Identity," starting with the era of Henry James's Washington Square, continuing up to today. The styles of the 1920s and 1930s I well remember from my mother, including her wedding dress.

Saturday, May 8, 2010

We returned via Dartmouth Coach to Hanover, arriving at 1:30 p.m. I practiced, took a brief nap, and at 3:30 played the 8-hand version of Haydn's Military Symphony, first movement, at our monthly recital. Actually we played it better than ever before at rehearsals. No mistakes.

May 14, 2010

Alec reported that the Patana School closed today owing to the hostilities downtown, the first day lost by the school despite all the disturbances recently and previously. Also, a sort of civil war seems to be in progress in central Bangkok.

May 28, 2010

Chrysanthi invited six guests for supper in the apartment to celebrate my 80th birthday: Muncks, Pietsches, Wilsons. Claire brought a very chocolaty chocolate cake. Menu all Greek: τυρόπιτα, κρεατόπιτα, δολμαδάδια, χωριάτικη σαλάτα. Very pleasant.

May 29, 2010

Went to the Dartmouth Symphony and Handel Society's performance of Mahler's Second Symphony, the "Resurrection." The first movement in my opinion is psychopathic. But the rest isn't; it's even beautiful at times besides being extraordinarily loud. (We were in the second row.) What a joy to see our Dartmouth students performing so professionally.

June 6, 2010

I played the prelude and postlude at the memorial service for Bob Stanton. Bach's fugue in A-flat from Book 2 of the Well-Tempered, and then a Chopin Nocturne. Not perfect, but not bad. And I seem to have conquered the jitters. . . . People here are upset by all the construction and feel that the original sense of community has been lost. Various groups are trying to enlist me to sign a petition or to help plan a remedy. Chrysanthi keeps lecturing me to stay outside and apart from all this. I'm pulled both ways. But we're about to depart for Riparius, which perhaps is the answer, at least until September.

June 12, 2010

I played the Bach fugue again in the Cary Room this time plus 8-hand piano: Overture to Don Giovanni. Frequent performance has reduced my nervousness remarkably. No more frozen hands.

June 13, 2010

To Riparius. Entering our farm, we were observed by a doe in the east field, very attentive so long as the car alone was in her vision but off she went as soon as we emerged from it.

June 15, 2010

Lovely, warm e-mail from Έρη Πίτσου responding to my message to her after I noticed in my journal from decades ago a few sentences about her together with us in Christos's home in Birmingham, and how she was studying American literature but still had not read Faulkner.

June 16, 2010

Tractor battery dead, surprising because I charged it so carefully in Hannover. Earl Millington came down and discovered that it was simply the positive cable not secured tightly enough to the terminal.

June 17, 2010

When it went dead again I knew what to do this time; I fixed it correctly, and everything was fine. But I couldn't start the Troy-Bilt, the one that took a swim last year. It will go back to Dale's tomorrow. . . . Everything else is now working well including TV, and high-speed internet after some difficulty solved by a nice technician from the telephone company. I'm working on my revised lecture for Jeff Murphy on A Passage to India. Last night we watched Howard's End, thanks to Netflix. Before that, more "I Love Lucy."

June 20, 2010

Back to the farm. More mowing, this time at Alec's. Our Troy-Bilt doesn't work. Water from its "swim" last year had remained in the motor and rusted out some parts. It's now, thanks to Earl, at Huggins' place in Warrensburg to see if he can fix it. . . . I'm trying to learn the prelude to the A-minor fugue in Book 2.

From The Economist, June 19, 2010. Very important for Kazantzakis's Bergsonism:

In one way, post-genomic biology—biology 2.0, if you like—has finally killed the idea of vitalism, the persistent belief that to explain how living things work, something more is needed than just an understanding of their physics and chemistry. True, no biologist has really believed in vitalism for more than a century. Nevertheless, the promise of genomics, that the parts list of a cell and, by extension, of a living organism, is finite and cataloguable, leaves no room for ghosts in the machine.

Viewed another way, though, biology 2.0 is actually neo-vitalistic. No one thinks that a computer is anything more than the sum of its continually changing physical states, yet those states can be abstracted into concepts and processed by a branch of learning that has come to be known as information science, independently of the shifting pattern of electrical charges inside the computer's processor.

So it is with the new biology. The chemicals in a cell are the hardware. The information encoded in the DNA is the preloaded software. The interactions between the cellular chemicals are like the constantly changing states of processing and memory chips. Though understanding the genome has proved more complicated than expected, no discovery made so far suggests anything other than that all the information needed to make a cell is squirreled away in the DNA. Yet the whole is somehow greater than the sum of its parts.

Whether the new biology is viewed as rigorously mechanistic or neo-vitalistic, what has become apparent over the past decade is that the process by which the genome regulates itself, both directly by one gene telling another what to do and indirectly by manipulating the other molecules in a cell, is vastly more complicated and sophisticated than anybody expected.

I remember the pleasure I felt listening to Peter Constantine talk on Isaac Babel, whom he had just translated, and receiving his book. Today in the TLS I read that the translations are full, truly full, of horrible errors on every page. I'm thus glad that I'm having Peter Mackridge check my Kazantzakis letters. In the same TLS I encountered the following poem by Zbigniew Herbert, translated by Alissa Valles:

ON TRANSLATING POETRY

Like a clumsy bumblebee he alights on a flower bending the fragile stem he elbows his way through rows of petals like pages of a dictionary

he wants in where fragrance and sweetness are and though he has a cold and can't taste anything he pushes on until he bumps his head against the yellow pistil and that's as far as he gets it's too hard to push through the calyx into the root so the bee emerges swaggering loudly humming
 I was in there and those who don't take his word for it can take a look at his nose yellow with pollen.

Very good for my work on Χαρκιανάκης!

June 29, 2010

Weeded the garden, which now looks fine. Tilled it again with the Mantis, which I succeeded in getting to run again by adjusting the carburetor. . . . Am watching Wimbledon with pleasure.

July 1, 2010

Chrysanthi and I are raking up lots of hay in the east field. I did half the "beach" using Leander's mower, finishing with the scythe. Happily, the Troy-Bilt was not seriously in trouble. Mr. Higgins in Warrensburg has fixed it for only $30.00. . . . A good poem, read today in April 2's TLS:

LAST REQUEST

(After reading the TLS, February 12, 2010)

Samuel Johnson, pitiable and great, feared death because his soul might never die being damned by God to eternal pain.
 Hume stopped fearing death, seeing his soul to be a bundle of sensations death would untie, thus preventing Dante's infernal state.

One poet knew the bed where he would lie at a window in sight of sea and sky, screens behind which a patient daemon would,
 ‘rather like music,’ thump the floor, cry thrice, ‘Come, Jeffers.’ Let me too without distress obey that call into fertile nothingness.

Sedona, Arizona

Traveled yesterday, leaving the farm at 8:15 a.m. and arriving at our destination at 8:45 p.m. Arizona time = 11:45 p.m. Eastern time. Good, uneventful flights. Avis car at Phoenix, and I didn’t get lost. Found Alec and Peter Buseck waiting for us at the entrance to Briar Patch Inn, to show us a direct way to our cabin, named “Owl.” Only Peter gave us someone else’s key by mistake, so at 12:30 a.m. we were awakened by knocking on the door; another couple had our key, we had theirs, so we exchanged amicably. Saw Alice last night and Clive, Monica, Theo, Elena. Alice in good spirits but relaxing in an armchair. . . . Breakfast this morning outdoors with a racing stream below, red-rocked canyon wall in the distance, and guitarist and violinist playing music. Joined by Paul and his four-month-old baby, chubby and serene, and David and Alice. All the “young folks” went on a hike in the canyon. We drove to Sedona on 89A, which offers spectacular views of the red-rock formations, all eerie shapes. Back to the cabin. I’m reading A Passage to India in the edition that I carefully annotated with marginal notes when I taught the novel. It’s a great pleasure to return to it now, with probably greater appreciation than I had many years ago. I’ll be lecturing on it for Jeff Murphy’s lawyers in New York on July 15. Also the last few days I have been watching Wimbledon avidly but am missing the ladies’ finals today and will miss the gentlemen’s tomorrow. . . . At 5:00 p.m. we all gathered in the “Big House” for the celebration. Peter brought out a vintage bottle of port he had purchased in 1970 from University College, Oxford, and very fine it was indeed. Susie showed numerous photos on power point, some donated earlier by us—for example, a scene at Peter and Alice’s wedding at Hone and Irene’s, photos of his father and mother, a photo of all of us when we went to the Grand Canyon on my parents’ anniversary, etc. Statements by Paul, Ellen, David, some limericks composed by Lori, etc., and a catered supper ending with a large very chocolaty chocolate cake. Professions of enduring love by Peter and Alice. Alice very tired at one point and took a respite, but returned in good form. She begins chemo again on Wednesday, hoping for the best.

Sedona–Grand Canyon

I accompanied Alec and family to the Grand Canyon, a two-hour drive from Sedona. Amazing scenery along the way: canyons, mesa, 7000-foot altitudes, 13000-foot volcanoes. Entering, I received a lifetime pass to all National Parks. Grand Canyon is very commercialized but obviously the canyon by itself is still pristine—huge and unthinkable. We went down one of the trails perhaps  $\frac{1}{4}$  mile and then happily turned back—it was scary. Reached Sedona about 4:15 p.m. A much needed shower and change of clothes. Then everyone announced they were going to Slide Rock. We arrived after 6:00 p.m. and the official entrance was closed, but we were able to reach the site “surreptitiously.” It reminded me of the Black Hole. A healthy stream flowing over smooth rocks that one can slide over, ending in a deeper pool. Elena and Theo broke the ice and were followed by Alison and Amy, also Paul, David, Ellen and, with lots of screeches, Dana. A good finale to the weekend’s festivities. Another dinner, nice words, and goodbyes.

Monday, July 5, 2010

Phoenix–Albany

Up at 5:30 a.m. Easy drive to Phoenix. No traffic because today is also a holiday. Discovered in the US Airways Club that Nadal defeated Berdych in straight sets.

Thursday, July 8, 2010

From A Passage to India, chapter 31: “If I live impeccably now, it is only because I am well on in the forties—a period of revision. In the eighties I shall revise again. And before the nineties come I shall be revised!” (The speaker is of course Fielding.)

Friday, July 10, 2010

Fancy dinner at the Copperfield Inn with Don and Maria Kurka and two of their Garnet Lake friends, followed by a dreadful concert at Tannery Pond. A chamber orchestra. It started with the Star Spangled Banner, everyone rising. Later they played the theme songs of Army, Navy, Marines, Air Force and Coast Guard, asking in each case for those who had served to stand and be applauded. Following this: God Bless America plus army marches. Too bad Art Perryman wasn't present; he would have approved. He told Chrysanthi that Obama was trying to make the USA a Muslim nation.

July 14, 2010

Saratoga

Our annual feast at Hall of Springs followed by ballet, celebrating our 55th anniversary a few days in advance plus Alec's birthday further in advance. Wonderful to see Balanchine's genius on display, as always. Family continued home. I drove south to the Marriott Albany to spend the night.

July 15, 2010

New York

Early flight to La Guardia. Lunch at the Yale Club. Nice to see my favorite waitress, Angela. Limousine picked me up at 4:30, drove clear across town on 44th to the Hudson. Hell's Kitchen is now replete with fancy apartment buildings and restaurants. We drove down past the old piers where we departed for Europe, now removed or converted into entertainment centers. A narrow park along the entire stretch with bicycle paths. To the World Financial Center. Cafés, open-air, along the river. Marinas. Beautiful. The tall atrium of #2 WFC with indoor palm trees. Met downstairs by old friends who had attended my previous lectures, then upstairs by Jeff's classy, sexy "assistant," then Jeff and others I'd remembered, including Paul, the artist. And an Indian gentleman, a painter named Natvar Bhavsar, who had been brought along, since the subject was Forster's A Passage to India. Good crowd. Good questions afterwards. Couldn't answer some of them, since I'm really so distant now from all this—e.g., Why are the three sections connected with climate: e.g., heat, rain? The Indian said that Forster's picture of India under the Raj is inaccurate. I should read William Dalrymple's White Mughals to see why. Reception following the lecture. Long talk with the founding director of the firm. Then the Indian took us all to "the best Indian restaurant in New York" (of course), on Hudson Street, the owner his friend. He ordered for us, including lamb chops. Nothing extraordinary, but fine service and atmosphere. About ten people around the table. Finished at about 11:00 p.m.

July 16, 2010

New York City

Yale Club air conditioning failed during the night. Breakfast outdoors on the roof. Amazingly, I found White Mughals in the Yale Club library and read about 100 pages on and off, lots in the airport waiting for my flight, delayed two hours. At 9:30 a.m. went to the King Tut exhibit in the former New York Times building on West 44th between 7th and 8th. Beautifully displayed and captioned artifacts from the Cairo Museum relating to Tutankhamun himself (who reigned from age 9 to 18, when he died) and other Pharaohs. I brought the catalogue back for Chrysanthi and also to show to the Wilsons in September. Back at “Terpni” at 11:00 p.m., I learned that our pump had failed. No water! Returned with a pound of manouri cheese.

July 17, 2010

Luckily, Pinky O’Dell was able to come in the morning to replace the broken pump. What an immense job it was to haul out first Leander’s pump, which is only half-way down, then ours, hundreds of feet down, then to replace it with the new McDonald pump, and to reinsert both and all the wiring. The lever for the drain rusted off and needs to be fixed. Pinky will do that separately, later. The new water is full of sand but will clear up in a few days, we’re told. The old pump was installed in 1990, so it lasted exactly 20 years, about right, says Pinky. The major trouble is that we don’t use it continually since we’re gone for 8½ months each year. If the new one lasts 20 years, I’ll be 100 when it breaks. Total charge $785, which the Terpni Partnership account will pay.

July 28, 2010

Damn! Pendle Hill rejected my Quakerism and Darwin (revised) for the second time, definitively now. I’ve asked Darren Middleton if he knows of another possible venue. . . . Dan Fones and crew are here, ridding a large pine of branches interfering with our TV reception, felling the dying pine in back of Leander’s cabin, trimming branches to allow more sunlight in the garden. Cost this time: $1200 for a full day’s work. Right now Dan, with crampons, has climbed high up in the TV tree, with a small chain saw lopping off branch after branch.

July 29, 2010

Alec’s birthday. I bought him a 4-inch vice, very fancy, for a hypothetical workbench to be built (next year, it seems) in his barn. We started our thinning operation on the #2 plot, the one for beech trees, I using an axe because my Stihl is at Dave Whitty's getting a new piston. Somehow—how?—I prepared a can of 50:1 gas:oil for the saws and forgot to add the oil. Thus we ran both my saw and Alec's plus the Mantis on gas only, no oil. But Alec's is working still and so is the Mantis. We finished plot #3 (hemlocks) last week.

plus a special menu for the children, ending with Brownie à la mode. . . .
Lots of appropriate toasts. Then outside to take our 2010 family photo.
Then back to our private dining room. I read most of the following remarks from my journals concerning Riparius:

July 10, 1952, S.S. Waterman, mid-Atlantic

I had been at Riparius and immediately returned . . . taking Peter [Gardner] with me to the farm. The few days with him were delightful. We finished the sheathing on the overhang, then put the roofing paper over it. Next we completed the outside nailing for chinking, and Peter helped me with most of the oakum. Two nights after having worked steadily from 8 a.m. until 8 p.m. we went horseback riding, once as far as the Black Hole, with Clare Carman. Before Peter came I had put on most of the roofing paper, filled in the two gables with boards from the barn, and laid the two floors. After he left I completed the chinking, including the outside cementing, all but a few logs directly under the overhang, where rain cannot enter; put in all the windows, planeing them to size and securing each with a sash lock; made and hung two doors, only temporary ones, however; creosoted the outside up to the level of the windowsills. It was a grand month at Riparius. I worked very well, largely, I think, because of the relaxation and companionship in taking meals with the Carmans instead of preparing them myself, as I did the summer before. I enjoyed their conversation, simple as it was, much more than that of the Gerstanzangs, where Arthur Levitt and Karen invited me one evening for a steak dinner. The desolate, meaningless, parasitic life of those people with their constant round of tennis, swimming, golf, or boredom stands in sharp contrast to the constructive activity and deep human contact I knew over at Riparius. Even a slight incident binds people and destroys all the sophisticated superficiality that characterizes so many people. Alvin Millington cut his leg with an axe and the blood gushed out so fast that he had to apply a tourniquet (lucky thing he thought to do it). I drove him down to Carmans', where he had left his car, and offered to drive him to Chestertown, but he thought he could make it by himself. As I expected, he began getting faint down the hill, and stopped at home so that his wife could accompany him. An hour or so later he was back at Carmans', and his childish smile when I happened to drive by was something to warm the coldest heart. "Ten stitches," he said, with pride; and he looked like a great honor had been given him instead of a near-great misfortune. He thanked me profusely, although all I did was drive him half a mile (at the end of which he had presence of mind enough to apologize for the pool of blood on the floor of my truck).

What real part the farm will play in my life yet remains to be seen. At any rate I shall have a home, for you cannot call Sunnyside or New York City a "home" and really mean anything.

Tuesday, October 21, 1952, Riparius.

Warmed by a pot-bellied tin stove, illumined by a kerosene mantle lamp, and enjoying the fruits of much labor, here in my cabin. . . . Now I am at Riparius and feasting on the fall colors, the ever-bright stars at night, the bend of trees to the wind. Since Saturday I have been laying the finish floor downstairs of five-inch Canadian spruce. Only five rows left. I have also filled up a few more holes around windows, etc., in an effort to get the place reasonably ready for winter living. But the fireplace will have to wait now, for it is too cold for cement work.

Thursday, October 23, 1952, Riparius.

Yesterday I finally finished the floor, and what a difference it makes. Now I really feel protected in this house and even confident that it will see me through a hard Adirondack winter.

December 20, 1952, Sunnyside.

So far, my house has cost as follows, exclusive of tools and things stolen:

cement for foundation	$ 15.00
floor joists 18/2" × 6" × 16' @ .080	23.00
corner posts 4/2" × 6" × 12'; 4/2" × 4" × 12	6.50
windows and sash	108.00
door & window frames 150 r.f. 2" × 6"	12.00
plate 2/2" × 4" × 20'	2.00
spruce flooring, tongue & grooved @ 140	57.00
shiplap flooring	35.00
rafters 36/2" × 6" × 16'	46.00
sheathing	45.00
asphalt roofing paper	24.00
oakum	15.00
cement & lime for chinking	10.00
nails	15.00
creosote	5.00
	$418.50

September 1, 1953, Rochester.

I had a glorious two-week vacation at Riparius, made complete in every way by good weather, lots of work accomplished, and much socializing, the latter not ordinarily a part of my Riparius stays. . . . I built a good deal of my fireplace and did, I think, a good job. On the outside I built up the footing, then laid the hearth of firebrick, which I put on so unevenly that it looks like a genuine 17th century antique hearth, and thus is very becoming. On the inside I got as far as the arch, which I didn't complete for lack of the proper-sized arch support.

A Haverford freshman, John Hawkins, was Sibley's chargé d'affaires and we soon became friends, since he is mostly interested in music, is an organist, and a friend of Peter Gardner's. He helped me lay rock one afternoon. Then I went over to George Davis's place and bought the beautiful pump organ there for $20. That evening and one other, John and I played it far into the night. . . . Went horseback riding . . . up past Dr. Barnard's, where we enjoyed her magnificent panoramic view, and then through the woods to Mr. Kennedy and one of his mistresses.

October 30, 1954, Riparius.

Warming my feet in front of a truly blazing fire in my fireplace, the first fire of its career. And a foot-warming one it is, too, cackling away, spurting, blistering; now and then throwing out a dangerous spark onto the carpet, making me wish that I had not forgotten the fire-screen that still lies useless in fireplace-less 3902. One log is already shriveled red from the heat; the others are encased by semi-circular leaping flames. Now the wood begins to settle a bit, dangerously. I see ashes on my clean white firebrick. Soon the hearth will be black with use.

But all is not well. I found that my cabin had been broken into, or so it appeared. The lock and lock-fixture on the back door had been sheared off. I saw immediately that someone had removed the stovepipe that projected through the south attic window. I went upstairs with trepidation, expecting everything else to be taken, but nothing was. I told Carmans and they immediately said that the culprits were four hunters living across the road, for they had needed stovepipe.

Tomorrow I hope to pour a concrete slab for my chimney cap and to complete the struts that will hold it up. Also I must hang the new front door and figure a way to make the back one more secure. After this I want to make window coverings from the old barn-wood.

November 2, 1954, Riparius.

Sherman, Ken, Fred, and Hal found a bee tree yesterday. Sherman braved the bees' wrath and stole the cone, escaping with only one sting. Clare placed the cone in a large pan and heated it until the honey separated down from the wax. She then strained the liquor until it became clear: a delicious finished product. I told them that I had a bee tree on my place, too, so today we all went back to the edge of the swamp to look at it. It turned out to be the same one they had found. The top had fallen off and lay open on the ground, exposing both honey and bees. The latter droned industriously over part of the cone, eating the honey that they had manufactured and stored over the past years. Actually, most of the honey was already consumed. Sherman said that if we had found the tree a year or two ago we would have captured two or three hundred pounds of honey. As it was we only got a few jars full.

June 2, 1958, Riparius.

Freddie killed eight porcupines in my barn this winter. Also a bobcat which, as he says, “was sitting upon a rock just like a house cat. I had my twenty-two, and I shot him right in the neck. He just rolled off the rock, kicked a couple of times, and . . . that was all!”

There’s a blazing full moon to the east tonight, and a very insistent whippoorwill outside.

September 12, 1959, Riparius.

I accidentally chipped off Roy Millington’s front tooth—his “best apple-eating tooth”—while we were sawing wood. Took him to Dr. White in Chestertown, who put on a cap and hopes that the tooth can be saved.

Saw Nick Millington again. He lost his arm in the sawmill, now has a hook, and a twitch in the left shoulder where the straps are. He gets $145 a month from the government, so is fine that way.

I saw Alvin Millington yesterday, too. He’s a virile looking chap, much younger than I’d thought, with a prizefighter’s nose and a scant beard. His project now is making his own bullets and loading used shells with them. He has elaborate molds & precision machinery for this, and says he saves about 80% of the cost of new bullets.

I like the Millingtons’ children: Roy, David, Jimmy, Dale, Earl, Catherine, and a few others. Roy takes charge of everything. Jimmy is the black sheep. David is the best looking. Chrysanthi says they’re all barbarians and are corrupting Leander.

July 28, 1960, Riparius.

We cleaned the organ and saw a baby mouse crouching inside. Chrysanthi quickly went and brought the cat, who pounced. A little squeak and then silence, the cat walking methodically away with a pluff of fur between her teeth. But then Alec screamed mightily. He—poor thing—could see nothing but injustice and tragedy in this planned and well-executed murder.

July 2, 1961, Riparius.

I lost a lamb the morning after we bought him, because I went to get the two lambs from their shed, by myself, and while I was holding one the other slipped out between a crack resulting from a loose board (the house having been patched together hastily the night before). The other lamb struggled furiously to escape as well but I held on to his foot. I could hear, actually feel, his heart thumping and making the entire body quiver. It was a sudden, furious effort. I thought surely he would drop dead from a heart attack. The successful escapee stood off about 20 feet from the house, glaring at me, and then both lambs began bleating plaintively at each other. I called Chrysanthi, and we (very stupidly) tried to head off the lamb, forcing him back toward the barns. But he kept retreating in the opposite direction, and before long went into the woods. A few days later we learned that the lamb had been seen in town, near the post office, on the following morning.

The remaining lamb must have a charmed life, however, ferocious, unpleasant beast that he is, always glaring at me hatefully with his head lowered, as though glancing over the rims of bifocal glasses. I say so because last Sunday, as we were driving home from our swim and picnic at Minerva Beach, we saw the blackest, cruelest-looking clouds I had ever seen, and rushed back home, beating the storm by just a half a minute. I had tied the lamb to the shed and had left the door open, and the rain came down so furiously, and with lightning and a hurricane wind, that I didn't have time to go out to him or, rather, I was about to go to him when I saw his entire shed rise up in the air, fall again, and the next time rise and continue rising, sailing through the air like a kite and landing upside down about sixty feet from its original position. I waited until the storm passed and then ran to the field, expecting to see the poor lamb strangled. But there he was, wet but healthy, next to the shed, the rope around his neck. We set the building upright and gave him an extra dish of grain—the filthy beast! The same wind also toppled over the outhouse, ripping off its peaked roof. I had to spend the next day salvaging the roofing and making a new, shed-type, roof.

Our first month here is already gone! I finished the first draft of Saint Francis and have started the revision. No time for other reading, however. My projects so far: enlarging the garden, building the sheep shed, peeling 110 cedar posts, putting the windows in the kitchen, and building a set of shelves, using glue and dowel-pins, my first venture in this type of construction. Also, fixing up the chicken house and putting a fence around it. Of our five chickens, only one lays, and she only every other day. Also, we got two kittens from Mr. Tubbs, and one disappeared the other night, probably scared by some animal that came to eat the cat's food. The other kitten, which has two "club feet," couldn't run far enough to get lost. Here is an example of where a defect aided in the battle for survival. Of all our animals, only the rabbits have suffered nothing very spectacular, although their house was also overturned in last week's storm.

August 5, 2010

We finished all three of the areas designated for thinning, Alec doing probably three-quarters of the work and I one-quarter. . . . Celebrated Sophia's birthday pleasantly. Her white pine, which seemed to be dying, suddenly came alive.

August 6, 2010

Lunch at Marsha's. Then retrieved my Stihl from Whitty, with a new piston. Cost $100. Left Alec's, which also suffered from my gaffe of not putting oil in the gasoline can marked 50:1. . . . Final supper with Alec and family. Then to Stewart's.

August 11, 2010

Harvard Magazine had an article on drop-outs and requested others to send in their memories. So I sent this:

Although I left Harvard after only two years (1948-1950), I am not technically a "drop-out" because what I did was transfer to Haverford College, where I received my B.A. in 1952. Nevertheless, my story may be of some interest to true drop-outs.

The major problem for me was the size of classes and the remoteness from professors. I experienced marvelous lecture courses, especially from Raphael Demos and Samuel Beer, but was always in a huge hall and terrified at approaching the professor. An equal problem was the disappointing nature of the sections.

Most of the graduate students who conducted my sections were not interested in teaching us, or even in the course material, but rather in having us do research for their ongoing doctoral dissertations. (There was one splendid exception, however.) The difference between Harvard and Haverford is well illustrated by the case of Professor Hocking. He had retired from Harvard just before I arrived; otherwise I surely would have taken his famous philosophy course on the meeting of East and West, sitting with 300 others in a large hall. When I matriculated at Haverford as a junior, I discovered that he was there as a visiting professor and would be offering this same course. Naturally, I enrolled. The class consisted of twenty students. Professor Hocking read and graded all the essays (Haverford did not have any graduate students). In one of my essays, I ventured to disagree with him. He graded it "A" and invited me to supper. This resulted in a friendship that continued via correspondence until he died.

In addition, I felt that Harvard's justified pride in intellectual accomplishment left it morally deficient. There was very little sense that we were extraordinarily privileged and therefore owed something to the rest of the world. The exact opposite was true at Haverford, which sent me out as a work-camper on weekends to the slums of Philadelphia and which tended to produce graduates interested in teaching, social work, the ministry, etc., instead of business or banking.

If I had remained at Harvard for my junior and senior years, presumably some of these difficulties would have disappeared or been reduced. However, Haverford—largely because of its intimacy—changed my life in a way that I doubt could have happened at Harvard.

To Chestertown to hear the Johnny Cash Band. Spoiled because none of the words could be understood—owing to distortion in microphones, Leander said. Still fun to hear "Jackson" and other favorites. Pizza afterwards in the Chestertown place now under new management and much better.

Typing in my office, I had two fauns ten feet away, not bothered at all by me as they sniffed at the grass; then the doe, their mother, also very close and undisturbed by me. I'm now typing volume 2 of my Journal: 1950, summer at Brant Lake, visit to MacLeish, transfer to Haverford, Hocking's course. . . . Waiting for Peter Mackridge's final set of corrections of the Kazantzakis letters.

August 13, 2010

Leander and I felled a tree in back of his cabin, landing it expertly exactly where we intended it to go. My repaired Stihl chain saw works beautifully. (I had accidentally filled it with gasoline minus oil, which ruined the piston.) Dave Whitty's son (also Dave Whitty) did the expert repair.

August 14, 2010

Attended a woodsman's education session at John Sullivan's farm (John very friendly, assured me that Protect the Adirondacks, although without resources, is at least honest, not corrupt). Saw Steve Warne there, our very first forester, now working for Donna and Ed. A good demonstrator from Cornell gave basic lessons in (a) identifying which trees to eliminate in a thinning exercise, (b) safety with a chain saw, (c) how to fell a tree. I was familiar with much of this, but certainly not all, especially cutting technique. On a large trunk, after making the V, he doesn't cut from the back toward the V, but inserts the saw point-first through the trunk one inch in back of the V, to create the hinge. Then he uses wedges, or he saws from this cut backwards, away from the V until the tree begins to sway, at which time he "escapes" at least 15 feet away at a 45-degree angle, not behind the tree.

Peter Mackridge completed his vetting of the Kazantzakis letters. I couldn't have found a more competent person to do this job, because of his trained eye, his knowledge of Greek, including idioms, his wide knowledge of Greek history and culture (resulting in valuable help with the annotations). He has saved me from extreme embarrassment. My errors in number and nature are beginning to convince me that at age 80 my mind is no longer what it used to be. I append here part of his final e-mail:

"Reading and checking through your translations has been an educative and often moving experience for me. In particular, I found the hairs standing up on my back with emotion as I read the very last letters that he wrote before disappearing off the face of the earth somewhere between China and Alaska (a fitting way to go, in a sense).

“I would like to be able to write a review article about your book for BMGS when it is published, με το καλό. It would be a pity not to give myself the opportunity to record my judgements and impressions, and as an editor I can waive the normal convention that books should not be reviewed by people who are acknowledged by the author as having contributed something to it. Unfortunately, because of the pressure of time, I had to do the checking job very quickly, and I didn't have time to make any notes that might help me in such an article, so I will have to look again, at greater leisure, at the text in the published version of your book.

“I send you many congratulations on your great work. It is an άθλος worthy of Kazantzakis himself, and I'm delighted and privileged to have been given an opportunity to have contributed to it.

“With all good wishes to you and Chrysanthi. Peter”

Lunch at the Copperfield Inn with the new president of Protect the Adirondacks, Peter C. (?), and the chief fund-raiser. Peter is very impressive: newly retired after many jobs entirely relevant to his new position. Told me that RCPA and the precursor of Protect were both near bankruptcy. Consolidation seemed to help, but the finances are still very meager. I gave $1000 this year. Obviously they want more. . . . Then went to Greg's barbershop in Minerva, run by a transplant from New Jersey with a pronounced New York City accent. He gave me an excellent haircut for $8.00 and then asked if I wanted him to do my eyebrows! No! He enlarged on all the excellent communal activities in Minerva. I hope to visit him again next summer.

August 21, 2010

Finished draft no. 4 (!) of Quakers and Darwin in order to shorten it to about 4000 words (from 8000), to comply with the usual word count of articles in the QUIP journal, which is willing to take a look. . . . Worked hard afterwards, completing the covering of the entire blueberry patch with woodchips, probably twenty wheelbarrow loads. Previously I spread a lot of pine needles over the area. Next: pruning. Also raised a ladder against the cabin's south wall in order to get high enough to trim some of the ash branches that are too near to the roof. If the deadly ash borer kills this majestic tree, we'll be very sad.

August 22, 2010

I've been called a "workaholic" perhaps with some justification. Today, typing my journal entry from Haverford, March 2, 1951, where I have extensive entries from Carlyle, I found this, which apparently appealed to me 59 years ago: "The only happiness a brave man ever troubled himself with asking much about was happiness enough to get his work done. . . . The spoken Word, the written Poem, is said to be an epitome of the man; how much more the done Work."

August 23, 2010

Rained heavily all day yesterday. We had a comforting fire going, and I spent time practicing my Bach prelude (C-minor, Book 2 of the Well Tempered Clavier) and also typing more of my journal. I finished volume one (39,000 words) and am now about one-third through volume two (16,600 words so far). Judging from the extraordinarily lengthy excerpts I copied in from books that I was reading, I wonder if I had time to do anything else at college. Right now I'm at the time in life when I declared my C.O. position to the draft board during the Korean War period (1951) but am still at Haverford: my junior year. Among lots of personal notes I record a girlfriend's remark when I told her that she was saved from listening to things I had written, "Oh, you write, too!" I don't mean the journal, but poetry and fiction. Today, in the TLS in a review of a book about women who attached themselves to writers, the reviewer quotes Henry Miller's advice to Anaïs Nin, who had been writing a voluminous diary, ". . . the hours that go into the journal are an evasion . . . You see I am aiming seriously at the destruction of this diary. It is only good if you recognize it for what it is worth; otherwise it is dangerous, poisonous, inclined to make one lazy, facile, self-centered." Does this apply to me and my diary, the whole of which, from 1948 to today, probably adds up to 1,000,000 words? Plus how many hundreds of thousands of words in translation. But original poetry or fiction? Nothing.

Tom and Joan Wilson were here for lunch on the way to Lake Pleasant, Joan bringing a jar full of her delicious chocolate-chip cookies. Their son-in-law, who works for CARE, is now in Afghanistan, which is dangerous and worrisome. I'll join Joan and Stan Udy and Dr. Clendenning in eight-hand piano on September 14th, doing Schubert's Trout Quintet. . . . We had the Smiths for dinner, Jane and Rob, our Antler Lake neighbors. He taught French in schools on Long Island. She graduated from Hunter College. Interesting, cultivated, liberal people.

August 29, 2010

Finished lifting the tractor up off the ground, easier this year, with no mishaps. Always an "accomplishment." Dinner at the Wells House in Pottersville with Donna and Ed with lots of talk about Adirondack things (Ed is building an outhouse) and of course America's dismal political situation.

August 30, 2010

Kendal asked me to fill out a personal form giving info and preferences for after death: where buried, undertaker's name, location of safe deposit box, etc., and also an Obituary. This is what I submitted:

Peter Bien was born on May 28, 1930 in Queens County, New York, the son of a pediatrician who had opened his practice there in 1927 and a mother who served as a docent at the Metropolitan Museum of Art. He was educated in three exceptional public schools, P.S. 150 in Sunnyside (primary), P.S. 69 in Jackson Heights (middle), the Bronx High School of Science for three years and then Deerfield Academy in Massachusetts, where for the first time he found his true direction: literature (not science). His boyhood in New York City was extremely rich; it included attendance with his mother for many years at the full series of the New York Philharmonic's children's concerts at Carnegie Hall, regular viewing of the Museum of Modern Art's exceptional movies, weekly square dancing at the Ethical Culture School, lots of tennis (lessons, tournaments, membership in the Bronx High School team and the Deerfield team), horseback riding with his father, introduction to the Metropolitan Opera thanks to his uncle Bill, Toscanini's concerts with the NBC Symphony thanks to uncle Mike, who worked for NBC, second row seats at Lewisohn Stadium with his father whenever Artur Rubinstein played Tchaikovsky, bicycle rides to LaGuardia airport to watch the PanAm clippers land on water, family outings to the Trans Lux Theater on Madison Avenue, meals in Schraff's, the Russian Tea Room, the Automat, summers at Atlantic Beach, one block from the ocean, then from age eleven to twenty at Brant Lake Camp in the Adirondacks, first as camper, then as counselor. Deerfield made a large difference chiefly because of Richard Warren Hatch, his teacher of English literature, who became a friend and correspondent for many years after graduation. Education continued at Harvard, where he concentrated in American History and Literature and lived (sophomore year) in Lowell House. Harvard was extraordinarily stimulating, yet disappointing in the undergraduate's inability to have meaningful direct contact with his professors, plus what young Bien felt was an "absence of soul." Thus he transferred for his final two years to a small institution where intimacy was easy and "soul" was plentiful—Haverford College—majoring first in English but then finally in music, chiefly owing to Professor Alfred Swan, an inspiring teacher of composition. After a three-year interval, Bien's education continued in the Graduate Faculties of Columbia University, where he earned his Ph.D. in English and Comparative Literature, majoring in modern British fiction, minoring in Italian renaissance literature, and choosing John Milton (over Shakespeare and Chaucer) as his required major author. Both his M.A. thesis and his doctoral dissertation were on the British novelist L. P. Hartley, with whom he enjoyed a frequent correspondence. This led to the first of his three Fulbright grants, to spend a year near Hartley as a graduate student at the University of Bristol, in order to visit the novelist, who lived nearby in Bath, and to complete the dissertation, which was subsequently published in England by Chatto & Windus.

The three-year interval before graduate studies consisted first of half a year in the Netherlands, where he was sent by the American Friends Service Committee to an international work camp at a home for sufferers from Down Syndrome, then of two years' national "alternative service" as a conscientious objector during the Korean War, working as a surgical technician in Rochester, New York's General Hospital. During this time, he studied piano at the Eastman School of Music and became a formal member of the Religious Society of Friends (Quakers), to which he had been introduced at Haverford, largely by Professor Douglas Steere, and for which he had been prepared by regular attendance with his father at The Community Church in New York where he greatly admired the liberal, anti-militarist pastor, John Haynes Holmes. Upon completing his required service, he traveled to Birmingham, England, in order to spend the first half of 1955 at Woodbrooke College, a Quaker adult-education center. There he met his future wife, Chrysanthi Yiannakou, who had been sent there from Greece by the headmaster of the Quaker school outside of Thessaloniki where she had been teaching baby-care to village girls. After the Woodbrooke term ended, Bien traveled to Greece by third class rail, sitting up for three days and two nights on the Orient Express (all-in-all he, eventually with family, made 27 trips on the Orient Express from Western Europe to Greece). He cycled into Thessaloniki on his British bicycle. He and Chrysanthi were married there in July in the Greek Orthodox Church. They moved to New York at the end of the year. Bien began his studies at Columbia in January 1956 and their first child, Leander was born at the end of March.

The summers at Brant Lake Camp had led six years earlier to Bien's purchase of an abandoned uphill Adirondack farm of 120 acres for $1200 ($10 per acre). By 1956 he had already constructed a 16 × 20 foot cabin from logs he cut on the property, at a total cost of $418.50. Chrysanthi now joined in the necessary addition of a kitchen, plus completing the chinking of the logs, clearing land, etc. Fifty-four years later (2010) the farm consisted of 300 acres with three separate dwellings, three barns, a guest house, and Bien's wonderful office: a three-sided Adirondack lean-to facing south. All this, except one of the dwellings and one of the barns, was constructed "by hand" by Chrysanthi, Peter, and especially Alec, their second son, born in 1958, who built his own log cabin. "Terpni," as the farm is called, repeating the name of Chrysanthi's birth-village in Macedonia (the Ancient Greek word means “pleasant”) brought together Bien’s three children (the third being daughter Daphne), their spouses, and seven grandchildren each summer for extended stays amidst beauty and peace.

At Columbia, Bien, quite by accident, read a novel by Nikos Kazantzakis, translated as The Greek Passion. Most of his professional work for the next fifty years involved translations of this author’s work and scholarly writing about it. He co-founded a Quaker Meeting at Columbia and began teaching there after completing his M.A., first as instructor of English to Hungarian refugees (which led later to an interest in writing textbooks for the instruction of Greek), then as instructor of English literary classics to adults in Columbia’s “extension division.” He obtained his Ph.D. in 1961 and that same year began teaching at Dartmouth College as an instructor.

At Dartmouth, serving actively for thirty-six years, he was honored as the first Ted and Helen Geisel (Dr. Seuss) Third Century Professor in the Humanities (1974–79) and then as the Frederick Sessions Beebe ’35 Professor in the Art of Writing (1989–97). He chaired the Program in Comparative Literature on three separate occasions, co-founded War and Peace Studies, founded and directed for twenty-five years the University Seminars program and the Resource Center for Composition, was elected twice to the president’s advisory committee (CAP, which gives final approval or disapproval for tenure appointments), and served six times as lecturer on Alumni College seminar-cruises in the Mediterranean. His teaching concentrated on British modernism (Joyce especially, Woolf, Lawrence, Conrad) and comparative modernism (Joyce, Mann, Proust, Kafka, Beckett), plus lots of Paradise Lost. In addition, he offered five courses in the adult-education Institute for Lifelong Education at Dartmouth (ILEAD), of which he was an Honorary Founder. His research, after the first book on L. P. Hartley, was devoted almost exclusively to Modern Greek literature: primarily to Kazantzakis (criticism, plus translation of three novels and an annotated edition of the Selected Letters), Myrivilis, Cavafy, Ritsos, and Harkianakis, accounting for 19 books of criticism or translation, plus 3 textbooks on Modern Greek language in collaboration with John Rassias and others (full titles, etc. in Who's Who in America). His academic honors include Fulbright grants to England, Australia, and Greece, the E. Harris Harbison Award for Distinguished Teaching (Danforth Foundation), a conference and Festschrift in his honor by the University of Birmingham, England, the Gold Cross of Apostle Andrew awarded by the Archbishopric of Australia, honorary doctorate from the Aristotle University of Thessaloniki, Greece, honorary membership in the Hellenic Author's Society. While still at Dartmouth, he served terms as visiting professor at Harvard University, Melbourne University (Australia), Woodbrooke College (England), the Aristotle University of Thessaloniki (Greece, 3 times), Pendle Hill (twice); after retirement from Dartmouth (1997) at Princeton University, Columbia University, Brown University, the University of Crete (Greece), with shorter stays for lectures at Loyola Marymount University, Colorado College, Stanford University, Simon Fraser University (Vancouver, Canada). He also lectured in Sweden, England, The Netherlands, Germany, Australia (Sydney, Adelaide, Melbourne), Thailand, repeatedly in Athens, Iraklio, Hania, Rethymno, and Thessaloniki (Greece), and in Virginia for the Department of State.

A founding member of the Modern Greek Studies Association, he served as its president from 2000 to 2002. Other administrative experience included presidency of the Kinhaven Music School's Board of Trustees; presiding clerk (Quaker-talk for "president") of the Pendle Hill General Board, and clerk of its publication committee; clerk (twice) of the Hanover Monthly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends; trustee of the American Farm School (Greece), chairing its Secondary Education Committee; president of the Kendal at Hanover Residents' Council, 2006-07; chairman of Kendal at Hanover's Board of Overseers, 1989-95; chairman of Kendal at Hanover's Board of Directors, 1995-96. He was generally credited with being the founder of Kendal at Hanover, although obviously a dozen or so other Quakers on the founding committee also contributed in important ways.

His life was blessed by a beautiful marriage, three children who are responsible citizens and caring parents, a fine academic situation at Dartmouth College, idyllic summers at "Terpni," the continuing fellowship and inspiration of various Quaker meetings, and a final home in another meaningful community, Kendal at Hanover.

To Berkeley

Flew to San Francisco. Rental car on freeways. Managed to find the Berkeley City Club, a Moorish medieval monument with beautiful public rooms but an uninspiring bedroom. A half hour later Ronald Moore and Thanassis Maskaleris were waiting for me at Reception. Roland took us to a new restaurant on Oxford Street named "Gather," where Martha Klironomos joined us. The menu was as though in a foreign language, everything organic/health food, but delicious. 10:00 p.m. Berkeley time was of course 1:00 a.m. Hanover time, but I was wide awake with this splendid company, sharing many interests and experiences.

Berkeley

Lovely breakfast at the Club. At noon Michael Heyman came. We had dined with him and his wife in 1983 in his Chancellor's mansion, and then treated him and his wife (now deceased) to dinner at Dartmouth when he was serving as a trustee. I remember opposing him when McLaughlin wanted to bring ROTC back. He is exactly my age, born on May 30, 1930, but has emphysema and partial deafness. Was a heavy smoker. He arrived with an oxygen tank and a device in his nose. Sat a bit to catch his breath. Then drove to the Berkeley Marina to a lovely restaurant by the water. He is now remarried. He told me that he lost his eldest son, but I don't know how. We had a lovely reunion, as though no hiatus had existed, talking easily from noon until almost 3:00 p.m. . . . Then I braved the freeway again and highway to Ellen Lerner's parents (mother and step-father) in Martinez, California. I got lost but called on my cell phone and was directed. All of Alice's children, spouses, and grandchildren were there, of course. Alice herself was feeling very well. Blood count normal. "Remission," she confided. But more chemo starts next week. Ellen has four brothers. One spoke to me at length because his son, a high school senior, had just returned from Dartmouth, where he attended debating practice for high school teams. He wants now to apply to Dartmouth. I gave him the usual advice. The food was, again, all health/organic. Not my taste. Lots of talk with various relatives. Susie and Ellen appeared, of course. I hoped they like rice, since my gift was a rice cooker.

September 5, 2010

Berkeley

Sunday. I walked, far, to Berkeley Friends Meeting on Vine Street. Anna Brinton attended this Meeting. Afterwards I was introduced to her grandson and we talked about Pendle Hill and Tony Manousos's forthcoming biography. Then I was able to visit the University of Berkeley's Doe Library. Huge reading room. Lots of my books in the catalogue. The campus is beautiful, chiefly owing to its many redwood trees. It is very large compared to Dartmouth. Lots of single people and families strolling on this lovely Sunday. . . . Back on the freeway to Moraga, site of the wedding, which I found without mishap. Susie in a white wedding dress, Ellen in white trousers! First, signing of the marriage document; then everything else was via Jewish tradition. Susie and Ellen signed plus only one friend (apparently Ellen's real father was present and she didn't want him to sign—thus no relatives at all). The wedding was outdoors. Lovely, very moving singing by the female cantor. The officiant, also female, was "half a rabbi," I was told, but did well. The whole was very emotional. One thinks, always, of one's own relationship. . . . Nice to see Daphne and Greg, who came just for the wedding. Afterwards, another organic/health food dinner (alas) plus "events" organized by Linda: bad poetry, bad singing, but all in good spirit. When Daphne and Greg left, I followed them in order to get back to the freeway (in the opposite direction from them), which I did successfully.

September 6, 2010

Not so successful today on the way to Rental Car Return. I made a stupid wrong turn off the freeway but somehow retraced my route and found the Avis facility, luckily. Uneventful flight home (first class, like the flight out). Back to Kendal at 9:00 p.m., where Chrysanthi had a steak dinner waiting. Finally nothing organic or healthy! I'm glad she didn't need to suffer my adventures on the freeways. She of course was eager to hear all about the wedding, and about Alice's health, and especially about how Susie and Ellen were dressed. All in all, this Lesbian wedding was exactly like a heterosexual wedding in its feel and its ceremony.

September 7, 2010

Riparius

Back to the farm for a final week and for closing. Earl has made two lovely paths for his four-wheeler. Leander flagged them with surveyor's tape. We walked both with pleasure.

September 10, 2010

Riparius

Yesterday and today I spent lots of time bringing wood chips to the garden and spreading them there. I've done the entire section with blueberries, and the section with flowers, and one strip on the side. All this despite a back that sometimes ached. . . . Fertilized the fruit trees with spikes but did not prune the trees. Let's see if this makes any difference next year. However, I carefully pruned the blueberries.

September 11, 2010

Trying to close the water, I found that I could not open the drain owing to Pinky's new system. I didn't even know which of the two visible pumps was mine and which was Leander's. Lots of trying to no avail. Kept calling Pinky but he was gone all day. He called back after 7:00 p.m. and promised to come at 7:00 a.m. tomorrow. So we had a leisurely extra day at the farm with beautiful weather.

Sunday, September 12, 2010

Pinky came, showed me which pump was which (the lower one is mine) and where to hook the end of the long lever. I urged him to come next summer and restore the lever the way it was before he changed the pump: permanently attached. We got back to Kendal at 4:00 p.m. and immediately entered this very different lifestyle.

Wednesday, September 15, 2010

Finished the extra chores with the Kazantzakis letters, including finding a few Greek manuscripts that Peter Mackridge never received. As soon as he looks at these, the whole book will go back to Princeton University Press, thankfully.

Friday, October 1, 2010

Only one more poem to go in the Χαρκιανάκης volume. I'm hoping that he will have someone in Sydney check my English for mistakes and then perhaps find a means for bilingual (or monolingual) publication in Australia. . . . A very pleasant visit from Laird Barber in the afternoon. He'd come to visit his cousin, who lives in Norwich. I invited Tom Wood and Robert Binswanger to join us for tea at 4:00 p.m. Tom brought the 1948 Pocumtuck (Yearbook) and we had great fun looking at the photos and credits. Chrysanthi remarked my curls. I looked very “official” in my tuxedo as a member of the debating team, with Bobby Johnston the chairman. Binswanger surprisingly was not involved as a manager in just about everything, as he became in later life. Tom was a soccer player and the only graduate going to Haverford. We’re all of us reasonably healthy and active whereas many of our Deerfield classmates are now dead. . . . Dinner with Mel and Evelyn Spiegel with so much easy conversation that we almost forgot our theater tickets for “Death of a Salesman” at the Hop at 8:00 p.m. The group that performed was based in the Weston, Vermont theater, all of them professionals. Despite this, the production simply did not work. The lead overacted continually. Too much screaming. Also I think that the play is overrated. Of course it makes its point about false mercantile values and father-son enmity, but it lacks the brilliance of a Shakespeare or even of a Shaw. If nothing else, it is never relieved by humor or song, techniques used by Shakespeare to keep tragedy from becoming maudlin.

Saturday, October 2, 2010

New York City

To New York by train. Nice lamb chop dinner at the Yale Club, Chrysanthi and I sharing one serving (5 chops). Then to see Shaw’s Mrs. Warren’s Profession, starring Cherry Jones. And what a difference! Jones never overplayed, although the part could easily inspire screaming or the like in a lesser artist. The daughter, not so good but adequate, the various men also . . . adequate. But the play was lifted as a whole by Cherry Jones’s great talent. I remember her from the marvelous Twelfth Night she did at the A.R.T. and then Doubt, which we traveled to Boston to see. Shaw’s message, no longer shocking, as it was in 1905, is still needed, although the feminine “solution” of celibacy and independence is no longer embraced by so many intelligent women.

NYC

A very busy, varied day. Started by taking the M4 bus to Morningside Heights. Gazed at our old residence on 121st Street, still the same, but the building next to it has come down and been replaced by a Columbia building, as have the brownstones across the street that used to be occupied by Puerto Ricans; they are now a high-rise Columbia dormitory.

And the sandbox on Morningside Drive has been planted—no more fun for small children. Then to Morningside Quaker Meeting, which now meets on the 12th floor of the Riverside Church tower. Lovely to see Vince Buscemi there, as I had expected, and his wife, Ernie. Vince and I spoke at some length after Meeting about Pendle Hill. He is still on the Racial Justice Committee, that's all, and hopes to resign from that fairly soon. He said that the finances were saved last year by a bequest. He agreed that our choice of Steve Baumgartner as Executive Secretary was a large mistake. Morningside Meeting is smallish. No children. Lots of strange—and strangely attractive—people. Introducing myself, I told about founding the Meeting around 1958 with the worship group I started at Columbia, which eventually was attended by Victor Paschis, who developed the Meeting much further. Robert L. Smith (eventually headmaster of Sidwell Friends School) used to meet on fifth day with me at Columbia. The Morningside Clerk wants me to send her a full account in writing, to put on their website. Μακάρι! . . . Viewed the beautiful Riverside Church nave, and the Hudson to the west. Walked along Broadway from 120th to 72nd, viewing “farmers’ markets” along the way: food, singing, handicrafts. Lunched on a frankfurter outdoors across from Lincoln Center. Then attended the New York City Ballet’s matinee, a stellar program. “Chaconne” (Balanchine/Gluck), very delicate, danced by Wendy Whelan. Then a complete change with two short Stravinsky/Balanchine ballets, “Momumentum pro Gesualdo” and “Movements for Piano and Orchestra,” abstract, pure. Then another total change with “Tschaikovsky Pas de Deux,” sheer athleticism, jumps, the girl diving into the boy’s arms, the crowd cheering. Finally, Peter Martin’s “The Magic Flute” to music by Ricardo Drigo, a lovely tale about a girl whose parents want her to marry an old wealthy man hardly able to stand while she of course has a serious boyfriend her own age. Lots of humor, color, costumes, scenery, a good ballet for Theo and Elena next summer at Saratoga if they do it there. The Tschaikovsky spectacular was danced with bravura by Tiler Peck and Gonzalo Garcia. All in all, one of the best ballet programs we have seen, partly because everything was the first time for us. . . . But the day continued. Lacking time, we went into a sort of pub for a sandwich. This turned out to be a place where unemployed actors and actresses serve as waiters and also perform, very loudly, and well. The place was full of enthusiastic young people, and everyone was asked to donate something to the actors in addition to the bill for food (which was high: $33 for two toasted cheese sandwiches!). At 7:00 p.m. we attended a musical: Mama Mia, very loud, but in good taste. Same story (sort of) as Mrs. Warren's Profession: a girl who doesn't know who her father is, a mother who is proud to be single and independent. But this was of course sentimentalized, since she finds her original husband (seducer) and marries him at the end. Not bad. Good singing. A good band. Setting supposedly a Greek island, with men playing tavli. . . . A long, full day, thanks to the wonders of New York City.

New York City

To MoMA at 9:30 a.m. to enter before the mobs, thanks to my membership, to see the very interesting Matisse exhibit devoted to just about only five years of his career, 1913 to 1917, when he was struggling to find his own way instead of copying the cubism of Picasso and others. I bought the catalogue (as usual) and also a small poster to give to Leander because the subject is "The Piano Lesson." . . . For Evelyn Spiegel, got info and menus from three Greek restaurants, for their trip to New York later this month. Bought manouri at the Grand Central market and went to Penn Station for the trip home. . . . Heard that Howard Mitchell's wife, at Kendal, had a devastating stroke and is terminal. Does not recognize him now. Very sad.

October 9, 2010

Kendal

Saw the Met Opera telecast of Das Reingold. I found it horrifying, so dark, voices so low, orchestra so overblown, all about power, and I concluded that now I know why the Germans were attracted to Nazism.

Saturday, October 23, 2010

Drove to Lake Morey—beautiful autumn color—to see sixty-five students receive mediation training. I explained to them about our effort many years ago, the opposition from deans, the encouragement received from Robert Reich (a court of law never changed anyone's heart). They were told the differences among negotiation, mediation, arbitration, and litigation. The instructor, a lawyer, termed litigation "war," the object being to defeat an enemy. . . . Returned in order to see the Met's new production of Boris Gudunov, for the first time. Ugly, sadistic, no joy.

Early Music concert. I performed the C minor prelude and fugue from the Well Tempered Book 2, with errors owing to nervousness, but I think I covered them satisfactorily. Supper with Robert and Penny Binswanger and their son Tim, who had spent a term teaching English at Athens College in 1977. Folks there thought at first he was a CIA spy. Lunch after Meeting with Jack and Ruth Hunter and Sydney Jarvis, first time since last spring. But no Lafayette, who is now permanently in Kendal

Lafayette is now installed in Barclay. Saw him and Kesaya last night at supper. He goes to exercise, takes long walks, eats in the café. The apartment, maintained empty for twenty years, is now relinquished. . . . Heard the president of Friends School Ramallah yesterday. Very impressive woman who relates how horribly the Palestinians are treated by the Jews. She is one of the very few remaining Palestinian Quakers. I sent the school $500. . . . Today, finished typing volume two of my elephantine journal. Another 100+ pages single-spaced. Does this tedious job make sense? Yet reading over the material I am thrust back into parts of my life that largely I have forgotten. Right now it's the period just before beginning C.O. service in Rochester.

October 29, 2010

I had written to Jud Shaver, chair of the Trustees Committee, who asked if I'd be willing to serve another term on the Farm School board, that I wondered what real service I could offer. I'd certainly done a service in the past, fixing Brenda Marder's history so it could be grammatical, and I'd also helped in securing interns. But what now? And I was discouraged by Gail Schoppert's failure to include the Secondary Committee minutes and subsequently by Charlotte Armstrong's omission of the Secondary Committee on the list of those reporting. But I said I'd be willing to serve one more term. He apparently sent all this to Annie, who—lovely Annie!—sent me the following e-mail and warmed my heart: «Dear Peter, Τι είναι αυτά που έγραψες στον Jud? Αμφιβάλλω αν υπάρχουν, όχι πολλοί αλλά έστω μερικοί, που να αγαπούν, να καταλαβαίνουν, να ξέρουν τη Σχολή και τις ανάγκες της περισσότερο από σένα. Οι περισσότεροι είναι περαστικοί, γράφουν στο CV τους ότι είναι και μέλος του Board της AFS και που τους είδες ύστερα από λίγο. Είναι τιμή για την Σχολή να σε έχει στο Board της. Κατάλαβέ το. Μη ξανακά-νεις τέτοιες σκέψεις σε παρακαλώ! Άννη»

A quick trip to the farm today to get some more books on Paradise Lost for my ILEAD course and to return laundry, bring the hula hoop I bought for Elena, etc. Everything just as we left it, but the pond full up from the great amount of rain we've had. Earl discovered our gate opened and called to say hello. He killed a bear in our woods, a 125-pound male, and says there's a large one still there. He's eating the meat and will have the head stuffed by Roy to hang proudly on his wall. Lunch at Marsha's, chocolate milkshake at Stewart's, our familiar rituals. I put graphite in the gate lock to ease entry of the key. . . . Finished introduction to the Saint Francis section in Thanassis Maskaleris's forthcoming anthology of ecological passages from Kazantzakis. . . . Wrote a blurb for Harry Mark Petrakis's latest. . . . Waiting on line to be seated at Green Tomatoes restaurant, a woman came up to me and said, "I'm Noel Perin's daughter!" What a nice surprise! This was the younger of the two. She was accompanied by her 14-year-old daughter and by a man named Carlos, her "fiancé." First marriage obviously did not last. She lives in Florida but is visiting her mother, Nancy, here. I asked if she was working. No. No jobs owing to the bad economy. She noted how important we were to Ned, and I answered her that he was my very best friend in the department. We had lovely memories of pancakes (she smiled) and of removing stones from the fields, and petting Ned's cows, and . . . and . . . I seem to be easily recognized by people who have not seen me for decades.

Yale Club

Got up at 5:30 a.m. to drive to Burlington for a 9:30 a.m. plane, only to discover that the flight was canceled. Got a seat on the next US Airways flight scheduled for 1:00 p.m. Plane arrived at 2:00 p.m., and I finally got to La Guardia at 4:00. My meeting was at 3:30. So I missed it, but luckily it was the College Committee, not the Secondary one that I chair, which is tomorrow. On bus 60 to Manhattan, the driver stepped out and returned 15 minutes later. I should have traveled by AMTRAK, but I am sort of held hostage by US Airways, always hoping to fly enough in order to renew my Preferred status the following year. But had a very pleasant dinner with Burt Pike at the Yale Club. Three solid hours of conversation. He's healthy and busy, as I am. We're both very fortunate.

He, like Dennis Carroll, felt that I shouldn't retype all the passages in my journals but should gather together entries on a given subject. The farm, for example. He's very opposed to Xlibris, saying that the books they advertise in the New York Review of Books are beneath contempt.

November 5, 2010

NYC

It's lovely to work in the Yale Club library, typing volume three of my journal, which is now 1953 in Rochester. Lots of memories of life there and also of various trips to Riparius. It's amazing how many people I interrelated with and were forgotten until revived by the re-reading of these journal entries. A particular example worth remembering concerned the death and wake of Charlie McCarthy, Bernard's father. . . . At noon, Maya Nathan appeared and joined me for lunch. She's a Dartmouth graduate who is applying to be an interne at the Farm School next year. Two hours with her. She's rather academic, not very sportive. I'm not sure how effective she'd be, although she has experience working with academic low-achievers. She'll see Ev Marder tomorrow. Let's see what he thinks. . . . Walked to 26th and Broadway, fun because Broadway now has a corridor reserved for pedestrians. The hat store where I bought my fedora is now closed, alas. In time for my Secondary Committee. Nice to see fellow trustees. Jud Shaver assured me I'd been renewed for another term. Gail Schoppert gave me thumbs up. He now has a goatee; I hardly recognized him at first. A new trustee, Christos Folias, was outspoken and very friendly; we shared stories about the Svarnas School, which he attended and in which I taught English in 1955 for dr. 30/hour (= $1.00). T. Jewett asked to join the committee, as did Folias. Very easy to talk to and work with Panos Kanellis, the new president. I asked if Father Kyriakos, the priest who died, will be replaced. The answer seems to be No. No need any longer. Too bad. The memorial classroom for Vouli is ready. They've ordered a commemorative plaque. I said I would pay for it. . . . Back to the Yale Club. A Manhattan and spicy chicken wings in the main lounge; then worked on the report for tomorrow until I walked to the Century Club, 7 West 45th, for board supper. Very intimate; many didn't come owing to Greek Summer festivities elsewhere, which I chose to miss. Lots of talk with Joann Ryding. The club, very exclusive, etc., is really inferior to the Yale Club in its amenities, just as is the Harvard Club also.

NYC

Buffet breakfast at the Yale Club. Then to board meeting from 9:00 to 1:00. Chairman Charlotte Armstrong seems mostly confused. Secretary gets mixed up. Interminable discussion without adequate “clerking,” as Quakers say. But I read my report with verve and obtained easy approval for the beginning of pre-kindergarten and kindergarten, plus (in principle) of elementary school depending on Panos’s feasibility study. Finances look a bit better owing to the rising market. And we voted, finally, to buy a farm, already equipped for cattle, for the cows.

November 12, 2010

Pendle Hill

To Pendle Hill for the 80th anniversary celebration and Parker Palmer’s Cary lecture. The grounds are beautiful, with leaves still on the oak trees and the tall Japanese maples. We drove immediately north to Newtown to visit Dan Seeger. Newton Garver was with him also. Dan’s quarters in Pennswood Village are very tiny. He sleeps on a Murphy bed in a room that doubles as an office. Bookcases neatly arranged, of course, but the huge archives he had in the basement of Lumberton Leas are gone. He has just finished as interim director of AFSC, working in the newly greened Quaker headquarters that he was in charge of greening (they have a Platinum LEED—Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design—award for it). Now he’s on multiple Quaker committees, but has given up playing the piano, even though his keyboard is still evident, only now as furniture. Healthy and vibrant, worried about gaining weight, exercising extensively in the ample exercise room. We had good conversation, especially about his reasons for abandoning Medford Leas, and then went through the hallways for a fine dinner complete with Dan’s wine. He and Newton discussed Kant. Then we got to politics. . . . Back at Pendle Hill, lovely reunion with Shirley Dodson, and Laurie Perman. Shirley assured me that I am not the only “accomplished” author who has been rejected by the pamphlets committee. Laurie hopes to start book publication again with Doug Gwyn’s new history of Pendle Hill and then Tony Manouso’s biography of Howard and Anna Brinton, but probably via electronic publication. Too bad I missed Doug, who is here all year but was gone to England just this weekend.

November 13, 2010

Morning session on John Woolman led by an energetic professor, very knowledgeable, but who talked too much. However, he did call upon folks in the class, including me. I suggested that Woolman, like Fox, was a genius. How else explain the quality of his writing, let alone of his morals. Margery Walker, sitting in front of me, suggested that the cadences of his prose came from the King James Bible. Greeted Parker Palmer at breakfast. He was very gracious, obviously remembering me, for we had many good interchanges during his decade at Pendle Hill. . . . After lunch, Chrysanthi and I rushed to Macy's in Springfield Mall, our favorite. I bought two suit jackets at ridiculously low prices; she bought a cashmere sweater that I'll present to her as a gift at Christmastime along with a collection of paint brushes we ordered on line a few days ago. . . . The main event came next: Parker Palmer's Steve Cary lecture. It was splendid. First came introductions, including Dan Seeger explaining who Steve Cary was, then one of Parker's trainees explaining his "spiritual enterprise," and finally Laurie speaking about Pendle Hill's unexpected beginnings in 1930, directly after the stock market crash. (I told her later about the Empire State Building and Al Smith.) Parker spoke at length about his eleven years at Pendle hill; he came aged 35, and how much it taught him about community: where the teachers worked in the kitchen and garden and the workers studied. As Director of Studies he took the exact same salary as the cook. He explained how gradually he came to appreciate silent meeting after first rejecting it and wanting his more familiar sermon and hymns. He found that silent meeting was a fine way of discovering a "safe space" for the inner spirit, the essence no longer distracted by "accidentals." I told him afterward of Leonard Slatkin's introduction to a piece of avant-garde music: "No melody, no harmony, no rhythm, no counterpoint. What's left, then? Sound." And sound it was, fascinating because the old expectations had been removed. The same happened with him and silent meeting. Quakerism's chief discovery was subtraction. . . . Lots of talk afterwards. Reunion with old Pendle Hill friends and colleagues, among whom was Rebecca Mays, whom at first I didn't recognize (she's fatter now). Very cordial about "our" production of books at Pendle Hill, which she hopes won't be forgotten. Her daughter has given up the bass fiddle and is living with a man in Italy. . . . Supper in the Reading Room, 18 people, by invitation. I sat next to Steve Cary's widow and daughter. They were pleased to hear that the Cary Room at our Kendal will house a recital tomorrow. After dessert we had a chance to ask Parker questions. I asked how we should react at Kendal when certain people become angry at the mention of Quaker values. He replied helpfully. Ask the person to express his or her values and how they developed. Let the objector feel that he or she is being heard. Often, the reply will show that the person's values are totally compatible with Quaker values. The important thing is to get beyond branding and to arrive at the essence: at sound not at melody, rhythm, or harmony. . . . Parker told a good Quaker joke. A Quaker farmer's mule refused to work. The farmer says to the mule, "Thee knows that I won't kick thee, beat thee with a lash, or hit thee. But thee doesn't know that I'm going to sell thee to the rich Episcopalian next door who's offered me twice your worth!" Yes, Quakers came to do good and did well.

Sunday, November 14, 2010

Up at 5:00 a.m. Flew back to Manchester. Beautiful weather. Practiced Schubert. To the Hop at 12:45 for Met Opera's "Don Pasquale," a delicious comic romp. 3:30 p.m. to Cary Room to practice 8-hand first movement of Schubert's Trout Quintet. 4:30, Cary recital. We played last, well enough. I told everyone who Steve Cary was and how pleased his wife and daughter were to know that his room at Kendal would be filled with music. . . . Then Walter and Miriam Arndt showed up (they were supposed to come next Sunday). So we accommodated to their presence and shared a long supper with them. Walter is 97. His complaint about Harvest Hill, where they moved: No one to talk to. Such a shame. But apparently Jim Tatum visits occasionally and they converse together in Latin. Miriam is afraid to drive in the dark; thus I managed to get her yellow VW bug back to Lebanon, with Chrysanthi following successfully in our car. A long day.

Wednesday, November 17, 2010

Boston

Lunch in the Hanover Inn with the "old group" as usual on Wednesdays. President Kim was there. I told him how much we valued these lunches and he assured me that they would continue. . . . Dartmouth Coach to South Station. In the "T" I was told that seniors could receive a large discount if they had the proper card. So I obtained the card, finding the office by a miracle. Thus, each ride now costs $0.60 instead of $2.00. Back Bay Station on the Orange Line, then through a huge mall to the Marriott Hotel. Met the organizer of this meeting, Vasiliki Tsigas-Fotinis, the coordinator for the Standards for Modern Greek Language Learning Project. With her were Nancy Biska, who remembered interviewing me for Greek television, Vassiliki Rapti from Harvard, and Aristotle Michopoulos, head of Modern Greek at Hellenic College, who in the past was accused by Eva and others of stultifying the teaching there. The purpose of all this is to submit standards to ACTFL to be included in their next publication of national standards. I found ACTFL's materials excellent and want to send them to the Farm School to help with the teaching of English there. The four of us met for three hours over supper in a restaurant and exchanged lots of good ideas. I encouraged the teaching of Κοινή (New Testament) to be included in our thoughts. Nancy told me that in contacts with Dimitrios, the current archbishop, she learned that he refused to read the report that John Rassias and I wrote for his disgraced predecessor, Spyridon. . . . Afterwards, I wandered through the Prudential Center, which is next door. What a lovely city this is! The Marriott in late afternoon was swarming with young people drinking and enjoying themselves, very much as in an English pub.

Thursday, November 18, 2010

To the Sheraton Hotel for today's meetings. We accomplished a lot in the morning and even more when after lunch we were joined by Elpida Bairaktaris, who teaches Modern Greek in a charter school in Delaware and had lots to show us about lesson plans, objectives, etc. She's from Thessaloniki and is well aware of the Farm School. In mid-afternoon the two Vassilikis went off to the ACTFL committee hoping to get its permission for us to submit standards for MG. I took the 4:30 bus home. Chrysanthi and I had a delicious calf's liver dinner in the apartment and later watched Ken Burns's fine documentary on the building of the Brooklyn Bridge.

Washington

To Leander's yesterday via AMTRAK, a 12-hour journey, but comfortable. Today I visited FCNL's "green" building by pre-arrangement, and was given a tour by Jim Cason. It's on 2nd Street, across from the Hart Senate Office Building, a short walk from Union Station. Originally it was two or three town houses, but not in the horrible slum where I served in an AFSC work camp in the 1950s. Jim told me that most of that burned down in the riots of 1968. The Quakers received a Platinum LEED award for greening this facility, where 27 people work each day. He showed me: flooring made from bamboo instead of oak or maple since bamboo matures in three years; a carpet made from reprocessed bottle caps (!) and laid down in separate squares so that one or two can be easily replaced owing to stains, etc.; a full geo-thermal system supplying both heat and air conditioning; plantings on the flat roof, designed to absorb most of the water from rainfalls and thus to help prevent the overflowing of DC's public drains; a sun-conduit facing south and beaming sunshine to the floor below via transparent flooring; wallboard made from reprocessed waste material; metal chairs and tables designed for easy recycling; staircases with natural sunlight, designed to be pleasant and therefore to encourage people to use them instead of the elevator; a shower for people who arrive via bicycle on hot days; a scheme to encourage use of bicycles by means of contributions to charity. All this cost many millions but he says that the payback period on extra greening costs is only about six years. Very nice to see all this. Probably the Quaker Center in Philadelphia, whose greening was supervised by Dan Seeger, is equally impressive. I wrote at once to Win Hunter suggesting that he add Jim Cason to his lecture series, after Bill McKibben. Cason can come, will use power point illustrations, and will stress "What we did wrong." . . . I spent the rest of the day usefully and enjoyably as a sightseer. First to the Supreme Court, which has a museum in the basement with portraits of past judges—e.g., Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., Thurgood Marshall, Cardozo, and a lot on the design and construction of the building, heavily influenced by Greek architecture (but the Greek sculptors of human—or divine—figures were so much better). Then to the Library of Congress, the adjacent building. Nice to see the grand rotunda again in the Jefferson Building. I checked the electronic catalogue to see which of my books are included and found pretty much all of them, including translations into Greek. There was a special exhibit of Jefferson's amazing library, all arranged in his categories: a treasure. . . . Detoured to Metro Center subway station to get a half-priced senior Metro card. Then to the National Portrait Gallery for a special exhibit of Norman Rockwell's vignettes for the Saturday Evening Post covers—humorous or sad pictures of American life, plus portraits of civil war leaders, Walt Whitman, revolutionary leaders, and a whole section on Katherine Graham and the Pentagon Papers controversy. So much to see, including the impressive building itself. . . . Out to an Italian restaurant with everyone. Then falling asleep while watching the film "Robot."

December 7, 2010

Another colonoscopy. But this time the doctor told me that I needn't have any subsequent ones in the future, even though two small polyps were removed. Her decision relates, I expect, to my age, 80½, and to the fact that these polyps grow very slowly. In other words, I'm bound to die from something else before colon cancer gets me.

December 8, 2010

Very nice two-hour lunch at the Hanover Inn with Jack Shepherd with lots and lots to talk about in multiple areas: writing, family life, England, Dartmouth, Quakerism, mediation. He wants now to have these lunches more frequently.

December 10, 2010

Diversity Committee meeting. Weezie is very excited by my discovery that Pennswood Village (where Dan Seeger now lives) has an ongoing program to support entry fees to the tune of $100,000 a year. Margery Walker is similarly delighted. We'll keep trying. . . . This meeting was followed by a summing up of our Values initiative in a joint meeting with the staff. I had occasion to pester them again about mediation, but I doubt that anything will happen.

December 11, 2010

Saw Verdi's Don Carlo in the Met's film series. Marvelous lead soprano, Marina Poplavskaya, and terrible evocations of the horrors of the Inquisition. . . . Afterwards, however, a beautiful Webster recital by Dan Weiser and Philip Liston-Kraft doing four-hand music, including Schubert's masterpiece, the Fantasia in F minor, which I introduced. He wrote it in 1827 several months before his death at age 31. They balanced its sad grandeur with the delicious Brahms Hungarian Dances and with Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

Sunday, December 12, 2010

A busy day. At 8:30 a.m. I gave a talk on Isaiah's 4th Servant Song and its prediction of Jesus. Large audience. Lots of good questions and discussion. I stressed how useful this was for the early Christians in their attempt to convince other Jews to accept Jesus as the Messiah. . . . Then Quaker Meeting, at Kendal this week. Then Business Meeting emphasizing our attempts to bolster and save the Kendal Worship Group. . . . Then Pat Porter conducting her New London group of Renaissance Singers, including our friend Susan, who sang the Walker songs with me several years ago. Then a nice dinner with Bill Pietsch and Martha Wiencke. Then practicing my part in the eight-hand Schubert Unfinished Symphony. . . . On the sad side, Penny Binswanger suffered a broken back when Robert went off the road owing to black ice ten days ago. She's on a respirator and is kept artificially in a coma until she responds better. Will she survive? If yes, will she ever walk again? Also, Alice Buseck seems to feel that there is no longer any therapy for her lymphoma.

December 18, 2010

Matthew Rassias-Miles received chrismation at the Newport Greek Orthodox Church in a moving ceremony yet one that reaffirmed the total orthodoxy of the Church, including its renunciation of all heterodoxy. At the dinner afterwards, David Markwood, Veronica's husband, told me that he is reading my translation of Kazantzakis's Saint Francis for the third time, the book is so meaningful for him. I actually did some Greek dancing with Chrysanthi in the lead. How nice! . . . Twenty people registered for my ILEAD course on Paradise Lost, including many from Kendal. A full house! Will I do this reasonably well? So far I'm not very enthusiastic. . . . Alec and family arrived in NYC from Bangkok this morning and will be at the farm tomorrow. Luckily, it's not too cold, only about 15 degrees.

December 24, 2010

New York City

Drove to South Salem yesterday. Lovely to see Alec and family there plus of course Daphne and family. Today I went with Alec, Monica, Theo, and Elena to the City via commuter train from Katonah. And what a busy, interesting day we had. Grand Central market for manouri and caerphilly. Then a day-card for Alec for bus and subway (used Chrysanthi's card for Monica), Oyster Bar, Grand Central main hall, then the Yale Club library and lounge, 42nd Street library reading room and painting of Milton reading to his daughters, Bryant Park's ice skating; walked down Broadway looking for a deli; found one advertising Greek dishes only to discover it's now owned and run exclusively by Koreans, but had a pastrami sandwich nevertheless. Macy's outside and in. Wanted to ascend Empire State Building but the line was too long. Bus to 83rd Street. Metropolitan Museum to see the Egyptian section because Elena is studying Egypt in class, then armor for Theo. Walked down Fifth Avenue a bit. I pointed out 20 East 74th Street to the children. To Rockefeller Center's magnificent Christmas tree. Mobs of people there, including two ladies from Indonesia whom Monica knew! Pointed out where Daphne used to work at Simon and Schuster. Times Square all lighted up. Broadway now a pedestrian precinct. Back to the Yale Club for a quiet supper served by my friend Angela, total cost $127 for everyone whereas I'd been charged $135 for my single supper at the Century Club when the Farm School trustees ate there (complained to Charlotte Armstrong to no avail). Harlem Line commuter train back to Katonah. Ten miles to Daphne's house. What a day!

