Sit-in by students. State troopers, mass arrest at 3 a.m. Trial. Thirty days in jail and $200 fine. Of those I knew or had taught, the following were in jail: Sandy Mackie, Steve Tozer (freshman advisee), Dan Taggart (the one who wrote such an open, confessional paper in a course the year before), Frank Reynolds (Deerfield graduate, English 2, Greek 11, English 59), Dan Daley (Deerfield), Steve Stoci, Ed Levin, David Green. My involvement included (chiefly) writing an essay "Myth, Metaphysics and Politics" treating student unrest in terms of Bergson and Georges Sorel. This essay achieved a vogue on campus; I distributed about 300 copies. Prison visits. Mr. Tozer overnight, came to visit his son in jail. Then the return, and the "internal trials" with poor Bill Ballard in an impossible position as chairman of the committee on discipline. A disturbing (and fascinating) term, but very disruptive of my work on Kazantzakis

I was promoted to full professor at a salary of $16,000 plus 16% TIAA-CREF.

July 23, 1969

Riparius

Reinoud Oort came to America for a clergyman's congress in Boston, and as part of sightseeing arrangements was taken to Burlington, Vermont. We drove up to get him, returned to Terpni via Champlain ferry and Ausable Chasm, spent the day and the next. He walked in the woods, helped to mow, talked. I had always told him how much I wanted him to see the farm, but had never dreamed that it would become a reality. Now we must visit him in Den Helder.

July 25, 1969

Bob Bell and Ilona spent the weekend. He is taking his Ph.D. orals next year.

Kazantzakis book going fairly well. I am up to 1940, with the middle section written out and the first  $\frac{1}{3}$  still in outline.

The Modern Greek Studies Symposium looks good. We have great names lined up: Δημαράς, Τερζάκης, Σαββίδης, Λορεντζάτος, Μιτσάκης, Peter Levi, Bouvier, and others. Let's hope those in Greece will be allowed out. Mike Keeley and I have been the coordinators.

Kinhaven, Weston, Vermont,

August 2-3, 1969

one night at Markham House

We visited Leander. Alec, Daphne, Chrysanthi, Mother, Father, and myself. Saturday night was a remarkable concert by the staff: fine performances of fine, and very varied, music. Imagine, in one evening, to hear the following: Bach cantata solo for soprano with oboe obligato; sonata by Petil for brass quintet; woodwind quintet by a contemporary composer; 16th century music for two recorders, gamba, and percussion; Gesualdo madrigal; Villa Lobos quartet for oboe, flute, horn, and clarinet; and the Dvorák piano quintet. The next day, Sunday, the students performed, less expertly, of course, but they did music that was just as varied and interesting. Selections by Byrd and Farmer for full chorus; sonata for two trumpets, two trombones, and horn; CPE Bach trio for flute, clarinet, and piano; Haydn piano trio, played by Leander at piano; Mozart quartet in G for strings; Mozart Divertimento for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, and French horn; trio for winds by Mrs. Dushkin; frippery for brasses; Morris Dance fantasy for 2 recorders, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, 2 violins, cello, piano, percussions; Stamitz quartet; Milhaud suite for oboe, clarinet, bassoon; Beethoven trio; Rossini quartet; Boccerini quintet for guitar and strings; Hindemith quartet for piano, clarinet, violin, cello (marvelous music); Chavez toccata for percussion (!), and finally a composition for full orchestra composed and conducted by a sixteen-year-old student, Bruce Adolph, a fine, mature piece.

Leander played with delicacy and sensitivity, although he had to fight a fly buzzing round his head, and muffed an arpeggio near the end. He is very sensitive and self-conscious, reminding me of a tennis player who hurls his racket when he misses a shot. But he seems to be thriving in the camp, with lots of friends. Certainly his musicianship has improved considerably, the fruit of good coaching and a conducive environment. I had an overall lovely feeling at the camp that civilization is not dead (though some, I suppose, would call this a fossilized remains). Here were people banded together to produce something beautiful. They were all vibrant and energetic, with a kind of renaissance youthfulness, and also an old-fashioned appreciation of hierarchy, for it was all too clear that the adults were superior, had something to teach, and that the students had lots to learn. A true university.

The Schultzes delivered Jerry McLane, who then returned with us to Terpni, while my parents stayed on for a week at the Blue Gentian Inn in Londonderry.

September 8, 1969

Chrysanthi and the children are in Hanover, and I have returned to the farm for 10 days to try to continue my book without interruption. Lonely at first, especially after dark, but I am quickly getting used to that. Also keeping busy, painting the living room floor. The weekend I spent in that graceful city, Montreal, going up Friday afternoon. Stayed in the Queen's Hotel instead of the Windsor, which is too expensive. Chinese dinner. Evening in "Gay Paris" watching poor striptease. One of the dancers, the loveliest of the lot, joined me and asked if she could order a small bottle of wine. It came, with a bill for $16.00. I sent it back, and she had to be content with 2 cocktails at $3.50 each. I drank beer! She turned out to be a native of Worthing, England, with English father and French mother. Came to Canada at age 5. Divorced, with 2 children. I asked her how she spent her days. "Taking care of my children and going to court." "To court? What for?" "For mingling." She seemed sweet and decent; hadn't finished high school; completely and magnificently bilingual. After her dance she went to another table. Maybe she got her small bottle there.

Saturday morning to Aux Delices for café-croissants. As I was finishing, a heavy person with a pot belly asked me the time, then if I was from New York, then if my name was Peter Bien, then if I remembered him, which of course I did. It was Gregory, the porter at Rochester General Hospital when I worked there as an orderly, and also the most faithful participant in our work camps, both years. We had lots to reminisce about, all the doctors and nurses: which were married, which dead (Dr. Farlow, Dr. Killip, both gone), Miss Hoover married, poor thing, etc. Also the orderlies: Jack, Tony (garbage collector), Garcia, Richard (doorman at Paramount Theater). Gregory's own career: went to NY for 6 months as orderly at Rockefeller Institute; returned to Rochester, Iola Hospital, then to State Hospital for the Aged; fired for kissing the old ladies. "When they're senile they're cute," he told me. Unemployed; then 4 years ago took a job as Pinkerton Guard (nights) at the Eastman School. Works 12 midnight to 8 a.m. All alone in the building, except for cleanup men. Nothing has happened in all the four years. Routine. Lives with father and brother. Eats continually. We talked about Peter Gardner, Jeanne Ludmann, Nancy Fairbank, Woody and Merrlynnane Thomas, Mrs. Fish (now dead), who didn't like me at all, and thought me dishonest; Chris and Charles Piersol, Dean Freiday, the "leader" who came to run the workcamp the second season. Gregory remembered all the names, also all my various addresses. We walked up Sherbrooke Street, bought some Babushka dolls, wandered through the McGill campus, then through Ville Place St. Marie, and I left him finally (!) at 7 p.m. He planned to stay another day and then take the bus for NYC. I drove back, with my plunder: 2 dozen croissants, a huge baguette, and a dozen snails (canned).

1970

---

Hanover	January 1–March 30
Ireland: Shannon, Sligo, Cork, Dublin	March 31–April 6
Missionary Guest House, Selly Oak, Birmingham	April 6–July 15
London, Paris, Milan, Venice, Belgrade, Thessaloniki, Larissa, Volos, Ai Yanni	July 15–19
Ai Yanni, Piliou	July 19–25
Kolokotroni 13, Thessaloniki	July 25–30
Belgrade, Paris, London, Birmingham	July 30–September 1
Kingsmead Close, Birmingham	September 1–December 31

Monday, March 30, 1970

Boston-Shannon

Drove to Boston. Shipped trunks via air cargo. Boston Science Museum; transparent lady; supper in Greek restaurant in Cambridge; toured MIT activities building; showed Widener to the children, also Thayer Hall, Lowell House. Wait at Logan for plane, delayed 1 hour owing to “sick-out” of dispatchers. Talked with “Bob,” a dropout from UVM in senior year, on his way to settle in Europe and study in Munich Pleasant but pathetic; he was reading “Lyrical Ballads” and writing a poem about a friend he’d just left; thought that Gaelic was an early form of English!

Tuesday, March 31, 1970

Shannon

Sunrise from plane, above cloud-cover. Landed at Shannon about 11 a.m. Hired car from efficient Mr. Jones. Goodbye to Bob, who began to hitchhike to Dublin. Three miles along the road, saw Bob thumbing. Stopped. He stayed with us all day, practically. Drove through County Clare: Ennis, Ennistymo, Kinvara to Galway, where Bob left us finally. On the way we admired the “Burren” fields of stone along the coast, and the perpendicular cliffs of Moher, which we saw from a hotel on a rise. I chatted with the owner. He lamented the departure of the English, whom he called “our best friends,” and said that teaching Irish youth Gaelic is a farce, since 90% have to emigrate to England or America. “All our best minds have left us,” he said. I asked if people on the Aran Islands still spoke Gaelic. (The islands were visible from where we stood.) “Fifty years ago they did,” he replied, “but no one does any more.” “What do they do for a living?” “There are 200 people on the island, and all except two draw relief checks from the government: taxpayers’ money. The two who don’t are the postman and the teacher.” When I asked if Ireland wasn’t better off with the English gone, he replied, “There was those who did well of the revolution. Some high ones fell low and some low ones were raised up. That’s the only difference.”

On to Sligo via Tuam. Rooms at Grand Hotel. Terrible dinner of greasy food, then out to see the Feis (pronounced Fesh) Shligigh in the Town Hall. Lovely singing and some not so lovely, by both children and adults. Fine dancing. We saw the competition for the Hornpipe. I was reconfirmed in the poverty of American culture. Our children have no grace, no attributes; drugs are their chief excitement, aside from ugly music. These Irish children were poised, proud, and accomplished. But how drab all the audience were dressed and how dilapidated the assembly hall. We have so much—I was ashamed of Daphne’s fashionable cape—and yet so little. To bed finally at midnight after a full day and only a few hours’ sleep on the plane the night before.

Wednesday, April 1, 1970

In the morning, back to the Feis. Youngsters around 10 years old competing in Jig. Also some singers including 3 girls singing in Irish, and a choir doing a hymn in Latin, led by a nervous priest. The judge made little speeches, deploring the fact that more girls were entered in the contests than boys, and that older people seem not to sing. Here too it is a struggle, apparently. Drove north to Drumcliff to see Yeats’s grave beneath Ben Bulbin. “Cast a cold eye on life and death / Horseman, pass by.” The setting is spectacularly beautiful, the church a dream, sitting as though on an apron of grass and flowers, beneath Ben Bulbin’s strength. Then to Lissadell, the home of Eva Gore-Booth and Constance Countess Markievicz. We were shown around the house by their nephew, Mr. Gore-Booth. How pathetic it all was! The house cold and unused except for the room with the windows overlooking the bay, the room mentioned in Yeats’s poem. And Mr. Gore-Booth, hanging on, giving his dismal tour for 3/8 a head. Nothing of note in the house, except memories. All the old masters were reproductions, bought on the Grand Tour. The originals were dismal paintings by the Gore-Booths themselves. But in the dining room Count Markievicz had painted four gigantic cartoons of gentlemen, very grotesque and amusing. Mr. Gore-Booth lamented his isolation. Nothing ever comes here; all Ireland is cut off, and the West of Ireland most of all. We get tourists, nothing else. He said that the family had to choose, after the revolution. They weren't Irish but they weren't English either. And they chose to stay on. How could they leave Lissadell? Now, apparently, all they have is their pride. He said that Yeats himself felt this dilemma, since Yeats was so very English and had lived extensively in England. But he said that the two "girls" did not end as grotesquely as Yeats indicates in his poem. Eva was frail, it is true, but did not wither away. Mr. Gore-Booth asked if we were musical, and he asked Leander to play on his magnificent-cased but badly out of tune piano. I was glad to leave because of the pity of it all. Ξεπεσμός γενιάς, Chrysanthi summed it up. We ate sandwiches on the estate, overlooking the bay. Then drove via Ennis and Ballina, by-passing Galway, and proceeded to Gort. Supper at Glynn's Hotel, which was full. Night at the lovely Tara Guest House run by talkative Mrs. Maloney.

Thursday, April 2, 1970

To Yeats's tower, three miles north of Gort. Closed, but still nice to see the setting. Calm, next to a stream, with fields all around, and with Yeats's poem about his restoration of the tower inscribed outside. Thence to Coole Park, seat of Lady Gregory, now just a ruin. But the yew walk is still discernible, as is the huge tree where Yeats, GBS, AE and others inscribed their initials. We were saddened by the jagged half-walls, all that's left of the barns. No sign at all of the house.

South via Ennis, Limerick, Killarney to Kenmore. Saw lace display in the Convent of Poor Claires, and paid far too much for a souvenir. Jolly nun showed us the wares. Thence to druid stone ring in a field in town, past two Irishmen digging in a garden, who made me feel uncomfortable for being a tourist, with my leisure, car, money, wasting time to see old stones. Drove then through gorgeous mountain scenery to Bantry, a charming seaside town. Wretched supper. Night in Barry's Guest House, overlooking the harbor. The scenery from Killarney to Kenmore was also spectacular.

Friday, April 3, 1970

Uninteresting drive to Cork. Bantry cattle market in progress in the square when we awoke. Pig market is on Thursdays, cows on Fridays. Peasants still travel in carts, though some have tractors. The scene reminded me of Hardy—Mayor of Casterbridge—and I don't imagine the life has changed very much. From Cork to Blarney. The castle very rugged. Dungeons, places where boiling tar was poured on besiegers; everything to appeal to our boys! Side tour to interesting rock and tree formations. Back to Cork. Lodging in Gongane Bara Guest House, Western Road. Chrysanthi and I went to a performance of "Stephen D." that was amateur in some ways yet very moving and sincere. Small theater, no sets really, no frills, full and appreciative audience. The play missed most of the nuances of the Portrait but captured the themes in a coarse, blunt way, adding long passages from Stephen Hero and even "Gas from a Burner" to make everything explicit. The part emphasized was Joyce's rebellion against Ireland and the Church. The audience took this without a whimper. I noticed several young clerics in the audience, one with a girlfriend! No tomatoes or catcalls. Joyce is respectable!

Saturday, April 4, 1970

Drove from Cork to Dublin via Waterford, Wexford (nice waterfront), Gorey, Rathoram, Bray, Dalkey, Dun Laoghaire (pronounced Dun Lóiri), stopping to see Joyce's tower at Sandycove. It was closed. Men were swimming at the 40-foot hole. Lodging at Phoenix Guest House, Parkgate Street, just at the entrance to Phoenix Park. Rushed to Abbey Theater to see a play by Dennis Johnston. Terrible, full of every cliché (bossy servant, even), yet throwing a certain interesting light on Irish problems, for example on an extremist group wishing to keep Ireland agrarian and backward in order to avoid the evils of industrialized nations. We left after the second act.

Sunday, April 5, 1970

Attended Meeting at Eustace Street. Met Harold Lamb again and his son Edmund and family. Took Edmund and wife and children Alvin, Charlotte and Roger and the baby to lunch at Clarence Hotel. Then took his children to the zoo with ours, and drove out to their farm north of Dublin to stay for tea. His family produces jams and jellies with "Fruitfield" label. The farm is lovely, with acres of apples, blackberries, currants, strawberries and raspberries immaculately cared for. The Meeting, like last time, was very Christ- and Bible-centered, with some strong, very practiced ministry.

Flew at 6 p.m. to Birmingham.

Martyn 2, Missionary Guest

April 6, 1970

House, College Walk, Selly Oak

Marvelous performance of Chekhov's Three Sisters at the Birmingham Repertory Theatre. Visited Louis Ullmann, who will teach Alec violin again. Leander will be taking piano from his accompanist, Mrs. Brooke. Very jolly. She assigned him Beethoven's Sonata in D minor, opus 31.

April 11, 1970

Visited Margaret and Christos Alexiou. He was very eloquent as always about injustices done the Greek communists. Accused Sherrard and Woodhouse of prejudice in this regard. I tried to interest him in our book, Demotic Greek. Their twins, alas, seem subnormal. One, although 2½, doesn't talk or understand; the other does somewhat better. They sleep at 11 and rise at 5. Ματῦριο!

Sunday, April 12, 1970

Meeting at Selly Oak. Good ministry, all about the fact that spring cannot be far behind, even though it has rained, sleeted, or snowed almost every day so far in April. Muriel Poulter was here, also Margaret Worsdale. Learned that Blanche Schaeffer's mother is very ill.

April 13, 1970

Took the boys to visit Mr. Hearne, the deputy headmaster at Kings Norton Grammar School. Mr. Sheen, alas, has an incurable cancer, discovered suddenly sometime after our last correspondence.

I finished my essay for Coulombis's anthology on Politics and Society of Modern Greece: "the Mellowed Nationalism of Kazantzakis's Zorba the Greek." Writing it was a torture. Now that it's finished, I think that it probably distorts the book terribly.

Met a man named Murray who is a native of the Seychelles Islands, of all places in the world. A businessman, looking half Negro, half Arab, on holiday here, while his wife completes a course in secondary school administration. The islands are about 600 miles from anywhere, but will soon have an airstrip . . . and then . . .

Reading at Woodbrooke, spring term 1970:

- George Thomson, tr. Kostis Palamas, The Twelve Lays of the Gipsy
 Richard Clogg, “The Correspondence of Adhamantios Korais with Thomas Burgess 1789–1792” Richard Clogg, “The Correspondence of Adhamantios Korais with the British and Foreign Bible Society” Νικηφόρου Βρεττάκου Ὁδύνη
 Τάσου Αθανασιάδη Η αίθουσα του θρόνου
Καινή Διαθήκη: Α΄ Θεσσαλονικούς, Hebrews, Colossians
Ἅγιος Ἰωάννης
 Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Letters from Prison

Reading at Woodbrooke, fall term 1970:

- G. W. Anderson, The History and Religion of Israel
 Tom Stoppard, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are Dead
 Amos, Hosea, Isaiah 1–11, Micah 1–2, Jeremiah, Isaiah complete A. P. Herbert, The Secret Battle
 Δ. Σολωμού Διάλογος
 Ezekiel, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, I & II Samuel, I & II Kings, Genesis
 Μ. Τριανταφυλλίδη Νεοελληνική γραμματική Α΄. Ιστορική
Εισαγωγή
 Robert Browning Medieval and Modern Greek

Οικία Αντωνίου Κοριαζή,

July 22, 1970

χωρίον Ἅγιος Ἰωάννης, Πηλίου-Βόλου

Long conversation last night with Λεοντάρης, schoolmate of George’s in Serres, now an official in the Εθνική Τράπεζα, but an amateur of λογοτεχνία. Has published studies of Kazantzakis’s philosophy in Ελληνικά Γράμματα, also essays on philosophy, sociology, etc. His wife, a φιλόλογος, said that the Kazantzakis-Kakridis translation was never adopted for use in the schools. Says that teachers find ways to get around the decree about καθαρεύουσα. If you speak καθαρεύουσα in class, the children heckle you. Thus one starts and then “forgets”—i.e., lapses into δημοτική. Also, the καθαρεύουσα that is taught is άπλή. Leondaris finds Kazantzakis’s language τραχή, όχι στρωτή. So did another φιλόλογος I spoke with here.

July 24, 1970

Lola says that if you go to any official office to request something and speak in demotic you are immediately suspect. You must say τῆς πόλεως, not της πόλης. Demotic is now a provocation! She also says that the readers for the early grades are filled with chauvinistic propaganda, and especially with exultations of war, patriotism, bravery, heroism, etc. All sensibility, all refined feelings, have been eliminated.

Myrivilis speaks of the sponges swaying helplessly to the rhythm of the sea. Today, wearing a mask, I surveyed the sea-bottom and saw clumps of rock-plants (I don't think they were sponges; maybe they were) swaying precisely as he described them: slowly, rhythmically, with a grace, a peacefulness, but also a helplessness—forlorn.

Sunday, July 26, 1970

Good advice in the novel by Τάσος Αθανασιάδης, Η αίθουσα του θρόνου, σελ. 372, as a father prepares to send his son to Europe for postgraduate study: Θα σε στείλω δυο χρόνια στην Ευρώπη. Αν το επιθυμείς, μάθε κάτι περισσότερο. Αν όχι, ζήσε, για να μη βαραίνει αργότερα την ψυχή σου η αρρώστεια που τη λένε «άζητη νιότη».

Monday, July 27

Long discussion with Κύριος Νικαλοΐδης, φιλόλογος, who teaches in the Πειραματικό Σχολείο Θεσσαλονίκης—i.e., the special school for university preparation, to which Δημητράκι will now go. He has always been a δημοτικιστής. Nevertheless he did not agree with the program of Παπανούτσος-Κακριδής επί του Παπανδρέου. His reasons were convincing. In the previous καθεστώς, he told me, i.e., when katharevousa was still taught in the high school, he himself introduced demotic by its side, teaching from the Triandafyllidis grammar. This was known by the «διευθυντή σχολείου, τον επιθεωρητή, κτλ., και κανείς δεν μού 'κανε παρατήρηση». In short, he was more or less free to do as he pleased. With the Παπανούτιος καθεστώς he wasn't. Demotic was taught, and nothing but demotic. So far so good. But look at the sequel. The narrowness of the demoticists provoked a corresponding narrowness in the Colonels, who threw out demotic and restored katharevousa alone, από πείσμα. Νικαλοΐδης feels that if only the fanatics on both sides could be ignored, the problem would solve itself. In short, ο λαός would solve it. Indeed, it is already being solved, which can be seen by comparing today's απλή καθαρεύουσα with the καθαρεύουσα of Metaxas's time or earlier. Even the newspapers, today, write in a language that is really closer to demotic than to Korais.

Tuesday, July 28, 1970

Strange how life goes on. Lola told me that Αριστούβουλος Μάνισης, who has been expelled from the university and exiled to a village, is now free. Lola saw him with his wife, and Kakridis, at a concert at the H.E.N. (YWCA) recently. Previously, Lola had met Mrs. Manisi once in church and had asked her about her son while he was still στην εξορία. The mother said he was well and that they were allowed to talk to each other on the telephone. Notice that the propaganda periodicals in England reported him as "gravely ill." The problem now is that, although he is free (though perhaps he has to report daily to the police), he has no job. Worst of all, he was denied a passport, and thus cannot take up a university post outside of Greece. The concert in question, a piano recital, was given by the wife of a lawyer who is one of the prisoners on Aegina. Obviously his wife is free to pursue her career. Lola said that the husband has been translating books from French while in prison; these are printed and are on sale as far as she knows, but she wouldn't dare go to Morphos's to buy one, for fear of being implicated. An interesting touch is that after the concert the pianist was presented with a huge bouquet—a really startlingly huge bouquet. Lola learned that this had been sent collectively by all the prisoners on Aegina, in her honor.

Lola's own situation is most unpleasant. After the coup, all teachers had to fill out various forms and, in addition, comments were solicited from all present and previous headmasters. The headmaster with whom Lola had had such difficulties, including a law suit, when he cheated her of her salary, reported that she had strenuously supported Papanoutsos's program of demoticization. On the basis of this, Lola's license to teach was revoked. Apparently there is a review procedure, and Lola had submitted an appeal, but so far (three years after the coup) nothing has been done.

Immediately after the coup, when Lola was still teaching, she was obliged to read aloud each day the newspaper editorials extolling the Colonels for having saved Greece, etc. The students were skeptical, at best. After one such reading of particularly repulsive chauvinism, one girl on the way out approached Lola and said, “What’s the matter with you, M’am? Don’t you listen to the BBC?”

Wednesday, July 29, 1970

Alec’s birthday, celebrated with candles bought in church (and removed), then stuck in pieces of baklava. Boisterous gay party with all of us, and the lovely family of Nikaloeidis, the φιλόλογος from Salonika. He sang a few verses of Η Σαμιώτισσα στην άκρη καθαρεύουσα! We all howled. Επιπόλαιο μου λες, γιατί πάω με πολλές, at the top of our voices. Η Θεανώ Νικαλοείδη showed us a nice version of the συρτάκι, and we all danced, including ο Παππούς, who also did an energetic waltz with Efthymoula. We ended with charades, which included George playing the waiter and I the customer, trying to get served at the Aigaion Hotel.

Saturday, August 1, 1970

Long talk with George. I asked him how agriculture was progressing now in Greece, and especially what effect the new government was having. He was extremely optimistic, and also had much praise for the Colonels. In general, agriculture is extremely healthy. Greece has reached the stage where it exports many products: wheat, grapes, tomatoes, etc. In addition, many new processing factories have been created, for tomato paste, for example, which is now exported all over the Near East, and even to America. There is no longer the problem of wastage owing to the scarcity of immediate markets. Previously, the fruit rotted on the ground; now it is canned, or exported fresh, where feasible. This has been facilitated by the government’s policy of friendly economic relations with all countries, and especially with the Eastern Block (contrary to the government’s fierce anti-communism). There is lively trade with Russia, which receives a proportion of the Greek tobacco crop, which previously remained partially unsold. Also wheat. Previously, the government bought up wheat at low prices and stored it. Now the wheat is exported and the prices are better. Trade is carried on with Bulgaria, Romania, etc., and even with Albania, from which the Greeks buy heavy machinery. The government, says George, has solved the wheat problem entirely. It was able to do this because it instituted revolutionary and radical measures that no previous government was willing to do, because of fear of vested interests. Here it was a question of trade guilds, the bakers’ guild and the millers’ guild. Previously these were “closed professions.” No one was free to open a “furnace.” In each neighborhood or village the number of establishments was controlled; the same with mills. When, and only when, the baker or miller died or retired could another man (usually the son) take over the business. In effect, each baker’s shop or mill was a monopoly guaranteed to have no competition. This situation was perpetuated because trades could apply sufficient pressure on M.P.s to make any change impossible. When parliament was abolished, however, the new government, coming as it did from a sector having no previous political entanglements, was able fearlessly to take measures. In short, they made both the millers’ and the bakers’ trades “free” and open. The result is: more bakers, more millers, and better bread at cheaper prices. Also, the millers previously used foreign wheat because it was cheaper; now they use Greek wheat and make a smaller profit, with benefits to the economy and the consumer. Another trade previously closed and now open is that of the chemist. George also praised the government’s policy of ample loans to farmers. This of course is a continuation of previous policies, but under the Colonels the loans have been liberalized. For example, farmers can now get loans to build themselves new homes. This was not possible before. The interest is only 2 percent.

There is a great exodus from the mountain villages where farming is uneconomical. George sees this as a healthy development. In fertile and level regions, irrigation and mechanization have revolutionized agricultural practices.

The government is also encouraging tourism in an efficient and enlightened manner. ΟΤουρισμός gives loans for the construction of modern hotels, for example. (The good taste of the new hotel at Άγιος Ιωάννης.) Prices are strictly regulated. There is also an active campaign for cleanliness. Every so often Pattakos flies over resort towns or beaches in a helicopter and woe to the mayor of an area that is found to be covered with litter.

But there is also, of course, the other side of the coin. I asked George if he knew of anyone who had been imprisoned, or of the families of such. Yes, of course, of course. “How many are imprisoned?” “No one knows. No one asks such questions.” “Are there more people or fewer in jail now as compared to the early stages of the coup?” “As far as I can tell, more, many more. Especially army officers. Every day there are lists in the paper of those who have been relieved of their posts. They're jailed and then if they sign certain papers they are pensioned off." "How do the families live?" "Who knows? They manage on their savings." "Does anyone help them?" "Are you kidding? If you help them you land in jail yourself. But perhaps some people help them secretly."

What impressed me most about George's observations was his emphasis on how silent everyone is. No one talks about political matters. No one expresses any opinions to anyone else. "We don't trust a soul," he told me. "Not even our closest friends. So we keep quiet." He said that in the three years since the coup, no one had ever asked him, nor had he asked anyone else, the questions that I had posed, especially about the number of prisoners. In three years he had never discussed the subject with a soul.

Saturday, August 15

τῆς Παναγίας

George was again very eloquent and emphatic about the "psychological torture" under the present régime. The imprisonment, maltreatment, etc. mustn't detour people's attention from this. Nor must the manifestations of ordinary everyday life—the eating, dancing, buying, etc. Because underneath is always this lurking fear. "The horror," he says, "is that from one day to the next I don't know whether I'll be holding my job when I wake up in the morning. The horror is that there is no law, only the whim or will of the rulers. I can be fired on the spot, and for no reason, or for false reasons supplied by sycophants. And there is no recourse. Everyone in Greece—and especially of course civil servants, which means all teachers, priests, agriculturists, policemen, etc.—lives with this fear. Thus no one, but no one, will ever tell anyone else, especially a foreigner, that life is bad. "We're fine," they'll say, and will change the subject. And outwardly they are fine: they smile, eat, enjoy themselves. But inwardly they are holding on for dear life and living from day to day. Thus the situation is intolerable for all intellectuals, all people with ideals and visions.

For George, the situation is complicated by the continued specter of his brother, Odysseas. George feels, indeed knows, that this fact has hindered his career. Indeed a functionary in the Ministry told him as much: it's the rules! Father, mother, uncles, aunts, brothers, sisters, cousins. If anyone has a "bad record," this is taken into account. George has received promotions and salary increases according to the regular scale.

But everything above and beyond has been denied him. In particular, he twice took examinations for fellowships to study in France. Both times he came out first among the examinees, with a grade of άριστα, but the fellowships were given to someone else. On the other hand, he perhaps is the beneficiary of the old-time Greek system of nepotism. (We'll see.) His application for transfer back to Salonika so that he could be united with his family was never acted upon until one day Efthymoula, by accident, discovered that one of her distant cousins was a high-ranking officer in the inner revolutionary clique, indeed serving in the palace as an adjutant to the Regent. They went to see him. He of course did not know of George or of Efthymoula, but as soon as he heard of the family relationship he was more than willing to help. "The Revolution does not believe in separating families," he said. "This is disgraceful." In the event, he succeeded in having George transferred (maybe) but only to Χαλκιδική, 50 km. from Salonika. To be more exact, he assured George that the διαταγή had been written. It had to pass pro-forma through the Council. . . . George is still waiting.

George said that this cousin assured him very vigorously that Papadopoulos is not a fascist, and that he basically believes in the parliamentary system. He admitted however that some of the other members of the government do not share this view. One needs to be careful in every appraisal because everything is rather subtle. Because decrees are issued, for example, does not necessarily mean that they are honored. After the constitutional referendum a law was passed subjecting to punishment all those who did not vote. This was later rescinded. Yet when a friend of Themis's applied for a passport after the rescinding, he was denied it because he hadn't voted. What is one to think, accordingly, of the new regulation lifting the ban on all the books proscribed since the beginning of the Revolution? I asked a bookseller what this would mean in practice. "How can it be applied?" he answered me. "We are all afraid. Who will be the first to display these books?" To make matters worse, the decree states that no book may be sold if it has "propagandistic content." In short, the situation is now probably worse, for the decision is left up to the bookseller, who knows that "propagandistic content" can mean anything that a tribunal wants it to mean. Before, things were definite and you knew what could be sold and what could not.

Regarding the constitutional referendum, ο Παππούς told me how it was conducted, at least in Salonika. There was “secret balloting.” You were supposed to be given two ballots, one saying Yes and the other No. Then you were supposed to go behind the curtain, drop one of them into the box, and destroy the other. Fine! But in the event the voters, when they entered the polling place, were handed only the Yes ballot. If they wanted the No ballot they had to ask for it. This obviously no one did, as their name would be recorded on the spot by the attending policeman.

Fear is the keynote, especially for anyone, like the Yiannakoses, who have a “blot” on their record. We invited both Lola and George to come with their families to England, taking advantage of our presence there. But will they? The chances are no. Lola, for example, will be very reluctant to apply for a passport because this will remind the authorities of her existence!

Re: education. The gymnasiums still have up to 70 in a class. Some say that the government plans to restore the Lyceum system instituted under Papandreou, and to raise the school-leaving age once more. But there are no rumors even about a change in the linguistic policy.

Pappous has lovely stories to tell, including some about his military service. He never shot a gun, or hardly saw one. When he joined up he was asked immediately, Έχετε γράμματα; Since he did, he was sent to Salonika, given the stripe of an υποδεκανέας, and put in the quartermaster’s department issuing clothes to the new recruits. This of course was Venizelos’s revolutionary army. They had nothing: no offices, no facilities, literally no toilets. The recruits were rounded up in the villages and brought to Salonika in chains. He would issue them their full equipment: boots, greatcoat, shirts, guns, canteen, etc. They’d then be placed on trains heading for the front. But a good many of them would jump off the trains and return to their villages. There, they’d be rounded up again and brought to the quartermaster. Έλεγε ο Παππούς, «Εσύ, βρε, δεν είναι δεύτερη φορά που σε δίνω;!» They would smile sheepishly at each other. In this way, some Greek villagers brought a goodly supply of clothing home to their families.

August 25, 1970 (written in the British Museum on September 26)

Η μέρα της αποχωρήσεως. Ξηκωθήκαμε πρωί-πρωί, η ώρα 5:00. Ο Παππούς φυσικά ήταν ξυπνητός από τις 4:00, και κατεβήκαμε στο καφενείο του Κυρίου Νίκου, δηλ. του στεκιού του Παππού, για να περιμένουμε το ξεκίνημα του λεωφορείου. Ήταν ακόμα νύχτα. Καθήσαμε εκεί, δίπλα στη θάλασσα και παραγγείλαμε καφέδες, ψωμάκια με βούτερο και καφέ, που ήταν το συνηθισμένο μας πρωινό όλο το διάστημα που καθόμασταν στον Αι Γιάννη. Εκεί που τρώγαμε, ένα κουβάρι φωτιά άρκιζε να προβάλλει μέσα από τη θάλασσα, καταντίκρυ μας. Ήταν, νομίζω, πρώτη φορά που είδαν τα παιδιά το ανατόλισμα του ηλίου. Ανέβαινε ανέβαινε τόσο γρήγορα που μπορούσες να αισθανθείς το γύρισμα της γης. Σε λίγο καθόταν επάνω στον ορίζοντα αναπαυτικά, σαν νά 'θελε να μένει έτσι για πάντα. Δεν έμεινε όμως. Όλο ανέβαινε, ωσπού να ζυγιάσεται ακροβατικά στο ουρανοθαλάσσινο σχοινί. Τότες έδωσε ένα σαλάκι κι άρχισε να πετάει λεύτερα μέσα στον αέρα. Πριν ήπιαμε τους καφέδες μας, βρισκότανε σ' ένα μπόι ύψος. Γλύκανε ο ουρανός, έφεγγε, άρχισε κιόλας να ζεσταίνεται. Καταλάβαμε ότι ήταν μερα, ότι θα μας κάψει ο γήλιος όπως πάντε. Μπήκαμε την ώρα 6:00 στο λεωφορείο. Αυτό ανέβηκε, έκανε τις τρέλλες τις στροφές ψηλά ψηλά πάνω από το χωριό και τη θάλασσα, πέρασε γκρεμνούς, δάση, νερά, βράχους και όλο ανέβαινε. Φτάσαμε ύστερα από τρεις ώρες στον Βόλο, ζαλισμένοι κατά βάθος. Η Χρυσάνθη δε μπόρεσε σχεδόν να σταθεί στα πόδια της. Συνήλθε όμως. Περάσαμε από το σπίτι του Γεώργου, όπου μας περίμεναν ο παππούς και η γιαγιά. Εκείνοι είχαν φύγει με φορτηγό κατά παραγγελεία του Γεώγιου και μαζί με τις αποσκευές. Ηε γιαγιά ήταν βέβαια χάλια. Μας πρότειναν να μείνομε εκεί ως το απόγευμα, και να πάμε στη Σαλονίκη με το βραδυνό. Δεν θέλαμε. Αφού αρχίσαμε τα βάσανα, ας τα τελειώσουμε πια. Έτσι μας πήγε στο σταθμό η Ευθυμούλα, και φύγαμε μόνοι μας. Στη Λάρισσα κατεβήκαμε. Φάγαμε ωραία στο εστιατόριο του σταθμού, απολαμβάνοντας τη μουσική. Στον Αι Γιάννη δεν υπήρχε μουσική κατά διαταγή του Τουρισμού. Όπου νά τους πάλι: ο παππούς κι η γιαγιά μαζί με τον Γεώργο, την Ευθυμούλα, το Δημητράκι και τον Ανδρέα. Γι' αυτό φύγαμε όλοι μαζί για τη Σαλονίκη.

Εκεί περάσαμε τρεις-τέσσερες μέρες. Ο Θέμης ο Άλτας φρόντισε το πόδι του Αλέκου, ο οποίος χτυπήθηκε άσκημα λίγες μέρες πρι φύγομε απ' το χωριό. Ύστερα πήγαμε μαζί με τους Άλτα στον Μηχανιώνα όπου είχαν αγοράσει ένα οικόπεδο, ενάμισο στρέμμα, μέσα σ' ένα μποσάνι. Έχουν φτιάξει κιόλας δυο καλύβες από άχυρο κι ψάθες, και ένα υπόστεγο πάλι με ψάθες. Μαζέψαμε μπόλικά σταφύλια από το αμπέλι δίπλα, κόψανε τα παιδιά καρπούζια από το μποτσάνι, κουβεντιάσαμε με τη Θώδωρα, που τη βρήκαμε βάφοντας τη φράχτη. Περιπατήσαμε εγώ με κείνη στη χώρα ενώ ο Θέμης πήρε τους άλλους στο αμάξι του. Καθή-σαμε πάνω απ' τη θάλασσα, φάγαμε γύρους, μήδια, κόκκινες πιπεριές, μπύρες κι χορτάσαμε, παραχορτάσαμε. Πόσο φιλόξενοι είναι οι άνθρωποι εκείνοι! Ήλθαν ύστερα στο σταθμό κιόλας να μας προβαδίσουν τη μέρα που φύγαμε για την Ευρώπη.

Στη Θεσ/νίκη εγώ αγόρασα αρκετά βιβλία, σαν από μανία κατακτήσεως. Περάσαμε πολλές ώρες με τον Κώστα. Πήγαμε μαζί σε μιαν ωραία ταβέρνα ν' ακούσουμε τραγουδάκια. Τι ωραίο, πόσο αναπαυτικό! Πόσο είναι φτωχά το έθιμά μας που δεν έχουμε τέτοια μέρη για να περνούμε τις ώρες μας στην Αμερική. Τη παραμονή της εκθέσεως, είδαμε τα πυροτεχνήματα· κατόπι, αφού είχαν φύγει οι επίσημοι (ο Παττακός έβγασε λόγο αντικαθιστώντας τον Παπαδόπουλο). Μπήκαμε όλοι μέσα, βάλαμε το παιδιά στα ηλεκτρικά αυτοκίνητα και τη Δάφνη στις κούνιες, χαρήκαμε όλοι. Πήγα και εγώ στα αυτοκίνητα μαζί με τον Αλεκάκι και σπρώξαμε το Λέαντρο και τον Νίκο.

Ήλθε η μέρα να φύγουμε. Ολόκληρος λαός στο σταθμό. Ο παππούς με τη γιαγιά ήθελαν να μας προβαδίσουν μέχρι στην Ειδομένη· έμαθαν όμως την τελευταία στιγμή ότι δεν επιτρέπεται. Ο παππούς, χωρίς να ρωτήσει, χωρίς να αντισταθεί, πήρε απόφαση και αρνήθηκε να πάρει πίσω τα χρήματα των εισιτηρίων. Στην Ελλάδα πια η διαταγή δεν σηκώνει αντίσταση! Έτσι φύγαμε οι πέντε μας, μέσα στο θαλαμάκι μας του Wagon-Lit χωρίς κλάματα τούτη τη φορά. Συνηθίσαμε. Ο παππούς, στη γραμμή, κουνούσε τη ψάθα του σαν τρελλός, φαινότανε από πολύ μακριά κιόλας σαν κίτρινη σημαία που τη δέρνει ένας δυνατός αέρας.

Στον Αι Πάννη η Kate Harvey που ήθελε τόσο πολύ να μας επισκεφθεί, δεν μπορούσε. Ήλθε όμως στα καλά καθούμενα ο Ιάσων ο Μεταξάς, μαζί με τη θεία του και τον άντρα της, που είναι γερμανικής καταγωγής. Φαίνεται να ανήκει αυτή στον «καλό κόσμο». Η μια αδελφή έκει το σχολείο Μεταξά στην Αθήνα, η άλλη είναι στο ραδιόφωνο, διαβάζει ιστορίες για παιδιά κάθε πρωί. Είχαν δώδεκα χρόνια να δούνε τον Ιάσωνα. Δεν κατάλαβαν μάλιστα καλά καλά τη φιλοδοξία του να γίνει ηθοποιός. Έπρεπε να γίνει . . . γιατρός! Ύστερα μάθαμε ότι ήταν γιατρός η ίδια, ενώ στα νιάτα της ήταν ηθοποιός για λίγο διάστημα. Οι γέροι ξεχνούνε εύκολα.

Τι κάναμε στον Αι Πάννη; Πολλά μπάνια. Τι άλλο; Φάγαμε χιλιάδες μερίδες μοσχάρακι ψητό. Εγώ δούλευα· μετάφρασα 28ο σελίδες του Ή ζωή έν τάφω». Το σπουδαιότερο, ζήσαμε με τον παππού και τη γιαγιά. Τα παιδιά είχαν ευκαιρία να γνωριστούνε με μιάν άλλη γενεά, εκείνοι να γνωρίσουν τα εγγονάκια τους. Ευτυχώς ο παππούς είναι σπάνιος άνθρωπος εξαιρετικός. Το καλοκαίρι αυτό τού 'κανε καλό. Πρίν, ήταν ακόμα φοβισμένος από το δυστύχημα πού 'χε. Σιγά σιγά όμως παράτησε το μαστούνι του, άρχισε να κοιμηθή πάλι τη νύχτα, ξανέπιασε ακόμη και το μαντολίνο, πρώτη φορά σε 15 χρόνια. Τραγουδίσαμε όλοι, χορέψαμε, παίζανε τα παιδιά χαρτιά, τάβλι, σκάκι· ακόμα κι η Δάφνη έμαθε φάντης λιγάκι. Μου βοηθούσε πολύ ο παππούς με μερικές δύσκολες λέξεις στο βιβλίο, προπαντός τις τούρκικες. Μα πώς μιλάει ο άνθρωπος εκείνος! Για κάθε λέξη έπρεπε να διαβάσει όλο το κείμενο, να δει «τι λέει τα συμφραζόμενα» ενώ τα συμφραζόμενα τις περισσότερες φορές δεν μας βοήθησαν καθόλου να καταλάβουμε τη σημασία της λέξης. Με βοήθησε φυσικά κι η Χρυσάνθη. Καθήσαμε το βράδυ στη βεράντα ή κάποτε κάτω στη θάλασσα, στο «Αιγαίο», και κάναμε τη δουλειά μας. Σαν όμως να μην είναι δουλειά, γιατί ήταν κάτι να μοιραστούμε πια, ήταν για εκείνη μια απασχόλαση που να τη βοηθήσει να ξεχάσει τα παιδιά για λίγο. Γενικά, δεν περάσαμε πολύ καλά το καλοκαίρι· ήταν μακριά από μένα και στενοχωρημένη, δε ξέρω γιατί. Μαλώσαμε. Τη μάλωσα μια φορά που δεν φρόντισε σχεδόν καθόλου για να φάω το βραδυνό, σαν να μην υπάρχω. Της είπα ότι αξίζω δέκα λεπτά φροντίδα την ημέρα. Παραπάνω δεν ζητώ. Μας έκανε καλό ο καυγάς αυτός. Γλύκανε πολύ προς εμένα, ελπίζω να γλύκανα κι εγώ. Αλλά αυτές οι βελτιώσεις είναι πάντα προσωρινές. Γυρίζει εύκολα αυτή στη συνιθισμένη της αδιαφορία· γυρίζω εγώ στη συνιθισμένη μου σκληρότητα.