South Salem

Christmas with Daphne's family and Alec's very pleasantly. Christina hopes to go to the Thacher School and is studying for the PSAT exam. I looked at the study-book and couldn't do any of the math problems. Leander and family were meant to be present but canceled because Sophia had received C, D, and E on her report card for the first term at high school and Deanna was too upset to travel and socialize. But we expect to see them at the farm on the 28th.

December 29, 2010

North Creek

Leander and Alec and families are both on the farm, keeping warm. Very little snow, grass visible. Waddell Road totally clear, sanded. Frost heaves very severe, leaving gaps in the earth. We met them all in North Creek at the ski bowl, where the children were tubing down the hill with glee. Very cold. But there's a new building there with a café where we had hot chocolate while waiting. Then to Pete's Ah for pizza, which we ate in Leander's cabin, with beer and apple pie. Very pleasant. Slept in the center of North Creek at Alpine Lodge, with its fake-rustic décor.

December 30, 2010

Breakfast with everyone at Marsha's. The waitress quit school in grade 12; was failing all her subjects and is now making sometimes $100 a day. North Creek full of skiers. Drove to Riparius. In the post office Roy Millington greeted me, "Hi, Pete, when are you going to live here full time?" I answered that I'd dreamed of doing that 60 years ago but alas will never do it now. We delivered some books to our cabin and replenished the mice poison. Everything looks fine. Children went horse-back riding. Alec, Leander, and I tramped over parts of the 36 acres that Deana Wood wants to sell just south of our south field. Discovered that the Antler Lake stream is in a rather deep gorge as it traverses the corridor they created. Someone presumably could build near our southern border, but this seems unlikely. And Deana is asking well over $1000 an acre, which is prohibitive. Chrysanthi spent some time in the North Creek library. I returned to our motel and made a compendium of journal entries on Riek Kleefstra, which Dennis Carroll has encouraged me to do and to send to him. It's a bit embarrassing, of course. . . . Supper with everyone at Trappers. Leander and Nicholas went to a jazz concert at Tannery. We returned with Alec and family to their cozy cabin, where Theo and Elena stretched out comfortably downstairs, reading. But each also played a piece on the harmonium, Theo especially well.

December 31, 2010

Our usual escargot party at the Rassiases. Good to talk with Bill Miles. Mary very sleepy all the time. Matthew hugged and kissed me because I gave him a chrismation present: Ritsos's poetry, bilingual.

January 1, 2011

Celebratory lunch with Weezie and Bill Pietsch, Rose Miller, and Avery Post. Avery told lots about his career: many parishes, then administrative position in local context, finally national directorship of the United Church of Christ. . . . Supper with Ruth Stanton: chopped chicken liver, just for me, she claims. . . . These last few days I've read the entire book about the Cadbury, Fry, and Rowntree chocolate companies, their accomplishments, fights with Nestlé and Mars, and Hershey, and then, so sadly, the takeover of Cadbury by the American cheese company, Kraft. End of an era. I thought of our Kendal. Will it go the same way? As the author said, all the old values, so remarkable, were replaced by a single remaining value: money.

January 4, 2011

I'm now typing 1955 in my journal, including the lovely time at Woodbrooke, Edinburgh, London, eventually Greece, with Chrysanthi after we first met. It's quite a revelation.

January 16, 2011

Played two Goldberg Variations, numbers 18 and 10, at this morning's Interfaith Gathering, when Brent Edgerton spoke very well on fate vs. destiny. Happily, I didn't get nervous and didn't make mistakes. Performing fairly often helps considerably. . . . Am now vetting the copy-editor's changes on my Selected Letters, over 2000 pages. But it's going fast enough. Mostly questions of hyphenation, capitalization, and the like, but in addition he has caught some embarrassing typos.

January 29, 2011

A very good show about Buckminster Fuller at the A.R.T., acted by Thomas Derrah alone for two hours. And Bucky did talk, nonstop. An intellectual treat, unabashedly "metaphysical."

January 30, 2011

To West Hartford to the lunch celebrating Gail and Ruth Schoppert's 50th wedding anniversary. We had hoped to see David and Patti Buck there, but they're in Florida. Did see the Johnsons again and had easy conversation since he was a book publisher and knew David Godine and Ray Nash.

February 6, 2011

My sister Alice has given up trying to treat her lymphatic cancer, has called in Hospice, and is dying. Doctors give her perhaps four months. Today, practicing piano (Haydn's Military Symphony for eight-hand piano performance next Sunday) I suddenly felt that losing the wonderful pleasure of playing piano must be for her one of the saddest aspects of losing . . . everything. Piano, especially chamber music, was always central for her. It's good that we were able to be a duet team at Kinhaven for several years.

February 20, 2011

Miriam Arndt called to say that Walter died last Tuesday. End of an era. Such a remarkable man.

February 21, 2011

I introduced Jim Strickler, who spoke at Kendal about the splendid program of Dartmouth Medical School to help concerning childbirth and mothers' health in Kosovo, saying first that we Kendal residents wouldn't be here if it wasn't for him, but most likely would be across the river, paying Vermont income taxes! And then I recited his dictum: "The most serious disease of older people is . . . loneliness."

February 22, 2011

I introduced professor Bill Wohlforth at our War and Peace Studies dinner-seminar. Of course the Hanover Inn's projector for his illustrations on Power Point wouldn't work, as usual, but he did splendidly without them. His thesis was that the world today has fewer wars than ever before in history. Hard to believe, but he argued well. Good to see Tom Powers as one of the audience this time, brought by Alan Rozycki.

To Tempe

Flew to Phoenix in order to see Alice in time, for she's dying from lymphatic cancer and is now under Hospice care at home. Paul and Susie are visiting now. Paul showed all his photos of Hazel, of course, now one year old. Alice was sleeping, so we didn't greet her today.

February 24, 2011

Tempe

We greeted Alice in the morning. She smiled broadly but she has failed considerably since Leander saw her about ten days ago. Now she cannot get in and out of bed, cannot walk, and talks only in half sentences, sparsely. Susie suspects that the cancer has gone to the brain. But she was very aware of who we were. She's free of pain owing to morphine, but is always tired, and stays alert with eyes open only briefly before lapsing back into sleep. The Hospice nurse comes regularly, as does an assistant nurse to help with washing, etc. Peter is a devoted caregiver and very happy that her last days will be at home, where he can sleep next to her, hold her hand, etc. Even while she sleeps, one or more of the family tend to sit in the room and be there when she rouses. A sad story, but actually not so sad now that the inevitable is clear and she is not in pain.

Interestingly, Peter received additional morphine and the paperwork advised strongly that he shred all the labels lest someone sifting through his trash discover the presence of morphine in the house and burglarize the dwelling to secure this drug for illicit use. . . . I spent enough time typing more of volume 5 of my journal. And I bought everyone a take-out Indian meal—everyone, that is, except Alice, who drinks but has stopped eating except for a sliver of cheese perhaps every 12 hours. We all rejoiced that she was so remarkably well, despite the cancer, for her 50th wedding anniversary celebration and for Susie’s wedding. When I tell people, especially at Kendal, that she’s dying at age 74, the uniform reaction is “So young!”

New York City

Flew from Manchester to La Guardia for the Farm School trustees’ meetings. Went to 47th Street with my extracted tooth and its gold crown and was given $60 for the gold. Amazing! Then to MoMA for the special exhibit of Picasso’s “constructions” using bits of newspaper, cardboard, scrap metal, etc. to fashion rather beautiful “paintings,” many representing guitars (sort of). Then to Columbia for a seminar given by Heath Cabot on how Greece treats displaced people applying for asylum—very badly. Fifteen thousand applications have resulted in about 80 approvals. Nice to talk with Vangelis Calotychos, whose edited book on Anagnostakis, which I vetted for Fairleigh Dickinson, has been accepted for publication. He hopes that Princeton will accept another. I’ve told him to apply to Hanne Winarsky. Neni was there, too, and I thanked her for the various e-mails she sends on Modern Greek subjects. I felt very much at home on the sixth floor of Hamilton Hall. . . . Then to West 110th Street to Sharon Vaino’s dinner for Farm School trustees. T. Jewett, who has joined my committee, won’t be able to attend tomorrow owing to a conflict. Long talk with Jud Shaver about retirement communities. He is 61 and beginning to think about such things. I prompted him to visit Kendal on Hudson. Sat with Seth, the young man who’d been in the office previously, an unemployed (mostly) actor and would-be director of musical comedies. He picks up odd jobs to make ends meet.

March 3, 2011

A full, interesting day. Did some typing of volume 5 of my journal in the lovely Yale Club library. Then walked to Madison and 36th to the Morgan library and museum. What a treasure! This plutocrat collected books mostly and manuscripts. I saw his Guttenberg Bible, Shakespeare Quarto, original manuscripts by Mozart, Liszt, Schumann, Schubert, and his thousands of volumes of English and French literature in fine bindings. Nice to watch groups of schoolchildren being instructed there. Then to the Chinese restaurant on 39th and 6th recommended by Mrs. Gow's son as the best in New York. I had spring shrimp with garlic sauce, very tasty, and amazingly inexpensive. We had our meeting of the Primary, Secondary, and Student Life Committee at 3:00 p.m. T. Jewett couldn't come. Costas Carass, a new member, was useful, Panos full of information and good values, ditto for Bill Tsacalis and Tommy Thomas. Manita was present but didn't speak. We're full of excitement regarding the forthcoming pre-kindergarten, kindergarten, and primary school, which should affect Secondary and even Perrotis in helpful ways. And the whole project has invigorated Tasos Apostolidis, who now is no longer longing to retire. . . . Back to the Yale Club. Met Michael Groden for dinner there and for the Mint Theater's production of Arnold Bennett's 1909 play "What the Public Wants" about crooked, exploitative journalism, very appropriate for today, a century later. Well acted, always interesting.

March 4, 2011

Went to an exhibit that included a movie showing Vesuvius's eruption in A.D. 79 hour by hour. Lots of smothered bodies. Good displays of how Pompeii's citizens had lived before the catastrophe. . . . Wrote up the minutes of our Secondary Committee's meeting yesterday. Perrotis meeting today. Panos tired; too many meetings. Afterwards, Dimitri Gondicas and I went out for coffee for an hour or so. He made a good suggestion for the cover of my Selected Letters, to have the image of Kazantzakis depicted against the background of a holograph letter. Also to include some photos of letters in the book. Of course he wants to revise Greek Today, and asked me to inquire at UPNE if they're willing—perhaps to do an on-line 2nd edition. . . . Instead of going to the ultra-expensive trustees' dinner, I went to the Paul Taylor ballet at the City Center. The first offering, "Speaking in Tongues," I found repulsive and much too long. Ugly, spasmodic repetitions. I couldn't wait for it to end. Of course it did contain bravura dancing. But the second piece, "Esplanade," to Bach's double violin concerto, one of Taylor's earliest, was totally delicious, sort of 50% modern dance and 50% ballet, marvelously congruent with the music. This time I wished it hadn't ended so soon.

NYC

Full board. Pretty routine. We still have a yearly deficit, but less. They expect each trustee to give a minimum of $3000 a year. . . . I'm stuck in La Guardia Airport at 7:00 p.m. because the plane has some problems. Chrysanthi just telephoned to say that Alice died two hours ago. I'm not surprised. She was failing rapidly when we saw her, and I doubted that she'd last until our projected visit on March 14th. She had stopped eating, to hasten the process. Apparently all the children were present. It's very good that we went when we did in February to see her when she still could recognize us and be aware that we had come. But at age 74, which everyone now says is "so young" it's a shame that she couldn't have had another few years.

Sunday, March 6, 2011

Bob Daubenspeck came for lunch and gave us his latest little poem:

CONVERSATION

Will there be silence?

Or will there be conversation when I am called and join the Holy Spirit?

It will depend, dear one,

on how many words of Love you have learned and carried out.

March 15, 2011

To Boston via Dartmouth Coach. Checked in at Hilton Logan Airport. Silver Line to South Station. Got a senior "T" card for Chrysanthi. Red Line to Cambridge. An hour reading about Prometheus in Widener Library. Supper in a Thai restaurant. Then to the Oberon on Arrow Street for the A.R.T.'s "rock opera" production of Aeschylus's Prometheus Bound. Waiting on line outside with others, all of whom were very young. Those over 21 received a red tape across the wrist, certifying them capable of ordering alcoholic beverages. Finally admitted. Our seats were at Table 2 on bar stools, very uncomfortable. Everyone given earplugs! We applied ours. But most of the music was quite bearable, even nice. I watched the remarkable bassist a lot, and the gyrating guitarist. Prometheus was a man in his twenties, shirtless, in blue jeans, writhing in his chains, acting, speaking, and singing well enough. Io was an African-American girl, Hermes a domineering braggart. Some of Aeschylus actually survived all this and could be heard. But despite all the castigation of tyrants (Zeus), the performance had no emotional power for me, although afterward they made a speech about Amnesty International, its relevance to Libyan dictatorship, etc. A large problem was the fact that in the songs the words could barely be understood. One question, when all is done, is why Greek drama needs to be subjected to all this extraneous business, although it did attract a full house mostly of people hovering on either side of age 21.

Santa Barbara

Daphne left us for an hour and a half at the Mission while she did her weekly service at the Middle School, helping with snacks. The Mission is interesting, giving the history of the region: first Indians, then Spain, then Mexico, then the United States: 1848 treaty with Mexico, 1849 gold discovered, 1850 California becomes a state. The Missions were created of course to convert the Indians to Christianity. Instead, the Indians caught the white man's diseases and died in droves. I was impressed by how crude all the architecture and artifacts were compared, say, to those of Ancient Greece. After lunch we went with Peter to his tennis lesson, not next door but in a gated community (with a real gate and guard at the entrance) surrounding a golf course and tennis courts. Luxury galore. Sumptuous private homes. Tennis pros on tap. Disgusting. . . . David Buseck sent me the music we're meant to play at Alice's memorial. A bit difficult. I'll need to practice. I queried Alec, who is coming, if he'd like to do Fauré's "Après un rêve." Andrew had a lesson on bass guitar. The teacher arrived in a Mercedes. But all menial workers are Mexicans driving pick-up trucks and buying sandwiches in Montecito for lunch instead of bringing lunches from home.

Friday, March 18, 2011

Lots of piano practice this morning: Fauré's "Après un rêve" and the flute sonata David sent me to play at Alice's memorial. Nice lunch in an Italian restaurant nearby with Chrysanthi and Daphne. Greg is away with his tennis team for a match. Watched Andrew play basketball (his team won, 25 to 0) in a lovely YMCA filled with people on exercise machines.

Joined Facebook, tutored a little by Christina. Watched the “husband-wife” pair of ducks who are sojourning here, it seems.

Saturday, March 19, 2011

We gave away our tickets to the Met broadcast of Lucia di Lammermoor in Hanover because of the trip here, but happily discovered that it played as well today in Santa Barbara. What a pleasure! Natalie Dessay played Lucia memorably, Ludovic Tézier the villain, Enrico, Joseph Calleja the lover, Edgardo. Beautiful music, expert singing and acting. The sextet was especially memorable, and of course the mad scene. . . . Folks who asked to be my friends on Facebook included the nice student I had at Princeton, Nancarrow, who is now gainfully employed in Chicago. But Doug Gwyn wrote to say that after this summer (he is now at Pendle Hill, writing its history), he sees no source so far of gainful employment.

Sunday, March 20, 2011

Daphne digitalized the video that Don Kurka made when I celebrated my 70th birthday and the farm’s 50th birthday. We saw the whole thing, of which I had very little memory except for the huge faux pas when Don said to Dan Seeger, “I’ve heard that you don’t play the piano very well.” (Ugh!) Lovely images are recorded, and even better are the testimonies of Alec and Leander about me and their relationship with me and especially about the major role played by the farm (a) in that relationship and (b) in their own sense of values. . . . Afterwards, played monopoly with a very energetic Peter and Andrew.

Tuesday, March 22, 2011

My Ritsos book has been corrected (let’s hope) by the publisher. I’ll need to go through it again, of course. But not, I hope and trust, with the agony of the first time, when the Greek was 80% wrong. . . . I’ve had an interesting and cordial e-mail exchange with the new editor of JMGS, Maria Koundoura, because she graduated from the University of Melbourne and also has roots in Thessaloniki. . . . The Kazantzakis Letters will be returned to me, paginated, in mid-May, to check again and write the index. Publication probably in December. . . . This morning we walked through the extraordinarily beautiful shopping center of Santa Barbara on State Street: flowers, colors, opulence everywhere. Then to the excellent museum to see a special exhibit of an artist who says he was influenced by Kazantzakis. In the afternoon, to Santa Barbara High School to watch Greg's boys' tennis team play another high school. I was amazed at the skill and strength of these young players aged 14 to 17. They serve beautifully, have powerful overheads, and smash their forehands and backhands. Well, it's California. Greg was pleased because his team won most of the matches. We picked up Peter and Andrew from school. What a difference! Peter lively and vivacious, Andrew half asleep, uninterested in everything, devoid of vitality. Christina left yesterday morning for a five-day camping and kayaking trip organized by her school. I find her personality extremely negative; she actually frightens me. But apparently she's entirely different when not at home. At least I hope so. Of all our seven grandchildren, Alec's and Monica's have the best personalities.

March 28, 2011

Membership Committee tonight at the Meeting with the results of the letters we sent out six months ago to "junior members" and non-resident adult members. Among the "junior," Daphne asked to be released from membership. Among the adult non-residents, Leander asked to be released from membership. So we've lost them both, it seems, definitively, to Quakerism. Only Alec (maybe) remains with some allegiance. A shame! Their lives, and the lives of their families, are impoverished thereby. I failed in this respect (and others) as a parent.

April 4, 2011

An interesting day. At 8:30 a.m. Joan Wilson came to play four-hand piano with me. We practiced the Brandenburg; our two parts of the eight-hand version we're doing with Stan Udy and Bill Clendenning. Then I went to Chalmers to introduce Homer Jernigan, the speaker at this month's Professors' Colloquium, which Tedd Osgood and I coordinate. Homer gave a splendid presentation on innovative methods of teaching theology, reminding me of the dismal teaching of New Testament Greek that I endured at the Selly Oak Colleges. Then to my study in Baker Library, working some more on my essay on Thomas Mann's séance chapter. Then Chrysanthi picked me up and at Kendal we supped with Evelyn and Mel Spiegel and Suzanne Laaspere and Dick and Audrey Cherin, very pleasantly. Then Chrysanthi and I drove back into Hanover to attend a splendid production at Hopkins Center—the SITI Theater from New York doing their very interesting version of Macbeth, beautifully acted, as though in rehearsal. This was followed by a question and answer period between actors and audience. At home, I accessed Daphne's photos, sent to my Facebook account, of their week in Hawaii, all sunshine and surfing. All this in one day.

April 6, 2011

Accidentally I discovered that Stephanie Boone, who used to work for me in peer tutoring, is still working in the totally revised system, which continues in an enhanced fashion. She'd like to have me interviewed regarding how all this started.

April 7, 2011                      Madison, Wisconsin, Concourse Hotel, 800 356-8293

A long trip here. Delays at Chicago, but at 7:00 p.m. I met Vassiliki Tsigas-Fotinis, Eva Prionis (from Stanford), Nancy Biska, Elpida Bairaktaris, and Louiza Kondilis, and we all went out for a delicious supper at the hotel: Thai hors d'oeuvres, swordfish, full glass of wine, and lots of good talk.

April 8, 2011

Madison, Wisconsin

But the real fun was today, especially at breakfast. I sat at a table with teachers of Arabic, of African languages, a Palestinian named Mohamed who teaches Arabic, an American who'd spent two years in Indonesia and whose children went to Jakarta International School (JIS) while Alec was teaching there, and an Indonesian-Chinese Christian lady teaching Indonesian in California. Wonderful! Then our group met for many hours with June Phillips, who gave an excellent presentation on the ACTFL standards, giving us lots of ideas how to improve our application. And it turned out that Louiza is a good friend of Tom and Nancy Doulis in Portland. Small world. We kept going until 5:30 p.m., assigning each of us jobs to do before we meet again in New York in October. Then we reconvened for supper together at 7:00 p.m. . . . On e-mail, I received Simone Dinnerstein's program for April 30. . . . At supper tonight, Nancy told us terrible things about the New York archdiocese, that everything is controlled by their financial officer, even the archbishop and the patriarch, with evidence of homosexual relationships, corruption on a grand scale. Horrible! . . . Interesting that all the waiters we've encountered, plus personnel at the hotel, are Americans, not Mexicans or Hispanics from Puerto Rico or South America, or other ethnics. Such is the Midwest, it seems—very different. . . . Chrysanthi told me on the telephone that Congress at the last minute reached an agreement on the budget, so that the government won't shut down tomorrow. What a circus this Congress is!

Madison

Vassiliki and I went in the morning to visit and tour Monona Terrace, the large complex designed by Frank Lloyd Wright very late in his career, at the time of the Guggenheim Museum. And it is lovely: full of circles, and a marvelous stairway with a skylight above. Rooftop gardens. Even the parking areas are aesthetic.

April 16, 2011

Tempe, Arizona

We traveled early this morning to Phoenix, met Daphne at the airport and Alec at the Four Star Hotel. How nice! Then to Friendship Village for the memorial to Alice. This is the retirement community where Peter Buseck's mother spent her last years. Big auditorium with a Petrov piano, made in Czechoslovakia. David and I rehearsed the Handel Adagio and Allegro quite nicely. Then Alec and I rehearsed the Fauré "Après un rêve," agreeing on rubato elements. In the event, I played the Handel allegro badly, starting well, then having trouble, but ending well, so it was OK, not a disaster. But Alec and I played the Fauré beautifully. It is such an emotionally powerful piece, and was much appreciated. Before things started, it was especially nice to greet and talk to Ellen, although Susie was rather cold and distant. She and others of course were lamenting for their mother. Peter Buseck's position was especially difficult. Paul Ekstein, Peter's cousin, offered the welcome. Then David and I played our Handel. Then came a series of reflections by, in order, Clive, Paul, Lori; then our Fauré; then reflections by a woman whom Alice had helped with English; then Daphne, then Leander's letter read by Daphne, then Carrie Bitterbaum's letter read by Susie, then a Scriabin prelude played by Walter Cosand, a piano professor, then lots of open reflections unprogrammed, e.g. by Amy Bernstein and Roy, and lots more. Finally, Paul Ekstein closed the proceedings two hours after they had begun. The tributes to Alice's vivacity, love of family, love of music, love of travel, were various and warm. I spoke about our many collaborations at the Kinhaven four-hand workshop, benefiting from Leander's coaching. Too bad that almost nothing was said about Little Red Schoolhouse. Carrie Bitterbaum's letter was especially warm; I hadn't realized that Alice and she had been best of friends. Paul was humorous about his failures as a French horn player. Ellen spoke beautifully, as did Clive, describing the difficult family situation with his own parents as compared to the excellent one thanks to Alice and Peter. All in all, it was an informative, uplifting testimony to a life that alas ended too soon. . . . Afterward, back at the hotel, we had a few hours with both Daphne and Alec before she left for her flight back to Santa Barbara. Then Alec, Chrysanthi and I had a leisurely delicious steak dinner in a nearby restaurant. He described Elena's brightness; she is now mastering Chinese! His work as head of arts continues to appeal to him; he manages the drama department, studio art, and music, with an ample budget. How nice!

An article in today's Daily Dartmouth quoted Chrysanthi, who was interviewed yesterday:

Chrysanthi Bien, chair of the Hanover Senior Citizen Advisory Committee, also said she appreciates the wide variety of opportunities available to her in Hanover. Bien co-wrote a Greek language workbook with French and Italian professor John Rassias that was published by the College in 2004.

"I take advantage of everything here," Bien said. "I've been living in Hanover since 1961 and it's been fantastic. I know many of us love the fact that here you can see the opera for $20 compared to spending $200 in New York or Boston to see the same show."

The Hanover Senior Center is also a popular resource for retirees, according to Bien, who organizes events for the center.

April 21, 2011

Went to "Be Fit" to receive physiotherapy for my pains in left hip when getting out of bed and, less so, in right arm when raised high. Also trigger finger in the left hand, but this seems to be getting better. The pain hasn't happened in a long while. I've started a series of exercises.

May 3, 2011

New York City

To NYC by Dartmouth Coach, arriving at 11:30 a.m. Yale Club lunch served by Angela, my friend. Then we went to Macy's at Herald Square, the huge store that was built around 1840, I think. Bought a new Atlantic valise to replace my old red standby whose extendable handle no longer works. And Chrysanthi insisted on buying me a new suit jacket, summer weight (silk & wool) for my birthday (paid for of course on my Macy's card). We rested, dressed somewhat fancy, and walked to the Union League Club on East 37th, very special—Abraham Lincoln was a member—for a cocktail reception first, all this for the Farm School. Nice to see old friends and to meet new folks connected in some way with the School. I felt worse and worse about skipping the meetings in June because trustees really should not be absentees, but Chrysanthi refuses to go to Greece. Then we all went upstairs to another huge room for dinner (filet mignon) and a talk by the actress Olympia Dukakis, first cousin of the late Arthur Dukakis, a former trustee, and also of Michael Dukakis, former governor of Massachusetts and presidential candidate. She was lively as she recounted her Greek roots and her admiration for Arthur, but she didn't reveal any secrets of her professional life in what she called "the entertainment industry." I talked a bit with Joann Ryding, who says that Tsimiski is filled with failed, empty, stores. We both worried about Albana, who seems at the end of her tether, in an economy with nothing fresh to offer.

Wednesday, May 4, 2011

New York City

A long, stimulating day. I took Chrysanthi at 10:30 a.m. to see the Morgan Museum, which had so impressed me the last time I was in the City. This time, after touring the office and library, I went upstairs to see the exhibit of personal journals, wonderfully varied and informative, especially those of Thoreau, Scott, Virginia Woolf (in print, not manuscript), Charlotte Brontë, Hawthorne. Good to be reminded that I'm not the only obsessive journal-keeper. . . . Walking uptown afterwards, we passed leisurely through part of the garment district devoted chiefly, it seems, to beads. Also wholesale dresses, female ornaments, and the like. A hot pastrami sandwich à la NYC and then an immense treat: the musical comedy "Billy Elliot," enchanting from start to finish, largely owing to the immensely talented eleven-year-old playing Billy and also to an even younger boy (it seemed) playing the mischievous Michael. Music, décor, choreography, stagecraft—everything enchanting. A full three hours of delight. I'm ready to see it again. . . . Back to the Yale Club for a lamb chop supper served by Angela, plus wine and coffee, all free of charge because it's my birthday month. So $500 for the Farm School filet last night and $0 for the lamb chops tonight. . . . Finally, to Lincoln Center for ballet, as though one hadn't experienced enough ballet already in "Billy Elliot." An all-Balanchine program: "Episodes" (Webern), very abstract and modernistic, with the beautiful Ricercata from Bach's Musical Offering added on. "Tombeau de Couperin" (Ravel), formalistic, with two quadrilles. Finally "Symphony in Three Movements" (Stravinsky), beginning with the spectacular row of ballerinas stretching, angled, across the entire stage. A contrast of whites and blacks, frenzy and serenity.

New York–Hanover

To MoMA where, luckily, I'm still a member, so we went straight in instead of waiting forever on line with the hordes of people buying admission. Went again to Picasso's guitars, which Chrysanthi hadn't seen. Some are lovely artistic paintings, others mere sketches or jokes, it seems. Perhaps most impressive is simply his productivity. Upstairs, on the 6th floor, we were held in suspense by a film showing a red bug trying to get up a steep hill and repeatedly failing. Then another film, remarkably intimate, of a small but intensely powerful tornado, remarkably filmed. We raced through an exhibit of German expressionism because of the need to get back to the Yale Club for our return bus. Too bad, because Chrysanthi's portrait is of course by a German expressionist we knew in Morningside Heights. A quick trip to Grand Central Market to buy manouri and stilton. Then the five-hour ride back to Hanover, during which I read some of the boring Ph.D. thesis I'm vetting on the novelistic treatment of Asia Minor refugees.

May 7, 2011

Memorial service here today for Sandy Stettenheim, Quaker style. I instructed the non-Quakers at the start about silence.

Sherri Buckman will retire after 19 years. I wrote this poem for her:

A SONNET ON MY EVENING'S SHERRI

My evening's quaff of flavorful Sherrí, unfailingly smooth, sweet and ever good,
 even with a dollop of Levengood, Fleming-lad, Cadwallader, and Brophy, or Armstrong, Edgerton, Woolrich, or Smith, not to mention our council présidents splendidly galore. But now I am miffed:

 no more nineteen-year-old daily essence:
 that routine quaff of Harvey's Bristol Cream, which aided Sherri's vigor organizational to upgrade each day's chaotic mess to its identifiable proper nest, making Kendal's life operational, powered by brain and a bit, too, of dream.

May 15, 2011

Played "Après le rêve" with Madith Hamilton, cello, as the prelude for Fred Berthold's Interfaith Gathering, and the largo from Chopin's Cello Sonata as the postlude, managing both well enough. Lively lunch afterwards with the Bertholds. I learned the Chopin in one week, which is encouraging.

Riparius

Here since June 12. Leander returned after Kinhaven, did lots and lots of mowing but also broke the White by encountering a thick stick hidden by tall grass. It's being repaired. I've been preoccupied for ten days creating the index for the Kazantzakis Letters, covering roughly 40 pages a day. Near the end today. And on page 825 I found the following regarding translation of The Last Temptation into French. Kazantzakis writes to Prevelakis, "Your Greek and also mine is sufficiently craggy for those who do not know demotic. Thus I confess that I would not entrust the Temptation to Mr. L. at a distance"—"at a distance" meaning without help from him. Well, what do you know! Who was there to help me? . . . My Ritsos book arrived from Scott King. Beautiful cover and design. But still a few typos in the Greek, only four this time. Both this and the Kazantzakis Letters are reaching the point of publication. . . . I should mention the five or six sessions of physiotherapy I had in Hanover for my thigh and also my right shoulder, with remarkable improvement especially for the thigh. I'm continuing the exercises here at the farm, more or less.

June 23, 2011

Finished the index to all 851 pages of text.

July 4, 2011

Finished an extensive weeding of the garden, by hand mostly. Ready now to start in the office with my journal. I'm doing 1966 at present. . . . Lots of mowing. And Alec, Monica, and the two children raked the entire east field and pond field and brought the good hay to Art Perryman, whose three horses were most appreciative.

July 5, 2011

Splendid evening at the ballet. "Fearful Symmetries" to John Adams's minimalist music; dynamic choreography by Peter Martins, total energy without stop. Then "I'm Old Fashioned," which we've seen so many times and this time seemed uninteresting because Fred Astaire is better, really, than these dancers. But "Stars and Stripes," which we'd never seen, was spectacular, demonstrating Balanchine's genius once again. . . . Yet they ruined the Hall of Springs dinner by abandoning the buffet. The ordered entrée was enough for four people—disgusting. I complained to the maitre d', who said she agreed.

July 14, 2011

What a pleasure to see both "Apollo" and "Agon" on the same program at SPAC. "Apollo" remains my absolutely favorite, the masterpiece of the 24-year-old Balanchine. "Agon," with Stravinsky's 12-tone difficult music, is interesting but not soothing, as "Apollo" is. Also on this program: Balanchine's sensational pas de deux "Tarantella," pure fun, and a fine exploration of Ligeti's piano music by Christopher Wheeldon, premiered in 2001. All this was topped of by (a) a full moon in clear skies, (b) a Stewart's chocolate milk shake in Lake George on the way home, with Chrysanthi ordering the same for herself and cherishing it, after resisting for 30 years.

July 17, 2011

Daphne, Greg, Andrew, and Peter arrived (Christina is at a volleyball camp). Very nice celebration of our anniversary. Cookout with steak, corn, potatoes, marshmallows, fruit. Andrew grew three inches since last summer and his voice is changing. He asked to drive the tractor; he can now reach the pedals. Daphne is a new member of the board of trustees of the Santa Barbara Middle School, where Christina just graduated and Andrew is about to begin. Greg is chairman of the Santa Barbara High School Foundation, which hopes to raise $5,000,000 this year.

July 20, 2011

Alec now has four “new” tires on his Jeep, actually old truck tires given him by Earl—whitewalls no less—and a uniform set. He also now has a generator that works, so the battery charges. And suddenly the horn works. I treated him to the generator as his birthday present. The gas pedal is now controlled by a bungee cord since its spring disappeared. Perhaps next year he’ll fix the brakes. . . . I just finished 1967 in typing my journal. 1967 was an amazing year. Coup in Greece. A week on Mount Athos. Harbison Award and visit to the White House. Woodbrooke.

July 23, 2011

Finished typing Journal VIII, which brings me to the middle of 1971. This one included the Colonels’ coup in Greece and life at Woodbrooke, ending with our tour of Quakerism’s classic sites.

July 28, 2011

Finished mowing the south field—i.e., everything. Have I ever done it so soon, before the end of July? . . . The pond has algae, the first time. I’ve ordered bacterial treatment, and the children are scooping the pads out with a device I constructed with two badminton rackets wired together and covered with window screen.

August 17, 2011

Tom and Joan Wilson brought us the algaecide I ordered, forbidden in New York State, OK in New Hampshire, so I had it sent to Kendal. Last Sunday we applied it in the pond and today, lo and behold!—the algae are all gone. I also applied something that introduces millions of bacteria that dissolve the sludge, thereby reducing the nutrients needed for algae. So far so good. This double treatment seems to be working beautifully. I also had the water tested and got a good result: it’s fine for recreational use.

August 20, 2011

Wilsons for lunch, on their way home from their week at Lake Pleasant. Tom remembers coming here in 1950. We had lots of blueberries for dessert, and our own tomatoes and lettuce on the sandwiches, plus σπανακόπιτα. In the morning, typing my journal for 1977, I found a long entry describing in detail the time John Rassias and I spent in Birmingham with Christos Alexiou and Paul Morby, making the videotapes for De- motiv Greek 1. After the Wilsons left, Leander and I went into the woods to the area where we did the thinning of beech last year, and salvaged a large amount of this beech for firewood. . . . Spaghetti dinner. Then of course to Stewart's for ice cream. . . . Two days ago we had dinner with Fran Shapiro at "The Glen," where she now lives. She is 97 years old, perfectly sound in mind, just a little slow on her feet, but able to walk well enough, and with a good appetite. But she misses Irv terribly and shed a few tears when speaking about him. . . . My Ritsos book arrived, looking very beautiful. I asked Scott King if he might be interested in my Harkianakis translations and he told me to send them.

August 24, 2011

A new book by Ronald Dworkin, Justice for Hedgehogs, starts with his recipes for personal dignity. The TLS reviewer (August 19 & 26, p. 29) summarizes as follows: "You should recognize, as a matter of self-respect, that your life is objectively important. And second you should assume the responsibility to make something of it: to pursue a good life by all means but in any case to live well, true to your situation and the values you find appropriate."

August 25, 2011

John Tallmadge was here for 24 hours, arriving for lunch yesterday and leaving after lunch today. I think we talked—or mostly he talked—pretty steadily during all those hours except at night when we were asleep. He, now approaching retirement age, was very interested in my "philosophy" of retirement and how, in actuality, I had applied that philosophy, or if I had. I told him, of course, that I, so far, have been very lucky insofar as health is concerned. That is always the Number 1 consideration. Also, qua humanist and not scientist, I could pursue my profession after retirement, needing just a computer and time, not a laboratory, grants, etc. He told me that he was impressed, even as an undergraduate, with what he perceived as my ability to stay far away from academic politics and factionalism, and we discussed this at length—the truth of his perception and also to some degree the untruth. But I was not the sole subject of conversation. It was good to hear his own story, and values, and application of those values. He is admirable in, owing to good values, overcoming the disappointment of (a) failing to get tenure at Carleton, (b) being dismissed from his job at Union. His belief, gained from actual experience, is that catastrophe can be turned into opportunity, and that is what happened regarding both of the above catastrophes. He is now acting as a consultant, helping people in academia who are struggling. He showed us his techniques in this regard. They are admirable. (Chrysanthi was very interested in all this.) How nice to see this totally civilized man! . . . And of course he loved Greece. We saw photos galore, especially of Arcadia and Bassae, now enclosed in a tent. Yesterday I showed him our forest thinnings and the lovely hemlock stand. And this morning I took him down to see our super-industrious beavers. More talk along both these paths. A lovely visit. . . . In the afternoon I struggled with the White, servicing it for the winter, but couldn't unscrew the oil filter.

August 26, 2011

Managed this morning to unscrew the oil filter, after I loosened the cowlings sufficiently to expose it better. But in replacing it with a new filter I failed to notice that the rubber ring of the old one hadn't come out with the filter, and I tightened (I thought) the new one with two rings in place. As a result, when I started the motor, oil shot out. Luckily I didn't destroy the motor, but it was close. When I finally secured the filter properly and started the motor again, huge billows of smoke were emitted, from the spilt oil that was everywhere. Finally everything became normal again. The White is now "ready for 2012" in the barn, neatly covered.

August 27, 2011

We're supposed to endure part of a hurricane this evening and tomorrow. A few days ago we felt, very slightly, the earthquake centered in Virginia.

August 28, 2011

Yes, we did have the hurricane, but not the worst of it. Twelve steady hours of driving rain. Then fierce gusts of wind, very scary. And no electricity, of course. We lost five or six trees between the Guest House and the south field. Luckily, no real damage and just popples toppled over, roots and all, and also a balsam with the roots. Lots of cleanup tomorrow. The big ash next to our cabin lost large branches but nothing hit our roof. . . . I was able, despite all this, to finish putting the John Deere away for the winter, doing much better with the jacking and elevating than last year, for instance. Of the machines to fix for winter I have remaining only the Troy-Bilt mower and the Stihl saw. Then I hope to do lots of pruning of blueberries and all the plum trees and the apple tree. . . . My ILEAD course has six registered students. Too bad. I was hoping for zero.

September 4, 2011

I read Peter Mackridge's informative article about Kay Cicellis, whom unfortunately I never got to know, although I think I met her once at a reception. I appreciated what she once wrote in a letter: "I know how easy it is to distort, unwillingly, the meaning and the flavor of a literary text. I have learnt to fear translators!" Amen.

September 12, 2011

New York City

I lectured for Jeff Murphy and his colleagues again, this time on The Magic Mountain. There were fewer attending than in the past, but most had finished the novel and I had good questions afterwards. Jeff said this was my 9th lecture to his group. Lovely to see familiar faces. Leisurely dinner afterwards with good discussion.

September 13, 2011

New York City

I fulfilled a long ambition by walking across the Brooklyn Bridge. The tower was completed in 1875; the bridge opened in, I think, 1883. Remarkable engineering triumph. Afterwards à propos in the Transportation Museum in Grand Central, I understood more about the similar engineering triumph of the first railroad tunnel under the Hudson River, built by the Pennsylvania Railroad. . . . On the bus to NYC I vetted Maria Kurka's essay on modern Colombian painters: their ambiguity—very philosophical and complex. On the way back, I read and annotated Dennis Carroll's latest, on the metaphysical deficiencies of contemporary life, relevant for The Magic Mountain.

September 17, 2011

Cambridge

Saw Porgy and Bess done with great gusto at the A.R.T. Gershwin's music is of course the essence of it, but story and characterization also come through with emotional power.

September 24, 2011

I think of this journal as a commonplace book. Today in the TLS for September 9, p. 23, I was interested to read that Erasmus's manual "On Copia" (on what is rhetorically pleasing) "instructs the reader in the usefulness of keeping a commonplace book, in which to record useful phrases, good ideas, and striking witticisms, which can be recycled in later writing, as needed.” Of course the review continues, “we all have access to Wikipedia, the cyberspace version of the commonplace book.” Well, I have both: Wikipedia, which I use on almost a daily basis, and my own, which I continue to read and type. I’m now up to the year 1982.

October 7, 2011

A review (in TLS, Sept. 30, 2011, page 5) of “Alfred Kazin’s Journals” by Zachary Leader attracted me for obvious reasons—for example, the fact that Kazin’s full journals add up to 7000 pages. This book publishes about one-sixth of the total. Kazin called his journal “a disorderly pile of shavings.” He saw its task as being “to use our suffering and to use it so well that we can use it up.” My journals are obviously—thankfully—different. . . . I was attracted to the following section on other people’s journals:

The journal-keepers Kazin measures himself against are Henry Thoreau, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Henry James, André Gide, Edmund Wilson, and John Cheever. His own journals constitute an “open, suffering, deeply clamorous personal record.” Wilson’s journals, in contrast, are “simulations of objectivity,” his voice “caged,” “disciplined,” making little distinction between “the degradations inflicted upon the old stone house in Talcottville” and “his daughter Helen flying through the windscreen in a terrible motor accident.” Kazin was a champion of emotional openness, like many writers of his age. Saul Bellow, five days his junior, has the protagonist of his first novel, Dangling Man (1944), complain that “to keep a journal nowadays is considered a kind of self-indulgence, a weakness, and in poor taste.” Dangling Man is written in journal form, by a protagonist openly defiant of current codes: “If you have difficulties, grapple with them silently, goes one of their commandments. To hell with that! I intend to talk about mine.” This was Kazin’s attitude as well, yet he admired the “obdurate elegance” and “persistence” of Wilson’s more impersonal journals.

John Cheever’s journals could not be more different from Wilson’s, but their emotional nakedness and extremity (“God knows what Susan C. [Cheever's daughter] or Gottlieb [the New Yorker editor] or whoever left out") elicit a comparable admiration: for the "terrible strength" required of their author, an iron determination that recalls "the Kafka story about the terrible machine, 'The Penal Colony.'" At his own moments of extremity and self-exposure, Kazin sometimes feels ashamed of journal-writing: "What a disease, what sentimentality, what rhetoric! What excuse for not living! Above all, what self-centeredness!" Mostly, though, he finds writing in journal form, in any form, a joy: "Evening—writing—the bliss of writing. How lucky I am to be able to write, to be able to write this quickly. To be able to tune in whenever and wherever." In writing, Kazin feels, "you have paid back something of your debt to the Creation, to look at things more sharply, attentively, and above all more lovingly, with the senses and coordinates aroused by the act of writing."

The construction company in Brant Lake Eric and Eric is re-roofing our small barn, with metal over the shingles I put on in 1982. This is the first time we have hired some outside people to do any of our roofs. Leander and Alec wanted very much to do it next summer, but I thought best to keep them off of roofs despite the expense: $2371.

October 10, 2011

In today's class, on Ritsos, I read, among many others, his poem "the Last Summer," written on Samos two years before he died. It of course speaks to me, strangely: "Farewell colors of evening . . . Time to pack our three suitcases: books, papers, shirts . . . Don't forget the pink dress you looked so nice in, even if you won't be wearing it this winter. Meanwhile in the few days left I'll revise the lines I wrote in July and August, though I can't help thinking that I've added nothing, have in fact subtracted far too much, because what glimmers through those lines is a lurking suspicion that this summer, with its cicadas, its trees, its ocean, its boat whistles blowing in glorious sunsets, its caiques bobbing under moonlit balconies, its feigned compassion—will be my last." —Karlóvasi, September 3, 1988.

October 12, 2011

New York City

Went to MoMA to see the large retrospective on Willem de Kooning. It seems that he spent five decades deliberately producing ugliness, which I suppose is a commentary on the times. Contrariwise, I am re-reading Life in the Tomb, which I will teach (somehow) on Monday. This, although about the ugliness of the first world war, is beautiful in its allegiance to the human imagination. I cannot imagine how I ever had the endurance to translate it.

Saturday, October 15

I'm still in New York. My flight was canceled yesterday; everything else was booked solid. Luckily, the Yale Club (which really feels like home) could take me another night. Yesterday was interesting. I apparently left my Parker pen at NYU. In addition, I lost my penknife at Burlington because I'd forgotten to leave it home; it was confiscated by security at the airport. I'm getting careless and forgetful. Also a bit confused. Yesterday morning when Vasiliki Tsigas joined me for a breakfast meeting, I thought she was Vasiliki Rafti, and at NYU I couldn't figure out who Eva Constantellou was until I saw her name tag. But everything else was OK. Our breakfast meeting with the ACTFL people was pleasant and productive. It seems that I should go to Denver for the next meeting. Then at NYU I saw lots of old friends (recognizing most, I'm glad to say). Andonis Decavalles's widow was there, and gave me a lovely photo taken in 1973 at the MGSA symposium at Columbia showing Andonis, Chrysanthi, Christos Alexiou, and me (looking very young at age 43). Mike Keeley was there, looking old and tired. Mary has lost her near-term memory and is undergoing chemotherapy. They're still in the house despite everything. But they did go to Greece for three months. Heard Dia give a good paper on her Census, with Wim in the audience. We pledged to visit again in Cambridge when we go to the A.R.T. Nice to see Elsa Amanatidou from Brown, and Martin McKinsey, now at UNH, and Vangelis Calotychos, and Karen Emmerich, currently in Cyprus, and Dimitri Gondicas, and Πετράκι, the son, now 16 years old, of Stathis Gourgouris and Neni Panourgia (Eva's "baby" is about to get married), and George Syrimis, and Gonda von Steen, and Victor Papacosma, now retired in Maine, and Katherine Fleming, now vice-chancellor at NYU, and Vasilis Lambropoulos's wife, etc. In Dia's session on bibliography and libraries, the Yale librarian spoke at length of all the services rendered by Evro Layton—good to remember her in this way. The Modern Greek specialist at the Library of Congress, Harold Leich, turned out to be a Dartmouth graduate. He told me that he studied Modern Greek with Michael Choukas. Obviously that affected his life. The session I chaired, "New Readings on Seferis," had just two speakers since three had canceled. But this was much better since we could therefore have leisurely discussion after each of the papers, both of which dealt with Seferis's treatment of Homer. Thanks to my ILEAD course, I was able to point out the quote from Karyotakis in Μυθιστόρημα, which the speaker had overlooked. We had a good discussion of Greek writers' use of the ancients and its pros and cons. Also saw Peter Allen and Tom Gallant.

October 22, 2011

Ruth Lappin, chair of the Kendal Finance Committee, asked me to come with details of how we handled, or failed to handle, problems with the building's defects when I was chair of the board. I looked over whatever documentation I still had in my files, a lot, and came up with considerable information and memories. Right now I can hardly imagine how involved I was in those years when, somehow, I was also still teaching.

Riparius

Finally made it to the farm, traveling on Route 4, now restored after the August 28 hurricane, but showing evidence still of vast damage on both sides of the road. The new metal roof on the barn, done by Eric & Eric, contractors, looks lovely. Strangely, they left a large tarpulin, a ladder, lots of boards, and some roofing paper. Also, I found the cable for the lightning rod detached from the grounding rod because now too short. A mystery, until reliable Earl appeared and pointed out that they had to wrap the cable around a bit, owing to the metal roof, forcing them to detach it from the clamp securing it to the grounding rod. I'll try to repair this with additional aluminum cable. Earl also told how one of the workmen, whom he knows, said that placing metal roofing over shingles was simply bad technique, so they removed the shingles even though we had secured a reduced price from Eric & Eric by asking them to leave the old shingles under the new metal. So, we seem to have received a sort of bargain. Lovely supper in Sweet Tomatoes, Rutland, on the way home.

October 24, 2011

My six-week ILEAD course ended today with a class on Zorba. I did two weeks on Cavafy, one on Seferis, Elytis, Sikelianos, Karyotakis, one on Ritsos, one on Life in the Tomb, and the last one on Zorba. Some of the students seemed very involved and responsive. Among them was Evelyn Spiegel, a Greek-American, Frederica Graham, who grew up in Greece while her father was serving there under the Marshall Plan, and Everett Marder, so I had some who could read the Greek out loud (sort of). At least all, except one, stayed through all six weeks. . . . I'm very angry at Charlotte Armstrong, who abolished my Farm School committee without consulting me. She wrote me that the committee's reports were "written by the Administration" (!) instead of representing the trustees' independent appraisal of school affairs. Some truth in that yes, but not entirely. We'll see what happens in New York on November 11, when the new Education Committee replacing mine and the Post-Secondary meets.

October 30, 2011

A lovely Sunday, fine Quaker Meeting, with only Peter Stettenheim ministering. Lunch at EBAs with Jack and Ruth Hunter and Sydney Jarvis. Then the Metropolitan Opera's high definition broadcast of a marvelous Don Giovanni. Interesting supper with Kendal friends. Then practiced Barsantis, which I'll be playing with Joan Wilson and Madith Hamilton at the early music concert on November 6, plus the #2 Goldberg variation, which I'll be playing by myself. . . . Typing the journal is progressing. I'm in volume 12, approaching the end of 1985, on typed page 955.

November 1, 2011

To Riparius again, because I felt compelled to fix the disconnected lightning rod cable, having secured the necessary materials thanks to the internet. I did this without difficulty. Then I also managed to replace the defective special socket despite the rigors of dealing with #12 wire. Chrysanthi and I shared a pizza in Rutland on the way back. Saw Earl before we left. His camera photographed a splendid buck that he'll be waiting to shoot tonight. Venison for the winter plus spectacular horns! . . . Gifted $100,000, $25,000 each, to Theo, Elena, Sophia, and Nicholas.

November 9, 2011

Played Bach with Dick on flute and Pat Porter accurately sight-reading the voice parts. Lovely. Next week we'll have Allan Munck again on cello, back from Florida, and perhaps Phil Porter singing bass voice parts.

November 10, 2011

New York City

Went to the new Islamic show at th Met. Huge, diverse collection. For me (and most people, probably), the most spectacular artifacts were the carpets, plentiful and beautifully displayed. One about thirty feet long, others almost as long. Since I've seen girls in Ouranoupolis making rugs laboriously knot by knot, I can imagine the labor that these Islamic rugs represent. Otherwise the art doesn't "send" me, probably because there are so few depictions of human beings, or even of animals. What seems to dominate is calligraphy, design, geometric exactitude. . . . Traveling here, I began to read David Bellos's Is That a Fist in Your Ear, about translation. Some of it will be useful for my talk on translation to the Professors' Colloquium. I also found, by total surprise, probably an accurate translation of a phrase in Tasos Apostolidis's report on the Farm School's Resident Trustees. He stresses ερευνητικές εργασίες. The best I could come up with was "academic skills." In Bellos I found "empirical investigation," which seems to be what the cryptic Greek actually says. Dimitri Gondicas told me later that it probably means "research projects." . . . Cocktail party for Farm School trustees. Nice to see Tommy Thomas and especially Sheila Baird, the hostess at her splendid residence on East 37th Street. I asked Joann about Albana. Her hope now is to get aid doing another degree this time in the U.S. As Joann said with some severity, "What she really should do is get married, even if it's not meant to last." Mariage de convenance! . . . I raced to the City Center to see the American Ballet Theatre, and what a pleasure that was, except for the first number, "Duets," with percussive music by John Cage realized it seemed by jack hammer and sticks. But the rest was exquisite: a trio on stage playing the andante from Schubert's Trio no. 1, three dancers languidly interpreting the gorgeous music. Sheer beauty of both sight and sound. Title: "The Garden of Villandry." Next came a humorous Twyla Tharp "Known by Heart (Junk) Duet," followed by "Private Light," the best part of which was the exceptional guitar playing of popular music. Lastly, "Company B," choreographed by Paul Taylor, set to renditions of popular songs by the Andrews Sisters, the words being very important. Great fun, with lovely dancing. A long evening, yet I was sorry when it ended.

November 11, 2011

New York City

I walked to MoMA to see the Rivera fresco show, luckily with my member's pass at 9:30, avoiding the crowds that came later. Of especial interest was Rivera's troubles with Rockefeller Center, which asked him to remove the depiction of Lenin and, when he refused, removed and destroyed his entire fresco. I compare this, of course, with our Orozco murals at Dartmouth, equally communist, yet kept, never destroyed or even "fixed." I was also extremely interested in the fact that Rivera, like Kazantzakis, was invited to Moscow for the 1927 tenth anniversary celebrations of the Bolshevik Revolution, although he was a VIP, standing very near Stalin on the reviewing stand. A few years later, however, he was expelled from the Mexican Party because of his support of Trotsky over Stalin. The frescos displayed are of course splendid. . . . Education Committee at 3:30. I emphasized the need for the board to vote tomorrow to establish an elementary school (grades 1 to 6). I compared this visionary plan to the decision to build the Empire State Building a few months after the 1929 crash and quoted Bruce Lansdale regarding "vision" from my 1987 diary. . . . Dimitri and I sat for an hour over tea afterwards, talking mostly about what he hopes will be the "Peter Bien Archive" at Princeton. Besides the Kazantzakis letters, 3 × 5 cards (which apparently won't be accepted unless they're digitalized), notebooks, etc., he wants all books sent me as presentation copies, all letters from Ritsos, Harkianakis, etc., all texts—e.g., Ο τελευταίος πειρασμός with my penciled notes as I was translating. He'll also see which of the books I collected might be needed by Princeton. He suggests that I drive there on a Sunday, stay over, attend the Monday lunch he always holds, remain for someone's presentation on Tuesday, and depart on Wednesday. He'll suggest dates. . . . Then to Περγάλι restaurant on West 20th Street for the usual very expensive supper with trustees. I enjoyed meeting the new trustee, Sophia, and her husband, who played tennis at Harvard, but just after Greg Tebbe. He remembered my coach, Jack Barnaby. Also another new trustee, Morgan, whose father was close to the Lansdales.

November 12, 2011

Full board. There was considerable discussion about the proposed elementary school, worry about raising the venture capital needed to fix the building, worry that in the present crisis not many parents would have enough money for private schooling. Pantelis spoke beautifully, saying that in Greece parents will work fifteen-hour days and go without food in order to educate their children in the best possible way. Tsakalis also spoke beautifully about the formation of character in the proposed school. And it passed. Phew!

November 23, 2011

Washington

Arrived at Leander's yesterday evening and watched the Republican debate on TV. Depressing. Sophia is doing much better in school, happily. Today I went to Washington, first to the Corcoran Gallery. I was intrigued by a sculpture by Mary Early, made of narrow pieces of wood glued together and coated with beeswax. I thought that I could do something like this at the farm. Found an image of it on the internet. Then to District Chop House for a long lunch with Dennis Carroll, whose parody of the Gospel of Matthew I read on the train yesterday. Much too long; no playing with the King James language. Repetitious; one-sided (anti-Christian). A shame, because the general idea is a good one. Today he seemed to agree with my criticisms and suggestions, and plans to rewrite.

November 24, 2011, Thanksgiving

Practiced Schubert's Trout and Goldberg no. 25. Nice walk around the lake. Turkey and trimmings. Skype with Alec, Monica, and the children. Alec and the Patana school have not been flooded, thankfully. The Buddhist center I visited is under two feet of water, Alec said; so is the university where we stopped for lunch. . . . Watched an amazing Woody Allen film after our feast and then, by accident, an hour-long Thanksgiving special on Lady Gaga, whom I assumed would be provocative and in bad taste but turned out to be just the opposite. Truly good voice, natural musician, excellent pianist, sensitive, helpful in the community, with warm memories of the Catholic girls' school she attended on 68th Street in Manhattan, and of her grandfather, etc. She can do all styles: jazz, pop, folk, country. Now she has established a foundation to help children and to set up her father as owner of a restaurant, his lifelong dream. She's an Italian-American New Yorker. One of only twenty accepted to NYU Theater School at age seventeen. She is now twenty-five and a superstar.

December 2, 2011

Washington

Arrived yesterday and had a leisurely supper with Leander in an Indian restaurant. Today, I drove in to the Kennedy Center with Deanna and watched the National Symphony's rehearsal from 10:00 a.m. until 12:30 p.m. with Eschenbach conducting. What a pleasure this was! Shostakovich's first symphony, written when he was 19 years old, shows off the orchestra in spectacular fashion and is beautiful. Then the violinist Midori played Britten's violin concerto, which of course showed off her as a brilliant soloist. Fun to see everyone including Midori in normal street clothes, looking very ordinary. Had a long talk afterwards with "Bill," the head usher, who had kept my valise safely during the rehearsal. He is a former teacher who now works at the Kennedy Center three days a week and thus hears all the concerts. . . . Metro to Dupont Circle. Then to the Embassy Circle Guest House on R Street, just in back of the Greek Embassy. Very nice, small, simple B&B. Then went to the nearby Phillips Collection to see their special show on Degas's ballet paintings and sculptures, which left me pretty much unimpressed. But it's always nice to see the marvelous Renoir and also many good Cézannes. . . . To the Greek Embassy at 6:00 p.m. People approached saying, "Do you remember me?" I didn't. But no matter; we talked about Georgetown, etc. Zoë Koumadou, my host, had lost the handouts I mailed to her. Luckily I had copies, so she had them reproduced just in time. I think that my lecture on Odysseas Elytis, who refused to become pessimistic, went well. One of its virtues was length, only 40 minutes. Afterwards two other people read some of Elytis's poetry in Greek and English, and a twenty-minute pretentious video illustrated a few of his sayings with boring images. The best part was the question period. I was asked where I learned my Greek and I answered (of course) "in bed." Talking to people on the line for μεζεδάκια, two amazing things happened: (1) A man told me that as a child he had known Δημήτριος Γιαννακός στη Νιγρίτα, (2) a woman, sent here by the Ministry to teach at Georgetown, turns out to have run a small business precisely in Κολοκοτρώνη 11. We were both amazed at the coincidence. I told her about our apartment and about ο Κύριος Μάνεσης upstairs who threw boiling water down on noise-makers during siesta time. . . . Zoë took me out for dinner afterwards and we found much to talk about. For example, two people she knows (they were at the lecture) specialize in Hippocrates and know Λυπουρ-λής. In Cos, Hippocrates's herb garden has been re-created. I thought of this for the Farm School and hope to learn more. She wants me to be on the advisory committee for a project she's fostering to spread awareness of Greek literary culture. And so forth . . .

December 4, 2011

Kazantzakis in a 1957 interview: 'Όταν δουλεύει κανείς πνευματικά δεν αρρωσταίνει, δεν γερνάει — αυτό είναι το μυστικό: να μην παρατήσσει κανείς τη δουλειά του, γιατί τότε αλίμονο. (Ταχυδρόμος, 2 Μαρτίου 1957.)

December 16, 2011

Long two-hour lunch with Ulli Rainer, Steve Scher's widow. Good to reminisce about Steve after so many years.

December 21, 2011

Finally received my "implant" tooth, solid gold. But it's a molar, way in the back, so cannot be seen or showed off. The process has taken a year and a half.

December 22, 2011

The Selected Letters of Nikos Kazantzakis arrived today, a very fat book, the result of twenty years of work (off and on). How nice that it's DONE!

December 24, 2011

South Salem, New York

At Daphne's for Christmas. I asked Christina what she's doing in her English class. "We read books," she answered. "Which books?" She couldn't remember a single one. "Macbeth," Daphne called across the room. "Oh, yes, Macbeth." Sad.

Mendelssohn's two string trios and cello sonata at the Hop, played expertly. Yet I found the trios strangely "empty." They seemed exercises in fancy technique (especially when played as fast as they were by this group) without much musical interest. As someone else said perceptively afterwards (Ruth Lappin), the pieces were “busy.” Only the scherzos were better, because they had some fun in them.

January 12, 2012

Hooray! Scott King is going to publish my translations of Harkianakis’s Παίδων και εφήβων. And the Kazantzakis Letters are published very handsomely by Princeton.

Lake George

Drove last night in bad weather, wind and snow, to the Queensbury Hotel in Glens Falls, old but rather nice. Today, beautiful weather, spent at a Cornell Cooperative Extension program for forest owners. Lovely to see Ed and Donna there. Donna rushed over and hugged. Also Steve Warne and Bob Manning and the coordinator of Protect. Good presentations especially on taxation (480A), keeping the property in the family, conservation easements. Of course everything, especially the easements, are complicated, but certainly possible. 480A doesn’t seem right for us. I took lots of notes that I’ll hope to share with the boys. . . . This was held in the Great Escape Lodge, filled with very good Adirondack-type furniture, and a large water-playground filled with children and adults. . . . Last night we had supper in the Montcalm, the first time in probably twenty years. They still have “fisherman’s bisque.”

From TLS review of Frederic Raphael’s talk on Josephus (TLS, Dec. 23 & 30, 2011, p. 19): “Josephus was the first Jew to offer an overview of the world’s history and evolution which was not Judaeocentric. In his wake, Yahweh would be deconstructed through the centuries, by a series of Jewish intellectuals, some religious, many not. A suite of competitive analyses generated schemes of redemption, in this world if not in the next. Visions of universal truth, culminating in Marxism, divinized History itself, which became a godless theodicy in which logic or ‘the dialectic’ held inexorable, impersonal sway. Dialectical materialism was only one of the ways of depersonalizing the God that had failed, and finding a governing principle less capricious, and more morally consequential, than Tyche. The desire for an overarching logic that applies to everything is often said to be the legacy of Greek ‘science’; But the appetite for universal rules, and the belief that they can be divined by human intelligence is an aspect of Judaism that Josephus and his epigoni never abandoned.” . . . À propos of this sort of discussion, I began today—on the Dartmouth Coach bus to Boston in a snowstorm, to see As You Like It at the A.R.T.—to read a book summarizing the evolution of Don Cupitt’s philosophy, which of course interests me exceedingly. . . . Scott King, who did my Ritsos book, has agreed to publish my translations of Stylianos’s Παίδων και εφήβων bilingually. And I received the entire Greek text via internet from Kastaniotis, so we won’t have to type the Greek and will avoid the terrible mess that arose from Scott’s typing of Ritsos’s Greek.

New York City

Came down this morning on Dartmouth Coach. Nice to be welcomed by name by various people at the Yale Club. Took my tan shoes to be repaired at the store in the Club building and was told that the shoemaker in West Lebanon did slipshod work, gluing new soles instead of stitching them. So now the repair was done expertly. . . . Then to Lincoln Center to see a rehearsal of Christopher Wheeldon’s new ballet “DGV: Danse à Grande Vitesse.” Nice to see a young vivacious woman, Clotilde Otranto, conducting. The music, by Michael Nyman, was minimalist but not as annoying as Philip Glass’s. The dancing—i.e., the choreography—was different, original, appropriate for the score. The dancers, as always, were splendid: Ashley Bouder, Maria Kowroski, Tyler Peck. They were in full costume. The stops were mainly for the music, not the dance, although at the end Wheeldon guided various couples in the execution he desired. . . . Yesterday a virus in my MacBook destroyed everything I’d done all afternoon, on the translation lecture I’m preparing for the Professors’ Colloquium in March. I have a backup in the office, which should be all right. . . . At 6:45 p.m. in the Rose Building on West 65th we attended a “Dancer Chat.” The dancer was Faye Arthurs, a perfect Balanchine type, leggy (her own description of herself), probably weighing 100 pounds at most, small-breasted, charming. She spoke intelligently about her career, and answered questions. I asked how ballets are learned. She said that older dancers teach but mostly now the new dancers study videos. The School has a huge collection of videos of the repertoire. Sometimes, however, an older choreography is lost. An example this season is the “revival” of “Seven Deadly Sins”; it isn’t a revival at all because Balanchine’s work is now lost and the ballet has been re-choreographed by someone else. She said that most of the company know about 75 ballets. As soon as they hear the music, they're ready to go. Amazing! We then went to the evening performance. "Ocean's Kingdom" with music by Paul McCartney (the famous Beatle) and choreography by Peter Martins, added up to nothing. Martins, alas, is always boring and unimaginative despite lots of razzmatazz. And the music, pleasant, again added up to nothing that one could want to hear again. A flop. But then we heard Ravel. What a difference! First "Tombeau de Couperin," by Balanchine: sedate, pure, serene. Then Jerome Robbins's "In G Major" (the Ravel piano concerto), with an exquisite pas de deux by Sterling Hyltin and Adrian Danchig-Waring. The whole ballet delicious.

New York City

Another very busy, stimulating day. First to the Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit on West 44th, beautifully done. There is so much about Old Testament times that is known by scholars but not by laymen like myself. Much of it was well displayed in this show. The whole story of the accidental discovery of the Scrolls, their cleaning and preservation and interpretation, was well told in a movie narrated by some of the principal experts involved. Fragments of the Scrolls were displayed, each with explanatory materials. This source of Scripture and, more generally, Israeli actuality, was made very clear via artifacts and placards and an audio guide. There was much made of the Ten Commandments. Do we follow them? "Thou shalt not murder!" Hardly. . . . Stopped in Barnes and Noble café for a coffee. Nice to see an African-American man reading a story to his wide-eyed son. Then to one of the best ballet programs. A marvelous "Firebird" to begin. The music is so moving in all senses, that of motion and of emotion. Then the Bizet/Balanchine "Steadfast Tin Soldier," which of course we've seen (as we have the "Firebird") frequently but it was totally fresh again, and beautifully danced by Megan Fairchild and Daniel Ulbricht. Then the Tchaikovsky "Pas de deux" that shows off the two dancers, especially the male this time: Gonzalo Garcia. Finally the Gershwin/Balanchine "Who Cares?" a festival of color and motion. Some paragraphs in the program notes may be appropriate for our Kendal all-Gershwin Webster recital in May. . . . Back to the Yale Club for a delicious lamb chop supper. Then walked to City Center's Pearl Theater on West 55th to see G. B. Shaw's The Philanderer in the intimacy of this small theater with the audience on three sides of the stage. Well acted, funny, and equally “socially relevant.” Interesting to see that the women’s movement was alive in 1893, thanks very much to Ibsen’s A Doll’s House. The play’s hero is an Ibsenite refusing to follow the usual norms of masculine behavior and hoping that his many female friends will be equally unwomanly. The scenery is dominated by a portrait of Ibsen. But at one point a character scoffs “Pshaw,” pointing at it and giving away GBS’s Ibsenite proclivities. Lots of fun. Intimate, stimulating theater. We walked back to the Yale Club in lovely New York weather. . . . Between the Dead Sea Scrolls and the ballet I forgot to note that we spent an hour or so at MoMA, showing Chrysanthi the Mexican mural exhibit, visiting the Leon and Debra Black room to see if he donated any of the paintings in it (he did not), and enjoying the Picassos especially.

NYC–Hanover

Chrysanthi suggested we spend the morning in the Metropolitan Museum. We arrived at opening, 9:30 a.m. No crowds. Went first to the refurbished American wing. I was especially interested in the Hudson River School, paintings of Adirondack subjects, also by Winslow Homer. Lovely silver, furniture, as well. Then to our old-time favorites: Rembrandts, Vermeers, El Grecos, and the Impressionists.

February 10, 2012

A lovely visit from Daniyal Mueenuddin and his Norwegian wife Cecilia. Yesterday he read selections to Dartmouth students who filled Sanborn library, after an hour of questions and answers in the Wren Room. All this was shared with a young poet named Yang. Daniyal was very relaxed and impressive. Then we all had dinner at the Canoe Club in Hanover. One of my former students is now teaching creative writing here; he remembered my course on Conrad, Joyce, and Beckett. Today we had a leisurely breakfast together with Kendal’s famous sweet rolls, then a tour of Kendal. Nice to meet Jim Armstrong in Whittier, where he’d been reading to the Alzheimer patients. At supper, with Pakistani delicacies supplied by Rehan, I took Cecilia over to meet Agnar. They started speaking Norwegian to each other, and Ag actually spoke more than I’ve ever heard him do—he’s so limited by Parkinson’s—but apparently not so limited when conversing with an enticing young Norwegian beauty like Cecilia. Daniyal spoke well to a full house afterwards about his own ancestry, father, mother, taking over the father's farm, fighting corruption, discovering so much to write about, such as seven generations of his family—in prose, whereas he'd been a very mediocre poet previously. He also read a short section of the autobiographical piece that will be in The New Yorker in April, and then answered questions about his work and also about the situation in Pakistan. An obvious success. We said sad goodbyes, since they'll be leaving at 6:00 a.m. tomorrow to go to Killington to ski, and we expressed hopes that they'll return. Yes, said Daniyal, on my next book tour. Let's hope. I felt so friendly and at ease with them both.

February 13, 2012

Saw Götterdämmerung for the first time in the Met's HD transmission at Hopkins Center. The music is wonderful but, as Mark Twain famously said, "Wagner would be better without the singing," by which he meant, I venture, that the plot and characters are repulsive. When I saw Das Rheingold last October my major conclusion was that Wagner was a proto-Nazi.

February 25, 2012

Lunch with Carrie Rosenblum, the Dartmouth grad whom I sent to the Farm School as an intern in 2010–11 and who did so very well in that role that she has now been hired to lead Greek Summer 2012. I wonder if Christina will go. Carrie told me, alas, that the teaching of English at the Farm School is very poor, the students are bored and uninterested. This was not a surprise, sadly. But she had very good experiences on the sports field and also when invited to students' homes. . . . Quite a day today. On the way to meet Carrie I heard the Dartmouth Symphony rehearsing Tchaikovsky's first piano concerto with a student pianist, a remarkable virtuoso, then rehearsing Milhaud's 4th symphony, which struck me as precociously modern and interesting; thus on the spot I bought tickets for tonight. We already have tickets for the matinee of Dartmouth Players in Hair Spray, a Broadway musical, all song and dance done vivaciously. Went with Mel and Evelyn Spiegel and then continued with them to have roast beef dinner at the new "boutique" hotel in Hanover—very good indeed. So: lunch out, theater, dinner out, symphony, all in one day. And tomorrow we have the Met HD's production of Verdi's opera Ernani. I also finished my revision of the translations of Harkianakis's Παίδων και εβήβων and vetted the computerized book with facing Greek and English pages.

March 8, 2012

Wilmington, Hotel du Pont

I'm here for a few days to work again with Vasiliki Tsigas-Fotinis and her team on getting Modern Greek language teaching accepted by ACTFL. Others who came were Nancy Biska, journalist, who acts as paymaster, Ari Michopoulos from Hellenic College, Eva Prionas from Stanford. We were the guests of Elpida Bairaktaris, who heads up MG teaching at the Odyssey Charter School here in Wilmington. How nice to be back in the magnificent Hotel du Pont! I telephoned Chrysanthi after checking in to my room, a beautifully furnished suite, and confessed, "I wouldn't mind living here." The group met for supper in the palatial dining room, where we sat for three hours at least. Then I detoured to the Hotel du Pont Theater, huge and jammed, to see most of the performance there of La Cage aux Folles, a Broadway musical in which most of the female parts are played by men and the subject is how normal homosexuality can be. A little like a Greek επιθεώρηση, disjointed, stressing song, dance, and a bit of sex. First half very mediocre, second half better. At first I thought the corps de ballet were women; they weren't.

March 9, 2012

We spent the day at the Odyssey Charter School, a truly remarkable place. Founded, and still managed, by Greeks, it features immersion in Modern Greek language and culture for all students, from kindergarten through 8th grade. Only about 5% of the students are "heritage"—i.e., Greek-Americans. We met the corps of teachers of MG. They do math classes in Greek as well as language classes. They're sent here by the Greek Ministry of Education, paid by the Ministry, given airfare by the Ministry, and pension accumulation. They stay three years and can be renewed for two more. Then . . . ?! No jobs at home, most likely. Guided by the ACTFL Standards, they developed very fine agendas for teaching at various levels. Our job all day long was to revise our own list of standards, especially now that ACTFL has changed all the rubrics. In this we were guided once again, as previously in Madison, by June Phillips, who was in charge of developing the standards for ACTFL in the first place. At 6:30 the school's founder took us out to a restaurant for supper, together with some of the administrators, all very dedicated people who kept stressing that the school's social goal is to create a true community of caring individuals.

March 10, 2012

More revision of our standards, working now in the hotel. Travel by taxi to Philadelphia International Airport together with June Phillips. We'll meet again in Philadelphia in November at the ACTFL convention, when we expect that our efforts will be rewarded with acceptance. . . . On e-mail yesterday was a letter from Niki Stavrou complaining that Dimitri Gounelas was part of the move to discredit her father. Thus she hesitates to approve his editorship of the Selected Letters, with publication by Aristotle University. She wondered if I'd be willing to mediate. If I convinced him to allow Niki to publish the book, perhaps she'd agree to authorize his editorship. I replied that I have training in mediation and will be happy to try. Μπελάς!

March 23, 2012

Phil Porter lent me his three-disk recording of the St. Matthew Passion plus his full score, and I listened to it last night, enraptured, especially with the choruses, more specifically the double choruses, usually in exquisite counterpoint. The genius of Bach is incomprehensible. But so is that of Beethoven, as made more evident in a documentary we saw a few nights ago: how he pulled away from Mozart and Haydn at first slowly and then precipitously. . . . When I talked about translating at the Professors' Colloquium a few weeks ago I mentioned the English word "sough" meaning the sound of wind passing through trees. I pronounced it "suf." Phil Porter said he'd heard it as "sow" rhyming with "cow." Later I found that one dictionary gave suf as preferred, sow as secondary, while another dictionary gave the reverse. Today I composed the following poem for Phil:

THE BALLAD OF BUFFWUFF

(for Phil Porter)

One source wants sough like stuff, another insists it sound like sow. [the female pig]
 If only I knew just precisely how
 I ought to say it when I tug my pluff, —or should I call this pluff somehow plough?

My despond is in a most-gruff sluff.
 (Yet must not every sluff be shouted slough?)
 O Phil, teach me, without rebuff, to disallow every skulking –ow; help me to off-slough each buffwuff that indubitably is a bowwow.

Supper with Robert and Penny Binswanger. He wanted to tell us that he has cancer of a rare kind: breast cancer. He has already had an operation to remove the tumor and is now awaiting the pathology report of adjoining areas to see if it spread. A difficult time.

Sunday, April 1, 2012

A splendid day in Boston with Pat and Phil Porter. Left Kendal at 7:30 a.m., listened to Ignat's marvelous playing of the Goldberg Variations on the drive. Arrived at the Fine Arts Museum precisely at 10:00 a.m. when it opens. It is huge now; I haven't been for several decades. We took quick looks at impressionists (not much) and Greek and Roman (lots), two El Grecos, then joined the 11:00 a.m. tour of the new American wing, all four floors of it, with an excellent young guide. Concentrated on Paul Revere, Copley, colonial furniture, Jackson Pollack, Bostonians' need to appear European. Just a smidgen, but all very interesting. Then a quick lunch in the cafeteria, and walked to Symphony Hall, a bit early, so Chrysanthi and I went across the street to the huge Mother Church of the Christian Scientists. Empty, but there were receptionists present to help orient visitors. I remarked that the architecture resembled that of Greek Orthodox churches and she said that the inspiration was Byzantine, especially St. Sophia in Istanbul. But unlike Orthodox churches, this one is without ornament; it's plain, almost Quakerly, except of course for the huge, very visible organ pipes. The organist is the son of Paul Ashley, one of our Kendal neighbors. . . . Back to Symphony Hall for the 2:00 p.m. introductory lecture on the St. Matthew Passion. We learned that Bach was the 3rd choice for the coveted position in Leipzig. No. 1 was Telemann, who refused, using the honor to have his salary increased where he already was. No. 2 also refused. The church documents state that they were reduced to employing "mediocrity"—namely, no. 3, J. S. Bach! The performance, from 3:00 to 6:00, was grand: a perfectly trained double chorus supplemented by two student choruses plus excellent soloists. The audience—full house—was rapt as was I, as I followed everything thanks to a piano score with English translation. Then we all had a simple supper and drove home listening to more Bach, Dinnerstein's latest CD.

April 4, 2012

Finished typing volume 20 of my journal, which brings me to the middle of 1994.

April 7, 2012

Lovely reunion with Ignat Solzhenitsyn, who came with his son Dmitri, now aged 10. Very pleasant, ebullient. Lots of fond memories. Asked about Leander, Alec, Daphne. We about his mother, who lives in Moscow and is concerned with the ongoing reputation of Alexander, who completed his massive history of the Russian Revolution in seven volumes. The family now lives in Cavendish, with Ignat keeping an apartment in New York and traveling frequently to Russia. He played Schubert and Prokofiev masterfully—miraculously—to a very appreciative audience. I introduced him by saying that his career is given fully in the program but I should add that he is a very good teacher and a wonderful conductor of master classes with a gift for diagnosis of precisely what's needed in a student's playing to effect improvement. Then:

"I'd like to say a brief word about Schubert, if I may. We've had the pleasure of hearing Schubert songs this season; tonight we'll hear the first of his two piano sonatas in A minor. And two weeks from tonight we'll hear Sally Pinkas playing the sonata in D major. With luck, perhaps I can convince our Classicopia duo pianists to do the extraordinary Fantasia in F-minor sometime next year, perhaps in memory of Beveridge Webster, who played it so often with his wife Franny.