Κάθομαι και γράφω όλα αυτά στην αίθουσα αναγνώσεως του British Museum. Προχθές τελείωσα πια, στο Birmingham, την πρώτη γραφή του «Η ζωή έν τάφω». Έφυγα αμέσως για το Λονδίνο για να αλλάξω ατμόσφαιρα, για να φύγω μακριά από τις γκρίνιες τις συνεχείς της νοικοκυρικής ζωής.

Εκνευρίστηκε η Χρυσάνθη ίσως γιατί έφυγε ο Λέαντρος. Τον έστειλα σε ένα public school που λέγεται Leighton Park. Είναι των Κουακαίων και λένε πως είναι πολύ καλό σχολείο. Ήθελα να γίνει πιο ανεξάρτητος ο Λέαντρος, να πιάσει φίλους, να δει και να μάθει καινούργιους τρόπους, να μπλεχθεί με εκλεκτόν κόσμο. Μακάρι να πραγματοποιηθούν αυτές οι ελπίδες. Θα δούμε. Έν τω μεταξύ η Χρυσάνθη είναι φυσικά πολύ στενοχωρημένη που τον έχασε, παρ' όλο που συμφωνήσαμε και οι δυο μας να τον στείλουμε. Αρπάζει τα άλλα τα παιδιά, μπας και θα τα χάσει κι αυτά. Αμελά εμένα. Αμελώ εκείνη. Εκεί καταντήσαμε.

Την αγαπώ όμως φοβερά, όπως πάντα. Μα δε μπορώ να της το πω, ούτε να της το δείξω. Είμαι όλο σκληρότητα. Η δουλειά μου είναι ένα καταφύγιο. Δεν θέλω διακοπή, φοβάμε την ανεργία, σαν πανούκλα. Ίσως είμαι στενοχωρημένος ετούτες οι μέρες γιατί ήλθαν κι ο πατέρας μου με τη μαμά. Πήγαν στις Αλίκης στον Οξφόρδι, κατόπι σε μας. Έμειναν μια βδομάδα. Ήλθαν μαζί στο Reading για να παραδώσουμε τον Λέαντρο στα χέρια των δασκάλων του, ξαναγύρισαν στον Οξφόρδι διότι η Αλίκη ήταν άρρωστη, έπειτα ξαναγύρισαν σε μας. Με ξεκαρδίζει ο άνθρωπος αυτός γιατί κάθε φορά που τον βλέπω καταλαβαίνω πόσο τον μοιάζω. Αυτός κλειστός, χωρίς κέφι, χωρίς πρωτοβουλία, χωρίς αυτοπεποίθηση, πολύ οκνός άνθρωπος—όπως είμαι και γώ. Προσωπικότητα καμιά. Όταν μιλάει, κανένας δεν ακούει. Δειλός. Ωραίες ιδέες πολιτικές κ.τ.λ. αλλά πάντα κρυβότανε πίσο από απραξία. Και φροντίζει μονάχα τον εαυτό του. Κατσούφος άνθρωπος, ανάβει αμέσως υπερβολικά ευαίσθητος, όπως κι εγώ. Κοντά στον παππού της Ελλάδας, είναι τιποτένιος. Ήταν ποτές πατέρας μου; Ήταν η μητέρα ποτές μητέρα; Θυμάμαι μονάχα την απουσία τους, σαν νά 'τανε φαντάσματα μέσα στο σπίτι, χωρίς υπόσταση και ουσία. Τόσα χρόνια χωρίς ούτε ένα τραγουδάκι, χωρίς να μου σηκώσουν ούτε μια φορά στα χέρια τους, να μου χορέψουν. Χωρίς να παίξουμε μαζί, να διαβάσαμε ιστορίες. Μονάχα μου έπαιρνε ο πατέρας στα εκλεκτά εστιατόρια τον καιρό του πολέμου (που μας στέρησε τα σπιτικά τροφήματα κι είχαμε δελτία σισσίτιου) για να μάθω να τρώγω εκλεκτά φαγητά. Μου έπαιρνε και στο σινεμά και—όταν ήμουν πολύ μικρός, δλδ ούτε 10 χρονώ—για να περάσουμε καμιά ώρα καβάλα. Τίποτε άλλο. Τη μαμά μου, τη θυμούμαι ακόμα λιγότερα. Πού βρισκότανε τόσα χρόνια; Πώς τα κατάφερε να γίνει τόσο περίφημο φάντασμα; Έστω. Είναι περισμένα αυτά τα χρόνια. Είναι όμως και κληρονομία μου. Αλλοίμονο! Το κακό είναι ότι τα δικά μου τα παιδιά θα πούνε το ίδιο για μένα, ίσως χειρότερο, κι ας τα χόρεψα κάμποσες φορές. Ευτυχώς έχουν και τη Χρυσάνθη, που είναι σωστή μητέρα. Ευτυχώς έχουν και όλους τους συγγενείς στην Ελλάδα, που δείχνουν την αγάπη τους με τόση δύναμη κι απλότητα. Ας είναι καλά όλοι τους!

Στην εξωτερική ζωή περνούμε μια χαρά. Γυρίσαμε σ' ένα ωραίο δι-αμέρισμα, στο Kingsmead Close. Είναι πραγματικό σπίτι, εστία. Την πρώτη μέρα ήλθε η Blanche Schaeffer με ένα cake με τα γράμματα Welcome επάνω του. Ήλθε και η Muriel Poulter για να μάθει μήπως θέλω να δανιστώ το αυτοκίνητό της, και να μου πη ότι θα μας καλέσει σε λίγες μέρες να γνωριστούμε με τον καινούργιο τον καθηγητή της Ελληνικής, τον Rees. Η Αγγλία πια, σαν νά 'γινε πατρίδα μας. Θαυμάσιος πολιτισμός. Θαυμάσιοι φιλοξενούμενοι άνθρωποι. Ο μεν Αλέκος ξαναγύρισε στο Kings Norton Grammar School. Φαίνεται νά 'χει φέτος καλύτερους δασκάλους. Δουλεύει σκληρά, αλλά πάει καλύτερα. Άρχισε και να πηγαίνει στο Birmingham Youth Orchestra. Τον βάλανε first violin! Ετοιμάζουν το Nutcracker Suite και ένα violin concerto του Bach, για τη συναυλία των Χριστουγέννων. Ο δε Λέαντρος θα έχει μαθήματα και στο πιάνο και στο organ, στο Leighton Park. Πήγαμε μεμιάς στο θέατρο. Είδαμε ένα είδος επιθεώρηση, Forty Years On του Jonathan Miller, που σατυρίζει τους public schools και διάφερα άλλα έθιμα της Αγγλίας. Για μένα, η παράσταση αυτή ήταν σαν φρέσκο άνεμο για να καθαρίσει το θολό μου μυαλό. Είχαν πάει τα παιδιά με τη Χρυσάνθη, τον παππού και τη γιαγιά στο Fiddler on the Roof. Πήγα εγώ, μόνος, στο Stratford να δω το King John. Μου άρεσε η απλότητα του έργου και το ηθικό του περιεχόμενο. Εδώ στο Λονδίνο είδα μια φάρσα γαλλικού τύπου που ήταν χάλια, αν και γέλασα λίγα. Είχε γυμνές γυναίκες σε μια πισίνα, γι' αυτό τραβάει το κοσμάκι (κι εμένα). Την άλλη μέρα όμως είδα ένα πολύ καλό έργο, Home, με John Gielgud και Ralph Richardson. Παιζανε δυο γέροι σταλμένοι σ' ένα ψυχιατρικό ινστιτούτο. Άλλαξαν ξερές κουβέντες παράταιρες, όλα αναθυμίσεις του παρελθόντος, ενώ απέφευγαν από τη τρεχόμενη κατάσταση τους. Ήταν και δυο γυναίκες πολύ χυδαίες αλλά—η μια τουλάχιστο—πολύ απλόικη. Οι άντρες, από μοναξιά, από πλήξη, έπιασαν φιλίες μ' αυτές. Αλλά στο τέλος, αφού είχαν αλλάξει μερικές στοιχειώδεις κουβέντες, δεν τους έμειναν πια τίποτε να πούνε. Κατάντησε η ζωή νά 'ναι τίποτε παραπάνω από τα φαητά που έτρωγαν. Όπως είπε ο ένας, "The advantage of a late lunch is that it brings you that much closer to tea-time." Είδα και του Fellini Satyricon, που δεν μου άρεσε καθόλου. Καταλαβαίνεις ότι ο σκηνοθέτης πασχίζει να σε συνεπάρει, και γι' αυτό ακριβώς δεν σε συνεπαίρνει. Εκείνο που λείπει από το έργο είναι η απλότητα.

Προχθές στο Birmingham φάγαμε με τον Χρήστο και τη Margaret Αλεξίου και τον George Ross. Πόσο μιλάει ο Χρήστος! Και πάντα τα ίδια, για τα γουρούνια που κυβερνούν την Ελλάδα. Είναι όμως καλός άνθρωπος με πολύ δυστυχημένη ζωή και μου αρέσει πολύ. Έχουν οι καημένοι ένα παιδί ανώμαλο. Από έλειψη οξυγόνου στη γέννησή του, πέθανε ένα μέρος του μυαλού. Επομένως δεν μπορεί να μιλήσει. Η Χρυσάνθη κι εγώ, πάλι, καταλάβαμε πόσο είμαστε τυχεροί, πόσο η ζωή μάς έχει δώσει ως τώρα το κάθε καλό.

October 11, 1970

In Selly Oak Meeting today a speaker said something very familiar but that nevertheless struck me forcefully and freshly. We tend to speak of life's journey, he said, as from the cradle to the grave. But this is not a very useful formulation. Rather, we should think of life's journey as that from complete self-centeredness to complete selflessness, which means, he continued, from the vanity of time to the riches of eternity. This is a rich text since it has deep meaning not only psychologically and morally, but also metaphysically.

November 20, 1970

The shepherd in Winter's Tale (III.iii.59) speaks à propos of our times: ¶ I would there were no age between ten and three-and-twenty, or that youth would sleep out the rest; for there is nothing in the between but getting wenches with child, wronging the ancients, stealing, fighting.

I am reveling in Shakespeare. In the last two weeks saw Winter's Tale at the Aldwych, Tempest at Stratford, and a magnificent Twelfth Night at the Aldwych, with Leander, who came in from Leighton Park. We spent the afternoon in the B.M., had a huge and expensive Chinese dinner, then Shakespeare, and spent the night in the Great Western Hotel. On Sunday morning Leander went back to school and I took the train via Oxford to Brum.

December 11, 1970

A.m., sitting at the rear of the B'ham Town Hall attending the dress rehearsal of the B'ham Schools Symphony Orchestra in which Alec is in the first violin section. This is in lieu of the concert tonight, which C. will go to but which I shall miss, having to pick up Leander at Leighton Park and escort him to London so that he can take the U.S. Secondary Schools admission test tomorrow morning, poor fellow!

What a joy to sit here and see these musicians: full orchestra, plus senior and junior choruses for the Christmas carols part of the program. The orchestra itself is doing the Nutcracker Suite and the overture to Rosamunde. They have been rehearsing every Saturday morning since September, and Alec has had an exceptional, and certainly unexpected, training as a result. When we auditioned for Mr. Adams last June, he said he wished Alec could stay for the next four years. Would that he could, that we all could, for the level of culture here, musical and otherwise, is decidedly superior to that in the States. The Schools Symphony is one small example, and explains why adult Englishmen take to classical music naturally, because they start young.

To London, early afternoon. Checked in at the English Speaking Union and then walked, probably two miles at least, to Paddington via Marble Arch and Edgware Road. This entire section of London was in darkness because of the electricity workers' work-to-rule. The ESU had candles in all the rooms and on the landings, and a hurricane lamp at reception. Some places had lit the old gas lamps. Candles have been at a premium, not to mention flashlights (torches). Chrysanthi was asked 13/ for a single candle the other day in Birmingham! Needless to say, everything was difficult during the blackout. No traffic lights, no street lights. This caused great confusion, and one took one's life in one's hands just trying to cross the street.

Paddington to Reading. Leander was all ready when I arrived. We didn't go to the school concert after all—couldn't have done so if we wanted to, since the hall was completely filled. I heard a little through the window, and watched Mr. Hughes conduct Bach dispiritedly in a tempo rather too slow. The violins were fine; the horns completely erratic, but of course Leighton Park doesn't have 500,000 people to draw from, as does the Birmingham orchestra. Still it was nice to see this little ritual of the Christmas concert. Leander said that he had been commanded a few days earlier to work up a movement of a Mendelssohn trio at a day's notice, to play at the Collect marking the departure of John Ounsley, the headmaster. God only knows how it sounded. He says that the violinist and 'cellist he plays with are first rate. Mr. Hughes tells him that he probably can take grade 8 in the Assoc. Board exams if he stays next year. He seems to like the organ. I'm eager to hear him. But where can we find an organ in Birmingham?

December 12, 1970

Shall he stay or not? That will be a difficult choice. It is so tempting: an obviously fine school that he really likes (although he's still failing physics!). Yet he can't be an Englishman most likely, unless he stays on for the whole time, goes to Oxford, and settles here. Tempting. This morning, taking him to the room for the Secondary Schools Admissions Test, I felt nausea at the American children gathered there, irrationally I know. Yet they were so brash, and dressed so garishly! I'm really becoming an old stick-in-the-mud. Yet . . . Should he stay one more year, do his O-levels and then come home? That is what he wants. But at the end of the second year the question will inevitably come: Why not a 3rd, and then, of course, a 4th? Also, if he goes two years here he will have very little chance of entering an independent school in the U.S., for they like to take students in the 10th, not the 11th grade. Yet the life in Leighton Park seems very healthy and wholesome. No need for drugs, no great campaigns for self-rule, etc. The hierarchical society brings children gradually into responsibility. They know that in the 6th form a great change will occur, and they seem content to wait for this. Thus there are no twelve-year-olds on school committees!

The last three weeks—incredibly; how long everything takes—I've spent revising my Princeton manuscript, going systematically over the comments made by Trypanis, Mrs. Kazantzakis, and Christos Alexiou, making changes and additions. The worst part was carrying the history of the diglossia back from Koräis's time to Hellenistic times, but this had to be done. In the process I came in touch with the source materials that I should have used earlier: Κορδάτου Ιστορία του γλωσσικού μας ζητήματος, Τριανταφυλλίδη Νεοελληνική γραμματική· ιστορική εισαγωγή, Browning's book, etc. An interesting study. But time-consuming. Now only the typing remains. In addition, the pamphlet for Columbia has been shipped off and I await their reaction. This was terribly difficult to do; I felt at the end of my tether, as though I were 80 years old with no real intellectual energy left. But after a catastrophic revision, in which I seem to have shifted every paragraph to a different location, the thing assumed some unity and coherence. The whole problem was how to be enthusiastic about Kazantzakis without inflating his achievements.

If I can spend the rest of the Christmas holidays checking out all the απορίες still remaining in Ἡ ζωὴ ἐν τάφῳ then I can begin fresh on the politics book when Woodbrooke resumes in January. The time grows less and less. The other day Peter Saccio wrote from Dartmouth saying he had just been presented with 130 term papers of 20 to 40 pages each. This shocked me into fearing my future. What a joy, what a gift, this free time has been!

Nice weekend some time ago with Noel, Joy, and Catharine Jones, who drove over from Cambridge. We sat up until 2:30 a.m. talking vigorously. Haven't done that in a long time. But the organism doesn't assimilate such irregularities as it used to. Being over 40 has begun to show!

Met Will Lee by chance when we went with the Woodbrooke group to The Tempest at Stratford. He seems 40 already, though he's all of 23. He spent the summer touring Europe for the first time: Germany, Spain, etc. I asked him how he liked it, and he answered, "It was tiring"!

1971

---

Kingsmead Close, Birmingham	January 1–July 9
Quaker pilgrimage, March 27–29
Οικία Γραμματέως Κοινότητας, Χωρίον Καλλιθέα,Κασσάνδρας, Χαλκιδικής (Μάλτεπε)	July 12–August 26
Κολοκοτρώνη 11, Θεσσαλονίκη	August 26–29
Salonika—Munich	Aug. 29–30
Friends International Center, Courtauld House, Torrington Place WC1 London	September 1–2 c/o Helen Strange, 62, Priory Gardens, N.6	Sept. 3–6
Fly home	Sept. 6–7

January 15, 1971

Leander back in school after an enjoyable month at home. We saw a reasonably good Major Barbara in London, a superb recital by Stephen Bishop, all Beethoven, including the Diabelli Variations, at Queen Elizabeth Hall, 1066 and All That at the Brum Rep, had a visit by Will Lee, 3 days with Busecks including Edith, a memorable trip with them to Coventry Cathedral. I did Woodrow Wilson interviewing in London, with Sir Sidney Caine and Professor Ford of Rochester University, whose child goes to the Mountain School. New Year's Eve at the Alexious, with Ritsa Papatheophilou and her charming sister from Athens (one arm; all vivaciousness and grace).

In this period I revised my demotic book for Princeton, posting it on December 24, then wrote an introduction for the MGSA volume Modern Greek Writers, finally turned again to Ἡ ζωὴ ἐν τάφῳ, tracking down elusive words. And so Woodbrooke began again. Another term, and how nice it is to be back at my desk there! I'm doing New Testament Greek with Curtis (Mark and Hebrews), the Pauline epistles with Muriel Poulter, and David Robson's Quakerism course. Quite enough, also Maurice Creasy's Monday night seminar on ministry. On music night a few days ago Leander and I played some Brahms waltzes 4 hands, and the 1st movement of Mozart's piano concerto K. 466. Alec did a Telemann trio sonata with Maurice, and Leander played a prelude and fugue from the Well Tempered, Book II, doing the fugue very nicely. The Mozart concerto was an ordeal for me, but I got through it somehow.

Yesterday met an interesting chap from Fircroft, Don P., friend of Professor Thomson's through the Communist Party, of which he is a member. Has worked in factories all his life; now has quit and is studying English literature at Fircroft and hoping to go to university. He told me of experiences that were uncannily Proustian: life mirroring art. Age 5 he was evacuated to a village in Wales, and had no real memories of it. Age 30 or so he went back there actually with his mistress, on a last fling (he'd resolved to leave her and return to his wife). He couldn't remember any details of his experiences at age 5 until, entering one of the village houses, he smelled a certain smell. Then, in a flash, everything came back, in amazing detail. Also, he felt that being there with the mistress he was reliving, with variation, what had happened before, because at age 5 he had felt estranged from his mother; now he was estranging himself from this girl. Again a Proustian repetition with variation. Lastly, he told how going to work on the train he noticed primroses growing along the track. They struck him with great force, and suddenly he connected them with primroses he'd seen 25 years before in the Welsh village, also actually growing (primroses are normally seen as cut flowers in florists' shops). I tried to convince him to read Proust. We also talked about Joyce (he's doing Finnegans Wake!) and about Mann's "Death in Venice" and Kazantzakis. A very enjoyable two hours over tea, in the Woodbrooke Common Room.

February 14, 1971

Drove to Reading. Got Leander, who was playing in a soccer match, and then traveled first to Salisbury Cathedral and then to Stonehenge. Alec had just been studying "English perpendicular" in school and was very knowledgeable. Deposited Leander back at school and proceeded to Oxford, to Peter and Alice.

February 15, 1971

Oxford

Very enjoyable day. Met Tom Doulis in the morning at the Randolph Hotel. (But first, Peter showed me how he magnifies his crystals 200,000 times in the electron microscope.) Tom and I talked continuously and enthusiastically for three hours, on Greek literature. While we were in a coffee shop, Bill McCurrine saw me through the window and burst in, all smiles. I hope to have him come to B'ham, had forgotten that he was at Oxford, on a Rhodes. Then Peter and I lunched in the Senior Common Room at University College. The masters sitting across the table asked where I was from and as soon as I said Dartmouth there were smiles and then enthusiastic conversation especially about Bob Reich, whom they admired, and about Bill McCurrine, and also Isaacson (Bob Bell's brother-in-law), who they said did not have a 1st class mind, which Reich definitely had. Nice feeling of academic contact and warmth.

Reading at Woodbrooke, 1971.

L. P. Hartley, My Sister's Keeper

Galatians, Thessalonians, Corinthians, Romans

Siegfried Sassoon, Memoirs of an Infantry Officer

Σικελιανού Ο Δαίδαλος στη Κρήτη

Tsoucalas, The Greek Tragedy

Γιώργου Θεοτοκά, Πνευματική πορεία

Μακρυγιάννη Απομνημεύματα (selections)

Καζαντζάκη Καποδίστριας, Κωνσταντίνος ο Παλαιολογος,

Σόδομα και Γόμορρα, Ο Χριστός ξανασταυρώνεται

Ζήσιμου Λορεντζάτου Μελέτες

The Salonika Front, painted by Wm. T. Wood, described by

A. J. Mann (1920)

February 20–21, 1971

Tom and Nancy Doulis here with their 3½ year old. More talk. Supper with Christos, Meg, Ritsa, and Alexis Dimaras, a crisp, wiry character with a fine mind.

February 24, 1971

Mike Keeley telephoned from Princeton. (The British postal strike is now in its 5th week.) I worked hard, got the MGSA manuscript ready by Thursday, and gave it to Judith Herrin, who'll mail it in Paris.

February 25, 1971

Leander was accepted at Mount Hermon with $1000 scholarship and $500 loan.

February 26, 1971

Leander home. We all went to the Theodorakis concert at the Odeon Theatre, New Street. He played settings of Ritsos and of Seferis's Μυθιστόρημα. Also a stirring cycle of songs written by Theodorakis himself while he was in prison. And then an encore, the Zorba music in a stirring arrangement. Μαρία Φαραντούρη was the energetic soloist. She has an intriguing throaty voice, very robust. Theodorakis is a giant. When he conducts he is like a bare oak tree swaying in the wind.

March 4, 1971

To London to a seminar at the School of Slavonic and East European Studies. The speaker was C. M. Woodhouse, who gave a splendid paper on the relation of Capodistrias with the Φιλική Εταιρεία. We chatted afterwards. I told him about Kazantzakis's play, which, by coincidence, I am now working on. He has just completed an entire book on Capodistrias. He told me his interest was first aroused in the mountains of Greece in 1942 before the sabotaging of the Gorgopotamos viaduct. He, Zervas, and Aris toured the villages, making speeches, and Aris's favorite speech was a denunciation of Capodistrias.

March 10, 1971

Much Ado About Nothing at the Crescent Theatre with Chrysanthi and Alec. Letter and photo yesterday from Odysseas from Tashkent, the first direct contact Chrysanthi has had with her brother in 25 years!

March 14, 1971

Sakuma, the Zen Buddhist, told Maurice Creasy he should meditate on the following: the stream stands still, the bridge flows.

March 17, 1971

Nice lusty performance of The Merry Wives of Windsor by the Oxford Players at the Alexandra. I never knew that Tolkien's man of "middle earth" was Falstaff in the fairy scene.

March 19, 1971

Γιώργος Σικελιώτης, the Greek painter, came to us for supper along with Ritsa Papatheophilou, Christos, and the Doulises. Sikeliotis is a grand figure, an ex-μπακάλης turned successful artist. Former μπεκρής, smoker, etc., he now abstains from everything, except good spirits. I mentioned somehow, something about waiting until the κέφι came, and he answered good-naturedly, Εγώ, έχω πάντα κέφι! which was true. He was full of jolly stories about his eating-drinking companions, especially George Savides. Also about his love for painting, and how the Ford Foundation in Athens is subsidizing artists and writers. Κάσδαγλης, Ciccillis, etc. We had a grand time. Sebastian and Helen Brock were also with us. The Brocks, Tom Doulis, Christos and I had spent the last day and a half at the University of Birmingham Byzantine symposium, a series of eight papers on the subject of early Byzantine asceticism, chiefly on the monks of Egypt and Syria—Simon Stylites, etc. Bryn Rees spoke, as did Brock, and a charming ascetic-like scholar from All Souls, Peter Brown, bravely living with his stutter. These concentrated short courses are extremely good, though exhausting. A whole new understanding of this asceticism was opened up, at least to me, especially the communal, social role played by these men whom I had ignorantly thought of as “drop-outs.” They flourished because they were needed. Another interesting insight, this time negative, concerned the disastrous effect of monasticism upon the liturgy. The meaningless repetitions, the reading of the Psalms and lessons in order throughout the year without relationship either to the time of year of the needs of the congregation, all stem from rigid monastic practice later imposed on non-monastic worship. It was a day full of talk and learning.

March 20, 1971

The Doulises stayed overnight. More talk—steadily from 10:30 in the morning until 4:00, when they left. How easy it is to talk . . . with some people.

The previous Thursday, the day before the Byzantine symposium, I went to London. Spoke on the BBC Greek program on Kazantzakis, under the direction of Yolanda Terenzio, then went to the School of Slavic Studies to hear Professor Dakin lecture on the attempts to form a state in Greece ca. 1824–1831. Long chat with Tappe, who’s editing the Romanian series for Twaine. Then home with Richard Clogg and supper there. They’re a nice couple. Young, pretty wife, ex-American. I missed my train back, stayed over at the English Speaking Union, and the next morning settled our travel arrangements with BUNAC, thanks to a tip from Clogg. Very useful day. Then to B’ham for the Byzantine congress and another useful and enjoyable day.

March 27, 1971

End of term. Left this a.m. on Quaker Pilgrimage with Woodbrooke group. David Robson, Chris Lawson and family, the Walkers, Shasti, Beat, Tashio, Ruth Tassoni, Robin Wilkinson, Robert Hewison, etc. 32 in all. We drove to Downham village, I at the wheel of a 12-seater coach. Lovely village. Lunch by a stream, with hens and ducks. Then we all climbed Pendle Hill, in various ways. Leander, Alec, and Jaimie Walker went through bogs, encountering sheep skeletons: very romantic. The rest of us went round back, and up a path to the top. Daphne walked all the way, resolutely. On top, a crowd of children, all with transistor radios, listening to pop music and football games. So much for George Fox and religious δέος. But that evening at Yealand Conyers, Elfrida Vipont Foulds inspired us with her account of Fox's activities in this area. The Meeting at Yealand was established in 1652. And Robert Hewison read the passage in the journal where Fox was moved by the Lord to climb Pendle Hill, where he had his vision of the great people waiting to be gathered. We are staying in Elfrida's house, built in 1603 and occupied by the same family until after World War I. It is a rabbit warren of a place, very gracious now and warm, filled with books, Chinese vases, engravings, and a huge piano. Mrs. Foulds spoke quite beautifully last night, as we all sat in her sitting room in front of the fire. She is an enthusiast, in the best sense of Quaker history, yet never willing to think that the history is its own justification. Its only justification comes if it can be a living impetus today, in us. Hard, hard.

Chez Elfrida Vipont Foulds,

March 28, 1971

Yealand Conyers, Carnforth, Lanc.

Meeting here at Yealand Conyers. Very lovely meeting house, absolute plainness and simplicity. Friends around all four sides, very lovely feeling of intimacy and warmth. But the Meeting itself was disappointing. All old people, as usual. One ministry, longwinded and pretentious. Later, I learned that the members are not native Westmorelandmen. This has become a favorite place of retirement for elderly Friends, and the members are all "sophisticated" Friends from the south. I expected something more genuine. But the atmosphere was still nice. The closeness. I could imagine the early Friends gathered together as in a place of refuge, with the silence electrically charged, with persecution and danger hovering always in the background.

We then drove to the Meeting House at Brig Flatts, built in 1675 and kept in a good state of repair despite woodworm. Again, a tiny, simple building, very reminiscent of the old Friends. The village that used to have 70 families now has only 2 or 3, a victim of the industrial revolution, for the village was a center of cottage industry: flax growing and linen making. George Fox slept in the farmhouse adjacent. We drove, next, to Firbank Fell, where he preached to a great multitude of 1000 seekers for 3 or 4 hours. We were greeted by a great multitude of sheep—hundreds, all converging upon our vehicles and baying. The new flock! The fells have a wild splendor. Fox came here to a chapel, now gone, and used a rock for his pulpit because the crowd was too large to fit inside. We returned by Sedbergh, where he preached under the yew tree of the Sedbergh church at the time of the Whitsuntide hiring fair, and made such a great impression. Behind the church is a nice view of the Lune River, painted by Turner and praised by Ruskin. (No, this is behind the church at Kirkby Lonsdale, not Sedbergh.) We had a nice tea; then Beat played Beethoven sonatas. Tonight we'll have music after the meeting with Elfrida Foulds, and the epilogue.

March 29, 1971

To Prestonpatrick Hall, near Yealand. The farm just above was the home of a Quaker named Camm who preached in Oxford, convinced only one man, and considered himself a failure. But this one convinced Friend then went to Ireland, where he was heard by a young boy. Many years later, the same boy, remembering him, heard him once more when he was preaching in Cork, and became a convinced Friend. The boy was William Penn! The Hall itself, built in the 1300s, still operates as a manor farm. The courtyard, exactly as it was in medieval times, was all mud, cows, manure. The house itself, very simple, with a courtroom at one end (the lord of the manor was also traditionally the magistrate). The owner, a Friend, took us around. She was very tweedy and fine. I envisioned all the county squires of literature. Then on to Ulverston, and Swarthmore Hall. The building is quite ugly, but half of it is gone. Judge Fell's parlor and the great hall are restored. Here Fox found refuge, and completed his journals. From here, Margaret Fell went out to preach. In the town is the Meeting House left by Fox in his will. Very plain and lovely. We also saw the old burial ground where Margaret Fell is interred, overlooking Morecambe Bay, the sands of which Fox used to cross at low tide, to save time. We then drove a bit through the Lake District, visiting the Meeting House near Lake Windemere and crossing the Caba by Ferry. Lots of singing and good spirits in the coach along the way.

July 25, 1971,

Καλλιθέα, Χαλκιδικής

Φύγαμε από το Λονδίνο τη 10 Ιουλίου και ήλθαμε στη Θεσσαλονίκη, μέσω Dover–Ostend–Munich. Μας πήραν από το σταθμό ο παππούς, η γιαγιά, η Λόλα, ο Κώστας και ο Γεώργος. Φάγαμε, ξαπλώσαμε λίγο, κι αμέσως φύγαμε πάλι για την Καλλιθέα, με το λεωφορείο της επικοινωνίας. Φτάσαμε κατά τις οχτώ το βράδυ. Το σπίτι μας βρίσκεται στο δημόσιο δρόμο, λίγα βήματα από τα καφενεία του χωριού. Είναι πέντε δωμάτια σε σειρά· από τα πέντε, κατοικούμε εμείς τέσσερα. Από μια πλευρά είναι ένα είδος αυλή· απ’ την άλλη, μπαλκόνια που βλέπουν στη θάλασσα, που είναι 200 μέτρα μακριά. Το σπίτι κάθεται στην άκρη-άκρη ενός γκρεμού. Έτσι βλέπομε όλο τον ορίζοντα. Στο δρόμο, κοντά μας, είναι τα εστιατόρια, καφενεία και καταστήματα του χωριού. Κάτω, στην παραλία, είναι ένα ξενοδοχείο πολυτελείας, μια ωραία πλαζ με λεπτή άμμο, και δύο κέντρα. Μπροστά στο σπίτι μας, στο κάτω μέρος του γκρεμού υπάρχουν και ανασκαβές. Βρήκαν εκεί ένα αρχαίο ναό του Άμμωνος Διός. Ως τώρα έχουν ξεσκεπάσει τις μεγάλες μαρμάρινες πλάκες του πατώματος του ναού. Βλέπομε τους εργάτες από το μπαλκόνι μας και θαυμάζομε την προσεχτική τους δουλειά. Τώρα σκάβουν και στις πλάγιες του γκρεμού. Σε μια μεγάλη τρύπα που άνοιξαν, προβάλλει κάθετως μια κολόνα.

Μόλις φτάσαμε, εγώ άρχισα να δαχτυλογραφώ το βιβλίο μας, Demotic Greek, που το επεξεργάστηκα στην Αγγλία. Έφτασα στο ενδέκατο μάθημα και βαρέθηκα. Ήταν δύσκολη δουλειά, που μου έφαγε δυο ολόκληρες βδομάδες. Ύστερα η Θεοδώρα Κουμβακάλη μου σύστησε δύο κοπέλλες στη Θεσσαλονίκη, τους ετοίμασα το επόλοιπο του κειμένου, και τους το έφερα. Έτσι γλίτωσα, ελπίζω, από τη σκοτούρα αυτή. Κατά τη διάστημα αυτή αισθανόμουν την αγωνία του Καζαντζάκη όταν αναγκαζόταν να χάνει το καιρό του με hack work ενώ λαχταρούσε να καταπιαστεί με δημιουργική δουλειά. Οσο για μένα, είχα σκοπό να δουλεύω το Μυριβήλη όλο το καλοκαίρι, αλλά μέχρι τώρα ήμουν απασχολημένος με το Demotic Greek επειδή το ζητάνε μερικοί και βιαζόμενα.

Μέχρι τώρα είχαμε αρκετά “social life.” Βρίσκονται εδώ φυσικά ο παππούς με τη γιαγιά, η Λόλα με το Νικάκι. Έρχονται συχνά να μας επισκεφτούν ο Γεώργος με τη γυναίκα του και τα δυο του παιδιά. Ήλθαν μαζί τους μια μέρα ο κύριος Νικαλήδης, που γνωρίσαμε πέρυσι στον Αι Πάννη. Είναι καθηγητής αυτός στο Πειραματικό Σχολείο και τώρα διορίστηκε επιθεωρητής και μεταφέρθη στη Καβάλλα. Πήγαμε με το Γεώργο σ' ένα ξενοδοχείο στην άλλη άκτη της Κασάνδρας και μιλήσαμε για εκπαιδευτική ιδεολογία. Αυτός φαίνεται να έχει προοδευτικές ιδέες αλλά με την τωρινή κατάσταση δεν εφαρμόζονται. Ύστερα από λίγες μέρες ήλθαν και ο Θέμης κι η Μιράντα Άλτας με τη Μαριάννα, μαζί με τους φίλους τους τον κ. Μανώλη και τη γυναίκα του, που είναι κι αυτή τυφλή σαν και τη Μιράντα. Τους είχαμε γνωρίσει πριν από τέσσερα χρόνια στην Άγια Τριάδα, εκείνη την ωραία μέρα που πλαγιάσαμε όλοι στην άμμο και τραγουδήσαμε. Αυτός ο Μανώλης είναι ένας «παλαβός» από την Κρήτη, υπερβολικά εξώστρεφος, και με ενοχλούσε λίγο με τις φωνάρες του και τις απανωτές αγκαλιές. Είναι όμως ένας καλός άνθρωπος. Η δε γυναίκα του, η κυρία Κούλα, η τυφλή, είναι το αντίθετο, σαν πεθαμένη. Δεν μιλάει, δε γελάει, δεν χαμογελάει. Το πρόσωπό της φοράει πάντα μιαν έκφραση κουτομάρας ενώ δεν είναι καθόλου κουτή, έχει πάρει δίπλωμα στην Αγγλία από το Royal Institute for the Blind και διδάσκει τώρα στη Σχολή Τυφλών. Έφυγε όλη η παρέα αλλά σε λίγο οι Άλτες ξαναγύρισαν, ενοίκιασαν δωμάτιο, και έμειναν δέκα μέρες, για να περιθερίσουν μαζί μας. Έτσι είχαμε παρέα κάθε μέρα. Κάναμε το μπάγνιο μας μαζί το πρωί, και το περίπατό μας μαζί το βράδυ. Άλλωστε έφερα εγώ απ' τη Θεσσαλονίκη το μαγνητόφωνο του Θέμη και αρχινήσαμε τις καινούργιες ταινίες για το βιβλίο. Ο Θέμης έχει εξαιρετική φωνή και ηχογράφησε για το χατίρι μας όλους τους διαλόγους του βιβλίου! Ήλθε κι ο Κώστας αλλά ύστερα από λίγες μέρες είχε φοβερό καβγά με το Γεώργο και έφυγε πάλι. Η αφορμή του καβγά ετούτου ήταν ο Λέαντρος που έδωσε μια γροθιά στο Νικάκι όταν έπαιζαν ποδόσφαιρο. Δεν ήταν τίποτε μα ο Κώστας, θέλοντας εκδίκηση, φοβέρισε το Λέαντρο. Τότε ο Γιώργος δεν κρατήθηκε, είπε τον Κώστρα άναντρο για να θελήσει να χτυπήσει ένα παιδί, ο Κώστας αγρίεψε, όλο το μίσος που έχει ο ένας για τον άλλο βγήκε στην επιφάνεια, κι όπου φύγει φύγει. Τώρα όμως, ύστερα από μιαν εβδομάδα, καταστάλαξαν τα πράγματα. Είχαμε τη τρικυμία μας, αλλά περάσε . . . για το παρόν.

Είχαμε και το πανηγύρι μας. Του Αγίου Πανταλείμμονος. Μουσικά-ντηδες, χοροί, γλέντη μεγάλη. Δυο μέρες βαρεία λαϊκή μουσική.

Γνώρισα τον παπά του χωριού. Πήγαμε με τον παππού στη λειτουργία· ύστερα καθήσαμε στο καφενείο να πιούμε τον καφέ μας, να φυλλομετρήσουμε την εφημερίδα, και να μιλήσουμε με τους άλλους εκεί για τους αστροναύτες, την απόφαση του Νίξον να επισκεφτεί τον Μάο, κ.τ.λ. Ο παππούς κάλεσε τον παπά να καθήσει λιγάκι μαζί μας, και μιλήσαμε αρκετά. Είναι πολύ νέος, με τρία μικρά παιδιά, με κομμένα γένια, και πιστεύει ότι η εκκλησία πρέπει πια να γίνει πιο σύγχρονη. Έτσι συντομεύει αυτός τη λειτουργία. «Αυτό που προηγουμένως βαστούσε δέκα λεφτά», μου είπε, «τώρα το κάνουμε σε τρία λεφτά.» Είναι και ο δάσκαλος του χωριού. Διδάσκει όλες τις τάξεις σε ένα one-room schoolhouse. Όμως η γλωσσικές ιδέας του δεν είναι τόσο προοδευτικές. Είναι καθαρευουσιάνος. «Η καθαρεύουσα», μου είπε, «είναι μια πιο μεγαλοπρεπής γλώσσα, έχει παράδοση.» Όσο για λογοτεχνία, πιστεύει ότι η πιο σημαντική λογοτεχνία απ' όλη την ελληνική παράδοση είναι τα συγγράματα των πατέρων της εκκλησίας!

Η ζωή εδώ είναι ωραία, αλλά στενή. Όπως μου΄πε προχθές η Χρυσάνθη, όλο σκέφτονται φαΐ. Κι ο Λεάνδρος μου΄πε κι αυτός ακόμα: «Δεν ξέρεις πόσο χάρηκα, μπαμπά, σήμερα το πρωί, ν' ακούσω λίγο κλασική μουσική στο ραδιόφωνο. Την επιθυμώ πολύ.» Πόσο χάρηκα κι εγώ να ακούσω τα λόγια του! Ο Λεάνδρος φέτος έκανε μεγάλη πρόοδο στη μουσική· παίζει τώρα πολύ ωραία το πιάνο. Έπαιξε συχνά στο σχολείο. Την τελευταία μέρα, που είχαν συναυλία, έπαιξε ένα Nocturne του Chopin και ένα Trio του Mozart με clarinet και 'cello. Χάρηκα πάρα πολύ να τον ακούσω.

7 Αυγούστου, 1971

Είναι μια εβδομάδα που άρχισα πια την επεξεργασία του Η ζωή εν τάφω. Σήμερα—το Σάββατο—θα δακτυλογραφήσω τις σελίδες, περίπου 40, που τελείωσα μέχρι τώρα. Είναι σκληρή δουλειά, τρώει πολλές ώρες, αλλά μ' αρέσει. Σηκώνομαι στις 6:30 η ώρα, τρώω λίγο ψωμί με μέλι, πίνω το Nescafé μου και κάθομαι στις 7:00 π.μ. στο γραφείο μου, δίπλα στα μισοκλεισμένα παντζούρια (ο πρωινός ήλιος είναι από εδώ). Δουλεύω μέχρι στις 12:30, τότες γδύνομαι (αυτό είναι εύκολο γιατί δεν φοράω παρά T-shirt και σορτς μ' ένα rouch για εσώρουχο, πάντα ξυπόλυτος είμαι), βάζω και το μαγιό μου, φοράω και τα γυαλιά του ηλίου, κατεβάζω τη ψάθα στη κεφαλή μου και ξεκινώ για τη θάλασσα. Εκείνη βρίσκεται κάτω-κάτω. Σκαρφαλώ τη φράχτη του σπιτιού, κατεβαίνω κάτω πρόχειρες σκάλες που μας έβαλε ο νοικοκύρης μας, και τραβώ μπρος. Στο δρόμο, περνούμε από μια βρύση, ένα από τα αραιά αγνάρια της μονής που βρέθηκε εδώ μια φορά κι ένα καιρό. Φτάνω στην άμμο, που βρίσκονται η Χρυσάνθη, ο Νίκος και τα παλικάρια μας κάτω από την ομπρέλλα, ξεπλυνομαι ανάσκελα να κάνω ηλιοθεραπεία κι ύστερα από λίγο (γιατί ο ήλιος καίει πολύ) κάνω το μπάνιο μου. Η θάλασσα εδώ, αφού είναι κόλπος, είναι συνήθως ήσυχη· είναι και πολύ ρηχή, το πάτο στρωμένο με άμμο, που και που μερικές θαλασσινόπετρες με φύκια και αχινάρες στις χαραμάδες. Προχωράς μεσ' στη θάλασσα, προχωράς ακόμα, ακόμα, και το νερό δεν φτάνει παρά στη μέση σου. Λίγο πιο μακριά όμως και δεν πατάς πια. Είναι μια θάλασσα κατακαθαρή και έξοχη. Γυρίζω σιγά-σιγά στο σπίτι, να μην ιδρώσω στον ανήφορο. Το τραπέζι είναι στρωμένο. Συγκεντρωνόμαστε όλοι στο δωμάτιο του παππού—είμαστε εννέα άτομα—και τρώμε φασολάκια ή μελιτζάνες, πάντα με σαλάτα, ύστερα καρπούζι, πεπόνι, ροδάκινα. Τότες πάω αμέσως στο δικό μου δωμάτιο και πέφτω σαν πεθαμένος στο κρεβάτι μου. Αποκοιμούμαι κατά στις 4:00 μ.μ., βάζω το κεφάλι μου κάτω από τη βρύση να δροσιστώ λίγο, πίνω ένα καφέ, και κάθομαι ξανά στο γραφείο. Η απογευματινή θητεία βαστάει μέχρι στις 7:30, όπου αρχίζει να σκοτεινιάζει ο ουρανός, και βγαίνουν και τα κουνούπια. Σχολάζω τότε, βάζω πανταλόνια και πουκάμισο, και βγαίνω έξω στο καφενείο να πω ένα ουζάκι με «περιποιημένους» μεζέδες. Κάθε βράδυ κάνουμε και το περίπατό μας με τη Χρυσάνθη. Ξαπλώνω πάλι, κάποτε διαβάζω λίγο Proust στο κρεβάτι, ως που με παίρνει ο ύπνος.