"I always think of Schubert in this Kendal context, where middle age begins at 70, because poor Schubert died at age 31, from syphilis, which in those days was a death sentence. He contracted it in 1823 and survived for six years, dying in November 1828. In March 1824, aged 27, he was in despair, writing in a letter, "I find myself to be the most unhappy and wretched creature in the world. Imagine a man whose health will never be right again, . . . whose most brilliant hopes have perished . . ." What is amazing, however, is the productivity of those remaining six years. The sonata you'll hear in a moment is from 1823, the one Sally will play on April 21 is from 1825. And in his final year there are three more—marvelous ones—the last written the month before he died.

“So, in hearing Ignat Solzhenitsyn play the sonata in A minor, let us appreciate the extraordinary creativity of a man severely ill who died at 31 years of age. As the epitaph on his grave states: ‘The art of music has entombed here a rich treasure but even fairer hopes.’”

April 10, 2012

Pleasant dinner for the tenth anniversary of the Lewin grants. Nice to see Andy and his second son, who's now at Dartmouth. Sat next to one of the War/Peace Fellows. I hope to influence him to ask to visit the Center for Defense Information in 2013. . . . Then to the Hop for the Takács Quartet, which did the amazing Beethoven opus 131, which is so extraordinarily contrapuntal.

April 11, 2012

Met with Ji Hyae Lee '13, the student who has been so dedicated to re-instituting mediation at Dartmouth and has finally succeeded. Training begins this Sunday, with thirty students. She was very appreciative of my assistance, presenting me with a bouquet of beautiful flowers plus a huge kiss. I'll visit the session this Sunday. . . . And in the mail today came the very welcome announcement that Chrysanthi has won the 2012 Joseph D. Vaughan Award presented annually by the New Hampshire State Committee on Aging and ENGAGING to an individual in each county who has shown outstanding leadership or achievement as a volunteer on behalf of older citizens in New Hampshire. She'll be honored at a special ceremony in Concord on May 8th. All this happened owing to Kesaya Noda's nomination, aided by information supplied by me, and various interviews—e.g. with Willi Black, Shirley Montgomery, Evelyn Spiegel, Gail in the Senior Center. How nice!

April 15, 2012

Pleasant, busy weekend. Greek Easter. Friday to Newport church with Chrysanthi and Frederica Graham, student in my ILEAD class on Greek poetry and a fellow Quaker. We sang all traditional hymns: Η ζωή εν τάφω, Ἄξιον εἰστί. Beautiful, moving service expressing the sadness of Christ's suffering. Saturday listened enraptured to the Met Opera's HD film of La Traviata, so emotional, mostly owing to the music, quite aside from the pathos of the plot. Today, Sunday, a gathered Meeting with my committee, Adult Education, preceding and Fred Berthold's talk on "Why Christian Anti-Semitism" afterwards. I introduced him with pleasure. He is 90 and is going strong. His chief point was that the synoptic gospels are very different from what follows in John and especially in Acts and the Epistles, since in the synoptics there is no "theology" of Christ as son of God saving us from Adam's sin. The later doctrines were anathema to Jews, who thus were considered heathen or heretical by Christians. . . . Then to the mediation training arranged by Ji Hyae with teachers from Champlain College, about thirty students all very attentive as they were taught how to ask questions that are not judgmental. How nice that this effort is being revived so well! . . . Then to Rassias's for Easter lunch, lamb and trimmings following cracking eggs. Veronica there with David and all six children. They want to visit us in the Adirondacks this summer. . . . In typing this journal, I'm now in 1995. Recently finished the long account of our trip to Japan. I sent a copy to Kesaya and another to Alec, who has just returned from a trip to Japan with his family, retracing our steps: Tokyo, Kyoto, Hiroshima, but with Naoko and Yasuo Takahashi, not Daphne Tebbe.

April 28, 2012

Wonderful Webster performance tonight by the two Classicopia pianists, Dan Weiser and Philip Liston-Kraft. I had pestered Dan for a year to do Ravel's "La Valse" and we were treated to that amazing piece. In introducing them I said that, for me, the waltz was like a beautiful young girl who wished to dance in sunlight and did occasionally, but somehow was restrained in a dark cellar from which she sometimes emerged but then was forced back in, in which case we heard bits and pieces of this glorious waltz, distorted and disfigured. Dan added later that Ravel composed the piece after the first world war and it has been often interpreted as his statement about the end of the beauty represented by pre-war Vienna. In any case, the piece also presents the generic human condition whereby we do possess beautiful and beneficial emotions and capabilities, yet these are all too often constrained and distorted by outright evil or by our own laziness or indifference, so that at best only bits and pieces, distorted, are evident, until sometimes our full capacity for goodness is temporarily released.

April 29, 2012

After Meeting, Jack Shepherd and I went together to visit the second session of the renewed mediation training at Dartmouth. But when we talked there with the student leader, Ji Hyae Lee, we found her discouraged because the trainer had done no simulation exercises, alas. Some were promised for this afternoon's final session, that's all. Strange, because the trainer had brought six graduate students along supposedly to supervise multiple simulations. Jack, Ji, and I spoke about ways to remedy this next autumn. Perhaps we were amiss in not conferring at length with the trainer before the sessions began.

May 8, 2012

An important day for Chrysanthi. She won the Vaughan Award, thanks to nomination by Kesaya Noda. This is issued by the New Hampshire State Committee on Aging each year "in recognition of one's outstanding leadership and meritorious achievement on behalf of New Hampshire's older citizens." An award goes to one person in each of New Hampshire's ten counties. Chrysanthi received it for Grafton County. So today we traveled to Concord, together with Evelyn Spiegel and Suzanne Laaspere, for the ceremony. Helene Rassias showed up as well. The certificate is signed by Governor Lynch, who presented the award in person, and by Nicholas Toumbas, Commissioner of the State's Department of Health and Human Services, who congratulated Chrysanthi in Greek! All this happened in the governor's reception room of the State house. Lynch made a short, appropriate speech and then a lady read Kesaya's letter of nomination, the governor presented the award, official and unofficial photos were taken (one of which, with Chrysanthi looking very happy between the smiling governor and Toumbas, appeared on the first page, Section B, of the Manchester Union Leader on the next day). I append here the nomination letter:

VAUGHN AWARD NOMINATION
March 2012

Chrysanthi Bien has devoted herself to the service of elders in the Hanover area for so long that no one I spoke with could date the beginning of her involvement. Through an examination of town records, we've discovered that Chrysanthi joined the steering committee of the Hanover Senior Center in 1988—twenty-four years ago. She's continuously chaired the group for the past twenty-one years. Since 1986, she has also led the committee running the 55-Plus Art Show at the Howe Library.

When Chrysanthi first began, the Senior Center offered only a few informal activities. Today its schedule is rich with exercise and craft classes, lunches, health clinics, and social activities. Chrysanthi played a role in the overall growth of the center's offerings, but she has also directly involved herself in nurturing several programs. Once a month, various Upper Valley churches take turns sending members to make lunch for the center's seniors. Chrysanthi coordinates the program, making many phone calls to ensure that there are enough volunteers and that plans are in place. Over the years, she has helped maintain the continuity of craft offerings by leading activities herself. Each December, for example, she gets greens from the Noda family's Christmas tree farm for wreath making. As a painter, she also encourages the work of others, promoting senior center participation in Howe Library's art show and guiding the hours of labor necessary for the show's success. She has initiated and supported the development of connections between young people and seniors at the center and is instrumental in the advisory committee's volunteering monthly to prepare a meal for guests at the Upper Valley Hostel.

Chrysanthi will be stepping down from her position at the Senior Center this year. I join many others in believing that she is most worthy of receiving the Vaughn Award, not only in recognition of the many hours she has devoted to seniors this year, but because of her vision and her unbroken, long-term commitment.

Chrysanthi grew up in Greece, in a village where the lives of elders, families, and young children were interwoven within a single community. Her background has surely formed her values. Everyone who speaks of her mentions her efforts to connect the Center and its seniors with individuals and organizations in the wider community. She works hard to break down the barriers that tend to divide the generations in our culture, and, through her efforts, gives seniors the fullest respect and honor, as should always be their due.

On the same day, in the evening at the Hanover Town Meeting, Chrysanthi was cited for her various forms of long-term service and was awarded with a beautiful glass bowl crafted by Simon Pearce.

May 9, 2012

Arnie Alpert, who heads the AFSC office in Concord, notified me that a beautiful photo of Chrysanthi receiving the award from the governor was on the first page of Section B of the Manchester Union Leader. Most places in Hanover don't carry it (it's right wing) but I found a copy in the gas station. Now we have several copies to show off.

May 11, 2012

A lovely day at the farm. I started the White easily, also the tiller, and tilled the entire garden. Chrysanthi planted three tomatoes, covering them with Reemay against possible frost, and also some string beans and potatoes.

May 12, 2012

To Cambridge for an A.R.T. production dedicated to the life and songs of Woody Guthrie done by four multi-talented actors/singers. He was deliciously left-wing, which this audience seemed definitely to appreciate. I particularly liked the country music flavor, reminding me of Johnny Cash. Chrysanthi remembered singing Guthrie's "This Land Is Your Land" in Greece, with Greek words, of course, and said she'd like to learn it on the mandolin this summer.

May 19, 2012

Another treat: Handel Society doing the Brahms Requiem, which I followed with the full score. Beautiful. And it was preceded by Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," so moving as the Warsaw ghetto Jews began to sing the Shema Israel as they are led to the gas chamber. We marveled afterwards at how fortunate we are to be able to hear such totally professional performances 12 minutes from our apartment.

May 26, 2012, to Rachel Hadas

Dear Rachel,

I was so moved by your "Freelance" in the TLS about showering your husband in the Schervier Nursing Home—mostly because Chrysanthi and I (who are healthy, thankfully) live in a retirement community where, inevitably, we know too many couples with one member descending—or descended—into Parkinson's or Alzheimer's and the other member trying his or her best to cope. Fortunately, we have our own Health Center; thus the deprived person is still in the same building, and is well supported by angelic nurses, with the healthy member remaining in an apartment but visiting for meals, activities, and (who knows?) perhaps even showers. But to know these couples while both are hardy and then to see one decline so rapidly in mind and body is devastating. All the more reason, naturally, to marvel at our own good health. I turn 82 this Monday and am still comfortably riding my bicycle, gardening, teaching a bit, translating, publishing books. And Chrysanthi just received an award from the Governor of New Hampshire for her decades of volunteer service to the town's older residents, besides which she plays a mean game of ping pong!

Our best wishes to you.

Terpni

A pleasant birthday. Chrysanthi gave me a chocolate bar, a jar of chutney, and a painting of a large field with me in the middle on a tractor, mowing. Leander gave me a bottle of sherry. We had a full, pleasant supper at Basil and Wicks.

May 29, 2012

A technician from Direct TV upgraded us to HD, with a new dish, oval this time, not round, using satellites higher in the sky so we should be able to receive the local stations. But I couldn't find the remote for the new TV; thus he hooked us up with the old one again. Several hours later, of course, I found the remote and was able to get the new TV to work for the French Open tennis (Williams defeated in the first round). What a difference in reception! Trouble getting the DVD machine to work but I managed and we actually saw some "I Love Lucy." The same day the technician for the telephone company got my high-speed internet to work after fixing a defect in Wevertown that kept me from receiving a full signal.

May 30, 2012

Best news of all, and a huge surprise: the Riparius Post Office will continue as it is for two years and will also continue beyond that period, but with reduced hours of operation, although access to our P.O. boxes will continue at more hours than those of the actual office with a postmaster giving service. Hooray! I discontinued the box I had secured last summer in Wevertown.

June 8, 2012

Amazing! Everything is working. Another technician from Direct TV fixed the remote so that the picture appears now each time I press "On." And it's remarkably clear and crisp. I've been watching the French Open tennis matches, with pleasure. My computer now has a wireless modem and wireless mouse. The new laptop is much faster than the four-year-old one which, however, is still needed for printing. The tractor now works thanks to a new battery and also to my recall of Earl's advice that the positive cable must be secured very tightly, and cleaned beforehand with steel wool. I've done the entrance up to the cabin and have started Leander's field. And I finished the first chapter of Mathioudakis's dissertation. The Greek is easy for me, thankfully. I wish the quality were better. Let's hope he really begins to contribute something in subsequent chapters. So far, nothing much. . . . One first great load went to the dump. That's always a relief, a pleasant "evacuation." I read my own chapter on Kazantzakis's Odύσεια in volume 1 of Politics of the Spirit and liked it. (Preparation for dealing with Mathioudakis's thesis, even though it's on the epic's words rather than its ideas.)

June 9, 2012

George telephoned to announce tearfully that Efthymoula has died. Bad cancer. Luckily she went very quickly. I wrote him as follows: Έχουμε τόσες αναμνήσεις, με τη Χρυσάνθη, από ευχάριστα δείπνα και ενδιαφέρουσες συνομιλίες στο φιλόξενο σπίτι σας, καθώς και εκδρομές στην άνω πόλη ή ακόμα στην Τερπνή ! Η Ευθυμούλα πάντα ήταν η τέλεια οικοδέσποινα. Θα μας λείπει προφανώς όταν, κάποτε στο μέλλον, θα σε ξαναδούμε. Με αγάπη.

June 11, 2012

Everything is working finally: the tractor with a new battery, the Troy-Bilt, which started with the first pull after I squeezed the right-hand handlebar to establish an electrical connection. I've spent lots of afternoons in the garden, weeding, tilling, fertilizing. It's beginning to look civilized, and everything is growing nicely. Of course I've also done some mowing both with the White and the John Deere, plus the Troy-Bilt, but not as much as in previous years at this stage. Interestingly, there are no bugs: no black flies, no mosquitoes. A chipmunk seemed to be raising her family in the fireplace, but now we don't hear them any longer. Haven't seen Earl and we wonder apprehensively because he told us earlier that he'd been in hospital with severe symptoms. We telephone and there is no answer. Chrysanthi is cooking marvelous suppers night after night, very involved all of a sudden in this art, besides struggling as always with puzzles.

June 14, 2012

Long, nice visit to Donna and Ed, first by the pond, then in their cabin. They're building a real house near the pond. Ed expanded to me on the defects of Donna's daughter's good-for-nothing husband, who cannot hold a job or perhaps doesn't care to.

To Kendal

Left the farm on a beautiful morning, Chrysanthi wondering why I would leave this paradise in order to expose myself to the discomforts of a trip to Greece. But at least I now have business class for all flights, and also again in October. Of course we also recognized, as always, that Kendal, too, is totally "home."

Boston-Philadelphia-

Monday & Tuesday, June 18-19

Athens-Thessaloniki

Dartmouth Coach 7:00 a.m. to Logan Airport. Easy flight to Philadelphia. Then business class non-stop to Athens, arriving on Tuesday morning. My feast-fast-feast-fast routine, plus lots of (sort of) sleep on the flight has worked well. I felt wide awake all day Tuesday. Athens airport just like always, no sign of any "crisis" in Greece. Waiting for the Olympic Airlines flight to Thessaloniki, I encountered T. Jewett in a wheelchair, which she didn't really need, although she has a bad back. Olympic men took charge, treating her like a queen, and me, too. I couldn't even roll my valise; they did that. We were kept from going on the bus with everyone else to the plane. A large truck-like vehicle came for us. It had a way of lifting the wheelchair with T. in it, to its door. We entered to find a space with some seats and a way of securing the chair. At the plane, all this was elevated until on a level with the plane's entrance, and in we went. My valise was raised by this good man to the storage space above. A smiling hostess ministered to our every need. At Thessaloniki, the same tricks, in reverse, with similar solicitude until we were both inside our Farm School staff person's car. This was Sissy Bamba, who works at the desk in the library. I settled in to my room at Cincinnati Hall but soon went by taxi to the Καμάρα, where I had arranged to meet the woman to whom Georges Stassinakis gave the money for my October travel expenses. We repaired to a café to have a frappé. She handed me €1550, exactly what I had requested. Since I had only about €15 previously, the guard at the Farm School gate lent me €50 just in case. Earlier, in Athens, I tried to use my Greek visa card at an ATM machine, only to be told that the card was now invalid. Back to Cincinnati Hall. At 8:00 p.m. we all left in the Perrotis van, with Vangelis Vergos driving, for a nice tavern in Αρετσού, by the sea, and were regaled with Greek μεζεδάκια, finishing with ice cream. Here endeth the first day.

Wednesday, June 20, 2012

Up early. Went to the assembly, first enjoying a warm reunion with Tasos. He invited me to speak to the students and I did my usual thing: what trustees are, what we do, how we try to maintain the original ideal of combining the best in Greek and American cultures. These students are only those who will be graduating and who are now taking four days of exams. Also the two interns, one of whom is from Dartmouth, Maya, whom I did not recommend very warmly but who apparently has served well by helping with college counseling: eighteen students have been accepted by American universities, all with large financial aid. I of course had asked Tasos earlier to show me the new Vouli Prousalis classroom, which he did. There is an appropriate plaque, including a quote by Kazantzakis. He immediately arranged for someone to come with a camera, so after the assembly I posed with him, Κατερίνα Διάφα και Σωτήρης Παλαμάς next to the plaque. The photographer also photographed the room itself, so Chrysanthi can get some idea of it. What followed was the board's "information day," exhausting but very instructive. We started with the new educational dairy where the students learn to make cheese, yogurt, ice cream; we saw the laboratories and tasted sample cheeses. It's very high tech. Stratos Constantinidis emphasized to all of us that the Farm School's future lies in high-level scientific expertise. Then to the library to see a film produced by a student who received an award, followed by a nice video on Μέρα Μαΐου and then info about the eight students who'll be attending US universities, each of whom spoke to us briefly in English, well enough, followed by the dozen or so of younger students who will be spending a summer period in America, more going on this type of internship than ever before. Next came information on a new enterprise, the snail farm, near the winery. The snails reproduce on one half, eating sunflowers, it seems, and they "grow fat" on the other half. Then: escargot! Next came the new campus store, where I succumbed to the great temptation to bring home τραχανάς for Chrysanthi and παξιμάδι. We then congregated outside the new dining hall, where I was greeted unsuspectedly by a very attractive young lady who turned out, of course, to be Ελένη Γιαννακού. We exchanged telephone numbers after many smiles and good feelings. Next to the dining hall. After lunch we toured the old KEGE building, now remodeled for the pre-K, where Eleni is a volunteer, and for next year's kindergarten. We were enchanted by a dozen or so pre-K children who sang for us in both Greek and, very well, in English. They use computers already, plant, cultivate and harvest salad plants, as their introduction to "green" reality. It was a delicious moment for us trustees. Again to the library for a presentation on architectural plans for the future primary school—namely, a renovation and expansion of the old location of laboratories. Joann followed this with the financial realities of the primary school and opportunities to contribute in ways that would affix one's name to part of the project, for example on a classroom ($30,000). I mentioned to Joann that I would like to consider doing this and she kindly replied that the School really should have some place with my name and Chrysanthi's attached to it. Finally, at about 3:00 p.m., Panos presented his new vision for a Center for Entrepreneurship in Agriculture. I checked e-mail, took a short nap in my air-conditioned room. Supper was at Panos's. Dora Apostolidou came up and we talked at great length about Vouli, retirement (she's coming close), the Greek universities. I also met Panos's wife for the first time. She's important at Anatolia. I reminded her about Albana and also Nurjhan. A very long, full day.

Assembly again. Then an attempt to get wi-fi to work in Cincinnati (unsuccessful). Then Primary, Secondary, and Student Life Committee with Tasos and others giving inputs on the pre-K, the future kindergarten and primary school, additional opportunities for the secondary students (they can now have lessons even in Chinese), and details about various exchange programs. No action items or votes needed. It was fun to hear about the robot being built, to be trained to collect garbage. I suggested that he be baptized by full immersion, wearing a bathing suit. . . . In the afternoon, Higher Education Committee with John Cleave chairing pro tem (John Cruncilton just had a prostatectomy) and I acting as secretary pro tem. Nice to see Don Schofield beforehand and to catch up. He'll be publishing a book of poems shortly. I told him about my translation of Harkianakis. He'll retire in two years and will continue to live in Greece, perhaps on Ithaki. In the committee session, Vergos spoke on Adult Education, which is now increasingly important because of the urbanites who have lost their jobs and are returning to the land. Don then detailed his area: study abroad programs. Rotsios spoke about finances (they increased revenue without raising fees, and they decreased expenses, partly by reducing financial aid, alas, from 52% to 30%. Interestingly, most of the students enrolled from the AFS secondary program failed after a year and had to leave (mostly owing to deficiency in English). Finally, Φίλιππος Παπαδόπουλος elaborated on future hopes, including making Perrotis an "elite private college" (his words, not mine). But he also revealed that the Greek students, now 64% of the total compared to 38% three years ago, are the worst. They've failed the Panhellenic exam for university entrance and have lost their self-esteem. So they get special attention for a year and still, in most cases, need to leave. Κρίμα! Rotsios told me that they teach five courses a year and still manage some research. The total student enrollment is 127. . . . At 6:00 p.m., thanks to Eleni's initiative, I was greeted at Cincinnati by Μπρίνη, Τάκης and Ελένη. They live in Καλαμαριά, quite close. In the back seat were Odysseas, now 90 years old (George is 92) and walking with a cane, and his wife Eleni, who seemed in much better health than her husband. Talk talk talk about Alec, Monica, Theo, Elena, our time with them in the village during Easter vacation 2007, Takis's job (going well), his salary (reduced 50%), Brini's job (secure), her salary (reduced 40%). He said that contrary to what one might expect owing to Greece's crisis, his municipal projects are continuing, still funded by the EU and the town. Only a very few have been eliminated. Odysseas and Eleni, miraculously, are going to Eleni's village this Sunday, driven by Takis. Somehow they still manage. . . . Then another vivacious young lady joined us: Ανθούλα, η κόρη της Τούλας, about to graduate from a five-year course as an engineer, and not expecting to find a job. She'll help instead in Toula's Odeon, the way Odysseas used to help, in the office. But she also plays piano, violin, accordion. A pleasure to see these two younger women. Lots of good food: fish, shrimp. Takis drove me back at 10:30 p.m. because I still needed to type the minutes for both the Secondary and Higher Ed committees.

Friday, June 22, 2012

Assembly again. This time I offered to read from the Gospels, in English. I chose Luke 6 about the speck in your brother's eye and the log in yours. The student read the Greek with zero expression, just to get through it as fast as possible. I tried to read the English translation "theatrically." It's a marvelous passage. . . . Introducing myself at the full board meeting at 9:00 a.m. (everyone was asked to do this), I mentioned the passage but comforted the trustees by saying that of course it did not apply to them! The meeting went from 9:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m. Tedious. Wrangling over minutiae. I stressed the need for literature and the arts as well as science and technology, but I don't think Kanellis, a chemist, understood. He said I shouldn't worry because English is taught. What I was hoping the students would get was Greek poetry and prose. The acronym for his scientific emphasis is STEM (Science, Technology, Engineering, Mathematics). I said that I hoped the stem would have a flower. . . . Tried afterwards repeatedly to reach George by telephone, and finally succeeded. He seemed very disturbed, spoke of the terrible shock of Efthymoula's death. I suggested a rendezvous tonight but he didn't seem able to consider it or anything else. Maybe tomorrow, although I've arranged to meet Lena Arampatsidou and her husband at the Καμάρα at 1:00 p.m. for lunch.

Saturday, June 23, 2012

I finally reached George last night. He kept talking about το μεγάλο σοκ owing to Efthymoula's death. He wasn't free. I gave him my telephone but he never called back. Today I went to the Βυζαντινό Μουσείο and actually found a beautiful and appropriate icon on a postcard they sell, for a possible illustration on the cover of my Harkianakis book. It's called Παναγία Δεξιοκρατούσα because she has her right arm around the baby Christ, not the usual left arm (leaving the right arm free for crossing oneself). . . . Walked to the Καμάρα in the great heat, about 43 degrees Centigrade (= 110 degrees Fahrenheit). Lena Arampatsidou came with her husband, a nice young man who is a tax collector (!). She, it turns out, is going to assist Dimitris Gounelas in editing the Kazantzakis letters in Greek. So it was very good that we met because I was able to give her lots of needed information about the project. They took me to a very good restaurant just across the street, also very quiet with few customers (owing to the crisis). Her salary has been reduced 35%, his the same. But she says that the university is working well. She hopes I'll support her in going to Princeton for some study-time and in getting a Fulbright (she failed on her first try). I explained about Patroclus Stavrou vs. Stassinakis, etc., and the reconciliation that took place between Niki Stavrou and Stassinakis. We had a very long lunch, with lots of protein for me on my feast day. Then they drove me back and I gave them a tour of the Farm School. I promised a full party with champagne when the Greek letters are published. . . . My taxi driver this morning waxed philosophical about Greek rationality as we watched thousands of cars bumper to bumper at 11:30 a.m. trying to get to the beaches in Halkidiki: Οι Έλληνες εφεύρισκαν την ορθολόγισμα, αλλά έφυγε από την Ελλάδα. Τώρα έχουμε την συγκίνηση!

Sunday, June 24, 2012

Το Κομοτηνή

All day with Nikos Mathioudakis, a tall Cretan. He came to Cincinnati Hall at 9:30 a.m. I gave him a tour of the Farm School and we took off to Ξάνθη, where his professor and her husband were waiting for us for lunch. We traveled on the Εγνατία Οδός, which is remarkable, exactly like our interstate highways. This one goes from Ηγουμενίτσα all the way east to the Turkish boarder, through beautiful country: fields being irrigated with spraying fountains, forests, mountains, lakes, trees. Ξάνθη is beautiful, with a river running through the middle. The professor, Πηνελόπη Καμπάκη, is loud and brassy, but very friendly. Her husband, a professor of mathematics, went to school with Tasos Apostolidis, and he telephoned Dora while we were eating. He is also a poet with many published volumes, all of which he, of course, gave me. Penelope has two grown daughters who are professional singers. I heard their CD, truly beautiful. After the typical long lunch (on my fast day, so I concentrated on salads), Nikos took me to a fine hotel. Siesta. He came again at 7:30 and we walked through the city, including the section where Muslims live. There's a mosque, of course, and also stores with Turkish foods and supplies.

Nikos's big day. I practiced my talk, also typed a little journal. A friend got me at 10:30 a.m. The university is on a campus out of town. Some of it has been built, but not all. The building we entered was like a shed, but air conditioned and OK for power point. We five examiners sat on one side, guests on the other, including Nikos's parents, the father very typically Cretan. Nikos spoke for thirty minutes summarizing the thesis with the help of power point, followed by a short video showing Odysseas's trip down to the tip of Africa and onto an ice floe. The examiners asked questions and he replied. I kidded him about ελεύθερο μάνταμα, also on prohibiting me να γλιτώσω από τον Καζαντζάκη. Lots of hugs and kisses afterwards when he returned to hear our verdict of Άριστα. Then about 30 people feasting in town. Good food, and fortunately on my feast day. I was fortunate in sitting between the two young female linguists who had served with me on the jury and were easy conversationalists. And Nikos's father, in true Cretan style, gave us jigger after jigger of raki. Finally Nikos drove me, again on the amazing Εγνατία Οδός, to the Alexandroupolis airport. Overnight in the Sofitel after a quarter pounder at the Athens airport's McDonald's.

Riparius

Alec was mowing with the Troy-Bilt when the steel rod with the knives broke in two. But I was able to order a replacement part. Also the belt on the White kept slipping off the pulleys. We went to Steve, who fixes things like this, and he sent us to NAPA for a new belt, which seems to work. But he told me that Bud Roddick has retired and closed his shop. A great shame. . . . I'm typing the journal every day, now in volume 26, covering the summer of 1998. The farm never looked nicer, mostly because Alec and the two kids have done so much mowing and raking. And Monica is picking wild blueberries. We already have tomatoes on the plants. Tonight for supper we enjoyed the τραχανάς I brought back from the Farm School store. What a treat! Watching Wimbledon tennis, too. Tomorrow: semi-finals between Federer and Djoković.

July 10, 2012

It's starting. Close friends. Mary Rassias died today, peacefully. Heart failure. Who'll be next?

July 12, 2012

Ballet. Stunning "Firebird" with Ashley Bouder, one of my favorites.

Viewed "our" seat: Section 18, row C, #1:

July 13, 2012

Drove from the farm to Norwich to visit John Rassias, following Mary's death. He seemed fully in control but Athos was deeply, visibly affected. The problem was a blood clot that invaded Mary's heart, unexpectedly following her reasonably good recovery from her recent operation. Alec and family will go tomorrow and we'll send flowers from us and all three children.

July 15, 2012

Kinhaven

To Kinhaven with Alec and family for the School's sixtieth anniversary celebration. It was very nice to see old friends: Jerry Bidlack, of course, who conducted madrigals and also the Vivaldi "Gloria" with a combined Kinhaven and alumni chorus; Jim Quinn, still in DC and a subscriber to the National Symphony, and his daughter; Lelah Dushkin, living in Kansas but hoping to move to a retirement community in Massachusetts—her brother died, but Nadia is alive and well; Sandy Dennis, who now co-directs the Junior Session and continues to teach piano in NYC; Peter Schultz; Carolyn Wahl, whose horn and other brass students were very active in today's concert; Irene Mendelson, happy to be back on the Kinhaven board—she said she prefers the West Side to the East Side, jokingly, and I remembered many meetings on the West Side, more on the East Side, but some in Brooklyn; Elizabrth Gombosi, still on the board. I was sorry that John Austin didn't come, nor did Bill Polk. Alec was invited by Jerry to return to the Bidlacks' after the concert to see Nancy, which he did. She's totally incapacitated by Lou Gehrig's disease and, he says, is very angry. But, I remarked, she was very angry when she was healthy. It was wonderful to see Jerry actively conducting despite his own health problems. The concert was typical: a little Mozart and Schumann and Bruch, three Morley madrigals, but also lots of unknown composers played by a brass trio, or a snare drum quartet! The full orchestra, at the end, did a piece by Hindemith that I didn't much like, but it showed off various orchestral sections: brass, woodwinds, percussion, strings. All in all, as always, it is a joyous thing to see these talented students playing so well under the guidance of Kinhaven's fine staff. So after sixty years, the School is flourishing both artistically and even financially, with new faculty housing, new student cabins, the dining hall enlarged via a covered porch. Still, the barn needs a new roof and Main House needs just about everything. I was saddened to learn that the concert grand piano, which I secured for Kinhaven from Frances Mann, is now disliked by many (but not all). During the concert, I sat beneath one of the ceiling fans that I also donated to the School, relieved by its gentle breeze on this rather hot day.

July 17, 2012

The bar holding the knives on the Troy-Bilt snapped in two while Alec was mowing. But I was able to order a replacement that came today. I inserted it, and now the Troy-Bilt works better than ever, despite this mishap and despite drowning in the pond a few years ago. Alec was also able to get our chipper to work again. I'm hoping that Irv's tiller can be resurrected, too.

July 18, 2012

Today something really terrible happened. Diana Cox wrote to Bill Cook, c/o Jim Tatum, that despite being invited to Kendal and despite clearing all the required committees, now he cannot be admitted because beds are no longer available. Bill is heartbroken, Jim is furious, I feel betrayed by Kendal, not to mention that this really is also a breach of contract. And Diana now says that the case is closed; we will no longer consider Bill's entry. I suspect that Diana was "instructed" by Becky Smith, damn her. But I'm not sure. Diana in the past was always eager to have Bill, or so she seemed; thus the reversal is strange. Poor Bill believed he would finally find intelligent people to talk to and be stimulated by. No more. Alas! I'd worked on this for four or five years; it has come to nothing.

July 21, 2012

Finished mowing the south field. Και του χρόνου!

July 25, 2012

To the circus in Lake George, much better than the North Creek circus, which didn't come this year. Marvelous acrobats, all Chinese. Thankfully there was a net for them in case of misses, which happened. Scary. But the clowns were pathetic. They need the likes of a Benny Hill.

July 25, 2012

Drove Chrysanthi to Glens Falls Hospital for an ultrasound on her fore-leg that always seems numb. The doctor reported everything normal. . . . After supper we had a musical evening. Elena played violin with Leander accompanying (much better than I had accompanied her last week, of course). She scratches away more or less with no sign of musicality. She's better on the piano, playing a rag. Then Theo played his clarinet pieces again with Leander accompanying. He does show musicality. Lots. Then Nicholas on his alto saxophone with Leander playing marvelously despite having to transpose at sight from E-flat. Nicholas is now able to improvise after the "head" of the jazz piece is finished. He plays well, very well, but this music leaves me cold. Fortunately Leander, Alec and Deanna then did some Bach followed by a very fine Vivaldi, Alec sight-reading marvelously well. What a pleasure to hear this near-professional music in our log cabin! Finally Sophia surprised everyone by declaring that she would sing, provided that her parents retreated into the kitchen. She did, pumping out chords on the piano very badly. Afterwards she was willing to do the Star Spangled Banner with Leander on piano, better, but no oomph. . . . Alec and some of the children put a new coat of blue paint on the side and rear of the barn, which now looks very fresh, with its new blue roof as well.

July 29, 2012

Very nice 54th birthday party for Alec. I gave him a super penknife with screwdriver, scissors, bottle opener, etc., plus an industrial vacuum to replace the one that was destroyed by mice. Monica cooked chicken kabobs on the fire and her marvelous Indonesian noodles. Leander provided a special sort of beer. Theo built and lit the fire all by himself for the first time, successfully. Lots of fun afterwards opening presents, and then everyone climbed upstairs to watch the Olympics on our new first-class television.

August 2, 2012

An interesting evening with Tom Akstens and Susanne Murtha. Dinner at Basil and Wick's, always good. Catching up, mostly on their lives. They've bought a second home, in Rhode Island. Susanne says, "Don't tell anyone." They go on weekends, just for a change, so far. Tom's jobs continue at Sienna College and the New York State internet university, both of which exploit him increasingly. But he manages, somehow, always as an adjunct, alas. We then drove to the Seagle Colony in Schroom Lake and witnessed a sort of professional production of Don Giovanni, music provided by duo pianos. Not bad, but the Statue scene was emasculated without the orchestra and with a weak Commendatore. Octavio, the tenor, was the best voice; this made Octavio a little more believable. All the singers are young, beginning their careers; all have professional training. So, all in all, it was worth going.

August 3, 2012

Today, thankfully, we ended the difficult problem I've had each year opening and closing the water owing to Pinky's system of the long lever meant somehow to find a small lever and open or close the drain. No more. I called Wolfe's well drilling, and Gary, who remembered doing our well, sent his crew—Kyle Dunkley and another Gary Wolfe (his nephew). They replaced the tiny lever with a new device that opens and closes the drain automatically owing to fall in pressure or restoration of pressure. So, in the future I no longer will need to open the well cover and try to make Pinky's long lever somehow work. A great relief. All this happened owing to Chrysanthi's pestering, although I kept saying that I'd learn to use Pinky's lever better. She was right, of course. . . . Very lovely dinner tonight with Don Kurka and Maria, here for only three days. She's doing well, curating a show, teaching. He continues to paint "for himself" although he "accidentally" sold a painting. I'll send her the Kazantzakis letters when they're in Tennessee this autumn. She also would like my Ritsos book. All the children and grandchildren came over after dinner, plus Leander's friend Breck from Kinhaven, for a pleasant hour.

August 4, 2012

Breck, who used to work for the TomTom Company until he was laid off, gave me a needed lesson on my TomTom. Then we drove to Armstrong Road to meet Don and Maria again, who took us to meet a Greek-American surgeon and his artist wife who live in the house on Coulter Road that used to belong to Bob and Marian Morse, where we first met Don Kurka. Stratos Kantounis, born in America of parents from Ikaria, was very friendly and pleasant and wants to see us again. . . . I finished a book review of Tom Doulis's book on the Junta years, The Iron Storm, very difficult to write because he published it privately with no copyediting; it is filled with embarrassing typos. But I hope I did it justice.

August 6, 2012

Doulis, alas, wrote to say that I failed to do justice to his book because I emphasized the proof-reading defects in my second paragraph. I thought I had encouraged readers of the review to read the book. Not clear whether I should answer him or not.

August 7, 2012

Nikos Mathioudakis, whose viva I participated in at the University of Thrace, arrived here by bus from New York. We had long discussions about his projected involvement in publishing the Kazantzakis letters in Greek. But first, Niki Stavrou has assigned him the task of placing my so-called "Discarded Letters" on the internet. We also talked about his following my suggestion to see what Kimon Friar did, if anything, with the 5000+ neologisms in Kazantzakis's Οδύσσεια. For this he'll need a post-doc fellowship, ideally at Princeton. Lastly, we talked at length about the celebrations that Niki is planning in London on February 18, 2013. Nikos will be there, and I'll be the chief speaker, my subject still not determined although I thought perhaps something like "How does one stay interested in Kazantzakis for fifty years?" We went over a list of possible others to speak at this event. I gave him the usual tour of Terpni, and Alec and I took him down to see the marvels created by beavers. Then an Adirondack cook-out shared by him with all of us, a total of ten around the picnic table.

August 8, 2012

Jim Heffernan wants me to teach another ILEAD course winter term. I said No, but maybe spring term on Joyce's Ulysses. . . . Drove Nikos to catch his return bus in Glens Falls and then shopped in Lowe's for a new kind of mouse poison in solid blocks instead of pellets. Lunch in the Greek-American diner on Glen Street. Overheard the nice waitress telling the next table about dolmades, pronouncing the "d" like an English "d," and gave her a lesson how to pronounce it like the "th" in "this." She was a good student. . . . Chrysanthi and Theo re-did the cement on the front of the well and I rewrote "1950 ΤΕΡΗΝΗ." . . . I'm re-reading Paradise Lost with great pleasure. Just finished Book 9, the Fall.

August 10, 2012

Alec and family left and we both felt truly sad. Theo and Elena are now such clear, interesting personalities that we engaged with so easily and pleasantly for these past six weeks. And Monica continues to be so helpful and cooperative. I collaborated in many projects with Alec, as always. They hope to come for Christmas 2013, but of course next summer first.

August 13, 2012

Dan Seeger arrived and we immediately began endless talking about so many things we shared in previous years. Then, after supper, we tried some of our old four-hand duets: Percy Granger, Schumann, Schubert's March, even the first movement of Beethoven's Fifth. Both of us were surprised and pleased at how familiar all this still was. Also Debussy.

August 14, 2012

Showed Dan Alec's house and our forest, including the lovely hemlock stand. He needed to work on his computer, the daily torrent of e-mails, etc. He told me that Pennswood Village, his CCRC, is only 80+ occupied. Several other CCRCs in the Philadelphia area have failed. Very worrisome. We plan to meet for supper in Philadelphia on November 15, with Leander coming up from Maryland for the occasion. Played more four-hand duets in the afternoon and again after supper: our old repertory—Brahms' waltzes, Husa, Dello Joio, Satie, and of course Mozart's 40th. We were both pleased, indeed amazed, at our ability still to play these things, although the Samuel Barber was beyond us, except for his slow waltz.

August 15, 2012

Before leaving, Dan showed Chrysanthi his i-pad and i-phone and Kindle. Very tempting. . . . Working on my Paradise Lost lecture for August 30. Entirely new; nothing recycled from previous lectures.

August 17, 2012

Reading at breakfast an article by E. O. Wilson in the Harvard Magazine (May-June 2012), I came across the following which seems to be written precisely for us here at the farm: "Studies have shown that given freedom to choose the setting of their homes or offices, people across cultures gravitate toward an environment that combines three features. . . . They want to be on a height looking down, they prefer open savanna-like terrain with scattered trees and closes, and they want to be close to a body of water, such as a river, lake, or ocean. Even if all these elements are purely aesthetic and not functional, home buyers will pay any affordable price to have such a view. People . . . gravitate toward savanna forest (parkland) and transitional forest, looking out safely over a distance toward reliable sources of food and water. . . . All mobile animal species are guided by instincts that lead them to habitats in which they have a maximum chance for survival and reproduction. It should come as no surprise that during the relatively short span since the beginning of the Neolithic, humanity still feels a residue of that ancient need."

August 18, 2012

A new Pendle Hill pamphlet by William Shetter called "Some Thoughts on Becoming Eighty-Five" reminded me of Elizabeth Gray Vining's "On Being Seventy." I especially like his "Truly, there are few things more disheartening than an old sourpuss." . . . Lovely visit for lunch by Tom and Joan Wilson returning from lake Pleasant. Joan brought her marvelous chocolate chip cookies and Chrysanthi served spanakopita. They're off to the South Pacific in November to see the full eclipse of the sun. Chrysanthi seems willing to go to California next spring, but by rail only, which the Wilsons say is a splendid adventure. . . . I finished my Paradise Lost lecture. Must time it tomorrow.

August 24, 2012

Received the following cri de coeur from Constance Tagopoulos. I had written her about a lovely poem of hers called “Apollo” that she had recited with me, Keeley, and Fagles at the Onassis Center in 2001 or 2000.

Dear Peter,

What a beautiful message and memories! Thank you, it soothes my heart, especially on such a brutal day like today, when IRS rather than sending me some tax money back, asked me to pay them 3,000 euros! This is a new tax they just invented by canceling all kinds of tax exemptions, even medical! Greek citizens are up in arms, they all have to pay money back. Mine is exorbitant especially after they reduced my modest income by 45%. To make sure we pay, they entered the amount we owe on the DEH [Δημόσια Επιχείρηση Ηλεκτρισμού] bill and if we delay they will disconnect our electricity supply! Democracy at gunpoint!

Thank you, my friend! Your words, soothing like poetry, brought life back in me at this brutal moment. I miss poetry as I miss my friends; it is poetry that keeps that spark alive in our memory, like Odysseus when he buries himself under the branches and falls asleep, symbolically dies. Homer, poetry, will rekindle the spark with words, love for life, the sun, the sea, Ithaca . . . no matter how many times he buries that spark . . . he will be born again and again. . . . There is no poetry in this country to keep the spark alive any more, no tenderness, admiration, generosity, even the sun is hostile. . . . Our language has dried up, is all codes, slogans. . . . I tried to write a few times, cruel voices came out, or too cerebral. On the other hand there is this persistent cry: This is real life! Now, at the end of your life you are at last in contact with reality, suffering, danger, responsibility! Nobody helps—everybody pretends, now you are a complete person! —Nobody loves? —They envy, and betray you, unless you rise way above them, then they slavishly worship you! —No, thanks! I want to write poems crying all the time! Like then! —Oh, God, what a bore! I had friends then who knew the heart and emotion. They vanquished time and distance because they understood poetry—life.

Drove to AMTRAK Rensselaer station. Easy ride to NYC, reading Dennis Carroll's diatribe against the Koran, in which he actually quotes me on why I felt I couldn't read any more of that very strange document. We were able to walk to Jeff Murphy's office this year because they're now in the McGraw-Hill Building—four floors!—on 6th Avenue and 48th. Nice to see old friends, the “regulars” at my lectures. Apparently this is my tenth year doing this. But the total number of attendees seems to be decreasing. Jeff said he couldn't get beyond Book 1 of Paradise Lost because of all the annotations. One of the others said he read all 12 books with pleasure in three days, by ignoring the annotations. Good! Questions afterwards from Jeff's uncle (who, I was told, shows the beginnings of Alzheimer's) and a few others. But afterward, while we were all drinking wine, about ten of them gathered round me discussing my emphasis on monism and my pleasure in the “defeat” by Milton of the dualist position. Some contended that we do indeed have souls that are immaterial, citing Mozart, Beethoven, Milton. I of course granted the miracle of genius but hoped that even this has a monistic—i.e., materialist—explanation. Then downstairs in the same building to a superior restaurant. Lots of good conversation and good food. Home to the Yale Club at 11:30 p.m. to watch a bit of Mitt Romney's disgusting speech accepting the Republican nomination.

Luckily, I discovered by accident on the internet the existence of a Tenement Museum on Delancey Street and secured tickets for a tour they offer of a tenement building on Orchard Street. So about twelve of us were guided through by an excellent docent. We actually fully occupied the three hundred square feet of an apartment—kitchen, tiny bedroom, salon. No electric, no toilet, no heat, no water at first although municipal laws eventually forced landlords to add these improvements. Each tenement had twenty such apartments, each housing an entire family, sometimes four or five children plus parents plus a grandparent. Horrible! We heard about a family whose husband deserted them when he lost his job; he went out west and was never heard from again. The wife and mother had to cope, which she did by sewing in the apartment—barely. Some help was given by FDR when he was governor of New York, but not enough, obviously. The back of the building, where we were taken to see the privies serving these twenty families faced Allen Street, where my father's family first lived after they emigrated in, I think, 1905. Allen Street is now wide, with a park-like median. But the docent told me that this was added by Mayor La Guardia because Allen Street was "famous" for drugs and brothels, and he wanted to clean it up. Also, the 2nd Avenue El ran just outside the apartment windows. I wish I knew how long the Bien household remained in this horror, but who can we ask any longer? I wanted to have lunch afterward in a real Jewish delicatessen and was told to go to Katz's on Houston Street. So we walked the necessary five or six blocks in the 95 degree heat, only to find a line around the corner waiting to enter. No luck. . . . Home on ΑΜΤΡΑΚ and a nice dinner in our old haunt on Route 9, the Montcalm, where their specialty, seafood bisque with sherry, is still very tasty.

I've not written anything here about the Bill Cook saga, which has now ended, alas, so badly. A stroke many years ago left him paralyzed, speechless, mentally impaired. He recovered somewhat but is still paralyzed on one side, able now to talk but perhaps has Alzheimer's. Sad. I recommended that he be placed in Hanover Terrace and that happened. I visited him frequently there, bringing κουραμπιέδες. Horrible place, filled with zombies, no one for him to talk to, and not very good therapy. Jim Tatum, who looks after Bill's affairs, moved him to Genesee, which is better but still provides no one, really, to talk to, none of the intellectual stimulation we get here at Kendal. So, starting several years ago, I suggested that he move to Kendal. But Kendal, at that point, could not admit him because he would need to go into Skilled Nursing, into which we were not permitted by law to admit anyone from outside; he was too incapacitated to go into Assisted Living, where we could admit people from outside. This was confirmed by one nurse who went and examined him. However, Diana Cox, head nurse, told me that they were trying to change the law in a way that would allow admission into Skilled Nursing. This process dragged on for two or three years. I kept Jim and Bill informed. Finally it happened. Then the problem was "census"—how many skilled rooms were empty. So Bill was kept waiting at least another six months or so. Finally, last spring, Diana invited him to apply; census was low. He visited, was delighted, went through the usual process of financial discussion with Brent, and was ready to move. Then, suddenly, last August, Diana wrote to say that he could not come, the census didn't allow it. He was furious, as was Jim. Diana offered to visit in person to explain. They responded that they didn't want to see her. Their deposit was returned. I asked Diana if he could be invited again when the census permitted. She said No. Thus it ended, with Jim and Bill very angry. The other day, Diana asked to see me, together with David Urso, to explain. Tight-lipped, she said, "I am fully responsible," denying that Becky Smith had influenced her. When I said that in effect she had broken a contract with Bill and could be sued, she agreed. She was motivated, she said, by fear of having to send a resident to a nursing home if our Health Center was full, and then being accused of giving a room to a non-resident. We couldn't go further. The case was closed. No chance of Bill coming later (not that he would want to, now). So, all these efforts and hopes over several years ended negatively, despicably, in the worst action ever taken by Kendal to my knowledge.

NYC

Dartmouth Coach to the Yale Club to meet Constance Tagopoulos for supper and ballet. In the afternoon, Chrysanthi and I went to MoMA and saw an interesting special exhibit about artifacts made for children, especially after World War II, for example a toy wheelbarrow, the sort of thing I could have made at the farm but didn't. I did, of course, construct a large doll's house for Daphne, with living room, kitchen, bedrooms, and a roof covered with genuine asphalt shingles. I don't remember her spending much time with it, however. Maybe a wheelbarrow would have been better. Then the wonderful 4th floor, where both Chrysanthi and I especially liked a Cézanne landscape with stones and pine trees, but only half realistic. . . . Constance appeared at 5:00 p.m. together with a friend and colleague from Queens College, Nicholas Alexiou. We discussed the problem of getting copies of the Letters to Athens for my autographic session at the Estia bookshop. Nikos says that the Greek Tourist Service will send some copies, gratis, so I left one with him via Constance (who'll carry one in her valise) and will post others on Friday. Let's hope. He said that the whole situation at CUNY is bad owing to budget cuts. But they still receive their salaries every month, unlike what happens in Greece. Constance is of course utterly pessimistic (but she has always been that way about Greece, even before the crisis). At dinner we talked about the "round table" scheduled for October 15th. Stamatis Philippides is contentious, threatening not to come. He wants to recommend a complete Ἀπαντα for Kazantzakis, like the one done for Palamas. Ev τάξει, but who will do it, and where's the money? (Niki, of course.) Then to the ballet. Delicious. Three Stravinsky/Balanchine early masterpieces: "Apollo," "Orpheus," "Agon." "Apollo" was danced by Chase Finlay, a blond beauty who looks like a god. The music is of course marvelous, as was the entire realization, making one ever more certain that of all ballets this is Number 1. "Orpheus" less so. Interesting, and moving, of course, but lacking the utter magic of "Apollo." But "Agon" is surely a masterpiece, culminating in the splendid pas de deux danced by Wendy Whelan and Amar Ramasar, who received loud shouts of Bravo from the crowd. As always, a splendid evening: emotional and intellectual.

NYC

Beautiful day again. Clear blue skies, 70 degrees. Leisurely breakfast of eggs benedict. We returned to MoMA and, as Chrysanthi said, we "exhausted it." This time we "did" the 3rd floor, which is all abstract expressionism, Dada, and the like. But also the lovely sculpture garden, and an enclave with Turkish carpets. Very satisfying. Then a shared BLT, a long bus-ride home, a Chinese dinner, and a look at the new Black Family Arts building, where Leon lists as donors not only himself and Debra but their four children.

September 21, 2012

Sent two copies of the Letters to Nikos Alexiou, hoping that his scheme of getting them to Greece will work. . . . Yesterday, in the bus, I finished typing volume 30 of my journal (2002–2003); today I printed it and started volume 31 (2003–2004), which begins on typed page 2204. . . . Read Dennis Carroll's parody of the Gospel of Matthew, some of which (not all) is quite clever and bitingly anti-religious. Sent him my critique. . . . Received the first review so far of the Selected Letters, by David Holton in the Anglo-Hellenic Review. Very fair and complimentary. . . . I've been reading E. A. Milne's Modern Cosmology and the Christian Idea of God, attracted by the title. Actually it's 99% cosmology and 1% theology. And I don't understand 99% of it. But I did find today a few sentences that are totally comprehensible and well worth quoting: "At the epoch of creation we can make no proposition as to what the state of affairs was. God, in the divine act of creation, is covered with a mantle of invisibility; we cannot even in imagination assist at the birth of the universe” (p. 96). “We cannot, at present, say exactly what we mean by quoting a figure for the age of the universe. . . . / Estimates of the age of minerals in the earth’s crust, for example give their age as from three to five thousand million years, whereas the direct interpretation of the red-shift in nebula spectra gives only some two thousand million years. . . . What is significant is that a ‘time-constant’ of the order of a few thousand million years seems to be thrown up by the study of the universe, and that the only reasonable interpretation of this is that it measures the age of the universe for us here now, reckoned from the transcendental event which was creation” (pp. 96–97).

Cambridge

To the A.R.T. for a spirited performance of a new play by David Adjmi called Marie Antoinette, a very free treatment of her personality and career with Brooke Bloom giving a bravura performance in the leading role. At the end, one is perplexed whether to despise Marie for her snobbery, excesses, decadence, or to commiserate with her owing to her sad end, captured by the revolutionaries, tried, convicted of “treason,” and executed. The play had minor connections with contemporary events—e.g., the Occupy Wall Street movement. But it really did not make one feel the revolutionaries’ cause. We got famous statements, for example Marie’s remark when told that the peasants were starving and had no bread to eat: “Let them eat brioche,” she cruelly commented. The production skillfully combined period costumes and décor with a totally contemporary mode of speech. Well done!

Had lunch with Carrie Rosenblum, whom I sent as an intern to the Farm School several years ago. She was a great success there and returned last summer to direct the School’s “Greek Summer” program. Now she’s got a two-year job with Dartmouth Admissions, just what Mats Lemberger did many years ago. At lunch, she warned me that she would convey bad news from the School. She proceeded to say that everyone—staff and students—dislikes Panos Kanellis, viewing him as autocratic, cold, not interested in them, hard to feel close to. What a surprise! The trustees all seem to feel that he is a great success. Also, Tasos Apostolidis, who begged me not to vote for Kanellis, is apparently working very well with him. One never knows, and trustees seem always to be the last ones to know. Carrie related that people at the School are instructed that they are not allowed to speak to trustees. So they all kept begging her to “speak to Peter Bien,” and that is what she is doing. Sad. About the new food service: the food is terrible. Panos chose friends (of course). I told him to try Sodexo, and he said No. People fear that Panos wants gradually to make AFS like Anatolia, eliminating the cows, etc. and emphasizing academic scholarship, perhaps stopping to enroll boarding students from the villages. Of course we already hear from Constantinidis and others that Perrotis should become a center of biological research and innovation. Carrie told me that Perrotis students complain that the teaching is extremely poor. Well, I don’t know what to make of all this, except to keep vigilant in case these directions begin to become more apparent in the board. She kept invoking the name of Bruce Lansdale—in other words, belief in the School’s original objectives.

October 4, 2012

Heard a talk by Zainab Salbi, coming away with the conviction that I had just witnessed a saint, or genius, or both. I was reminded of Mairead Corrigan, the woman we heard in Selly Oak who co-led the struggle for reconciliation in Northern Ireland and received the Nobel Peace Prize. Salbi, after escaping from Iraq via an arranged marriage to an American Muslim, has spent her life working for women’s rights and equality worldwide. She spoke movingly of women exchanged for cows in Sudan, and wisely declared that one needs utter curiosity even concerning the heart of darkness—only then can there be a bridge for peace. Also what the Dalai Lama told her: If you don’t respect those you serve, then do not serve.

October 5, 2012

I was invited by the Dickey Center to share breakfast with Zainab and a small group of students and faculty. Wonderful to see her more intimately. I brought her my translation of Ritsos’s “Peace,” which, as I told her, seems almost to have been written by her. She smiled beautifully. Responding to questions, she described how the money poured largely by us into Iraq served chiefly to create corruption because there was, and is, no civil society in Iraq ready to use it, no NGOs. Thus it went to incompetents and to corrupt officials. In response to my question about the role of Islam in discriminating against women, she said that Islam is going through its dark age and perhaps just beginning to emerge. It is wonderfully beautiful (e.g. as described to her by her mother when she—Zainab—was a child) but also terribly corrupt and horrible. And of course she noted that all three of the Abrahamic religions, Christianity, Judaism, and Islam, are paternalistic.

Riparius

I've longed to return to the farm and I found an excuse: to get books on Ulysses, which I'll be teaching for ILEAD in the spring. So we left today early and spent a delicious five hours on the farm, walking a bit to see the fall color and planting garlic cloves in the garden, mulching them against winter cold and expecting to harvest them next summer. Then our usual spaghetti (Chrysanthi) and veal (Peter) dinner at Three Tomatoes, Rutland.

October 10, 2012

Discovered in the Greek newspapers today that a general strike is being considered for October 18, the day I'm meant to board a plane at 6:30 a.m. Will the airport be closed?

Saturday, October 13, 2012

US Airways flight two hours late to Frankfurt. I had only an hour and a quarter to catch the Lufthansa flight in another terminal + security + passport stamping, but I did make it. Trouble with a steward who said my valise was too heavy (owing to two copies of the Selected Letters), but I managed to lift it. Settled in the Achilleas Hotel on Lekka, very familiar, of course. Someone told me that Lekka is now the center of Athens' drug traffic and the like; it does look rather "potted" at night. Bought Christos and Eri some beautiful dried figs and went to Πλατεία Βικτωρίας. What a nice, deep friendship. We both remarked, simultaneously, that each time we visit together it's as though no time had intervened. We simply resume the previous conversation that lapsed perhaps five or more years ago. This time Christos had a guest, Πώργος Μιχαηλίδης, who, he says, is Greece's most important contemporary novelist. Michaelidis of course gave me a book to take home. And Christos gave me a study he completed on Ritsos's "Orpheus," which I had written about many decades ago, and Eri gave me something of hers. Aspasia-Maria, now an assistant director at the Εθνικό Θέατρο (!), was still at work there, so I didn't see her. She is 24 years old. Christos has some difficulty walking, and uses a cane, but is able to circulate. He wants to dedicate an issue of Θέματα Λογοτεχνίας to me. The first thing he needs is my full CV, which I will send when I return home. While I was there, Meg telephoned from England (they have good relations now). She said an extraordinary event had just happened—an epiphany. Years ago one night when she was preparing supper and Michael was fixing a bird feeder, he went to the next room to hang it outside a window and simply died suddenly. Since then, Meg said, no birds ever used the feeder until this very day, when she was amazed to see a crowd of goldfinches there. She also said that she's been awarded a visiting term at the University of Edinburgh and thus will be teaching again. I told her about the planned events on February 18 in London, and my hope that she can come. Over dinner, Christos filled in the latest about Dimitris, who is still in the halfway house near the university, and Pavlos, who is in a house in Blackpool with excellent wardens. He brought out a painting of this 45-year-old handsome, masculine man who is so severely handicapped with autism. Christos and Eri insisted that I take a taxi to the hotel rather than the Metro because I would be carrying my black attaché case, a great temptation apparently for robbers. Things have changed.

Sunday, October 14, 2012

Iacovos Tsalicoglou came to the hotel at 10:00 a.m., bought a copy of the Selected Letters (€63) and sat for two hours talking a lot about his life. The private university here in Athens where he used to teach economics simply went out of business and he was never able to find another job, not even with College Year in Athens. So he became an “independent scholar.” He has produced a short book on scholarly techniques and problems, in English. And he queried me on publication possibilities. Without encouraging him, I said that I could approach Princeton University Press on his behalf and also UPNE. He should consider electronic publishing and also a vanity press. He'll send me a copy. It's lovely that this old Dartmouth friendship continues. Then at 12:00 noon another Dartmouth friend, Don Nielsen, arrived with his wife Lia. I had brought them some lip balm and hydrogen peroxide that they had requested. We walked through Plaka, first past restaurants mobbed with tourists, eventually to a quiet, almost deserted one under the Acropolis. Long, very warm talk with Lia about her new job, teaching English to gymnasium students in a φροντιστήριο, which is far superior to her old one. And she actually gets paid—not much, but at least regularly. She lamented that none of the teachers she had for English literature demonstrated any real love or passion for their profession. Don is walking now without pain owing to two artificial hips. And he can put on his socks and tie his shoelaces. He remembered with great gratitude the machine I brought for him from America to do this; happily it is no longer needed. As always, he has a spectacular scheme, perhaps not just one but two, both of which can help the Farm School, he declares, and not cost the School any money! In addition, he knows of a better design of hothouses, totally “green.” He’ll give me documentation on both of these, so I can say something at the AFS trustees’ meeting next week. . . . At 6:00 p.m. I arrived at the Ξενοδοχείο Αθηναϊς near Mavili Square. The whole gang was there: Constance, Stassinakis, Gounelas, Stamatis, plus six others on the local board of the Friends of Kazantzakis. Constance guided me in plans for tomorrow’s presentation. Stassinakis talked a blue streak, as usual. I had nice reunions with various people I’d been with on previous visits, and we finished, as always, with a dinner in the hotel, at Stassinakis’s expense. Back to Lekka by taxi, with Constance. I walk around Athens now only with a plastic sack, not my attaché case, fearing that the case will be tempting to someone to steal.

Stassinakis came early with a driver and we went to the Βιβλιοπωλείο της Εστίας, Σόλωνος 60. The manager, very κεφάτος and friendly, gave us a table, offered coffee. Downstairs I noted that they don’t stock my Πολιτική του πνεύματος in the Literary Criticism section, although they said that they had done so in the past and needed to order more copies. Very few original works of Kazantzakis’s either. Oh well . . . Θανάσης Παπαθανασόπουλος came at 11:00, the first visitor. He kept emphasizing that he failed to be inducted into the Academy by one vote. Fond memories of our visit to his apartment probably in 1995. Others came, too, including Don Nielsen, and the inevitable privately published poets who autographed copies of their latest to give to me. But, amazingly, I sold every book we had brought, seven in all. I kept one so I’d have something to show in Iraklio. One man bought two copies, gave me €150 and refused change. He identified himself as a surgeon, so presumably doesn’t need change. Νίκη Σταύρου spent two hours with us, bringing two members of the team that runs Εκδόσεις Καζαντζάκη. At one point she asked me if I'd do a fresh translation of Zorba. "It's under copyright," I reminded her. She knows all that, naturally. She says that she gets along well with the manager of Simon and Schuster in New York and thinks that he'll agree to have the novel re-translated. I said I'd be interested. Πώς λοιπόν να γλιτώσω απ' τον Καζαντζάκη; She wondered also about a new translation of Ο Καπετάν Μιχάλης and I said I wasn't at all interested in doing that. But to create a really good, accurate English version of Zorba would be nice. And I might even convince S & S to give me some of the royalties. . . . My pocket full of the cash from all these sales, I went to lunch with Dimitri Gounelas in the restaurant on Βουλής that Christos once took me to. Very few customers, which seems now to be the rule in the Greek crisis. Dimitri asked about the sort of contract he should expect. I said I'll send him my Princeton contracts as models. . . . Some delicious rest. Then by taxi to the Γεννάδειος Βιβλιοθήκη with an Albanian driver who had no idea where it was. But I remembered enough from my last lecture there: above Ευαγγελισμός in Kolonaki. Good audience including Christos, Don, Iacovos, Κυριακή Πετράκου, Diana Haas, who works on the Cavafy archive and whom I remembered from my talk at NYU on Η ζωή εν τάφω, plus of course Stassinakis and his entire committee, an important priest in the first row representing a more important priest, a member of parliament (Νέα Δημοκρατία), and various other notables. I had no trouble reading my talk. I did it precisely in the 30 minutes I was allotted. Gounelas spoke well about Kazantzakis's relation to Mussolini and Hitler, drawing a lot from my chapter. Stamatis Philippidis also spoke strongly, but I'm embarrassed to say that I fell asleep during his talk and awoke, or was awakened, by the applause at the end. I suppose that people saw me nod off, but no one said anything. Lots of very kind people afterwards. Lots of photos. A TV interview in the hallway. But finally we escaped—Niki, Gounelas, Philippidis, Nikos Mathioudakis, and I—to a very fancy restaurant in Kolonaki (my shrimp entrée cost €22, plus of course more for wine, coffee, pourboire). At the restaurant, waiting for us, was Niki's husband, Spiros, a loud, pleasant man who runs the business end of Εκδόσεις Καζαντζάκη. He said that they break even barely and complains that his profits are taxed extremely heavily. Niki is up all night, he says, answering hundreds of e-mails from all over the world. I predict that when the Selected Letters appears in Greek, she'll be even busier.

Tuesday, October 16, 2012

Met Stassinakis at the airport and we flew together to Iraklio. Nice to be in the Atrion Hotel again, unchanged since my last visit. Welcome siesta. Then to the Lions Square and the Androgeo, where I lectured so many times in 2007. Hugs and kisses from Barbara Tsaka, big smiles from Leventis, greetings from a lady who introduced herself as a good friend of Ava's (Ava left three days ago). I was surprised that Katsalaki didn't come; nor did Gareth Owens. Someone conveyed Stylianos Alexiou's regrets; he is over 90 and unable to circulate. Ben Petre gave me some new work of his. The Mayor spoke well at first. Stassinakis then explained the activities of the Friends. Early in my talk I exhibited the one remaining copy of the book and announced my desire to donate it to the Vikelaia Library, whose director was sitting in the first row. I lengthened the talk by including a few more passages from the letters. I felt very confident in delivering it, just as though it were in English. No questions or preaching afterward. A relief. Then we went to supper with Ava's friend and her husband, a very interesting physician who gave a long explanation of Stassinakis's sleep apnea, and the chair of the Friends in Iraklio. Back in the hotel at the amazingly early hour, for Greece, of 11:00 p.m., I caught some of the Obama-Romney debate on the TV and the conclusion of many that Obama did well this time, overcoming the Democratic despair that followed the first debate, in which he did not do well.

Went out to buy τραχανάς and Loumidis coffee. Finally discovered through the internet that airline controllers would go on strike tomorrow starting at 10:00 a.m., which means that my 6:30 a.m. flight will be OK, as Lufthansa assured me when I telephoned. Big relief. Just about everything will stop tomorrow: Metro, taxis, trolleys, ships. . . . Nice to spend the night again in the Sofitel, where they know me from previous times. I didn't have to fill out the usual form; all the information was in their computer.

Athens–Hanover

All went well. Up at 4:15 a.m. Lufthansa at 6:30 a.m. to Munich, long before the airport closed at 10:00 a.m. US Airways business class thankfully for the nine-hour flight to Philadelphia. Wonderfully comfortable. I worked on the computer most of the time. Kept to veggies and fruit at first but then switched to high proteins—meat! By a mistake, I thought yesterday was my fast day; it was supposed to be the feast day. But actually this was better. I fasted all of yesterday and about half of today, switching to high protein diet just about 6:00 a.m. American time (12 noon German time). In Philadelphia I had to go to the agricultural inspectors because I had declared the figs I bought for Chrysanthi. But they passed them. Full flight to Boston, but only an hour. Comfortable Dartmouth Coach to Hanover, and hugs and kisses from Chrysanthi when I got off the bus. 25+ hours, but relaxing.

Friday, October 19, 2012

No jet lag at all. Slept normally. Chrysanthi enjoyed her gifts of figs (delicious!), τραχανάς, and a large Loumidis coffee. Lots of unpacking to do, testimonials to send for Tom Akstens, and agenda to prepare for the AFS Secondary/Student Life Committee next Friday. Learned that Jerry King died while I was away, one of the best people here; he leaves Muriel, whose rheumatoid arthritis handicaps her so severely. Lots of practicing of Gershwin and Schumann for Sunday.

Saturday, October 20, 2012

An amazing 70 degrees. Trees brilliant orange-red outside our window. I bicycled to the Co-op to buy grapes and Macintosh apples. Started thinking about my Rollins Chapel sermon on November 4, on the mind and God. Norman Porter, the very able man on the facilities staff here, taught me how to activate the new system for projecting power point. Bob Christie tried his slides and everything seems OK for tomorrow morning. . . . Annie Levis sent an e-mail to say that she won't be coming to the AFS trustees next week because Aris, her husband, has cirrhosis of the liver, which is incurable except by liver transplant. Sad. I sent my condolences, naturally. Also to Marjorie King.

Sunday, October 21, 2012

I played the prelude and postlude for Bob Christie's Interfaith Gathering. The Gershwin Prelude #2 went well enough, although there were two mistakes that probably weren't noticed. But the postlude, Schumann's Träumerei, was perfect—not a single mistake. Hooray!

NYC

To New York by train. Went immediately to the Frick Museum to see old favorites after many years' absence. What a pleasure! Vermeer's "Officer and Girl" with light streaming in through the window on the girl's face. El Greco's "St. Jerome" dressed in his cardinal's robe with his hands on the opened pages of the Vulgate Bible, the Latin translation, which he has completed. Bellini's "St. Francis in the Desert." I thought he was receiving the stigmata but perhaps he's just in ecstasy, meditating. And a painting I don't remember from previous visits: Ingres' "Countess of Haussonville" (1845), in her blue dress with her finger pressed to her chin, very different and memorable. Then of course Constable's "Salisbury Cathedral," where one can see the over-sized steeple leaning a bit out of the vertical, as so well evoked in Golding's The Spire. Then my especial favorite, the Rembrandt Self-Portrait from 1658, cheeks, nose, mouth lighted, but a dark shadow over the eyes. Turner's "Dieppe Harbor" (1826), so crowded with boats and activity, another that I don't remember from past visits. But of course I very much remembered Whistler's "Conte Robert de Montesquieu-Fezensac" (1892), most of course because Proust modeled Charlus on him. Finally El Greco's very small canvas of the "Purification of the Temple," crowded with figures and with a very active Christ in the middle. The museum building is unchanged. Sorry the music room was closed; I remember concerts there, especially Glenn Gould when I was probably ten years old. . . . To the Union League Club on East 37th for the Farm School's gala. Met Manita Scocimara's daughter and Swiss son-in-law, parents of Alexi, the girl who came to Dartmouth somewhat because of me, left, returned, left again, and is now finishing her degree in England. They assured me that daughter is now fine. And there are no hard feelings about Dartmouth. The father whispered in my ear that Greece is being kept temporarily in the Euro by the Swiss banks and that she'll be dumped at an opportune moment, and will revert to the drachma. I sat next to a talkative, interesting woman, married to a Greek, whose knowledge of the Farm School comes exclusively from Greek Summer—Nancy Mantzikos, involved with the Delfinia Group, which arranges luxury tours to Greece. I assured her that this does not give an accurate picture of the School's nature and doings. She needs to visit, obviously. Also sat next to fellow trustee Bob Uek and got to know him a little better. He's all in finance, audits, and such things. . . . Nice e-mail from Nurzhan, who is now in Vietnam, Ho Chi Minh City no less, where Chad has an NGO job. She has taken out US citizenship, which simplifies her travels. Too bad that our Monica didn't do this during the five-year period when Alec was at Friends Select. Now she cannot because they live in America only five or six weeks a year. I wrote to Albana as well but have not received an answer, which worries me. She was meant to be in Crete but didn't show up for my lecture in Iraklio last week.

NYC

To MoMA to see Munch's "The Scream," which Leon Black purchased for $119,900,000 and has lent to the Museum (anonymously) for a few months. I must say that it is very interesting, indeed memorable. Munch was apparently something of a psycho and he wanted viewers truly to understand and experience what a psychologically disturbed person feels, what makes him or her scream. The painting succeeds in doing this. I certainly would not like to have it in my bedroom to view first thing upon awakening. Apparently Munch meant the scream not to be from the specific figure but rather to be the generic scream of nature. Poor anguished person! . . . College Committee. Perrotis rated #1 of private colleges in Greece, above Deree-Pierce. I warned everyone about the "reality" of these classifications as opposed to the "perception" created. Panos thinks we would do better affiliating with an American university as opposed to the Cardiff institute. We would need then to make Perrotis a four-year college. The vast majority of students are now Greek, who were described to us repeatedly as the worst students because typically they enroll in Perrotis because they fail entrance to Greek public universities. Only 20% of students are now from the Balkans, etc. This is a major change. I spoke very positively about Vergos when we discussed extension work, saying how mature and strong he was after the humiliation of being removed as Perrotis's director. . . . Afterwards, cocktails at Joel Post's on East 77th. Nice talk with his wife. They have a six-year-old son in a fancy private school. I reminisced about St. David's and Marymount, both of which she knew about. Earlier, long talk with Seth Frank, who wanted to know how Mike Keeley is doing. I told him the sad news about Mary's death.

Friday, October 26, 2012

Prepared for Agriculture and Secondary, working in the Yale Club library. Attended the Farm meeting and gave my report about the Nielsen scheme to deal with cow manure and other waste. People seemed interested. In the Secondary Committee I was asked to introduce the possible problem of sexual harassment of our young students. Does the School have a policy about this and a procedure? I asked Panos to report at the next meeting of the trustees. . . . Nice long supper at the Yale Club with Burt Pike, who, like me, is active, alert, and productive. I didn't realize that he had supervised Constance Tagopoulos's dissertation at CUNY. . . . Then to the theater to see Ibsen's An Enemy of the People for the first time, very well acted by Boyd Gaines as Stockmann and Richard Thomas as his brother, the Mayor. It is so terribly bitter, about how honesty is defeated by expediency and how democracy is perverted by an illiterate populace and a scheming self-serving bureaucracy.

Saturday, October 27, 2012

Full board. Charlotte as autocratic as ever. Announced that we'd skip the March meeting. I objected, saying that such a decision should be discussed by the full board and then voted one way or the other. Others concurred. So, in the event, the board voted to restore the March meeting. The question of leadership also arose. Why didn't a committee on trustees recommend a slate of officers instead of us simply re-appointing the incumbents, including Charlotte, of course, as president. Well, the committee went out and came back in ten minutes recommending, the cowards, that the existing officers be continued. So we're stuck with Charlotte again. . . . One good idea, from John Crunkilton: we should look for trustees who are connected with early childhood education. I'll think about those I know from the ACTFL group. But they won't have thousands of dollars to contribute.

Sunday, October 28, 2012

Chrysanthi and I both went to Meeting at Kendal, which now attracts about twenty people. Very good ministry, especially from Rose Miller. Then to the opera, Otello, but I needed to leave early to get back to perform in the Early Music program: Goldberg Variation 18. I made mistakes but apparently people didn't notice; several said how well I played!

Then a lovely, lively supper with Audrey Cherin and Bill Tait. What fun to be in Kendal!

November 7, 2012

We're all delighted because Obama won a strong victory. Amazingly, New Hampshire elected a Democratic governor and sent Ann McLane Kuster to Congress. Even Warren County, New York, elected a Democratic Congressman.

November 13, 2012

I've been reading E. A. Milne's Modern Cosmology and the Christian Idea of God, most of which I cannot understand because he's a mathematical physicist. But occasionally he speaks non-technically, as for instance on p. 133: ". . . laws of nature are not special ad hoc creations, thrown in by the Creator to keep the world running, as fuel is fed into a machine, not even as catalysts, facilitating the 'reaction' of evolutionary process; but they are part of the inevitable accompaniment of the actual content of the universe . . . It seems to me that this state of affairs makes the physical universe a more perfect construction, more worthy of our wonder . . . than if we regarded the universe as an amorphous structure on which certain independent 'laws of nature' were set to work."

November 15, 2012

Philadelphia

Very nice dinner in Philadelphia with Chrysanthi, Leander, and Dan Seeger. Dan very talkative, especially about his disappointment with Obama (although he voted for him, even though he considered voting for Romney in order to make everything so totally bad four years from now that perhaps some acceptable candidate would emerge). Leander reported a fine visit to Moravian College with Sophia, who is attracted to its program in developmental psychology. She is finally doing well in math and chemistry, thanks to a good tutor. Nicholas gets "A" in everything without doing any work. He's silent and morose most of the time. Although Leander spent excessive time with both children reading to them and they to him, neither now reads, except on the internet, of course. Dan says he'd be willing to speak to Hanover Friends Meeting on the Pope's encyclical on world peace, which is being remembered now and celebrated.

Philadelphia,
November 16, 2012                      Marriott Downtown, 1201 Market Street

Went to explore the Reading Terminal Market, across the street from the hotel. Many of the stalls are staffed by Amish women, all very prim, dressed in their long skirts, hair covered. I bought a jar of Amish jam. . . . The three sessions for Modern Greek were mostly stimulating and occasionally truly excellent. How nice to be with scholars again, each one adding something new and interesting for me. Also how nice to see old friends and acquaintances—from Stanford, Harvard, Drexel, the Odyssey School in Wilmington—and to meet new people, especially Oupavía from Athens, who spoke so very well on enclitics, when to use them and when not to. For once I was simply a listener, although I participated in the various discussions. . . . Quick lunch in the Reading Terminal Market, served by an Amish man who seemed mostly interested in the cash box. Slight break after the last afternoon session; then walked to Locust just beyond Broad Street, across from the Academy, to the Estia Greek restaurant (215 735-7700), where Vassiliki had reserved a private dining room for about 20 people, some from the convention, some from the community, including a woman who used to teach Modern Greek at the Bronx High School of Science. This was very lively, although the food was nothing special.