Η επεξεργασία πάει καλά. Η γλώσσα του Μυριβήλη έχει λυρικά στοιχεία, σαρκαστικά στοιχεία, ωραιότατες περιγραφές, κ.τ.λ. Με σπρώχνει να βρω τη σωστή απόδοση στ' αγγλικά.

Έν τω μεταξύ πήγα δυο φορές στη Θεσσαλονίκη, ταχυδρόμισα τις μεμβράνες που είχα δακτυλογραφήσει, ετοίμασα το υπόλοιπο του κειμένου, το παράδωσα στις δυο κοπέλλες που βρήκαμε στην Ελληνική Βιομηχανία Σακχάρειας, αγόρασα ταινίες, έφερα σπίτι μας το μαγνητόφωνο του Θέμη. Ηχογραφήσαμε κιόλας το μισό του βιβλίου. Έτσι οι δουλιές προχωρούν.

Προχτές με ειδοποίησε η Mary Rassias ότι έλαβε τις μεμβράνες και θ' αρχίσει αμέσως η πολυγραφία. Καταντήσαμε εκδότες!

Έφυγαν οι Άλτες, αλλά θα ξανελθούν και σήμερα για το Σαββατοκύριακο. Περπατήσαμε ένα βράδυ με τον κύριο Μανώλη, που είναι δικηγόρος και βοηθός στο πανεπιστήμιο. Μου διήγησε τα χάλια των πανεπιστημίων, που σχεδόν δεν λειτουργούν πια, ένεκεν στερήσεως προσωπικών. Δεν υπάρχουν καθηγηταί. Όλοι ή παύτηκαν ή φύγανε μο-ναχοί τους. Στη θέση τους έβαλαν οι αρχές ανθρώπους που δεν αξίζουν και που δεν μπορούν να κάνουν διδασκαλία. Άλλωστε έχουν πνίξει οι συνταγματάρχηδες την οικονομική τις χώρας. Κάνουν πολλά δημόσια έργα για να δουλεύουν οι εργάτες, αλλά δεν έχουν τα χρήματα που χρειάζονται. Επομένως βγάζουν ομολογίες που οι δημόσιοι υπάλληλοι είναι αναγκασμένοι να αγοράσουν. Κι η κυβέρνηση και ο κόσμος ζει από δάνεια. Πάει να πει ότι τα επιφανιακά πλούτη που μπορεί να τα παρατηρήσει ο ξένος επισκέπτης δεν έχουν βάση—είναι όλα φεύτικα. Αυτή η κατάσταση μπορεί να βαστάξει για κάμποσον καιρό, αλλά δε γίνεται να βαστάξει για πάντα. Σιγά-σιγά θ' αρχίσει ο πληθορισμός, ώσπου να πέσει το κράτος σε μιαν κρίση οικονομική. Έτσι λέει ο κύριος Μανώλης. Ο δε Γεώργος, πάλι, ισχυρίζεται το αντίθετο. Λέει αυτός ότι η κυβέρνηση έχει λεφτά, γιατί φορολογούνται τώρα όλοι οι πολίτες, ενώ πριν οι πλούσιοι εύβρισκαν χίλιους τρόπους να αποφύγουν τις υποχρεώσεις τους. Ποιος ξέρει;

Χτές βράδυ γιόρτασε ο παπάς του χωριού και πήγαμε στο σπίτι το να του πούμε «χρόνια πολλά». Ένα ωραιότατο σπιτάκι, πλούσια επιπλωμένο, μα χωρίς επιφάνιση. Μάθαμε λίγο για την ιστορία του χωριού. Οι κάτοικοι είναι όλοι προσφύγες από το Μάλ-τεπε της Κωνσταντινιπόλεως. Ήταν στην αρχή τρακόσιες οικογένειες μα πολλές απ' αυτές έφυγαν αμέσως για τη Θεσσαλονίκη επειδή ήταν εμπορικές οικογένειες και δεν μπόρεσαν ν' αρχίσουν μιαν αγροτική ζωή. Πριν έλθουν, δηλαδή πριν από το 1922, όλα τα χωράφια γύρω-γύρω ανήκανε στη μονή του Αγίου Πανσελείμμος. Ο Βενιζέλος, για να δώσει γη στους πρόσφυγες, πήρε τα χωράφια αυτά από το μοναστήρι, που δεν μπορούσε πια να συνεχίσει, και διαλύθηκε. Γι' αυτό δεν υπάρχει πια το μοναστήρι. Μιλήσαμε και για τις αρχαιότητες που βρέθηκαν εδώ. Οι αρχαιολόγοι ήξεραν ότι πρέπει να υπάρχει εδώ ένα ναό του Άμμωνος Διός, γιατί αναφέρεται στις αρχαίες ιστορίες. Όλο το μέρος αυτό έπαιζε σημαντικό ρόλο στ' αρχαία χρόνια. Η Ποτίδεια, που την κρατούσαν αποικία οι Αθηναίοι, ήταν η αφορμή του Πελοποννησιακού Πολέμου. Η Άθυτος (δίπλα μας είναι η Νέα Άθυτος) ήταν αρχαία πόλις, επίσης η Όλυνθος. Ήταν πάντα σημάδια εδώ του αρχαίου ναού. Όταν ήλθαν όμως οι μοναχοί από το Άγιον Όρος να στήσουν μετόχι εδώ, πήραν τις πετρες και τις έβαλαν στα δικά τους κτίρια. Άλλες τις κουβάλησαν στο Όρος. Έτσι δεν απόμειναν παρά τα θεμέλια, τα οποία με το καιρό σκεπάστηκαν. Τώρα τελευταία, όταν έσκαβαν να θεμιλίσουν το καινούργιο ξενοδοχείο, έτυχαν να ανακαλύ-ψουν αυτά τα αρχαία θεμέλια του ναού του Άμμωνος Διός. Έβαλαν το ξενοδοχείο λίγο παράμερο, και άρχισαν τις ανασκαφές.

Ο Λέανδρος βρήκε παρέα. Τότε πλησίασαν μια μέρα μερικά παιδιά, αγόρια και κορίτσια της ηλικίας του, που ήθελαν να μιλήσουν αγγλικά. Από τότες πια, είναι αξεχώριστοι. Κάνουν τα μπάνια μαζί, παίζουν ποδόσφαιρο, σεργιάζουν, πίνουν τις πορτοκαλάδες τους, βάλουν πλάκες στα κέντρα να χορέψουν, κάθονται στο σπίτι να μιλήσουν, κ.τ.λ. Είναι μια μεγάλη παρέα από τη Θεσσαλονίκη και την Αθήνα. Έχουν τα παιδιά δικά τους σπίτια εδώ και έρχονται κάθε καλοκαίρι. Έχουν και τον παππού και τη γιαγιά τους, που κατάγονται από το χωριό αυτό. Έτσι έχουν χωράφια, καλαμπόκια, μποτσάνια, αμπέλια—όλα τα αγαθά. Ο παππούς κάνει δικό του ούζο, λάδι, ψωμί. Πήγα προχτές η Χρυσάνθη και τους βρήκε μαζεμένους στου παππού το σπίτι, εκεί που έψηναν ένα λαγό πάνω στη φωτιά. Ο Λέανδρος είναι μέσα στη χαρά του. Εμείς όμως δεν τον βλέπομε πια. Φεύγει μαζί τους το πρωί, γυρίζει το μεσημέρι να τιμπήσει κάτι, χωρίς πολλή όρεξη, ξαπλώνεται, φεύγει ξανά, έρχεται πολύ αργά να κοιμηθεί. Και δεν κλείνει μάτι. Είναι όλος αναστατωμένος. Πολύ ευαίσθητο παιδί είναι, δεν είναι ήσυχο πλάσμα καθόλου. Είναι τόσο χαρούμενος που βρήκε παρέα, έτοιμος είναι να αρρωστήσει. Περίεργο!

Να αλλάξω κουβένα, πρέπει να σημειώσω εδώ πόσο χαίρουμαι που ξαναδιαβάζω το Proust. Μπήκα στο βιβλίο—είναι ο τελευταίος τόμος—σαν να έμπαινα σ' ένα κόσμο πολύ γνωστό, που τον είχα επιθυμήσει για πολύν καιρό. Τι έξοχη γλώσσα! Τι ωραία μετάφραση (διαβάζω την καινούργια μετάφραση, από το οριστικό κείμενο). Τι οξύτατες περιγραφές ανθρώπων και τοπίων! Τι αφοσίωση στην ομορφιά και στην τέχνη, δηδ. στους μόνους παράγοντες της ζωής που μπορούν να αποκτήσουν μian «αιώνια» αξία. Μα φλυαρώ. Είχα σκοπό σήμερα το πρωί να δακτυλογραφήσω τις επεξεργασμένες σελίδες του Μυριβήλη. Μπρός! Δουλειά!

August 20, 1971

I think I have discovered why Greeks talk so much. It is to keep them from having to think.

1972

---

Hanover	January 1–June 16
Riparius	June 16–September 1
Hanover	September 1–December 31

1973

---

Hanover	January 1–June 16
Riparius	June 16–September 3
Hanover	September 3–December 31

1974

---

Hanover	Jan. 1–June 15
Riparius	June 15–September 1
Hanover, Niagara Falls, Oberlin, Riparius, Hanover	Sept. 1–6
Hanover	September 7–December 31

July 7, 1973

Riparius

I am despondent and self-critical for two reasons: (1) I am reading George Giannaris's book on Theodorakis, and cannot help but see my own lack of energy, cowardice, compromise, and comfort, compared to a man like Theodorakis; (2) a small incident last night confirmed to me my constitutional meanness. We went to Schroon Lake with Jacques and Hilda Grunblatt to see a performance by Indian dancers. Afterwards we went to a bar to have a beer. The "barmaid," a harridan of middle age with a body like a prizefighter's, was first very slow in serving us, and then got the order completely wrong. I reacted with feelings of self-righteous scorn for her but Dr. Grunblatt, as naturally as Leopold Bloom, said, both to me and to her, "It's been a hot day," which it had: 90 degrees in the shade. He was naturally, nonchalantly compassionate. I was not. (One could develop the resemblances between Grunblatt and Bloom.)

Nice visit over the weekend by Noye, Dee, and Ann Johnson.

July 15, 1973

To Kinhaven with parents and Dick and Irene (Frowenfeld). Leander played beautifully a Piston sonata. For the first time I had a sense that he could go ahead professionally. He played with sureness and grace. Alec was a little stiff (in his playing, not his personality) and timid, but did much better the second time round when he was second fiddle in the Mozart Dissident quartet. Both boys are flourishing. Afterwards: supper with Rachael Steuermann and David Ostwald included. Vast damage from floods in Weston and Londonderry.

July 16, 1973

Reading Mary Gianos's translation of Dimaras's History. Translation scandalously bad. Letter yesterday from Stangos. Ritsos and Alvarez both like my revised introduction. Δόξα σοι ο Θεός!

I love these lines by Palamas, in the collection Οι Λύκοι):

Τα πάντα αν περνούν, θα περάσει κ' εκείνη.
Ειρήνη σ' εφέ και γαλήνη!

Also these lines from the poem «Αριστοτέλης Βαλαωρίτης» in the collection Δειλούς και σκληρούς στίχους:

Με φέρνει υψώνοντες ο γοής χορός των εκατό σου χρόνων εκεί όπου φλοίσβος μουσικός γίνεται ο βόγγος των αγώνων, στών ποιητών και στων ηρώων τους παραδείσιους κόσμους, όπου δε φτάνει ο πόνος κι ο δαρμός ο πολυτάραχος του ανθρώπου.

There is also a touching, heartfelt sonnet of excellent technique by Γεράσιμος Μακοράς in Dimaras's History σελ. 422, called «Δύο» and addressed by the childless poet to his childless sister as they both can "look forward" to nothing but death. The last, bitter, tercet is:

Αχ! την ημέρα πού και τούτη πάψει, αν ένα μόνο δάκρυ ο κόσμος βγάλει, το ζωτανόν, όχι τον άλλο, ας κλάψη.

July 18, 1973

I am reading Linos Politis's History of Modern Greek Literature, which is interestingly different from Dimaras's. He cites some graceful, and wise, verses from the Ερωτόκριτος (885-888):

Απ' ό,τι κάλλη έχει άθρωπος, τα λόγια 'χουν τη χάρη να κάνουνσι κάθε καρδιά παρηγοριά να πάρη, κι οπού κατέχει να μιλή με γνώση και με τρόπο, κάνει και κλαίσι και γελούν τα μάτια των αθρώπων.

July 23, 1973

Extraordinary: a man was murdered on Waddell Road, near Route 8 (thank God). The police found his body this morning, in the declivity on the western side of the road, knifed to death. This all began last Sunday when, on the way to Kinhaven, we noticed a car parked in the road. We concluded that it was someone fishing in the stream and thought nothing more, but it was still there when we returned late that night. I didn't go out on Monday, but when we went out on Tuesday to go supper in Montcalm South, the car was still there, and I began to worry lest the man got lost in the woods. Returning from Lake George we took the license plate and called the police. Next day (Wednesday) they had traced the plate and discovered that the car belonged to a young man who had gone off for the weekend with his girlfriend. They were expected back on Sunday night but of course had not returned. On Thursday an airplane cruised the area. On Friday scores of troopers and forest rangers searched the woods, discovering the body of the male but no trace of the girl. Today (Saturday) they've been using bloodhounds but still have not found anything further. The speculation is twofold: (a) the girl killed him and took off; (b) they had picked up a hitchhiker, who killed the boy and either made off with the girl or killed her too. Nothing like this has ever happened before on Waddell Road!

July 24, 1973

À propos: Kimon Friar, in his introduction to Modern Greek Poetry (p. 67), which I am now reading with just admiration, quotes a statement by Seferis, presumably in his essay comparing Cavafy and T. S. Eliot. Both poets, says Seferis, warn us "not to be self-satisfied, not to fool ourselves with the belief that our life, our tidy and calculated life, is somehow out of reach of the spectacular and terrible." Personally, I have continually felt that my life has been so charmed, thus far, so extraordinarily lucky and blessed that some great extraordinary catastrophe must be lurking in ambush, ready to pounce.

July 25, 1973

W. H. Auden, in "Eros and Agape," The Nation, CLII, June 28, 1941, p. 757 (cited in Lillian Feder, Ancient Myth in Modern Poetry, Princeton 1971, p. 346): Eros is “the basic will to self-actualization without which no creature can exist and Agape is that Eros mutated by Grace, a conversion, not an addition, the Law fulfilled, not the Law destroyed.”

July 28, 1973

I'm reading, finally, the essays that Christos wrote for his B'ham B.A., right now the second essay on Sikelianos. On p. 134 he quotes Varnalis's devastating attack on the Delphic Idea, as a retreat from reality into a vague occultism, and speaks of other kinds of retreats in a way that hits me as well, and that I feel (the quote is from the original source, Varnalis's Αισθητικά-Κριτικά Β', 1958, σελ. 236-240): Αυτή η φυγή είν' η μόνη σωτηρία των αδύνατων ανθρώπων. Ο ένας λαχταρά να φύγει από τον κόσμο και ν' απομονωθεί σε μιάν ερημιά «καλλιερμώντας το κήπο του» [that's me!], ο άλλος το ρίχνει στον έρωτα και στο κρασί, ο άλλος στον πεσσιμισμό, κι ο άλλος στη μαγεία. Ο καθένας φεύγει από τον αγώνα της ζωής . . . Varnalis's own ideals are also clear: Ο άνθρωπος που κρατιέται γερά από την πραγματικότητα κι αγωνίζεται μέσα σ' αυτήν για την κατάκτησή της με οδηγό την επιστήμη, είναι ο άνθρωπος της προόδου κι ωφέλιμος στους άλλους . . .

1974

January 4, 1974

Forster on Mr. Fielding in Passage to India (p. 191, chapter xx): “After forty years' experience, he had learnt to manage his life and make the best of it on advanced European lines, had developed his personality, explored his limitations, controlled his passions—and he had done it all without becoming either pedantic or worldly.”

At the MLA in Chicago last week we interviewed a candidate, Melissa Cannon, who recited the whole of “Lapis Lazuli” to us and wept in the middle, after which she composed herself beautifully. We were all impressed with her (Gaylord, Epperson, Terrie, Walker) not only because of this but because of her general excellence. But Blanche Gelfant objected, saying that she misinterpreted the poem, the point of which is that we must not weep. What Blanche failed to recognize was that the girl wept, I'm sure, not because she thought the poem sad but because she thought it beautiful.

January 5, 1974

¶ Men yearn for poetry though they may not confess it; they desire that joy shall be graceful and sorrow august and infinity have a form. (Passage to India, p. 211, ch. xxiv.)

¶ It was . . . the old, old trouble that eats the heart out of every civilization: snobbery, the desire for possessions, credible appendages, and it is to escape this rather than the lusts of the flesh that saints retreat into the Himalayas. (Ibid., p. 241, ch. xxvi.)

¶ It's only one's own dead who matter. . . . How indeed is it possible for one human being to be sorry for all the sadness that meets him on the face of the earth, for the pain that is endured not only by men, but by animals and plants, and perhaps by the stones? The soul is tired in a moment, and in fear of losing the little she does understand, she retreats to the permanent lines which habit or chance have dictated, and suffers there. (Ibid., pp. 247–248, ch. xxvi.)

Forster says in Passage (somewhere) that only the East knows leisure; the West knows only Work or idleness.

¶ The Mediterranean is the human norm. When men leave that exquisite lake, whether through the Bosphorus or the Pillars of Hercules, they approach the monstrous and extraordinary . . . (Ibid., p. 282, ch. xxxii.)

January 7, 1974

Marlow in "Heart of Darkness" (p. 529): "No, I don't like work. I had rather laze about and think of all the fine things that can be done. I don't like work—no man does—but I like what is in the work, the chance to find yourself. Your own reality—for yourself, not for others—what no other man can ever know."

January 23, 1974

Most extraordinary dream just before I awoke. I was walking along a dirt road with someone, and suddenly we came across a small, shack-like house. My companion told me that Nietzsche lived there, and sure enough as I looked in (the front was an enclosed sun porch), there he was at a table in the corner, writing. I nodded and waved to him, in homage, whereupon he began to sing at me, loudly, with an inscrutable smile, like Godbole.

Conrad is so terribly relentless. Here he is on love—the love of young people and of old, speaking of Dr. Monygham's late-flowering love for Mrs. Gould (in Nostromo, p. 573, part iii, chapter xi): ". . . With the utter absorption of a man to whom love comes late, not as a most splendid of illusions but like an enlightening and priceless misfortune . . ."

I've been reading again this term. It's nice. So far: A Passage to India, Aspects of the Novel, "Youth," "Typhoon," "Heart of Darkness," "The Secret Sharer," Nostromo—my entire course!

Daniel Carson is driving me insane. Now he has stopped work again. Really, he has no interest in doing his novel, and is simply paralyzed by his own arrogance and neuroticism. For me, alas, this might mean denying him his Dartmouth degree. What a way to end after so many years, and with probably the brightest student we've had here!

Leonard Rieser approached me recently, asking me to submit my name as a candidate for the Third-Century Professorship in the Humanities. I have no real interest in doing so, but will probably let myself be directed by this aspect of fate, in the flabby expectation that fate can mold my life better than I can myself. Weakness, utter weakness.

Leander was accepted to Oberlin Conservatory. He said that the feeling he experienced afterwards—i.e., after the period of waiting—was not really glee or even self-confidence, but rather a kind of delightful emptiness, as after the discharge of a large, overdue bowel movement. His fate is taking form, also.

Lovely music last night. Lewis, Allan, Alec, and myself. We played Schubert's "Adagio and Rondo," something very romantic by Bruch, and parts of the Brahms piano quartet. Imagine!

I find the extraordinary omission in this Journal of the ten days in which Christos visited me last November: here, then in New York for the MGSA symposium, then back here (with Mario Vitti in tow), then back to New York again for the demonstration at the Chrystal Palace in Astoria for Hatziemmanuel. My goodness, we talked continually, five or six hours on end, without stopping. The tragedy that man bears (the two children, defective and hopeless) is almost unthinkable. We made plans for the future: collaboration on a second volume of Demotic Greek, and a joint effort to publish an anthology, with translations, apparatus, and introduction, of δηοτικά τραγούδια.

The Journal of Byzantine and Modern Greek Studies is now a reality, since we've signed the contract with Blackwell's. Nicol is editor, I am co-editor, and the board is Sherrard, Bryer, and Clogg in England, Keeley, Petropulos and Vryonis here.

Here is a fitting motto for any teacher: “Our daily work must be done to the glory of the dead, and for the good of those who come after.” (Conrad, Nostromo, p. 582, end of part iii, chapter xi, thought by Mrs. Gould.)

May 28, 1974

I was elected Geisel Third Century Professor in the Humanities. Strange.

July 9, 1974

Riparius

Ο Δημόκριτος κατά τον Διογένη τον Λαέρτιο σ' ένα βασικό του ηθικό απόφθεγμα γράφει: «Σκοπός της ζωής είναι η χαρά, όχι όμως η χαρά της ηδονής αλλά εκείνη που γεμίζει την ψυχή του ανθρώπου με γαλήνη και ηρεμία, που πραγματοποιείται όταν ο άνθρωπος δεν κατέχεται από φόβο, δεισιδαιμονία, ή άλλο πάθος.» (Νίκος Πολιόπουλος, Ο Νίκος Καζαντζάκης και τα παγκόσμια ιδεολογικά ρεύματα, σελ. 212.)

My new (old!) Steinway upright has its problems. My old piano was tuned too low for the flute. This one was tuned too high. So, with Al Zalan's appearance imminent, I let necessity energize me into a new skill: piano tuning. I lowered all 200+ strings so that A = 440. The result was horrendous, but we played anyway. The next morning I attempted the “fine tuning” with much better results, and we played again, with much pleasure. In my old age here is a new profession.

Yiayia and Pappou here, with Lori and David Buseck, two lovely children. Alec is back at Kinhaven. Leander is a junior counselor at Camp Timberlake and loving it.

July 10, 1974

¶ Ο αγώνας του ανθρώπου της εποχής μας . . . δεν είναι απλώς οικονομικός. Η οικονομική χειραφέτηση είναι μονάχα μέσο για της ψυχική και πνευματική χειραφέτηση του ανθρώπου. (Καζαντζάκης, «Απολογία», 400 Γράμματα σελ. 227 [?], cited in Pouliopoulos, p. 235.)

Evening. Extraordinary ballet: Prokofiev's “Prodigal Son”: so sparse and moving in Balanchine's version, which all seven of us saw at Saratoga together with Webern's “Episodes” (in one part, he orchestrates a six-part fugue from Bach's “Musical Offering”) and the ever-exciting “Firebird.” In the afternoon we watched the rehearsal: bare bones, with all costumes, scenery, and orchestral color subtracted.

July 11, 1974

Something always to remember, although it seems so simply and obvious: Kazantzakis's definition of saving our soul: να τη σπαταλήσ[ουμε] για ένα ανώτερο σκοπό (Ισπανία, σελ. 53, talking about Don Quixote and Saint Teresa).

July 15, 1974

Kazantzakis's definition of God is also striking in its simplicity: ο Θεός, δηλαδή . . . η απόλυτη ελευτερία. (Report to Greco, σελ. 547.)

Repaired the pump. The leathers had worn out and I had to purchase an entire new cylinder because of stripped threads. Riggered up a scaffolding and used a fence stretcher as hoist, which made the procedure much easier and safer than 10-12 years ago, when we simply lifted the whole rig, all 25 feet of it, upwards out of the well.

We decided to spend next Summer Term (26 April–12 July) at Woodbrooke, preceded by five or six weeks in Greece. Μακάρι να γίνει!

Surprise visit from Tom Wilson and son and a friend, who had just climbed Marcy and were returning to Love Lane, Lake Pleasant.

July 16, 1974

¶ “Le problème, a dit Malraux, pour un agnostique comme moi, c'est qu'il semble que l'homme ne puisse pas vivre sans une transcendance.” Je pense qu' aucune question ne concerne plus directement Kazantzaki qui n'a cessé de rechercher et de rejeter tous à tour une transcendance comme nous l'avons vu. (Marie-Louise Bidal-Baudier, Nikos Kazantzaki: comment l'homme devient immortel, p. 204.)

July 17, 1974

Our nineteenth anniversary. I gave Chrysanthi some colorful slippers, which she liked.

July 18, 1974

It's clear—as if it weren't clear before!—that my two loves are language and music. How thrilling to sit under my tree reading French again, and Greek. And how pleasant to sight-read Schubert sonatas last night (mauling them, of course), on the piano. This had been professionally tuned yesterday morning. It is still not without problems, twangs and the like, but playable. The tuner of course thought I had been terribly cheated. “You paid for the name.” The piano was manufactured in 1900!

July 24, 1974

Vassilis Vassilikos wrote from Paris asking me to translate his novel Ο μονάρχης in time for the English edition to coincide with the release of the film by Costa Gravas. Attractive. But I read the novel, which was really valueless as literature, and had nothing truly to do with Greece. A commercial undertaking probably written, even beforehand, with cinematographic possibilities in mind. I was tempted: the money (maybe), a chance to collaborate with Vassilikos, a foot in the door of that glamorous world of the cinema, etc. But Chrysanthi was firm: Don't waste your time with other people's work, and third-rate work at that! Do your own work! Κοντολογίς, I refused.

July 26, 1974

A lovely day. Leander arrived last night with his friend Todd Engstrom, a fellow counselor at Timberlake, and an expert on birds, trees, and wildlife. This very impressive youngster instructed us in all kinds of wonders this morning as we hiked about five miles through the woods on the Baker property: that a torn twig of yellow birch smells like wintergreen, for example. We saw bear droppings and tracks, deer tracks, elderberries, ironwood, basswood. I learned the difference between striped maple and other varieties, and that what we've been calling salamanders are really newts. We returned, plunged into the pond to refresh ourselves, piled into the car and drove, all of us, to Kinhaven, where Alec was concertmaster in an Ives' piece of great interest, and then played superbly in the Haydn piano quartet, with a force, authority, and virtuosity entirely new to him. Colin has been teaching him how to transfer the weight of his arm to the bow, with good results. We took Alec out to dinner on this lovely occasion (also his birthday is on the 29th) with Larry Morse and another violinist and strikingly good looking boy going next year to Queens College, Philip T—. Then back home, with Manon Price who'll spend the week with Daphne. Chrysanthi was ecstatic at Alec's playing and rightfully so. He was very impressive indeed.

Several days ago Gizikis handed the Greek government over to the politicians and Karamanlis returned. End to dictatorship, and so suddenly. Chrysanthi wept copiously at the vision of the imprisoned returning to Piraeus to be reunited with their families. We all wished we could have been in Greece at that moment of ecstatic joy. Η Ελλάδα ανέστη!

August 10, 1974

Something to remember in these days when everyone is scrambling for a higher salary: Όποιος δε βρίσκει την ανταμοιβή μέσα του είναι σκλάβος. (Καζαντζάκη Αγγλία, σελ. 146 quoting a Tibetan ascetic.)

Last Sunday, August 4th, another lovely concert at Kinhaven. Alec did a Krenek trio. We also picked up Leander at Timberlake and all had supper at Echo Lake Inn. Leander played in the F & W string band (!) for folk dancing in Hanover; also concerts in Newbury and (today) on the green at Weston. At our trustees' meeting I offered the F & W paradigm and said I'd push for quicker transfer of the Dushkins' property to the School, endowment notwithstanding. Francis Cabot asked to step down as chairman, which is good, because he's been too busy with other things to give the proper attention to this. J. Malcolm Forbes took over.

So much needs doing at the farm: stove wood for next winter, pruning, fixing up a new dry well, haying, the garden, finishing the mowing, replacing rotted boards on the porch, paneling the anti-room. What first?

I'm amazed that I've made no mention in this journal of the three-day visit paid us on May 13, 14, 15 by Eleni Kazantzaki. We picked her up at Logan airport and drove home for supper with Stelios, Dimitris, Nikos and our family. She got into a strong argument with Nikos Nikolaïdis over Cyprus, he being anti-Makarios. Then a student came from the "D" to do an interview, and things sweetened. Oh how she talked, how we all talked, continuously from 4:00 in the afternoon until midnight. The next day Chrysanthi took her around, especially to Daphne's school. I took her to lunch with Gary Sutherland, who'd come all the way from Virginia for the occasion. Then an interview broadcast alive on WRCR. She did splendidly; she always deprecated her English, which is excellent. A tour through the Hop, walk home, a few minutes' rest for both of us (she was less worn out than I was), then lots of people at home. She particularly enjoyed David Martin, who told her about his prison experiences. In the midst of this, Daphne got bit by a dog. So while Chrysanthi gallantly continued to play hostess, I rushed to the emergency room of the hospital. Quiet supper. Then Mrs. K's lecture in Filene, which was filled nearly to capacity. I introduced her, speaking of the true collaboration between her and Nikos. She spoke of his quest for freedom. Not a terribly good talk, really, but authenticated by the personality behind it.

Afterwards, all the questions—and there were plenty—were on politics. She laid it into the audience: You're young. Why don't you do something? Why do you accept injustice and killing? Shame on you! Leonard Rieser told me afterwards, "Fine! Just what they needed!" She was also very open about her adoration of Mao and China; she had recently returned. Then to International Center for refreshments and more questions and discussion until midnight again. The next day we returned to Boston. On arrival, previously, she had said she'd heard that the Museum of Fine Arts had a fine Chinese collection, so we all went there. After a while I got museum feet, but Mrs. K. marched indefatigably from hall to hall commenting learnedly on all the exhibits. At 4:00 p.m. we rushed to the airport and saw her off. She had exhausted both of us for three entire days, yet seemed tireless herself. And I remember her saying to me once, "Nikos exhausted me. I can't understand where he got all that energy."

August 14, 1974

Among the many brilliant observations of Helène Cixous' book on Joyce, many of which go far beyond the narrow subject of Joyce or indeed of literature, is this: Why do so poor, desperately poor, families have so many children? It's because children in large numbers are their only riches. They can "acquire" children—nothing else. (p. 24.)

August 15, 1974

If we were a myth-making nation we would soon create a legend, or even a cycle of them, out of the fall of Richard Nixon. It would be a kind of obverse of the Parnell legend created by the Irish. But we are not a myth-making nation, nor even an artistic one, and Nixon will find neither his mythifier nor his Shakespeare.

August 17, 1974

The perfect epigraph (or epitaph?) for my forthcoming English Composition Resource Center: "I fear that we cannot rid ourselves of the notion of God, because we still believe in grammar." Nietzsche (encountered by chance in Cixous, p. 330).

Afternoon: to Timberlake for their annual Fair, a most ambitious and imaginative affair with homemade Ferris wheels, dunking stools, crazy rides, food stands, dancing, etc., all ruined by a continuous downpour. They persevered, all drenched to the skin (literally to the skin because many had little else on except their skin). Leander was justifiably morose, having just served for two hours in the rain, when we arrived.

On to Weston for the final weekend. Alec played 2nd violin in the Brahms clarinet quintet. Very musical and fine. Philip did the Dumky, but not as excitingly as Alyce Coguetta, John Richmond, and Leander did it several years ago. A girl approached me in wonderment. "Are you Professor Bien? . . . Peter Bien? . . . The Peter Bien?" "Ah, yes." "I studied Greek from your textbook!" "Λοιπόν, μιλάς ελληνικά;" "Ναι," whereupon she explained to me, in very good Greek, that she had just finished a year at College Year in Athens. How nice! I conspired a little with various trustees.

August 18, 1974

Very spirited playing of the Academic Festival Overture and of course the concluding Bach motet was so touching. Back home at 6:00 with Alec. I began immediately repairing the mower. For supper we had our first corn. Delicious! Pappou and Yiayia spent the weekend with us.

August 19, 1974

Joyce (Critical Writings, p. 205): ". . . the truth inherent in the soul of Catholicism: that man cannot reach the divine heart except through that sense of separation and loss called sin."

August 20, 1974

Five hours' haying in the hot sun. Followed by delicious swim, leisurely supper, playing a Mozart sonata with Alec, bed.

August 26, 1974

This place has been suddenly transformed into a conservatory. Leander returned last night bringing Tom Miller, and right now (10:00 a.m.) Leander is practicing the piano in the living room, Tom is practicing the bassoon in the guest house, and Alec is practicing the violin in the barn. Daphne is despondent because she can't practice the piano simultaneously. How warm and lively Leander is compared to Alec.

August 28, 1974

Yesterday we cut several dozen trees, among those that I girded last year in the thinning operation. The boys dragged them to the path, helped by Tom Miller. Today I skidded them out with the tractor and we began sawing them up for firewood. Very satisfying work.

John Tallmadge arrived with one-third of his work-in-progress, a book on his experiences in the Sierras. He read to us last night the opening poem on the estuary, and several prose sections: the first week, an encounter with pseudo nature-lovers, etc. How nice to hear language so well used! I exhorted him, as I have so many times in the past, to muster up the willpower to finish!

The University Press of New England might publish Life in the Tomb. Nothing sure yet, but it looks good.

Harrowing letter from Christos, who is still delinquent with his general article for the Columbia Dictionary. The situation with the children has driven Meg into such hysteria, bitterness, self-hatred, etc. that she lashes out at Pavlos violently and also at Christos, so that the marriage is foundering. At the same time, Meg reacts with increased professional zeal, neglecting the children for her research, writing, for lectures, classes, etc., so that a disproportionate amount of the burden falls on Christos. Poor man! Such a tragedy, all because of that utterly stupid incident whereby oxygen was not available in the delivery room. If only the children had died in infancy! Now they are an inexorable curse, all the more so because Christos refuses to consider them a curse.

December 10, 1974

The first University Seminar met with Roger Masters speaking on moral and legal implications of psychosurgery. A very stimulating evening, bringing together medical school people, psychiatrists, and engineer, sociologist, literary scholars, etc. After it, I took the train to New York.

December 11, 1974

Observed a fine class at the American Language Project, Columbia. Richard Faust remembered me from "the old days." Then lunched at the faculty club with Mary Dobbie and Dan Dobson. He remembered sitting on my Ph.D. defense on L. P. Hartley. Amazing! Mrs. Dobbie the same as always. She showed me round her tutorial center, and gave me lots of ideas for Dartmouth's equivalent. Then on to Professor James Gutmann and Mrs. Mayer of the University Seminars, he a venerable gentleman, classmate of Jonathan Mirsky's father, she a German (refugee?) who runs the show, really. They were so proud of Tannenbaum, the founder, who obviously left something to be remembered by.

December 12, 1974

Off to CCNY to observe Mina Shaughnessy's excellent program. She was most gracious to Bill Cook and me throughout the day. We observed two classes, a teachers' meeting, the tutorial center, and lunched with Prof. Quinn, the chairman. I then took Bill Cook home to 20 East 74th for dinner.

December 14, 1974

A day of cultural feasting. Spent the morning at the Metropolitan Museum seeing the centenary exhibit dedicated to Impressionism. Marvelous placards throughout enable one even without the catalogue to understand what Impressionism was as a movement, what it was fighting, what success and failure it had. Then to Lincoln Center. First lunch with Steve Scher and wife in O'Neal's Pub, opposite the Dante statue. Then to the Met to hear Benjamin Britten's Death in Venice with Peter Pears, and Brian Pitts as Tadzio. In the intermission had a fine reunion with Herb Wekselblatt, whose tuba played the "cholera" leitmotif throughout. Herb said he did it so well that his colleagues assured him that they all felt sick! Virginia died about one and a half years ago (I knew this, of course) and Herb is managing. The Britten opera was a feast of beauty: music, literature, décor, and especially ballet, all amalgamated. Brian Pitts as Tadzio was Beauty itself: one begins to realize why the Greeks extolled the ἔφηβος. The nuances—e.g., Tadzio taking the posture of Michelangelo's Adam on the Sistine ceiling—were sophisticated. The whole was on the highest level of artistic endeavor, yet readily "available" to the audience, and a mixture of thought and feeling each abetting the other. Mann would have approved. . . . AMTRAK back to Hanover, arriving at 4:30 a.m. Sunday.

December 15, 1974

At Meeting, reunion with Bill Symonds, back from Oxford to go for job interviews as a journalist. 5:00 p.m. to Heffernans'. Nice talk with Boghosian, whose dealer is in the Parke-Bernet Galleries building near 74th Street. Symonds already insufferably conceited. How easily people delude themselves. I was dumbfounded when I read his account of his clarinet playing in his vita, since I had actually heard him. He can't play at all. Now he's ready to start at the top: New York Times or Washington Post.

December 21, 1974

To Boston: Goya prints in the Museum of Fine Arts. Marvelous Picassos. More Monets to flesh out last week's Impressionism exhibit, including Rouen Cathedral and some water lilies. But I most love Picasso's series on the bull, starting realistically and going by stages to just a line here, a line there. The Goya views of the Peninsula War are horrifying. Men are incredible beasts. No, beasts don't deserve that appellation; they are better.

Afternoon and evening with MGSA: business meeting in Philips Brooks House, then executive committee meeting at Parthenon restaurant. I spoke at length with Mrs. Koumanianou, who was discouraging about money being available, although Nicolopoulos continued to encourage. He is a faker, though. He told me to write to Mr. Feather at Blackwell's to say that the Greek government would purchase numerous copies of BMGS. Feather responded, writing also to Trypanis, to the British Embassy, etc. I asked John what he had written back. "Oh, I didn't write back," he said. "Why not?" "O, Trypanis or someone will write back." Φρίκη! . . . We planned another seminar, in California; also worried a lot (too much) about Julia Loomis's amour proper. . . . Scary drive back, amidst snow flurries. I arrived at 2:00 a.m.

December 24, 1974

To New York for Christmas and MLA.

December 26, 1974

Saw the new production of Tennessee Williams's Cat on a Hot Tin Roof. Very compelling story of a ne'er-do-well alcoholic who actually is the only moral person in the cast.

December 27, 1974

Equus, by Peter Shafer. Better than Hunt of the Sun because it takes the same concerns and applies them to a realistic situation. Beautiful mixture of stark realism and ultimate stylization. Also a successful blending of thought and feeling. Themes are universal ones: guilt, evil, temptation, sexuality, maturation, pagan versus Christian.

I met Allan Brick at MLA and had lunch with him. After a decade in the peace movement (AFSC, FOR, etc.) he rejoined the teaching profession by winning a job from 800 other applicants to direct freshman English at Hunter. Daughter Pamela goes to Oberlin. Full of humane and practical ideas about teaching. Also met Willis Barnstone finally. Very self-effacing. I had expected someone aggressive, I don't know why. He has a Greek wife. Poulakidis was there, looking middle-aged. Five years ago he was a youngster. Mike Keeley liked my Ritsos introduction.

December 28, 1974

Ballet: Nureyev in Apollo. The best was Paul Taylor's choreography of Handel in the ballet "Aureole." Brilliant. . . . Met Laird Barber and walked in the park. He doesn't seem to have much energy, but there's a glimmer somewhere, I think. . . . Some good papers at MLA and some rather heated discussion, especially in Spanos's seminar on post-modernism. . . . Went to Museum of Modern Art with Leander yesterday. He's beginning to awaken to culture, slowly.

December 29, 1974

Interviewing in morning. One young girl, Ann Gates, has already published stories in The New Yorker. Afternoon to City Center matinee of the American Ballet: Les Gatinours and La Fille mal gardée, both insipid. The star of the latter was the new Russian defector, Baryshnikov, who didn't seem so terribly extraordinary to warrant all the fuss. In the evening Alexis Levitin called and spent some time with us. Still without a job, as are so many. Still talk-talk-talk, but with an attractive naïveté. Leander and I went to the Frick. My favorite Rembrandt. Overheard one of the guards, a young boy, telling someone that he preferred this job to going everyday to some horrible office.

December 30, 1974

Morning to Butler Library to see if they had Ριζοσπάστης on microfilm. They do, and much more. On the way home to Hanover we stopped finally at the Adlers' in Briarcliff Manor. Paintings and sculpture everywhere. Oozing with taste and creativity. Sharon home from Wesleyan. Jack came early from the office especially for us and we exchanged smiling hellos, not much more, since we still had to reach Hanover before midnight, which we did, barely.

1975

---

Hanover	January 1–March 15
Boston, Frankfurt, Athens, Κολλέγιο Αθηνών, Τ.Θ. 5, Ψυχικό	March 15–16
Κολοκοτρώνη 11, Θεσσαλονίκη	March 17–24
Athens College	March 25–April 29
Κολοκοτρώνη 11, Θεσσαλονίκη	April 30–May 4
M.M.S. Guest House, Flat 02, College Walk, Selly Oak, Birmingham B29 (Woodbrooke)	May 5–July 18
Birmingham, Dublin, Shannon, Boston, Hanover/Norwich (overnight chez Rassias), Timberlake, Kinhaven, Riparius	July 18–19
Riparius	July 19–September 1
Hanover	Sept. 2–October 28
MGSA symposium at UCLA, Claremont Hotel, 1044 Tiverton Ave., Los Angeles	October 29–Nov. 2
Hanover	November 3–Dec. 28
Washington, DC. APA/MGSA meetings	December 29–30
Hanover	December 30–31

March 16, 1975

Κολλέγιο Αθηνών, Athens

Arrived via Boston & Frankfurt. Daphne vomited as the plane stopped taxiing at Frankfurt; otherwise the trip was uneventful. In Athens College they placed us at the very top of the main building, the Μπενάκειον, in a nice flat. John Lincoln welcomed us. The flat was filled with notes of welcome, bottles of wine from Steward Flory and his wife, a full icebox, etc. Very nice indeed. But then we called Thessaloniki to say hello and were told that Chrysanthi's mother was in a coma and we should come immediately.