Philadelphia–Washington

November 17, 2012

To the new Barnes Museum in the morning. The building itself is exceptional, inside and out (gardens, trees, and pools outside). The paintings, arranged exactly as they were in the original museum in Merion, are of course extraordinary. Indeed, the richness is so great that I found myself concentrating only on a single painter, Cézanne, represented by dozens of gorgeous masterpieces, with the very large “Card Players” in the main gallery. Landscapes, portraits (e.g., of his favorite postman), still-lives. All of them educe a power and subtlety lacking, I’d say, in the numerous Renoirs also on display. One genuine El Greco, several “from the school of El Greco.” Philadelphia festive on this sunny day, preparing for a Marathon race tomorrow. Peeked into the Free Library on the walk back but didn’t have time to go upstairs to revisit the main reading room. Parkway, where I walked, is surely one of the world’s marvels of city planning. . . . Back at the hotel, however, I was dragged into the embarrassing dispute between the two “directors” of our project, the two Evas, who are academics from Stanford and Harvard, and poor Vassiliki, named “coordinator” and accused in a loud dispute over a table in the restaurant of exceeding her responsibilities, claiming that our standards are finished when they are not, inviting people to an exorbitant $70 supper last night (neither of the Evas attended), etc. Loud voices, self-justification on both sides. I counseled them to forget the past, letting bygones be bygones, and to be more careful about the future, with Vassiliki coordinating more democratically. A sad, contentious way to end an otherwise pleasant time in Philadelphia. . . . Train to Union Station, Washington. Metro to Foggy Bottom, shuttle to Kennedy Center. Met Deanna and Chrysanthi. Supper in the café on the top floor. Then a marvelous concert. First the Tchaikovsky violin concerto played by a splendid virtuoso, Sergey Khachatryan, who from the very first phrase displayed an exceptional musicality, especially in his ability to achieve pianissimos. We gave him a standing ovation, with pleasure. Then Shostakovich’s 4th Symphony, opus 43, the one that Stalin disliked and had to be withheld until after Stalin’s death. A full hour long. Huge orchestra: 7 French horns, 2 tubas, 2 harps, multiple percussion players. Deanna sitting alone on stage (her partner was ill), very visible. Splendid conductor, Vasily Petrenko, whom Deanna said she and the other players liked and admired. He required four rehearsals to get the orchestra to stay together in this difficult music with changes in time signature frequent, ultra-sudden shifts from ff to pp, etc. The sadness—despair—was evident, as though the music were somehow declaring “Save us from Stalin!” Another standing ovation at the end.

Sunday, November 18, 2012

Washington

Leander drove us all to Arlington, Virginia to a restaurant on the Potomac for Sunday brunch: eggs benedict on Maryland crab-cakes, not very good, alas, but the atmosphere was pleasant. Then, next door, the Torpedo Factory, now a haven for artists, with 300+ studios where people work and display their wares, which I found uninteresting for the most part and extremely over-priced. But they also run a school for amateurs, which is good. We walked through the historical section of Alexandria, with its million dollar homes. Then to the mall in Washington. Walked to the back of the White House and took photos of ourselves with the building in the background. Only when we returned to Lopa Court and I surveyed the news on the internet did I realize that an hour or two later Bill McKibben would be leading his followers around the White House property to encourage Obama not to allow the tar sands pipeline. Too bad we missed this. No wonder there were policemen on the street already when we were there. . . . I read Dennis Carroll's revision of his parody of Paul's letter to the Romans and sent him an e-mail with my comments in time for our meeting tomorrow.

A full day in town, although I practiced my Goldberg fugue a bit before leaving and also some of the Milhaud. To the National Gallery first. So nice to see El Greco's large "Laocoön," his very bright "Madonna and Child," his "Saint Idelfonso," who looks very "academic," sitting at a desk and writing, and a version, not the best one, of "Christ Cleansing the Temple." Also a Rembrandt self-portrait when he was 53 years old (1659) but lacking the magic of the self-portraits in the Frick and the Met. I was pleased as well to see the famous "Venus and Adonis" by Titian, Venus resisting Adonis's advances just, I think, to maintain good form, not really to send him packing. Another nice Rembrandt, his "Lucretia" about to plunge a knife into her breast, poor thing. . . . Walked up 7th Street to the District Chop House for a 2½ hour lunch with Dennis Carroll. He encouraged me to use Xlibris for my journal and gave me pointers: use 11-point type with justified right margins; order soft-bound copies, which they do well, not hard-bound ones, which they do poorly; perhaps have them do a volume 1 of the journal before I finish everything. As for him, he hopes to complete his revised New Testament, first the Pauline epistles. I hoped he would do justice to Hebrews, chapter 11 on faith, and of course play nicely with Apocalypse. I think he is reconciled to never being published except by Xlibris, with whom he apparently has more volumes than anyone else on their list. . . . Then Metro to Dupont Circle and a bit of a walk to 1000 Connecticut Avenue, the shirt store that advertised pure cotton shirts for $39—Charles Tyrwhitt from Jermyn Street, London. They measured me: neck now 16 inches, alas, sleeve 32. I ended up buying three shirts which Chrysanthi can give me for Christmas!

. . . I'm sitting now, writing this, in the Martin Luther King public library on G Street and 10th, NW, very comfortably for 1½ hours until I meet everyone at a Chinese restaurant nearby before going to see the Wizards (who so far have lost every single game) at the Verizon Center.

. . . I'm reading in the TLS about the new volume of T. S. Eliot's letters and am about half way through John D. Barrow's The Book of Universes, about to begin the section entitled "Chaotic Universes" (p. 161). . . . To Chinatown, nearby, and a Mongolian restaurant to meet everyone else at 5:30. There's a buffet of raw meat, lo mein, vegetables, etc. You choose what you want, place it in a bowl, add garlic to taste, then tell the chef if you want it hot or mild; he adds the appropriate sauces, then cooks everything on a very hot griddle and returns it to you in your bowl. Waitress brings rice and tea. You eat and then, if you wish, go back for more, repeating the process. I had beef the first time, lamb the second. I didn't find either particularly tasty. . . . Then to the immense Verizon Center to see the Wizards play Indiana. The Wizards lost again but at one moment were only a single point behind. Indiana was clearly the better team. Wizards seem always to miss the basket, even on most foul shots. Lots of noise. An organ. Chorus girls. People hawking beer. A Child's game during half-time plus amazing acrobats jumping high up, turning summersaults in mid-air, and placing a basketball in the hoop on the way down. Chrysanthi very engaged, cheering the Wizards when they scored, moaning when they missed a point. Fun. Nightcap of B & B.

Tuesday, November 20, 2012

Very nice to return to the Phillips Collection. I'd forgotten that they have a truly magnificent El Greco, "Repentant St. Peter," ca. 1600. Peter is strong, muscular, with full gray beard and plenty of hair, in perfect physical shape despite his despair. Next to this painting is the same subject by Goya, ca. 1822, with Peter old, sickly, fat, bald. An interesting pair. Of course I remembered the large Renoir "Luncheon of the Boating Party" (1881). How could one forget that? But it was stimulating to find other paintings that I'd never noticed in previous visits or had forgotten: Rouault's "Afterglow Galilee," with its sunset colors and thick paint; Manet's "Spanish Ballet" (1862), very unlike most Manets; van Gogh's "Road Menders" (1889), with its eerie row of greenish trees; Cézanne's "Garden of Les Lauves," totally abstract, almost like a Kandinsky, and painted in 1906, the year he died—interesting to compare this with the Cézanne self-portrait of 1880 when he was 41 years old: totally representational. Then of course there is the Rothko room with a large typical Rothko, solid colors, on each wall, supposed to enhance meditation. Lost on me. Lastly, some wickedly abstract monstrosities by Dove, whose celebrity eludes me. . . . After this, it was stimulating to be introduced to a true creative genius in the East Building of the National Gallery: Roy Lichtenstein. If one knew only his sort of comic book illustrations done with dots, one would not think much of him. But this larger retrospective exhibition showed his inventiveness and individuality evidenced in numerous transformations of style and content. The East Wing also has some treasures on (I think) permanent exhibition. I was attracted by Kandinsky's "Improvisation 31" (1913), Brancusi's two separate "Bird in Space" statues (1925, 1927), gleaming and smooth, Georgia O'Keefe's "Line and Curve" (1927), several disturbing paintings by Mad Beckmann, especially his large "Argonauts" (1950), and the immediately recognizable Giacometti elongated nudes. . . . I should have mentioned that Leander took me for lunch at a deli that he knew; we had very good pastrami and chopped chicken liver. Crowded, but we got a table. I of course ordered the chopped chicken liver, he ordered pastrami. Nice. So now I don't have to try Katz's again in the Lower East Side, where we couldn't get in because the line went around the block. One chopped chicken liver sandwich per year (or, better, per decade) is truly enough. . . . After supper, Leander and I went to the new Spielberg movie, "Lincoln," in the theater complex at the lake where the Sodoexo headquarters are. The star is Day-Lewis, whose father I remember meeting at Chatto and Windus's in 1958. A brilliantly intellectual film concentrating on Lincoln's obsessive desire to have the House pass the Thirteenth Amendment, freeing slaves, despite all the opposition even in his own party (Republicans) and of course in the opposition Democrats. The polarized House, as shown, seemed exactly like our contemporary polarized House (maybe that was Spielberg's point). Votes had to be "bought" in various ways. A two-thirds majority was achieved, barely, with two votes to spare. Soon afterward, Lincoln was assassinated by Booth, who thought of himself as a Brutus necessarily killing a "tyrant."

Wednesday, November 21, 2012

Drove in with Deanna. Spent the morning in George Washington University's library, reading Barrow's The Book of Universes, some of which I actually understand, since it is not mathematical. Had lunch in the Starbuck's next door, finishing the second half of yesterday's chopped chicken liver sandwich, plus a latte. Then Metro to L'Enfant Plaza, which is very grand, with interesting architecture, and walked to the Space Museum. Luckily I was able to attach myself to an excellent tour led by a former fighter pilot. Most interesting to me was the large exhibit devoted to the Wright Brothers and containing the actual plane that they flew for twelve seconds at Kitty Hawk plus the experimental gliders that preceded this flight. Although sort of Rube Goldberg from a modern standpoint, their device was carefully planned and built after much preliminary experimentation—the true beginning of air transportation. Leander told us later that he and family have visited Kitty Hawk, where there is a large museum dedicated to the Wright Brothers and their achievement. Also interesting to me in the Space Museum was the material on Charles Lindbergh and Anne Morrow, including his actual plane, the Spirit of St. Louis. I asked the guide how Lindbergh stayed awake and he said, among other things, that he flew close to the ocean's surface with open windows so that spray landed on his face. Lots on planetary exploration, manless planes (drones), how planes land and take off from aircraft carriers, Copernicus and Galileo, the comparative sizes and distances of all the planets of our solar system, the fact that the large distance ones like Jupiter and Saturn are not solid but are gaseous, and more and more, for example on comets: where they originate, how often they return, why they are called comets (from the Greek κομήτης, of course, “having long hair”—the tails). . . . I then went to the National Portrait Gallery, near Gallery Place Metro. I'd been there before but this time, seeing a Benton painting on one of the posters outside, I inquired whether they had other Bentons. And they do indeed: two real beauties, the best Bentons I've ever seen. On the third floor is a large “Self-Portrait with Rita” (his wife) painted on Martha's Vineyard where they were vacationing in 1923. Benton paints himself bare-chested with muscles like a body-builder's, whereas Rita is not glamorized at all. Then on the 2nd floor there is a huge canvas, really a mural, called “Achelous and Hercules” (1947). It's 22 feet long. A muscular Hercules wearing blue jeans is about to break off one of the horns of Achelous, the river-god now a bull as the river floods. One broken horn becomes “cornucopia,” the full harvest owing to the irrigation the river provides. All this relates to Benton's home state, Missouri. His murals in the State Capitol, finished in 1936, contain the panel for which we own a study.

Thursday, November 22, 2012

Thanksgiving feast. Leander gave a long “blessing,” offering thanks for health and good spirits, and especially for his dear wife (with a bit of broken voice here). Nicholas dressed with blazer and necktie, Sophia in her #1 blue jeans. Walked around the pond afterwards and then watched a remarkable film, “Babe,” so sensitive about a piglet who trains as a sheep-dog, and thus is not served up as pork.

Friday, November 23, 2012

On the long train ride home I typed more of volume 32 of my journal despite the rough tracks, and read TLS, including the following about Spinoza, which amazed me because my views are just like his in many ways. Here’s why, according to Daniel Schwartz’s book, reviewed by Steven Nadler: “In his metaphysical and moral masterpiece, the Ethics, Spinoza identifies God with ‘Nature’, defends the life of reason over ‘bondage’ to religious passions, and denies that there is any kind of personal immortality. In his ‘scandalous’ Theological-Political Treatise, he argues that miracles are impossible, that prophecy is a product not of knowledge but of the imagination, that the bible is not the inerrant word of God but merely a compilation of human writings passed down through the generations (and thus a ‘corrupted and mutilated document’), that organized religions are in fact just organized superstition, and that religious authorities have no right to exercise control over the state or over the freedom of people to think and say what they want. The work was vehemently attacked by church and civil authorities immediately after its publication in 1670.”

Sunday, November 25, 2012

I ministered about Spinoza in Meeting. David Montgomery ministered afterwards, saying he fails to understand why so many people react with such passion against these liberal values. (I told him afterwards about Rebecca Mays’s diagnosis to me during the Last Temptation controversy, that it’s basically a subconscious fear people harbor concerning mortality.) Judith Pettingell told me afterwards, “Wow! Those Spinoza values are exactly mine, too.” Phebe McCosker leaned over to tell about the efforts to convert Jews in Amsterdam to Quakerism in the 1600s when a man who ground lenses for a living (i.e., Spinoza) acted as translator. Somebody else recommended a relevant novel by Isaac Singer. But of course two women ministered later in Meeting about the centrality of emotion in knowing God, since rationality is necessarily deficient in this regard. Yes, God is love as well as mind. . . . Finished typing volume 32 of my journal, on typed page 2351. Volume 33 begins on June 22, 2006. I'm getting close. Only volumes 33, 34, and 35 to go, and I'll be up to date. As Dennis Carroll suggests, it might be a good idea to print a first volume with Xlibris even before finishing the full typing.

Sunday, December 2, 2012

We had supper last night with Pete Kelsey, retired Episcopal priest. He said that his major effort in his various parishes was to convince people in the congregation that God loved them. I kept thinking of this in Meeting this morning and wondering how, say, a child dying of leukemia at age 9 could be convinced that God loved her. It's the old problem of theodicy, of course. I kept striving for some solution. John Milton's felix culpa, that God allows sin and suffering because some future good will come of it, didn't satisfy me. I felt stuck until someone in Meeting ministered about being loved even though he didn't deserve to be loved. Suddenly that seemed to work for me. The important thing is not just that God loves you but rather that God loves you—or that “you are loved” somehow by the universe—even though you don't deserve to be. What this means, perhaps, is that there is always the possibility of redemption of some sort, the possibility only, not the assurance. Coincidentally, the opera we viewed this afternoon, Mozart's last, La Clemenza di Tito, showed just this and seems, remarkably, to be Mozart's final message in his difficult final year—namely that clemency is possible, and indeed redeems sin and suffering.

December 13, 2012

I appreciated encountering this in the journal for 2007 that I was typing yesterday: “I keep resisting posting at the farm. In Berdyaev's The Destiny of Man, p. 218, there is a good expression of my reason: “The maximum of freedom and the minimum of tyranny is achieved when God is recognized as the absolute owner and man as a steward and user.” Of course the word “steward” evokes the American Farm School, which Father House described as “Stewards of the Land,” Φροντιστές της γης.

Played the variation movement of Schubert's Trout Quintet, transcribed for eight-hand piano, with Joan Wilson, Stan Udy, and Bill Clendenning for the Health Center audience. Full House. No nervousness and no mistakes. Lots of practice obviously helped.

Sunday, December 16, 2012

A full, interesting day. Started at the Meeting House at 8:30 a.m. with a meeting of the Adult Education Committee: Dulany Bennett, Jack Hunter, Hope Rennie, Frederika Graham. They want me to do two programs: the Meeting's pacifist activity during the Vietnam War, ideally together with Peter Stettenheim, and the Meeting's beginnings, purchase of the Rope Ferry Road property, decision to sell it, purchase of the Lebanon Street property. I also arranged for Doug Gwyn to come here from Pendle Hill in May to tell about some aspect of Quaker history. . . . Home at 10:10 a.m. Short time to practice. Then to the Gathering Room to do the music for DeWitt Mallary's interfaith Gathering. I did Beethoven's andante (in part) from the Appassionata as prologue, Goldberg Variation 30 as postlude, and three hymns. Again without nervousness or any serious mistakes. And I learned the Goldberg in just one week. Very encouraging. . . . Then we rushed to the new Black Family Arts Center (Leon Black's gift) to see the Met's HD movie of Aida, all four hours, with a very good lead: Liudmyla Monastyrska. Home in the first snow of this winter.

December 19, 2012

Arnie Alpert wrote that he spoke with the new Episcopal bishop of New Hampshire. Rob Hirschfeld, who said he remembered me from going to Quaker Meeting when he was a student at Dartmouth. I looked up my records and found that I also had him in class. He was Dartmouth class of '83. Interestingly I noted that he wrote the best final exam in the class and also a "heartfelt" paper explaining how affected he was by reading Ulysses and how it changed his life. Hope to meet him.

Andrew's school sent all of us a very fine poem by Wendell Berry just before the Winter Solstice:

THE PEACE OF WILD THINGS

When despair for the world grows in me and I wake in the night at the least sound in fear of what my life and my children's lives may be,
 I go and lie down where the wood drake rests in his beauty on the water, and the great heron feeds.
 I come into the peace of wild things who do not tax their lives with forethought of grief. I come into the presence of still water.
 And I feel above me the day-blind stars waiting with their light. For a time
 I rest in the grass of the world, and am free.

Chrysanthi's birthday, age 79 probably. We exchanged presents, just the two of us since this is the first year we didn't all gather at Daphne's South Salem house. They didn't come, and they're thinking of putting it up for sale. Greg sent me a Santa Barbara High School tennis cap, very nice. Leander sent chocolates and ripe pears and flavoring for coffee. But the best present was the Nook I bought for Chrysanthi; she broke into tears because, she said, she so much wanted something like this. Of course getting it to work was another matter. But so far I've managed to purchase Sudoku for it plus the book about Lincoln on which the recent film was based. . . . We visited Weezie, who is celebrating the 30th year of her ordination as an Episcopal priest.

December 25, 2012, Christmas

Snowing outside. A big surprise via an e-mail this morning from Leander. Last night they went to a pre-Christmas service at a Presbyterian church in Bethesda with a fine chorus. Sophia joined in the singing with vigor apparently, and says she wants to join the church. I responded to Leander with one word: "Wow!" This would be good for her and maybe for the family, if the minister is reasonably liberal. . . . This morning I finished typing volume 33 of this journal and began the present volume, 34, at typed page 2475. What to do with all this remains a problem. Probably Xlibris.

December 28, 2012

Reached 2011 tonight in my typing of the journal. Getting close. . . . Finally did a bit of cleanup in my Kendal “office”—the piles under the table that has the typewriter (now never used) and fax machine. A large amount was discarded, but I also discovered valuable things from the past, for example my talk on “Pagan and Christian Heroism” that I illustrated with two statues by Donatello. Also memories from the Kazantzakis Symposium I organized at NYU in 2007. . . . Iacovos Tsalioglou sent me a manuscript he wrote that he thinks I can place with a publisher. Impossible, I fear.

December 29, 2012

The Kazantzakis Museum sent this postcard that Kazantzakis wrote to someone, probably from Antibes. It’s refreshing since so much else for Christmas is totally secular.

Χριστούγεννα.

Ο Θεός να δώσει το παιδί που γενήθηκε σήμερα στη Βηθλεέμ να ξαναφέρει στη σημερινή αμαρτωλή ανθρωπότητα την αρετή, την αφέλεια και την εβγένεια του «Υιού τῶ Ἀνθρώπου».

January 1, 2013

Nice lunch today with Muncks and Lappins; nice dinner last night (lobster). But this is the first New Year's that we didn't celebrate New Year's Eve at the Rassias's with snails (because of Mary's death), didn't go to South Salem for Christmas (because the Tebbes did not travel East this year), and in effect spent the holidays without children. One reason was our fine, extended stay with Leander for Thanksgiving; another was probably Christina's grown-up lifestyle that precluded traveling for her. But Alec telephoned from Indonesia and Leander sent a nice e-mail. So it goes . . .

I'm hoping to free myself of the responsibility for the Interfaith Gatherings, which I've coordinated for seven years. I asked Bill Benson and he thinks that he can do it.

Cambridge

A TLS review of a new biography of Lyndon Johnson quotes one book as concluding, "Lyndon Johnson believed in nothing but his ambition. Everything he did was for his ambition." This of course reminded me of the time I was in the White House listening to Johnson's dismal recital to us of his own achievements, a display of naked egotism that made all of us cringe.

To Cambridge to the A.R.T. for a remarkable show called "Pippin," revival of a 1972 Broadway musical about a young man trying to find meaning in his life and discovering that power and militarism are not the way (the original version played during the Vietnam War). This revival was done by a team of remarkable Canadian circus acrobats and a full orchestra. What a pleasure to see these twenty or so talented people, all trained in ballet, who could sing, dance, act, and perform miracles with their bodies.

Yesterday I vetted Nikos Mathioudakis's proposal for a postgraduate time at Princeton, very badly written, alas. I sent him massive suggestions for changes. Today, I found his revision when we got back from Cambridge and supper at Three Tomatoes at 9:00 p.m. and looked at it again. Happily, it is just about ready to go, but he forgot to attach his name to it! I e-mailed it back. It's due in Princeton on Monday.

Finished typing volume 35 on page 2584! Amazing. As George Bush infamously said regarding the Iraq war, "Mission accomplished."

February 5, 2013

Spoke with the new director of the Dickey Center, Daniel Benjamin, about reviving the War/Peace University Seminar but no longer at the Hanover Inn, which has become too expensive. He wants to delay until he has a better sense of all of the Dickey Center's programs. So, we'll see . . .

Dan Benjamin delivered his first public lecture—on his subject of expertise: terrorism and counter-terrorism. I was pleased to hear him conclude that the country that emerged best of all, following terrorist threats, is Indonesia, and I wrote him afterwards about Alec's adventures in 1998 during the coup and following it.

February 8, 2013

Niki Stavrou received a letter from Simon and Schuster indicating that they might look with favor on a re-translation of Zorba the Greek. Here's hoping!

A sad visit tonight with Kesaya and Chris in Whittier. Lafayette has stopped eating and drinking, is heavily dosed with morphine owing to pain and obviously will die very soon. Kesaya realizes that this is now the best answer for her father. We spoke already about a memorial service here at Kendal. She hopes of course that David can arrive in time from New York despite the severe snowstorm now in progress. We all have so many uplifting memoirs of Lafayette, not to mention Mayme. I thought of the party in Boston and my poem with No-Da as the refrain (Da of course meaning Yes in Russian).

February 12, 2013

Letter from Simon and Schuster indicating some interest in allowing a new translation of Zorba.

Marvelous four-hand duet recital by Sally Pinkas and her husband, Evan Hirsch. She invited me last night to a "salon" at Dartmouth where they played some of the four-hand pieces: Schubert's Rondo and Shapero's interesting piece. But today in Spaulding these were much better. And added to them were some two-piano pieces, South-American tangos and a marvelous sonata by Poulenc, whom I had erroneously thought wrote only light, playful pieces like the four-hand sonata I used to play at Woodbrooke long ago with Maurice Creasy. Tonight's recital was brilliantly varied and showed off the real possibility of the two-piano literature.

February 13, 2013

Sally came for lunch at Kendal. Thankfully Chrysanthi, who has been homebound for a week with flu, felt well enough to partake. Sally of course wanted to tell us in detail how she fared so beautifully in Bangkok and at the Patana school thanks to Alec and family, and ultimately thanks to me for putting her in contact with Alec. Of course she marveled at the children, especially their dishwashing!

February 14–15, 2013

Boston, Charlotte, London, Penn Club

What a day! Routine flight, Envoy class, to Gatwick. No jet lag thanks to feast-fast and enough sleep. As promised, Nikos Mathioudakis met me at the airport with a car and driver. Penn Club always the same. In the guest book I noted that I had first resided there in 1955. Changed $400 in a bank at a good rate: 1.6047. Went to the British Museum. Reading Room closed, so couldn't revive memories of when I used to work there. But there was a special exhibit upstairs of drawings of Greece by British travelers in the late 1800s and early 1900s. Athenian Acropolis with sheep grazing outside. No buildup. Antiquities incorporated into the Turkish houses. Seeing the Elgin Marbles always sends a chill down my spine, especially the procession of horsemen. I'm glad they're here, "saved" by Lord Elgin. It was lovely to see hordes of schoolchildren gazing at these sculptures and crowding around the Rosetta Stone. . . . I went to the Holbrooke Underground Station and put money on my Oyster Card, enough for a week, I was told. . . . Walked all the way to the Royal Academy, hoping to see the Manet exhibit, but there was a huge crowd on line for tickets. I was advised to come back at 9:00 p.m. (they're open to 11:00 tonight). Passed time in the National Gallery; always a pleasure to see old favorites: the two unfinished Michelangelos, El Greco's powerful large Christ driving the traders from the Temple (ca. 1600), Titian's striking Bacchus and Ariadne (1520–23), with Bacchus's cape flowing out behind him as he leaps down from his chariot, which is drawn by two leopards. Then, of course, Rembrandt's "Belshazzar's Feast" (1636–38) with the fateful writing on the wall, and his two self-portraits, one at age 63, the other at age 34 when he was wealthy and successful and looking it, while at 63 (the last year of his life) he seems to be weighed down by life's difficulties, something seen equally in his portraits of other old men. Finally, I always admire his "Woman Bathing in a Stream" (1654). . . . Supper of bad food in Chinatown, which is garish and immense. Then to an interesting play, The Audience, starring Helen Mirren. She played Queen Elizabeth II having her obligatory weekly audience for an hour with each and every prime minister, twelve in her experience, starting with Churchill. Twelve different actors, eleven men and one woman (for Maggie Thatcher), played the PMs and looked remarkably like each of them. The audience—sold-out house—was enchanted because of course they knew all about the troubles and scandals of each. Mirren played the queen with understatement except when she got angry at the despised Maggie Thatcher. She was tender with Harold Wilson when he confessed his Alzheimer's and announced his decision to resign, whereupon she asked him to invite her and the Duke of Edinburgh to dinner at 10 Downing Street, the first such visit since Churchill's time. Great audience; cheering at the end. Fine theater! But it was too late to go back to the Royal Academy Manet exhibit. I did, however, go in to see the other exhibit, "Constable, Gainsborough, Turner and the Making of Landscape." By means of many prints and some full-color paintings, this showed how British painters began by imitating the French and Dutch landscape masters and then developed their own styles and mastery. Turner's amazing abstractionism is not evident in his landscapes, as it is in his seascapes. My favorite, therefore, remained Constable, evidenced here by his disciple David Lucas's "The Rainbow, Salisbury Cathedral" (of course) and his own "A Boat Passing a Lock." After a while I could tell the difference between the master's genuine work and an imitation by one of his school.

London

At breakfast, talked with a friendly American diplomat working in our mission in Brussels and here on vacation because he says that Brussels is boring and also that it is always raining there. (Here: clear skies and sunshine!) He predicts that Greece will pull through slowly, but not yet. It probably should not have been accepted by the EU in 1981. We now know that it offered inaccurate financial data in its application. I explained the importance for Greece of choosing "Europe" as its chief partner rather than cow-towing to the Eastern bloc, especially given what happened in the Greek civil war. And I explained to him that in the 1950s, 1960s, 1970s, a Greek about to travel West to France, etc. would say Θα πάω στην Ευρώπη.

Alix MacSweeney came to visit around 10:00 a.m. She explained, poor thing, that she lost her husband last year. He was a longtime sufferer from diabetes and was dispatched by an attack of flu when he was applying for a job (besides painting) that he could not have handled physically, if it had been funded. He was a fairly successful painter, with works in the Tait here and in MoMA in New York. I must get his accurate name and see if I can look at the canvases in MoMA. Alix, herself a painter, is not practicing her art at the moment, since she's preoccupied with preparing for her deceased husband's probate, etc. Too bad. She has no further influence in the TLS but is not surprised at its failure so far to review my Selected Letters volume. The new Classics editor favors Ancient Greece and not Modern Greece, all too apparently. I told her of my failure to get into the Manet exhibit (which she had seen and found somewhat disappointing), whereupon she revealed that she is a member of the Royal Academy (RA) and can bring me in as her guest without a ticket. So we went there and, as she said, I entered immediately without cost or waiting in line. She, having seen the exhibit, departed. I found it much better than she had, although I also agreed with her assessment of many of the portraits as being clearly the work of someone interested primarily in the high (excessive?) fee. I found the show better than she did, although I agree that many of the portraits fail to evoke the subject's spirit. But Manet has always been one of my favorites, and it was exciting to see his preferred black color predominating in so many canvases, one next to the other in five or six large galleries. Also interesting was to learn that he trained by copying previous masters, especially Goya, Velázquez, and Frans Hals. And I made a note of the saying by Baudelaire, an admirer of Manet, that music is the highest form of art owing to its non-mimetic quality. Of the paintings, aside from the famous "Music in the Tuileries Gardens" (1862), I especially liked the following: "George Moore in the Artist's Garden." Moore was of course admired by Joyce. And here he is, very young, looking ready for lively conversation, sitting in the sunshine, dressed shabbily as for an outing. "Portrait of Théodore Duret," the look of a dandy. I thought of Whistler's large portrait of the French aristocrat who was the model for Proust's character Baron Charlus. Here, too, we see a man totally satisfied with himself—that is his "spirit" shining through. "Portrait of Berthe Morisot," one of many. Her eyes are completely alive. Among the "status" portraits, the one of Antonin Proust (no relation to Marcel) shows a person 100% pleased with himself as a dandy. A nice touch is the one glove on and one glove off. Then of course there is the reduced version of "Déjeuner sur l'herbe," which looks somewhat frazzled compared to the large version, yet nevertheless conveys Manet's willingness to shock the stuffed shirts.

The rest of the day was not so successful because both plays I saw were inferior (one in its execution, the other in its script) to The Audience last night. The first, Macbeth, was overacted. The lead had a Scottish accent, which was nice. But before his first soliloquy he pretended to vomit into a modern toilet, completely wrong for everything else. Lady Macbeth was young and somewhat glamorous, which seemed incongruous to me. Lots of thunder and lightning, and Macbeth's severed head displayed in all its blood after MacDuff kills him. Etc., etc. Too much effort, strangely negating rather than abetting. I walked then on familiar ground down the Strand and across the river to the National Theatre. Good meal in the buffet there: chicken stroganoff. People always so helpful and kind. Pianist playing rags with admiral zest and power. But the play in the Olivier, the huge main theatre, had lots of empty seats and was, for me, a failure. It was called The Captain of Köpenick and was about a sad sack who kept screaming most of the time and was funny and interesting only when he donned an officer's uniform found in a shop and commanded a group of soldiers deliciously. Of course the whole was a strong protest against militarism. But, as with Macbeth, the excessive theatrical efforts really had a negative effect instead of the opposite. These consisted, here, of revolving stages, half-stages that descended and were replaced by others; brass bands marching around the stage, and other theatrical marvels, all of which, for me, were totally un-marvelous and just interfered with what might have been successful if had been done simply, and without screaming. I walked back to the Penn Club.

Sunday, February 17, 2013

Couldn't attend Meeting because I had to leave at 12:00 noon to go to Watting to meet with Rowena Loverance. That was a bit of an adventure: tube, then an overground line to Shadwell. Then confusion. Everyone visible either in shops or on the street was Muslim (from Bangladesh, I learned later). One actually found Rowena's street on a smart phone, but confusion remained until I found an English worker who showed me exactly how to find Rowena's street. And there she was, outside, waiting for me at 1:00 p.m., just as previously arranged. She was "let go" with ten others from the British Museum about seven or eight years ago, and moved here with her elderly mother, who occupied the ground floor while Rowena was upstairs. Her mother died a few years ago and Rowena now has a roomy, attractive flat looking out at the large Shadwell Basin. We had so much to talk about! She remembered all the children's names, and I went through the basics for Leander, Alec, and Daphne. She expanded on what had happened at the British Museum, basically a decision to make an entirely different use of the Reading Room from the one she had contributed to fashion—namely, multiple computers displaying the BM's each and every object with full explanations. All that has been removed and is available now to anyone at home, on line. The Reading Room will become an exhibition space. She continues to work as a Byzantinist, her interest at present being in Byzantine sculpture. There isn't much, and a great deal is simply "decorative," but there are significant finds of objects that need cataloging with full explanations, which she is preparing for a new book. I suggested I'd see if Kathleen Corrigan could invite her to Dartmouth. We had a lovely lunch together. Then some neighbors called, a young couple, the man English, the wife Indian teaching English literature in a sixth-form school. He had fun talking about Joyce's Portrait, etc. All this lasted until about 5:00 p.m. Rowena then walked me to see the river, which is extraordinarily wide here in Wapping, and to the train station. Tube to Green Park from which, with some difficulty and telephone calls, I reached the Park Lane Hotel to meet Niki Stavrou, Nikos Mathioudakis, and others for supper. Fun to see old friends and acquaintances, and to be introduced to many new people. Thanasis Maskaleris was there, just arrived from California, very jet-lagged and sleepy. Roddy Beaton arrived. He'd been at the other symposium, which I'd missed in order to go to the Manet exhibit. Nice to see Θανάσης Αγάθος again, after many years, and my friend Athina Vouyouka, representing Stassinakis and the Friends. We were served a fine dinner in the hotel, with a chance to meet the other symposiasts. One of them turned out to be a cousin of Eleni Tsacopoulos, so we had lots to talk about. I learned that Eleni is thriving as the US ambassador to Hungary; she wants to give all her business responsibilities to her brother and sisters, in order to continue with a career in politics. I told the cousin, Nektaria Klapaki, the curious story of the telephone call I had received from John Anton asking me to recommend Eleni for admission to Dartmouth although she was a poor student (B minus) but had a father worth millions. And Dartmouth accepted her! Home by taxi.

Monday, February 18, 2013

The big day. I was picked up by Niki's special bus at the Penn Club. Mine was the first session. Of course everything began late, but no matter since Greek events never begin on time. I was preceded by Beaton, Mathioudakis, Lewis Owens, and Papanikolaou. My "Report to Nikos" (Αναφορά στο Νίκο) apparently was a great hit. I was the only speaker who, if nothing else, made people laugh (the όρτσα story). Lots of applause and people coming up afterwards asking for a copy. The next session, for which I served as moderator, had talks by Aphrodite Athanasopoulou from Cyprus, Gerasimos Zoras, son of Professor Zoras, Agathos Charalambakis, and Klapaki. We finished the second morning session at 2:45 p.m. No time for discussion, alas. After a quick lunch the presentations were no longer scholarly. Vouyouka explained what the Friends do. Varvara Tsaka, using power point, indicated the Museum's new initiative, basically to put all resources on line. She told me privately that she still is not getting paid, also that Leventis has left and probably cannot be replaced. Then came four very excellent string players, a quartet, playing Theodorakis's music for a Zorba ballet. Not my taste at all until, toward the end, came the famous dance used in the film. After this, an English actor in a screaming monologue of Zorbatic sayings, accompanied by a pleasant Japanese man on an oriental sort of guitar and then on a bass fiddle. Much too long and too loud. The Zorba movie came next but luckily most of the speakers were allowed to return to the hotel via taxi. We were then loaded into different taxis and taken a long distance to Lemonia, a famous Greek restaurant near Regents Park. Mobbed, every seat taken. But of course Niki had reserved a private dining room upstairs. I sat next to her at the long table and learned that Simon and Schuster have agreed on a new translation of Zorba. Apparently I'm going to be paid by Niki, who also promises to send me a definitive Greek text. No talk yet about the level or means of compensation. As usual, much too much food. Mezedakia galore and then, after we were fully stuffed, the main meal: παϊδάκια. I inquired about reimbursement for my expenses and she sent me to a gentlemen at the far end of the table. Although I had sent her all the figures, he knew nothing. So I had to find various numbers again, luckily on my printed itinerary. But then, stupidly, I converted dollars to pounds by using the number I'd learned to do the opposite: to convert pounds to dollars, which I'd been doing since arrival for meals, taxis, etc. As a result, the total came to £2050, which he promptly gave me in cash. When I got back to the Penn Club, I realized my mistake, figured everything correctly and discovered that I'd been overpaid £1000! I immediately explained this to Niki via e-mail, and slept after an extremely long, full, and fulfilling, day.

Tuesday, February 19, 2013

Another full, varied, interesting day. Started by going to Friends House owing to the mission that Randy Warner had asked me to fulfill: to speak to Helen Drewery about the decision to stop paying the Farm School about £4000 a year from the Simmons Trust. I had e-mailed Drewery. No response. Six months ago I had written her and sent my lecture on Quaker influence upon the Farm School. No response. Now I telephoned her private number and received a recorded message that she was out sick. But another call to the receptionist confirmed that she was in the building. So I went, only to be told that she was in a managers' meeting all morning but that I could talk to her assistant. So down came a young woman called Clare Wood who told me she'd been in this job only two months. We spoke for a half hour (all she could spare). She took notes. I explained about the Quaker element in the School's history and then about reconciliation happening among Balkan students in Perrotis College, and finally about the new ecological initiatives in the pre-kindergarten, kindergarten, and primary school, followed by how we are helping the unemployed city folks who are returning to the land. She promised to speak to Drewery. And, miracle of miracles, I received a one-sentence e-mail later from Drewery herself saying that she was sorry that she couldn't see me herself today and that tomorrow she would not be in the office at all. I don't expect anything positive to happen. But at least I fulfilled Randy's commission.

Walked then to King's College and met with Polina Tambakaki over lunch in a Thai restaurant nearby. She has a class in Kazantzakis at King's but with only one student. Sad. She hopes to have more next year. She wants me to look at some writing she'll send. Nice young scholar, and lucky to have a position at King's. At 1:50 exactly, as arranged, Lewis Owens met me at King's entrance and escorted me upstairs to a room where a television crew was documenting an interview with Niki. The subject was chiefly The Last Temptation, upon which Lewis hopes to make a documentary. Niki answered various questions expertly, showing an intimate knowledge of the novel. In the interval after her turn, she said she had received my e-mail about the financial mistake, apologized for not giving her colleague my numbers in advance, and I happily returned her £1000 in cash. Then my turn came to be interviewed, Lewis asking the questions: how I first became interested in Kazantzakis (I told the story about my fellow student vomiting), how and why the book was opposed, then how the Scorsese film was challenged (my story of going to the screening in New York and having to pass through a gauntlet with Catholics on one side and right-wing Protestants on the other), whether I liked the film (hated it at first because of its total lack of Kazantzakis's language, and I related what Schrader told me about Scorsese's anger at the first draft: "No poetry!"). When I finished, Roddy entered and spoke very well about why he likes the novel and enjoys teaching it, emphasizing the final four chapters. Niki left, forgetting the £1000, which were left on a table, but Lewis ran after her successfully with the money. Then he, I, and a friend who was part of the film-making team had a coffee and pleasant, easy conversation until about 5:00 p.m., when Lewis and I went by taxi to Islington to meet his wife Tania, from the Ukraine, a pianist, and a man who turned out to have been her piano teacher and also one of the two performers on a disc Lewis gave me of the two-piano version of Shostakovich's 4th Symphony, the one we heard the National Symphony do, and the one that Stalin disliked. Lewis explained that owing to Stalin's displeasure the orchestral parts and the score had been destroyed, so that all that remained was the two-piano version that Shostakovich had prepared. I told them about the impressive power of two-piano performance I had experienced recently thanks to Sally Pinkas and Evan Hirsch. I also told them, very emotionally, about Bevedrige Webster; they had never heard of him. Then we all went across the street to the Almeida Theatre, very small, to see an adaptation of Henry James's The Turn of the Screw beautifully acted. The Governess was of course the lead, in a challenging role, but perhaps the star was the child who played the small girl. Lots of scares and shocks when the two specters appeared suddenly. Not great theater but a pleasant way to spend an evening. One feature I had never seen before was the use of subtitles (overhead) although the language was of course English. This was to enable deaf people to enjoy the play, and indeed there were four deaf people in front of us, conversing via sign language in the interval. I must now read Henry James's famous story again. Lewis was obviously very gracious today, renewing a friendship. He was open in speaking about Monica, the woman he abandoned after living with her for fifteen years. It just didn't work out, and luckily he found Tania, married her, and fathered two children. He also of course left the academic life (he says he was miserably treated at Canterbury) and is now president of a successful company advising secondary school students about entrance to British universities.

Wednesday, February 20, 2013

My last full day in London. Fulfilled a longtime wish by going to the Natural History Museum to do homage, I suppose, to the statue of Charles Darwin overlooking the Main Hall. This I did, with pleasure. The museum is amazing. Filled today with children (it was a school holiday of some sort) and organized to appeal to children. I saw only a small part, of course: insects (fascinating), whales (including a full-scale model, and explanation of how they mate and sing), birds, prehistoric mammals. What a treasure house! Then by taxi to Leicester Square, lunch of pasta and soup (my "fast" day), an hour again in the National Gallery enjoying as always especially the Cézannes and Manets. Then to a play about Oscar Wilde and his tragedy. First act: just before the police come for him. Bosie encourages him to catch the train to Dover and escape to France. Wilde refuses. Lots of Wildean repartee and brilliant wit. Bosie self-centered and hysterical. He's convinced that the controversy is really between himself and his father, whom he despises and hates. Wilde refuses to leave. Second act: Wilde in Naples after his two years in Reading gaol. Bosie there in bed, naked, with a naked Italian. Wilde despondent. No money. No audience. His career ruined. And Bosie protests that he really isn't just a lover of men, he is bi-sexual. He wants to abandon Wilde—although his family will help Wilde if Wilde gives permission. He does. And Bosie departs. The ultimate betrayal. Beautifully done, with superb acting, as always. Good vegetarian supper in an Indian restaurant. E-mail message from Simon and Schuster leading to a date for me to visit them on March 8th.

Thursday, February 21, 2013

Taxi to Victoria at 6:30 a.m. Gatwick Express. First class lounge. Expedited scrutiny of baggage, but they discovered the two jars of British jam I'd bought for Chrysanthi and confiscated them. I should have known better. Broke my fast in flight around 6:30 a.m., New Hampshire time, with Envoy class steak dinner.

So much to do, alas, when I return: Lewin applicants, ILEAD course, Webster organization, eight-hand practice and performance, Farm School trustees' meeting in March, continuing with vetting my Journal, whereas now the single important concern and activity should be the re-translation of Zorba.

Sunday, February 24, 2013

To Cambridge by bus owing to snow. Met Tom Akstens and Suzanne Murtha there. They had driven up from their new house in Rhode Island and treated us to lunch in a Japanese soba restaurant on JFK. They plan to sell the Bakers Mills home in about three years and to re-locate permanently. And Suzanne is exploring a career change. Tom will continue at Sienna, commuting, but will leave Empire. Saw Tennessee Williams's Glass Menagerie at the A.R.T. starring Cherry Jones, whom I so admire, as the mother. Such a sad play. Very well acted also by the woman who played the crippled daughter, Celia Keenan-Bolger.

February 25, 2013

Thanks to Pete Kelsey, I spent an hour today, very pleasantly, with the new Episcopal bishop of New Hampshire, Rob Hirschfeld, who took a class from me when he was an undergraduate here, and also did some Greek with Chrysanthi, and went sometimes to Quaker Meeting. My notes record that his final paper showed his "heartfelt" feeling of being greatly influenced by Joyce's Ulysses.

March 2, 2013

Spent five hours viewing the Met HD projection of Parsifal. The first act, which took almost two hours, was so slow, so boring, but the rest was not. The music is magnificent but the whole conception, being Wagner, I found repulsive. The Christianity centers on overcoming one's sinfulness. Not my cup of tea.

March 6, 2013

Hoke Brissenden died suddenly. He had obviously been very weak the last few weeks, walking always with oxygen and so exhausted the other day that he had to stop in the middle of the corridor and lean against the wall. And his wife, Annella, seems to have Alzheimer's. How can she exist on her own now?

Went to the Bentley Theater to see Rachel Decker-Sadowski act in Stoppard's The Real Inspector Hound. And who was sitting next to us but her mother, father, and boyfriend, and directly in front of us her tennis coach! Nice to meet all these people and to see her on stage. She's got the theater bug; will be spending the summer in London at one of the acting schools and going to three plays a week!

March 7, 2013

New York City

Spent an hour and a half with Michael Groden at the Yale Club. He is writing a memoir of his long association with Joyce and it begins, he told me, with my class at Dartmouth. He is free now of the restrictions imposed by Stephen Joyce because all the works are out of copyright, but he doesn't have the energy or desire to fashion the Joyce thesaurus. Too bad. . . . Then walked to 21 and ate there with Jeff Murphy talking about Catholicism and Obama, and the difficulties of lawyers and his three children. Then to Lincoln Center with him to see the Paul Taylor dance company's show. Very different from the NYC ballet. No dance shoes; barefoot mostly. No tutus. Lots of running, jumping, spectacular sliding. The men in trousers, the women in skirts. But spectacular athleticism and also the ability to convey peacefulness and contemplation. We saw "Gossamer Gallants" (Smetana/Taylor), "Eventide" (Vaughan Williams/Taylor), and the spectacular "Esplanade" (Bach/Taylor). Paul Taylor himself took a curtain call at the end.

March 8, 2013

Visited Suzanne Donahue at Simon and Schuster in the same building where I visited Michael Korda many times in the 1960s. And Suzanne asked "How is Daphne?" for she had been with S&S when Daphne worked with Fred Hills and remembered both of them well. She is very happy we'll be doing a new Zorba. I'm to deliver the manuscript on May 1, 2014. And she'll allow a subtitle ("The Saint's Life of Zorba") even on the cover. She also wants a Foreword regarding the reasons for a new translation. On e-books they pay authors 25% of their net proceeds (which are typically 30% less than the list price). But I'll be paid by Niki, not S&S. . . . Then went to MoMA to ask about Peter de Francia's two drawings. They're in storage in Queens. I was given the name of the person to write to in order to set up an appointment to see them. . . . Then to buy cheeses at the Grand Central market. . . . Then to 26th and Broadway for the end of the Farm Committee followed by the Perrotis

Committee and finally the Primary/Secondary Committee. My idea to minute our support of the primary school despite the letters from Stavros and Seth against continuing with it was rejected because members thought it would be better to be silent about the whole business and that the two objectors would not press the matter. We hope that Charlotte won't raise it tomorrow. I was asked to speak to her. We also discussed the harassment policy, which many, including myself, found too long, too detailed, almost unreadable. I read the first paragraph of the Pendle Hill statement as an example of something much more humanistic, brief, and reader-friendly. I also wish that mediation training were prescribed and that appeals could be done by peer review. Faint hope, alas. I asked about Tasos's retirement. Apparently he'll stay on, part-time, but relieved of full responsibility. He is interested in the new school for youngsters, I was glad to hear. . . . Dimitri Gondicas and I sat for our routine post-meeting tea. He is discouraged by the paucity of applications to Princeton from Americans doing Modern Greek. Also said that Mathioudakis didn't have a chance (a) because he submitted in Greek and only a little in deficient English, (b) his program was mechanical, numerological, too much counting. To my half-jocular suggestion that Perrotis contain a course in nature poetry and not just courses in STEM (science, technology, engineering, maths) he suggested that such poetry could be introduced surreptitiously via the English-language program. Good idea. I was pleased to learn that he'll attend the meetings in Greece in June. He of course reminded me about my archive, which Princeton is waiting for.

Then to the Morgan Museum for a concert organized by Charlie Hamlen, who is now organizing the St. Luke's orchestra and chamber groups. He was there. We had a lovely reunion after many years. He is prospering. He went back to IMG after leaving Classical Action, but didn't want to stay there and fell into the St. Luke's job, happily. He was so pleased to see Leander at Nancy Bidlack's memorial. Also pleased that he could help me with our Webster concerts at Kendal. This program, unbelievably, contained two pieces that I play with Dick and Allan: Ravel's Sonatine for flute, cello, and harp, and Debussy's Sonata for flute, viola, and harp. They played the Ravel very slowly. It struck me as a juvenile piece, and indeed it was written when Ravel was young: 28 years old. The Debussy was, by contrast, a very late composition, written in 1915 (he died in 1918). Nice to hear these done with the harp, but I must say that Dick, Allan, and I, despite all the mistakes we perpetrate, do make both pieces sound more or less as they are meant to sound. Also performed was a brilliant fantasy for harp and violin by Saint-Saëns, who apparently was a splendid pianist who used to say to audiences, “Which of the 32 Beethoven piano sonatas do you want me to play,” and then could do any one of them from memory. The most exciting piece was the world premiere of a quintet by Sean Shepherd, 34 years old—brilliant tonal but dissident writing for oboe, clarinet, violin, harp, and double bass, with a second movement labeled “insistent, nasal, snarling, relentless.” This was totally stimulating. Nice to see the composer, who took a bow and applauded the players. A fond goodbye to Charlie, embracing.

March 9, 2013

Full board. Instructed by my committee, I asked Charlotte not to suggest a third-party investigation of our charter to see if the primary school was legitimate under it. She said that she didn’t intend to, and she didn’t. Joel Post noted that we had depleted our endowment by more than $20,000,000 to cover deficits in the last six or seven years. But things look better now.

March 21, 2013

Chinua Achebe died today, aged 82. I remember having supper with him a long time ago at Dartmouth with some students also. One of the students asked him, “Is it still possible to witness primitive customs in the Nigerian villages?” Achebe’s answer was classic: “Try Scarsdale”!

April 3, 2013

Attended the Emerson Quartet’s recital at Hopkins Center. I have never experienced such utter perfection in execution. Total precision and also sensitivity.

April 5, 2013

Our balcony was completely rebuilt and then re-enclosed with thermal glass instead of plastic, the whole now also about eight inches larger. It’s a veritable extra room. And today Chrysanthi’s new swivel chair arrived. She sits queen-like there, reading a printed book or, more often, her e-book on the new Nook.

Nikos Mathioudakis, in Athens, has been splendidly helpful to me in discovering the meaning of the many words in Zorba that are not in any dictionary—what he calls νεολογικά αθησαύριστα. Of course Kazantzakis is sometimes just playful, as for example when he makes Zorba speak to Mme. Hortense about her “admirals” (ναύαρχοι) changing the word to νάβρακοι (sea-underpants)!

April 10, 2013

I am re-reading Ulysses and am already doing “Ithaca.” Yesterday I found two extraordinary passages that must be recorded here: (1) “He [Stephen] affirmed his significance as a conscious rational animal proceeding syllogistically from the known to the unknown and a conscious rational reagent between a micro- and a macrocosm ineluctably constructed upon the incertitude of the void.” (2) “What spectacle confronted them when they, first the host, then the guest, emerged . . .? The heaventree of stars hung with humid nightblue fruit.” This mimics the last verses of Dante’s Inferno, when Virgil and Dante emerge from hell.

I finished my first chapter of the new Zorba translation—chapter 11. (I always start in the middle.) Today I tried to make Mme. Hortense’s English sound like English with a French accent. Tricky.

April 15, 2013

Finished re-reading Ulysses, a wonderful experience.

April 21, 2013

Finished John D. Barrow’s remarkable “The Book of Universes,” of which I understood maybe 20% at most. His conclusion (p. 295): “We are asked to accept that our universe is a member of a never-ending multiverse of actual universes displaying different properties. Our universe may be special in ways that are essential for our own existence, and that of any other form of intelligent life. Today our universe exhibits a second burst of accelerated expansion that began less than 5 billion years ago. Copernicus taught us that our planet is not the centre of the universe. Now we may have to accept that even our universe may not be at the center of the Universe.” I especially liked his section labeled “Chaotic Universes.” Some quotes: “. . . why not try to prove that order will always result from chaos?” (p. 261). “This is an appealing idea: It has major philosophical implications. If true, it would mean that we don’t need to know how the universe began (or even if it began) in order to understand its present structure” (p. 262). “Sadly, by 1980, . . . the appealing idea . . . that physical processes in the very early history of the universe would always ensure the expansion because isotropic and homogeneous did not fly. There were just too many persistent types of irregularity . . .” (p. 168).

I learned today, via an e-mail from Niki Stavrou, that the bookstore in Athens where I autographed the Kazantzakis letters last October, Estia, has closed, gone out of business owing to the general economic crisis in Greece. How very very sad!

April 22, 2013

My final class, the sixth, in my Ulysses course for ILEAD. Some very appreciative students, some others who left halfway through. I'm happy now to be able to concentrate exclusively on the re-translation of Zorba.

May 1, 2013

New York City

A very long, varied, stimulating day. Up at 5:00 a.m. Dartmouth Coach to the Yale Club. Full buffet lunch. Then walked to 42nd between 9th and 10th to a small theater on the 4th floor to see what turned out to be an extremely well written play excellently acted called The Call about a young white couple that can't seem to have a baby and decide to adopt a black baby from Africa. But the “baby” offered is said to be 2½ and looks at least 4 years old. The wife, brilliantly acted by Kerry Butler, is despondent. She wanted the full experience, the first word, the first tooth, not a four-year-old. She decides to cancel. But finally she accepts to go through with it. Very emotional, sensitive, and real. And so well written by Tanya Barfield and directed by Leigh Silverman. A pleasure! . . . Chinese dinner in the food court of Grand Central, actually very tasty. But then a huge adventure getting to Lincoln Center. As usual we started with the Shuttle expecting to go easily from Times Square to Lincoln Center on #1. But there was a stalled train on the uptown tracks, huge crowds, and we were unable to get into a train. So we exited and I said “Let's walk along Broadway and get the bus that goes to Lincoln Center.” We walked quite some distance, no buses at all, and then I discovered that we were going downtown and had reached 36th Street! Horrors. Tried to get a taxi. No luck. But we did find a “rickshaw driver” and got in—a young foreign man doing the best he could on his bicycle, weaving in and out of traffic, assuring us that he had never had an accident. Would we arrive in time for the first ballet? Doubtful. But we did arrive at 7:28 for the 7:30 performance. His fee was $60, $1 per street (30 blocks) per passenger. Luckily I had three $20 bills, which cleaned out my wallet. And we arrived in time for a wonderful program. This whole week they have dedicated to American composers. So there was much too much Morton Gould, who is mediocre, but also, thankfully, some Bernstein on Friday. Tonight started with Gershwin, all the familiar songs, some played Gershwin-style on the piano. The ballet, called "Who Cares?" is by Mr. Balanchine, as they always used to call him. The highlight of the evening was "Ivesiana," also by Mr. B, to amazing music by Charles Ives. The best was the first, "Central Park in the Dark," with the corps in dark brown costumes slinking around the stage, almost invisible, an effect that only Balanchine could have produced, owing to his versatility. My only complaint was that I wished I could see the entire piece over again, to digest it better. Next came the show-off pas de deux "Tarantella," which is pure fun. Finally, more fun: "Stars and Stripes."

May 2, 2013

Walked to MoMA and entered at 9:30, before the crowds, owing to my membership. Saw the fascinating Claes Oldenburg special show. He lived in the East Village and Lower East Side and collected objects that he converted into objets d'art: a lipstick, cash register, frying pan with a fried egg, hamburger, clothespins, etc., reminding us that many of the objects we use have aesthetic qualities, for example the device I have both at Kendal and at the farm to moisten and seal postal envelopes, made by him into a sculpture. The ugly and ordinary things in our daily lives can be lifted into art, as proved by this exhibit. At 11:00, by pre-arrangement, we went to the museum's offices two doors further east on 53rd Street and were taken by a young official to the print and drawing department, where two drawings by Alix MacSweeney's late husband, Peter de Francia, who died in January 2012, had been brought for us from storage in Long Island City. Both are large. One, framed, is political, with a military figure dominating; the other, charcoal on paper, illustrates one of Césaire's stories, showing figures in a boat, one reading, another fishing with the line attached to his ankle. Wonderful work. I asked if they'd ever be exhibited and was told probably not. However, if Alix arranges an exhibit in England and wants them, the museum will be happy to loan them. Our guide was a young woman with an accent. I asked about her training. She'd studied art history in her native Argentina, then secured an internship at MoMA and was hired after three months. Lucky! . . . Back to the Yale Club to lunch with Jennifer Karsten, the new head of Pendle Hill. Young, energetic, happy to be in this position. She wants me to give a course, or at least a lecture, on Kazantzakis. I told her Yes but not until I finish translating Zorba. However, I'd like to do Quakerism and Darwin earlier, if they'd be interested in that. Apparently John Myers will decide. Then we raced back to Lincoln Center to attend a rehearsal of the NYC ballet. Not at all interesting. Lots of waiting with nothing happening. No real instruction taking place. Back to the Yale Club for a free dinner because my birthday is in May, then to our second night of the ballet's American festival. "Thou Swell" choreographed by Peter Martins to music by Richard Rodgers, with two singers whose words could rarely be deciphered. Mediocre. But Wheelton's "Carousel," again to Richard Rodgers's music, was much better, especially at the start when the dancers are in a large circle that draws inward. The best of the evening was of course Balanchine's "Slaughter on Tenth Avenue," again to Richard Rodgers's music. Balanchine's magic saved this evening.

Friday, May 3, 2013

To the Frick Museum at 10:00 a.m. to see old favorites but also a fine special exhibit of drawings. St. Jerome is so powerful. Rembrandt in his self-portrait is so self-satisfied. We walked both there and back on this beautiful day with flowers in bloom and everyone enjoying the outdoors. Lunch with Charlie Hamlen, so friendly and gracious. He told the sad story of his home in Jaffrey burning down with all his belongings when he was away with his wife (yes!) in Paris. Everything they owned was lost. But he is prospering now, and very happy in his current job managing the Orchestra of St. Luke's. . . . At 2:30 we were in the Greek Orthodox Cathedral on 74th and 1st Avenue for a long service: the Deposition from the Cross. At the height of this the priest detaches the Christ-puppet from his cross, wraps the body in a shroud, and will later place it, tonight, in the tomb for the Επιτάφιος service. But he pretends that the body is on a cloth held from his shoulders by another priest and paraded through the church, with the faithful prostrated in obeisance on their knees. Very moving, with incense wafted before him. I was a bit exhausted after these two hours, most of it standing. Thus for once we didn't walk but took the 72nd Street crosstown bus to Broadway and supped early in a good restaurant across from Lincoln Center. Then to the Rose Building for a “Dancer Chat.” This was with Olivia Boisson, a new member of the corps, very petite, born in Queens County and educated in ballet school in Forest Hills, then in Harlem, and then in the School of American Ballet, from which she was selected for an apprenticeship with the NYC ballet, followed six months later by this exciting job. She explained a typical day: practice from 10:30 to noon, then from 1:00 p.m. until 6:00 p.m. Then perform! Mondays they are free. Then to our final evening of ballet, again all by American composers. I was dismayed that the first ballet was again by Morton Gould, who is so mediocre. But the choreography by Robbins for this “Interplay” is excellent. What a difference, and pleasure, to hear Leonard Bernstein’s exciting “Fancy Free” next. The three sailors in the bar, choreographed by Robbins, are a pure joy. The last number was one of our favorites, “I’m Old Fashioned,” that starts with the movie of Fred Astaire and Rita Heyworth dancing. The end, when the whole ballet corps repeats Astaire’s steps, is scintillating. So endeth our three-day ballet festival.

Saturday, May 4, 2013

Dartmouth Coach home. At 8:00 p.m. Doug Gwyn arrived from Philadelphia. Lovely reunion after too many years. It’s so good that he seems now to have a steady, continuing position at Pendle Hill.

Sunday, May 5, 2013

What a day! Breakfast with Doug and Chrysanthi in the café. Then to Meeting. After Meeting, Doug gave a sort of class on the Beatitudes and their relation to early Quaker writing by Fox and Penington mostly. It was a brilliant class, with a good group of about twenty-five of us. Doug was able to draw out splendid participation by the “students” as well as to present his own points succinctly and clearly. We were all very pleased. Then quickly back to Kendal at about 1:45 p.m. to greet Natasha Peremsky, today’s Webster pianist. She was there, practicing Chopin and Mussorgsky. A twenty-five-year-old “sweetheart,” friendly, simple, no evidence of her genius or extraordinary success. At 3:00 she gave a beautiful program. Chopin’s 4th Ballade, Beethoven’s Tempest sonata, “Pictures at an Exposition,” and, to calm us down, as she said, at the end, Chopin’s “Berceuse.” I could tell from the first two bars of the Ballade that she was extraordinary. Thank goodness our Yamaha piano rose to the demands she placed on it: huge fortes, tiny pianissimos, and everything in between. Beethoven's sonata was truly given a tempest. And of course the Mussorgsky has dynamics in excess in all directions. Everyone felt that she was the best pianist we had ever heard here, maybe even better than Dinnerstein. Wonderful! And all thanks to Charlie Hamlen, her good friend and mine, for putting me in touch with her. . . . But the day's events continued. It was Orthodox Easter Sunday, and we all went, Doug and Natasha, too, to John Rassias's for the traditional lamb supper and cracking of eggs (Chrysanthi won). Lovely to see Veronica especially, and 5 of the 6 children. They hope to visit us this summer.

Monday, May 6, 2013

Doug and Natasha up and ready at 6:00 a.m. I drove them to town and they caught the 6:30 a.m. bus to New York. Amazingly, everything went so very well yesterday. . . . In the afternoon: Dr. Miller. We decided to wait until I complete Zorba to do the cataracts. I also have a lower eyelid problem that forces tears out of the eye instead of allowing them to drain internally as they should. This needs surgery but must wait until the cataracts are finished.

May 7, 2013

I spoke at the annual Remembrance Ceremony for those who died in the past twelve months, about forty people this time. I did more or less what I did three or four years ago, via literature and philosophy: Swift, Andrew Marvell, Kazantzakis, Lucretius, Harkianakis.

May 9, 2013

A fine computer person at Dartmouth finally repaired the website that we did for Greek Today, making the Morby videos work perfectly once again.

May 10, 2013

Performed eight-hand piano in the Cary Room: second and third movements of Mozart's 40th. No nervousness and no mistakes. But the middle F stuck each time on the upright piano. I contacted Dale Howe and hope that he will fix it before we perform again next Wednesday.

May 14, 2013

Meeting trustees. I'm president again, by rotation. It seems that we can conclude the negotiations regarding the donation of one-twelfth of the expanse rich in natural gas by selling our rights to the others who received the eleven-twelfths, and we might get almost $70,000 for this.

May 15, 2013

Eight-hand piano again in the Cary Room, this time a Rossini overture —terrible music, but the audience loved it.

May 16, 2013

George Pattison is here. He and I vetted Lewis Owens's dissertation and did the viva together at Cambridge. Lovely reunion. He spoke well on Kierkegaard, saying that his mode of writing, jumping from subject to subject somewhat confusedly, is "post-Christian." I've been calling Joyce's writing "postmodern." Maybe I should also say "post-Christian." What a difference between Joyce and, for example, John Milton!

May 17, 2013

A quick one-day trip to the farm. Started the White, fixing a leaking oil filter. Did some planting. A lovely feeling of peace, as always.

May 19, 2013

Alan Horton officiated at the Interfaith Gathering. He is such a deep, thoughtful man, totally atheistic yet at the same time totally "religious" in his metaphysical concern for one's status in the circumambient universe.

May 20, 2013

Met with Ella Erway, Avery Post, and others. We are scheming to enhance the Elizabeth Fry Fund in order to recruit to Kendal people of limited economic means.

May 21, 2013

Joan Snell helped me with my version of Mme Hortense's French accent in my Zorba translation. Big improvement.

May 25, 2013

Farm

Cold, rainy day. I started the water easily. No difficulty; indeed, the new system makes the process so much easier. No uncovering of the well any longer; no groping for that tiny lever. Internet works perfectly. TV works perfectly. Our new downstairs telephone works perfectly. But the bottom of the toilet tank leaks. That never happened before. I lowered the tractor off its struts and prepared it but was afraid to see if it will start, until tomorrow. Chrysanthi made delicious spaghetti with chicken and garlic for supper.

May 26, 2013

The tractor started immediately. No problem. I lubricated it and the mower and mowed. But I couldn't start the tiller and thus prepared the soil for Chrysanthi's planting by using a shovel. Added peat moss and fermented cow manure. Began to read Merrill Brockways's autobiography. Not very interesting so far. I'm waiting until he gets to his relationship with Balanchine. He mentions being at "a boys' camp" while he was a Columbia College student beginning in 1946. Thus I must have been 16 when I played duets with him at Brant Lake Camp. . . . We're enjoying "I Love Lucy" again, before sleeping.

May 27, 2013

Couldn't start the tiller until I realized that maybe it needed a new spark plug. This did the trick. I tilled the entire garden, which as usual was full of weeds. We ate supper in the new restaurant on Route 28, practically the only people there: two hamburgers, pie and coffee, all for $21.00. Earl visited at sat forever. Stephen will be entering kindergarten in the fall. We learned a lot about gun culture here in the Adirondacks, both encouraging and discouraging. Roy and Dale, who both have served prison terms and therefore are not allowed to possess guns, both do possess them. Dale served because he raped Monica when she was under-aged. Eventually, of course, they married. But Braley Noxon's new gun shop needed to be placed a least 1000 feet away from the school!

June 1, 2013

Lawrence, Massachusetts

To Allison Bolton's bat mitzvah. The ceremony leaves me cold, as it also does Chrysanthi and Leander. But nice to see family, especially Ellen Lerner, Paul, Hazel at age three a bouncing redhead, Peter Buseck still mourning Alice but with a lady who lost her husband recently, David planning to go to India on business via Bangkok and will visit Alec, Susan about to move back to the Bay area with Ellen although neither has a job yet. Paul and Dana sell all the vegetables they produce, and she'll have a second child in October. The eldest Bolton daughter is off to Pitzer College in California in September. She told me that everyone smokes pot there. Clive can afford the full cost. Allison, although profoundly deaf since birth, reads lips expertly and apparently hears very well with hearing aids. She of course read the Torah and did all the other required parts of this very forced ceremony.

June 3, 2013

Learned lots today from Earl. We heard a repeated call that I thought was a bird but that he identified as a faun calling its mother; apparently they'd become separated. Also, 89 and 91 gas do not have the ethanol problem that 87 gas does. We should use 89 at least in all our machines, plus blue Stabil just to be doubly sure. He brought some dog food hoping that this will attract our woodchucks into the have-a-heart trap. We've experienced no luck, so far, with ham, lettuce, carrots. Leander did lots of mowing both at his cabin and ours. I mowed Alec's and cleaned up around my office. The huge rock in Waddell Road was removed thanks to Earl's perseverance. It's on the side of the road now, as large as a small automobile. We clocked the distance from our house up Waddell Road to the northern border because Chrysanthi walks it: five-tenths of a mile, thus a full mile there and back. . . . Finished the day with milkshakes at Stewart's for Leander and me.

June 7, 2013

Sent the following letter:

Αγαπητοί Πάνο, Άννη, Τάσο, Joann,

Φαίνεται πως η τρίχρονη θητεία μου στην Εφορία της Σχολής θα λήξει τον Οκτώβριο. Μου ρώτησαν αν θέλω να συνεχίσω να υπηρετώ. Συζητήσαμε με τη Χρυσάνθη και νομίσαμε και οι δύο ότι ήρθε πια ο καιρός να πάρω σύνταξη από την Εφορία. Είναι απαραίτητο να έχετε στην Εφορία πιο νέα μέλη που θα μπορούν να υπηρετούν για 6 ή 9 ή 12 χρόνια. Εγώ θα τελειώσω 15 χρόνια ως έφορος και 7 χρόνια ως πρόεδρος στην Δευτερεύουσα Επιτροπή. Φτάνουν! Έφτασα πρόσφατα στην ηλικία των 83 χρονών. Αν υπηρετούσα ακόμα και 3 χρόνια, θα έφτανα στην ηλικία των 86! Δεν πάει.

Ήρθα πρώτη φορά στη Σχολή το 1955 όταν ήμουν 25 χρονώ. Έμεινα με τους μαθητές στο υπνωτήριο τους, και έπιασα φιλία με τον Bruce Lansdale που βάσταξε πολλές δεκαετίες. Η ευκαιρία να υπηρετήσω τη Σχολή ως έφορος ήταν για μένα μία από τις ακμές της ζωής μου και θέλω να ευχαριστήσω εσάς ειδικώς για όλα που κάνετε για τη Σχολή και επίσης για όλα που κάνετε για εμάς τους εφόρους, που προσπαθούμε να συνεισφέρουμε κάτι.

I went to the Dartmouth Baccalaureate service to hear Bishop Gene Robinson, who was exceptionally good. His text was Luke 3:10–11: “And the multitudes asked him what then shall we do? And he answered them: He who has two coats, let him share with him who has none, and he who has food, let him do likewise.” This is followed, continued Robinson, by Jesus’ temptation for forty days in the wilderness. He is supposedly tempted by the devil, but really he is debating with himself regarding his table of values. First temptation: Do more tricks. Turn a stone into bread. Jesus refuses. Second temptation: All power. Jesus refuses. Third temptation: Jump off a tower and angels will save you. Jesus refuses. Robinson then said to the students: You are intelligent and greatly favored. What will you say in your “inaugural lecture”? Will you say no to similar temptations, especially to the offer of power, which is certain to corrupt you? I hope that, following Jesus, you will devote your lives to helping those in need, those who are marginalized. . . . It was brilliantly done, so simple, so brief, so utterly comprehensible.

Thessaloniki

Arrived 2:30-ish. Sissy Baba drove us, very pleasantly. Panos Kanellis gave us a private tour of the new Primary School, unfinished but at least we could see the large dimensions of the various rooms. Only eight students registered so far, but he hopes that the second year will be a big improvement owing to the entrance of large numbers from our own kindergarten. . . . So nice to see so many old friends at the supper. I sat with Vergos. Stavros Constantinidis explained that his letter against the Primary School and his resignation from the board were both caused by complicated tax regulations that make it difficult for him to serve openly on two boards. So he’ll serve “non-openly.” Everyone was very happy to see Chrysanthi. From some hints dropped along the trip, I’m suspecting now that the real reason for her reluctance to travel to Greece the last three or four years is chiefly Vouli’s death. Tasos will show us Vouli’s memorial classroom tomorrow. I’m feeling somewhat emotional about my decision to leave the board, which may mean that this will be my very last trip to the Farm School and perhaps to Greece. I have served as a trustee for fifteen years.

Wednesday, June 19, 2013

Information day at the Farm School. Students going to America spoke, as did two who went last year. The one at Skidmore told me he performed in a play there, in English of course: Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream. What role did he play? The Wall! Lovely to see kindergarten and pre-kindergarten children singing to us in English and watering their crops, digging with tiny shovels and filling tiny wheelbarrows. Eleni Giannakou was very much there, working. . . . In the afternoon, to George's. He was hysterical, screaming, weeping, changing subjects, fulminating against his two children, Dimitris and Andreas, and especially against their wives. He gave them everything and they give nothing in return except scorn and further demands, he says. Both are virtually unemployed and without work or income in the crisis. George apparently is devastated by the loss of Efthymoula, which is strange because throughout his married life he always indicated that he had married the wrong person and was trapped in misery. We finally extricated ourselves and returned. Tonight was the annual "Dance Under the Stars: 450 people paying 40 euros each. We paid our 80 euros and sat at a table with Bill McGrew and Lena Stefa and others. Lots of champagne, good steak dinner, western style, music featuring French songs, dancing until 2:00 a.m. We quit at midnight. Bill is almost finished with his history of Anatolia College. He asked about the Marders who, he says, don't answer his e-mails, and about Mike Keeley. I told him the sad news about the former and the rather good news about the latter. Lena left her spectacular waterfront apartment (relatives occupy it) and downsized closer to city center. We reminisced about being together in Australia with Stylianos. . . . A man who was involved with AHEPA and Dr. Barich when I was trying to establish a Kendal here brought me, miraculously, a printed copy of an e-mail I had sent to Barich and others in 2004 about John Diffey's willingness to help. I felt certainly zero sense of the Greek economic crisis tonight as I sipped my second full glass of champagne.

Thursday, June 20, 2013

Long tête-à-tête with Pandelis after breakfast about the harassment policy and other issues philosophical and ethical including my decision to leave the board, partially at least owing to my allegiance to stenosis, “narrowing,” in old age. I cited Kazantzakis, who claimed that he wanted to die with no remaining flesh on his body, just bare bones. Then came the Primary/Secondary Committee, with lots of presentations about pre-k, kindergarten, secondary schools. Then we came to harassment, and the place exploded. John Cleave wants a one- or two-page document with a single policy for the entire institution, instead of separate sections for each of the three main divisions (Primary, Secondary, College). Others agreed. Pano said that he couldn’t have staff revise it and suggested that we do it. I said that I’d coordinate things to arrive at a drafting committee. We’d circulate the result and committee members would suggest changes. But the final revised document, ideally of two pages at most, would be beyond further discussion. Let’s hope! College Committee followed. I spoke about the need for time if they expect faculty to do research. They have no sabbaticals, plus a heavy teaching load: eight classes. I also questioned the current policy of enrolling up to 80% of Greek students and only 20% of foreigners, mentioning the role of reconciliation played by the students from Balkan nations in the past. Not much support, except from Don Schofield. Oh well . . . Foreigners need financial support, up to 14,000 euros a year.

Chrysanthi returned to George this morning. Ellenitsa, our friend from the Deaf School, joined them and drove them to the cemetery to view Efthymoula’s grave. In the afternoon we both went to the Byzantine Museum where I luckily just caught the director to give her my Harkianakis book with the lovely cover of the icon from the museum, the Παναγία Δεξιοκρατούσα. We walked down Tsimiski noting the many closed businesses. Also, coming in by taxi, twice at red lights there was a man with a cup or outstretched hand, begging for coins. And the taxi driver on our return expatiated on the χάλια of Greece and wondered if we expected a third world war precipitated by Syria. . . . Then Takis came. Last night at the Dance Under the Stars we arranged this with Eleni and spoke with her at length about her very positive feelings about her job and the School, thankfully. We went to a fish taverna, the one next to “Miami”—Takis, Brini, Elena, Odysseas, Eleni. The restaurant was full despite Greece’s economic crisis. Long easy talk with Eleni; long easy talk with Brini. Odysseas quite silent but did exchange a bit with Chrysanthi. Eleni wonderfully active and graceful. Easy conversationalist in English as well as Greek. Back at midnight.

Friday, June 21, 2013

Full board. Annie says she's "angry" because I'm leaving the board. Lots of kind words from various fellow trustees. Gondicas suddenly appeared (from Athens). Told me that Mike Keeley is doddering, beginning to decline noticeably from age. Charlotte, thankfully, said she will step down as chair in October. Good! Once again she seemed to forget (!) the Primary/Secondary Committee, but I finally gave my report, the last one. At the very end Manita spoke about the relation of agriculture with values. I followed this with Kazantzakis's poem that is really on the exact same subject: "I went to the acacia and said 'Speak to me of God.' And the acacia blossomed." I'm feeling now that my decision to leave the board after fifteen years is the right one. I'm calling it στένωσις when I try to explain in Greek: a narrowing that I believe, philosophically, is what we should be doing voluntarily as we grow older.

In the evening we went to see Christina and David Willis in their lovely home, garden, and orchard about twenty kilometers east of the School. Tad was there; she lives with them. Son Bruce was there. He just finished his freshman year at Haverford. Their daughter graduated recently from Haverford and then married a Haverford classmate! Bruce is charming, effortlessly bilingual. He did IB at Anatolia College. At Haverford he is one of the "Quaker Bouncers," a team of students who inspect parties and deal with drunkards or near-drunkards. Good idea for Dartmouth. Tad smiles and is coherent, but mostly silent, and moves with difficulty. David told us that she is just a bit senile. I'm reading her autobiography now; it's fascinating, really a biography of the Farm School. David gave us his lecture, with power point, on the School's beliefs and practices, gleaned from Brenda Marder's history. He has surrounded the house with olive trees, grapes, fruit trees, and a large garden. Christina teaches ceramics at the School and does beautiful work of her own. I related my Haverford story to Bruce especially, how I took Hocking's course there, how I majored in music by taking courses in four different institutions. Lovely vegetarian supper (our "fast" day), freshly picked from their garden.