March 17, 1975

Flew to Salonika. Magdalene a little better. Immobile in bed, except for a mouth that requested water and a hand that clutched, like an infant's. Πετσι και κόκαλα. Hard to say if she was aware of our presence or not. When Pappous told her that Chrysanthi had arrived, she asked, Ποια

Χρυσάνθη. Ο Παππούς very embittered about life, yet still the possessor of his wonderful smile when we took his mind off Magdalene, who had been a burden to him for three years. She hung on until Friday night, or rather Saturday a.m. the 22nd. She lay in state in the house early Saturday, with two giant candles at her head and feet, and very many callers, relatives from Salonika and the village, neighbors, friends. Then we all went to Aghia Triada for a short but moving requiem, thence to the new cemetery for an equally rapid burial, and lastly the δεξίωση at the cemetery, when I saw Marios again and we talked about his summer home at the tip of Κασσάνδρα. The next day, Sunday, the whole clan ate together, roast kid, my treat, and then Kostas tempted me to go to a soccer game. So much for the dead in the grave! On Monday, in rain and gusty wind we returned to the cemetery to spread κόλλυβα and wine (from a Pepsi Cola bottle) over the grave, sliding in the mud. It was hard to call any of this sad since she had been sick for three years, and house-ridden for long stretches of that, and had lost her memory. Once, during our stay, when she was a little bit herself and was asked how she felt, she replied: Καθόλου σαν άνθρωπος. She had to be cleaned like a baby, and even in death, after having been dressed in clean clothes and laid out in state, she defecated and had to be cleaned again. So endeth the farce. The family disposed of all her things—mattress, bed, clothes—and as she was carried out the door in her coffin, broke a glass on the threshold, να σκορπίσει το κακό. Now Pappous remains alone, as shall we all. He, too, has long losses of memory, but remembers enough to be tormented by these losses. His one dream is to see Odysseas return home from Russia, and he has even rented an empty apartment in the same building, against the day.

During this period, I saw George Savidis briefly. He liked my Introduction to Ritsos, and asked me if I'd ever like to come as a visiting professor to the University of Thessaloniki. I responded enthusiastically. I worked each day in the library of the Εταιρεία Μακεδονικών Σπουδών. Also had a very interesting evening at Vouli's house, with the archbishop elect of Australia, Στυλιανός Χαρκιανάκης, who asked me if I'd like to come to Australia for a celebration of the Archdiocese emphasizing Greece's literary culture. (I responded enthusiastically.) Harkianakis is a poet, and a very good one. He recited for us that evening. Also a great admirer of Ritsos. Indeed when he first met Ritsos, by accident in a bookstore, he, the bishop-abbot-archbishop elect, kissed Ritsos's hand! He invited me to accompany him to Mount Athos for 25 March, but I declined because of Yiayia's death. He was previously the abbot of Μονή Βλατάδων on Salonika's acropolis. Accompanying him was his successor, a roly-poly gentleman of advanced age who said that his taste in poetry lies with . . . Drosinis! Harkianakis, a wild Cretan, is a lover of Kazantzakis. He told a lovely story about a party during Lent when he was tempted despite himself to join in the dancing. Before doing so, he made a speech about Zorbas, concluding that it was all right for him, the abbot, to dance during Lent, since Zorbas taught us that dancing is the transubstantiating of flesh into spirit!

Also saw Themis and Miranda Altis. She is in mourning for her father, and very desolate; he is doing his best, as always—killing himself with work, probably as a refuge.

March 25, 1975

Telephoned Leander on his birthday.

March 28, 1975

Visited Πέτρος Χάρης concerning Ἡ ζωὴ ἐν τάφῳ. He's proud of the huge row of Nea Estia on the shelf, forty-five years under his direction. He was polite, but very brief.

March 20, 1975

Alec arrived.

March 31, 1975

Second visit to Ελένη Βλάχου in her office at Καθημερινή. The first time she was unexpectedly gracious, but this time rather abrupt. She corrected proof all the time I spoke. Said that she preferred to read Myrivilis and Kazantzakis in English because έχουν τη δική τους γλώσσα, κι εσείς [δλδ. οι αγγλόφωνοι] έχετε μονάχα μια γλώσσα. Said she was 99% certain she'd publish Ἡ ζωὴ ἐν τάφῳ if I freed myself of other ties.

April 3, 1975

Learned from Χάρης that the Academy has agreed to subsidize Ἡ ζωὴ ἐν τάφῳ via the Ouranis Foundation, according to the terms proposed by David Horne. Μεγάλη ανακούφιση. (But remember what happened later!!)

April 6, 1975

Jerry McLane left at 5:15 a.m. after having stayed with us ever since our arrival. He flew into Athens unexpectedly while we were in Salonika, and had to be housed by John Lincoln. Very embarrassing for all. A flabby boy without energy, not even enough to enunciate clearly. Not an idea in his head, in great contrast to some of the Greek boys, who are so naturally intellectual. Ο Στάθης, for example, a high school freshman here, who said that he'd read Zorba five times, thrice in Greek and twice in English, and who excitedly brought me Kafka to learn if I'd heard of him! All this outside of school, of course, despite the twelve subjects they carry.

Some fine people here. John and Mrs. Lappas; he's the θεολόγος. Peggy and Danny Danforth, who hope to spend all next year in Αγ. Ελένη, Σερρών, studying the Αναστενάρηδες.

Today, Sunday: archaeological museum in the morning, which leaves one aghast at the achievements of the ancients; Acropolis; lunch at Τουρκολίμανο; then βόλτα at Πασαλίμανο, most of this in the company of the Rassiases, who are beautifully installed in Katharine Butterworth's parents' apartment in Ilysia.

April 23, 1975

Spent two hours with Γιάννης Ρίτσος at his home in Οδός Κόρακα, an apartment filled to bursting with his famous "stones," two of which he gave us, his paintings, the male nudes of Τσαρούχης, and the extraordinarily beautiful editions of his books. Ritsos himself is, as everyone says, όμορφος, proud, with a warm smile and gracious manner. But as soon as he begins to talk—and how he does talk!—a kind of demonic glimmer invades his eyes; he is off in another world, reciting almost. His vocabulary, and the expressive means at his disposal in the oral word, are extraordinary, making one realize with a jolt what a meager part of their language most people utilize. What a gift to be able to think, and then to express one's every thought consummately, effortlessly, unhesitatingly.

We of course ranged over many topics. He was very complimentary regarding my little piece on Φιλοκτήτης, which surprised me because it was really so slight. He plans to have it, along with my introduction, printed in a volume of criticism of his work. Μακάρι!

What surprised me, although obviously it shouldn't have, was the degree to which he is immersed in the classics, the degree to which he sees himself continuing what was begun by Homer. This came out in many ways. I asked him, for example, about the dramatic monologue form, whether he was influenced at all by Cavafy, say, or by Browning. He looked very surprised. Of course not, he said. The dramatic monologue derives from Homer, where the poet so often hides behind his characters. Then there is the ancient drama, which started with one actor, expanded to two, then three. His “dramatic monologues” are not monologues; they always have one person addressing another, even if that other is relatively silent—but the other is a factor. Thus he sees his poems as continuing the modes established by the ancient tragedians and by Homer.

Similarly, when we came to the question of myth, he began by vociferously denying what many critics have asserted: that Ritsos used mythic subjects in order to “hide” his political message and thus be able to publish despite censorship. This is absurd, he said. First of all, many of his mythic poems were written and published when there was no censorship at all. No, what fascinates him is the adaptability of myth. Any given myth, in ancient times, took different forms from locale to locale and probably from decade to decade. In other words, the basic story was always altered to fit specific conditions of time and place, while still retaining enough of its basic characteristics to be recognizable as that myth and not an entirely new one. It is this adaptability and versatility, clamped together with an extraordinary stability, that Ritsos wishes to exploit in the twentieth century, just as the ancients exploited it in the Golden Age. So, when Ritsos rewrites the Philoctetes story or the story of Electra, he is trying to discover what form will be given the eternal myth by twentieth-century Greece. The question of hiding political innuendos is entirely irrelevant. The question of working within the Greek tradition while at the same time renewing it, is the relevant one. And Ritsos with great pleasure showed us a Spanish translation of Sophocles’ Electra with interludes from his own “Electra” in the same volume.

This devotion to the ancients extended itself even to the “problem” so often noted by critics: that Ritsos writes too much. When I asked him about this he was far from apologetic. On the contrary, he sees himself as visited by the gods, as gifted with a talent not given to other men. “How can I sit and not use that talent?” he asked me. “I need 700 years to say all I want to say. How therefore, can I let a single day pass without creating something, and what use is creativity if it is not offered to others? I don't write too much; on the contrary, I don't write enough. Those who criticize me are lazy; they sit doing nothing, and for that reason are jealous of those like myself who work, instead of going every day to the καφενείο. Think of the ancients. We know that Homer, besides the Iliad and Odyssey and perhaps other epics, wrote 33 hymns. Aeschylus—that strong, unbending spirit who refused to adopt his language to the Athenian public—wrote 70 to 90 plays. Euripides wrote 92. I haven't come close to them yet."

Interestingly, even Επιτάφιος he looked upon as a continuation of the ancient mode. First of all, it is in dramatic form, the poet "hiding" behind his character, the bereaved mother. True, it takes the form of the δημοτικά τραγούδια, but it also recalls the laments in ancient drama and epic. Indeed, Ritsos was careful to depart from demotic tradition, where the rhymed lines are always end-stopped, and to utilize instead a great deal of enjambment. [Check this; I may not have heard correctly.] He added that the enjambment in Homer is probably an indication of the degree to which the poem is not entirely oral.

As for meters, he has never been silly enough to try to reproduce an ancient meter exactly in his poems. There is no need to do this in such a pedantic way because all the meters he uses—iambic, trochaic, dactylic, and anapestic—are of course ancient.

I didn't ask about diction, unfortunately. It would be worthwhile to examine one of the poems to see the degree to which ancient and Byzantine forms are employed.

In general, Ritsos has a very "mythic" view of poetry in another way as well. A poem, he said, "can never be explained. Each explanation suggests another—the more the better. But the deepest truth is that the only guarantee that the poem is a true poem is this: that beyond all the explanations, beyond even the sum total of all the explanations there remains something entirely mysterious, something that leads us into another realm entirely, beyond that of human logic."

April 26, 1975

To a play by a Chilean author: Η Χιλή θα νικήσει. Rather primitive artistically, but very strong, and very "appropriate" for post-Junta Greece.

April 27, 1975

Chrysanthi tried to fly to Salonika but the Olympic 24-hour strike foiled her at the cost of a whole day back and forth between Athens College and the airport, Athens College and Syntagma.

April 28, 1975

Chrysanthi and Daphne left. I stayed in order to meet with Lambis Myrivilis, who was very understanding and patient about the saga of Ἡ ζωὴ ἐν τάφῳ. He invited me to dinner; thus I met the famous Κέϊτη Μυριβήλη, representative in Greece of the Ford Foundation. The two of them live in Κολωνάκι but strangely are far left-wing socialists, maybe communists. But it seemed mostly talk to me, and my goodness how much talk! There also was a chap named Nikos Chadzinikolaou, a Greek who was part of the παιδομάζωμα—the children kidnapped by the escaping ἀντάρτες and taken behind the Iron Curtain—at age 13. Now, after twenty-five years in Poland, with a Polish wife, he teaches Polish literature in the university and is himself a poet, in Polish. He had returned to Greece for the first time in twenty-five years and wept at the airport, but prefers to stay in Poland where everything, according to him, is marvelous. No one is hungry, no one is without a job; the state subsidizes poetry, and so forth. Afterwards, Katy said to me privately that he reminded her of the Greek-Americans: their basic insecurity makes them paint their adopted country all white. He was present because he is the translator, into Polish, of (guess what!) Ἡ ζωὴ ἐν τάφῳ.

July 29, Riparius

Scandalous that I made not a single entry during our stay in England! A good interview with George Thomson, however, I wrote up separately and included in the Philoctetes materials.

What did I do from May until mid-July? Among other things:

- Learned ancient Greek better than ever before, by reading Sophocles' Philoctetes carefully, word by word, three times. Very nice feeling. Among other things it helps with modern, especially with a poet like Ritsos, who uses ancient words to such good effect.

- Wrote a little (but, I think, a very good) analysis, in Greek, of the symbol of the cow in Ritsos's «Ορέστης», to be published in ANTI. The occasion for this was a request by one of the University of Birmingham students to elucidate the poem.

- Read scores of articles on Sophocles' Philoctetes in connection with my proposed Freshman seminar and the IPA meetings next Christmas.
- Finished, and posted, finally, Christos's articles for the Columbia dictionary.
- Finished the definitive version of the dialogues for Ο ιπτάμενος θάλαμος after Christos corrected his corrections!
- Followed Harry Newton's course on Marxism and Trevor Blackwell's on views of culture, both at Fircroft College. Got to know also Bob Milman and Terry Murphy, the other two tutors, and Harry's wife Liz. (Address: 1 Witherford Way.) Also met Corfield, the principal, and became involved, on the sidelines, in the "revolution" at Fircroft whereby the principal was expelled by the students, who then designed their own program, with the tutors' cooperation, held mass meetings when the governors (Christopher Cadbury, chairman) threatened to close the place down) and were finally evicted by the police. Met some interesting students at Fircroft, including a London cabbie who prided himself on getting theatergoers to their shows on time, and an embittered IRA Northern Irishman, Victor Hetherington, very bright but paranoid. Also assorted members of the British Communist Party and other leftist groups.
- Lectured twice to the Woodbrooke short course on Community and Authority directed by Chris Lawson (my paper on the Dartmouth revolution, 1969). Nice follow-up with an industrialist named Moses!
- Played the piano a bit, helping Margaret Evans's daughter prepare for her grade VII violin exam (Bach G major sonata; Mozart). Performed slow movement of Beethoven opus 10, D major, for Epilogue and played the hymn each Wednesday night.
- Edited (i.e., practically rewrote) Loring Danforth's article on Karaghiozis for BMGS; and somewhat (verifying references mostly) for Linda Myrsiades's article.
- Met on two occasions with Donald Nicol at King's College re: the journal. First time with Clogg, Sherrard, Mackridge; second time with Bryer. Attended Clogg's seminar on the Greek civil war after the first meeting.
- Negotiated another two years of BMGS with Mr. Feather at Blackwell's, Oxford, together with Anthony Bryer.

- Heard Kimon Friar's "Odyssey" talk (again) at the University of Birmingham. Supper afterwards with Christos.

- Heard Bryn Rees's nice talk about Charles Raven at the evening Meeting at Bournville. Afterwards learned that Liz Bryer is Raven's granddaughter.

- Visited the Marquis of Hereford's stately home outside of Alcester. Tea on the lawn, with Ritsa (Ragley Hall). Also a Catholic manor near Kidderminster; a Safari Park (with Ritsa); some lovely gardens in the Cotswolds (with Klaus and Nina Wedell); all of the Shakespeare houses, including Anne Hathaway's cottage for the first time since I went with Donella Gandolfi in 1952); David and Gwen Robson's lovely farm in Wales, just west of Llangollen, together with a score of Woodbrookers, for a weekend; Joy and Noel Jones in Cambridge for a weekend (the Cambridge fair); Danny and Bettina Wilkes outside of Bury St. Edmunds; saw the abbey there where the barons met in 1215 to decide to approach King John for the Magna Carta; John Meny and his wife in their digs in Cambridge; lunch in the rooftop restaurant of the theatre.

- Theatre: Henry IV, part I, at Stratford with Christos and Meg; Henry V at Stratford (Woodbrooke group); Henry IV, part II, Stratford, with Wedells and Ritsa; Importance of Being Ernest at Birmingham Rep with Ritsa; Travesties (Stoppard) at the Aldwich; Love's Labour's Lost at the Aldwich, starring Ian Richardson; Stoppard's Jugglers at the B'ham Rep; John Gabriel Borkman at the Old Vic, starring Ralph Richardson, Peggy Ashcroft, Wendy Hiller, with Chrysanthi and Daphne; O Jerusalem by D. Edgar at B'ham Rep (about plague in medieval times); Pilgrim at the Rep with Ron & Lura Adeney, David Holton and wife, Christos (mock musical based on Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress); Britten's Death in Venice at Covent Garden, starring Peter Pears (2nd time); a poor Tempest in London wit Paul Scofield as Prospero; Shaw's Heartbreak House in National Theatre production on tour at B'ham Rep, rather tedious; Love's Labour's Lost and Henry IV part II were superb, also the Ibsen and of course Death in Venice.

- In London with Chrysanthi and Daphne one weekend heard Liverpool Philharmonic (Franck's symphony) at Royal Festival Hall and stood four hours in the Horseguard's Parade to see the Queen, Philip, Charles, Earl Mountbatten, and all those marvelous horses in the Trooping of the Colours. Never again!

- Chrysanthi and I served as unofficial marriage counselors for Christos and Meg, whose relationship is horrendous. Hours and hours with Christos, who refuses to see his own faults. On July 6 Meg attempted suicide by swallowing 27 sleeping tablets. Christos luckily became aware immediately and got her to the hospital in time. We visited her there the next day; she was cheerful. It cleared the air. Three days later she was off on a holiday in Wales, without Christos, fortunately. I see little hope of the marriage surviving. But separation, for them, presents as many problems as does staying together, so that at present there is an impasse.

- Helped arrange for Meg to come to the MGSA symposium in California next October.

- Visited twice with George Thomson (58 Billesley Lane). The first time, Daphne fell in the garden and broke her arm. The second time I went alone, after Meg's attempted suicide, at Thomson's request to know my prognosis regarding the marriage. We, thankfully, turned to other things eventually. He told me that Bachtin was largely responsible for his own turn to Modern Greek.

- Relaxed talk with Helen Vlachos at her London townhouse, 28 Bryanston Square, regarding Myrivilis. In the end she decided that she could not publish it.

- Visited Adeneys at their home in Sutton Coldfield, together with Harry Newton and wife. Visited Joan Tyers again. Supper at Wedells. Tea with Chris Lawson & family. Went to University of B'ham Greek Department banquet for external examiners, and farewell for Bryn Rees. Saw Peter Mackridge there again. Lunch with Chrysanthi and Peter Ricketts (linguistics), who'd like an exchange year at Dartmouth. Lunch one Sunday with Alexious at the Bryers'. Spent one Sunday with Peter Dronke and family and Alexious. Went horseback riding at Clant Hills.

- Inspected the television centre at the University of Birmingham; saw the videotapes they did of Christos teaching and another of the Acclamations in Byzantine times, done for Bryer. Discussed with Paul Morby, the producer, the possibility of videotapes for Demotic Greek.

- Heard David Holton's seminar on early Greek printing in Venice.
- Played chamber music with Maurice Creasy and Dorothe Klein, and performed at the united service.
- Spent several hours in Dillon's University Bookshop, Torrington

Place, selecting books for our Composition Centre. These were mostly brought to my attention during our stay at Athens College.

- During this period Daphne went to Bournville Junior School and had a marvelous teacher and lots of friends (some from nursery schools days four years ago). Chrysanthi took social work courses and Fircroft courses and basketry at Bournville School of Art. We ate our dinners at Woodbrooke and talked with various interesting people there, as always. Very much at home, as always.

Alec, when Athens College closed, went on a Peloponnesian tour, then by train to Salzburg, Vienna, Munich, Geneva, Zurich, Nice, Marseilles, Paris. Many many adventures. Returned to Hanover via Montreal, penniless. Leander tried to establish himself in Hanover on his own, was overcome by loneliness, and after several days of agonized expectancy, was given a last-minute job again at Timberlake, where he is flourishing. Yesterday we visited him there and heard Alec play Prokofiev at Kinhaven. All's well that ends well.

Last week: to Saratoga for Program II of the new Ravel Festival. Balanchine's inventiveness remains unshaken.

August 2, 1975

Just had an insight; I wonder if it is true. My insight was that my admittedly irrational and excessive and certainly cruel antipathy toward disease (evidenced now, once again, that Chrysanthi has "sprained her back" and I am furious instead of compassionate) is connected with, based upon, my very deep antipathy toward my father. Perhaps poor Chrysanthi is the unwitting victim of a father-son battle being played out, now, on "symbolic" levels, with an antipathy toward someone who is sick being, in effect, an irrational fruitless "blow" against the man who always cared for everyone's sickness. Interesting.

Leander was here the other day for less than twenty-four hours on his day off from Timberlake. He is very proud of his successful first year at Oberlin. We'll see what happens in the future. Certainly his dismal experience on his own for two weeks in Hanover should be a clear warning, confirming something that we have known ever since Leighton Park—namely, that Leander functions only in groups, not on his own.

My parents are in an adult-education program at Skidmore. We met them last night at the ballet ("Swan Lake," which bored me to death; "L'après-midi d'un faune"; Farrell and D'Amboise in "Meditation"; "Cortoise Hongoise”); Sunday they are coming here, something to which I hardly look forward, especially with Chrysanthi in her completely incapacitated state. My father babbled on about this person and that, everyone being “so well informed,” as usual. Mother is better, δόξα σοι ο Θεός.

Alec called to say, with enthusiasm, that his final assignment is the Brahms piano quartet, the one we “murdered” one night at the Bonds’ with Wiggy, Nancy, Alec and myself (!) at the piano. Yesterday he did something by Ibert, after only four days’ practice.

I should record here that I am presently translating Ritsos’s poem “Φιλοκτήτης,” about 100 lines a day. In the evenings I am reading George Thomson’s strange book that interprets all the basic facts of nature and man according to axioms laid down by Marx, Engels, and Mao.