To town to visit Odysseas and Eleni. What a difference from poor, hysterical George! Wonderful Takis drove us. Big surprise: Toula was there, looking good, smiling. Hugs and kisses. Food food food, of course, all on the balcony. Toula naturally asked about Leander. I told her the whole story as best I could. Eleni expatiated on her military service and her mother's incarceration in prison which, she said, wasn't so bad: they got fed and housed, developed things to do, etc. I thought of Charlie Chaplin's famous moment in a movie when he is released from prison and begs the warden to let him stay. Odysseas told details about their home in Μεγάλο Χωριό. It's on the central square, flanked by the village museum, church, taverna. Eleni was born there; the house was destroyed by the Germans but then rebuilt. Why don't we come? Will we ever come? I had to be honest: no, never. We have our own paradise in the Adirondacks. Tearful good-byes. Then to George's again. Happily, Ellenitsa was there. She's the retired head of the School for the Deaf, and it was a pleasure to see her again after so many years. Lots of memories of Αγία Τριάδα together, for example of myself as the man "who was always writing." George was hysterical part of the time regarding Eftymoula and his unfaithful sons, but I tried to divert him via other subjects and various jokes, and actually got him laughing. A woman from Russia (the Caucasus) was there cooking, which makes things easier. More food of course. But finally we escaped, Ellenitsa driving us back to Cincinnati Hall. I should add that Dimitri telephoned, saying he'll send a photo of Marios Karasavas from 1955. But he won't come to see us. Everything is χάλια, no work.

Delicious siesta. Then Nikos Sphairopoulos came with his gracious wife, a periodontist, and two children: Constantinos, in his final year of the lyceum, and beautiful Christina, who is going into the 4th year of elementary school. Such civilized, serene people! I joked with Constantine about coming to America for university. He isn't sure yet regarding what he wants to study. The girl played piano; she studies with Toula and performed last Wednesday in the Odeon's recital. Both husband and wife have good jobs and actually get paid, although less than before. They brought ice cream for everyone. Daughter wanted to see our cows afterwards, and I showed everyone the kindergarten garden and "lake." . . . Then we went to dinner with Tasos and Dora, who remembered that I like chicken livers! They gave me a lovely gift, a paperweight from the Benaki Museum, a replica of an ancient Greek coin with Athena's favorite, the owl, on one side. Katerina Diafa was there with her husband. She's the new head of the schools, replacing Tasos. We wish her well. Three and a half hours of steady and interesting conversation over a delicious dinner in the garden with a full moon overhead. They were all very interested in my adventure of translating Zorba and how I discovered Kazantzakis (the story of my Columbia classmate's vomiting over Christ Recrucified). To bed at 1:45 a.m.

Sunday, June 23, 2013

Takis and Brini came and drove us to the village of Χορτιάτης, where we viewed with horror the memorial to all those slaughtered by the Germans on September 2, 1944 (!), just before the Germans left Greece—the barbarians! Entire families with tiny children included. Then a look at the new rose garden on the Thessaloniki promenade, which is now adorned also with rows of trees and a bicycle path with guide lights. Back to their apartment for a perfect “fast” meal. They've been so good to us.

Monday, June 24, 2013

What a mess! Only last night when I printed our boarding passes did I realize that the travel agent, Judith Flanders, made a terrible mistake with Chrysanthi's return trip, booking her from Thessaloniki to Frankfurt instead of from Thessaloniki to Munich together with me and then of course on a totally different flight that would have gotten her to Boston tomorrow morning instead of tonight. Didn't sleep much last night worrying about this. Tried to call Lufthansa offices but they were closed. This morning Aegean at the airport refused to change Chrysanthi's ticket from Frankfurt to Munich because it was a Lufthansa ticket. I had to purchase a new ticket for €210. Luckily there were seats. Then, in Munich, where luckily we had lots of time, the Lufthansa service center took 1½ hours to process a new ticket and charged me €350 because of change fee plus increased fare owing to lateness of booking. Again, luckily, there were seats on the flight. Chrysanthi vowed never to fly again! All this because of Janet Flanders' sloppiness and also my own neglect in noticing any problem until it was all too obvious on the boarding passes printed last night. But after receiving our new tickets we relaxed and had a nice lunch of meat, breaking our fast at wake-up time in Hanover and enjoying two free hot chocolates given by gracious Lufthansa.

Terpni

To Don and Maria Kurka's for supper. They're renting the Morses' old (palatial) house on Coulter Road. Maria's sister was there, too. She is a pediatrician specializing in kidney disease. Her house burned down in Knoxville a month ago with total loss but no human casualties, since no one was at home at the time. Don did an impressive painting, a version of "The Scream" with two onlookers betraying lack of awareness in different ways. Maria produced a show in Colombia complete with an impressive bilingual catalogue, and will be doing another one in the National Museum there. Lovely to see them, as always.

From a TLS review (May 31, p. 4): "Academics themselves are usually reluctant to reflect on how their intense, obsessive, and often very solitary interests affect those around them. And formal obituaries tend to draw a polite veil over the day-to-day structures and personal relationships that foster or undermine research projects. It is as if all those hours alone with books somehow take place in a social and emotional vacuum." Amen! Written by Mary Beard.

July 13, 2013

Ballet matinee at SPAC with Alec and family. Two special surprises: (1) "Year of the Rabbit" choreographed by Justin Peck. How nice to be introduced to a truly imaginative new choreographer! (2) The Barber Violin Concerto with Arturo Delmonico as violin soloist in a bravura performance. He'll be playing a Webster program at Kendal in April. Even Peter Martins's choreography, which usually I find boring, was quite good.

July 27, 2013

In a review (TLS, July 5, p. 8) of work by Claude Lévi-Strauss: "The modern Western self is constructed from an individual interior perspective outwards; for the Japanese, the self is an internalization of the collective." This reminded me, of course, of the visit to General MacArthur of Elizabeth Gray Vining when she arrived in Tokyo to tutor the emperor's son. Apparently MacArthur told her to inculcate in the crown prince the essence of Americanism. “What is that?” she asked. He answered, “Individualism.”

July 29, 2013

Alec and family left today to return to Bangkok. Very emotional; they are all so exceptional. It's so easy, and energizing, to interact with both Theo and Elena. A great pleasure.

August 7, 2013

Finished mowing the south field. I always say Και του χρόνου and this becomes increasingly problematic as I wonder, truly, whether I will be healthy enough, strong enough, to do the same job next year at age 84.

August 23, 2013

Each day as I walk out to my “office” I am overcome by the exquisite beauty of the south field, now completely mowed, and it is the same when I walk back viewing the cabin and pond. I marvel that somehow this has been granted to me to enjoy in this very deep manner each day.

September 27, 2013

Hanover

Finished the first draft of my Zorba translation and celebrated by having ice cream and hot fudge for dessert.

October 1, 2013

I sent the following letter to James McBride after finishing his novel The Good Lord Bird: Captain Brittles, I knowed something bout the Old Man caus once pon a tyme I were visitor to hisn farm near Lake Placid but I never knowed what I does now thanks to your book I sitted with it every mornin at brakefast and putted a shapter under my belt caus I does noh letters then I sitted agen with it over lunch and putted away another shapter but now darnation I aint got no more shapter to chew caus the Old Man they hanged him darn it but why why oh why the Onion she forgetted to deliver the password so all them bees dont get hived I think it were a mighty good book and my brakefast and lunch is not the same now caus the Old Man got hanged and that were no foolin the end.

October 4, 5, 6, 2013

Lovely weekend with Dan Seeger. We talked and talked, played our old duets, ate, visited with others, and on Sunday morning he spoke wonderfully at Meeting on the Book of Revelation in relationship to us today. He's as bright and individualistic as always.

October 19, 2013

Terpni

Lovely day at the farm. I placed the new plastic sides on the White plus the new screw on its air cleaner. Earl rigged up a hideaway where we have our grape vines. He sits there hidden from the deer and shoots them while they're comfortably grazing in the field. It's hard to think of this as "sport."

Wednesday, October 23, 2013

University of New Hampshire

To UNH for the first time, via Dartmouth Coach to South Station, T to North Station, AMTRAK to Durham, and by foot for a long distance through the huge campus to Three Chimneys Inn, built in 1649, where I stayed. Martin McKinsey met me for supper together with Katerina Kostiou, a woman who teaches at the University of Athens. Dino Siotis, Martin, and I were the speakers, all on Cavafy. I did my piece on translating "31 B.C. in Alexandria" with rhymed or unrhymed verse. Surprised to find a very large audience, full house, lots of students. It was fun.

Thursday, October 24, 2013

To New York City

Martin met me at 5:45 a.m., good soul that he is, to drive me to Portsmouth to catch a 6:30 a.m. bus to New York. This arrived an hour late but I managed to reach the Farm School offices in time for my Primary/Secondary Committee at 2:00 p.m. Sophia was there and spoke well about child molestation and the need for a compliance officer. Robert Uek was also very supportive. The Committee voted action on both the bullying document and the molestation plan. We'll see what happens on Saturday. In the evening I went to my favorite theater, the Mint, and saw their revival of George Kelly's excellent play Philip Goes Forth about a recent college graduate whose father wants him to join the family business whereas the son wants to write plays. They argue, the son goes off to Greenwich Village and, to make a long story short, discovers that he has no talent. Reconciled with the father after he agrees to return home, he enters the family business after all. A very honest ending for this play written in the early 1930s when Astaire and Rogers movies were giving the public the sentimentalized success stories that were welcomed during these depression years.

Friday, October 25, 2013

New York City

Higher Education Committee in the morning. Nice to see Mike Keeley there, walking with a cane but seeming otherwise fairly healthy. He sold his house in Princeton and is in a community, not like Kendal, where he has equity in his apartment and retains his own doctors. I then went to MoMA and through the Magritte exhibit very quickly because I had a luncheon date with Jeff Murphy at 12:30 at the premier restaurant at MoMA, one of the best meals I've ever had: small portions, lots of courses, repeated hors d'oeuvres, waiters changing silverware repeatedly and always scraping for crumbs (which did not exist). And Jeff paid, of course, for this probably very expensive meal. We sat by the glass wall separating us from the Sculpture Garden. A great pleasure. Leisurely, we sat and talked from 12:30 until 3:00. Then I walked quickly to the Frick Collection to see the special exhibit from Holland, a lovely Vermeer, several small Rembrandts—plus of course my favorite in the regular collection, El Greco's "Saint Jerome." 7:30 p.m. at Thalassa Restaurant on Franklin Street for an unexceptional Greek meal but chance to mingle informally with trustees, probably the last time I'll do this.

Saturday, October 26, 2013

New York City

A very full, special day. At the meeting of the full board in the morning our statement on bullying passed with some misgivings and with a promise to let me see the Greek translation (which I suspect will include various changes). Our minute on pedophilia, however, did not pass, especially because of our call for the appointment of a compliance officer. But the administration promised to bring an adjusted proposal to the March meeting. All in all, Sophia and I were pleased and not too disappointed. For me, the most pleasant part was my "elevation" to Honorary Trustee. Mike Keeley and I now share this honor. John Cleave, of all people, had prepared an encomium, mentioning even my work in making Brenda Marder's history readable and grammatical. All this was of course very pleasing. Fifteen years! Mike said privately that I'd done the right thing in stepping down.

Then a bit of an adventure taking the subway to Brooklyn, always a sort of foreign territory for me. But I managed to find the "Theater for a New Audience," also called the Polonsky Shakespeare Center, and saw there a brilliant performance of A Midsummer Night's Dream, marvelously inventive and humorous with the poetry excellently spoken, with Puck flying through the sky, scores of children playing angels, etc. An extreme pleasure. . . . Finally, Farm School banquet where I was invited (and treated) by Manita. She told me more about the granddaughter, who now admits that she was raped after being drugged at a Dartmouth fraternity. But she did not become pregnant, at least. I later sent the whole sad story to Dartmouth's new president, who is meant to do something about our continuing "animal house." It was nice to meet again the AFS graduate who is now attending Princeton (having been rejected by Dartmouth). He hopes to study architecture. Lucky boy, thanks to the Farm School, which found him in a small Macedonian village.

Sunday, October 27, 2013

New York City

By subway to 116th Street. To Morningside Meeting, chiefly to see Vince Buscemi. He's fine but now walks with a cane. I introduced myself as usual there as "cofounder" of that Meeting. A man called Andy Von Salis came to say hello; he turned out to be the son of Jane Von Salis of Kendal. I went to see 414 West 121 Street. Still there but everything else has changed on the street because of new Columbia buildings. . . . Lots of good cheese purchased at Murray's. Dartmouth Coach leaving for home at 4:30 p.m.

November 8, 2013

Finished the second draft of Zorba. But I'm going to read the whole thing over once more, quickly, before sending it to Niki. Leslie English and Nikos Mathioudakis also want to see it at this stage. And Joan Snell is still helping me with Mme. Hortense's French accent.

November 22, 2013

Finished the re-reading but still haven't done anything more with Mme. Hortense's French pronunciation.

Sunday, November 24, 2013

Baltimore

Leander and family met us at the train station and took us to the Ikaria restaurant in Baltimore's "Greektown." Long talk with the owner, whose mustache showed me how Zorba could always be twisting his. His sister, delightfully friendly, brought us desserts on the house and treated us as well to hugs and kisses when we left. Lovely atmosphere; authentic food. On Fridays they have the best bouzouki player one can ever hear, says Leander, but not on Sundays.

Leander's

I went into town to the National Gallery to visit the Byzantine show there, quickly because I'll go again tomorrow with Chrysanthi. Clearly the best presentation of Byzantium's 1000 years that I've ever seen. Beautiful mosaic from Serres, lots about Thessaloniki's Rotunda and sixth-century churches. Graphics showing the waxing and waning of the empire's borders. Of course the Gallery building itself is impressive, especially the rotunda with its black columns, evocative, I suppose, of the glory and might of the USA. A room full of El Greco paintings was added pleasure, including a Saint Jerome, this time nude! Also the famous Laocoön. . . . I went down the street to the Archives afterwards and fought the crowds gaping at the Declaration of Independence, Constitution, Bill of Rights. The small exhibits were not so crowded, thankfully. A video of Eisenhower speaking; movies of Teddy Roosevelt banging his fist to emphasize important points. On the subway both ways I read in Karen Armstrong's In the Beginning, a liberal interpretation of Genesis—fascinating. She even stresses how mean and cruel God is to allow Noah to kill everyone, the innocent as well as the guilty. After supper, Leander played the Mozart four-hand F major sonata with me, the one I'm doing with Stan Udy, stressing that it's Mozart's masterpiece in this mode, and sufficiently difficult (as we well know). He showed me relationships between secondo and primo that I'd never noticed and that must be emphasized in the playing. Then we dashed to a nearby restaurant to hear Sophia and a dozen classmates, all in high heels and black dresses, sing a cappella for the school's golf team's end of season celebration. They do well, staying on pitch. Sophia received, earlier in the day, a letter from the University of Vermont accepting her. I read the essay she submitted on all applications, about how her experience in Honduras of abject poverty affected her: well written and well conceived, much better than Christina's essay on why she wants to be a scientist.

Tuesday, November 26, 2013

Marina Hall fetched us for lunch. We both knew Kimon Friar and both received letters from him, hers mostly asking her to send vitamin pills, mine mostly literary. She sent me copies of hers and I presented her today with copies of mine, which I had forgotten about until she wrote earlier in the year about her association with Kimon. She and her friend Costas drove us to the interesting home in Chevy Chase near the Walter Reed Hospital and the National Institutes of Health where her husband, Dr. Hall, worked until he died of a stroke in his fifties. We had mousakas, wine, and full dessert: the works. Good conversation. Costas is quite sure that as a teenager in Nigrita he had some contact with Chrysanthi's father. Small world. He came to university here and never returned, like so many. Marina filled in the story of her contact with Kimon, and of course with Thanasis Maskaleris, when she and her husband lived in San Francisco. We both elaborated on Kimon's energy and κέφι as well as on his very bad luck in life. . . . Chrysanthi and I then continued to the National Gallery to see the Byzantine exhibit, I for the second time. This time I noticed a very helpful piece of information on one of the placards—namely that “Virgin” is a Catholic and Protestant designation for Mary, whereas Orthodox Christians say “All-Holy” (Παναγία), “God-bearer” (Θεοτόκος), or “Mother of God” (Μήτηρ Θεού). Thus I changed all instances of “Virgin” in my translation to one of the customary terms in Orthodoxy.

Wednesday, November 27, 2013

Played my Mozart four-hand sonata with Leander. What a difference! If only Stan Udy could come to Kinhaven and receive such superb coaching with me, we would utterly transform the piece. Then Leander and I went to a deli and had chopped chicken liver (for me) and pastrami (for him), the way it used to be: sandwiches three inches high. . . . An e-mail reminded me that I'm supposed to write a Kazantzakis article for the forthcoming Oxford Encyclopedia of the Bible and the Arts, and it's due on Monday! . . . I took everyone out for supper, celebrating Sophia's admission to UVM and also to Ohio Wesleyan, her top two choices.

Thursday, November 28, 2013

Thanksgiving

Started writing my Oxford Encyclopedia essay based on a lecture I gave long ago on Kazantzakis's religious vision. Another long session with Leander on the Mozart. The piece is so moving, so intellectually scintillating, one of Mozart's best. Afterwards, inviting Chrysanthi, Deanna, and the children, we “performed.” Most was OK but I muffed some places yet nevertheless always got back in satisfactorily, without stopping. . . . Lovely turkey dinner, as always. Alec telephoned from Bangkok, Daphne from California.

December 7, 2013

Supper at Shawn Donovan's to welcome Bob Schultz into Hanover Meeting. Lots of eager pleasant talking for three hours.

December 8, 2013

The ending of D. H. Lawrence's poem on bats is memorable:

Creatures that hang themselves up like an old rag, to sleep;
And disgustingly upside down.
Hanging upside down like rows of disgusting old rags
And grinning in their sleep.
Bats!

December 12, 2013

Christina was rejected by Haverford. She's weeping continuously. Waiting now to hear from Northeastern. . . . Leslie English has already copy-edited Zorba very helpfully but doesn't like what I did with Hortense's accent, and is probably correct in this.

December 18, 2013

Christina was deferred by Northeastern while Sophia was accepted by a third college, Lafayette, and offered $70,000 in scholarship aid. Daphne writes, "The nightmare continues."

Last night the Quaker 8s were here. I gave them the following passage from the basket: "Schleiermacher defined religion as 'feeling and taste for the infinite.' . . . Surely a religious sense is something other than formally professed religion. [It is] devotion to the mystery of creation . . ." —Thomas Mann, Dr. Faustus. This worked well. I elaborated, of course, on Kierkegaard's brilliant analysis using the categories of the aesthetic, the ethical, and the religious. I wanted to say, also, that I think my refusal to post my farmland derives ultimately from my "devotion to the mystery of creation" that tells me I really do not own this land but am merely a very temporary occupier along with the extraordinary number of other creatures, not to mention plants, on it.

December 24, 2013

Drove to the farm. Alec and family arrived two days ago. Their cabin is now comfortably warm. Leander and family arrived yesterday and their well-insulated house is, if anything, too hot. We checked in at the Goose Pond B&B in North Creek, a crazy place stuffed to the gills with everything imaginable, including two large parrots. Lovely dinner at Leander's celebrating Chrysanthi's birthday. I gave her adjustable ski poles. Deanna made a cake with a single candle. Lots of good cheer.

December 25, 2013, Christmas

Everyone (except me)—even Chrysanthi—went sledding down the slope to our frozen pond and across the pond. We played all sorts of word games at Alec's and finally had a feast of turkey and all the trimmings around our ancestral Biedermeier dinner table, which seats ten people with ease. Earlier, exchange of presents, lots for each of the children, of course, and enough for each of the adults. I of course got a box of fancy dark chocolates.

December 26, 2013

Alec and Monica left early for Latham, New York, to get Monica fingerprinted for a renewed green card. We drove home in slight snow, nothing serious, and had a pleasant supper with Tom and Joan Wilson following lunch with Robert and Penny Binswanger, their son Morgan, and his luscious partner (or wife?).

December 27, 2013

I started re-reading my journal again, having finished Zorba. I'm up to 1953. Am spending more time practicing piano: Mozart's four-hand sonata in F major, which Stan Udy and I are scheduled to perform in February; Bach's "Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme," and Handel's Sarabande, both for Len Cadwallader's Interfaith Gathering on January 19th; first movement of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony for eight-hands to be performed in February, plus Bach and Haydn with Dick and Allan.

December 31, 2013

Mats Lemberger was here yesterday. We had him and Carrie Rosenblum for supper at Kendal (they're dating). A lovely reunion. He is doing better now with machine-graded exams and expects to have A's and B's in all his courses. Carrie thinks, as do I, that he should do the full two-year course and end with an M.S., enabling him to teach science in a secondary school, instead of quitting after the first year and returning to medical school for the second or third try. But he dreams of doing family practice as a physician.

Today I had them both meet with Tom Pike, whom I am hoping to send to the Farm School as an intern next academic year. He has majored in Ancient Greek and Latin. They of course were able to give him a better picture of the intern's life at the School. We'll see now if he sends in his application.

No New Year's party at the Rassiases this year. We had a fine supper at Kendal with the Spiegels and Powells. No snails, of course, but lobster and veal plus multiple desserts.

Another beautiful meal, at noon, with Lappins and Gilsons. Stuffed. Then at 5:30 to Ruth Stanton’s for her traditional chopped chicken liver and fellowship with various friends.

January 2, 2014

I found the following quote from Whitehead’s Science and the Modern World in my journal for 1955, January 16, on shipboard bound for England. “A single tree by itself is dependent upon all the adverse chances of shifting circumstances. A forest is the triumph of the organization of mutually dependent species. Each tree may lose something of its individual perfection of growth, but they mutually assist each other in preserving the conditions for survival.” We should have this written out in beautiful script and mounted on our wall at the farm.

January 4–7, 2014

Wonderful visit here at Kendal by Alec, Monica, Theo, and Elena. Everyone remarked on Alec’s resemblance to me. One woman even asked if Alec’s mother had not been Chrysanthi because, she avowed, he had no Greek features. Alec knew so many people at Kendal, it seemed, often because he'd gone to school with their children. He and his family all gained some appreciation of the wonderful life that Chrysanthi and I enjoy at Kendal, via numerous meals, attending the Professors' Colloquium, interacting with friends like Weezie and Avery, etc. I gave them an extensive tour of Dartmouth, obviously also part of our lives. Three years from now, or four at most, Theo will be thinking of tertiary education. It seems clear that when Elena finishes Patana in six years, then enrolls in a university presumably in America, Alec and Monica will resign their positions and return to their Adirondack cabin at least at the start. I'll then be 90 if I'm still alive, Chrysanthi 87.

A full day. In the morning: Interfaith Gathering with Leonard Cadwalader as officiant and Peter Bien on piano playing "Wachet auf" as prelude and a Handel serenade as postlude plus two hymns, without nerves. Len spoke very well, and very appropriately for the Martin Luther King holiday, which is tomorrow. His text was Romans 13:10–12, as translated by me from the Greek. Then lunch with Len, Mary Ann, Carol Armstrong (who lost her husband two weeks ago), Dick and Margaret Powell. At 1:30 Simone Dinnerstein arrived with her husband and son. She prepared the piano for Crumb and at 3:00 began a spectacular recital introduced by me telling people to listen to the lower voice in counterpoint: Bach's fifteen two-part inventions, a piece composed for Simone by Nico Muhly, George Crumb's "Eine kleine Mitternachtsmusik" for amplified piano—plucking strings, banging with a mallet, counting 1 to 12 out loud in Italian. Long, a bit tedious, but a new experience for all of us. Finally, Beethoven's last piano sonata, no. 32, opus 111, played better than I've ever heard it, exhibiting Beethoven the madman while still being rational. Then drinks followed by supper with Ruth and Fred Lappin and Rogers and Sung Elliott, very pleasantly. Then to the music room to practice our four-hand Mozart sonata with Stan Udy, which is getting better and better. I know the first movement well enough now to play it without counting. Finally, back to the apartment just before 9:00 p.m. in time for the Danton Abbey serial on TV. Last of all, tasting the σηκωτόπιτα that Chrysanthi made just for me.

Kazantzakis, cited in Elli Alexiou, p. 162: Ο άνθρωπος πρέπει προτού φύγει να κάμει τρία πράγματα: να φυτέψει τουλάχιστο ένα δέντρο, να γεννήσει τουλάχιστο ένα παιδί, και να γράψει τουλάχιστο ένα βιβλίο. Well, I haven't done too badly judging from these three criteria.

I sent this letter to Stylianos: Τα νέα σου, πως υποφέρεις από depression και δε γράφεις ποιήματα, μας πικραίνουν πολύ. Θυμάμαι μια φορά που μου έλεγες πως μονάχα με το γράψιμο ποιημάτων κατάφερες να διατηρείς την πνευματική σου υγεία. Εμείς οι καθηγητές πανεπιστημίου πάντα διατηρούσαμε τη δική μας πνευματική υγεία επειδή μπορούσαμε να φύγουμε από την τάξη για τρεις μήνες κάθε καλοκαίρι. Μήπως κι εσύ θα μπορούσες να χαρείς ένα τέτοιο sabbatical μακριά από τη δολοπλοκία των λεγομένων Χριστιανών στους Αντίποδες, ίσως στην Κρήτη κοντά στα βουνά, θάλασσα, φρούτα, σταφύλια και φυσικά μεγαλεία των παιδικών σου χρόνων; Θα βοηθούσε μήπως αν μπορούσες να γράφεις ποιήματα πάνω στο θέμα της αθυμίας σου; Γνώρισα έναν διάσημο οικονομολόγο που, μαθαίνοντας ότι είχε καρκίνο άρχισε να γράφει κάθε μέρα ένα σονέττο πάνω στα συμπτώματά του και έτσι νίκησε την αθυμία. Θα προπαθήσω να βρω ένα αντίτυπο να σου το στείλω. Πάντως, σου ευχόμαστε με τη Χρυσάνθη τη δύναμη, το κέφι και το σθένος που χρειάζεσαι τώρα και που ξέρουμε ότι θα βρεις. Με αγάπη.

New York City

Arrived at the Yale Club at 11:30 a.m. via Dartmouth Coach. To MoMA. Saw the extensive Isa Genzken retrospective and also the show dedicated to the gallery owner Ileana Sonnabend, but most importantly the exhibit on Frank Lloyd Wright's view of the city: "density vs. dispersal." Genzken, a sculptor, favors cheap, shiny materials and was especially motivated by the atrocities of 9-11. She's what is called an "assemblage artist" and is clearly "unmonumental," antiheroic, and assuredly feminine. Sonnabend, whose gallery was in Paris in the 1960s, made American pop art known in Europe. The best work on view was by Rauschenberg, whose retrospective in the National Gallery in Washington showed me how important and impressive he was. Once again, MoMA here was highlighting a woman whose taste affected art history. But the Frank Lloyd Wright show was the most interesting for Chrysanthi and me.

He decried “density” in cities like New York and created a model for a city spread out, “dispersed,” with very few multistory buildings and lots of park space. On the other hand, he once dreamed of building a skyscraper one mile high! The many drawings by him on view gave evidence not only of his imagination and vision but also of his assiduity, so often an overlooked virtue of genius. . . . Then to 1230 6th Avenue, the very familiar seat of Simon and Schuster, the same that I frequented in the 1960s and Daphne in the late 1980s and early 1990s. Suzanne Donahue kept us waiting a half hour, being in a meeting, but we then had a cordial and informative visit. I introduced Chrysanthi to her as “Daphne’s mother,” since Suzanne, an old-timer, remembers Daphne and Fred Hills very clearly. I learned from her that Niki Stavrou does intend to pay me and indeed in the grand amount of $15,000. The delay has been caused by factors not really in Niki’s control, but the impediments will disappear and I will receive the money without fail. Hooray! Secondly, she informed me that the new Zorba will be published on February 18, 2015, this date of course being the anniversary of Kazantzakis’s birth in 1883. But S&S will advertise the book in 2014, its own 90th anniversary year. On February 18 there will be an “affair” in the Library of Congress. Suzanne has read some of my translation and finds a few places, very few, where she hopes the prose can be simplified. I’ll get all the details when the full copyediting is completed. So, things are clearer now than they were before. Also, she definitely wants my introduction in the front matter because I explain why this new translation was necessary. . . . Dinner across the street from Lincoln Center. Every seat taken, mostly by ballet and opera goers. Then to our first of three successive nights of ballet. These ballets this time with no orchestra in the pit. The first, called “La Stravaganza” with music by Vivaldi alternating with horrid squeaks and scratches, both “performed” electronically. Two groups of dancers, one dressed formally, the other slovenly. Strangely, the slovenly ones dance to Vivaldi, the formal ones to the squeaks and scratches. Not to my taste at all. But no. 2, with music by Leonard Bernstein (just clarinet and piano on stage) and choreography by Christopher Wheeldon, was much better: a lovely pas de deux danced by Tiler Peck and her husband, Robert Fairchild, and dedicated appropriately to Jerome Robbins. No. 3, called “Todo Buenos Aires,” featured a band on stage playing tango music by Piazzolla. But the choreography, by Peter Martins, was what one expects from Martins, alas—namely mediocrity. So, our first night wasn't the best to be sure, but it demonstrated the company's bravery to do new ballets in an attempt, somehow, to get beyond Balanchine.

New York City

A very fine day in many ways. Worked in the library in the morning, vetting my journal, now up to 1994. At 11:30 Burt Pike came and we spent two hours together over lunch. He and I are both healthy in mind and body. He has just been teaching Proust to adults and will continue with various involvements. We both lamented the plight of Constance Tagopoulos in Athens. But he says that if she had remained at Queens College she would no longer have a job there either—just as in Greece. Then to the play that Chrysanthi kept urging me not to book because we had seen it so many times, Waiting for Godot. But, I told her, we haven't seen it with an actor of the stature of Ian McKellen playing Estragon. And it was marvelous, she being the first to recognize this. It is of course natural to theater that every production is different and some better than others. The same with musical performances, of course. This production was continually funny together with the sadness. Both tramps were splendid, Potso and Lucky less so but still perfectly OK. The play, so obvious today, is extraordinarily brilliant not only in its overall conception but in so many of its details. Chrysanthi asked me afterwards what its meaning is. I replied that perhaps the best way is to remember that it was written just after World War II and Becket's vicissitudes therein. Humans can be like Potso and Lucky, tyrants and slaves, or they can basically love each other despite all impediments, as do the two tramps, who stay together in mutual support despite life's meaninglessness. . . . Supper this time more sensibly in the Food Court of Grand Central Station. Then to our second night of ballet, very different from last night, if only owing to a full orchestra in the pit. For me, the largest pleasure and surprise came from "Acheron," with music by Poulenc and choreography by Liam Scarlett. The music was Poulenc's "Concerto for Organ, Strings, and Timpani," thus very different. Tiler Peck and Robert Fairchild danced again, plus two other stellar couples. The whole was continually soothing, peaceful, perhaps hieratic owing to the organ. Then came "Afternoon of a Faun" to Debussy's music, of course, and choreography by Jerome Robbins based on the famous Nijinsky original from 1912. Danced superbly this time by Craig Hall and Janie Taylor.

New York City

Nice long lunch with Michael Groden and also his wife, Molly Peacock, whom I had never met before. She's very lively, and a published poet. Mike has just retired. He is writing his memoirs, how one becomes devoted to James Joyce, starting, he says, in my class at Dartmouth. We'll visit them in Toronto. Then to Astor Place to the downtown Public Theater on Lafayette Street to see Antony and Cleopatra. Well acted, although perhaps Cleopatra's infinite variety was a bit hidden in the Afro-American actress who played her. The plot is so familiar to me, but more owing to Cavafy than Shakespeare. Antony, insisting against all advice to fight by sea at Actium, is exasperating. Back to the Yale Club for our usual shared lambchop dinner there served by our friend Angela. Then to our final night of ballet. I neglected to note that last night we also saw Balanchine's "Walpurgisnacht" to Gounod's music, not very memorable, and the Ravel/Balanchine "La Valse," which the company hasn't performed for many years. Although the music thrills me, I was not especially thrilled by this ballet, half of which is not even danced to "La Valse" but rather to "Valse Nobles et Sentimentales." The "hit" last night remained "Acheron." Tonight the "hit" was clearly the Verdi/Robbins "Four Seasons," beautifully and sometimes humorously evoking winter, spring, summer, and fall in that order—winter with the corps all in white feigning coldness, spring in green, summer very languidly in yellow, and fall in the multicolor farrago of fallen leaves. This was preceded by "Bal de Couture" to uninspired choreography (as usual) by Peter Martins, and then by Wheeldon's "Danse à Grande Vitesse," which, like all of Wheeldon's work, is truly different and imaginative. Of the three performances we attended, surely the most memorable single ballet was "Afternoon of a Faun."

New York City

This morning was a real treat: the Futurism exhibit at the Guggenheim. I of course knew that Kazantzakis experienced Marinetti and his extravagances in Naples around 1924 but I never realized that Futurism produced many very fine painters in Italy, although they eventually seemed to align themselves with fascism, Mussolini, and war. They said, in effect, "Don't paint flowers and sunsets; paint locomotives, paint speedy print machines." And they did, with striking results. To see so many of these forgotten works all together, arranged chronologically, was a great pleasure.

Hanover

After so much culture in New York last week, we returned to the Dartmouth Symphony last night bravely doing “Firebird” and “Pictures at an Exposition,” and today Borodin’s opera “Prince Igor” in the Met’s HD series. A surfeit of culture, to be sure!

March 17, 2014

Very nice visit from Taveephol Chardtumrong (alias Pong), who said that he traveled from DC to Hanover chiefly to see me. He is the Thai student who graduated from Patana, where he had studied since age 8, and then from Dartmouth six or seven years ago. I was impressed, knowing him while he was at Dartmouth, that he had twice served temporarily as a Buddhist monk. When children do this, they win “merit” for their parents in this life and the afterlife. Upon graduation he secured a job in banking in Hong Kong, doing corporate mergers. Tonight the first thing he told me was that he had resigned. He is now unemployed, enjoying an interim period (without financial worries, I imagine), making peace with an ex-girlfriend in Washington, and wondering what to do next in his life. Apparently the last place in which he expects to settle is Thailand. What he needs is a good wife and a few children.

March 18, 2014

Christina, who was so devastated by being rejected by Haverford, has now been accepted at Scripps, which is just as selective, and wait-listed at Colorado College, accepted at Northeastern and others. Sophia, accepted everywhere, is probably going to choose between Ohio Wesleyan and the University of Vermont.

March 20, 2014

James McBride is here with his band after being unable to come owing to snow on February 5—four musicians, his younger brother, a driver, a tech man. They set up amplifiers and microphones for an hour, then shared supper with about fifteen of us, including Becky Smith. One of them said the fastest grace we had ever heard, like a machine gun firing. I introduced James, reading the letter I had written him in dialect after finishing his book. He recited four or five different passages after each of which the band played and sang an appropriate spiritual, with James playing his sax. One of these caused Becky to shed tears because it recalled something in her early life. The music was deep but also joyous. Kendal rocked! He said very complimentary things about Chrysanthi and me and especially about our children. What a fine act of friendship, especially considering how little ($1750.00) I was able to pay him. Lots of book-signing afterwards, and a chance to talk at some length with Sheilagh Smith, also the child of a black father and a white mother, like James. James was entirely open about the sadness of his divorce and the burden of the large alimony payment he needs to transmit each month. His great pleasure is going each week to the project in Brooklyn where he spent his childhood and giving pro bono music lessons to the children there. In his retirement he hopes to move back to this lower-class all-black project. He also stated that whenever he finishes a book he has very little interest in it any longer. Thus all his forced interviews and talks about The Good Lord Bird pain him; indeed in order to decrease his speaking time on such occasions he developed this “show” with the band and spirituals, where he can play his saxophone instead of reading from the book. I feel the same way about Kazantzakis most of the time. I mentioned to him my chagrin owing to Leander’s failure to continue composing, because he does have a good talent in this area. He transferred this time to fatherhood, I mentioned. James replied, “And what is more important? Surely fatherhood!” Amen, I suppose.

April 12, 2014

Beautiful Webster Performance by Arturo Delmoni, violinist extraordinaire, and Nina Siniakova, pianist, both employed by the New York City Ballet, he as concertmaster, she as pianist for warm-ups before performance. It was like being in Carnegie Hall listening to a world-famous virtuoso. And he did the Bach Chaconne!

Sunday, April 13, 2014

Quite a morning. Felitsa Makedon telephoned last night. The only time we could see her was for breakfast this morning. So we sat most pleasantly with her and Otmar and a nephew who lives in the Philippines with his father, Felitsa’s brother. Felitsa is the same: garrulous, lively, very smart, very connected with everyone of importance, etc., etc. We joked about going to Greece only if she can provide us with business class tickets. Otmar in retirement is still helping the Chinese in Beijing. He told me that the E.U. was well aware in 1981 that all the Greek data were false but decided that they could fix things nevertheless and thus admitted Greece to membership. . . . Then we raced to Newport to attend the Palm Sunday service in the Greek church. Saw Helene Rassias there and Sandra and Dimitris Tselepidakis and Phidias Dantos and his wife, Alice, who greeted me with multiple kisses and started reciting the Greek she had learned from our book. The priest is a black Kenyan, very lively. His English sounded like Greek to me; apparently when he got excited he lapsed into Swahili. His overly long homily concerned why Jesus entered Jerusalem on a donkey, not a horse! Afterwards, fish lunch and lots of talk from Phidias, who says he is becoming a pacifist in old age.

April 16, 2014

I'm about finished with Bill McGrew's fascinating history of Anatolia College, which I'm reading for the prospective publisher. It makes me understand and appreciate for the first time what brave people the nineteenth-century Protestant missionaries were, and what they endured. It also makes me understand better the vicissitudes experienced by the American Farm School. In his Chapter Ten he nicely summarizes the nature of Greek governance, as follows: "Although the severe controls on private education introduced at this time [early 1980s] reflected the zeal of PASOK's reformers, they also illustrate long-standing features of Greek governance. Upon its liberation from Ottoman rule, the country had adopted the continental European model, which concentrated vast authority in the state as the embodiment of nationhood and the paramount force for achieving goals of survival and expansion. The state mechanism evolved in subsequent decades to monopolize a wide range of powers and functions while also providing the primary source of employment. To the popular mind, the state's broad authority was largely unquestioned, irrespective of how effectively it performed public services. Education, in particular, was viewed as a social good to which every citizen was entitled, not to be sold on the market but provided by the state. Public schools were entrusted to transmit Greece's cultural heritage and shape the values and loyalties of its citizens. This outlook, of course, contrasted with the American concept of central government as a necessary but imperfect and even potentially harmful force requiring limitations on its power and functions and the entitlement of a host of private and regional agencies to serve the general well-being and to provide services such as education.”

April 26–27, 2014

A busy weekend. On Saturday Kesaya had us with fifty others to a catered supper at Kendal (which I arranged) to celebrate Chris’s seventieth birthday. Nice to meet his sister, who has been living in Dublin but says that she’s been unable to read Joyce’s Ulysses. I offered her the chart and my notes. At the same time, Jennifer Karsten, executive director of Pendle Hill, arrived. Rose Miller and Carol Armstrong took her to supper, thankfully, and we met afterwards and again at breakfast on Sunday. Then to Meeting, where Hope Rennie took charge of her and I retreated (after playing hymns) to Kendal because of Bill Benson’s Interfaith Gathering, very “formal” in Roman Catholic style, on doubting Thomas’s refusal to recognize the posthumous Jesus until he had touched the wounds. Drewry Logan played Schubert and Bach nicely. Then lunch with all concerned. Then hurried to the Black center for Così fan tutte, splendidly done by the Met. Jennifer got there in time; so did Chrysanthi, driven from an art class in Lyme. I arrived exactly as James Levine raised his baton. What a joyous opera, with Mozart’s miraculous music never faltering. Then to Kendal for a supper for Jennifer with fourteen other Quakers and her good account of Pendle Hill’s actuality and its future hopes.

April 28, 2014

Pleasant breakfast with Jennifer. I gave her my Harkianakis book as a remembrance. Then we visited with Margery Walker for an hour, so Jen could meet a previous executive director of Pendle Hill. Finally, a quick tour of the Orozco murals, of course. In the afternoon: dentist, two gold crowns. . . . Last Friday I finished dealing with the copyediting for Zorba. S&S objected to “paws,” “human,” “viscera.”

April 29, 2014

Harvey Cox spoke at Dartmouth about his meeting with Pope Francis and the recent sanctification of two former popes. In the question period I asked if sanctification might happen for Dorothy Day and he said, “Yes, it’s entirely possible although she wouldn’t want it.” I thought to myself, “That precisely is the nature of her sanctity.” Afterwards, Avery

Post mentioned that Pope Francis might appoint a woman as a new cardinal (cardinals apparently are not required to be priests) and that a likely candidate will be Mary Robinson. This brought back, of course, our visit to Mary Robinson when she was president of Ireland and subsequently my pleasant contact with her when she visited Dartmouth a few years later. But probably, like Dorothy Day, Mary Robinson would not crave the honor.

May 17, 2014

To Cambridge for a marvelous production at the A.R.T. of The Tempest. Lunch previously with Tom Akstens and Suzanne Murtha. He is skin and bones after heart surgery and has been fired from his job at Sienna after decades of teaching there as an adjunct. Sad. She, too, is discouraged. Her yoga class had only three students. They contemplate moving to Rhode Island, selling the house in Bakers Mills if they can, and starting over, somehow. He applied for a position elsewhere and was shortlisted once but not hired. Not even shortlisted in most places. Such capable, decent people! So sad.

May 29, 2014

Chrysanthi completely forgot my birthday yesterday although all three children remembered, as did even Demetrios Yiannakos and Andreas, George, and various other friends who sent email messages. Andreas's son Georgakis telephoned; he is applying to university. But the other day, to balance the sadness of Chrysanthi's failure, I received an unexpected letter from a student who graduated in 1967, Ted Haynes. "I am writing to substantiate that you changed and enriched my life much for the better and to thank you for it these many years later. I came to Dartmouth planning to major in engineering but found, after two years, that the courses I enjoyed most were Professor Crawford's course on Chaucer and your freshman introductory English course. I've always imagined that you yourself read my freshman essay on choosing between a rational approach to life and a romantic one, exemplified by the author's description of his passion for Italy. My fantasy is that you recognized some budding talent or at least inclination in the essay and had me assigned to your course. There were certainly apt students in that class and some of them went on to graduate school in English. I became an English major and, though I went on to business school (Stanford) and a career in Silicon Valley, I continued to enjoy reading and discussing books. I told myself, not believing it 100%, that when I retired I would write. I have made it come true and have enjoyed the writing immensely. My books have received good reviews and respectable sales, at least in the State of Oregon. While I am proud of the stories in On the Road from Burns I don't expect you to actually read them. But I hope you will accept the book as one fruit of the tree you planted and as a token of my heartfelt and lifelong appreciation."

Toronto

Picked up at the airport by Spyros Parashis, from Zacinthos, long resident in Toronto, and his son, a first-year university student, looking somewhat oriental because his mother was half-Japanese. The city is being "developed" by numerous high-rise apartments and office buildings, with no care for new roads or other traffic aids, resulting in daily gridlock. Sad. Another "rape" of a once-livable area, like Thessaloniki. Imbroglia in the hotel because Voula, who arranged everything supposedly, didn't do it with sufficient care so that she could pay the bill. Spyros took us to a lovely street (the old Toronto) six blocks away and we lunched in a sunny courtyard very pleasantly. We'd been up since 5:00 a.m. and were hungry. Lots of talk with Spyros half in Greek half in English about life here, the Greek community of 200,000, previous lectures—e.g., on the worldview of Kazantzakis's Odyssey. Then we took a very long taxi ride to the apartment of Michael Groden and Molly Peacock, next door to a huge market like the Reading Market in Philadelphia, mobbed on this Saturday afternoon. Their flat is tiny, stuffed with books, one cat (the other cat died last Wednesday). They never had children. Separate study space for each of them; nice view over the city. Good talk for several hours, somewhat literary of course. Molly, like Mike, publishes, in her case both poetry and prose. Mike recited how ill at ease he had felt at Dartmouth as a non-athletic lower middle class intellectual among the usual blond blue-eyed he-men. But he received a good education, he affirmed, and switched from science to English literature on account of Dartmouth's influence, including mine, of course, since he ended up specializing in Joyce. We then walked the short way to the lakefront, saw an artificial sandy beach created over concrete and filled with young folks in bathing suits. Then to a fancy hotel with a restaurant at the very top overlooking the whole city. But when we arrived there, on the 38th floor, Chrysanthi's acrophobia convinced the rest of us to go back down again despite our reservation there for supper. So we piled into a taxi and went to another place near the Anglican cathedral, a lovely outdoor restaurant in which a wedding had just concluded and the exquisite bride was still visible in her finery. We all had marvelous pasta served elegantly, with continued good fellowship and talk, after which we had the new experience of using the Toronto subway to the Museum station and then walking the short distance along Avenue Road to our hotel.

Toronto

A full, lovely day. I telephoned the Toronto Meeting and received full directions, just a fifteen-minute walk from the hotel. We left early and thus had time before the 11:00 a.m. service to stop at the Music School on Bloor Street West to listen to a choir singing "Adoramus Dei" beautifully and children scurrying to lessons holding their half-size violins. Also peeked into the adjacent Museum with the huge dinosaur skeleton in full view at the entrance. At Meeting I discovered that a woman was about to go to Woodbrooke as Friend in Residence. She told me that the rooms are now filled with diverse people who are wonderful partners at meals. In other words, Woodbrooke operates as a B&B, it seems. No more sleeping guests from the Selly Oak Colleges, which is the way we knew it. Meeting was basically silent. I discovered later that Keith Mattock, whom I had hoped to see, was not present although he usually comes every Sunday. A gentleman to whom I spoke remembered Liz Kamphausen with pleasure and admiration, and was well aware of her bad experiences in Toronto with a Lesbian partner who abandoned her. Walking back, we stopped on the same lovely street where we had lunched yesterday and again had an outdoor meal of bacon and eggs. All these restaurants seem to have an abundance of beautiful young girls in snappy uniforms as servers. Back at the hotel, met Voula, who had arranged my visit. Drove to Greektown, specifically to the Μακεδονικό Πολιτιστικό Κέντρο with its large murals and photos of Παύλος Μελάς everywhere, and of Thessaloniki's White Tower in 1905, then in the water and surrounded by a fortress wall. I gave my lecture on Kazantzakis as letter writer, growing very moved (as usual) at the emotional spots. People seemed to like that, commenting afterward that they appreciated my involvement with the material and were relieved not to be subjected once again to the usual academic stink. Long, tasty supper afterwards in a Greek restaurant. A lovely young lady sitting opposite me told me that she was reading the Iliad in translation, but not the Kazantzakis-Kakridis version (of course), the Maronitis one. I'll send her my Iliad notes and how to purchase Simone Weil's pamphlet. Also Joyce's chart, since she had tried without success to read Ulysses. Back to the hotel at 10:30 p.m. to welcome sleep.

Riparius

The John Deere started this morning on the first try. So did the Troy Bilt this afternoon. So I've been mowing. Better luck than with the old weed-wacker (Irv's), which worked beautifully yesterday until I couldn't extend the line—I took it apart and couldn't put it back together again. Mowing on the tractor today I noticed that I'd reached 600 hours since I bought the machine in 1988 when Daphne finished Harvard and I had extra cash. That makes this the 26th year. Last year I finished 25 years, which means the average sitting on the machine each year is  $600 \div 25 = 24$  hours per summer. 24 hours well spent.

Leander arrived after another successful four-hand workshop although fewer students attended. Sorry to hear that Bill Ballard's "upgrading" of Miss Mann's piano, which I secured for Kinhaven, has—according to Leander—just about ruined it. He lacquered the hammers and now the tone is adversely affected. Leander in the faculty recital played the same Mozart four-hand sonata, the one in C major, that I am studying now (1st movement only, so far) to do with Stan Udy. All the recordings play it at breakneck speed but Leander says that it's only allegro and needn't be played presto.

Santa Barbara

Sixteen hours from door to door owing to delays but it's nice to see Santa Barbara again after many years' absence. We heard a full report of Christina's progress at the rehab institute in Hawaii. Apparently she is happy and active. We resolved to give her a graduation present of 100 euros for use in Thessaloniki when she goes in September. Also, Greg suggested that Daphne take Chrysanthi with her to visit Christina during one of her breaks, just the girls. Chrysanthi, remarkably, did not say No. We also heard full news about Lucia, who is so demented that she remembers nothing from day to day but otherwise is “healthy” and active in a “safe house” with about eight other residents.

June 12, 2014

Practiced my Mozart on Daphne’s Steinway—a pleasure. Received word from Niki Stavrou that payment for Zorba will be coming tomorrow but she still does not say how much. Suzanne Donahue at Simon & Schuster led me to believe that it would be $15,000. Let’s hope. In the evening, went to a major graduation event staged by The Middle School in a museum high up overlooking the city, with a brilliant full moon overhead. At the museum’s entrance, a huge skeleton of a whale, something I’d never seen. The Head of School, Brian, spoke excellently about the school’s values especially as reflected by the trip program: to learn to cooperate in adversity, to seize the day, every day, carpe diem. Then two parents who went as chaperons on the latest trip also spoke about their experiences. Finally a very well-made film of the excursion in Oregon was shown, including walking the bicycles through mud and snow, and a 52-mile ride in a single day at the end. Campfires every night. Discussions, games, and Andrew’s famous “Tebbe-time” in which he stood before the 28 others and solicited questions, each of which he answered with humor, like a stand-up comic. I said that if I ever had the chance I’d ask him why Eve came after Adam and not before. The school is remarkable. Many of its teachers were former students. Its purpose is to change the lives of its students. One method is through repeated trips culminating in something as strenuous and difficult as this final one in Oregon.

June 13, 2014

Up at 6:00 a.m. to be in time for Andrew’s 7:00 a.m. swim in the Pacific ocean. Prior to this everyone—students, teachers, guests—formed a large circle on the beach. One of the teachers spoke about greeting each day with a “good morning.” Again, the school’s motto, carpe diem, “seize the day!” Then we all turned to the right and massaged the back and shoulders of the person opposite. After this, we turned to the left and massaged the back of the person who had previously massaged our back. These rituals completed, students and also a few teachers, ran into the water for a short dip. Coffee and donuts preceded. We were introduced to some of the teachers, and to several parents who enthused about Andrew’s Tebbe-times. The active graduation began at 1:00 p.m., outdoors in a park high up, with far-reaching views in all directions. It lasted four hours! Each of the 29 graduating students was bought forward and joined with an individual—teacher, father, mother, older sibling, uncle—who spoke about the student’s attributes for a maximum (all were forewarned) of two to three minutes. (The first went for ten minutes and frightened all of us, but the rest were admirably prompt.) Then the student and his or her sponsor were photographed. Then the student joined with Whitney Ingersoll, who read a poem she had composed for each, this becoming the graduation certificate. Andrew came as number 25 (the order being alphabetical), near the end. Eric Lehman, theater teacher, was his sponsor, stressing Andrew’s multiple virtues and ending, of course, with the now-famous Tebbe-times. Many of the commendations were very moving, especially when a mother or father spoke about their child. It was an ordeal owing to the length, but on the other hand admittedly different, making the ceremony truly personal for each graduate. It was amusing to see the huge differences in appearance, some of these 14- or 15-year olds looking like college students already, others looking like primary school youngsters. We shook hands afterwards with Brian McWilliam, Head of School, who said that he remembered me from our last time at the school four years ago. But I didn’t have a chance to speak again to the English teacher, Jesse Wooten, who is a Dartmouth graduate.

June 14, 2014

Visited a local retirement community called Casa Dorinda, very posh, very Spanish architecturally, planning like our Kendal to add new units that will be larger and more expensive. The biggest difference is that they have an activities director for the residential unit whereas we of course do not. They are more expensive than we are, and the apartment size seems a bit smaller. Otherwise much is the same, even a non-refundable entry fee. . . . I wrote the Memorial Minute for Peter Stettenheim, requested by Ministry and Council. . . . Niki Stavrou sent an e-mail on Thursday that she was ready to pay me via electronic transfer to my checking account. But so far nothing has arrived. . . . Went to the next village to see “aeroponic” growth of lettuce, tomatoes, broccoli, peppers, etc. No soil. The seedling’s roots are washed over by running water fortified with nitrogen and other nutrients. No danger from rabbits or deer or whatever. The Greek is αερο- (air) + πόνος (labor). In the evening, went to the busy harbor where we had never been before. Hundreds of boats, both for commercial fishing and for private pleasure. Crowds— young, old, families. Ate fish and chips and shrimps. The ocean calm, gentle waves, infinite expanse to the south and west.

Terpni

Beginning to feel my age increasingly. Bending down to pick up sticks, etc. is slow, rising to full height again even slower. Aches on and off in ankle, legs, knee, shoulder. Mowing makes me tired, although the John Deere is still quite easy. I managed to scythe around the pond satisfactorily, also to till the garden. So enough energy remains.

Dear Mike [Keeley],

Thanks again for sending me The Megabuilders of Queenston Park. I read it with interest because I had of course known your house on Littlebrook Road and had spent many happy hours there, but even more because, thanks to this novel, I realized for the first time that I, too, had been victimized by a mcmansion!

By the way, the two-bedroom apartment we now enjoy in Kendal at Hanover occupies exactly 1,107 square feet. (Of course we also have the run of the entire complex, including washer and dryer out in the hall, a ping pong table further down the hall, a library, dining room, exercise room, etc., etc. Thus we hardly feel cramped.) Here in the Adirondacks we live in a log cabin containing a living room of 320 square feet, a sleeping loft of the same size, a kitchen of 280 square feet and a bathroom of 100, totaling 1020 sq. ft. (Here, too, I must add, we have the run of 300 acres of woods, plus two barns, an Adirondack lean-to that serves as my semi-outdoor office, and a 10 × 16 “guest house” filled with books.)

Here's what happened in Hanover. In 2001, in order to move to Kendal, we put our modest home on sale. It had a nice living room, kitchen, dining room, small guest room, and half-bath downstairs, three bedrooms upstairs, and a full cellar, all on a fairly large plot (1½ acres), with a small clearing in front and back, and a large patch of woods leading downhill to the street behind us—all this unbelievably just a seven-minute walk to the Dartmouth campus.

We told the real estate agent that we wanted to sell to a youngish family with a child or children, to reproduce our own situation when we had purchased the house thirty-five years before. She produced an appropriate buyer, a woman who came to us for an interview accompanied by a husband and baby. She was eager, thus agreed to our price. Excellent! So we sold to her. Only much later did we discover that the husband and baby were fake—borrowed for the occasion. The new owner, now known as Hanover’s “slum lord,” never moved into the house. She turned our living room into her office for controlling the multiple dwellings she owns in town, and filled the bedrooms with five graduate students, which meant that their autos plus hers and a pick-up truck lined the driveway leading to our small one-car garage. But that was just the beginning. Eventually we discovered that the woods behind the house, every single tree, had been uprooted and removed. New construction had begun at the bottom of our land (our plot being large enough to allow a second dwelling). When the new cellar and first floor had been completed, our home was raised up, placed on steel beams, and moved down the hill to be situated on top of the new construction. Thus our front door (eventually removed) was raised to her second floor. Her construction then added sizable additions on both sides of our original building so that eventually our modest home was totally enclosed in what, thanks to you, I now realize is a mcmansion! And there it sits. However, she has applied to zoning authorities, etc. for permission to build a still larger dwelling, complete with a five-car garage (!), on the vacant spot where our home originally sat. Apparently permission has been granted, although the garage allowed will be only for four cars. Sounds just like Princeton, don’t you think? As for the town boards that allow such things to happen, I asked one of the members whom I knew and who voted for the woman’s original mcmansion, why he voted positively. He is a medical doctor, a surgeon. He answered, “Peter, I’d been in the hospital since 6:00 a.m., operating repeatedly. When the town committee met in the evening I was so tired I didn’t know what was going on, and I just raised my hand in order to bring things to a close so that I could go home and get into bed.”

Somehow I'd never thought of my enclosed former home as being part of a mcmansion, but now I do, thanks to your novel. If anything, my megabuilder was (is) more nefarious than your fictional father and son. In any case, I hope that your present quarters on Windrow Drive are larger than 1,107 square feet.

June 27, 2014

A propos, Mats Lemberger came to visit yesterday, stayed overnight, and this morning I took him down to see the beaver dams and pond, negotiating this quite well. Yesterday, mowing with the White, he broke the belt. I shouldn't let guests use our machines. Luckily, Steve has a replacement belt and will presumably fix the machine on Monday. I've been "mowing" with the Stihl trimmer, having trouble as usual with the line always becoming too short to do anything and not lengthening when I bump the end of the machine against a rock. So I take the spool apart and reposition the line, which lasts until it hits a rock. Despite everything I'm probably ahead of usual in mowing this year, having finished the south field, all around the house, and all around the pond already. The growth over the power line is so dense that I had trouble finding our so-called path's direction when I took Mats to the beavers. Mats, by the way, has been accepted to medical school again after having been expelled for academic failure. He completed another full year of biology courses in a graduate school, passed them, and was readmitted as a freshman with zero credits for previous work. He says that he has found some tricks to help him memorize data and thus pass exams. He is justifiably proud of his perseverance over three or four years. We compare him to David Noda, who was repeatedly refused admission to medical schools, gave up, went into banking instead (and presumably is now millionaire). Mats played guitar for us and sang some songs both popular and a few original ones, in a weak voice not very attractive. But he plays well. I reciprocated by playing the primo part of the Mozart C major four-hand sonata that I'm learning in order to paly with Stan Udy in September when we return to Kendal.

I sent this testimonial to be read at the ceremonial dinner for David Holton in Cambridge at his retirement.

I have known David Holton since 1975, when we were both in Birmingham; indeed in the spring term of that year I attended a seminar he gave on early Greek printing in Venice. In 1976 he was working there in an administrative post, not an academic one, and lived with Ann and their adopted baby Christopher at King's Heath, Birmingham, in number 60 Taylor Road, which I noted in my journal resembled the house that Chrysanthi and I had endured in Bristol in 1958—namely “two up two down” with kitchen and loo out back. Ours had no provision for heat, except a coal grate in the “salon.” I hope that his was better. In 1979 he, Ann, and now two children, Christopher and Rosalind, came to tea, and I noted that he was presently “a kind of executive officer for the Faculty of Law at the university, having left Byzantine Studies.” But by 1985, happily, he was finally a veritable academic in Cambridge, where, as I could not help but marveling, “classics has its own building, with a huge library.” It was very special then to meet Alexis Vlasto there, the son of the admirable Πιέτρος Βλαστός. Ten years later, in 1995, I was pleased to encounter daughter Rosalind again, now grown up and doing A levels in art history. In that same year, I lunched in hall with David at Selwyn, together with a mathematician, engineer, theologian, ancient historian, and political scientist. How different from Dartmouth, which does not even have a faculty club. My seminar to David's graduate students elicited intelligent questions, everything in Greek of course. Five years later, in 2000, I was again at Cambridge for a seminar with his graduate students, followed by a lively discussion for an hour with this articulate, thoughtful group on questions of nationalism. David and Ann were better situated now in a town eleven miles distant, since it has a cohesive village life, which they missed in Cambridge. On my final visit, in March 2005, I spent an hour with David in his suite learning about his large project of five years' duration (so he thought, then) with several collaborators: to create a proper grammar of the vernacular Greek spoken in medieval times. After my lecture came the obligatory visit to the bar followed by dinner in Grantchester, inevitably at the Rupert Brooke Restaurant, then a drive past the Grantchester Church on the way back, but we couldn't see if the clock was still at 10 past 3. Spent overnight very comfortably at Selwyn.

1975 to 2005: thirty years of scholarly, intellectual, and personal exchange, not to mention the 20 issues of Kambos, running from 1993 to 2013, on my shelf at home. David's hospitality at Cambridge was always gracious, his students always eager, gifted, and grateful for the care they were given by a mentor who, as one of them told me, was unlike so many other teachers because he seemed actually to care about his subject.

July 8, 2014

Alec fitted a new belt into the White, which now runs perfectly, just in time for Leander, who arrived last night, to reestablish his "golf course" on his front lawn. And I managed successfully to rivet in a missing knife on the Ford mower, which now performs better than ever.

July 9, 2014

Two large branches down from the ash tree next to the cabin. But apparently we missed a severe storm—an actual tornado—that devastated parts of North Creek, leading to long power outages. Lucky! . . . Alec is re-doing our south gable. The scaffolding is up. He has removed the old shingles and has applied a new layer of black paper over the layer I applied sixty-odd years ago.

July 10, 2014

Ballet at SPAC with Alec and family, a delicious, invigorating program beginning with Stravinsky/Robbins' "Circus Polka" for little girls: three groups starting with the oldest, then younger, then still younger, all charming. Next came Gounod/Balanchine's "Walpurgisnacht Ballet," more traditional, balanced by Justin Peck's new "Everywhere We Go" very imaginative and different although probably too long. Finally, the Gershwin/Balanchine "Who Cares," with marvelous arrangements of Gershwin's music. The pianist, who had lots to do, was possibly the one who'll be coming to Kendal next January, Nina Siniakova. Maybe she can play a Gershwin medley for us.

July 27, 2014

Finished mowing the south field. Και του χρόνου (μακάρι)! Also finished the Introduction I was asked to write in Greek for the new edition of Ο φτωχούλης του Θεού. Chrysanthi says that it is very clear. Let's see now what Nikos Mathioudakis says.

July 28, 2014

Evelyn Greene guided us to a trail off Route 30 along Indian Lake that led after about 1½ miles to a series of “erratic boulders” (laid down by the retreating glacier) enormous in size, each of which exhibited “tafoni,” which are indentations circular in shape, mostly, a sort of embroidery caused by unknown forces, amazing evidence of prehistoric processes. Chrysanthi negotiated the uphill path very well, as did I, and the children of course scampered with ease. Afterwards we ate our sandwiches at the boat-launch site where Warder Cadbury used to pick me up to go to Camp Backlog. Poor Don Greene is more incapacitated than last year. Evelyn says that he can walk from the house to the mailbox, that’s all. And he was a 46er! She lent us a privately published book recording the Schaeffer family’s accomplishment of the 46 peaks.

July 29, 2014

Alec’s birthday. I gave him two of the marvelous Tyrwhitt shirts that I had ordered from London. Beautiful supper prepared by Monica. Daphne and Greg came with Peter and Christina (Andrew is at a movie-editing camp at Yale University). Christina, alas, is still very psychologically sick despite the restorative time in Hawaii. I told her all about her future location in Thessaloniki and she showed no interest, asked no questions; indeed most of the time sat inertly and silently. Also she sleeps until noon typically. What a shame! But we all tried to ignore this and be lively. Lots of good food. I gained a few pounds owing to the donuts they brought.

July 30, 2014

I drove to Dave Whitty’s to reclaim my chain saw, whose gas line was injured by freezing moisture caused by ethanol, he told me. Went to the Marina to see if they sell ethanol-free gas. They do not, but the clerk—who turned out to be Dave Whitty’s daughter—told me of a place just off Route 8 on the way to Brant Lake. So I went and, lo and behold! there the 91 gas is ethanol free. So I brought home a gallon in a can, added the required oil, poured the ethanol-laden gas out of the Stihl saw, and replaced it with this ethanol-free gas. Now we can leave the saws, etc. over winter with full tanks instead of emptying them and hoping for the best. And, with luck I won’t have any more $75 repair bills owing to ethanol.

July 31, 2014

We repainted the porch—or, more accurately, Elena and Theo repainted the porch, although I did some and also replaced a rotted board. Monica did a second coat. It's a bright blue, a bit lighter than before, and beautiful.

August 1, 2014

Up at 6:00 a.m. today to burn the brush pile. Also we collected about five large piles of brush left in various other areas—east field, pond, south field—and burned those also, including lots of slash brought down by Alec from his cabin, in the wagon pulled by the Jeep, miraculously running after Alec replaced the radiator and manifold with parts obtained via internet from Texas. I cleared much this summer, especially around the pond. It's a good feeling. So is the clear, fully weeded garden. For supper, Tom and Suzanne came. Both are about to undergo life-style alterations, moving to Rhode Island, and changing jobs, Suzanne mostly by choice, Tom because of being fired, along with 28 others, by Siena College, which claims that it cannot pay for the required healthcare under the new "Obamacare" law. Tom and many of the others already have health insurance and do not want the government's plan, but the law forces the college to provide it unless, of course, they fire all the people concerned. Horrors!

August 2, 2014

Dave Whitty again fixed my chain saw, this time gratis, because the "fixed" saw I retrieved a few days ago was impossible to start after it conked out while idling. He found a defect in the carburetor. This afternoon, with the Troy-Bilt, I trimmed around all the rocks in the south field that couldn't be done well enough by the John Deere. Heavy work but helped by a fresh, cool breeze. At 4:00 p.m. I went to my "office," which I had abandoned for well over a week. Nice to return to this journal.

August 3, 2014

Alec, Elena, Theo, Monica, and I all went down half of our southern border and half of Alec's re-marking it because previous markings had faded. Hard to find where to mark but we did rediscover old markings most of the time and even some fence. I left them when the land descended very steeply to Vly Brook. They reported later that the beavers have started a new dam below their old triple dam and thus will eventually transform more of the stream into a lake. In the afternoon Chrysanthi and I, alone, marked the remaining portion of our southern border, up to the swamp, again with difficulty owing to faded markers but also with the assurance of re-discovering old fencing here and there. Lots of hard work. Supper at Pete's Ah in North Creek, with the verdict that pizza at the revived "Chicken" in Chestertown is infinitely better. Then—of course!—Stewart's, our ice cream refuge. Finally, really too late, when the children were too tired, some music: Theo transposing on clarinet some gypsy melodies, Elena playing half of a Vivaldi first movement, then breaking down in tears because she felt she had played so badly. Neither child exhibits any special talent for music, alas, but at least they do well enough to participate in ensembles at school.

August 4, 2014

The following arrived by post from Kinhaven, the result of an interview I gave several months ago: Conversation with Peter & Chrysanthi Bien, Two of our Silver Swans. For Peter and Chrysanthi Bien, their connection to Kinhaven includes their whole family. Each of their three children participated for years as student musicians, producing two violinists and one pianist. Their pianist, Leander Bien, still serves as the current Director of the Adult Piano Workshop. Peter's work as a Board Member, during three terms and then as Chairman of the Board from 1988–89, was extremely significant. His Board service was during a critical time of transitions for Kinhaven, as they worked with the Dushkin family, after Mr. Dushkin's passing, to take the school from a renter of the property to owners as an institution. We also have Peter and Chrysanthi to thank for securing two of our Concert Hall's most important features—the fans that help cool the hall, and the concert grand Steinway (which was recently refurbished thanks to a generous foundation grant and now plays and sounds better than ever—one great fit for another great gift). Peter retired from Dartmouth College as Professor of English and Comparative Literature in 1997, and today continues as an accompanist and playing for enjoyment. When asked what prompted him and Chrysanthi to include Kinhaven in their estate giving plans, he replied, "For us, it was a very natural act since a large part of our lives has come from music and specifically Kinhaven. This music school is unique in its mission, in that while it is not in the business of producing professional musicians (although it does do that), rather its focus is on nurturing students to become people who will continue to make music a loving part of their life. Through our giving we hope to ensure the longevity of this admirable mission.”

Alec and Monica invited Mike and Laura Gouthreau to supper and we joined them, all seated around my parents’ Biedemeier table, I in the matching chair for head of family I suppose. Before and after dinner Mike and I sat next to each other and engaged in unstoppable conversation, so easily and effortlessly. He is such an interesting man. Now they plan to move to a condo in St. Albans, Vermont, to be near his native Canada, and to be relieved of the chore of cutting and splitting enough wood to heat their Adirondack house all winter. They hope to sell the house. Both families look forward to visits. They can descend from St. Albans to White River Junction via AMTRAK; we can ascend in the opposite direction.

August 5, 2014

Monica’s Green Card has been renewed. We’re waiting for it to arrive. Today she went again to Homeland Security to be fingerprinted for a re-entry permit next year. . . . I finished reading and proofing my journal for 2013. Now I will begin typing what I’ve written so far for 2014. Yesterday I corrected the faulty English translation of Stassinakis’s latest Synthesis. I still have lots to read for Dennis and also for Lewis Owens: a play on Shostakovich; in addition, a series of poems by Mathioudakis, one of which I attempted to translate. . . . Lovely dinner with Don and Maria Kurka, such talented people. She organized another show in Bogota and wrote the impressive catalogue. He has painted two large canvases, both disturbing—one of a contorted face, the other of two women terrified by an unknown object—reflections perhaps on aging. . . . Monica was fingerprinted again by Homeland Security and will receive permission to reenter the country. We are still waiting for her renewed Green Card, which was forwarded from Hanover.

August 6, 2014

Alec and the children went off to mark his northern border across from Vly Book and up to the corner with State land, but couldn’t find the corner.

August 7, 2014

I finished civilizing around my office, removing weeds but leaving all the tiny oaks east of the rock pile. Also repaired a gap in the rear wall, using two leftover cedar shingles. Extended the black paper along the south border of the garden. After supper we went for the children's final "Stewart's treat." Returning, we found a bat flying around our kitchen, but we left the door open and it departed. Amazing, my MacBook Pro computer, which refused to work this morning, functioned perfectly tonight. Robien in Hanover says I need a voltage regulator.

August 9, 2014

All six of us squeezed into our Malibu to get Alec's rental car in Queensbury, then visited Fran Shapiro quickly, bringing her some of our blueberries. She is 101 but looks and acts like 75. Then lunch together in Panera's, very pleasantly. Shopping; chores; Alec finishing his closure when Elena, walking backward, fell into the cellar because the trap door was open, but luckily didn't break anything—landed on her backside, which is sore, and bumped her head slightly. By suppertime she was part of the troupe again with a good appetite for our spaghetti.

August 10, 2014

Departure day for Alec and family. When they descended in mid-afternoon in their rental car, ready to leave, I was at the top of a ladder brushing mold off our porch roof. Alec jumped up onto the roof itself and did the job properly, dressed in his departure clothes, then stepped onto the steeper roof over our connecting room and brushed away more mold. Theo ran to the barn and brought some black paper to catch all these droppings. And then, after hugs and kisses, they drove off. Such excellent people, all of them! We went to Schroon Lake later and ate at Pittkin's, only the two of us, of course.

August 11, 2014

To Warrensburg to fill the gas tank with the 60¢ per gallon discount obtained from yesterday's shopping at Price Chopper. Bought five bags of cow manure to fertilize all of Chrysanthis's gardens for next year. Also RV antifreeze, even though it's still early. Later, while I was in the post office hoping that we could put a search on Monica's lost Green Card post that was forwarded from Hanover and then disappeared, Chrysanthi captured and killed a mouse by herself in the kitchen. Quite an accomplishment!

August 14, 2014

Took down a dead tree near the south border. Chain saw working perfectly on ethanol-free gas. Chrysanthi and I are civilizing the ground floor of the barn, discarding lots from this fifty-year accumulation but also discovering items that we had forgotten were there. Eric from Eric and Eric came to look at our roofs and submit a proposal. The gently sloping one over porch and bathroom on the north side cannot take metal. He suggests “modified bitumen roll roofing heat applied,” which he says will be OK for the TV dish. We want to leave our home to the children without old roofs that need to be replaced. . . . Practicing all three movements of the Mozart four-hand sonata in C major, I’m amazed that I can actually do them (sometimes). . . . Monica’s letter, presumably with her new Green Card, has finally been delivered—to Missouri! She’ll need to contact Homeland Security to discover what went wrong.

August 15, 2014

I’m trying to read Mark C. Taylor’s “ERRING, a Postmodern A/theology.” Some of it is gobbledygook, some not. But the gobbledygook is not always postmodern. For example: “. . . when it is shown that what the subject is lies entirely in the attributes of the subject; that is, that the predicate is the true subject, it is also proved that if the divine predicates are attributes of human nature, the subject of those predicates is also human nature.” That’s a quote from Feuerbach’s The Essence of Christianity, published in 1841.

August 21, 2014

Today: (1) finished reading Zorba again, this time the first printed version, in order to catch the mistakes—many; (2) put the tractor up for the winter, not difficult except that the battery seems heavier each year; (3) ordered new metal roofing for our cabin from Eric and Eric.

August 22, 2014

I’m still bothered that I cannot understand statements such as the following (by Derrida, of course): “The history of presence is closed, for ‘history’ has never meant anything but the presentation (Gegenwärtig- gung) of Being, the production and recollection of beings in presence, as knowledge and mastery. Since absolute self-presence in con-sciousness is the infinite vocation of full presence, the achievement of absolute knowledge is the end of the infinite, which could only be the unity of the concept, logos, and consciousness in a voice without différance." . . . Nice visit from Leonard and Mary Ann Cadwallader. Then we went to Queensbury to share supper with Fran Shapiro.

Sometimes Mark Taylor is helpful despite the gobbledygook. He notes that the term "encyclopedia" comes from εγκύκλιος παιδεία, the circle of arts and sciences that constituted the education of Greek youths. And he notes that "Kant's critical philosophy effects a 'Copernican revolution' by placing the human subject at the center of the universe of knowledge. According to Kant, knowledge involves the conjunction of general a priori structures of cognition and particular a posteriori sense data. [However] . . . it is impossible to be certain that the cognitive forms with which the knowing subject is equipped disclose the way things 'really' are. Consequently, it is necessary to distinguish the things-as-known from the things-apart-from-known (Ding-an-sich). The thing-in-itself is, by definition, unknowable and forms an absolute limit to all knowledge" (p. 83). That is well said, and easily understood by me. But when he moves on to Hegel and "the conviction . . . that Kant's thing-in-itself does not designate extramental reality but is actually a cognitive construct that stands in critical tension with all determinate forms of knowledge, . . . the last vestiges of mimesis yield to thorough-going poiesis [and] . . . the locus of creativity shifts from the divine to the human subject . . ." I begin to fog over, the major cause being, I presume, my ignorance of Hegel's philosophy. . . . Later: This helps: "The return-to/of Hegel that deconstruction proposes is mediated not only directly by Nietzsche but also indirectly by Kierkegaard. . . . Kierkegaard's relentless attack on Hegelian results foreshadows deconstruction's critique of eschatology and denial of closure" (p. 99).

August 25, 2014

Taylor introduced me to Wallace Stevens's marvelous poem, "The Red Wheelbarrow":

so much depends upon a red wheel barrow glazed with rain water beside the white chickens.

The whole secret is the lineation, placing “barrow” and “water” on separate lines.

Taylor’s major thesis is clearly summarized on page 175: “The incapability of erring calls into question the notion of truth that lies at the heart of the Western theological and philosophical network. . . . The dominant theological position in the West is, of course, monotheism. . . . Insofar as God is one, truth is one. From this point of view, the tone is never plural, multiple, and complex but always unified, single, and simple. . . . In contrast to ephemeral temporal flux, truth is believed to be eternal. . . . The monologism of truth is pre-scribed to ease the distress induced by the uncertainty that arises from the polymorphous play of appearance. Contrary to expectation, this ‘cure’ inevitably fails . . .” I am fortified by this in my feeling that Greek polytheism is superior to Hebraic-Christian monotheism. As Taylor says on p. 176, “impermanence . . . can actually liberate. . . . When it no longer seems necessary to reduce manyness to oneness . . . , it becomes possible to . . . take ‘eternal delight’ in ‘the enigmatical/Beauty of each beautiful enigma.’”

Washing my face this morning, I was able to watch a miracle through the bathroom window next to the sink—a spider industriously finishing its web, going round and round in the ever-diminishing circles. Our woodchuck has also been visible. The other day he (or she) was standing next to the outdoor pump. Seeing me through the window, he disappeared beneath the house, where apparently there is a burrow. But the other burrow, in our outhouse, which has been active for decades, clearly continues. One of its residents was feeding nearby in the field, standing up, as they do, every so often to survey the surroundings in case of danger, and of course the moment I made myself visible at the house he scampered back to safety beneath the outhouse. Recently, as well, two large families of wild turkeys, mothers and chicks, were feeding outside of Leander's cabin.

August 29, 2014

My favorite spider's web is a shambles—torn, dirty, a mess. But this morning Madame Spider repaired it systematically, one rung at a time. Now it is like new, perfect again, and she has retreated as usual to hide beneath the kitchen overhang, waiting for dinner. . . . Taylor concludes with two lines from Stevens's poem "July Mountain": "Thinkers without final thoughts / In an always incipient cosmos." . . . We had "tea" this afternoon with Lou and Inge Curth in their house off River Road, built in the 1870s, he says. He told me about how happy he was to retire, although a captain, from the Rangers owing to an ideological battle with the governor and his minions wanting the Rangers to concentrate on law enforcement, and to be armed like policemen, whereas Lou and other "traditionalists" wanted the Rangers to continue enhancing the Adirondack wilderness with trails, lean-tos, etc. The traditionalists have already lost. He said, interestingly, that the change started with Garrow, the Waddell Road murderer about whom I was the one who first alerted the police. When Garrow was eluding state troopers because he knew how to live and hide in the forest and they didn't, which led to the Rangers being called in to assist them, whereas the Rangers then demanded to be armed. And that has continued. The Curths have transferred ownership to a corporation in which their son, next year, will possess 51% of the stock. But it's been a nuisance because a sister and brother-in-law, also stockowners, became drug addicts and had to be bought out with great difficulty and expense. Naturally, I give thanks to our family, the limited partners in Terpni, none of whom is a drug addict! . . . Marvelously tender porterhouse steak grilled perfectly by me on the open fire for supper. Watched Federer win again afterwards, in the US Open.

August 30, 2014

To the dump in the morning, one of our recurring pleasures.

September 4, 2014

Leander and I painted the northern border of Terpni successfully. Difficult to get through the bogs, places where we had to search for the line, always finding it eventually and even discovering bits of fencing.

The northwest corner is clear; there is even a surveyor's pin. Along the western border we noted our neighbor's posting signs and his heavy logging, but always legally on his land, right up to the line sometimes, never across on our land. We bushwhacked back, following my compass eastward, and found a trail which led us to the end of the logging road made by Bill Heid so many decades ago. We toured a bit through another path made by Earl Millington, and got home by 11:30 a.m. Next year we must re-do the entire western border. . . . In the evening Don and Maria Kurka came for supper. Such good guests! Chrysanthi cooked us a delicious chicken Parmesan and we finished a bottle of wine after a bottle of beer for each of us. Leander was very talkative, as was especially Maria, who is so bright and genuine. Tom Akstens is offering Don's former property for sale but at $395,000. They left around 10:00 p.m., early enough for Chrysanthi, Leander, and me to watch the amazing five-set match that Federer won in the US Open against Monfils.

September 16, 2014

At "Quaker 8s" tonight, I gave the following to everyone as the basis of our meditation: "Matthew Fox, in his The Coming of the Cosmic Christ, defines worship superbly: 'The essential role of worship is to link together microcosm and macrocosm once again in the context of thanksgiving or praise for our amazing (and therefore reverential) existence in the universe. Worship is the microcosm (humanity) giving thanks for the macrocosm (the universe and all its creative wonders)' (p. 213). He also appreciates Silence as a way of getting in touch with what there was before words. And he is scathing on the trivialization of worship that occurred in Protestant churches, and in Catholic ones after Vatican II, where mystery is removed." Present were Anne Baird, Len and Mary Ann Cadwallader, Peter and Penny Wright, Hal Hamilton, Judith Pettingell, Chrysanthi, and myself. As so often happens in our meetings, the meditations were meaningful, coming from the heart as well as the mind. At the start, we treated everyone to a marvelous chocolate cake baked by Melissa, our new Kendal baker. . . . In the afternoon, Chrysanthi and I completed our business with Catherine Richmond, lawyer, adding a codicil to our wills to provide $50,000 donations to the American Farm School, Pendle Hill, and Kinhaven. I wanted $100,000 each but Chrysanthi reduced each to $50,000.

Terpni

After eight-hand piano practice (Rossini's Barber of Seville overture), drove to the farm, expecting to see Eric & Eric's roofing work completely finished. Instead we found the two workmen still very busy, trash everywhere around the cabin, one metal roofing piece missing over the porch because it had arrived damaged and needed to be replaced. Also, on entering the cabin, we found the kitchen full of bits of cement and rotten sheathing, covering Leander's shining yellow floor. My window shutters upstairs were hampered by sheathing, in addition. In sum, it was very good that we came. The workers adjusted the sheathing so that the shutters can now be removed and then put in place. They helped us clean up the kitchen. We talked about the cedar shingles that they had for completing the sheathing that I had never done behind the electric wires upstairs, saying that they should be coated with clear preservative to hamper weathering, as we'd done with the new gable that Alec had placed on the south end. John, the "master carpenter" from the office, was attentive and helpful. So, everything will probably be finished next week, and we'll make another trip to inspect before paying the final bill. Earl showed up with Stevie, now in first grade. No more instances of bullying, thankfully. Earl has a splendid buck and a large bear in photos and hopes to shoot them this year, having failed to do so last year. As always, the farm is beautiful, a tonic. And on the drive over in the morning we were regaled by the very best color we'd ever seen, at least east of Rutland. West of Rutland and into the Adirondacks was entirely different, with hardly any color, probably because of the preponderance of pines and other evergreens. . . . I stopped at the post office to alert Tom to the latest news in Monica's difficult relationship with Homeland Security regarding her green card. They had neglected to do anything after the new card was returned to them instead of being forwarded. They promised to attend to it now. She needs to wait another 31 days before inquiring. The plan now is to have the card sent to P.O. Box 106, Riparius and for Tom not to forward it but to mail it to us disguised, after which I'll dispatch it to Bangkok via Fed Ex or UPS, not US post. Let's hope that this will work.

October 2, 2014

Andy Rangell telephoned to say that he was in Hanover and could we have lunch. Luckily I was able to join him at noon. We lunched at the Chinese restaurant for two and a half hours both enjoying this reunion after many years. He had just played two concerts in Vermont and is able now to perform in public up to a point, owing to the severe trouble he had in both wrists. He has concentrated, wisely, on recording, where he can play bits and pieces. He surprised me by saying that his eight years at Dartmouth were a beautiful time, at least until the end, when two tenured faculty members persecuted him and got him fired. But he adjusted to this and also to his mysterious wrist problem that no doctors seemed able to diagnose and treat. We also spoke about Beveridge Webster—or Bev Web as he was known to his students. Rangell loved his instruction and his person. He never saw any sign whatever of Bev's alcoholism; obviously he was a functioning alcoholic. I asked if Andy considered Bev a genius. Well, compared to Mozart, Beethoven, Bach, probably not. But he was "a giant," Andy concluded. Could I book Andy for a recital at Kendal? Doubtful. But what a pleasure to see this friend again, who has dealt so serenely and successfully, it seems, with multiple adversities. . . . Returning, I found Chrysanthi back from the dentist's with her new front tooth, an inlay costing about $6000 in total! "Aren't we lucky to have enough money to pay for such expenses?" I queried. And she agreed.

Pendle Hill

To Philadelphia by air and then to Wallingford via Avis rental car, my first time after so many years' absence from Pendle Hill. The other day, re-reading my journal for 1952, I found a brief entry concerning my first sojourn year—a week's orientation before sailing to Holland to work in QIVS (Quaker International Voluntary Service). I noted the presence then of Henry Cadbury speaking in a New England twang, was sorry to miss Dorothy Day, and was forced to listen to someone pontificating on spirituality: the full Pendle Hill mixture. Today's trip took five hours, but it was pleasant to arrive. Saw Doug Gwyn immediately. He has lost his job because the resident program is now abolished. But he was just hired as pastor in a "hybrid" Quaker Meeting in Durham, Maine. He hopes to continue writing, this time on exactly what Quaker pacifism was like at the start. And Caroline, his wife, will be starting a new job in the USA in a year, thus leaving England. I said that we hope to visit him in Maine. Lovely to see Paul Rasor also, a man I always admired, who is back now at PH temporarily after serving in various academic capacities since I last saw him. I promised Jen Kasten that if she succeeds in eliminating the deficit in two years, as she says she will, I'll treat everyone to baklava! The place is mobbed with various groups—Quakers in Publishing, Quakers Caring for the Earth, AFSC, etc., etc., plus of course the reason I'm there: the Steering Committee for a projected capital campaign. We met over supper and afterwards. Lovely to see Kaye Edwards, who filled me in on Haverford. Also of course Henry Freeman, whom I greeted with "Here we go again!" Jennie Keith, with whom I played four-hand piano in the past, now serves on the board. Jen Kasten was of course the coordinator. An interesting man is Mark Myers, an important Philadelphia Quaker. Others were Anne Nash, one of Douglas and Dorothy Steere's daughters, Gretchen Hall, and Wright Horne. After we adjourned, I spent an hour a half with Doug Gwyn, who told me sadly that Larry Ingle "trashed" his (Doug's) new history of Pendle Hill, which also received only lukewarm reviews by other "experts." He hopes to publish it "privately."

October 4, 2014

Our working day. Henry Freeman, a marvelous professional, treated us to the inside methods of fund raising impressively. What's crucial is to get substantial contributions from wealthy Friends before the campaign is even announced to the public. When we adjourned, Jennie Keith and I played the first and second movements of the Mozart C major four-hand sonata that we've both been studying, I sight-reading the secondo of the first movement because of course I'm doing the primo at Kendal and Stan Udy the secondo. Then another five hours to get home, including a treacherous drive in rain from Manchester to Hanover.

October 10, 2014

Riparius

To the farm to see the finished roof, meet Eric, and pay the final amount. Lovely color. The new "bridge" across Vly Brook on Waddell Road is finished minus the railings, except that it isn't a bridge but rather a huge culvert over which one drives. Saw Earl, who told us that Dale and Monica are Harley-Davidson motorcycle freaks who'll be driving to a huge pow-wow in the Midwest. Monica has her own bike but a smaller one. Dale's is too heavy for her to manage; she sits in the back. Locked the gate and departed, sadly, probably until next May. But then stopped at the post office and happily found a letter in our box containing Monica's green card. Tom, of course, never sent it to us, didn't even know it was there. Thus this trip was a life-saver for Monica, since receiving this new green card has really been what we're all calling a "saga."

October 11, 2014

Sent the green card to Alec in Bangkok via Fed Ex. Let's hope it arrives safely. . . . Treated Depy (Despina) Karalis to supper. She's a Dartmouth freshman, a Greek now living in California because her parents escaped the Greek economic crisis. But she saddened us when we learned that she cannot afford to return to California for Thanksgiving and Christmas. No money. Her total cost for Dartmouth tuition, etc. is only $3000. I'm trying to help her in various ways—for example, to secure a Greek font for her computer, and perhaps an internship at Kendal since she aspires to become a medical doctor.

October 15, 2014

Stan and I practiced the Mozart duet an extra hour and a half today. It's sloppy when we do it too fast. I changed fingering on several parts to enable me to play them with strong fingers, not the weak 4th. And I'm trying to emulate Richard Goode, whom we heard here last week, in his splendid use of diminuendos.

October 16, 2014

The green card arrived in Bangkok. Hooray! Practiced another hour and a half this morning with Stan. If we do it at 108 it's sloppy; thus 100 is better. Also practiced our secondo part in the Rossini with Joan Wilson, making good progress.

October 17, 2014

Stan Udy and I performed the first movement of the Mozart C major duo sonata, I doing the primo. Surprisingly, I wasn't at all nervous. Actually it went quite well although I made an error in a place that never caused me any trouble before, and we needed to stop and regroup. I think I skipped a line in reading the score. No matter, really. The sections where I'd changed the fingering just two days ago went well, thankfully. Then our team—Stan, Joan Wilson, Joan Snell, and I—played the eight-hand version of Rossini's overture to The Barber of Seville better than we'd ever done it in rehearsal. For me to do something as difficult as the Mozart C major without frozen fingers and general jitters is really a new, and pleasing, development.

New York City

Up at 4:45 a.m. 6:30 a.m. bus to New York, with Chrysanthi. After lunch at the Yale Club, we went to 15 East 84th Street to a small exhibition space belonging to New York University, to see a unique show called “When the Greeks Ruled Egypt,” 300 years from Alexander to Cleopatra VII. A chart listing each and every Ptolemy echoed, for me, a list of characters in Cavafy’s poems! Neither of us realized that the term “demotic” in Egyptology refers not to the Greek language but to a simplified version of Egyptian hieroglyphics. The show portrayed the Ptolemies as very cleverly amalgamating Greek ritual and practice with endemic practices, consistent with Alexander’s liberalism in this regard. . . . We then took the N train to Astoria and found the “Minoan Palace,” headquarters of the Pan-Cretan Society. Opposite is a large Greek Orthodox church that we entered. Every square inch is painted or in mosaic; light shines in; an attendant told us that it was filled with worshipers this morning. The Cretans’ headquarters is a large room plus kitchen. Saw Georges Stassinakis immediately; he brought Swiss chocolates for us, and I gave him the translation into English that I’d photocopied from the English edition of “Spain.” Things began slowly, as usual, with lots of photos being taken and a TV reporter interviewing me, but the program actually began only 15 minutes late. Lots of introductory messages by diverse officials and, of course, the local priest, who spoke in almost ancient Greek. The auditorium was full—over 200 people, some standees, everyone speaking and understanding Greek, even those born in the USA. Stassinakis spoke well, but at inordinate length (we were both meant to limit ourselves to 20 minutes; he went on for 50). I then gave my 20-minute version of Καζαντζάκης ο επιστολογράφος, getting lots of laughs where appropriate (always a good sign). Various questions followed, with the coordinator expertly diverting numerous “statements” and insisting on “questions.” Whereas Stassinakis presented the usual encomium (at length), I tried to show the real Kazantzakis, with self-doubt, anguish, anti-Greek feelings, etc., all so very evident in the letters. People appreciated this. Many in the audience were teachers in the Greek schools; they showed interest in Greek Today and for one of them I even recommended The Flying Telephone Booth. All in all, the cultural differences were totally apparent. “These people are crazy,” I kept telling Chrysanthi. I felt like the dour parents of the American bridegroom in the movie “My Big Fat Greek Wedding.” Having gotten up at 4:45 a.m. and having everything here in Greek didn’t help, of course. A jigger of raki did help. Finally, our host Demosthenes Triantafillou took Chrysanthi, Stassinakis, and me to a very Greek restaurant for an indifferent supper that gave Chrysanthi a bellyache overnight. He also paid for our taxi back to the Yale Club. It was a good experience in total. Chrysanthi said I delivered my lecture better than ever, because speaking slowly, looking up instead of into the typed pages, holding the microphone properly, and laughing along with the audience at appropriate times. Best of all, the whole thing took only 20 minutes.

Monday, October 20, 2014

A stimulating morning in New York City, since at 9:30 a.m. we were at MoMA for the quite amazing special exhibit of Matisse’s cut-out art, five or six galleries-full of it. His colors, applied to paper with gouache, are much brighter in all of these productions than they are in his actual paintings, also on display in the museum’s permanent collection. A video showed him wielding his large scissors expertly. The stained glass windows made from his cut-out designs were also shown, with light streaming through magnificently. We were able to see the entire exhibit comfortably in an hour, before the mobs began streaming into the museum after its opening to non-members at 10:30 a.m. . . . The 1:30 p.m. Dartmouth Coach got us back to Hanover by 6:15, in time to catch supper at Kendal. Mail included a new Netflix, the extraordinary film “Murder on the Orient Express,” that we turned off at midnight. So we still don’t know who committed the crime.

Tuesday, October 21, 2014

My usual Tuesday morning eight-hand piano practice, but this time trying Mendelssohn’s Octet for the first time, slowly. Such mesmerizing music. I’ve photocopied my part in order to learn it and get it up to speed. Good Faculty Lunch at noon with the usual friends. Deposited an extra $10,000 from Merrill Lynch at the bank needed owing to added expenses for the farm roof and Chrysanthi’s new tooth, together totaling about $18,000!

Wednesday, October 22, 2014

Dick, Allan, and I amazingly played three Bach sonatas (at least attributed to Bach) quite well tonight even though Dick never observes his rests. These are all BWV 1033. But of course we made mincemeat, as usual, out of the Debussy Sonata for flute, alto, and harp. . . . Nice supper with Penny and Robert Binswanger and Tom Wilson. Penny is of course the ultimate example of fortitude under hardship. Robert was able to take her to their home in Maine for a month and she loved sitting on the porch with binoculars gazing at the sea and all the human and other activity on the beach.

Thursday, October 23, 2014

Stan Udy and I made good progress this morning from 9:00 to 10:30 on the third movement of the Mozart C major four-hand sonata. Like the first and second movements, it is extraordinary music: among the very best Mozart. . . . I enjoyed the following in a newspaper review of a pianist's recital: "The sense of journeying from Anton Diabelli's shabby little waltz—which Beethoven proceeds to mock, pull out of shape, overwhelm and finally elevate to transcendental heights—was given with a rare humanity."

Reading in my Journal for 1952, when I was 22 years old, I dwelt on a few words of Carlyle's which of course have a very different strength for me now, 84 years old: "Life: a little gleam of Time between two Eternities, no second chance to us forevermore!"

November 13, 2014

Chrysanthi left on November 9th for Greece—amazingly, after refusing so many times to go and saying after we returned in June 2013, "Never again!" But the incentive came from Daphne, who said "Let's go, just the two of us, ladies only, no men, to visit Christina in Thessaloniki." So I took Chrysanthi to the bus on Sunday, she met Daphne at Logan Airport, and off they flew to Istanbul via Turkish Airlines (!), business class, paid for by Daphne. Then, after a three-hour wait, to Athens. They slept comfortably in the Sofitel Airport Hotel (paid for by me), and on Tuesday went into town to the new Acropolis Museum and the Acropolis, followed by tea with Christos and a flight to Thessaloniki, where Takis and Brini met them at the airport. Other details I'll learn when Chrysanthi returns on Sunday. Daphne's brief e-mails, however, have assured me that everything has gone well. Chrysanthi even managed to cancel my Greek bank account, which I failed to do when I tried. And one evening when they invited Christina to supper at a taverna in town, Christina appeared with a dozen classmates to share the meal! . . . I'm doing well as a temporary bachelor. A few days ago I took John Rassias out to supper at the Canoe Club. We talked for two hours, but I sensed some hesitancy on John's part, of speech, not of desire, and at the end he said, "I know there's something wrong with my talking," and I had to agree. He cannot drive any longer and does not go to the French Department. But he does go in to the offices of the Rassias Foundation in Blunt Hall, although Helene really does all the work. I sensed that he feels very lonely and without much sense of direction or purpose. Sad.

November 15, 2014

Another memorial for Pano Rodis, this time in Rollins Chapel. It started with two Russian Orthodox priests and some women chanting part of the Orthodox service in English, to give the audience some sense of Pano's religious home. Joe O'Donnell spoke well, and cited Parker Palmer, which pleased me. A group performed a song, lyrics and music, composed by Pano. For me, the highlight was the chance to meet his second wife, also named Karen. She had clearly heard a lot about me, from what she said. She met Pano in psychology school; they had two children together. I asked about the two girls from the first Karen. The one who wrote the marvelous poem about 9-11 does not write poetry. Neither is married. One has a job; the other doesn't. Neither was at the memorial. Everyone emphasized Pano's ability to radiate love. The program printed a parting message from him: "I am glad and grateful to have known you, saddened that I cannot continue, but entirely hopeful about your own lives and what lovely, brave things you will do with them."

November 16, 2014

Went to see Rachel Decker-Sadowski act in "Blue Stockings," a play by Jessica Swale done extraordinarily well entirely by students. I found it extremely moving because it depicted the ideals and vicissitudes of the first girls in Girton College, Cambridge, in 1896, not too different from the situation at Dartmouth in the 1970s, believe it or not. Rachel's mother was present. She recognized me, came up, and we had lots of time to talk about Rachel, the Tebbes, etc. Apparently Rachel, who'll get her M.A. in Engineering in March, already has a splendid job. I'll invite her for supper at Kendal next term.

At 6:00, I picked John Rassias up for another supper, this time at the Norwich Inn, his treat. He behaved very strangely, unable to choose something to eat from the menu, driving the waiter to distraction. And, at the end, he seemed unable to pay the bill with his credit card, to figure the tip, and sign, asking me to do it for him. We did, however, enjoy some rational conversation along the way. But he is clearly descending into a strange form of senility.

At 10:00 p.m. I met Chrysanthi as she descended the Dartmouth Coach, returning from Greece. She was wide awake, jubilant, full of stories about her adventures in travel, hotels, sightseeing, and of course fellowship with Daphne and Christina. The only difficulty was George, "who drove me crazy," she said. Good visits with Odysseus and Lena, Takis and family, Nikos and family, and even Costas. Also Joann, Tasos, and Dora at the Farm School. And Christos in Athens, after seeing and greatly appreciating the new Acropolis Museum, plus the Acropolis itself, the Parthenon entirely encased in scaffolding now. They invited Christina for supper at a taverna and she arrived with a score of friends as well! Turkish Airlines were exemplary. In all, a trip without anything going wrong. And how nice that mother and daughter could do this together, thanks to Daphne's initiative.

November 21, 2014

I performed the first and second movements of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony in eight-hand arrangement with Joan Wilson, Stan Udy, and Heywood Alexander in the Cary Room. It went well, except that I got lost briefly in a place that never caused me trouble before. All the troublesome places were fine. The other eight-hand group then played the third and fourth movements, so we did the entire symphony. In my introduction I mentioned that Mendelssohn himself had played the organ at the dedication ceremony for the Birmingham Town Hall.

November 24, 2014

Potomac, Maryland

Twelve and a half hours door-to-door Hanover to Potomac, owing to AMTRAK being an hour and a half late. Sophia was eager to describe her favorite class: English. It's 100% writing, no literature, with students and the professor critiquing papers, which are then revised and resubmitted.

Her current subject is the immigration dispute now so hot in America. She writes well, judging from previous compositions I have seen. In addition she was soloist in the a cappella choir; we heard a TV recording. The trouble, from my snobbish view, is that they sing such fifth-rate music. She is also pleased with Spanish. She had two years of it in high school and tested into Spanish 1 in college—two years of waste. But the college teacher has them actually speak in class, which never happened in high school, alas. And Nicholas will be going to California with a jazz band and doing a solo. Also he has agreed to coach a basketball team of nine-year-olds. Very nice.

November 25, 2014

Leander's high count of triglycerides apparently hasn't caused any harm. Good news. This morning we saw an eight-point buck in his back garden, just standing there, looking at me. Apparently the deer here are tame, not afraid of humans. We thought of Earl Millington, who waited all last winter in vain for a buck he hoped to shoot.

Lunched for two pleasant hours with Dennis Carroll in the District Chop House, our usual haunt. He helped me regarding Xlibris, which apparently, he feels, is still the best of the vanity presses. He recommends that I use 11-point type to get more on each page, and that I choose Xlibris's "professional style." They produce excellent paperback books but not very good hardbacks. I probably should consult with UPNE also regarding an arrangement like my classical colleague Bill Scott's e-book on Homeric similes. I encouraged Dennis to write again on the Koran but this time pretending appreciation instead of damning it openly and exclusively, as he did in a previous essay.

I spent the rest of the afternoon in the Natural History Museum, which is fascinating especially in its extensive exhibits on human evolution. It was lovely to see so many children absorbed in various exhibits and not only in the dinosaurs. . . . Then to Tony Cheng's Mongolian buffet on H Street with the family, followed by Wizards vs. Hawks at the Verizon Center, an unexciting game accompanied by horrendously vulgar "entertainment." I am truly a snob and do not plan to change.

November 26, 2014

Leander gave me an exhaustive and somewhat exhausting lesson on the second movement of the Mozart C-major four-hand sonata. He tells me that Mozart himself, in a letter, said that it is difficult. And it is. We went over fingering, phrasing dynamics, speed, the slurs, what are the editor's marks in our edition vs. what are Mozart's in Leander's ur-text, possible retards, pedaling, and ideas not only for my part (secondo) but also for Stan's (primo) especially in places that are causing Stan difficulty. What a pleasure! Tomorrow we'll do the third movement.

November 27, 2014, Thanksgiving

Another lesson, two hours on Mozart's third movement. I was puzzled by the very end until Leander exposed its extraordinary treasures—shifts from major to minor, plus an unexpected harmony in a part seemingly reproducing something from the beginning. . . . Alec and family telephoned. Theo displayed his gold medal in swimming. They're off to Melbourne soon and will go to Philip's Island to see the penguin parade. . . . Read a new revision by Lewis Owens of Act I of his play about the awarding of honorary degrees at Oxford to both Shostakovich and Poulenc. It's better than the version I saw previously but still needs more work in ways that I tried to indicate. . . . I started re-reading "The Death of Ivan Ilych," which Atul Gawande (in his Being Mortal: Medicine and What Matters in the End, which I finished the other day while riding on the Red Line) says is the very best account of dying in fiction. (What about Thomas Mann's in The Magic Mountain?) . . . Daphne telephoned from Carl's home in Portland, Oregon, where all the Tebbes are gathered. . . . We had our pleasant turkey dinner with an especially good apple pie. The ladies then went shopping (of course!); Leander and I took a very brisk walk for about two miles filled with continual conversation, which is so easy with Leander. We wondered about the long-term future of the farm, for example. Lastly, with the ladies back together with their purchases, we laughed heartily at "Planes, Trains, and Automobiles," which is so brilliant. . . . I'm trying to get Atul Gawande to speak at Kendal, perhaps by convincing Dartmouth to bring him as a Montgomery Fellow.

Sent this to Lu Martin, who had lent me the book: "I finished Being Mortal yesterday on the Washington Metro and will return the book to you after we arrive back in Kendal at the end of the week. Thanks for alerting me to it and loaning it. Yes, it certainly is consistent with what you generously call 'my vision' for Kendal. If the vision belongs to anyone or ones, it is to the Quakers, who pioneered in our type of senior living beginning about fifty years ago. Dr. Gawande's plea for allowing people to avoid so-called ‘heroic measures’ to prolong life and instead to accept their mortality is very much part of my own experience because of my sister’s battle with lymphatic cancer for four years. She endured the horrendous side-effects of chemotherapy repeatedly, did have some apparent remissions (which were only apparent, alas), and when the doctors recommended a new type of chemo that might prologue her life for six months, she and her husband chose hospice instead—just as Gawande recommends. She lasted six months in any case, at home, peacefully, surrounded by children and grandchildren until the end.

“It’s interesting that Dr. Gawande speaks of ‘a ferment’ in senior care by 2010 and describes on his pp. 129–30 a Boston community called NewBridge that sounds pretty much like our Kendal, which of course opened two decades earlier, in 1991, preceded by another few decades by ‘Mama Kendal’ in Pennsylvania. But he sums up very well our vision on his page 243, where he writes that ‘our most cruel failure in how we treat the sick and the aged is the failure to recognize that they have priorities beyond merely being safe and living longer; that the chance to shape one’s story is essential to sustaining meaning in life; that we have the opportunity to refashion our institutions, our culture, and our conversations in ways that transform the possibilities for the last chapters of everyone’s lives.’ In my own thinking for Kendal, I imagined a community able to function well because every individual in it shared the overriding factor of mortality. And it does seem to work, if only imperfectly.

“It would be fun to bring Atul Gawande here sometime, somehow. Should we try?”

December 1, 2014

Saw Dr. Chapman, dermatologist. He’ll remove the cyst on my back in January. But the chief reason for the visit was the discoloration and roughness on my lower lip, first noticed by Dr. Dacey here at Kendal. Chapman says that this is pre-cancerous and should be treated. He recommends “blue light,” which he says typically destroys about 80% of the offending cells. So I signed up for this treatment, which will probably also happen in January. It is coordinated by another doctor, Pamela Gangar. Chapman warned me that cancer of the lip is an extremely nasty variety. Scary.

Spoke to Mike Burton at the University Press of New England about my journal, perhaps doing an electronic version the way the Press and Dartmouth did Bill Scott's book on Homeric language. He was encouraging, saying with a smile, "The only thing we need is to get paid." He told me to speak to David Seaman in the Dartmouth Library's administration.

December 2, 2014

So I spoke today to David Seaman, who was also encouraging. The plan is called "open access"; they hope to make it apply to the entire Dartmouth faculty. He'll now speak with Burton about a collaboration. Of course the difficult part of my journal is its bulk. I figured about one and a half million words, or more. The typed pages now number close to 3000.

At eight-hand practice this morning we started the Mendelssohn Octet with me playing the primo part in Piano One. It's gorgeous, but difficult. Happily, Joan Snell has returned after suffering from a bad back.

December 8, 2014

Bill Scott and I had a two-hour lunch at Lou's. He advised me to get financial support from the Onassis Foundation. He has now published two books in "open access" and is very satisfied. He also thought that Haverford College might be interested and able to help financially.

December 13, 2014

Saw a mediocre feminist play at the A.R.T. preaching the reduction of garbage. Thus there were no programs for the performance, saving scores of trees, etc. The heroine makes dresses from apricot skins, seaweed, and prunes. Imaginative, but I wish it had been written by Oscar Wilde or G. B. Shaw. . . . I extended my stack pass in Widener until December 2015, but will I ever use it? I had so many good moments in that library in the past. Perhaps now, as in other pleasures, the appropriate word is "Nevermore." . . . Highlight of the day was our tour of the new Harvard Art Museum incorporating the old Fogg with the Busch-Reisinger and the Sackler. An impressive building with natural light flooding in through the glass roof.

Sunday, December 14, 2014

Such a full, varied day! To Kendal Quaker Meeting at 10:00 a.m. Nice to see Bob Metz there. Dick Powell ministered well. To Interfaith Gathering at 11:15 a.m. with Tom Wilson speaking on modes of compassion and Stan Udy playing a medley of Christmas carols as the prelude. To the Black Art Center at 12:00 noon for the Metropolitan Opera's HD presentation of Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg, which lasted until 6:00 p.m. I hated the first act, which seemed stuffed, everything twice as long as needed. But the conclusion of the second act was stirring, and the entire third act was miraculous. Strange to hear an opera where almost all the voices are male and the leading female part is so minimal. But Wagner's music is stirring, inventive, deeply sonorous. And I didn't find him an obvious fascist in this opera, as I had with some of the Ring. Yet the super-patriotic part praising Germany at the very end spoiled the marvelous finale for me.

December 16, 2014

Eight-hand practice, again, of the Mendelssohn Octet. We're improving. The piece is so very beautiful, even at our slow speed, or perhaps owing to our slow speed. Mendelssohn was sixteen years old when he composed it! What a miracle, mostly because the music is so clearly "mature."

December 20, 2014

Simon and Schuster erroneously sent my copies of the new Zorba to me at the Riparius address and UPS left the package on the ground next to the locked gate. Fortunately Earl noticed it, picked it up before rain or snow came, and telephoned me. So Chrysanthi and I got up at 6:30 this morning, left at 7:30, and arrived at the farm at 10:30, retrieved the package from Earl, left a few things in the house (including a new type of mouse inhibitor using batteries), and walked up to Alec's and around to Leander's in the deliciously white snow observing all sorts of animal tracks. Brilliant sunshine. Clear sky. By 4:00 we were back in Hanover (stopping of course at Stewart's on the way for a milkshake). The new Zorba is tastefully designed and priced at $16.00 for the paperback.

December 21, 2014

Joint Hanover and Kendal Meeting at Kendal. I ministered for the first time in many months—on the miracle of the Solstice, today!—with the sun now going to be more visible each day instead of less visible, so beneficent unlike human beings, who seem always to be killing each other. Long leisurely lunch afterwards at EBAs, with Jack and Ruth Hunter. I congratulated the owner on giving a highly price-reduced meal every day to the students forced to remain in Hanover over the six week term-break. In the evening, practicing Mozart as usual with Stan, we discovered a trick to enable us to play joint sixteenth-note runs clearly, by means of a slight break at the top of the run before racing downward. Hooray! Previously, in the afternoon, Heywood Alexander and his daughter, who teaches flute, gave an hour-long concert, a beautiful interlude of peace with gentle snow falling outside. Such amenities are a recurring asset of our life here in Kendal.

December 23, 2014

Music with Dick and Allan. We actually did “Golliwogg’s Cake Walk” with everyone coming in on time—even Dick! Life’s little pleasures.

December 24, 2014

Chrysanthi’s birthday. She opened her presents in the morning. I gave her a jigsaw puzzle based on an aerial photograph of our farm. She’ll save that for summer.

December 25, 2014

When I ministered on the miracle of the solstice, last Sunday, I wish I had remembered Matthew Fox’s definition of worship: “The essential role of worship is to link together microcosm and macrocosm once again in the context of thanksgiving or praise for our amazing (and therefore reverential) existence in the universe. Worship is the microcosm (humanity) giving thanks for the macrocosm (the universe and all its creative wonders).” So, in speaking thankfully about the solstice, as I did, I suppose I was worshiping.

Last evening, Christmas Eve, I played about fifteen Christmas carols for singing at Meeting—real singing, on tune, not just mumbling. Tonight, Christmas, we went to Kesaya’s and Chris’s on Bean Road, as we used to go to Lafayette’s and Mayme’s. Fun and games, and food, but not Mayme’s extraordinary Japanese banquet. This is the first Christmas I can remember when we’ve been without any children or grandchildren. But it’s nice still to have true friends.

I sent the following letter to Dimitris Gounelas after receiving a long, warm letter from him:

Αγαπητέ Δημήτρη,

Θερμές ευχές σε σένα και στη Ρουθ (και στην καημένη την Ελλάδα) για το νέο έτος!

Χάρηκα πολύ να πάρω και τα νέα και τις σκέψεις σου. Μονάχα δε μας έλεγες τα νέα της Αγγέλικας και του Φραγγίσκου. Βρίσκονται και τα δύο ακόμα στην Αγγλία;

Εγώ μόλις εξέδωσα την καινούργια μετάφρασή μου του Ζορμπά. Έτοιμος είμαι να σας στείλω ένα αντίγραφο αλλά θέλω πρώτα να εξακριβώσω τη διεύθυνση. Έχω Υπισιάντου και Σκουφά, Πανόραμα 552 36. Είναι σωστή;

Συνεχίζω τώρα να ετοιμάσω τα ημερολόγια μου για ηλεκτρονική έκδοση. Πάνε από το 1948 ως . . . χθες, 3000+ σελίδες, αρκετές γραμμένες στα ελληνικά.

Δυστυχώς δεν προβλέπω κανένα άλλο ταξίδι στην Ελλάδα. Δε συνεχίζω να υπηρετώ σαν έφορος της Αμερικανικής Γεωργικής Σχολής, που στο παρελθόν ήταν πάντα μια πρόφαση να πηγαίνω στη Θεσσαλονίκη. Μα πάει αυτή πια. Και η Χρυσάνθη, παρόλη την οικογενειά της εκεί, δε αντιμετωπίζει ακόμα τις εκτεταμένες πτήσεις.

Για τα πολιτικά της Ελλάδας, τί να πω; Μονάχα ελπίζω ότι δεν θα χάσει το ευρώ για να ξαναπάει στη δραχμή. Και τι να πω για το δικό μας το πολιτικό τρελοκομείο;

Ευτυχώς είχαμε, εσύ και εγώ, καλές εμπειρίες στη Θεσσαλονίκη δυο-τρεις φορές όταν οι συνθήκες ήταν πιο σταθερές. Τώρα, όπως και σεις στο νησί, και εμείς στο αγαπημένο κτήμα μας, καλλιεργούμε τη γη και θαυμάζουμε τη γαλήνη των δέντρων.

Περιμένω επιβεβαίωση της διεύθυνσής σας.

Με αγάπη,
Πήτερ

Nice visit from Henry Hart, who brought his daughter Maria to begin winter term. We exchanged books. I gave him my new Zorba. He gave me his latest collection of poems, "Familiar Ghosts," and explained about his great-great grandfather, who was a Lutheran missionary in China when the Boxer Rebellion induced him to flee with his family to Mongolia. One of his poems is called "Lines Adapted from the Diary of a Missionary Written during China's Boxer Rebellion." Some of the lines are:

To them we were wolves with devils in our hearts.

They spared us so we'd lug omens by horseback and camel cart to the land of Crosses.

On our long trek through Mongolia, sun branded our foreheads with stigmata.

God sizzled on our tongues.

Night after night we drank the Gobi's silence.

Licking the moon's salt from dry wells, we learned the meaning of slow crucifixion.

I told him how my first appreciation of missionaries came from Bill McGrew's history of Anatolia College, especially the women, who endured so many reversals, hardships, catastrophes with endurance and the constant vision of a better future. He accompanied us to Meeting for Worship. Fortunately it was a very good one, truly gathered, and with excellent ministry. I didn't minister (I rarely do any more) but I kept thinking of how this phenomenon of men and women sitting in silence simulates somehow the non-fragmented essence of divinity, uniting all of us in some ineffable fashion.

A week ago the pianist Nina Siniakova performed here brilliantly. We obviously spent time together including a long breakfast on Sunday in which she queried me about reactions to certain plans she has for organizing something like our Webster Performance Series in Flushing, Long Island. Yesterday I received the following rather extraordinary e-mail from her:

Dear Peter,

I wasn't sure what would be the best way to send you these words—via email or just to call, but then I thought that if you have it in an email you can reread it.

I would like to tell you how much I am impressed with your personality and how much I am grateful for your invitation. That morning as we spoke in your cafeteria I realized how sharp-minded, intelligent, honest and open you are, how modern your attitude is and how warm-hearted you are. I had a feeling that I found a new friend. I could trust you with many things and get your “up-to-date” opinion on many subjects. I was a bit concerned about my appearance at your series since you mentioned a few very well known names, and, well, I am not a very well known person. So I truly appreciate your invitation and I am happy you were satisfied with my performance.

Thank you!

Sincerely yours,
Nina

New York City

I had hoped to greet Arturo Delmoni playing string quartets on the promenade of the New York State Theater before the ballet matinee, but he wasn't there, presumably still sick, as he was when he was visiting with us in Hanover last weekend in order to hear Nina Siniakova play her Webster performance. She did splendidly, as I noted earlier. Today was the celebration of the anniversary of Balanchine's birthday. No jiggers of vodka this time, as had happened many years ago when we were at a previous celebration—just a small magnet for the refrigerator with

Mr. B's sketch of himself on it. The matinee program was lovely. First, "Donizetti Variations" starring Ashley Bouder and Joaquin De Luz. Then my favorite, "La Valse," with the orchestra splendid in part 2, which is actually "La Valse"—part 1 being "Valse Nobles et Sentimentales," in which neither the music nor the dance interested me very much. But part 2 is spectacular, with the prima ballerina meeting death at the end. Ravel's orchestration is remarkable; thus it's such a pleasure to be able to see an orchestra doing this music. Finally, "Chaconne," very traditional, expertly danced by Maria Kowroski and Tyler Angle, plus of course the excellent corps. . . . I should add that a previous pleasure of this first day in New York was a lunch of oysters Rockefeller in the Oyster Bar at Grand Central.

Back to the ballet at 7:15 p.m. to listen to more string quartets first. Then an evening of spectacular dancing meant to show off Balanchine's growth. "Serenade" was of course first. I love the way it opens, with the ballerinas standing motionless with feet pointed straight, which means that they are not yet dancers. Then, as the music plays, suddenly every pair of feet spreads into first position. Now they have become dancers! And off they go. This was Mr. B's first ballet in America, premiered in 1935. Next in chronology came "Symphony in C," premiered in 1947. Finally "Agon," a landmark, of course, premiered in 1957 at the City Center, which means that perhaps we saw it in its first year or two since we went there so often (the balcony tickets costing only 75 cents). "Agon" was danced second tonight, out of order. We were in the second row, orchestra, because when I ordered the tickets the entire house was sold out except for these very expensive seats, center section on the aisle. And what a pleasure to be so close for the repeated displays of bravura dancing by both girls and boys—not to mention the especial pleasure of Stravinsky's music. I watched the pianist, who usually had just single notes to play, but when to play them was the question. "Symphony in C" came last—traditional ballet (especially when compared to "Agon") but with bravura dancing by Ashley Bouder (again), Chase Finlay, and two other amazing pairs. I don't think I am exaggerating when I consider Balanchine the Shakespeare of our day. Of course contemporary choreographers need to escape Balanchine, just the way playwrights following Shakespeare needed to escape him and late twentieth-century novelists to escape Joyce.

Sunday, January 25, 2015

Arrived at the Metropolitan Museum when it opened at 10:00 a.m. How nice to walk through its amazing galleries competing with almost no one else! We went to several special shows. First, El Greco, celebrating the 400th anniversary of his death (in 1614). A large room full of his paintings, most of which we had seen before because they are in the Met's collection, but also some others borrowed for this occasion, including a very elongated Saint Andrew, a photo of which we hope to send to Andrew Tebbe. I especially liked the "Vision of Saint John," a huge canvas with John ecstatic as he views the material for his Apocalypse. Also a strange "Holy Family" ca. 1585, with an ugly savior-baby suckling with puckered lips from the Virgin's very attractive breast. Nearby was a small room devoted to Caravaggio and lute-playing. Only two canvases, but lute music in the background, some ancient instruments displayed. Nice to see eminently "civilized" paintings by this infamous murderer and reprobate. But in the American wing we found an eminently "uncivilized" figure—who but John Brown, screaming, in a evocation of his madness by John Steuart Curry, dated 1939. We'd come to this area to see Thomas Hart Benton's mural "America Today," done for the New School for Social Research and based largely on Benton's many years in New York. So different from El Greco or Curry because so representational, even sociological (why not for a school of Social Research?). We passed quickly through the special exhibit of Cubism, admiring especially the polychrome canvases and not so much the monochrome ones. Finally to "Madame Cézanne," more that 40 paintings of the artist's wife, a not pretty middle-aged woman looking tired and overworked, with laundry most of the time. But how deeply this master entered her soul via the multiplicity of view! I forgot to add for the El Greco show that although I have always felt that our large print of "Toledo in the Storm" hanging in the Kendal hall outside our apartment is dull and that the original must be brighter, we found that the original— displayed at the Met—is just as dull. After all, Toledo is in a storm, not brightened by sunshine.

February 6, 2015

We went to a supper meeting at the Meeting House to discuss our views of money and how the Meeting should deal with the $168,000 in bequests we have received. During dinner, before the agenda began, I mentioned to Farzeen Mahmud, sitting across from me, my interest in hearing a retired US general being interviewed by Charlie Rose declare that the atrocities perpetrated by radical Moslem extremists can best be explained by the Koran. I wondered how she would react to this since she was raised a Moslem. But I had no forewarning of her extreme reaction. She broke into tears, could hardly speak, but did finally manage to say that since 9-11 the Moslem community has needed to defend itself against such accusations. She resented my question and we let it drop. My own reaction to all this was to feel a reaffirmation of my inability to share a Moslem's attachment to the Koran, which I find almost impossible to read. Obviously, I need to be educated in it, as she has been. But right now I'd rather spend my time playing the piano.

February 15, 2015

I played the second movement of the Pathétique sonata as the prelude for an Interfaith Gathering and the first variation of the Diabelli as the postlude. . . . Yesterday Joe Mehling came and photographed portraits of Chrysanthi and me, gratis. He has been a good friend for many years.

February 20, 2015

Played the second and third movements of the Mozart four-hand sonata in C major with Stan in the Cary Room. Forgot to repeat, once, but went back and did the repeat. Stan made his usual error of entering too soon at the end of the second movement but somehow we concluded together. Parts of both movements went well. We were no worse than some of the other performers.

February 21, 2015

Cambridge

Good to spend an hour with Dia and Wim at Au Bon Pain. Dia is still trying to update her "Census"! We were enchanted by the A.R.T.'s performance of Father Comes Home from the Wars, a brilliant play by Suzan-Lori Parks splendidly acted especially by Jenny Jules, who has already received numerous prizes. I'd love to see her in Twelfth Night. She would be as good as the almost incomparable Cherry Jones.

February 27, 2015

To New York City

Up early to get the bus to New York. But strangely for me, just before waking I had a dream that I remembered. I was in Athens, but strangely on the outskirts, reached by a small road something like our trail at the farm to reach the beavers. My car, "Petrakis" (!) was still in the garage, abandoned. I suddenly remembered that I was meant to lecture at my course in the university, opening day. I had only twenty minutes to get there and hadn't prepared, but figured I'd open the hour getting each of the students to introduce himself or herself. But how could I get there in time, or at all? I was dressing frantically when the alarm clock rang and I awoke.

We spent an hour or so in MoMA starting with the special exhibit of current art, most of which is ugliness and chaos par excellence yet with some few surprises of abstract beauty of color and design. Quiet dinner in the Yale Club served by Angela. It's fun to be greeted "Hello, Professor." Our first ballet was spectacular. Orchestra seats thanks to Nadia Stone in the Koch Theater administration, saving us from the next-to-last row in the top balcony, which Chrysanthi, with her acrophobia, would never have reached. Tonight was devoted to twenty-first century ballets, and every seat in the house was around $30.00 only. Afterwards, free beer and dancing for everyone on the Promenade. A festival. For me, the best of the three ballets tonight was choreographed by Alexei Ratmansky and created in 2014. His ability to make the dancers follow, exactly, the sudden changes in tempi, volume, mood, tonality of the music, Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," played on the piano by Cameron Grant, was extraordinary. The whole was an extended exposition of precision. Justin Peck's choreography for Aaron Copland's "Rōdē,ō" came next. Again fine, but I found the music more interesting than the dance: arhythmic, dissonant, always playful. But Tiler Peck and Amar Ramasar were perfectly matched in the pas de deux. This work was composed in 2015 and premiered only three weeks ago. Finally came Christopher Wheeldon's "Mercurial Manoeuvres" to music by Shostakovich, premiered in 2000. Again—indeed in all three of tonight's ballets—the music was just as interesting, perhaps more interesting, than the dance. This was Shostakovich's "Concerto in C minor for piano, trumpet, and string orchestra."

February 28, 2015

Met Jen Karsten at Lincoln Center at 12:30. She had read all my journal entries on Pendle Hill and had a list of questions to ask me. So we started in the Philharmonic Hall café, continued during ballet intermissions, and concluded over a Chinese supper on West 39th Street. She wanted to know about people I mentioned—e.g., Andy Towl, Janet Shepherd, Richard Barnes, Margery Walker, etc., etc.—and about my view of the Resident Program, which teachers had impressed me, which of my own courses went well, how the board dealt with, or neglected to deal with, Steve Baumgartner, why Dan Seeger was so resented, and so on and on. I had sufficient memory to answer most of these questions, probably because they were all generated by my journal. The entire procedure makes me feel, of course, that the journal can obviously interest other people besides myself, and that it contains (sometimes) information not available elsewhere. My lengthy account of the start of the colonels' coup d'état is another example. We all went to the ballet, again seated nicely in the orchestra. Chrysanthi and I were both quite amazed to view two Balanchine works we had never seen before: "Square Dance" with music by Corelli and Vivaldi, and "Harlequinade" with music by Riccardo Drigo. The first didn't seem to have anything to do with American square dancing, at least in this revised version (the original version included a caller shouting the steps). Very sedate and serene. It premiered in 1957 at the City Center. The second, in which Balanchine reworked Petipa, was a story ballet rich in scenery, costumes, slapstick, and of course spectacular dancing, not to mention solo violin bits (also in the Vivaldi-Corelli) played by Arturo Delmani. This sort of extravaganza makes us appreciate all the more Balanchine's bravery to break with such displays entirely in "Agon." . . . After supper we walked Jen to Penn Station, invited her to visit us at the farm in the summer when she and her husband and daughter drive north (he is a native of Montreal), and continued to the Mint Theater to see the revival of Ferenc Molnár's play Fashions for Men, which premiered in New York in 1922, about a shopkeeper in Budapest who is so kind-hearted and ethical that he seems stupidly naïve. Pure fun, nothing serious, but very well acted. What impressed me the most was how well made this well-made play was. Tiny bits of conversation in advance, always compatible with the current context, always made later events, personalities, or conflicts comprehensible. Any young aspiring playwright hoping to use nineteenth-century technique would do well to study Molnár.

March 1, 2015

Ji Hyae Lee, for whom I did the medical application letter, notified me that she has been accepted by three medical schools. She is delighted, and very thankful. She is the one who labored to revive mediation at Dartmouth. She hopes to continue to sponsor mediation in medical school as well. A propos, another Korean female student, my favorite among those we interviewed last Wednesday for the Lewin Fellowship (she was our number 2, however), wants to meet with me. We'll have lunch on Thursday. I was especially pleased because she had served for three years as a tutor in the composition tutoring program that I founded in the late 1970s, and has also been a War and Peace Studies fellow in the program that I co-founded.

March 14, 2015

Heard today from the Associate Dean for Humanities and Arts, Adrian Randolph, that he will subsidize the publication of my journal in the amount of $4000. Hooray! Mike Burton, president of the University Press of New England, will manage the whole process, but the actual work of setting the massive text in print will be done by Scott Cahoon of Passumpsic Publishing in St. Johnsbury, Vermont. I've figured that the total length of the electronic text from 1948 to 2014 is 32 megabytes. The typewritten text comes to 2646 single-spaced pages.

March 16, 2015

Mailed the journal today, the whole monster on a single disk, to Scott Cahoon for setting in type. The electronic result, Mike Burton tells me, will be available for Kindle, Nook, etc., and perhaps listed on Amazon. Also, a printed version (which would probably require three or four volumes) could be done at extra cost. I have no idea how further entries in the journal will be added. I joked with Chrysanthi that now I have nothing to do, and she pointed to all the old files, etc. in my room that need to be sorted and (one hopes) discarded. But immediately the computer brought new jobs. Lewis Owens wants me to read his play again, in its newest version. Georges Stassinakis wants me to copyedit the latest number of "Synthesis." Alessandro Falcetta wants my opinion on his thesis on Rendel Harris. Someone else wants my opinion of a play he wrote on "the life and times of Zorba the Greek." And Dan Seeger sent his position paper called "Why Develop a Model Bill of Rights for CCRC Residents?"

Ella Erway encouraged me to add some clarification to recent discussions about the proper size for Kendal future. I wrote the following response, which will be distributed in the good “Forum” that Clinton Gardner manages here:

HOW MANY APARTMENTS?

There is much discussion here about the proper number of apartments. Should that number be 250, as at present, or perhaps 280, as has been proposed? Should the decision be based on some determination of how many people enhance a community, how many weaken a community, or whether a certain number of dwellings is appropriate for a particular terrain and acreage or inappropriate? I don't know. But I thought it would be interesting to compare our real and suggested numbers with numbers elsewhere in the wider Kendal community. The first Kendal, at Longwood, now has 261 residences, an enlargement over its original number. Crosslands, the second Kendal to be built, has 275 residences. We were the third. Of the total number of Kendal Corporation facilities, currently 13, Granville is the smallest, with 134 residences, and Collington the largest, with 361. These ranges probably indicate that a viable community can exist given all the existing sizes, which might mean that a proper number of residences depends more on particular terrain and acreage or on considerations of recruitment—the existence of competing CCRCs nearby, the type and extent of the nearby population, etc. In our own case, I doubt that the magic number of 250 residences with about 400 people was chosen because it was determined to be perfect for a viable community. Our size had much more to do with the nature of the sloping land with its esker and ravines, compared for example to the sweetly rolling farmland of Longwood and Crosslands. Our main considerations in future expansion should be, in my opinion, those of needed or non-needed equivalent expansions in dining, healthcare, Gathering Room, etc., and those relating to the future cohesiveness of the community—that is, whether it will all fit together physically (not to mention economically, culturally, etc.) as it now does well enough despite the slope and esker, or whether one section will be a sort of distant annex removed from the whole. I do not have any magic answers to these considerations, but I do hope that they will be discussed.

Weezie Pietsch has invited us to a special dinner at a restaurant on March 28 to celebrate her 75th birthday. We're delighted to be with this good friend's family, who are traveling here from vast distances for the event. I composed a sonnet for the occasion:

A SONNET: WORRYING ABOUT THE NAME WEEZIE

Why did they reduce the dec'rous Louise to that demotic soubriquet Weezie?

Louise is surely not a Portuguese corruption or anything quite so sleazy;

without a doubt it puts us at our ease while th' other makes us so very queasy even sneezy when we voice its uneasy articulation, causing us to freeze.

But Louise is Santa de Marillac while Weezie's a spoof, great fun to be sure, an open avenue, not a cul-de-sac;

quite the moniker for an epicure, not for a snooty hypochondriac but for our best friend, weeziely secure.

Going through my files yesterday in order to throw away masses of accumulation, I found another sonnet, this one written for George Draper when he retired from the presidency of the American Farm School in May 1999. It's not in my 1999 journal. So why not record it here?

A SONNET FOR GEORGE DRAPER ON HIS (DUBIOUS) PASSAGE FROM PRESIDING TO PRESUMING

Presiding, George, is acting with authority even when you do not know what to do.
Presuming is venturing with audacity because something could or might be true.

Is this your passage from presiding to presuming? Or do prexies presume more than they preside? Is uncertainty taboo in rules of administrative behavior?

Thessaloniki to Boston and Maine, okhtapódhi tighanitó to cod and baked beans, is a passage not to disdain, nor to replace gallop with sluggardly plod.
Your (dubious) passage from presiding to presuming is surely not backsliding.

I spent this entire week reading Alessandro Falcetta's huge dissertation on Rendel Harris. I had helped him when we were at Woodbrooke together twenty years ago, introducing him to Bryer, for example. Now he has completed this 500-page exhaustive intellectual biography that I couldn't put down because it touched so many things in my own life either directly or indirectly. If I'd been more assiduous I would have copied numerous passages into this commonplace book. I did type just a few into the computer, however:

"This was a mistake; for with years I am more and more clear that the significant man does more for a pupil by his mere personality than a dozen lectures full of useful information dictated by an ordinary person, however correct; and most College lecturers are ordinary people. For instance, I constantly think of two lectures by Rendel Harris that I heard—I might say that I watched; for his Woodbrooke audience, gathered from Britain, the United States, Holland and Norway, with stray people of other origins and abodes, was part of it. He took two hours (on separate days) to give us what a commonplace person would have told us in ten minutes or less; only in that case it would probably all have been forgotten; as it was, it was an experience, and a landmark. The whole class was enlisted, and there and then worked the matter out. The question was the date of Christ's birth, and we all started calculating about Cyrenius and the year of the Greeks and so forth, the orthodox ones never guessing that they were engaged in Higher Criticism; it was all so natural, right and inevitable."
(p. 266)

"In Constantinople the Doctor was much impressed with the stout legs of the Greek girls. So he proposed this hopeless conundrum. Why are the Greek girls like the Prodigal Son? Because they go in for fatted calves.” (p. 450)

Rendel concluded with his ideas about paradise.

“Paradise, in the religious sense, has always been difficult to define: The ancients pictured it as a park, with a good water supply, and plenty of vegetables. I am not interested in gardening or greengrocery, and only remotely in irrigation. My earthly Paradise is a cross between the British Museum and a second hand bookshop. It is packed with first editions and radiant with lost authors. Prospero, in the Tempest, had something of a similar definition. Books, said he, that I valued above my kingdom.” (p. 468)

“As a good protestant, Rendel opposed merits to mercy. In one of his devotional writings he considered it to be wrong to believe that merits will take one to heaven. This was in his view a cheap way to reach the desired final destination. ‘Life-work is not sufficient. Judged by the Divine standard, there is not enough either of life or of work to form a justification for living or for working.’ In another devotional he observed: ‘one mark of sanctity, and a part of the price that must be paid for it, is anonymity.’” (p. 529)

Out for supper tonight to a restaurant for Weezie’s 75th birthday celebration. Lovely to meet her two sons and daughter and two grandsons. Lots of speeches about her supreme qualities as a mother, and I read my sonnet of course about Weezie vs. Louise. Sat with her youngest son, who lives in Seattle and went to Dartmouth and spends part of his summers in the Adirondacks, so we didn’t lack for subjects to talk about. Before dinner, standing for a long time and talking to two ex-New Yorkers about the Philharmonic and Russian Tea Room and Automat and Schraffts, my two legs turned numb but luckily there was a chair right next to me, so I didn’t collapse onto the floor the way I had many years ago at Pendle Hill owing to the same problem.

I’m the next speaker, in May, at the Professors’ Colloquium. My subject is Beveridge Webster, and I plan to play some recordings. Bob Sokol, who runs each event, always starts with a bio of the speaker. So I wrote one out for him today, as follows:

Peter Bien was born in New York City, where his mother brought him regularly to the Children's Concerts of the New York Philharmonic. He was educated in the Bronx High School of Science, Deerfield Academy, Harvard College, Haverford College (B.A. in music), Columbia University (doctorate in English and Comparative Literature) and the University of Bristol in England.

After college, The American Friends Service Committee sent him to Holland to an international work camp aiding an institute for Down's Syndrome patients. During the Korean War he did alternative military service in Rochester, New York as a surgical technician, co-directing two Quaker summer work camps in the Black ghetto there and studying piano for a year at the Eastman School of Music. Returning to Europe at age 24, he met Chrysanthi in England at a Quaker adult education center. They were married in Greece, where he lived for a year learning the language from elementary school textbooks supplied by his father-in-law, headmaster of the local school. Columbia and Bristol came next, followed by employment in 1961 by Dartmouth College, where he was active for 36 years, teaching in the English Department, the Comparative Literature Program, and the Classics Department, always playing chamber music, but not practicing for three decades until he and Chrysanthi came to Kendal in 2002.

They have three children. The oldest lives outside of Washington, D.C. He is a professional pianist and his wife is a violinist in the National Symphony. The middle child teaches music and conducts the string orchestra in the British International School in Bangkok, Thailand. The youngest, who worked originally with the Simon and Schuster publishing house in New York, is now busy with three children in California. The entire family has gathered regularly at the 120-acre farm that Peter bought in the Adirondacks in 1950 while a sophomore at Harvard, and where Chrysanthi has proved herself admirably skilled at chinking their log cabin.

Beginning in 1984, along with a group of Hanover Quakers, Peter was active in making Kendal a reality, and is especially happy to have played a role in bringing here the extraordinary musician Beveridge Webster, the subject of his talk today.

Having finally read material sent me a long time ago by Tasos Apostolidis, I wrote him the following letter:

2015-04-07

Αγαπητέ Τάσο,

Επιτέλους, ύστερα από μεγάλη καθυστέρηση, διάβασα το άρθρο στη «Θεσσαλονικέων Πόλις» για τους δυσκούς των κόμικς, το οποίο μου το έστειλες προ πολλού. Είχα μια λίστα άρθρων, βιβλίων, μελετών από φίλους και συναδέλφους να διαβάσω, μα την έβαλα στο περιθώριο ώσπου να τελειώσω δύο τεράστια δικά μου σχέδια: (α') να ξαναμεταφράσω στ' αγγλικά τον «Ζορμπά» του Καζαντζάκη, (β') να ετοιμάσω το ημερολόγιό μου, που αρχίζει από το 1948 και πάει μέχρι σήμερα, για ηλεκτρονική έκδοση. Η μετάφραση δημοσιεύτηκε προ λίγου—βρίσκεται κιόλας ένα αντίγραφο στη βιβλιοθήκη της Αμερικανικής Γεωργικής Σχολής. Χρειάστηκε να ξαναμεταφραστεί επειδή ο προηγούμενος μεταφραστής δε κατάλαβε νεαελληνικά κι γι' αυτό χρησιμοποίησε μια μετάφραση του βιβλίου στα γαλλικά με το αποτέλεσμα ότι όλα τα λάθη και τις παραλείψεις της γαλλικής εκδοχής συνεχίζονται σ' αυτή την πρώτη μετάφραση στ' αγγλικά. Η δεύτερη, δική μου μετάφραση βασίστηκε αποκλειστικά στο πρωτότυπο κείμενο στην νεοελληνική γλώσσα, που σημαίνει ότι διαφέρει αρκετά από τη προηγούμενη εκδοχή. Όσο για το ημερολόγιο, η δυσκολία ήταν κυρίως το μέγεθος—κοντεύει σε 3.000 σελίδες. Έπρεπε να δουλεύω αρκετούς μήνες για να διορθώσω τα τυπογραφικά λάθη και να βελτιώσω άλλα ελαττώματα· τώρα όμως γίνεται η στοιχειοθεσία.

Περιμένοντας να τελειώσει αυτή η διαδικασία, αισθάνομαι για πρώτη φορά ότι δεν κάθεται τίποτα στο πιάτο μου (προσωρινά, ελπίζω) και συνεπώς ξαναβρήκα τη λίστα άρθρων, βιβλίων, μελετών που καθότανε τόσους μήνες στον υπολογιστή μου. Διαβάζοντας για τους δυσκούς των κόμικς, έψαξα για τα αντίγραφα των κόμικς σου που αγόρασα πριν από πολλά χρόνια στη Θεσσαλονίκη, μερικά στ' αγγλικά, μερικά στ' ελληνικά, και τα ξανακοίταξα. Το ευνοούμενο για μένα παραμένει η «Λυσιστράτη», αλλά εννοείται ότι δεν κατέχω τα κόμικς που βγήκαν πιο πρόσφατα. Χαίρομαι που, τώρα που απαλλάχτηκες από τις ευθύνες της Σχολής, ξαναγυρίζεις σε αυτή τη τέχνη.

Χαίρομαι επίσης που είδατε με τη Ντόρα το Νοέμβριο τη Χρήσανθη και τη κόρη μας τη Δάφνη όταν ήρθαν για τρεις μονάχα μέρες στη Θεσσαλονίκη. Μακάρι να ξαναβρεθώ καμιά φορά κι εγώ εκεί, αλλά αμφιβάλλω αν θα ξαναπάω.

Πάντως, σας εύχομαι το κάθε καλό !

Εγκάρδια,
Πήτερ

He replied immediately:

ΠΗΤΕΡ,

Χάρηκα πολύ με το γράμμα σου! Χαίρομαι πολύ που είσαι πάντα ανήσυχος και δημιουργικός. Να συνεχίσεις έτσι πολλά πολλά χρόνια! . . .

Μέχρι το τέλος του 2015 θα βρίσκομαι στη Σχολή ως σύμβουλος Προέδρου. Έτσι πηγαίνω λίγες ώρες την ημέρα. Τις υπόλοιπες πράγματι ασχολούμαι με την Τέχνη μου.

Έχουν κυκλοφορήσει 11 βιβλία—κόμικς μου στα αγγλικά, γαλλικά, γερμανικά και φέτος 2 και σε λίγο καιρό θα γίνουν 6 στα τουρκικά!

Έχω δε την τιμή να πωλούνται στο Μουσείο της Ακρόπολης και σε άλλα πωλητήρια κέντρων πολιτισμού.

Ήταν μεγάλη η χαρά μας που είδαμε τη Χρυσάνθη με τη Δάφνη και θα χαρούμε ακόμη περισσότερο αν ξαναβρεθούμε όλοι μαζί! . . .

ΦΙΛΙΑ ΚΑΙ ΧΑΙΡΕΤΙΣΜΑΤΑ ΣΕ ΟΛΟΥΣ ΑΠΟ ΤΗ ΔΩΡΑ ΤΗ ΖΩΗ ΚΙ ΕΜΕΝΑ. ΝΑ ΕΙΣΤΕ ΠΑΝΤΑ ΚΑΛΑ.

I've been cleaning, urged by Chrysanthi, and discarding many records of my previous academic life. Most recently: dozens of the small disks on which everything used to be stored from the Apple computer. I actually had an external device—indeed two of them—enabling these disks to be read on the massively evolved computers of today (with luck). So I went through all of these small disks, discarding many outright. Those left, about 75, I put into my external device yesterday. Perhaps ten of them showed up on the finder. And of those ten, only one was readable; the others required missing applications, or whatever. Yet the one-only readable text that I was able to save in this way was Chrysanthi's memory of her mother, as follows:

MAGDALENE SAMARA YANNAKOU

by Chrysanthi Yannakou Bien

I remember my mother as a tall, beautiful lady. She wore a light chocolate color dress made of pure silk; it was long, down to her ankles, and was gathered at the waist and with a fitted bodice, and a large opening around her neck. A golden cross and golden chain decorated her beautiful face. On her head she had a lighter-colored kerchief with a bow on the side near her ear, and long elegant earrings matching her golden chain. She put very light powder on her face and a very light blush, and always light lipstick. I think she wanted to look beautiful but naturally.

I still feel in my bones her smile, her modesty, and her kindness. She was the "lady" of the village. Because my father was principal of two schools, she had to entertain a lot. I remember the parties we had in our house. My father was very proud of my mother and included her in all his out-of-school activities.

My father, Demetrios Yannakos, was a sociable person. He loved to sing and to play the mandolin. He was obsessed with church psalms. He left home very early in the morning before we all got up. He made his own breakfast—usually eels cooked on charcoal, bread, and milk. Then he went on foot to his schools to light the wood stoves so the schools could be warm before the teachers and children arrived for class. He walked through fields and hills from one village to the other. I remember once he told us that he saw a wolf early in the morning.

My mother was from a rather wealthy family. She didn't continue school because her father thought it was unnecessary for his beautiful girl to work so hard. "We will find a rich man. We have a good dowry," he used to say. So my mother spent her time embroidering, sewing, knitting, cooking, and being a good girl for her father. But things turned out their own way. My father—a poor, educated, handsome young man—fell in love with my mother. He saw her on her balcony when he was sitting with his friends in a coffee shop across from her house. They flirted with each other from a distance. The next day he went again at the same time to the same coffee shop. He saw her again and instantly was determined to get to know her more, but he couldn't. So he got very brave and went right to her home to talk to her father. Her father was very flattered to have the village's teacher as his son-in-law, but even happier probably because this man (my father) did not ask for a dowry! My father was a man before his time. He used to say, "A man who demands a dowry is not sincere, nor is he a real man." So my mother became the wife of the school principal.

She gave birth to four children and lived in the village very happily until my father announced that they had to go to the city so their children could continue their education (the village had no high school). What a sacrifice for both of them! They left their beautiful lives and we all squeezed into a very old taxi and went to Thessaloniki.

I remember the trip. I was almost five years old. I was very excited but very sad. I left behind all my friends. I wonder what my mother had in her mind. In Thessaloniki my mother felt out of place. The clothes she wore looked funny to the city people. Her beautiful kerchief on her head with a bow looked ridiculous. Her open décolleté with her golden cross and chain made her look like the city's cheap women. The more I remember the first year in the city the more I appreciate my mother. I wonder how—dressed like a clown in a place where everyone else was dressed city-style—she continued to live in a small apartment with four misplaced children, and a husband who was away all day long in school. The neighbors laughed every time they saw my mother. It became so bad that one day my father said, "Loudha [my mother's nickname], I arranged with a seamstress to come tomorrow to make your clothes like everyone else's." I remember that my mother cried. I don't know whether she was happy or scared of the forthcoming metamorphosis. Was she thinking of her identity? Where did her pride go? Where had her beautiful, sociable, dignified life gone? Tomorrow she was going to be a transformed lady. But she did this in the way she did many other hard things. She was strong, with a loving husband.

The years went by. We went to school. We changed apartments. And as the children grew, so did the problems. The Germans occupied Greece in April 1941. We had poverty, famine, bombs, then civil war, arrests, prison, sickness. My mother's life was full of ups and downs. I remember one New Year's when all our neighbors were celebrating and our apartment was full of Gestapo torturing my father, abusing my mother, using their boots to kick my sister and myself out of bed to make us confess and tell them where my brother Odysseus was (a law student, he had joined the resistance against the Nazis). So the family had to suffer until he was captured. After that I didn't see my mother, for she was arrested, as was my father, and sent to prison for eleven months on a deserted island where she was hungry, cold, and very sick. Many mothers in such prisons returned home sooner because they couldn't tolerate any more torture and thus signed a paper saying, "I do not acknowledge my son as my son because he is a traitor to our country." My mother could not make herself sign such a declaration, so she stayed on the island until the Germans were forced to leave Greece in October 1944. An amnesty was granted then, and she returned home. She had a sad smile and looked old and sickly, but tried to be courageous, strong, and protective, as always, and apologetic. Why apologetic? The last time we had seen each other was in prison where we were together for fifty days, after which we were suddenly separated without hugging and kissing each other. She was apologetic. Looking at me, she hugged me and asked me to forgive her for what I had gone through. Why did she do that? What did she mean? I didn't understand, but now I do. It was because her son had made me suffer—so she took the blame on herself.

After that, we had happy times together, with marriages and grandchildren. But she always had a pain in her heart because of her lost son. Was he alive? Was he dead? Was he suffering? These questions tortured her for thirty years. When she was dying I fortunately was by her side. She opened her eyes and said, "I won't see him home. Maybe in the other world. But you, Chrysanthi, go for a walk with your friends. You are too beautiful to stay here."

And she closed her eyes, murmuring, “The young with the young, the old with the old, the dead with the dead.”

Two weeks after her death, my brother Odysseus returned to Greece after thirty years as a political refugee in the Soviet Union, bringing with him a wonderful wife and two beautiful children.

April 26, 2015

Kendal showed the Zorba movie tonight with me giving an introduction for fifteen minutes beforehand, about the new translation and some experiences when I was on the film set in 1964. It's interesting how many elements in the film I seem to recognize although I've seen it probably four or five times. It seemed so completely accurate to the Greece that I knew and experienced in the 1950s and 1960s. Also, I appreciated the elements of dialogue that Cacoyannis chose to preserve from the book, even though Stavridakis is nowhere nor is the Boss's regeneration as a writer. A good crowd came and many seemed to find the movie very powerful. I emphasized a symbolic approach—Kazantzakis's effort in the famine of 1941 following the German invasion when all was lost, to examine and project that element in Greece and Greeks that somehow survives.

Last week I got involved, and into a bit of trouble, at Kendal owing to its official expansion plans and an alternative plan offered to oppose the official one. The crux is the proposed construction of thirty new, elaborate, expensive apartments, income from which is meant to provide for renovation in the health center, Gathering Room, etc. The alternative plan eliminates the thirty new apartments and some of the other proposed changes, greatly reducing the total cost. I liked the alternative proposal and e-mailed its three proponents favorably, even suggesting that they encourage folks to vote No for expansion of residential units on the ballot at Town Meeting on May 12. Somehow, unknown to me and without my permission, this private letter got displayed on Clinton Gardner's internet Forum (he later apologized for his thoughtlessness in doing this) and then, worse, as a page placed in everyone's Kendal mailbox repeating the Forum letter from me and my suggestion about voting. This was very bad, since we do not want political messages in the mailboxes and also since I didn't understand how the ballot worked. I subsequently learned that the question of added residential units was one of a total of seven items about CCRCs that needed to be voted Yes or No in the aggregate, and that the other six were innocuous and useful. I wrote a retraction, which Clint did not print in the Forum until I spoke to him three days later. Meanwhile many people, incredulous, asked me for explanations. Of course my sentiments were directly opposed to the “official” plans proposed by Becky Smith, Stan Pelli, the Board of Directors, and the Kendal Corporation. Chrysanthi reacted in dismay, somehow equating our present situation with that of her family under the Nazis in Greece. But, as so often happens, people begin soon to forget, so that now, nine days after the appearance of my sentiments in the Forum, I think that there really is no more problem.

April 27, 2015

But a real problem has developed, and one that may not go away so quickly. It seems that I am suffering from actinic cheilitis, pre-cancerous evidence in my lower lip owing, they say, to sunlight over many years. At the moment I am sitting in the hospital as I undergo my initial treatment with a cream called Levulan that will soon be activated by “blue light” for fifteen minutes and forty seconds if I can stand it. This is supposed to destroy the offending cells. We’ll see . . . and hope for the best. Apparently there will be three treatments each separated by six weeks. Later: the fifteen minutes and forty seconds under the blue light wasn’t bad. No real pain, just a strong tingling in the lip. And afterward in late afternoon and evening no discomfort at all, no trouble eating supper. It’s almost as if nothing had happened, but I do hope that the offending cells are dying . . . gently.

May 6, 2015

Very nice music tonight with Dick and Allan. We played the second Brandenburg quite well—it isn’t that difficult—and the fifth Brandenburg not so well, but it was still satisfying. With Stan Udy, Joan Wilson, and Joan Snell I am now preparing the overture to Don Giovanni to play in the Cary Room on May 15th.

May 8, 2015

Terpni

Last September, as an experiment, I left the tiller with its tank filled with 91 octane gasoline without ethanol. Today, happily, the tiller started immediately and easily, and worked well. So I purchased more 91 gas without ethanol and hope to use it everywhere to avoid the ethanol problem.

Earl drove up. He shot two ten-point bucks last season, but is alienated from his wife's family, the Morrises, down the road. That's the news!

May 12, 2015

A very lucky day! In the morning I received word that I had won the MGSA translation prize of $500 for my Zorba. In the evening, at Town Meeting, I learned that the town, amazingly, had defeated the regulation permitting Kendal to build more apartments than its present 250, 637 votes to 548—in other words, by a comfortable margin. This delighted (and surprised) me.

May 15, 2015

Our eight-hand group played the overture to Don Giovanni truly well today in the Cary Room. It was real music, not just notes.

May 18, 2015

Bought a new car today, another Chevrolet Malibu. Chrysanthi figured that if we can drive perhaps another five years we ought to have a car that won't cause us trouble during that period.

May 20, 2015

Drove to the farm last evening in our new car. Planted tomatoes, lettuce, potatoes today, tilled the entire garden, fixed the black paper that had been dislodged by wind, started the White using non-ethanol gas. Most important, a technician from Direct TV replaced our disk on the porch roof; thus we retired with "I Love Lucy" and Charlie Rose!

May 22, 2015

Worried about frost at the farm last night, when the prediction called for 28 degrees. But we were lucky: the lowest was 34 degrees.

Yesterday, at Kendal, I officiated at our monthly "Death Café" event. I was asked to do this by Barbara Taylor, who earlier this month called me to her apartment to announce that she had decided to end her life by starvation and thus would be dead before the event took place—as she was. So of course I announced it as a memorial to her. By her request, I read appropriate poetry: Milton, Shakespeare, Harkianakis, Cavafy, Marvel, Herrick, plus a paragraph from Montaigne's "That to Philosophize Is to Learn to Die" and another from Lucretius's "De Rerum Natura." I had planned to end with some of Kenneth Boulding's sonnets but did not, in order to leave time for discussion, which concentrated on the question of an afterlife—ignored totally by all the poetry I read. As Andrew Marvel says, “The grave’s a fine and private place, / But none, I think, do there embrace.”

May 30, 2015

Memorial service today for Barbara Taylor with all four children speaking and Frank Logan playing Gershwin—all designed by Barbara herself, who insisted that the service “be not religious” although it was conducted by Weezie and Avery. Yet in its own way it was religious, because it had an integrity and was governed by love. Even the music, especially the Gershwin, was equal to Bach. One of the children read Cavafy’s “Ithaca,” which of course I included in the Death Café. Clearly it speaks to Barbara’s condition. In the section of the service where anyone could give testimony, I recounted how in my last interview with her when she told me about her decision to end her life through starvation, her personality then changed remarkably—it was no longer “commanding.” One of the service’s best moments was when the children attested that Barbara’s many years at Kendal were among the happiest of her life, affirming the power that Kendal certainly may have.

A week ago Dick Williamson broke his hip. He spilled water in his kitchen, then slipped on the same water as he bent down to wipe it up. The first time I visited him in the hospital I was frightened. He was totally irrational, with slurred voice as though drunk or drugged, and was accusing me of various imagined misdemeanors. I spoke with the nurses afterwards, who said he had been that way off and on all day. The next day he was much better. But the third day he still mixed rationality with totally fantastical moments. We all feel sorry for him because he is so totally alone—no family, no children, no wife, nobody. He always disparaged Kendal, where of course he would be so much better off at a time like this. On the second day I brought him his favorite roast beef sandwich from Stinson’s on Allen Street. Not even a thank you! Oh well . . . Now he is in restorative care in Lebanon. The only person who seems to be following everything is the Math Department secretary, whom he once described as mothering the entire department. Lucky Dick!

June 2, 2015

Read this about Trollope in the TLS (April 24, 2015, p. 3): “He did not fear death. . . . But what he did fear, to the pitch of sheer terror, was idleness. . . . He confided to his son . . . , ‘As long as I can write books, even though they be not published, I think that I can be happy.’” This struck me as applying to myself right now. For the first time in my professional life I have no writing to do.

June 4, 2015

Leander played here in our Webster series, four-hand piano with his fellow teacher at Kinhaven, Andrew Harley. They did the Mozart C major sonata especially for Stan Udy and me, since we had played it earlier in the year, followed by the Brahms sixteen waltzes and Schubert’s Fugue in E minor and, lastly, his Lebensstürme. Everything was beautifully musical and much appreciated by our audience.

June 8, 2015

To the hospital for the second of my treatments for actinic cheilitis. But Dr. Chapman said, “Your lip has no sign any longer of actinic cheilitis; thus there is no need now for treatment. But it may come back in a year or so. Thus I’ll want to keep seeing you every six months.”

June 9, 2015

Hanover to Riparius

In the morning, Chrysanthi, who is serving now on Council, attended her final meeting. In the afternoon we migrated, happily, to the farm. I’m eager now to get the tractor started and to begin another year of mowing at our amazing paradise where, on July 17th, all children and grandchildren will be present for our sixtieth anniversary dinner. But what will I be writing this summer and beyond? That remains a big question. Dr. Chapman told me that an eighty-five year old person in my good health usually lives another ten years. Can I remain productive during that time or at least part of it? If Chrysanthi dies before me, it will be as if my two arms or two legs have been amputated; conversely, if I die before her she will be bereft of all the ways in which each day I enable her to cope. The answer in both cases, fortunately, is Kendal, which pampers us totally—something increasingly evident now, since we are at the farm needing to care for ourselves. Most of my life has been nurtured by splendid institutions—Deerfield, Harvard, Haverford, Pendle Hill, Woodbrooke, Columbia, Dartmouth, Bristol, various Quaker Meetings, Kinhaven, the Farm School—and now, finally, definitively, Kendal, which (everyone keeps telling me) I founded. Nevertheless, I don’t want my remaining years to be increasingly pampered and empty.

Terpni

To town to meet Ed and Donna to attend a concert with a very good bassoonist plus a string quartet. Donna brought me their copy of The New Yorker with another piece, a very short one, by Daniyal Mueenuddin, about his amazing father, an Oxford-educated grandee in pre-partition India.

June 17, 2015

Long visit from Earl. Interestingly, when I mentioned that our beavers were building another dam south of the triple dam on Vly Brook, he said that beavers always do this as a way of teaching the young—together with the young they construct a new dam or at least part of one, mainly for instructional purposes. Amazing!

June 18, 2015

Working in my office this morning (final check on Journal 2014 for Scott Cahoon), I was accompanied by a loud gnawing noise, obviously from a mouse creating a nest in one of the beams overhead. And at one point I actually saw Madame Mouse with her mouth filled with chips of beam-wood climbing back to the site.

June 24, 2015

Another pleasing testimonial arrived from a former student—Daniel Daley, who studied Ulysses, Woolf, Kazantzakis with me in . . . 1968 (!) together with his friend Ed Levin. He writes that he and Ed “often spoke of the pleasure and excitement of being in your classroom and its impact on our thinking and appreciation for life.” He continues, “I read Ulysses three times in my early 20’s. Now after a life of work and family I am delving deeply into Beckett.” These testimonials perplex me because I had then, nor do I have now, no comprehension whatever of why I seemed to be effective in the classroom, at least for some of the students.

July 8, 2015

We’ve done lots on the farm. Repaired problems on my yellow birch over the office—large branches needing to be removed because rotted. Alec trimmed all around the south field and I started mowing except where wild blueberries exist (Monica is collecting). Also trimmed both willows of various dead branches. Alec and the children removed the hardware cloth around the Guest House, brushed away dust, etc. on the walls, and began to reapply brown stain. Afterwards we’ll repaint the gray trim and affix a new metal roof, probably colored green to match the door from 3902 47th Street, Sunnyside.

July 11, 2015

A beautiful matinee at the ballet with Alec and family. “Interplay” (Morton Gound/Robbins), “Tarantella” (Gottschalk/Balanchine) danced with verve by Ashley Boudier and Joaquin de Luz, “Symphony in Three Movements” (Stravinsky/Balanchine), and finally “Western Symphony” (Hershy Kay/Balanchine). Unbelievably, Chrysanthi and I had not seen any of these before. Of course the Stravinsky was the best music, but the others were OK and the Kay had two tuba solos! Marvelous dancing, as always. . . . Afterwards we had a date to meet for supper with Arturo Delmoni at the restaurant 50 South at 5:00 p.m. I thought I had directions but they were entirely wrong, taking us on Route 50 north instead of South. We telephoned and were given very circuitous directions to go to exit 12 on Interstate 87, then on route 67, again in the opposite direction. Finally we got Arturo himself on the telephone and arrived over an hour late. But he was so upbeat and gracious, full of good humor, enchanted especially by Elena, hoping that Alec can arrange for him to play with the Bangkok Symphony Orchestra, etc. So we had a leisurely dinner filled with laughter and conversation until about 7:30, when he needed to return to play the evening performance.

July 12, 2015

Observed today a real miracle for the first time. Some large, very green oak leaves were protruding from beneath my metal valise in my office and I decided to pull them up. They came up intact with their stem, which issued from the acorn that I pulled out of the ground. So for the first time I saw a “generating” acorn. By some exquisite miracle, the slender stem issues from its insides, produces into open air, branches into immense green leaves and, if in the right location (obviously not inside my office) grows in thirty or forty years into a substantial tree. I’ve seen, of course, so many acorns simply on the ground, where they are often taken and stored by squirrels or chipmunks.

July 15, 2015

Painted the screen door of the Guest House a lovely shade of green, matching the grass outside. Alec, Monica, Theo, and Elena painted all the trim a dark gray. We’re waiting now for Murphy’s to deliver the metal for the new roof.

July 16, 2015

Daphne and family arrived. We are fifteen here now. They brought me donuts and canned Ιμάμ μπαϊλντί, and a beautiful photo memory of the Salonika trip last November for Chrysanthi. The photos of her and Daphne together in Athens make it difficult to tell who is the mother and who the daughter!

July 17, 2015

Our sixtieth! How lucky we both are to have had such a good marriage! In my case doubly good because, beyond the family success, it led to my major academic interest and success. A pleasure to see our three children who obviously like each other, and the grandchildren who—with the exception of Christina, alas—are vigorous and inquisitive and accomplished—even Nicholas, who seemed more approachable than I’ve experienced him previously. We all went out for a dinner at the Adirondack Café in Pottersville after taking family photos and listening to my 45-minute recital of nuggets from my journal pertaining to children and grandchildren.

July 19, 2015

Today I completed the extensive answers, in Greek, to Mathioudakis's interview with me that will appear in a Greek literary periodical. It has been a good exercise.

July 20, 2015

Finished mowing the south field. Και του χρόνου !;

July 21, 2015

Alec, helped by Leander and me, completed the new metal roof on the guest House, which now has been completely upgraded on the exterior.

July 22, 2015

We went with Alec's wagon, now fully legal because the non-blinking rear light was fixed, to the Nettle Meadow goat farm to get a load of manure. The owner, on our arrival, said a goat had been born 15 minutes ago and went and brought it to us. About seven pounds, with fur already, and able to walk. They pasteurize the mother's milk to guard against disease and feed the newborn with bottles. The cash "crop" is cheese, made from goat's and sheep's milk. Thousands of pounds, all of which they sell mostly via internet. There is a huge barn with a marvelous vaulted roof. We shoveled the large amount of manure into a pile at the back end of our garden and hope to see improved plants and yields in the future.

I sent the following e-mail to Larry Ingle after finishing his book Nixon's First Cover-Up: The Religious Life of a Quaker President. "Dear Larry, I read your book with interest and pleasure. When you first announced this project, decades ago, the general opinion of others (and yourself, too, I think) was that you would find very little relevant material. But the book proves otherwise since poor Nixon, despite all his hang-ups, was always clinging in some fashion to his mother's 'sanctity.' The major thing I needed to learn in reading the book was how different my own Eastern, liberal, silent Quakerism is from the Quaker Church that nourished (if that is the right word) Nixon. I have never participated in an evangelical Quaker service, although I did witness bits of one a few times when a Kenyan Quaker pastor at Pendle Hill organized the morning worship there. You are helpful in repeatedly emphasizing the important difference between liberal and evangelical Quakerism, and—contrariwise—remembering that both (up to a point) are pacifist.

I was also interested in the book's treatment of Herbert Hoover, not very extensive and yet helpful in enabling us to sense his difficult relationship to his religious origins. I once toured the Hoover Museum in Stanford University and came away with great admiration for this man, at least for the pre-presidential part of his career. I come away from your book with more positive feelings about Nixon than I had before. Previously for so many of us, he was the sort of crook from whom you wouldn't even want to buy a used car. But your book shows him as intelligent, somewhat diverse (he played the piano), tortured, somehow desiring to be a force for good (including peace), but at the same time too emotionally precarious to succeed. Thanks!"

July 29, 2015

Alec's birthday: 57 years old. We had a lovely dinner in their cabin and watched as gifts were unwrapped—lots of dress shirts as usual (needed for work in the Patana School). I gave him a set of six brackets to use in the barn to hang equipment, plus three battery-powered anti-mice devices to help protect his car during the winter. Then Mike and Laura Gouthreau came. I had a long talk, as always, with Mike. When he asked how I was doing I needed to reply that for the first time in my adult professional life, since 1956, I had no project, nothing to write! I get up in the morning and don't go to the "office." No nervous breakdown, however. I'm trying to practice the piano more, right now the Schubert "Fantaisie" in F minor, primo, which is of course much too hard for me ever to do cleanly up to temp. and the Samuel Barber "Waltz" secondo from his "Souvenirs," both to do with Stan Udy when we return to Kendal. Of course there is always work here on the property, although mowing is now finished. But Alec and I cleaned up the south forest path the other day, and I've weeded the garden and will build Chrysanthi another large box for planting. Also painted the Guest House door green. But all this used to be merely the "accompaniment" to some form of productive writing. No more, it seems. Unless . . . ?

August 2, 2015

I liked this, read over breakfast this morning: "Some theorists have likened translation to a palimpsest in which the original text, though erased, glimmers through the translated one like Archimedes' theorems" (TLS July 17, 2015, p. 25).

Invited Earl, Kelly, and Stevie Millington for supper at 6:30. They arrived at 6:00 and stayed until 10:30. Kelly turns out to be intelligent and sophisticated, despite the restrictions of life on Waddell Road. Stevie actually fitted several pieces of Chrysanthi's ongoing jigsaw puzzle. We learned more about the ten Morris children, seven girls, three boys, not a happy lot, alas, owing to disease, accident, failed marriages.

August 3, 2015

Chrysanthi is delighted with "Swann in Love" in Proust's first volume and will read Justine next. I note Durrell's definition of love therein: "a consuming and depersonalized friendship" (p. 110).

August 7, 2015

Dear Katherine Ebury,

I hope that this reaches you. I have just finished reading your book Modernism & Cosmology, which is brilliantly researched and presented. It was a special pleasure for me to learn so much more about Joyce's Ulysses, Beckett's Murphy, and his three Trilogy novels, all of which I taught repeatedly at Dartmouth College for over thirty years along with other modernist delights by Virginia Woolf and (in our Comparative Literature program) Thomas Mann, Kafka, Proust. I occasionally attempted, without much success, to do something with Finnegans Wake (which I studied with William York Tindall, my Ph.D. advisor at Columbia University). My pleasure in your devotion to literary modernism arises in part from my disappointment regarding what happened at Dartmouth when I retired in 1997 and the committee appointed to find my replacement decided to recruit in Colonial Literature instead of English Literature. Thus my successor had never read Ulysses; she replaced the wonderful modernist authors that you appreciate and understand so well with Das, Naipaul, etc. No one at Dartmouth now does Beckett's prose; even Ulysses is not taught regularly.

I of course realized that the works you treat all belong to the "new physics" and even, somehow, to the legacy of one of my favorites: Bishop Berkeley. But I never acquired the understanding of Einstein's world that you enjoy and describe so well. I kept telling my students that they were all nineteenth-century readers trying to comprehend post–nineteenth-century materials, and sometimes I did effect a slight change, perhaps, in a few of them. Ulysses, especially, which they approached with dread, occasionally changed a student’s life. I cannot say the same for Beckett, however. In 1995 the University of Birmingham (England) held a conference in my honor called “Greek Modernism and Beyond” (published in 1997) in which I contributed a short “Afterword” in which (if I remember correctly) I argued that pre-modernism (e.g. Conrad) continues the earlier novel’s adherence to realism whereas modernism projects meaning in a non-realistic manner via symbolism chiefly, and post-modernism denies meaning altogether. That is a long way from the expertise and complexity presented in your book, but perhaps it is not entirely simplistic.

I did post-graduate study for a year in your Bristol University, met my Greek wife in Edgbaston, Birmingham, and used to travel repeatedly to England, but at age 85 this delight has stopped, alas. If you ever find yourself in Boston, which is only two hours from us in New Hampshire, perhaps we could meet.

August 8, 2015

I learned from the Harvard Magazine’s obituaries that Steve Baran has died. Thus both he and John Harvey, my two Harvard roommates, are gone, and I, strangely, seem perfectly healthy and even sufficiently vigorous at age 85. Strange. But also in the Harvard Magazine, in an article on David Ferry, I encountered these lines he translated from sixteenth-century Scottish poetry after his wife died:

My married heart shall never turn from her
 Unto another so long as my five wits
 Shall last, whose whole consent is given to her Until death’s rage shall cleave me to the root.
 So shall I love her ever, in spite of what-Soever circumstance can do to us.
 God grant I go to the grave before she goes.

These beautiful words of course speak as well—so deeply—from me to Chrysanthi.

August 9, 2015

Finished Philip Kitcher's Life after Faith: the Case for Secular Humanism. Disappointing. He argues most strongly not for secular humanism but instead for the liberal interpretation of Christian doctrine. His main point is summarized thus on page 122: "Religion is rightly seen as a corrective to the materialism of the age, not because it draws attention to any real 'spiritual realm,' nor because of the correctness of any specific religious doctrine . . . nor because religion is the source of values, but because of the importance to us of a multidimensional form of community life. For large swaths of contemporary affluent societies, that form of shared ethical life is in short supply, and religious communities are the principal places in which it can be found." On pp. 61–62 he lists his three assumptions: "First, religion is not understood as primarily a collection of doctrines about the transcendent, but as a system of practices and commitments. Second, the doctrinal statements that figure in religious practices and in expressions of commitment are not interpreted through the lens of everyday implications—they are taken to have symbolic significance, to be allegories or to contain profound metaphors. Third, the fundamental commitments of religions are to values, and the thought of a 'transcendent realm' is important because of its role in articulating these commitments . . ." Certainly most liberal Quakers would agree with all three assumptions.

Chrysanthi's excessive worrying was evident in full force this evening when Alec finally telephoned from a restaurant in New York. He hadn't called last night or earlier today and she was in a fit. As usual, and as always happened to me when I was the delinquent person, she of course spoiled his day by accusing him of neglect. When I suggested that she had no cause for worry, she replied, "You are not a mother!" Well, no use in fighting this at this point. She concluded her talk with Alec by admonishing him repeatedly to "stay together" in Times Square, where they are planning to go after supper, because Times Square is so obviously dangerous.

August 10, 2015

This is the first time my "guru," Don Cupitt, has disappointed me. The Revelation of Being is pure philosophy, not at all about religion. And the philosophy is gibberish largely, at least for me. But a few passages are worth recording here:

pp. 75–76: “Bernard Williams, in ‘The Makropulos Case: reflections on the tedium of immortality,’ decides that ‘an endless life would be a meaningless one,’ and gives all the right reasons. He quotes Aristotle’s splendid saying about Plato’s form of the Good to the effect that it is not ‘any the more good for being eternal: that which lasts long is no whiter than that which perishes in a day’ (Nicomachean Ethics, 1096<sup>b</sup> 4). What is precious is no more precious for being eternal, and, conversely, no less so for being transient. And in saying all this, Williams is unexpectedly close to Heidegger. . . . For Heidegger, it is our consciousness of our own mortality that acts like a religious vocation: it galvanizes us into realizing that we must make something of our lives while we have time.”

p. 88: “In the old religion, which reaches its culminating form in Islam and in Calvinism, everything was traced back to the omnipotent Will of a single Monarch. Faith involved submission and an unconditional commitment of the human will to be henceforth the instrument of the divine Will. . . . In the new religion, the world is an evolving co-operative product and the relation to the religious object does not involve submission so much as patient responsiveness and partnership.”

p. 99: “In Platonism, eternity is timelessness, and belongs only to God, the things of God and the eternal world. . . . In Existentialism, ‘eternal’ is said to be a quality, not an extension. In Romanticism and more recently, eternity is associated with the sublime, the Sun and everything that is solar.”

p. 105: “Spirituality: a vague and contested word now. Perhaps, the collection of regular practices and forms of expression through which we may seek to get ourselves together, represent our feeling for the human condition, and find personal happiness.”

August 17, 2015

Just finished a lovely visit by Don Seeger and—something new—his “partner” Tom Goodridge. They let us know from the start they wanted only one bed, to share. What a pleasure to have Dan here for two and a half days. Conversation flowed easily and continuously. Lots about NaCCRA, of which he is president. But he says the membership is divided. I’ll witness some of this on November 1st in Boston. He also showed me how to access Form 990 on the internet. This is submitted each year by all not-for-profit organizations, including Kendal, and shows its financial status, salaries of chief personnel, etc. Kendal looks quite OK, with a surplus of many millions, so far. Tom, the partner, is younger, a member of Morningside Meeting, which seems to be a sort of haven for gays. He is a professional aid for troubled pre-school children: autistics and the like. Very lively. Also very “green” and knowledgeable about wildlife. He was thrilled by the marvels achieved by our beavers when I took him and Dan down to Vly Brook. And he has a special affection for hemlocks, so we went up to see our lovely hemlock stand where I had done some thinning several years ago. Both evenings Dan and I played piano duets, and also some organ. He hasn’t touched a keyboard for years, but he can still sight-read anything that is familiar to him. So we did the entire Schubert Fantasia together . . . somehow. And Bach on the organ. What pleasure! Tom, being a compulsive swimmer, used our pond repeatedly and we drove him to the lovely Schroon Lake beach as well. They’re off now for a few weeks in Canada—always, I’m sure, with a single bed!

In the evening we had more guests for supper: Tom Akstens, Susanne Murtha, and Tom’s singing partner. They have just sold their house in Bakers Mills plus Susanne’s yoga studio and are about to begin a new life in East Greenwich, Rhode Island. Tom will have one more year in the New York State on-line college; Susanne has interviewed for a local job as a health counselor and is waiting for the decision. Brave people! They want to meet us in the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston and then to return to Greenwich and have us spend the night, after they get settled. We’ve had so many dinners and visits here in the Adirondacks for three decades, but both parties will try to maintain a portion, at least. With Laura and Mike Gouthreau moved to Vermont, Irv Shapiro dead, Fran in Queensbury aged 101 or 102, the Kurkas here only a few weeks each summer, Art Perryman’s ultra rightwing Republicanism difficult to stomach, our social life is diminished. But Inge and Lou Kurth are coming for supper next Monday, and we still feel very comfortable with Don Green and Evelyn. But the closest friends now are surely Donna and Ed Welch.

August 18, 2015

Helped by Chrysanthi, I’m doing something for the first time in our 65 years here: cleaning up the “islands” in the south field—namely, the three places where rock piles have allowed trees and brush to grow in and around them. And what a difference this makes! For supper, tired owing to so many guests around the table night after night, we decided to collaborate. Chrysanthi cooked bacon, I supervised poached eggs and did my specialty: hashed brown potatoes. Yum! Plus a tomato just picked from our garden, full of good taste.

August 19, 2015

From Don Cupitt, After God: the future of religion: “God has no body, parts, or passions. He has no structure. There is in God no differentia, no contrast, nothing that one might be able to single out or get hold of. Nor can one draw any ‘nearer’ to God because God is omnipresent in his whole reality everywhere, and yet also infinitely Other than us. We always already coincide with a God who is always unknowable. In contemplative prayer, God therefore is apprehended only as a naked, formless void infinite that may equally well be described as dazzling light or as deep darkness, as the plenitude of being or as absolute nothingness, as fullness or as emptiness. . . . And the state of resting in God may equally well be described as a state of absolute knowledge or as a state of the purest unknowing” (p. 54). “I am offering only religion as a toolkit, a small set of attitudes and techniques, by practicing which we can grow in self-knowledge . . . , learn to accept the transience and insubstantiality of ourselves and everything else . . . , and learn to say a wholehearted yes to life. . . . Another item is . . . a license to make whatever new use we can of the surviving scraps of vocabulary, ritual, and symbolism that are available to us” (p. 106).

August 24, 2015

One of the memorable moments in my intellectual life was when Ihor Ševčenko took me to lunch at the American Academy of Arts and Sciences in 1983 and sat me down next to the famous philosopher Quine. We had an easy, comfortable time together because it turned out that we had both known Tom Vance. Ihor told me afterwards that the “immortals” of the Academy treated me very well contrary to their usual behavior. I was reminded of all this at breakfast today by a TLS review of the book Ontology Made Easy by Amie Thomasson, where I read: “But what it means for a thing to ‘really’ exist will depend on whom you ask. One dominant approach, invented by the American philosopher W. V. Quine, is that what really exists is whatever is included in the proper formulation of the best complete scientific theory of the world. ‘Best,’ in this context, is understood in terms of scientific virtues such as simplicity. So when followers of Quine dispute the existence of things like tables, they are claiming that we could construct a simpler (and therefore better) complete theory of reality that does not mention them (for example, by talking only in terms of physical particles and their arrangements).” I had never suspected that Quine’s philosophy could be reduced to such a “simple,” completely comprehensible formulation.

September 1, 2015

I don’t know why I keep reading Stylianos’s lead article in each issue of the Φωνή της Ορθοδοξίας, which I keep receiving. The latest issue (vol. 37, no. 4–6) celebrates his fortieth year as archbishop. He is a poet, and sometimes his prose takes on a poetic quality. For example, in this issue: Ο θάνατος του Χριστού που ήρθε σαν θυσία για ολόκληρο το ανθρωπινό γένος δεν έμεινε ένα ξεκομμένο μυστηριώδες υπερφυσικό γεγονός του παρελθόντος. Φυτεύθηκε στο κέντρο της ζωής και της ιστορίας σαν αιθαλής δένδρο, του οποίου τους γλυκείς χυμούς σπεύδουν να γευθούν οι πιστοί, παίρνοντας θέση κλάδου που «ενοφθαμίζεται» στο δέντρο. The only words I didn’t know were of course the two most essential in his simile: αιθαλής = evergreen and ενοφθαμίζομαι = to engraft.

Last Saturday we went to the headquarters of the Adirondack Mountain Club in Lake George for a seminar on the bug that threatens to kill hemlocks here, although it hasn’t reached the Adirondacks yet. A truly excellent professor from Cornell explained everything splendidly. Afterwards, talking to him, we both agreed that the crucial qualification for a good professor is that he actually enjoy his material, which he obviously does (and so did I). In the woods walk in the afternoon I learned how to identify hemlock—by the line and two white areas on either side on the underside of the leaf. And I also saw for the first time a cedar, which has a very distinctive leaf. Thus I can now distinguish hemlock, cedar, spruce, and balsam! Regarding the ash borer, he told me, alas, that Earl’s theory that large ash trees are not attacked is totally wrong. Thus we could lose the very huge ash right next to our cabin.

Jen Karsten, who visited last week, very pleasantly, just sent some photos she took. The most memorable, for me, is the one through the screen of the front door showing the immense, perfectly crafted spiderweb directly outside, the one that Chrysanthi keeps destroying but that Madame Arachne keeps rebuilding immediately in all its glory.

September 12, 2015

Closing and leaving. It's always sad, but much more this year because of fear that one of us, or both of us, will not be able to return next spring. On the other hand, I just paid $600 to On-star in our car for three years!

September 27, 2015

This evening from about 9:00 p.m. to midnight we watched a total eclipse of the moon, comfortably through a window across the hall. It reminded me of the statement I made years ago that I believe in rationality, which everyone pooh-pooed. I did it from my conviction that, despite the vagaries of human behavior, the solar system is deliciously rational, behaving according to plan year after year, as witnessed tonight in this solar eclipse.

October 15, 2015

Atlanta, Georgia

Flew to Atlanta in order to receive my MGSА Elizabeth Constantinides Translation Prize of $500 for my new Zorba. Arrival in Atlanta airport is frightening—so many people, so many African Americans, so many talking with southern accents. And the train you need to take to the exit. A black man pushing a black woman in a wheelchair took me in tow, telling me to follow him to the train, then where to get off, then how to find MARTA, the subway system. A twenty-minute ride takes one to Peachtree Street right at the corner for the Ellis Hotel. Nice to see Victor Papacosma at the check-in. Also Artemis Leontis, very cordial. I walked through the neighborhood, trying to find the site for the prize awards, but failed. The city struck me as unpleasant mostly, although I did encounter a small park. Finally, one of the symposium's organizers accompanied me from the hotel to the site. I sat with Neovi Karakatsanis, the current MGSА president. Big auditorium in a local university, lots of people. I was asked to say a few words after being handed my check, and started by remembering Elizabeth Constantinides as a kind, graceful person who alas died all too young. Then I spoke about the translation of Zorba, why that needed to be done, and the problem of the words included in no Greek dictionary, explaining about Mathioudakis's work and how, by combining what I found in his dissertation with Kimon Friar's translation, I could arrive at an accurate definition almost every time. Neovi in her introduction had named this the twenty-fourth symposium, so I said that I could say a few words about the very first symposium, which made everyone laugh. I told about the meeting of seven of us in 1968 and our desire to found a scholarly society. (I add here the names of these seven founders: Constantine Mitsakis, Andonis Decavalles, Kostas Kazazis, Edmund Keeley, John Nicolopoulos, Byron Tsangadas, Peter Bien.) So each took out five dollars from his pocket and we formed the society's first treasury in the amount of thirty-five dollars. Then we decided that a society needs to have a journal and that a journal, in order to acquire articles, needs to draw from symposia. Thus we organized the first MGSAsymposium, with Mike Keeley and myself in charge. Zisimos Lorentzatos came, as did Mario Vitti, Angelos Terzakis, and Bertrand Bouvier. Other speakers were Thanasis Maskaleris, Peter Levi, Stavros Deligiorgis, Michael Antonakis, Byron Raizis, Andreas Poulakides, and Mike and myself. Chrysanthi, with John Rassias, demonstrated our oral/aural methods of teaching Modern Greek, using Princeton students as guinea-pigs. The year was 1969. Twenty-three subsequent symposia at two-year intervals = 46 years;  $46 + 1969 = 2015!$  I concluded by congratulating the audience on maintaining the sequence without a break.

October 16, 2015

Full leisurely breakfast at the hotel with Victor Papacosma and a lady from France. Nice to see Vassilis Lambropoulos briefly; he amazed me by talking of retirement. Home in time for supper and a joyous reunion with Chrysanthi.

October 17, 2015

We went to the Metropolitan Opera's HD movie of Verdi's final opera, Otello, written when he was 71 years old. Such an amazing masterpiece, largely of course because of Shakespeare, but equally because of the dark music bringing this sad story to its dismal end.

October 18, 2015

A most unusual day owing to the arrival of two expert videographers—Tassos Rigopoulos from New York, and Skip ? from the University of New Hampshire—to interview me just when half of Hanover's roads were shut down owing to a five-mile marathon race for charity. Fortunately they arrived just minutes before the shutdown began. Chrysanthi and I had just heard Edie Gieg give probably the best talk I've ever experienced in the Interfaith Gatherings, beautifully combining personal and impersonal aspects in a sermon stressing the importance of giving. We then lunched leisurely at Kendal with Tassos and Skip, who had brought a bottle of wine and insisted on paying for their meals. Then the problems began. Route 10 was closed; so was Rip Road. We needed to detour probably more than five miles to the East, finally ending on Lebanon Street opposite the high school and unable to go further into town. So I suggested the good idea of doing the videotaping at the Quaker Meeting instead of in my Baker Library office, which was the original plan. We decided on the Meeting's library-room. They adjusted the camera lens so that the books in back of me would be out of focus, thus not revealing their Quaker identity since all this was meant to be about Kazantzakis and especially about his epic Οδύσσεια (which I spell here correctly with the two sigmas of the 1957 reprint although Kazantzakis of course naughtily used only one sigma in the original publication in 1938). They needed to cover the southern window with large pieces of black cloth, which they had brought along for this purpose just in case, in order to exclude the bright sunlight. They did various sound checks with me, had me turn my head at a precise angle away from the lens, etc., etc. It was an education to observe these two obviously professional film experts at work. Tassos then read the questions that had been sent from Greece and I answered them as best I could. Everything was in English, which helped. Then they had me hold the new Zorba in front of me and raise it at their signal. Next, they decided that they still wanted to see my office and presumably do some videotaping there. It was 4:30 p.m.; the roads were now open. In the office they accomplished a provisional set-up, but still with tripod and artificial lighting. They wanted to photograph me sitting at my computer, which I did with a scan of a Kazantzakis letter on the screen. Then they wanted me to read a portion of the epic's Greek text. I chose the juicy first lines of the first canto:

Σαν πια ποθέρισε τους γαύρους νιούς μες στις φαρδιές αυλές του, το καταχόρταστο ανακρέμασε δοξάρι του ο Δυσσέας και διάβη στο θερμό λουτρό το μέγα του κορμί να πλύνει.
 Δυο δούλες συγκερνούσαν το νερό, μα ως είδαν τον αφέντη μπήξαν φωνή, γιατί η σγουρή κοιλιά και τα μεριά του αχνίζαν και μαύρα στάζαν αίματα πηχτά κι από τις δυό του φούχτες· και κύλησαν στις πλάκες οι χαλκές λαγήνες τους βροντώντας.

Tassos then ran off to catch a bus to New York from Boston, and I returned to Kendal to share yet another lovely supper with Chrysanthi and friends. The whole experience of this videographing reminded me of Andrew Tebbe, who hopes to train in the same way in order to make and/or edit movies.

October 30, 2015

Chrysanthi and I flew to Philadelphia. Anne Harper met us at the airport and drove us to Pendle Hill in time for lunch. While I was eating, Henry Freeman came over to extend a warm hello, as did Arnie Alpert, there with the entire Northeast ASFC staff for a conference. Then to the piano in the barn to practice with Jennie Keith the slow movement in the Mozart C major sonata and the Fauré Kitty-Valse, preparatory to playing tonight. Then the first meeting of the Campaign Steering Committee—Kaye Edwards, Mark Myers, Gretchen Hall, Jennie Keith, Anne Nash, myself, and Henry Freeman and Jen Karsten. We toured the campus with Lloyd Guindon and John Freeburg, learning about all the new roofs and new painting, plus the plans for the adjacent building recently purchased. Freeburg very impressive in his explanations and justifications: no more deferred maintenance! Jen then spoke rapidly for over an hour on the State of Pendle Hill. Deficit for FY16 is only about $25,000. Remarkable. Projected deficit for FY17: zero! I promised baklava for everyone to celebrate. After supper, Jennie and I played for the group. The Mozart went well, although I faked the thirty-second notes near the end. The Fauré not so well. More faking, which we both did rather well, we concluded afterwards. Strangely, as often happens, I faltered not in spots that had always been troublesome, but in spots that had never been troublesome.

October 24, 2015

Breakfast this morning with Henry Freeman and the couple from Wales who are Quakers in Residence. Amazingly, the conversation centered on Montaigne, Darwin, and Henri Nouwen—a typical Pendle Hill breakfast! Our committee considered 250 names of recent contributors, each of us seeing which ones we knew and then offering names that should be on the list but are not—e.g., Gay Berger. Jennie Keith expressed eagerness to play four-hand piano again despite my errors last night. Home at 10:00 p.m., always a comforting feeling.

October 27, 2015

Heard a lecture by Wendy Sherwin, #3 in the State Department and chief negotiator for the treaty with Iran. My major reaction: I wish she were running for president of the United States!

October 28, 2015

Heard Renée Fleming at Hopkins Center. She started with the Schumann opus 42: Frauenliebe und -leben, the best part of which was the piano postlude at the very end.

October 29, 2015

I found the score today for the lovely piano postlude at the end of song #8, Nun hast du mit den ersten Schmerz getan, and hope to learn it. Also, Ruth Lappin wants to play more selections from Dolly with me, not just Kitty-Valse.

November 20, 2015

Stan, Joan Wilson, Joan Snell, and I played the 8-hand version of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, first movement, in the Cary Room this afternoon, with the usual mishaps, but satisfactorily. Then Ruth Lappin and I were meant to play Berceuse, Kitty-Valse, and Mi-a-ou from Fauré's Dolly, but there wasn't time. With luck we'll do it in December. I'm amazed that I learned to play the primo of Mi-a-ou just about up to speed. Found another beautiful, slow Schumann, the final selection in his Kinderszenen, The Poet Speaks.

Sunday, November 22, 2015

Chrysanthi and I took the 7:00 a.m. bus to South Station so that I could meet Katherine Ebury, the young English scholar whose book on Joyce, Beckett, Bishop Berkeley, and Einstein I read with such admiration and interest last summer. She was in Boston for the Modernist Studies Association's conference. So we took the T to Back Bay (Copley Square), listened for a while to a rehearsal of the choir in the Episcopal church in the square (bad music, so-so singing, making me feel so glad to be a Quaker), then attended a conference session in which one of the speakers discoursed on Hasek's "The Good Soldier Švejk." I asked him if he knew of the opera and he said he did not. I'll send him information about Robert Kurka's opera, which we saw many years ago at Cooperstown, together with Don Kurka. Met Katherine at noon, together with

I went to town early on a very crowded Red Line train with someone offering me a seat (amazing!). Spent the entire day, more extensively and leisurely than ever before, in the marvelous National Gallery, punctuated by a two-hour lunch with Dennis Carroll at the District Chop House—our annual ritual. Dennis is super-productive, having just completed an interesting, innovative novel (I have read selections but not the whole) on sexuality: about a professor who dares to offer a course, amply illustrated, about healthy, beautiful sexual intercourse as opposed to pornography. It's a continuation, more or less, of Lawrence's Lady Chatterley's Lover, published 87 years ago. Will he be able to find a publisher? Would Grove Press (if it still exists) do it (they issued an unexpurgated Lady Chatterley in 1959)? He gave me a copy of his novel Design of Darkness, published in 1910 but written considerably earlier. It's about a gifted young woman reduced by encephalitis to mental incapacity versus a floundering young man who does everything right, ending as a millionaire. I hope to read it; perhaps it will be a better exploration of "darkness" than Μάρτυς μου ο Θεός. Dennis was also very open (not for the first time, however) about his parents' failed marriage and especially about his mother's disastrous health problems as a widow, with Dennis, the son, needing to cope somehow, again and again—an appropriate warning for those who fail to view a CCRC as an appropriate solution. He and I now consider our annual luncheon, always at the District Chop House, as a necessary ritual and thus look forward to another similar event next Thanksgiving.

I was lucky in the National Gallery today because they had a beautiful Vermeer on loan from Amsterdam entitled "Woman in Blue Reading a Letter" (ca. 1663)—so simple, genuine, "unartistic": just an ordinary woman wearing an ordinary dress, standing in an ordinary room absorbed in the words of the letter held in her hand. My other very special surprise was "Ginevra de' Benci" by Leonardo Da Vinci (1474/1478), apparently the only Da Vinci painting in the United States. It portrays a sixteen-year-old, a very pale, worried-looking girl apparently about to be married to a man twice her age. The artist's skill makes her completely alive on the canvas. Another special for me was Roy Lichtenstein's series of increasingly abstracted bulls (1973), starting with one that looks like a bull if you don't examine it carefully (it is already abstracted to small degree), then progressing to six or seven more that increasingly reduce the bull to just curves and lines, brilliantly. Other paintings that I noticed with especial pleasure although I remembered them from prior visits were Rembrandt's "Apostle Paul" (ca. 1657), and the "Self-Portrait" from 1659 in which he looks so very tired; El Greco's "Laocoön" (1610/1614, "Saint Martin and the Beggar" (1597/1599); Turner's "Approach to Venice" (1844), Constable's "Salisbury Cathedral" (1820), a whole gallery of Cézanne paintings but especially "At the Water's Edge" (ca. 1890), Van Gogh's "Roses" (1890), and Pissarro's "Boulevard des Italiens" (1897). I also happened to be within earshot when a docent was explaining Saint-Gaudens' "Shaw Memorial" (1883/1900), which she said had been rescued from its outdoor position at the Saint-Gaudens' site in Cornish, New Hampshire, where the weather was greatly hampering it. I told her that the site, which I have visited, is beautiful especially in good weather.

In the evening, we all went to Bethesda to an amazing place, Max Brenner's Creating a New Chocolate Culture Worldwide—a café in which everything was made from chocolate. I had an exquisite milkshake, but the children had something like chocolate pizza!

Tuesday, November 24, 2015

Deanna took us to an immense shopping place called Costco Wholesale where everything is purchased in bulk. I ended up with a 2½-pound bag of Starbuck's French Roast coffee beans that cost $15.00, whereas a ¾-pound bag normally costs about $9.00. The place was mobbed, but we seemed just about the only Caucasians. Afterwards I practiced "Dolly" and the Mozart Allegretto that I'll be playing with Stan and the two Schumann pieces that I'll do for Stan's Interfaith Gathering in February—namely, the final piece to Scenes from Childhood, and the piano conclusion to the song sequence "Frauenliebe und -leben," opus 42, both amazingly beautiful. Leander gave me very helpful lessons on both of these, and we played Fauré's "Berceuse," "Kitty-Valse," and "Mi-a-ou" for Chrysanthi, plus the Mozart. I think I'm beginning to control both Schumann pieces now, thanks to Leander's fingerings and explanation of details. Finished the day with supper at a local Jewish delicatessen: matzo ball soup and chopped chicken liver on rye.

Wednesday, November 25, 2015

More practice in the morning. Then we all drove to Mount Vernon, George Washington's estate in Virginia, on the banks of the Potomac River. This productive plantation eventually reached 8000 acres (now 400) and needed 350 slaves to run it, all of whom were granted their freedom in Washington's will. The 21-room mansion, carefully restored to match its décor in Washington's lifetime, is very grand, furnished, decorated, and painted with material imported from England. The outhouses are called "Necessaries"! We were lucky to be there in mild weather and without too many other tourists.

In the evening, we were visited by Christina Tebbe and her boyfriend, named Marco. What a pleasure to see Christina as now an outgoing, talkative, smiling person instead of the morose horror she was as a teenager at home. And the boyfriend, Marco, was very presentable, son of an Italian-Swiss family, studying computer science. Christina's study is psychology with a minor in criminology. In 2016 both will go off for the first of Northeastern's work-programs, perhaps also in Boston. Because of these programs, the total undergraduate curriculum takes five years instead of four. They seem very pleased with college, so far. My hope, of course, is that morose Nicholas and still semi-morose Sophia will open up, as Christina has done, when they totally leave home. Sophia of course is much changed, much improved, but still generally looks bored and worried as she buries her nose in her i-pad. Nicholas is totally silent.

Thursday, November 26, 2015, Thanksgiving Day

Sausage and eggs in the morning, plus the Thanksgiving Day parade on television. Then the customary turkey will all the fixings in mid-afternoon, very pleasantly, with Leander giving emotional thanks for the entire family. A bracing walk around the pond where we usually go, plus our curiosity at what happens in a Talbots black Friday—people emerging with huge TV sets and even a ping pong table.

New York City

Train to New York. Business Class no longer provides newspapers in print form; they only enable you to read The Washington Post or the New York Times electronically on your pad or computer. Thank you so much! Taxi to the Whitney Museum on Gansevoort Street, riding down through Hell's Kitchen and Chelsea, now both gentrified. Huge line outside the museum for tickets, so I went inside and took out a membership, which granted immediate entrance. We went directly to the 5th floor, devoted exclusively to Frank Stella, whose huge, colorful paintings and (more often) sculptures (three-dimensional paintings) are displayed expansively. It was easy to see various opinions in a recent review in The Economist. For example: “Mr Stella’s paintings left no room for personal expression and made no claims to transcendence.” “. . . elaborate variations . . . carried out with deadpan precision, . . . denied that art was anything but material form.” “Even when Mr Stella abandoned the classical austerity of . . . early works for the baroque profusion of his constructions, . . . the final product is the result of conscious decisions, problems to be solved, rather than spontaneous outbursts of an authentic self.” “By introducing the techniques and, even more crucially, the attitudes of industrial production into the realm of the fine arts, Mr Stella provided a road map to the digital age where the idea of the hands-on artist is increasingly quaint.” Perhaps. But this is still art, not industrial production, and as such it does lift the spirit. Descending to the 3rd floor to see some of the museum’s own paintings, I was pleased to find two by Thomas Hart Benton: “The Lord Is My Shepherd” (1926) and “Poker Night” (1948), not the best Benton in either case, but still . . . Benton.

Directly outside the museum is the High Line, the elevated walkway that goes from Gansevoort to 34th Street. We walked it to 14th Street, with pleasure and surprise that an abandoned eyesore had been transformed into a delightful promenade through Chelsea along the waterfront.

Burton Pike joined us for dinner at the Yale Club. He is hale and hearty, and the recent winner of a translation prize that paid $5000 (I joked with him about my $500 prize). He runs a reading group for Haverford alumni living in New York, still serves on the PEN board, etc. I of course asked about Peter Constantine and was told that he continues as always, managing by the skin of his teeth owing to translations from a slew of languages.

Then to “The Curious Incident of the Dog in the Night-Time,” which required a bit of adjustment. By the end, however, we were fully enthusiastic. Tyler Lea, the young actor who played the autistic Christopher, was extraordinary. Probably the most memorable features, however, were the I.T. effects—something that Andrew Tebbe must have appreciated when he saw the show last summer. All in all—acting, message, lighting, electronic trickery—it was splendid, and very unusual. We had never seen that sort of theater before.

Saturday, November 28, 2015

To MoMA for the exhibit of Picasso as sculptor, showing hundreds of works generally unknown. He began with bronze but, during the war, when he remained in Paris under the Nazis, he of course could no longer obtain metal, and began large sculptures in plastic. Afterwards, he incorporated whatever he could find in the streets. None of these works could be called “beautiful”; however, some are “interesting” and all help to confirm this man’s unquenchable need to create in new and different ways.

We then walked to an excellent restaurant across the street from Lincoln Center, The Atlantic Grill, 49 West 64th Street, to meet Charlie Hamlen for lunch, passing tourists taking horse and buggy rides in the park on this festive day. Charlie explained at length his very serious leukemia and its cure owing to stem cells transferred to his bone marrow from his sister. Now, amazingly, he says that there is no longer a single sign of leukemia in his body. He is back at work at The Orchestra of St. Luke’s, which will be honoring him at its gala later in the year. He noted that Benjamin Hochman mentioned how pleased he was to meet us, but alas he was not entirely optimistic about Hochman’s cure. Apparently the right hand was never affected—only the left. Hochman is seriously studying conducting as a way forward. What a shame! My dream of having him play again at Kendal, this time using both hands, may never be realized.

Next: Balanchine’s Nutcracker at the NYC Ballet, across the street. Ashley Bouder was angelic.

In the evening, to the City Center’s Manhattan Theater Club for the utterly zany “Important Hats of the Twentieth Century,” all about New York City, with an audience of natives laughing out of control. Jokes like: “Did you look at the sky today?” “Of course not, I’m a New Yorker.” The star, a fashion designer, becomes maximally distressed when he sees a gentleman in black shoes wearing a brown belt!

Sunday, November 29, 2015

No. 1 local to 116th Street. Walking through the Columbia campus, Chrysanthi remembered that Leander first learned to walk on the steps up to the library. Our apartment house on West 121st Street is unchanged, but new buildings across the street replace the brownstones full of Puerto Ricans, and the single-occupancy monstrosity on the corner has been replaced with a Columbia dormitory. At Morningside Meeting we saw Vince Buscemi and Ernie—Ernie fine but Vince much reduced in body and spirit, alas, although he told me that he still manages to climb to his second-floor walkup in Greenwich Village. We came primarily to meet Dan Seeger and Tom Goodridge. After Meeting, lots of announcements, etc., including something by a black man who had been in prison and was now working to help others released from prison, plus a woman urging everyone to participate in the rally in front of Town Hall concerning the UN meeting on climate change to convene in Paris tomorrow. Dan left early to prepare the soup; Tom guided us to his apartment—in one of the “projects” between 121st and 125th, the first time I’d ever been inside one of these. His apartment is small, much like ours at Kendal, but very pleasant, on the first floor, with a garden and even a lawn outside. He enthused about our farm and the fact that I had actually built our cabin, the barns, etc. I hope that both will come back next summer. Worrying about catching the 4:30 Dartmouth Coach back to Hanover, we left, Tom accompanying us to the 125th Street station, which is elevated, rather than back to the 116th Street one. I’d never been on the elevated station, which now gives one a view of one of Columbia’s new north-campus buildings in Harlem. The train was mobbed with people who seemed to derive from deserts and Asian wildernesses—God knows where! We arrived in time to buy a sandwich in the Grand Central basement for supper and for me to race to the toilet in an adjoining hotel before the long trip (owing to traffic) back to the Hanover Inn.

December 2, 2015

Helene telephoned from Mexico City, tearfully, to say that John died this morning, peacefully. I told her that although part of Rassias family life had obviously been subtracted, John and I were so connected professionally, personally, and family-wise over half a century, starting with his arrival at Dartmouth in 1965 and his surprised discovery that I had translated Kazantzakis’s Saint Francis, that part of Bien family life had also been subtracted. My first entry on him in my journal is dated April 24, 1966. In 1967 Chrysanthi started using John's Peace Corps techniques in her Modern Greek classes. In 1975 John and I were installed together in Athens College to evaluate how English was taught there; when Chrysanthi and I returned from Europe later that year we slept the first night in the Rassias's Norwich home. How very many evenings he spent seated at our dining room table collaborating first on Demotic Greek 1, then on The Flying Telephone Booth. In December 1976 John and I were both in Birmingham making videotapes for Demotic Greek 1 with Paul Morby. That's when John invented his brilliant solution for his deficiency in Greek—namely, help from Zeus on high whenever needed. We were housed in adjoining single rooms in a temperance hotel; early Sunday morning both doors were opened without knocking by hotel staff, to make sure that we hadn't brought women in to spend Saturday night with us. (We hadn't.) At Dartmouth commencements in the 1970s we sat together and hissed when the dean of the Medical School, instructing the graduating students to recite the Hippocratic Oath, always declared that it was written in a language no longer spoken! I remember marching to our seats with John being embraced and kissed by half the girls in the row of students we passed while the rest of us just continued solemnly forward. Later, when I was asked to proclaim part of the Oath in Greek at the Medical School ceremony, then separated from the Arts & Sciences commencement, I did so for a few years and eventually begged John to replace me, which he did with exaggerated pleasure year after year. Every New Year's Eve we spent at the Rassias home gorging ourselves on escargot and lamb, with Chrysanthi carefully arranging the 25-cent piece in the βασιλόπιττα so that she knew which child would receive it. In 1987 John went to China with Mary without incident, then drove into a ditch on Cliff Street and had to be pulled out by a tow truck. He claimed that he had swerved to avoid an elk! (Maybe it was a gnu!)

And of course there was also Archbishop Spyridon's Commission in 1998–99, with John in charge of a marvelous group: Jim Alatis, Dimitri Gondicas, Vasos Papagapitos, Bill Scott, Phyllis Franklin, Ernie Friedl, Sol Gittleman, David Millstone, Peter Patrikis, Constance Tagopoulos, and myself as “recorder.” We traveled far and wide, sent out hundreds of questionnaires, interviewed teachers, parents, administrators, students, and concluded that Modern Greek would die out in America unless massive changes were made in teaching methods, textbooks, teacher training, salaries, and parental attitudes. Our published report, entitled The Future of the Greek Language and Culture in the United States: Survival in the Diaspora, concluded its preamble with the statement “The Commission is convinced that, unless action be taken immediately, Hellenism’s survival in the American diaspora will be at risk.” After a fancy ceremony at the Archdiocese, Spyridon urged John to set up a group to oversee implementation of our many recommendations. John was eager and energetic in this endeavor, but everything came to a halt when Spyridon was removed from his post by the Patriarch.

December 10, 2015

Stan Udy and I performed the third movement of the Mozart C major four-hand sonata K 521 as part of the Winter Concert at Kendal, in the Gathering Room, on the stage, with the Yamaha piano, before a huge audience. There was the usual recorder consort first, boring, and the Chorale afterwards. Happily, I had no problems of nervousness at all, and played well enough despite some sloppiness in expected places. But Stan made a wrong entrance in a place he had failed more than once in rehearsal, stopped, said out loud “This is all messed up!” which caused laughter in the audience. So we began again and this time got satisfactorily to the end, although we were not together once again at one point, with Stan continuing thankfully until soon enough we regrouped satisfactorily. So it wasn’t bad, really. Lots of nice comments afterward from people in the large audience. One person even said it was the best part of the program. It helps to perform with other groups that are even worse than the two of us!

December 11, 2015

What a day! At 10:30 we arrived at Rollins Chapel for the funeral service for John Rassias. And there was Leander, who had left home at 4:00 a.m. and had flown here for the event. Huge crowd. Nice to see people we knew. The priest, from Boston, was young, perfect in both Greek and English, ingratiating. The psaltis, Damianos, our former student, was excellent. So we witnessed a full, traditional Orthodox funeral service, with John a wax doll in front in the open coffin. During the overly long sermon, Father Barbas had all of John’s grandchildren stand and tell their names, which was so nice. All this lasted an hour and a half. Then family and close friends were driven to the Norwich cemetery for burial. More assurances that John was now in Paradise eternally, our human life being like a single raindrop in all the earth's oceans when compared with eternity. Reception at the Inn with former students describing John's ministrations over a loudspeaker. Hungry, we grabbed a ham sandwich and then hurried Leander to his car to return to the airport, after he delivered to me the box of fancy chocolates he had brought as a present.

Back to Kendal at 3:00. Rehearsal with Ruth Lappin at 3:30! At 4:30 in the Cary Room concert I played Schumann's "The Poet Speaks" and Ruth and I did Douglas Townsend's "Fantasies on Christmas Carols" better than we had ever managed in rehearsal. Amazing! Supper with interesting new residents; Charlie Rose; sleep at midnight.

December 13, 2015

This morning in Meeting I ministered for the first time in many many months: about Sarah Baldwin, who died last week—how Chrysanthi was part of a rota after Sarah was born fifty years ago, exercising her legs and arms. Why? Perhaps because there is that of God in everyone, as Quakers say, but also perhaps because of the realization that we could have a similarly defective child. Then about my work in the home for Down syndrome in Holland where the staff cared so very well because of their belief in reincarnation (they were disciples of Rudolph Steiner): that these spirits could be reborn healthy, the staff people could be reborn with Down syndrome. I concluded by saying that I do not personally believe in reincarnation but I do believe in universal vulnerability, which should be an equal motivation to go several hours each week to exercise Sarah Baldwin when she was a nearly paralyzed baby.

December 14, 2015

I finally finished the marvelous 495-page book by Armand Marie Leroi, The Lagoon: How Aristotle Invented Science. It is learned and also opinionated about Aristotle, acknowledging his invention of science but also, most of the time, acknowledging as well how utterly wrong much of his science was. There is so much that I would like to quote from the book in this journal. If I still had the energy and endurance that I possessed when an undergraduate at Harvard, I would fill as many pages now as I did then for William James, to cite just one name from those years. But I will limit myself to just a few paragraphs, beginning with one near the end of the book that could serve as a summary: “‘It has been said,’ wrote Borges, ‘that all men are born either Aristotelians or Platonists.’ Philosophers may wince at the opposition, but I suspect it to be literally true. Plato invites us to the world of abstractions, Aristotle to the world of tangible things. You begin with particulars, a box of seashells, say; gather them together and rearrange them endlessly in order to apprehend their logic and order. This apprehension, Aristotle says, is the gift of reason and the beginning of science. It is also where true beauty lies” (378).

“Let’s accept, ex hypothesi, that the cosmos shows the signature of purposeful order, the hall mark of design. Where does it come from? There are three, and only three, possible answers. The first is to appeal, as Plato did and Christians still do, to a beneficent creator who arranged things just so. The second is to appeal, as Democritus did and Epicurus would, to an infinite universe—infinity solving all low-probability dilemmas. The first can be discarded; the second I have no views on, though some cosmologists believe it to be true. As a biologist, however, I like the third for it depends on the only known mechanism capable of creating order from disorder: natural selection. This is the reasoning behind Cosmological Selection Theory, which proposes the existence of a population of universes—a multiverse; that these universes reproduce, that they do so with unequal success, and that they transmit their physical constants, allowing for some mutation, to their progeny universes. It’s nothing more or less than cosmic Darwinism and an easy route to a universe which, depending on the fitness function, has any non-lethal combination of parameter values that you please. One multiverse theory holds that universes give birth to baby universes via black holes. In that case, the number of black holes in our universe (millions) would be a design feature. The plausibility of the physics need not detain us, but, granting them, or some similar scheme, it is clear that natural selection among universes will work. If it has, far from being the mere product of brute material necessity, some of the features of the universe would be as teleologically explicable as the parts of an elephant. Such a cosmos would have a purpose. In such a cosmos, Aristotle would surely be at home” (335).

“In the Nicomachean Ethics Aristotle discusses the best sort of life to lead. The good life is obviously one of active virtue, and there are many ways in which virtue can be achieved—in politics or in the army, say. But the virtue that derives from such things is entirely utilitarian. The best way that a man can spend his life is in contemplation for that has no utilitarian goal; it's pleasurable in itself. Elsewhere he relates a story. Someone asked Anaxagoras what was the point of being born, to which the great physiologos replied: 'to study the heaven and order of the whole cosmos.' The answer rang true to Aristotle; he told the story at least twice. But he warns that none of us can ever achieve a life of pure contemplation. There are so many things, the mundane things of everyday life, and the human things—the sense is disparaging—that distract us from the divine life of the mind. Nevertheless we should 'strain every sinew' to ignore them and devote ourselves to pure reason. That is where true happiness lies" (340).

December 16, 2015

I sent the following Christmas message to Christos after receiving his card, most of which lamented the decline of civilization in Greece and worldwide:

Αγαπητοί Χρίστο, Έρη, Ασπασία-Μαρία,

Χαρήκαμε τόσο πολύ να δούμε την εξαιρετική ζωγραφική του Παύλου στην κάρτα σας. Στη δική μας βλέπετε μιαν χειμερινή όψη του κτήματός μας, από τη Χρυσάνθη. Λυπούμαι που δεν ερχόμαστε πια στην Ελλάδα να σας δούμε, αλλά στα γερατεία το ταξίδι γίνεται πιο προβληματικό. Σε λίγο όμως ελπίζω ότι θα μιλήσετε στο τηλέφωνο με το γιο μας τον Αλέκο, ο οποίος θα βρεθεί στην Αθήνα με την οικογένεια από 30 Δεκεμβρίου μέχρι 2 Ιανουαρίου. Η οικογένεια αποτελείται από Μονίκα (σύζυγο), Θεόδωρο (γιο, 15 χρονώ) και Ελένη (κόρη, 13 χρονώ). Θα μένουν στο Novotel, Μιχαήλ Βόδα 4, τηλέφωνο 210 820.0700. Μακάρι να τους δείτε.

Τι χρήμα, Χρίστο, που οι ελληνικές συνθήκες, όπως τις περιγράφεις, είναι τόσο αποθαρρυντικές. Εξακολουθώ να πληροφορούμαι για τα πολιτικά και οικονομικά της Ελλάδας, που φαίνονται χαώδη, αλλά υπάρχει τουλάχιστο μιαν εξαίρεση: η Αμερικανική Γεωργική Σχολή, για την οποία υπηρετώ ακόμα σαν honorary trustee. Παρ' όλες τις δυσκολίες, πάει μπρος.

Χαίρομαι να γράψω πως βρισκόμαστε και η Χρυσάνθη και εγώ σε φυσική, νοητική και πνευματική υγεία, λίγο-πολύ. Η Αμερική πλησιάζει κι αυτή σε μιαν χαώδης κατάσταση, μα εδώ στην επαρχία, μακριά από πόλεις, δίπλα σ' ένα μεγάλο ποταμό, περκυκλωμένοι από βουνά και δάση, με τ' άστρα και το φεγγάρι ακτινοβόλοντα αποπάνω, συνήθως αισθανόμαστε καλά. Εγώ όμως, για την πρώτη φορά σε 60 χρόνια, δεν έχω μπροστά μου κανένα σχέδιο για γράψιμο. Κάνω μικρά πράγματα για άλλους, παίζω πιάνο, διαβάζω ποιήματα σ' έναν συνάδερφο που είχε διαδρομή εμβόλου, παίρνω μέρος σ' ένα γρουπ για συζήτηση, κτλ. Ευτυχώς πηγαίνουμε ακόμα για τρεις μήνες στο κτήμα κάθε καλοκαίρι, εκεί που μεταμορφώνομαι σε θεριστή!

Ευχόμαστε ότι και εσύ, την Έρη και την Ασπασία-Μαρία θα περάσετε το νέο έτος γαλήνια, αταράξια, χαμογελαστά.

Με αγάπη

Peter

Yesterday at Quaker 8s at the Cadwalladers', we discussed the following marvelous poem by Rilke, written in 1919:

Du Dunkelheit, aus der ich stamme ich liebe dich mehr als die Flamme, welche die Welt begrenzt,
 indem sie glänzt
 mich nicht so sehr verhinderte am Wachen—:
 für irgend einen Kreis,
 aus dem heraus kein Wesen von ihr weiß.

Aber die Dunkelheit hält alles an sich:
 Gestalten und Flammen, Tiere und mich,
 wie sie's errafft, Menschen und Mächte—

Und es kann sein: eine große Kraft rührt sich in meiner Nachbarschaft.

Ich glaube an Nächte.

I brought along part of a passage from The Lagoon that I had entered in this journal two days ago: “One multiverse theory holds that universes give birth to baby universes via black holes. In that case, the number of black holes in our universe (millions) would be a design feature.” We also pointed out that in the Book of Genesis, before God says ‘Let there be light’ “darkness was upon the face of the deep.”

Here's a translation by Robert Bly:

You darkness, that I come from,
I love you more than all the fires that fence in the world, for the fire makes a circle of light for everyone, and then no one outside learns of you.

But the darkness pulls in everything:
shapes and fires, animals and myself, how easily it gathers them!—
powers and people—and it is possible a great energy is moving near me.

I have faith in nights.

Peter Green in the TLS quotes W. H. Auden quoting George Orwell's "So long as I remain alive and well, I shall continue to feel strongly about prose style, to love the surface of the earth, and to take pleasure in solid objects and scraps of useless information." Amen.

Cambridge

We took the 7:00 a.m. bus to South Station, then the Red Line to Harvard using our "T" discount cards, then directly to the Harvard Museums using our Hood Museum membership to get free admission since the Harvard Museums are in the reciprocal system. I was especially impressed by their ancient Greek vases and coins, the coins most of all. I managed next to get my Harvard library card renewed for another year (Will I ever use it?) before meeting Connelly Akstens (the name that Tom now prefers) and Susanne Murtha at "their hangout," the Japanese restaurant Wagamama on JFK Street, where Connelly can get food conforming to his dietary requirements. I had soba noodles for the first time since Tokyo in 1994. Next, to A.R.T. for the amazing show "Natasha Pierre, and the Great Comet of 1812," an electro-pop opera based on Tolstoy's War and Peace. As Diane Paulus says in the program, this employed "360-degree staging" and "new relationships between performers and audience members" as an exercise in "immersive theater." Thus we were seated in the middle of everything, just behind the marvelous stage band, with actors sometimes directly in front of us as they wandered throughout the entire theater playing their parts. The central figures in the play as in the novel are Pierre Bezukhov, the perplexed philosopher, Countess Natasha Rostov, who is engaged to Andrey Bolkonsky but is seduced by the horrible Anatole and tries to commit suicide when she discovers that this rogue is already married. At the end, Pierre has an epiphanic experience viewing the great comet (actually brightest in 1811) that was supposed to portend Napoleon's invasion of Russia in 1812. This was a splendid occasion for us of a new type of theater. Connelly then drove us to their new village, East Greenwich, Rhode Island, for supper and sleep in their new home. Connelly helped me with the Shakespeare sonnets that I want to read to Bill Cook on Tuesday, lending me his copy of the excellent collection edited by Katherine Duncan-Jones. Susanne revealed to Chrysanthi (and wondered if I knew, which I didn't) that Connelly is a cross-dresser. I remember the bevy of cross-dressers we once saw in a show at the A.R.T.—beautiful women who, in the question period following the play, all turned out to be men.

December 20, 2015

By 7:30 a.m. we were already on the beach bordering Greenwich Bay. I was reminded a little of Atlantic Beach, with the jetty at the end and the sand filled with clams. Temperature about 30 degrees, blue sky, brilliant sunshine. The huge breakfast that followed kept us until suppertime. We spent four leisurely hours in Boston's Museum of Fine Arts, viewing the special exhibit on Dutch Painting in the Age of Rembrandt and Vermeer that displayed how very many portrait and landscape painters there were in this extraordinary seventeenth-century Holland that was so prosperous largely owing to its control of the East Indies (today's Indonesia, of course). The show divided its subjects according to wealth: high, middle, and low. I especially admired Frans Hals's "Regents of the St. Elisabeth Hospital of Haarlem" (1641) from the Hals Museum in Haarlem, and Vermeer's "The Astronomer" (1668) from the Louvre, representative of high and middle classes. Pleasant supper in a Brookline restaurant. On the Dartmouth Coach bus back to Hanover, I completely planned my reading for Bill Cook, as follows, in this order:

65, only poetry can overcome decay
 38, the fair friend will enable Shakespeare's poetry
 12, but the friend, too, will die; solution: procreation
 17, a child plus a poem is still better
 29, the friend cures the poet's despondency
 55, the friend lives on, owing to the poem
 63, even when aged, the friend lives on in the poem
 90, the friend abandons the poet
 91, without the friend's love, the poet is wretched
 147, the poet's love for the dark lady is a disease 138, self-deceived, the poet pretends that the dark lady is chaste while she pretends that he is young 130, she is dark, etc., yet he loves her 141, he loves her not with his senses but with his heart, the site of sin and suffering
 134, the dark lady has now attracted the poet's fair friend 144, the poet's two loves: the fair friend and the dark lady now copulating, the friend eventually being infected with venereal disease

Very difficult, owing not only to certain words and expressions having a different meaning in Shakespeare's time from our meaning, but also to Shakespeare's frequent use of double meanings that hide the sexual content especially—for example “Till my bad angel fire my good one out,” line 14 of Sonnet 144, where “fire” can mean the dark lady's “heat.”

Christmas today; Chrysanthi's birthday yesterday. I gave her War and Peace in the new translation by Anthony Briggs (I have two copies of the old translation at the farm); she gave me a panful of σικωτόπιτα. No visit with children any more since Daphne and family do not come to South Salem. But she sent tulips, Leander sent Chrysanthi a warm vest, and Alec sent a photo of everyone with Takis and family in Thessaloniki, and telephoned from George's apartment. We overate extraordinarily on both days and on Christmas, after a huge ceremonial lunch, went to a party at Kesaya's with another large meal at which I just nibbled. At yesterday's ceremonial lunch at Kendal, Melissa the baker made a cake for Chrysanthi with Χρόνια πολλά, Χρυσάνθη written beautifully in icing on top.

A simplistic remark by Henry Kissinger is nevertheless worth remembering in this election year: “The philosopher deals with truth; the statesman addresses contingencies. The thinker has a duty to define what is right; the policymakers must deal with what is attainable.”

In a review in TLS (Dec. 18 & 25, p. 30) of Jon Miller's Spinoza and the Stoics I was delighted to read “Both Spinoza and the Stoics identified God with Nature and believed it to be the unique, immanent causal source of all things. Spinoza, however, rejects the Stoic idea that this ‘divine’ power acts teleologically, and especially that it does what it does for the benefit of human beings. . . . Spinoza . . . makes it absolutely clear that God (or Nature) does not act to achieve any ends or purposes whatsoever. . . . In Stoicism, something is truly good if it helps a human being achieve the supreme goal of living according to nature—that is, leading the life of reason. . . . The most obvious and interesting point of confluence between Spinoza and the Stoics [is] how the acquisition of rational virtue in a world whose events lie outside our control will result in equanimity and tranquility in the face of those slings and arrows of outrageous fortune.” All this of course expresses and summarizes my own governing philosophy of life.

Eleni Yiannakou wrote to say that her uncle Odysseas, Chrysanthi’s brother, died this morning. He’d been very sick and the death was a release. What an amazing life that man led, owing to the war! His wife, Eleni, is totally demented now, confined to home, with Toula living there and caring. I remember when her mother, released from a long term in prison for political reasons, was in the same condition, hidden in the bedroom.

Received an e-mail from someone trying to write an appreciation of John Nicolopoulos. He says that John was the primary founder of MGSA, with much exaggeration, and tells about our gathering at the University of Maryland. I must check with Mike Keeley to verify that my memory of the founding does not put Nicolopoulos at the center.

To Boston on Dartmouth Coach, full of other Kendal folk. We’re in the Hotel Veritas thanks to Vassiliki Rapti. An hour in Widener thanks to my renewed stack pass. Then to Dia and Wim’s for tea. Dia fully alive as always, filled with memory of Steve Waite, Rassias program, etc. Wim very quiet, very negative about American academic life, which he insists is totally non-democratic. I replied that in Dartmouth’s English Department, at least, the chairman was not a dictator determining everything. We voted on all important matters, freely. Vassiliki, poor thing, for she must now leave Harvard after eight years—maximum—in her position teaching MG language, picked us up. I lectured in the seminar room on Arrow Street to a full house, people from BU and BC as well as Harvard, people studying with Greek Today, as well. I did the Bien-Arndt paper on translating rhymed verse as rhymed translation, with “31 B.C. in Alexandria” as the example; then my lecture on Ritsos’s painterly technique; then as an example “The Moonlight Sonata,” which I recited (abridged version) with the music in the background, as required, hardly able to control my emotions in order to see straight and enunciate clearly. Finally: the two letters that Ritsos wrote me so interestingly, about his poetic technique, which he wished I would pay more attention to in my essays, aside from the content of the poems. Someone asked how painterly technique could apply to today’s totally non-representational painting, music, or literature. Maybe not, but I hoped that even an immensely large and complicated sculpture such as those we saw at the Whitney Museum last November could be appreciated as a single entity, in space, as opposed to a multiplicity in time, and therefore acquire a characteristic of beauty even though one could never call it “beautiful” as the word was used in the nineteenth century and even in the twentieth. Finally, supper with four others in a jumping, noisy Cambridge restaurant, terrible food, but easy conversation, all in Greek. I haven’t lectured like this in a long time and was pleased to discover that I can still do it.

Breakfast in Zoe’s across from the hotel, full of young mothers with their beautiful children. Walked through the Harvard Yard, full of memories for me, then to the Harvard Museums, where Connelly and Suzanne met us. Interesting to see portraits of John Adams in a proper wig when he presented his credentials in England, where he must have been amazingly hated owing to their loss of the Colonies. Also portraits of various Belmonts who made a fortune in mid-Atlantic trade, plus someone else whose fortune came from the slave trade and who left massive benefits to Harvard. A nice Monet, when he was young and hadn’t discovered impressionism yet; this landscape of a snowy road looks like a Winslow Homer. A splendid museum to which we must return. Lunch in Wagamama pleasantly. Then a delightful show at the A.R.T. called “Nice Fish” with bravura acting by Mark Rylance and Jim Lichtscheidl, a philosophical romp as they sit on the ice fishing through it. What a pleasure to see such good theater! Susanne, sitting next to me, was laughing constantly, as was I. We seem to have developed a ritual with Connelly and Susanne that we all hope will continue. Christina and Marco met us at South Station at 5:00. We went to a Chinese restaurant on Essex Street and spent good time together. Christina seems fully “cured” of past difficulties. She is talkative and charming. Ditto for Marco. She’s studying psychology, criminology, and business; he’s doing engineering and computer science. Both expect to go out on an internship within the next six or nine months. They would like to see “1984” with us at the A.R.T. in late February. What a relief and pleasure to see Christina now as a normal, energetic, approachable human being!

I voted with pleasure for Bernie Sanders in the New Hampshire primary despite my wife’s vociferous opposition. She of course voted for Hillary Clinton because she views Bernie’s proposals as unrealistic and his general experience as much inferior to Hillary’s. I told her today that her arguments against Bernie are convincingly expanded by David Brooks’s op-ed column “Livin’ Bernie Sanders’s Danish Dream.” She read it and then asked if I agreed. “Yes,” I replied. “So why did you vote for Bernie?” “For two reasons,” I answered. “Because of my amazement that he can say what he does without being denounced as a Communist, traitor, etc., the way people were in the McCarthy period, and because if Bernie’s popularity continues although Hillary becomes president, she is likely to adopt some of his best ideas—in moderation.” I am still glad that I voted for Bernie’s “Danish dream” in the New Hampshire primary.

Helene sent me the following piece of writing by John, which must date after 1977 (sixth printing of Demotic Greek 1) and before 1982, when Ο ιπτάμενος θάλαμος was published:

One of my greatest joys at Dartmouth has been my friendship and collaboration with Peter Bien and his wife, Chrysanthi. The three of us wrote a text on Demotic Greek and, in its field, it has become a best seller going through six printings.

“We are now working on another volume of Greek at an intermediate level. It is cast in a science fiction mode and introduces Greek culture and literature to second level students, along with a review of grammar.

We are completely opposite in temperament and yet ideally complementary. We are both looking forward to doing a course in tandem on the Greek myth in English and French literatures.

We will do it under the auspices of the Comparative Literature Department.

I first met Peter at a party given by Larry Harvey in the first year of my arrival at Dartmouth. I did not know who he was, and he did not know me. We somehow ended up in our host's kitchen, where a mosaic of St. Francis was affixed to a wall. I gazed at the image and said to this man next to me that there is only one book I have ever read whose last two pages I shall never complete. 'I do not,' I continued, 'want, by finishing the book, to bring to an official close the sheer pleasure of reading a powerful story and a perfect translation. I mean Saint Francis by Kazantzakis.' Peter smiled and left the room. It was only later I learned that it was he who had rendered this flawless and inspired translation.

He is modest, totally honest, and deeply committed to the profession and to students. He is a completely authentic human being, serene in his wisdom, sensitive in his awareness of others. He is selfless and humble. He is open to learn and quick to admit a rare error he may make. As a good friend he is also a severe critic, challenging a myriad of insane ideas which come rolling from my mouth—but never discouraging me in anything I say or do.

I mention Peter last because his style of teaching is low key but intense. He is an impeccable lecturer: his dazzling thoughts are articulated with intensity; his voice dresses his interpretations with dramatic flair—he whispers, booms, insinuates, orates, dreams, converses. He commands respect by his thoughts, his delivery, and his total sincerity. He opens the minds of students and shows them what they are capable of accomplishing.

Peter has another way of doing things, but we are committed to the same principles. The differences between us vanish when we are engaged with students and that, ultimately, is all that matters. No one person can have all the answers, and I have always figured that two are better than one. We need all the effective styles we can get, we need all the commitment to the task we can get because it is already later than yesterday and close to tomorrow.

A long e-mail from Joe Morris to Alec, relayed to Leander, and finally to me, describing the illegal activities of Earl “and his crew”—apparently cutting trails on other people's land (as he did on ours) reaching all the way from North Creek to the River Road, using the power line in part. Joe says that police and the DEC have been investigating. He also says that Kelley is living in a Roman Catholic "safe house" because she has been abused. Yet with us he has always been all sweetness and light, and we often see him with Stephen. Something is screwy. What to do, if anything, is certainly not clear.

Last night at Meeting to discuss what to do with the almost \$300,000 we have been left by three bequests. I suggested keep  $\frac{1}{3}$ , donate  $\frac{1}{3}$  to our sister meeting in Cuba, and split the remaining  $\frac{1}{3}$  between Pendle Hill and Woolman Hill.

Played the third and fourth movements of Haydn's Military Symphony in the Cary Room yesterday (8-hand piano with Joan Wilson, Stan Udy, and Joan Snell) better than we had ever done it in rehearsal, even incorporating some of the terrace dynamics.

I visited Jack Hemenway in the health center. He stopped eating nine days ago, but is still drinking water, so his self-decided process of dying is prolonged. He was jolly, smiling, talkative (although with some difficulty), besieged by visitors including staff and even some of the workmen now here. He said that he and Dr. Dacey, about a year ago, agreed on this course of action but would wait until the timing seemed appropriate. Like so many, he feels immensely grateful to Kendal and is assured that there is a special section of heaven devoted to former Kendal residents!

Αγαπητέ καθηγητή Αλιβιζάτε,

Πήρα είδηση στο κομπούτερ μου ότι θα μιλήσετε στην Αδελαΐδα (όπου μίλησα κι εγώ πριν από πολλές δεκαετίες) και ξαφνικά θυμήθηκα μερικές συμομιλίες που είχαμε στην Αθήνα (πάλι πριν από πολλές δεκαετίες) και προπαντός πάνω στην προσάθειά σας να βοηθήσετε στο Ευρωπαϊκό Δικαστήριο Δικαιωμάτων του Ανθρώπου στο Στρασβούργο τους Έλληνες αντιρρησίες κατά συνείδηση. Ώραγε τι προστασία έχουν τέτοιοι άνθρωποι τώρα στην Ελλάδα; Μήπως αναγνωρίζει επιτέλους η κυβέρνηση τη θρησκευτική απάρνηση να σκοτώσουμε κανέναν συνάνθρωπό μας;

Και βρήκα στο ημερολόγιό μου κάτι που είπατε σ' ένα συνέδριο στο Τορόντο—λόγια που θα είχαν ισχύσει και χθες: October 17, 2003, very good keynote talk by Nikos Alivizatos on what, if anything, Greece can contribute to the EU. His answer was that Greece, more than any other EU country, has been growing and changing according in part to EU directives, for example in the treatment of minorities. It can therefore teach others in the community that a nation can comply and conform without losing its own identity and integrity.

Όσο για μένα, συνταξιούχος στην ηλικία 86, πάω καλά. Πέρυσι δημοσίευσα μια νέα μετάφραση στ' αγγλικά του Ζορμπά, που χρειάστηκε επειδή η προηγούμενη ήταν από τα γαλλικά από έναν μεταφραστή που δεν ήξερε τα ελληνικά. Τώρα μαζεύω τα συγγράματά μου σε περιοδικά να ξαναδημοσιευτούν σαν βιβλίο.

Σας εύχομαι το κάθε καλό στην Αυστραλία . . . και παντού!

An interesting day in Boston and Cambridge. First stop: the Bromfield Pen Shop to get a new ink plunger for my black fountain pen, the old one having fused tight from lack of use. Memories of going to the Park Street Church with Johnny Taylor. Then to the Zoe Greek café that we discovered last month next to the Hotel Veritas. This time—about 11:00 a.m.—it was totally full with lively Harvard students feasting on a late breakfast, as we did too. Then to the Harvard Museums. A strange exhibition on the third floor features work by Australian Aborigines, not to my liking. But then we went slowly through the splendid Ancient Greek collection of vases and coins plus the Egyptian, in which I had to try hard to convince Chrysanthi that Cleopatra was not a dark-skinned African. Finally we discovered the first floor collections, which are rich. I especially liked Cézanne's "Study of Trees" (1904), really abstract even this early, and Picasso's "Woman with a Chignon" (1901) because of her expressive face. Finally, to the A.R.T. for 1984, based of course on Orwell's famous novel. I found it somewhat tedious, although very well acted. The protracted torture scene at the end was excruciating, making some of the audience get up and leave. I kept thinking of the Junta in Greece—the inability to trust anyone because supposed friends or even lovers would then betray you as a resistor. What a total difference between this sort of theater and the movie of As You Like It that we saw earlier this week—total fantasy and joy!

Lewis Owens, reading my journal, reports that it was Monica who abandoned him rather than he who abandoned Monica, as I report. Also that Queens' College was founded by two queens and therefore cannot be written as Queen's College. This makes me realize, of course, how many other errors, large or small, must be contained in those 1000+ pages.

I saw Naomi Hartov downstairs the other day as she was collecting the beautiful collages she had on exhibition here. It was a lovely reunion until—thoughtlessly—I mentioned that I had found Jean Brophy and had invited her to return for our twenty-fifth anniversary celebration. Naomi's expression registered her disgust, and today I received the following letter from her.

Hi Peter,

It was lovely to see you and then Chrysanthi on Monday. I have to say, I was feeling very good during the hours I was visiting there and seeing so many people (staff and residents) with whom I used to work. However, I must tell you that, after some thought, I actually felt very, very badly and need to pass on my thoughts.

I know in my heart what kind and forgiving people you and Chrysanthi are, but I feel you still don't "get" how many people were hurt by Jean's 7+ year reign at Kendal and just how badly they were hurt by her. I can (but won't) name any number of people who needed counseling after their experiences with her, but I openly include myself. Kendal did not pay for our counseling. Although I left Kendal of my own free will, I did it because I could no longer continue, day after day, to tell prospective residents that our philosophy was "to be a good place to live, it must be a good place to work." It was the best job I have ever had, and I gave it up, not only to spare myself the dissonance of repeating what I felt was a lie, but to save other employees from suffering from Jean's behavior by making it crystal clear to John Diffey and the Board how important it was for them to let her go. For me to hear that you had actually reached out to invite her to the 25th anniversary celebration, and in the process not even thought of inviting Carol Weingeist who actually paved the way for a successful opening... well, it just stunned me.

Perhaps you feel that Carol, me and others should just get over it and let bygones be bygones, but the wounds have been reopened and, though the deed is already done, I felt I couldn't keep this to myself.

Best regards,—Naomi

I responded as follows:

Dear Naomi,

I watched your face fall when I thoughtlessly mentioned Jean Brophy. I of course knew well enough of how bad she was to you and Carol (among lots of others). We tried to “cure” her over a two-year period, hiring psychologists to train her to be pleasant, to smile, be considerate, etc. But it didn't work, and eventually we fired her.

So why did I reach out to invite her? It's because she never acted badly toward me and indeed in many respects was a good administrator—indeed in every respect except one: her inability to ingratiate herself with either colleagues or residents. I was hoping that my invitation would act in some respect as a healing potion. Of course you are totally correct that the first one I should have reached out to in this way was Carol, although in her case, as in yours, no healing is necessary because you were both exemplary in your ability to ingratiate yourselves with all concerned.

Well, she may not come at all, since we needed to change the date to a weekday, Wednesday, June 29.

Yes, it was lovely to see you and I'm especially glad that Chrysanthi found you as well. Jean Brophy did enough harm 20+ years ago; let's not allow her to do more harm now in 2016.

Easter Sunday

Yesterday, looking for letters in file letter H, possibly for the Princeton archive, I found this following sonnet dated November 19, 2000, that I had written for Stylianos Harkianakis and had completely forgotten:

A BILINGUAL SONNET
FOR ARCHBISHOP STYLIANOS
ON HIS NAME DAY

Στυλιανέ, thy name itself's a prop—στύλος, στύλωμα—a mainstay, pillar where Simeon legislated on top to pilgrims arriving from near and far.

And how much better than “Your Eminence,” since height for thee conveys a fatherly concern both strict and loving, assurance of στοργή ruled by faith, hope, and charity.

Therefore let the στυλ- in Stylianós ring out in thy name-day's celebration; for pillars, props, and columns keep the roof from caving in, sustain our Lord Χριστός the Pantokratoras's elevation, and provide each pilgrim with living proof.

Visited Dick Williamson, who is again in hospital, having fallen for the third time. And what a horrible sight—covered with bloody bruises and with a clamp around his neck and partially covering his mouth owing to a fractured bone in the back of the neck. He was lucid, but I could hardly understand him owing to the clamp over his teeth. A nurse told me that last night he was fearfully agitated, striking out and trying to hit people. Such a sad case, so arrogant, so unable to accept the clear fact that he is failing. He insisted on living at home, never used any aid in walking or to help keep his balance. So, of course, inevitably, he fell yet again. The nurse told me that he must not try to live at home, alone, any more. I hoped that some legal constraints can be imposed; otherwise he'll go right back again to the guarantee of another fall. I do sense, regretfully, that death at this point would be his optimum next step.

Robert Pinsky spoke here, beautifully, this afternoon. Among other gifts I heard from him for the first time this marvelous poem by Emily Dickinson:

I'm nobody! Who are you?
 Are you nobody, too?
 Then there's a pair of us—don't tell!
 They'd banish us, you know.
 How dreary to be somebody!
 How public, like a frog
 To tell your name the livelong day
 To an admiring bog?

I read excerpts from Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass to Bill Cook this morning. I especially liked the following:

Great is language . . . it is the mightiest of the sciences
 It is the fullness and color and form and diversity of the earth . . .
 and of men and women . . . and of all qualities and processes;
 It is greater than wealth . . . it is greater than buildings or ships or religions or paintings or music.

I received a letter from Charlie Hamlen today saying that Natasha Paremiski had written him to declare how much she enjoyed her time with us here last Saturday when she came to perform. I responded as follows:

Dear Charlie,

We enjoyed Natasha immensely both as an abnormally gifted musician and as a normal, simple, friendly human being. Her program (Brahms Paganini variations, Beethoven opus 110, Rachmaninoff sonata no. 2) was all fire and brimstone (especially the marvelous Beethoven fugue in the last movement), played as though everything was as simple as pie! When she was here 3 years ago and did Pictures at an Exhibition, also fire and brimstone, she concluded with a Berceuse “to bring us back to normal” and probably ought to have done that again this time, for the Rachmaninoff was more fiery than the two previous works put together. In any case, it was a memorable recital. Her stamina is remarkable. She got up early on Saturday morning to catch the 8:30 a.m. bus on 42nd Street, didn't have much breakfast, arrived here at 1:00 p.m., wanted only a cup of tea, rested a bit, then practiced vigorously from 4:00-ish until 7:00 p.m., refusing supper or any socializing, 15 minutes later began her demanding recital, and finally after all well-wishing and congratulating audience members has gone home to sleep, she proclaimed with a smile, "I'm hungry." And, "Do you have any wine?" So she feasted on lamb chops in our apartment lubricated with Greek ouzo. Spying the music on our piano, Britten's "Playful Pizzicato" and Mozart's 4-hand sonata in F, she said, "Let's play 4-hands" and sat down with me, beginning at a speed that of course left me lingering far behind. Finally to bed, but in the morning she reported that her boyfriend in Texas had telephoned her at 4:30 a.m. to make sure that she awoke in time for the morning bus back to New York (which of course she did). Thanks to you, once again, for making her visit (visits) possible.

If any of your wanderings bring you northward this summer, we'd love to see you at the farm, especially in July and very early August when Alec, Monica, and the two children will also be there.

We went to the Epitaphios service at Newport with Kesaya and Chris and also Carrie Rosenblum. It is so moving, so terribly sad the way the Virgin Mary mourns for her son. At the same time, it is so beautiful. We sang the three famous lamentation hymns at length, half in Greek, half in English. But when we returned at 9:00 p.m. we were shocked to learn via an e-mail that Allan Munck had died suddenly this morning. I played music with him ten days ago and we were eager to rehearse Beethoven and Mendelssohn for next time. He seemed so perfectly healthy in both mind and body—and now he is gone. Lucky for him, I suppose, but not for those he leaves behind. We had played chamber music quite regularly for forty or fifty years! Now with him gone and Dick Williamson so declined, my Wednesday evening music is finished.

Earlier today: mailed a new Parker fountain pen to Hussein Majeed in Turkey. Poor man, he has fled Iraq and somehow subsists, unemployed, in central Turkey. His Parker pen broke and he begged me to send him another. As a long-time devotee of Parker pens, I understood perfectly his need. (I now have two in working order here and one more at the farm!) Last Saturday: spent the entire afternoon with Mike and Laura Gouthreau, our former Adirondack neighbors who now live in St. Albans, Vermont. They said they were amazed at my stamina in leading them on tours of both Kendal and Dartmouth. What a pleasure to see these good friends again! We plan now to schedule a lunch sometime in Montpelier, which is halfway between us.

May 4, 2016

To Princeton via Dartmouth Coach and then Bus 100 to Princeton. Overnight in Nassau Inn, where we changed room because we heard the man in the next room speaking interminably on his cell phone, with his every word discernible. Kathy Crown, head of Humanities Studies, took us for a good supper at the Mediterranean restaurant, where I had been before. Indeed as we walked through town beforehand noting various restaurants, it seems that we had eaten in just about all of them during our stay in Princeton and my many visits writing "Greek Today" with Dimitri. Kathy pleased us greatly by confessing that she had studied Greek with "Greek Today" and remembered receiving the book via post and groaning owing to its weight. Previously, also, we walked leisurely through the wonderful Princeton town library, now enlarged, with a beautiful children's room on the third floor. How beautiful and upscale Princeton is, especially compared to the unrelieved ugliness one views from the bus traveling here.

May 5, 2016

In the morning, delivered the first part of my archive to Don Skemer. I felt bereaved of my spiritual and intellectual self. He received all the letters sent me by famous or otherwise notable people, plus about  $\frac{3}{4}$  of the amassed photocopies of Kazantzakis's letters that Chrysanthi and I collected in order to produce my volume of the Selected Letters. These ran from 1902 until 1939 because that's how far I could go in producing a catalog listing each document. I must continue now with the letters, from 1940 to 1957. Don is paying me \$2500 for the original letters, nothing for the thousands of photocopies. I must check with Dimitri Gondicas concerning what other things he wants included in the archives. He isn't here now because he went to Greece for Easter and was there when his mother died on the following day. Being here now brings back so many memories of my multiple visits to work on "Greek Today" with him and Mache Karanika, plus my term here as a visiting professor.

Walked at 11:30 to Prospect to view the formal garden with multi-colored tulip displays. At noon Carol Oberto greeted us with hugs and kisses. So nice to see her again and so nice that she's still working at the Modern Greek center. Then Mike Keeley came with his new "friend," Anita, who lost her husband six years ago. She cooks breakfast for him every morning! He is writing a new novel, a murder mystery not connected with Greece. He finally sold his apartment in Kolonaki—for half price. We both expressed our deep gratitude for the ways in which marriage to a Greek changed our lives. Carol then announced that Dimitri, detained in Greece owing to his mother's death and thus unable to be at this lunch, had sent a toast to be read. So we clinked glasses and she then declaimed a beautiful statement of his gratitude for what I contributed over so many years to Modern Greek studies.

We returned to Manhattan on the slow bus, walked with our three valises (two now empty) from forty-first and eighth to fifty-third and seventh, to the Sheraton Hotel, managed to get to our room on the forty-third floor despite Chrysanthi's acrophobia, then walked to Lincoln Center and are now sharing a coffee (price $3.75) in Symphony Hall, awaiting our evening of Balanchine ballets. These were extraordinary. Two we'd never seen before and two old-timers still completely satisfying. The first two were "Bournoville Divertissements," traditional, showing off nineteenth-century technique, and "Moves," jagged and sexy, a "ballet in silence," performed without music, yet with all the dancers perfectly coordinated. Next came the "Tchaikovsky Pas de Deux," which we've seen repeatedly, yet this time with Tiler Peck and Andrew Veyette it was athleticism at its most exciting. But best of all was the evening's finale, Stravinsky's "Symphony in Three Movements," which, from its startling opening with the corps all in white lined up in a straight line across the stage until its frenetic end danced by the full cast, is a showcase for Balanchine's brilliance, not to mention, of course, the startling music.

Slept in the Sheraton New York on fifty-third and seventh, forty-third floor, Chrysanthi bravely overcoming her acrophobia as we ascended the mile-a-minute elevator. But I kept the shades down to mask the "splendid view" that Reception had promised us.

May 6, 2016

Took all our valises to the Yale Club and breakfasted there, then reached MoMA precisely at 9:30 to see the special Degas exhibit. This showed a totally different side of this artist from the usual one, which identifies him solely with the painting of ballet dancers. Now we learned that he had begun chiefly as a printer, engraver, often doing multiple prints, some light, some dark, some altered with pastel. But the highlight at the Met for us today was clearly the Pergamon show, a collection chiefly of sculpture brought here from the museum in Berlin. The treasures were discovered when some German archeologist observed a peasant pulverizing marble statues in order to make lime! Excavations then unearthed extraordinary treasures, even a huge Αθηνά modeled on the Athena cult-statue in the Parthenon. The whole story of Alexander's conquests, the multiple kingdoms that then ruled them, and the end of this with the suicides of Antony and Cleopatra became totally clear. There was even a long composite sculpture depicting the battle of Actium. A wonderful education, all of this, and too much to digest all at once. So of course I purchased the catalogue. Lastly, after eating comfortably in the Met's members' dining room, we went to the Frick Museum's show of Van Dyck. What interested me most were his multiple portraits of Charles I, long before the civil war and Charles's bloody end, of course.

May 10, 2016

A few weeks ago it occurred to me that perhaps the Town of Hanover might honor Kendal at Town Meeting, much as it had honored Chrysanthi when she received the Vaughan Award. So I went to visit the town manager, Julia Griffin (Julie, as everyone knows her), together with Jeff Roosevelt of the Kendal administration. She of course greeted me as "Chrysanthi's husband"! She immediately thought that our suggestion was a very good idea. "The town could give Kendal a tree," she offered, but that didn't appeal to me. "How about a bench?" I suggested. Immediately she smiled and revealed that one of the three benches directly outside the town offices was still unnamed, and declared, "It's yours!" "Yes," she continued, "we'll make a nice declaration at the start of Town Meeting and will also give Kendal another present." "Probably not the lovely glass bowl that you gave Chrysanthi," I offered. "How about a very attractive clock to hang on the wall?" was her response. Thus today, at Town Meeting, the clock was presented and the declaration was read by the chair of the Select Board, Peter Christie, as follows:

A PROCLAMATION CONGRATULATING KENDAL
AT HANOVER AS THE COMMUNITY CELEBRATES ITS TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY.

WHEREAS: Kendal at Hanover opened its doors to residents in July of 1991; and

WHEREAS: Since opening, Kendal has been home to 1,053 Hanover residents, enjoying life in 250 independent living apartments and a full service nursing home facility; and

WHEREAS: Kendal residents are vital members of the Hanover community, volunteering thousands of hours every year to dozens of area organizations, including supporting a partnership with neighboring Richmond Middle School; and

WHEREAS: Kendal's Intergenerational Program with residents, staff and children in the Children's Center is considered a model for other retirement communities throughout the country; and

WHEREAS: Kendal's Inner Light Program, a resident-oriented continuous improvement process, received a regional award from Leading Age Maine and New Hampshire; and

WHEREAS: Kendal at Hanover is accredited by the Commission on Accreditation of Rehabilitation Facilities and has been awarded a five star overall rating by Medicare's Nursing Home Compare; and

WHEREAS: Kendal has played a significant role in Hanover's EPA Green Power Community designation, representing the second largest 100% Green Power user within the State of New Hampshire; and

WHEREAS: Kendal is a major employer in the region, providing jobs for 321 staff members; and

WHEREAS: Kendal continues to provide a wonderful retirement living option for many Hanover residents as well as many people from around the country that are attracted to this region and contribute to the intellectual, philanthropic and volunteer spirit of the Upper Valley.

NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT PROCLAIMED by the Town of Hanover Select Board that July 2016 will mark the twenty-fifth anniversary of Kendal in our community. The Town of Hanover is immensely grateful for Kendal's presence in our midst and the invaluable contributions made by so many of its residents to the benefit of our region.

Proclaimed this tenth day of May, 2016

TOWN OF HANOVER SELECT BOARD: Peter L. Christie, Chairman, Athos J. Rassias, Vice Chairman, William V.
Geraghty, Nancy A. Carter, Joanna Whitcomb, Secretary.

I still haven't seen the bench, but I'm told that its brass plaque is already in place!

May 15, 2016

Because our Gathering Room will soon be closed for six or more months for enlargement, Ruth Lappin organized an informal three-hour recital by Kendal's amateur musicians. I played the following: Third movement from Mozart's four-hand piano sonata in D major, K123a, written when he was 16 years old, and the first movement from the four-hand sonata in F major, K. 497, written when he was 30 years old, both with Stan Udy; Bach's third Brandenburg Concerto arranged for 8-hand piano, with Joan Wilson, Stan Udy, and Joan Snell; Ravel's Pavane de la Belle au bois dormant and Les entretiens de la Belle et de la Bête, from Ma mère l'Oye (Mother Goose), and finally Britten's Playful Pizzicato, all three with Ruth Lappin. Mistakes in everything, but nothing serious or perhaps even noticeable. Lots of practice paid off.

May 19, 2016

I spoke in the Gathering Room about how Kendal was founded, helped by Tim Thacher, Bob Belenky, Edie Gieg as "hecklers" and "abetters," Rose Miller as introducer, and Carol Weingeist as an added resource in the question period (she told about the time when a moose walked into Kendal through the front door). The whole idea was Bill Benson's but he, suffering from terminal cancer, alas, did not come on the stage, although he did attend. I had collected about 25 photos of the construction from the huge number lent me by Sherry Butler (Facilities) and had arranged them on Power Point with splendid help from experts at Dartmouth. Norm Porter helped the set-up beforehand, so that everything worked perfectly. I ran the slide-show of the photos at the start as people came in, turned them off during the talk, ran them again during the question period after the talk. This is the talk:

THE EARLY HISTORY OF KENDAL AT HANOVER

Peter Bien

Opening: ROSE: When you were very young, did you ever wonder about miracles? We all heard the word, no doubt. But could there really be such a thing? Tonight we will learn that there have been miracles. And, to our surprise, we live in one. Bill Benson realized that so many newer residents had not heard how this miracle happened and he thought to make this happen. Peter Bien knows all the details, from personal experience, and he will tell us about it. There may be interruptions, but for the rest of us, let's be polite and save our short questions until the end. Peter . . . ?

PETER: I will begin by stressing two things. The first is that Kendal at Hanover's existence is a sort of miracle; we are here by a hair's breadth. The second is that this facility was totally a Quaker initiative. I will elaborate on both of these elements. First: the miracle.

TIM: OK, tell us about the "miracle." That's a great big word. What do you really mean?

[Ad lib about the size of the word "miracle."]

Our Kendal would never have even been conceived if Kendal at Longwood outside of Philadelphia, what I call "Mama Kendal," had not first failed at Blue Hill, Maine. I do not know the full story of that failure. My understanding is that exceedingly antagonistic officials in both the state and the town made life so miserable for Kendal at Longwood's managers that they decided to pull out.

What happened next was an accident that has a lot to do with Quakerism.

BOB: Whoops! Are you already on the Quaker initiative. Is there nothing more to say about the so-called miracle?

[Ad lib about more on the miracle, soon. However:]

The director of Mama Kendal at the time was a "weighty Quaker" named Lloyd Lewis, a businessman who had been in the steel industry and knew his way around. He and I were trustees of a Quaker study-center in suburban Philadelphia. I used to see Lloyd at the trustees' meetings.

Lloyd was failing at Blue Hill; concurrently I was having a serious problem with my father, who was very ill. I convinced my parents to sign up for a new Quaker CCRC called the Quadrangle that was being developed in Haverford, Pennsylvania. But the Quadrangle never got built under Quaker auspices. So we have two failures that explain why Kendal at Hanover is here. At the next meeting of the Pendle Hill trustees, I said to Lloyd, "I need a place for my father and you need a location that might work better than Blue Hill. How about Hanover?" Lloyd's first reaction was: "We can't. Nobody's going to retire in frigid New Hampshire!" But he was intrigued. So we began to ask people. He sent one of his administrators up here. Together we visited every church in town, the Rotary, Kiwanis, etc., and described what a CCRC is. We then asked people, "If a CCRC were built here, would you retire in Hanover despite the weather?" The typical answer was always: "Yes, yes! We don't want to go to Florida; we don't want to go to Arizona. All our life is here, our friends are here, everything else that we find familiar is here. Yes, we would retire here!"

That was encouraging. So we decided to try. Who were "we"? I noted above that Kendal at Hanover was totally a Quaker initiative. We were a small group of members of the local Friends Meeting in Hanover. The only ones still alive are Chrysanthi Bien and myself, Erica Brinton, and Tom Corindia. We asked ourselves, "Can we build such a place?" Not a single one of us had been trained in business. So we decided to involve Mama Kendal, which eventually became the Kendal Corporation. That brought Lloyd Lewis into the picture as the central figure.

Lloyd hired Carol Weingeist, a local Quaker whose parents were resident in Kendal at Longwood. [Introduce her.] We installed her in an office in the Quaker Meeting House. She began to recruit prospective residents interested enough to put some money down. We conducted numerous forums in various places. Many brave souls signed up. This encouraged us to begin to look for land. We wondered whether Dartmouth might collaborate. I remember meeting with President McLaughlin of Dartmouth. He asked about an admissions process in which Dartmouth people would receive priority. We deemed that contrary to the Quaker principle of equality. So the negotiations broke down. However, we remained friends with Dartmouth. When it came time to look for land, the College was very cooperative.

EDIE: Whoops again! This isn't a very coherent talk. Now you're suddenly off on a completely new topic: Land! You won't forget about the miracle-business, we hope.

[Ad lib about more miracle to come plus more Quakerism.]

We went all over town with Gordie DeWitt, who was then in charge of Dartmouth land. The College owns numerous properties, many of which it was eager to sell. I remember going to a beautiful farm in Etna. Lloyd was there, and Alan Hunt, then chair of the Kendal Corporation's board. Alan actually began to dance—"Oh what a beautiful view!" You could look right over into the Vermont mountains. But then, sobering up, we asked Gordie, "Is it on town water?" "No." "Is it on town sewage?" "No." "Is this road ever likely to be paved?" "No." It was steep. We contemplated all the autos of residents slithering out of control down this icy hill in winter and figured that maybe this beautiful view was not such a good idea. Then Gordie showed us another farm located not too far up Lyme Road. This was flat, nice, and much nearer. Interested, we began to talk to people about it, whereupon we discovered that this was the site where Dartmouth's Medical School and Chemistry and Physics Departments had buried their radioactive wastes for decades! So we thought we had better not take that site either.

We began to look in Vermont. There's another reason for that which I will come to later. We actually found a very nice property on Route 5, on the river. But everything else told us to stay in New Hampshire because there's no income tax and because the hospital was very close (then it was right in Hanover). In any case, all these things were going on together. We were looking for land, holding forums, recruiting people, talking to Dartmouth. But the other aspect was the hospital. Would Hitchcock be interested? It was not clear at first that it would. We needed to discover some cooperative physicians. First and foremost among these was Dr. James Strickler. This leads to another unlikely circumstance.

We still had not found an appropriate piece of land. We got it finally thanks to Jim Strickler, only because he happened to be my father's physician. One day he said to me, "I have a patient who wants to donate a beautiful farm; her name is Doris Ferguson, née Cummings. But she insists, 'over my dead body it must not go to Dartmouth!' How about Kendal?" This is where we are located: on the Cummings farm. We began to talk to the owner. Her daughter got into the act and said, "Well Mom, let's not donate it, let's sell it." So we started talking price and things were not going very well. Then we found that she had a childhood friend—they had gone to school together here in Hanover. It was Lou Bresett of Lou's Restaurant. So we brought Lou into the act. He brokered the deal in such a way that the part of her farm across the road was purchased by the Hanover Improvement Society and therefore will remain open. We paid Mrs. Ferguson over a million dollars.

At the same time, negotiations were continuing with the hospital. These were not easy. But some very cooperative physicians—Jim Strickler, of course, Bill Chambers, Ross McIntyre, Mike Zubkoff, Harold Rawnsley—argued that what we were doing was important not only for us but also for the medical community since we could constitute their geriatric laboratory. That was the breakthrough, leading finally to an agreement whereby Hitchcock would provide our physician and two nurse practitioners.

While these things were going on, we were also going through the State's regulatory process. When we started all this, there was no CCRC north of Massachusetts. Nobody knew what a CCRC was. In New Hampshire and Vermont, as in Maine, there were no procedures—no way to regulate this sort of entity. So the first step on the State level was to decide whether a commission would be set up to draft the proper procedures for regulating CCRCs. That is where the trouble began, because the committee appointed was chaired by a gentleman called Hurley who was the owner of the largest chain of nursing homes in the State of New Hampshire. You cannot get a greater conflict of interest than that. But he was the chair. What Hurley brought to the committee were lurid stories of retirement communities that had gone bankrupt and of residents who had become charges of the State under Medicaid.

Furthermore, the New Hampshire State government's official in charge seemed determined to sabotage Kendal. That was the other reason that made us look for land in Vermont. We had a very good relationship there mostly because the governor at the time, Madeleine Kunin, was a dear friend of the late Barbara Gilbert, a former resident here and one of our original Quaker founders. The governor was eager to see us in Vermont. But we still preferred to be in New Hampshire.

Then some really strange things occurred, making me repeat that Kendal at Hanover is here by a miracle.

TIM: Ah, finally!

Yes, we are here by a hair's breadth, owing first to the failure at Blue Hill, then to the Haverford CCRC's failure, to Jim Stricker being the physician both of my parents and of Doris Cummings, and now to another serendipitous circumstance. For some reason, I was invited to a big affair at Dartmouth's Rockefeller Center. I never had anything to do with that center. On this occasion, however, I was asked to give a report because I was in charge of something that involved Rockefeller people. It just happened that at dinner I was seated next to Malcolm McLane, a distinguished lawyer in Concord, former mayor of that town, father of our present Congresswoman, Annie Kuster, and descendant of a former New Hampshire governor. We started talking; I told him about the problems we were having with the State. He looked me in the eye, pointed his finger, and blurted out, "You are so stupid, I cannot believe it!" When I regained my composure I asked why. "Don't you realize," he responded, "that nothing ever gets done in New Hampshire the way you are doing it? You are playing fair. That doesn't work in New Hampshire." I sheepishly inquired, "What works?" He answered, "It's very simple. You need to spend a lot of money to hire an accomplished lobbyist who will go to all the individuals on the committee." So I told Lloyd Lewis. Lloyd, being a good Quaker, said, "We cannot do that. We must do things properly, honestly."

The situation got worse and worse, until finally Lloyd Lewis capitulated. We spent a lot of money; Malcolm McLane found us the proper man to do the lobbying, and the final vote on the committee deciding whether or not to set up regulatory procedures was five to four. We won because of a switch vote by a committee member who had been successfully lobbied. The essence of the story, I suppose, is that our Kendal at Hanover would not exist if I had not been seated next to Malcolm McLane at that fancy dinner.

But we still were opposed by the State official who seemed intent on sabotaging us. That leads to another story. Lane Dwinell, a former New Hampshire governor, was on the Kendal priority list. We told him about our troubles. He said, "Leave it to me." And he telephoned John. John was John Sununu, governor at the time. "John," Dwinell explained, "there's someone in your administration trying to destroy Kendal at Hanover." "Kendal at Hanover? What's that? Never heard of it." Dwinell, who used to love to tell this story, filled in the details about Kendal and then exclaimed, "John, I've devoted my entire life to New Hampshire and I'll be gol-darned if I'm gonna die in Vermont!" Amazingly, everything then changed. Sununu presumably spoke to our nemesis and from that time onward the procedures were fine. A commission was set up to develop regulations for CCRCs. The rest was not so threatening.

Bob: Well, that's quite a story. The rest not so threatening? Do you mean that it was easy, comfortable?

[Ad lib on town difficulties, maybe even worse.]

Now we come to the town. The initial concern was traffic. They quizzed us and quizzed us. How many of your residents are going to have cars? How many times will they leave the premises and drive? In which direction will they turn? Will they park in Hanover? Obviously, we did not know any of the answers. But we assured the town that the traffic problem would be manageable, and somehow got beyond that concern. The real stickler was taxes. Our position was that we wanted to pay taxes, should pay taxes, did not expect a free ride. But we considered ourselves a charitable, not-for-profit entity and suggested that we pay, in lieu of taxes, a sum to be mutually agreed upon. The town replied, "You must be kidding. We will never do that. You will pay taxes just like everyone else, and we will tell you how much." Nevertheless we did manage a bit of negotiation, with the result that the residential buildings would be taxed but not the health center or the community center. What remained, however, was how the tax was to be calculated. The town wanted to determine the amount according to resale value. We complained, "Who is going to buy this place?" and argued for cost as the basis. The town refused. When the assessments were published, we found to our dismay that a percentage had been added to the residences because of so-called "enhancement" by virtue of the health center and community center. Although these two facilities were not supposed to be taxed, they were clearly being taxed indirectly. The total tax was immense; we considered it unfair. What happened next stretched over several years but I will describe it now and backtrack afterwards to the subject of Kendal's construction.

EDIE: Good! You're trying to keep the development rationally coherent, as a professor should, of course.

There is a committee for tax adjustment in the town. Hoping for alleviation, we appeared before this group. I made a speech about how private entities relieve towns of their public responsibility. Like Queen Victoria, they were not amused. "You're a nursing home," they declared; "we will tax you like any other nursing home." We objected: "We are not a nursing home." "Well then, you're a condominium, and we will tax you like any other condominium." "We are not a condominium." "What are you?" "We're a CCRC, a Continuing Care Retirement Community." "What's that?" They had no idea. We could not make them understand that we were neither a condominium nor a nursing home. I took care not to reveal that we were more like a cruise boat on land—that really would have raised the tax to the maximum!

The local committee for tax adjustment found against us, of course. Then it got worse because we upped the ante by going next to the state-wide committee for tax adjustment. This group came back saying, "You are not a charitable organization. No way! Don't fool us. And don't fool yourselves." Secondly, they said that it was illegal for the town not to tax the community building. Thirdly, they ruled that we must be charged not only in the future but also retroactively for the taxes that we had not paid. It was grim: millions of dollars. We did make an adjustment with the town whereby the retroactive part was forgiven. But these proceedings were extremely unpleasant.

Then we made a further mistake. We decided to go to the New Hampshire Supreme Court. “This issue is very important,” people told us, “because towns all over New England are strapped for money and they are trying to tax not-for-profit organizations and even churches. So you should take the lead by bringing your case to the Supreme Court.” We hired a fancy lawyer from Concord who had worked well for the hospital. He assured us, “This is going to be a key case, and I’m going to get you a dozen similar not-for-profit entities who will join you as amici curiae before the Supreme Court.”

In the event he got none. Other not-for-profit organizations were frightened that the decision would be negative and that they would then be the very first to be taxed; thus nobody joined us. We asked more people for advice, and they said, “Please do not go to the Supreme Court. It’s a big mistake. You’ll lose the case.” So, fortunately, we changed our minds, and we remain one of the three largest taxpayers in the Town of Hanover. The first is Dartmouth. Our payment to the Town one year ago was $1,308,243.00.

As I noted earlier, all of this took several years. Let’s go back now to the subject of Kendal’s construction.

TIM: Most of us know about the wall project and of course about the forthcoming master plan. You mean that there were construction problems and decisions even earlier?

[Ad lib: Oh my God, are you kidding? Concerning construction, let me start with the pleasant part.]

Our local Quaker group developed a wish list and a series of suggestions many of which related to the difference in climate between New Hampshire and Pennsylvania. Have peaked roofs, we said, not flat roofs, which don’t do well in snow. Do not place roof groins over doorways; see the mistakes on Dartmouth’s Hood Museum, designed by a famous architect who knew nothing about snow and ice, which fall directly on one’s head at every entrance. Cap the chimneys because raccoons like to nest in open chimneys and then sometimes fall down them. Provide closed garages underneath the multistory buildings, and covered carports for the cottages. (They had intended to have all cars outdoors, unprotected, as in Pennsylvania.) Place garbage storage in closed areas to prevent coons, skunks, and bears from getting into the receptacles. Provide a place to store bicycles. . . . Amazingly, some of these suggestions were actually adopted.

There were other ideas, too: for example, a place for card games, special workrooms for music, carpentry, jewelry, painting, weaving, basketry, calligraphy, photography, sewing, and sculpture; unisex hairdresser; darkroom, photocopying machine, public computer terminals, big windows with southern exposure for plants needed to keep up people's spirits during the long winters; multipurpose space for theatricals, concerts, dances, meetings; tables for ping-pong and billiards; indoor swimming pool—we fought very hard for that. The architects said, "We'll build an outdoor swimming pool." We replied, "Are you joking? In this climate?" We got an indoor one. Tennis courts: no luck. Cable TV: yes. Backup heating for times of power outages, which are frequent in this climate: yes. Effective soundproofing between apartment walls and ceilings: unfortunately a long story. For the grounds: allotments for gardening, and (this was really too much!) a green for bowls, British style. We did not get that, or the tennis courts. We did get the bank, hairdresser, and gift-shop placed as we desired in the Health Center, to deemphasize the difference between healthy residents and unhealthy ones.

The architectural firm, based in Philadelphia, was Ewing Cole Cherry Parsky, which had built Kendal at Longwood. A local firm, Fleck and Lewis, was brought in to teach the Philadelphians about north-country cold. The contractor was The Carlson Corporation/New England, a large Boston corporation owned by a still larger corporation in France. Civil Engineers were Bruno Associates. Landscape Architecture was done by Ertel Associates. The finances, handled ultimately by the Bank of Ireland, went very well. We had the priority list deposits; we asked those who planned to move in immediately to pay half their entry fee up front to help with construction; Lloyd obtained venture capital from the Revlon Corporation; and we floated $43,000,000 in tax-exempt bonds. I remember going down to New York for the dinner party on October 11, 1989, that marked the closing on the bonds. It was held at a private restaurant with no sign outside whose owner reminded us that that she usually served kings and prime ministers. There were a lot of speeches about money, interest rates, marketing. I actually got the Bank of Ireland people talking about James Joyce. For my speech I recited Shakespeare on the seven ages of man, which ends with the last scene of all being “second childishness and mere oblivion, sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything.” They didn’t understand, but we had a splendid meal with countless bottles of champagne. The bonds sold quickly and well.

That’s the pleasant part. The rest is very different. The construction took two years, much of it through winter cold and snow. Unfortunately, we had major trouble with the clerk of the works, the individual who is supposed to supervise the process, making sure that everything is done correctly. The man we hired died quite soon after construction had begun. He was replaced after a long interval by one of the architects in the Fleck and Lewis firm who apparently spent most of his time keeping warm in the trailer instead of going around to look at things. Much was wrong. For example: the contractor put unskilled workers in skilled jobs such as building the brick tower, which went up so crooked that it had to be torn down and be re-done. Furthermore, there were workers on drugs. Then the new clerk of the works made a change in the specs for the sound insulation in the ceilings, the result being zero sound insulation. We had to rip out all the ceilings except those on the fourth floor and re-do them.

As if this were not enough, the sprinklers were put in incorrectly and more than once went off with no provocation, flooding people’s apartments. There were several poor souls for whom this happened twice. We moved people out; we put them in motels; we shifted them to other apartments. We discovered that not only had the sprinkler pipes been laid incorrectly, but also that faulty insulation in the roof was to blame. The valves would freeze up, which tripped the mechanism. Then as soon as they unfroze the water came rushing out. When we tore off the roofs we found that the contractors had taken the big 4 × 8 batts of fiberglass insulation and had cut them in half longitudinally so that they were now  $2 \times 8$ , covering twice the area with half the effect. Not only had they done that; they failed to place the batts touching each other, so everything—heat and cold—went through in-between. In sum, the roofs were criminally done. They leaked in addition, owing to ice buildup, having been designed for New Jersey instead of New Hampshire.

We entered into various lawsuits. The contractor said it was the architect's fault, the architect that it was the contractor's. We finally got some restitution, out of court, but not enough. Jean Brophy, our first executive director, was heroic throughout all this, mopping floors at 2 a.m., soothing people, mollifying anger. Marjorie Walker and I traveled down to Philadelphia to point our fingers at the Kendal Corporation's board and accuse them of malfeasance. Our residents, although in some cases understanding and supportive, generally felt that Quakers were not good managers, and that our Board should be re-formed by adding non-Quaker residents and outside professionals experienced in management. This was the beginning of a long adjustment of governance concluding in the end of Quaker control.

BOB: Yes, we've heard that Quakers are good in founding charitable and similar enterprises but not in maintaining them, so I guess that Kendal is pretty "routine" in this respect.

[Ad lib to set up the conclusion.]

You've heard about various difficult elements characterizing Kendal's early history (perhaps I should say its "Quaker history"). Yet other elements need to be added. The food director quit two weeks after we opened. Our health center, early on, looked as though it was going to be closed down by the State inspectors. We rallied, fixed various problems, and avoided closure by a hair's breadth. That was very scary. Then came the question of accreditation. At first we decided not to apply; we were not ready. When finally we did go ahead, we discovered what a huge effort was required by way of preparation. But the adjudicators gave us high marks in every area, saying that ours was the first "literate" report they had ever encountered.

TIM: In closing we want to repeat that this wonderful facility, filled with extraordinary residents and staff, does exist by a miracle. We must not take it for granted. Secondly, we want to repeat that the original goals, principles, ideals, and effort were purely Quaker. This small Quaker group felt so blessed by living in Hanover that they determined to give something back to the community, and Kendal is the form it took.

BOB: Many thanks to all the residents, staff, administrators, and board members who have contributed over the quarter-century that we are now celebrating.

EDIE: at the ground-breaking ceremony, which occurred on September 5th, 1989, Peter concluded that Kendal, upon opening, would offer all of us the chance to continue to control our lives in their final third or quarter, instead of feeling increasingly controlled, and to do so in an environment that was healthy, beautiful, civilized, and temperamentally serene. If that has happened to some degree in our first twenty-five years, we should be pleased.

PETER: Indeed. And I hope everyone realizes now that this unlikely experiment, having begun in 1991 despite the failures I described at Blue Hill and the Quadrangle, despite the serendipitous circumstances of my serving on a board of trustees with Lloyd Lewis, of Jim Strickler being physician both to Dorris Cummings and to my parents, of my being seated next to Malcolm McLane in the Rockefeller Center, of our failure to obtain amici curiae, which saved us from a negative Supreme Court decision. Despite all this, and despite construction problems both at the start and later on, the reality that we're still here and going strong after a quarter century truly can be described, I believe, as a sort of miracle.

Nina Siniakova came with her entire family: husband Kurt, a composer of classical music and lover of James Joyce, daughter Maria, son Theodore, another son, and a two-month old baby who either sleeps or cries! At supper the baby erupted. Nina nursed it and ate nothing, then performed her lovely program—Franck, Schumann, Beethoven (Moonlight Sonata, at my request), one of her own pieces, and Rachmaninoff—very credibly and with good commentary. We'd saved some salad fortunately for her afterwards. What a heroine she is!

May 22, 2016

Breakfast with Nina and family. Good to talk with Kurt about Joyce's Portrait, Samuel Barber, Alban Berg, whom he greatly admires. Nina said she'd been refused two jobs the moment she revealed that she was married with a family. They live way out on Long Island, with his parents, near West Hampton. Two and a half hour commute to the City. I gave her two of my books, at her request, and she gave me a bar of Russian chocolate. I tried to show them Dartmouth's wonders. Chrysanthi and I, after a two-hour lunch at EBA's with Jack and Ruth Hunter, loaded lots of books and paraphernalia from my study to take to Kendal, enjoyed supper with Claire Munck, now a widow, alas, and the Houghtons, and played the Schubert Fantaisie with Stan, not at all badly, and then the exquisite Pas de deux by Samuel Barber, both of which we promise to practice all summer.

May 28, 2016

Happily at the farm. Chrysanthi's beautiful birthday card started the day: "My dearest Peter, You are the best husband and I love you very very much. Please stay healthy and try to enjoy life as we grow old. Lots of love. Chrysanthi." Actually felt quite healthy this morning as I crawled under the tractor in order to lower its wheels to the ground again. It started on the first try! So did the tiller. And yesterday Earl fixed our frozen water pipe, improving it with "bleeders" to remove each autumn to make sure that no water remains. Returned by supertime to eat with Claire Munck and then go with her to a magnificently moving Dartmouth Symphony concert featuring Beethoven's ninth.

Stig Abell, TLS editor, writes that it is "perhaps, easier to be an interesting critic than a wealthy one," speaking of Oliver Goldsmith (May 20, 2016, p. 2). I thought of my own career as—in part—a critic. If I was interesting I certainly should be pleased.

"As a student at Cambridge, Keynes studied the philosophy of G. E. Moore and adopted Moore's idea of the good life as his own: the ends of human existence are, in descending order of value, love and friendship, aesthetic experience, and the pursuit of knowledge. All people ought to have a life rich in such goods” (TLS June 3, 2016, p. 9). Amen!

July 1, 2016

I submitted the following account of my work camp experience for publication by AFSC, which will be celebrating its centenary next year.

My first two undergraduate years were at Harvard, where my roommate and I typically passed our Saturday nights at The Old Howard or some equivalent allure of Boston’s Scollay Square. My final two undergraduate years were at Haverford. What a difference! Soon I met Dave Richie and noted in my journal that he “radiates love and compassion.” Thus weekends were typically spent in Dave’s famous Philadelphia weekend work camps, where restoration of slum housing in black ghettos not only improved those dwellings but also bonded together those so engaged. As Haverford’s Professor Douglas Steere always preached, love is best manifested through work.

The following summer, after six weeks alone as a silent hermit in the Adirondacks, I suddenly immersed myself in loquacious companionship with 13 girls and 5 boys in AFSC’s Washington D.C. work camp three blocks from the Capitol—painting, plastering, and puttying decrepit slum tenements whose occupants sat on the doorstep shooting themselves with heroin. This was so significant (at least for the campers) that I applied to join Quaker International Voluntary Service (QIVS) immediately after graduation. Thus in late June 1952 I found myself at Pendle Hill for a week-long training program, the strongest part of which was simply that Pendle Hill itself, like any well-functioning work camp, is a community in the fullest sense, joining people of diverse nations and thoughts into a collectivity where everyone collaborates in mind, body—and washing dishes. I was the only American in the camp in rural Holland where I’d been sent by AFSC. Organized by Pierre Ceresole's Service Civil International, it was located in a home for children mentally retarded owing to Down syndrome and encephalitis. The directors subscribed to Rudolf Steiner's philosophy of anthroposophy, which includes a belief in metempsychosis. Thus they ministered with loving care, convinced that each child's soul would survive its currently deficient body and inhabit a normal body in the next incarnation. What I experienced there was an application of the pragmatic dictum "Whatever works is true." Anthroposophy worked, giving the staff the devotion and patience necessary for a very trying endeavor that was eased for them by our camp's help with sanitation, cleanliness, tidiness—and washing dishes.

My final work camp experience was with Dirk Spruyt as a co-director of camps in the black ghetto of Rochester, New York during the summers of 1953 and 1954. Getting started involved speeches at churches and the university's Divinity School in order to win recruits. We were housed in the Baden Street Settlement, attended various black church services on Sundays, and were well known throughout the community, perhaps chiefly because I looked exactly like Mr. Peepers, star of a sitcom that aired on NBC from 1952 to 1955; indeed in my progress through the community I was typically trailed by a line of young boys shouting "Mr. Peepers! Mr. Peepers!" Did our repair of homes, especially windows that would not stay open, our fraternization at churches and at the Settlement, our occasional success in incorporating into our group one of Baden Street's black residents—did any of that do any good? Apparently not, judging from the impassioned 1964 race riots in Rochester, based in part on squalid housing. Yet I also remember walking though the area several years after the camps had ended and suddenly being enveloped in the warm embrace of a woman who had run out of her tenement to greet me. Surely this was an expression of genuine love, since she was of the wrong age and sex to have been captivated by Mr. Peepers.

Talking to Steve Cary in 1991, I lamented the cessation of AFSC's extensive work camp program. However, he was able to convince me that the decision had been proper. Alas!

To Hanover so that Theo could take the Dartmouth tour. He has already done the same at Haverford, Swarthmore, U of P, Drexel, Harvard, MIT, Boston University, and will be going to Middlebury, University of Vermont, and McGill. In addition I bought him a new Mac Book Pro at the Dartmouth Computer Store, which also gave, gratis, some excellent ear-phones. For the first time, I actually followed the tour, which I've been tempted to do often as I see the groups on campus. There was first an hour in a Silsby classroom, with students giving testimony on video, and an administration office staffer explaining, chiefly, that Dartmouth College, although really Dartmouth University, emphasizes undergraduate education, has 99% of its courses taught by professors, etc., although it also boasts a three-million-book library and three professional schools. Then we went outside to be greeted by four student leaders, all class of '18 (sophomores doing their summer term). Thus the large group was divided into four smaller ones. Our leader spoke well, and loudly, and was able to answer questions with authority. Interestingly, neither he nor the staffer for the first hour said a word about "Greek life." Instead, lots about the new cluster system about to begin in September. Nothing about the Dickey Center, but when I asked him to elaborate on it he did so very well indeed. Also almost nothing about the Outing Club and all it offers owing to Dartmouth's rural location. But what first? Generally I was pleased. Before the tour we had a short lunch at Kendal with Alec's old friend from Friends Select, Fairlee Gamble; on the way home a splendid Chinese feast in Rutland. At Kendal I collected our passports so that Chrysanthi could go to Montreal with Alec's family, but she has changed her mind.

July 17, 2016

Our anniversary, the sixty-first. Monica gave us a feast for dinner, of Greek dishes. The family's card is worth copying: From Elena: "I wish you many anniversaries to come. I love spending the summer with you and hope to spend more than six weeks with you in the future. Thank your for being wonderful grandparents! Lots of love." From Theo: "I wish you the very best on this special day. Love." From Monica: "Every day is a celebration here with you both. Best wishes for many more summers and anniversaries together." And from Alec: "What a treat it is for us to be able to spend each summer with you on our beautiful land. Each day is a gift! Love.”

Finished mowing the south field, which I was able to do quite early this year owing to the lack of wild blueberries. Και του χρόνου—μακάρι! In my office I also finished preparing for Open Access publication all the Cavafy poems I translated years ago. An immensely enjoyable process.

July 21, 2016

Alec, needing some nails, opened the valise upstairs in the barn where I keep all nails and screws, only to find it occupied by numerous mice and very recent offspring, plus piles of nesting, excrement, etc. Also, the mice had eaten through the side creating an entrance hole. So we concluded that the valise, which had a CUNARD sticker outside and also a FULBRIGHT sticker, needed to be taken to the dump. Emptying it, we found pasted to the inside of the lid an article list for Brant Lake Camp still fairly intact. Of interest: 14 handkerchiefs! One heavy shirt—drinking! 9 books. 1 typewriter. 1 baseball glove. 10 T-shirts. 1 pair of rubbers. And of course 1 tennis racket.

July 22, 2016

We took Alec, Monica, and the children to The Place for the prime rib special—a huge slice, enough for two or even three people, for $19.99. Alec and I split one portion, Theo and Elena another. Antipasto for everyone first. A beautiful feast for a beautiful family.

July 23, 2016

To SPAC for the NYC Ballet matinee performance of Balanchine’s Midsummer Night’s Dream. The Mendelssohn music (with Arturo playing the solos) was stirring, the dancing imaginative, as always. Such a treat. Met Donna there with her daughter Shandra and granddaughter. She told me that Breck Trautwein is dying from emphysema at age 74. He was a heavy smoker all his adult life. Afterwards we met Arturo at 50 South, where last year we had kept him waiting for two hours because I turned right on 50 instead of left. Kim, the restaurant’s founder and owner, sat with us and ended by giving all of us multiple desserts on the house. Arturo in best of form especially after two martinis. We’re trying to convince Arturo to send full into to Alec so that he can try to book him with the Bangkok Symphony. And we're hoping that both he and Kim will visit us at the farm this Sunday.

July 27, 2016

Long, lovely visit with Art and Kris Perryman, finally, after lapse of several years. They of course have clear memories of our entire life here, going back five decades at least. Entering the living room and viewing the massive staircase we now have to the second floor, Art remembered the original ladder! Of course we steered clear of politics. Interestingly, Art has kept a journal, as I have. But his is still in pen and ink. He doesn't type. Mine could have stayed that way. I'm so glad that it is now all on line, enabling me to search in it with ease.

Yesterday Alec, Theo, and I went up to our western border and remarked it, which was very necessary since the previous marking were extremely faint. But we found them, plus fencing here and there, plus some Posted signs affixed by our neighbor. But as we neared the southern end we lost it because it had originally been under water. Now this was swamp—no water but lots of mud, more like quicksand. The beavers are gone.

July 29, 2016

Alec's birthday, the fifty-eighth. Joined by Donna and Ed, we had our traditional feast in their cabin with blueberry pie (of course) for dessert. My presents for Alec this year were a pair of leather work-gloves, the marvelous glove-holder that hangs from one's belt and keeps one from misplacing gloves, and a device from Forestry Supplies for storing implements with long handles—rakes, shovels, brooms. Ed marveled at the children, whispering to me: "They like each other!"

September 13, 2016

Returned two days ago to Hanover. Yesterday Leander telephoned, all excited and disturbed because Earl revealed that Roy and Hawk (Roy's son) insist on obtaining a key to our farm and threaten to break down the gate if they are denied and also to do damage. Earl refused. Leander of course agrees with the refusal. So does Alec. The reason seems to be that all three of these Millingtons wish to kill the sixteen-point buck that apparently is on our land. What to do?

I never wrote anything here, strangely, about our wonderful adventure on August 2nd rafting down the Hudson River, eleven of us, everyone except Chrysanthi and Daphne, who stayed home, and Christina, who was working in Boston. I was the second oldest person our rafting company ever had, so I was treated with special care, dressed toe to neck in a wetsuit plus life preserver and helmet and a strap to secure my spectacles. And, as the eleventh person, I went free of charge. It was very exciting, even a bit scary. Thankfully we had an excellent professional at the helm, Chris, a third generation fireman in NYC who comes north on his days off to guide rafts down the Hudson. Saw the blue ledges finally. Lots of #4 rapids (#5 are the fiercest) plus #3s. Chris kept us off the rocks most of the time. No one fell out of our raft although Nicholas fell out of the other raft. I paddled with the others but felt very tired and stiff and was allowed to recuperate by sitting in the bottom of the raft, after which I rowed again, most of the time. Everyone immensely energized.

September 19, 2016

More on the Millingtons. Earl pulled Hawk out of his car, or was it that Hawk pulled Earl? How to tell, since the stories are always contradictory. Leander furious and unreasonable, shouting that they're all barbarians, etc., etc. I keep writing to Roy that family dissention is the last thing we expected. On the contrary, hunting should unite family members in pleasure. Naïve! Yet today I received a conciliatory message from Roy saying he would no longer try to hunt when Earl was there and furthermore that both brothers now realize that they should sit down, talk, and put an end to their enmity. Hooray! Naïveté does have a kind of power.

September 23, 2016

Looking for Robert Frost poems to read to Bill Cook, I found this one that applies somewhat to our current situation at the farm:

TRESPASS

No, I had set no prohibiting sign,
 And yes, my land was hardly fenced.
 Nevertheless the land was mine:
 I was being trespassed on and against.
 Whoever the surly freedom took
 Of such an unaccountable stay
 Busying by my woods and brook
 Gave me strangely restless day.

He might be opening leaves of stone,
The picture-book of the trilobite,
For which the region round was known,
And in which there was little property right.

'Twas not the value I stood to lose
In specimen crab in specimen rock,
But his ignoring what was whose
That made me look again at the clock.

Then came his little acknowledgment:
He asked for a drink at the kitchen door,
An errand he may have had to invent,
But it made my property mine once more.

November 6, 2016

I'm at Pendle Hill for a meeting of the capital campaign committee. But I asked Nina Siniakova to come after breakfast so that she could see PH's beautiful Yamaha piano (which I played last night for an hour) and meet Jen Karsten. I'm trying to arrange a recital by her at PH and told Jen that I'd donate a special $500 contribution to make the honorarium possible. She's a great friend, and I'm so happy that she has at last found a real—good—job as pianist for the Philadelphia ballet. But she is not happy with the school that her children are attending. I suggested that she investigate Friends Select, which surely will have financial aid available, plus a new headmaster since Rose, whom Alec so disliked, is finally retiring.

The capital campaign meeting was very expertly done. Now we have all been assigned a small group of people to contact about a possible contribution. To make this less frightening, we read a fine pamphlet by Henri Nouwen on the spirituality of soliciting, or something like that, reminding us that when we ask for money for Pendle Hill we are really asking for help with something that we believe in and that we hope and expect the donor will get to know better and also come to believe in. Thus instead of simply taking from donors, we are also giving. After the meeting I drove to see if I could find again the Armenian pastry shop that I always visited, and I did find it still very much in existence: Armenian Delight Gourmet Foods, 2591 West Chester Pike, Broomall, PA 19008. I have repeatedly promised Jen that if she truly goes through a fiscal year with a level budget—no deficit—, I will buy baklava dessert for everyone at supper! We'll know this August. If the deficit is zero, it will be the first time in 20 years at least.

Then back to the airport to fly to London: the beginning of a quite amazing new development in my life.

November 7, 2016

A few weeks ago I received a telephone call from Greece informing me that I had just won, by unanimous vote, the “Nikos Kazantzakis Prize” awarded by the municipality of Herakleion, Crete, for someone who has contributed to the city’s cultural life. Apparently there were seventeen candidates. This came as a complete surprise. I was aware of the prize only because Nikos Mathioudakis had written several times to say how much he hoped that he would be selected. Of course I was also told that there would be a ceremonial awarding (απονομή) and that of course they expected I would be present. The date was set for November 9. At this event I would naturally make a speech! I had repeatedly told people that I would never again go to Greece, mostly because of Chrysanthi’s determination never to go again, and I had become reconciled to that negative future regarding such travel. But this seemed different. I was already scheduled to go to Philadelphia for the Pendle Hill committee. Thus instead of returning from there as previously planned, I booked a flight from there to London for last night, from London to Athens today, and from Athens to Herakleion tomorrow. Today, amazingly, although I didn’t arrive in Athens until about 6:00 p.m. local time, and had to book into the Sofitel Hotel at the airport, I managed to reach Victoria Square to visit with Christos and Eri by about 8:00 p.m. As so many times in previous years, we had supper together and talked talked talked (all in Greek of course) for hours. Christos also telephoned Meg so I was able to say hello to her as well. I left in order to catch the last train back to the airport, at 11:00 p.m. What a day! Since I’d traveled the previous night with some sleep, going steadily until midnight tonight (the train takes almost an hour to reach the airport) was somewhat irregular, but rather easy. Of course my marvelous feast-fast remedy for jet lag worked perfectly once again. I should have mentioned earlier that on the flight from London to Athens, about three and a half hours long, I sat next to a very interesting woman named Claire Vishik who travels the world because she’s an expert on cybersecurity. We shared a lot, which enabled our conversation to last literally for the entire journey. Thus: three hours of English conversation followed by two and a half hours of Greek conversation on my first day on this unexpected trip to Greece!

November 8, 2016

7:30 a.m. flight to Herakleion. Met at the airport by Kostas Mpournazakis, sent by the Mayor's office, who deposited me at my στέκι in Herakleion, the Atrion Hotel, and then fetched me a bit later to go to meet the Mayor in the town's beautiful offices in the Lions' Square, in one of the remaining Venetian buildings there. About ten people attached to the office all congratulating me, photographers outside, photos photos photos. Also, previously, even while I was still in America, there had been numerous newspaper articles with my photo and headlines that I had won the prize, and biographical descriptions. With Andreas Lenakakis, another of the mayor's associates, to a store where I was able to buy machlepi for next Easter's tsoureki cooked by Meli at Kendal. Then I was able to meet Ben Petre by pre-arrangement at 1:00 p.m. for lunch in a restaurant near the harbor. Some of the newspaper articles describing me had noted, erroneously, that among the many books I had translated was also Captain Michael, which of course was an error, and I told Ben that he is clearly the one who should do such a translation if the possibility ever occurs, for he knows more about the language of that novel than anyone else does. He was pleased. We talked about his daughter as well, whom I might be able to help get an internship at the American Farm School. Next, amazingly, I had an hour and a half with Albana (now baptized as Anna) Fejzo in the hotel, also of course by pre-arrangement. What a pleasure for both of us! She is as attractive and vivacious as ever, and much happier too, for she has a steady job as manager-in-chief of an important resort in Crete and, most importantly, the Greek equivalent of what we call a "green card" in America: the right to live and work in this country. She hopes to take out Greek citizenship as well. She told me about her brother, who was so sick in Italy but is now much better, and her parents, both now retired. She returns to Albania once a year at most. She repeated what she has told me before, that she is eternally grateful for the help I gave her first at Perottis College and then at Anatolia College. I understood this in a new way owing to the Nouwen pamphlet read just a few days ago at Pendle Hill. At 5:30 I was picked up by Andreas and brought to the offices of Radio Crete, just outside the city, for an hour-long interview with Eleni Vakethianaki, all in Greek of course. I had feared this owing to my sense that I wouldn't be able to express myself adequately in Greek, yet somehow it went well, without any real difficulties. But as if all this wasn't enough, as I was waiting in the hotel lobby just before 5:30 to be picked up, in walked to the hotel Peter Buseck with his lady-friend, Cindy! He reminded me that months before he had asked me to recommend a hotel in Herakleion. He and Cindy, tourists, had just come from three days in Santorini. What luck that I'd been in the lobby at that moment. Thus, after I returned from the radio interview, we walked together up to the Lions' Square "to see the sights," which included a noisy demonstration against fascism in Turkey plus an art exhibition in the Basilika of St. Mark, where my event will take place tomorrow, and where the artist herself was present and insisted on taking photos with all of us and begging me to convince the mayor not to remove her exhibit temporarily owing to the απονομή. We found a restaurant overlooking the square and had a good meal (it was my "feast day" in the jet-lag program) with lots of wine.

November 9, 2016

My "big day," as though the last two hadn't been big enough. When asked, as I was repeatedly, if I had been enjoying myself, I replied Yes, but I felt I was in a τρελοκομείο. Today was the craziest of all. It started at 7:45 a.m. with a long taxi-ride to Cretan Radio again and yet another interview. On the taxi-ride back, the lively driver said that he'd been listening to the interview just before and planned to come to the ceremony tonight. Then I was picked up by Andreas again and brought to the Mayor's offices because they needed all my boarding passes as proof of expenses. Then I was delivered to Cretan TV for an hour-long television interview with Rena Papadaki, the usual "anchor" on this program—a very presentable self-assured woman with a perfect face, perfect diction, etc. I had to be powdered a little beforehand. She had prepared well owing to information I had sent. Actually the interview wasn't being broadcast live but will be broadcast in a few days, so I had to refer to the award and my speech as already having happened. No problem. By this time everyone was aware of Trump's victory in the US elections yesterday. I was asked to comment, and said that I was "crying." Apparently everyone in Greece was also crying owing to this unforeseen result. Rena covered lots of aspects of my work and of the Kazantzakis phenomenon, very well indeed. She's clearly a real "pro." Andreas and Kostas and someone else from the Mayor's office then took me to a fine lunch (on my "fast day") in a restaurant that I'll be able to find again, because it's on the same street as the Youth Hostel, a street that I know well. I should have mentioned that at various points yesterday and today I was also trying to get a new sim card for my overseas cell phone, which I finally did without having enough local currency (euros) to pay for it. Andreas kindly contributed the missing 10 euros. But in the hotel yesterday, and again today, I encountered Myron Zolotakis, the poet whose work I have begun to translate, plus his wife, who turns out to be a professional firefighter in Athens. I told her all about the man who guided our raft down the Hudson River and is a professional firefighter in New York. Myron kept insisting that he wanted then and there to pay me, even though so far I have done only two poems (which, by the way, he sent to Beaton who affirmed that they had captured the "poetic quality"). Myron seems to be rich; he told me that he has a περιουσία here in Herakleion. So, he gave me 10,000 euro in cash, which I have stowed in the bottom of my valise, beneath the dirty laundry. Finally, after lunch, which of course began at about 3:00 p.m., I had some off-time at the hotel: a chance to read over my lecture once again and practice a few difficult-to-pronounce words. Kostas came, Andreas came, we walked to the Basilika, in slight rain, also with Peter and Cindy. Peter had asked me previously if he and Cindy could come to the dinner following the ceremony, I had asked at the Mayor's office, and the answer was an easy Yes. So nice to see friends and acquaintances at the ceremony: Gareth Owens and his wife, full of smiles, their children now amazingly 17 and 20 years old (I remember them aged 7 and 10 of course), various friends of Ava whom I had met when John Rassias and I came to do Rassias-method demonstrations, Barbara Tsaka of course from the Museum, Toula from the Museum, and best of all the wife of the famous Greek biologist Fotos Kafatos, Sarah Niles, whom I'd known in Thessaloniki fifty years ago before she married and who visited us in Hanover with him. He is now a victim of Alzheimer's disease, living in his ancestral city, Herakleion. They sat me in the front row, between the Bishop and the Mayor. The Mayor spoke briefly, then introduced Tasoula Markomihelaki, professor at Thessaloniki, friend of Dia's, who introduced me at great length and breadth, with photos of important publications, also of the entire extended family at the farm gathered around my green tractor. The Mayor then presented the official declaration of the award plus a check for three thousand euros. Then I delivered my talk, my Αναφορά στο Νίκο. I of course was hoping that laughter would sound when I tried to be funny, and it did sound, indeed very massively, especially when I recalled my first sentence in Greek: Η Νίνα παίζει με το τόπι της . . . But I didn't hear any laughter, alas, when I said that I'd learned my Greek στο κρεβάτι. Afterwards, however, several people told me that they had indeed laughed at that, but "internally." Apparently the talk went well. Among other things it was nicely short (about 35 minutes), followed by loud applause and by dozens and dozens of people coming up afterwards to give congratulations. The affair ended with a pianist and baritone performing songs based on Kazantzakis material from the novel "Captain Michael." Then dinner for about 30 people with me at the head of the table, next to the Mayor, and Peter and Cindy opposite.

Faithful Andreas fetched me at 7:30 a.m. (every single appointment these last few days had been exact, nothing according to "Greek time") to go to the airport. He has become a true friend. He teaches Latin and Ancient Greek in high school here, besides working in the Mayor's office. Installed again in the Sofitel, I met Constance Tagopoulos for an early lunch at a really fine restaurant, the Athinaïkon, Mitropoleos 34. Her life is terrible, as always, owing to the permanent illness of her son, to her own lack of work (except some translating), and generally to the ongoing Greek "crisis." But she still comes back to New York once a year, somehow. I said that when this happens next spring she, Burt Pike, Chrysanthi and I should meet together in New York; this pleased her greatly. By subway then to the new Acropolis Museum where I met Don Nielsen and suddenly realized my one and only severe mistake on this insane-asylum journey: I had brought him the Jergen's lotion he desired for his wife and had left it in the valise in the Sofitel. I hope to mail it to them when I return. He turns out to have been very connected with the Museum, having formulated all the English translations for Greek labels on things, and also having narrated the English portion of the movie shown in the Museum about the Acropolis. For all of this, he mentioned, he has never been paid. We talked over ice cream in the café, after which he took me on a quick tour, including portions of this marvelous building that most visitors would not be aware of. I of course couldn't spend leisurely time viewing specific exhibits, but I did get a very fine sense of the whole, which is remarkable. He went off to another appointment just as I met Nikos Mathioudakis at the Museum entrance. We sat in Plaka over coffee. He's the one who wants me to give the first talk, entitled "Kazantzakis's "politics of the spirit," at the symposium scheduled for November 2017 here in Athens. His idea is that I should explain what I mean by this and then go from one specific novel, poem, or play to another, showing how the concept is projected therein. As I said to him, although a month ago I was still determined never again to travel to Greece, I will probably come again next November and offer this contribution. That means that I must (a) do Zolotakis's poems, (b) continue with my Open Access project collecting my previous writings, (c) write a new speech in Greek for the November symposium. Why not?

Long trip home. Athens-London flight squeezed in a narrow seat next to a huge, fat man. Zero conversation. But it was over in three hours. The long flight over the Atlantic, once again, was comfortable, with the seat next to me vacant. And we had a special view of Greenland along the way. I have written this long description of my Athenian extravaganza in the plane on the way back to Philadelphia.

On the train from Boston to Washington yesterday, I read this interesting commentary by Peter Hainsworth in a TLS (Oct. 14, 2016, p. 8) review of new books “tracing the beauty and inconsistency in the work of Dante”: “The question then comes up of how it can be that desire that is in some sense erotic is also desire for God. Dante’s Persons by Heather Webb confronts the issue from a modern theological perspective. Dante’s journey is an education which transforms his (and potentially the reader’s) vision of what constitutes another person and hence transforms also what sort of relationship one should have with oneself, others and the divine. Hell is the realm of the deluded individual, who mistakes isolation and competition for reality. In Purgatory mutual recognition means the emergence of a different sort of social behavior modelled ultimately on the example of Christ. Then from the start of Paradiso Dante and the reader are in the realm of fulfilment in which desire and satisfaction, both of love and knowledge, circle each other much as do the three persons of the Trinity. This process is not so much a transcendence of the human as its realization, its becoming transhuman.”

Visited the recently reopened East Wing of the National Gallery today. The architecture is splendid: so open, so relaxing, without any of the squeeze of many museums. Wonderful early Picassos. And a surprise painting called “Cakes” by Wayne Thiebaud that depicts 5 or 6 different varieties. I was pleased to find it illustrating a collection of note cards, which I purchased to give as a present to Melissa, our wonderful cake-maker at Kendal. Leander, Deanna, and Chrysanthi met me at a restaurant after which we went to a production of Arthur Miller’s “A View from the Bridge” at the Kennedy Center. The bridge in question is clearly the Brooklyn Bridge because the view it affords is of a very complex family in Brooklyn with the head of household, Eddie, keeping his niece (whom he secretly lusts after) from experiencing life or becoming trained enough to “cross the bridge” into Manhattan and a responsible job, not to mention the chance to meet a prospective husband. But into the household come some Italians who have jumped ship. The niece and one of them fall in love. Eddie informs the immigration service (compare those who cooperated with the McCarthy Committee) as a way of preventing the marriage. The immigrants’ hopelessness back in Italy and faith that America offered “work” speaks so clearly to today’s situation with so many refugees flooding into Germany, America, and other rich countries, yet at the same time being considered “unregistered aliens” and threatened now with deportation by the president-elect Donald Trump. Not a great play, but interesting in relation to current events.

Splendid lesson from Leander on Samuel Barber’s beautiful “Pas de deux” in which I’m playing the secondo and Stan Udy is doing the primo. Such a difference when an experienced musician like Leander approaches a piece! We concentrated on many things, especially pedaling.

November 24, 2016, Thanksgiving

Another splendid lesson, this time on Barber’s “Schottische,” which I’m also preparing with Stan to perform in the Cary Room at some point. Thanksgiving dinner, very pleasant and delicious, followed by our traditional walk around the lake. Leander and Deanna are gracious. The real problem is the two children. Impossible to talk with them. Sophia had an assignment to write an obituary for Obama—an imaginative topic assigned by her professor. Nicholas had to write something on Hamlet. Both compositions were completed, but neither child showed any interest in what they had done or any desire to communicate to us the slightest information or enthusiasm. We all watched the delicious movie “My Big Fat Greek Wedding,” which was even funnier the second or third time than originally, but Sophia was buried in her i-pad immediately afterward, without a word. So it goes. Thank goodness for marvelous Theo and Elena!

AMTRAK to New York in the morning. Immediately to the Whitney Museum using a members’ card supplied by the Yale Club. Walked down the amusing Hi Line again. We were both quite amazed by the special show on the eighth floor: an exhibition focusing on “the development of Carmen Herrera’s signature hard-edge painting style from 1948 to 1978” and situating her work “within the history of twentieth-century abstraction.” Unlike other abstract paintings, even the full room of Rothko’s that we saw the other day in the East Wing in Washington, Herrera’s are uplifting, energizing, beautiful, varied enough to be surprising.

To “The Cherry Orchard,” starring Diane Lane as Madame Ranevskaya. Although I’d seen this marvelous play many times in the past, this time I identified so strongly with the forceful chagrin of Ranevskaya and her brother (but not of her daughter) over the possible—and then actual—loss of the orchard, which seemed to me something like Alec’s land across Waddell Road, which like the cherry orchard could easily become a site of summer villas instead, as it is now, a site of miraculous beaver workmanship.

At breakfast in the Yale Club, picking up the New York Times, we learned that Fidel Castro had died. Our waiter was jubilant; it turned out, of course, that he was from Cuba, where his 95-year-old mother still lived. He’s hoping now for the death of Raúl Castro followed by a coup d’état and the end of communism. I suggested that Batista wasn’t so good either and that perhaps some useful changes happened under Castro’s rule. He disagreed strongly, replying that things were just fine under Batista. We turned to American politics and he said proudly that he had voted for Trump. Of course! I told him that I voted for Bernie in the New Hampshire primary. “That’s OK,” he replied. “Now we all get along!”

Off we went to MoMA, stopping a moment to peek inside St. Patrick’s, now brilliant white after being cleaned for two years. MoMA’s special show was Picabia, a diverse genius who traveled from style to style from about 1900 until his death in 1953: impressionism, pointillism, cubism, dada, surrealism. He once wrote, “If you want to have clean ideas, change them like shirts.” This is what he did; thus this retrospective show of his work enabled us to pass through all these styles, remembering others, like Cézanne and Picasso, who excelled possibly in not so many of them. From here we rushed to the Met to see the Jerusalem show, remembering that we were once meant to start a Dartmouth Alumni College tour in Israel but couldn’t because of a terrorist incident there, and started instead in St. Paul’s first stop in Greece. Most interesting in this show were the books: illuminated manuscripts perfectly preserved from as far back as the third century, also the Temple in memory, and the dream (unfulfilled, alas) of the city where the three Abrahamic faiths—Judaism, Christianity, and Islam—could coexist in peace. Then via crosstown bus to Lincoln Center for an angelic two hours watching Balanchine’s “Nutcracker,” highlighted by Lauren Lovette and Chase Finlay as the Sugarplum Fairy and her cavalier. The long, gorgeous violin solo in Act 1 was played . . . of course . . . by Arturo Delmonico: perfectly.

Then No. 2 subway to Nevins Street, Brooklyn, Chrysanthi behaving as though Brooklyn were a foreign country. But we found the Theatre for a New Audience after walking the wrong direction for a bit and then a good German-style restaurant just one block away. The presence of BAM and a dance school plus the theatre and fancy restaurant convinced Chrysanthi that this small quadrant of Brooklyn was . . . well . . . civilized. We were then entertained by a splendid cast in Goldoni’s The Servant of Two Masters, a hilarious commedia dell’arte, scripted and unscripted, utterly zany, a little like Karaghiozis.

November 27, 2016

Our Cuban waiter, this morning, asked me how I felt and I replied, “I feel happy—for you!” I had the full Sunday buffet breakfast, Chrysanthi had her usual bagel and cheese, and at the end the waiter announced, “Surprise! The breakfasts are on me!” We walked through the Columbia Campus, full of memories for us, and then confirmed that 414 West 121 Street is still there. Entering Riverside Church to ascend to floor 12 for Morningside Meeting, we noted that every person we passed was colored. Apparently the pastor is now an African-American woman. Lovely to see Dan Seeger and Tom Goodridge at Meeting, but not Vince Buscemi and Ernie—in the announcements I heard that Vince was again in hospital and I learned afterwards that he is now demented, too. In my own introduction I said that I had served on the Pendle Hill board for decades with Vince, who was always one of the most conscientious and most brave of trustees. As usual, I reminded Friends that I was a co-founder of this Meeting owing to the fifth day meeting I started with two others at Columbia in 1956. Lunch afterward in Tom’s fine apartment in the “project” nearby. He told me that Union Theological Seminary and also the Jewish Seminary across the street were going to erect multi-storied apartment buildings, as the Manhattan School of Music had already done. Tom, during lunch, was very excited by the reality of my building our log cabin on the farm. I concurred! Afterward, when he, alone, showed us the way to the subway station and I congratulated him on his marriage to Dan, he said that he had waited 65 years to have a true “relationship.” They both seem very happy.

I spent an hour with Julia Griffin, Hanover’s Town Manager, who is appalled at Trump’s victory. She informed me that getting an article on the Town Warrant for Town Meeting is very easy. The deadline is April 4. Before then what is required is a petition signed by 25 registered Hanover, NH, voters—that’s all. She felt that Town Meeting would probably pass a resolution to make the town a “sanctuary town.” She is very concerned about protecting undocumented students. She informed me, as well, that Hanover police NEVER inquire about an arrested individual’s citizenship status and are resolved to continue that practice. Furthermore, quite a few Hanover residents have already informed her that they would offer residence in their homes to undocumented students if that were required (I thought of the Anne Franck situation in Holland under the Nazis). Julia herself will take in several such students if necessary. All this is very positive, naturally. Her one and only hesitation to the sanctuary proposal is this: If the town were so designated, she is sure that it would become what she calls a “target” for the Republican NH legislature and governor, who are always out to “get” Hanover for whatever reason. In other words, they might direct federal agents to start their operations in Hanover. I’ve written to Jack Shepherd and Patricia Higgins apropos. Obviously, to get 25 signatures for a sanctuary petition would be extremely easy, but should we do it?

Earlier today I read poetry to Bill Cook, which I do routinely now on Tuesday mornings. Today the readings were all from Emily Dickinson, 23 poems chosen beforehand from the volume of her 1775 “Complete Poems,” and starting with my all-time favorite:

I’m Nobody! Who are you?
Are you Nobody too?
Then there’s a pair of us!
Don’t tell! They’d advertise, you know!

How dreary to be Somebody!
 How public, like a Frog,
 To tell one's name, the livelong June,
 To an admiring Bog!

December 2, 2016

Terrible shock this morning. Stan Udy and I were meant to meet in the Music Room at 9:00 a.m. to practice our two Samuel Barber pieces, applying all the good points made by Leander last week. We saw each other at supper last night and confirmed this appointment. I went a bit early to the Music Room and was practicing when Chrysanthi knocked on the door to inform me that Stan had died last night. Alas! Such a sweet personality, such a good 4- and 8-hand partner! With Allan Munck gone, too, my long-standing piano arrangements are finished. Only Dick Williamson remains, and with him I no longer want to play since he refuses to count. Maybe Ruth Lappin?

Saw Bob Donin yesterday—Dartmouth's chief lawyer. He agrees with Julia that a sanctuary status for Hanover would make the town an immediate target. Why not wait a year, he advises, to see what the Trump government actually does, or fails to do, with undocumented students.

Finished reading through the complete poetry of Emily Dickinson, preparing my recitation this week to Bill Cook. So many excellent—and difficult—poems. Only one is on music (no. 1480):

The fascinating chill that music leaves
 Is Earth's corroboration
 Of Ecstasy's impediment—
 'Tis Rapture's germination
 In timid and tumultuous soil
 A fine—estranging creature—
 To something upper wooing us
 But not to our Creator—

What this perhaps means is that music stimulates our aesthetic sense but not ultimately our religious sense. Maybe.

I contacted Letitia Ufford, who is now coordinating the Professors' Colloquia here, and said I'd like to do a session on Emily Dickinson.

She signed me up for next October. Interestingly, I sort of suddenly feel academic again. Thus I also sent in a proposal to speak on Kazantzakis's eschatological optimism at the MGSA Symposium next November. And I'm making good progress on my translations of Zolotakis's postmodernist poetry.