August 4, 1975

Pappous, Yiayia, Daphne and Chrysanthi are in the house. I am in the field, in my “office,” translating Ritsos (and reading the Iliad in Greek in the intervals: how delightful to be able [almost!] to manage it now, after putting myself to school with Sophocles at Woodbrooke). A furious thunderstorm is in progress outside (outside! I am outside) with noble Zeus-heaved lightning bolts dancing off the treetops and great rolls, claps, machine-gunning, cannonades of thunder reverberating through the mountains. The rain is coming in driving buckets-full, so welcome after weeks of drought and 90+ degrees temperatures. My roof is doing well, thanks to the extra tarring of last year; but a huge puddle is gathering at my feet, since a stream has developed beneath the sills. I’m saved from discomfort by several boards that float upward as the depth increases. It is really too dark to look up words in the dictionary, so I’ve taken a rest. I am much relieved (whether I should be or not is another question) by the two lightning rods on my roof here.

Yesterday, after a similar but less dramatic storm, we were without electricity for eleven hours. Thankfully, Art and Kris Perryman came and we passed a pleasant evening by candlelight.

Chrysanthi’s back seems to be improving. She developed a rash, plus constipation, from the drugs prescribed for her, so is now continuing just on aspirin.

August 5, 1975

Joseph Losey, teaching at Dartmouth again this summer, wrote to me saying he'd like me to read, and comment upon, the script for his projected movie of À la recherche du temps perdu, prepared by Harold Pinter. Losey hopes to begin shooting next spring, in France. I spoke to him on the telephone. He seemed glum: disgusted by the apathy and machismo of Dartmouth students, and worried about his own future—he is 67 and has so much he wants to do! He wonders will he ever finish the Proust. . . . This anguish about mortality is, of course, something I too am beginning to feel more and more. From this point onward everything is really so uncertain. Every day is a reprieve.

I'm on the second draft of Φιλοκτήτης, trying to render it in English verse. On line 200 now; it goes very slowly—20 or 30 lines a day.

August 16–17, 1975

Very full and enjoyable weekend. We left Saturday a.m., Chrysanthi's back not being very hardy, and drove to the Blue Gentian Lodge outside of Londonderry. Then a nice lunch at "The Garden," which is like a pub; then to Alec's concert at Kinhaven. He did the Brahms D major piano quartet with Peter Calabro at the piano. It was well played, but somehow not inspiring. We left the concert early in order to rush up to Timberlake to see Leander and the annual fair. Lovely day this time; last year it rained continually. Leander bursting with health. Saw Ruth and Jack Hunter, and Addison Cate and Bruce Koloseike and the Brezee girl and Stettenheim's daughter Wendy, so felt very much at home. Piglets, sky-rides, dunking bowls. Even a demonstration of how to raise a teepee in nine minutes flat, presented by the campers of Flying Cloud, lovely blond teenagers in the usual F & W loincloths. Then back down route 100 again to Kinhaven for the second concert, or most of it. Then sleep in good, hard beds. Sunday: the third concert, including the orchestra under Jerry Bidlack in a very good performance of Berlioz's Roman Carnival Overture, and a fine Mozart piano quartet with Kathy Southworth, whose parents, sitting behind us, had obviously been won over to the magic of Kinhaven. Farewells, tears, the usual. . . . Lovely drive home. Steak and corn on the outdoor fire in honor of Alec's homecoming. No sooner were we in the door than Jacques Grunblatt called: let's go to a concert! Chrysanthi started to say that we'd just been to three in two days, but I said "Let's go!" So we went to Schroon Lake to hear Claude Frank in the Boathouse: three Beethoven sonatas including opus 190 and the Waldstein, done magnificently. Irv and Fran and Al Zalen and Mary were there, too, so we had quite a party; also Mark Grunblatt, who'll be starting Haverford in a fortnight. During the concert some "pranksters" removed the fuses and the lights went out, but Frank continued without a stir and afterwards joked about the value of low stools, which bring you close to the keys. At the conclusion Jacques invited the whole group for pizza. A very pleasant time. We got to bed at almost 1:00 a.m. I should add that Daniel Carson telephoned during supper and threatens to camp in our house for a week in October: the smudge that set off the beauty of all the rest.

August 19, 1975

Short, nice visit from Bob Bell, now very pleased with his job at Williams. More music with Al Zalan in the afternoon; then Alec and I played for Bob at night: Corelli, Bach, and our usual schmaltzy favorites.

October 29, 1975

Hanover

Meg Alexiou: near crash landing, her plane diverted to Kennedy. I finally caught up with her in Chicago. On to Los Angeles.

October 30–November 2, 1975

Claremont Hotel, Los Angeles

Sightseeing at Universal Studios; walk through Beverly Hills. MGSA symposium at UCLA the next two days, organized excellently by Speros Vryonis. Met Robert Browning, among others. Meg's paper superb. UCLA and Westwood so beautiful: like Greece. Mediterranean climate, sunshine, architecture. My first view of fabulous California.

November 3–6, 1975

Hanover

Meg here; delivered two papers, both well received. The separation from Christos is now definitive.

December 19, 1975

From Joseph Campbell, The Mythic Image (Princeton, 1974), pp. 303, 305:

¶ . . . in all three great Levantine faiths sharing the Biblical concept of divinity (Judaism, Christianity, and Islam), where the godhead is regarded as a transcendental personality outside of and ontologically distinct from his creatures, a logic of duality is maintained, and the religious aim is not to achieve an experience of identity with godhood but to establish and maintain a relationship of some kind by virtue of membership in a social group believed to be supernaturally endowed: the Jewish race, the Christian church, or the Mohammedan Sunna.

¶ The aim of Indian yoga, on the other hand, is a realization of identity. . . . The yogi is to penetrate and cast aside . . . the whole spectacle of phenomenality—forms, names, and relationships—letting only that which shines through all as undifferentiated consciousness remain to his contemplation. (p. 305 ff.)

¶ Pick up, for example, any object at all. Draw mentally a ring around it, setting it off from the world. Forgetting its use, forgetting its name, not remembering that it was made, or how, or that names are given to its parts; not knowing what it is, but only that it is, simply regard it. . . .

¶ Anything at all, any stick, stone, cat, or bird, dissociated from every concept this way, will be seen as a wonder without “meaning,” a beginning and an end in itself—like the universe. . . . As James Joyce states in Ulysses: “Any object, intensely regarded, may be a gate of access to the incorruptible eon of the gods” [p. 409].

1976

---

Hanover	January 1–February 8
Cincinnati, c/o Peter Topping	February 9–11
Washington, AHEPA Educational Foundation	May
Riparius	June 28–September 1
Hanover	September 1–October 28
Chicago, MGSA symposium	October 29–November 1
Hanover	November 2–December 7
Birmingham, Norfolk Hotel, 263 Hagley Road, B'ham B16 9NA	Dec. 8–22
Hanover	December 23–31

February 3, 1976

Letter from Athanasiadis-Novas announcing the decision of the Ouranis Foundation to subsidize Ἡ ζωή ἐν τάφῳ up to $4500. Hooray! David Horne accepts!

February 9–11, 1976

With Peter and Eva Topping in Cincinnati. I read my Philoctetes translation, mostly to members of the Classics Department, and lectured on the γλωσσικό ζήτημα and Kazantzakis to Topping's seminar. Very nice break. Learned lots about Cincinnati; visited Taft museum, etc.

June 18, 1976

¶ Our age reminds one vividly of the dissolution of the Greek city-state: everything goes on as usual, and yet there is no longer anyone who believes in it. The invisible spiritual bond which gives it validity no longer exists, and so the whole age is at once comic and tragic—tragic because it is perishing, comic because it goes on. (Kierkegaard, "Either/Or," in Kierkegaard Anthology, pp. 81–82.)

July 9, 1976

Riparius

Lovely visit from Tom and Nancy Doulis with Dion and Yanni. The last time we saw all of them together was in Oxford in 1971. Talk talk talk. Eight hours steadily on the day of arrival. The next day we went to the “Patriots Day” parade in Minerva. Beautiful Belgian horses perfectly matched in a team; floats; bands; fire trucks; revolutionary costumes.

July 12, 1976

Finished haying the front field and the pond. Donna Trautwein took all the hay for mulch.

Alec is working at the C & A Pizza place in Hanover. Leander is at Camp Timberlake again. No more Kinhaven, alas.

July 13, 1976

¶ The only end of writing is to enable the reader better to enjoy life or better to endure it. (Dr. Samuel Johnson.)

I tightened the fan belt on the tractor so efficiently that it broke away the fan sleeve because of too much tension. So off came the cowl and the entire water-pump assembly. I’ve brought it to Mr. Savage in Johnsonburg to see if he can weld it. So far the Allis-Chalmers has had nine-plus lives. We’ll see.

At the post office I met an old man who said he used to hay on the old Mauston farm with Charles McCarthy.

July 14, 1976

I am finishing a large doll house I built for Daphne, complete with balcony and railing made from coffee stirrers and toothpicks ¶ (Ρώτας writing on Kazantzakis in 1978; my Kazantzakis notes p. 1536): Τίποτε άλλο δε μου κάνει τόσο εντύπωση όσο αυτό το θαυμάσιο παράδειγμα ενός ανθρώπου, που έχασε το Θεό του, έψαξε να τον βρει και τον βρήκε, γιατί ο Θεός φαναρώνεται άμα ψάξεις να τον βρεις. Ο Καζαντζάκης, όταν ο Θεός πέθανε μέσα του, αντί να κάνει ότι έκαναν όλοι οι άλλοι, δηλαδή να το κρύψει και να προσπαθήσει να ζησει τη ζωούλα του με το ψέμα . . . αυτός πήρε το ραβδί του άθεου προσκυνητή κ’ εξεκίνησε νάβρει το θεό.

July 15, 1976

Leander here overnight on his day off from Timberlake. Looking healthy.

Idea for a novel: Political embroglio ca. 1969 with leftists of various degrees (Audrey Logan’s daughter, Quakers, etc.) rightists (use Jeff Hart’s essays), and those caught in the middle. Cf. Kazantzakis’s statement in 1935 (notes 1656–1657) that only those who take sides are “fertile”; those in the middle are sterile. Trial scene (Bill Ballard, Alverson, etc.), Rieser's dilemma, various students: Sorline the ομορφονιός, attractive to women—and men! The homosexual who confessed to me his crush on Sorline, went to him, was welcomed to his bed, and was impotent, so the only thing that happened was that Sorline scratched his back! Sorline's ostentatious sex life with Rogers Elliott's niece.

Am listening systematically to Ulysses read by Alexander Scourby. Marvelous. Chapter 1 is a masterpiece in itself.

Tractor part too far gone for welding. Maxwell's in Lyme is sending a new part; we'll see if it fits my 1939 antique.

July 20, 1976

Ballet with Jacques and Hilda Grunblatt and Donna Trautwein. I liked only Benjamin Britten's "Fanfare": brilliant musically and choreographically (Jerome Robbins).

July 21, 1976

Kazantzakis has a fine passage on art that I should use in my teaching. It's from a 1937 interview (Katsimbalis #188; see my notes 188off): Η σχέση της Τέχνης με τη ζωή είναι σχέση διαμαντιού προς το κάρβουνο. Το διαμάντι είναι συμπυκνωμένο, από τεράστια πίεση, κάρβουνα. Ένα διαμάντι είναι το δάκρυο ολάκαιρου ανθρακωρυχείου. Κι όμως τι διαφορά! Το ένα εύθραστο, καίγεται, φθείρεται, μουτζαλώνει· το άλλο λάμπει σκληρό κι αχάραγο και παίζει με όλα τα χρώματα της ίριδος. Όμοια, με τεράστια πίεση κι αγωνία, βγαίνει και το έργο της Τέχνης από τη ζωή. . . . Η Τέχνη είναι η συνθετική όψη της ζωής.

July 26, 1976

¶ A proper historical sense should not lead to relativism. There is a common humanity which makes all art available to us, from any age or country. (René Wellek, lecturing at Dartmouth several years ago—I just rediscovered my scribbled notes.) The above is of course the finest justification for comparative literature.

August 7, 1976

To Kinhaven for a staff concert, more specifically to see Charlie Hamlen play Dvorak's piano quartet, which I didn't much like, thought of course it was well played. Afterwards, the staff chamber orchestra did a Stravinsky suite, very neo-baroque and humorous, especially the double bass's "solo." The usual spirit, of course, was well in evidence. Alec came over from Hanover with Cathy Emery, his girlfriend, so we had a little reunion. Also with Kay and Bob Moore, Jerry Bidlack, MJ, Mr. Dushkin.

August 8, 1976

Daphne looked so forward to bacon for breakfast (as did I) but then had diarrhea and vomiting and couldn't eat. We continued on from Weston to Timberlake—familiar ground—and arrived in time to attend Meeting at the camp. Ministry from Slonaker and another counselor, but also from a thirteen year old camper, who spoke simply and movingly about the ability to live with few and simple gifts of God: firewood to keep warm, for example (it was a wet day and the upper Lodge had a roaring—literally—fire). We saw Leander's cabin, right by the lake, met his campers, took him out for a nice lunch, which was a treat for him, and then all went to visit Ken and Susan Webb at "Brooksend." Susan is running for re-election to the Vermont House, and had just returned from a morning of handshaking, but was energetic and talkative, as was Ken, as always. Beautiful home right on the lake, with an English-type garden in back. Ken is still writing the history of the camps. On the return trip we stopped at Proctor and saw the extraordinary marble exhibit there, not to mention the town itself, which has a Greek temple: all marble; even marble sidewalks! Finally, we stuffed ourselves at the Montcalm.

The previous week my parents were here, and also Βούλη Προύσαλη for two days. On the first evening, Jacques Grunblatt brought over a professional writer he'd met in Puerto Rico, a man who does pulp romances "to order" and makes lots of money. Print order is 100,000 minimum. I asked him how he got his start. "Pornography," he answered. A vocation missed.

August 10, 1976

The kind of day I really like. Reading all morning. Then directly after lunch to the woods, logging. A fine breeze kept the bugs away. I haven't been logging all alone like this for many years.

Renewed contact with Peter Gardner. I'd dreamed of him, saw him going into the subway in Boston with a haggard face, and wrote accordingly. He responded at length. My dream was not inaccurate. He is presently unemployed, and his wife has left him! He confessed that his reluctance to communicate all these years came from the sense that I had done what he had failed to do and wanted so much to do: establish a career and a stable household. This, too, I had sensed over the years—that is, the reason for his silence.

August 12, 1976

Full house. John Tallmadge came for a visit, and Leander arrived from camp on his day off, with Todd Engstrom. I invited the Shapiros and Perrymans to hear John read from his “work in progress,” which is progressing very nicely indeed. Irv Shapiro showed his excellent movies on (a) a trip down the Yampa River, (b) mule-train through the Sierras. But, through it all, Chrysanthi was chiefly preoccupied by another bat inside the house!

August 14, 1976

LAZYBONES (EL PEREZOSO)

They will continue wandering, these things of steel among the stars, and weary men will still go up to brutalize the placid moon.
 There, they will found their pharmacies.

In this time of the swollen grape, the wine begins to come to life between the sea and the mountain ranges.

In Chile now, cherries are dancing, the dark mysterious girls are singing, and in guitars, water is shining.
 The sun is touching every door and making wonder of the wheat.

The first wine is pink in colour, is sweet with the sweetness of a child,
 the second wine is able-bodied, strong like the voice of a sailor, the third wine is a topaz, is a poppy and a fire in one.

My house has both the sea and the earth, my woman has great eyes
 the colour of wild hazelnut, when night comes down, the sea puts on a dress of white and green, and later the moon in the spindrift foam dreams like a sea-green girl.

I have no wish to change my planet.

—Pablo Neruda, from Estravagario (1958),
tr. by Alastair Reed in Selected Poems,
ed. N. Tarn (Delta Books, 1972), p. 379.

ODE TO THE TOMATO (ODA AL TOMATE)

The street drowns in tomatoes:
noon, summer light breaks in two tomato halves, and the streets run with juice.
In December the tomato cuts loose, invades kitchens, takes over lunches, settles
at rest on sideboards, with the glasses,
butter dishes,
blue salt-cellars.
It has its own radiance,
a goodly majesty.
Too bad we must assassinate:

a knife plunges into its living pulp, red viscera, a fresh,
deep, inexhaustible sun floods the salads of Chile, beds cheerfully
with the blonde onion, and to celebrate oil the filial essence of the olive tree lets itself fall over its gaping hemispheres, the pimento adds its fragrance, salt its magnetism—
we have the day's wedding:
parsley flaunts its little flags, potatoes
thump to a boil, the roasts beat down the door with their aromas:
it's time!
let's go!
and upon the table, belted by summer,

 tomatoes,
 stars of the earth,
 stars multiplied and fertile show off their convolutions, canals and plentitudes and the abundance boneless, without husk,
 or scale or thorn, grant us the festival of ardent colour and all-embracing freshness.

—Neruda, tr. by Nathaniel Tarn, from
Odas Elementales (1954), Ibid., p. 319 ff.

Seferis, in his journal Μέρες του 1945–1951 (σελ. 199) recounts his return, in 1950, to the house outside of Smyrna he had left as a boy: Τα τζάμια του κάτω παραθύρου σπασμένα, η σιδερένια πόρτα φριχτά σκουριασμένη· δε θα την ξανάβαψαν από τα δικά μας τα χρόνια. Έχω ακόμη το κλειδί της στην Αθήνα. Ο Μιχάλης ο Μπουγάς, που φύλαγε το σπίτι τον καιρό της καταστροφής, μου το παράδωσε στα '34. Ήταν το μόνο πράγμα που έσωσε, μαζί με τη ζωή της γυναίκας του και των παιδιών του, όταν κατάφερε να ξεφύγει το διωγμό πάνω σε μια σχεδία. . . . I thought immediately of what Tom Doulis told me earlier this summer during his visit: that his father, at the time of the καταστροφή, had left his house with only the key. But, as he made his way toward the harbor and looked back and saw the flames of the great Smyrna fire, he threw the key into the gutter.

August 15, 1976

Leslie English here for two days. I'd never known that Jerry English is buried on McCarthy Mountain under a cairn. I've always wanted to be buried at Terpni. Silly. Leslie is sewing beautiful robes, is modeling nude for art classes, is getting an abortion every so often, when needed, is editing for IBM, and still speaks Greek like a charm. We had a nice visit, because I, for once, was relaxed.

Dick Raskin got changed into a woman and is now “Renee Richards.” So I read in the New York Times, when Renee won a trophy in a girls’ tennis tournament, and is now being challenged regarding eligibility!

August 19, 1976

Simplicity: a nice maxim by Kazantzakis in his Τετράδιο VIII.58: Ὅσο λίγα κι αν έχω, με φτάνουν· όσο πολλά κι αν έχω, δε με φτάνουν. Another, ibid., p. 63: Ο Barrès σ’ ένα νέο που πήγε να τον συμβουλευφτή: Je vois bien quels sont vos projets, vos idées, vos croyances; mais quelle et votre soif?

Copied out by Kazantzakis in London, 1946. Τετράδιο VIII.127: ¶ I do not know what I may appear to the world; but to myself I seem to have been only like a boy, playing on the sea-shore, and diverting myself in now and then finding a smoother pebble or a prettier shell than ordinary, whilst the great ocean of truth lay all undiscovered before me. —Newton

August 21, 1976

A full day touring. Indian Lake, Blue Mountain Lake, and the very fine museum there. Raquette Lake—to the former estate of Durant and then of J. Pierpont Morgan, now in disrepair (pretext: meeting there of the Nature Conservancy, which we missed). Of interest was the Adirondack Camp architecture—e.g., siding of spruce bark. Of greater interest were the furnishings displayed in the museum at Blue Mountain, especially the sideboards, etc. finished with birch bark. On to Long Lake, Tupper, Lake Placid (very beautiful). Supper in the Elm Tree Inn at Keene, where we encountered Martha Schultz and Mrs. Nye from Hanover. Returning home at 11:00 p.m., found a stranger waiting on the porch. This turned out to be the Dartmouth student sent to me by John Rassias—Dana Moody.

August 22, 1976

All day, literally, talking to Dana Moody. He is a former ABC and Bridge Program student—black—who graduated, majoring in philosophy, and who wants to go to Woodbrooke for a term. Impressive person, but terribly handicapped by an inability to write clearly. I was reinforced in my sense of mission for our Resource Center for Composition (it could have helped him, for example). His hope is to minister to children, orphans especially, in order to create a future for them. He is “into” meditation, monasticism, occultism, etc., but withal levelheaded and rational. At 4:00 p.m. I drove him to the Route 149 turn so that he could hitchhike back to Hanover. Nice swim with Daphne at 6:00. For supper, we picked our first corn, but it wasn’t ripe.

August 25, 1976

Problems. The Guest House, I observed earlier in the summer, is no longer level, but tilting toward the forest. I had assumed that the foundation piers had sunk on that side. Today Alec and I dug around the front pier with the thought that we’d simply jack the building up and shim it. We discovered, however, that the top block of the pier had broken off and was resting at a 45-degree angle and that the entire building had slipped to the right! We also discovered that that side of the building is a veritable swamp. Our hole filled immediately with water. Impossible to work there, to get any footing from which to jack. I ordered a treated beam from Murphy’s, and tomorrow we’ll try to position it beneath the sill as a temporary measure.

Installed a new stove in the kitchen, a cast-iron box stove for heating: one of life’s small pleasures.

Split wood in the afternoon, after we gave up on the Guest House. I still feel healthy and strong (at times).

August 27, 1976

¶ Il boit, mais il était fait pour l’opium: on se trompe aussi de vice; beaucoup d’hommes ne rencontrent pas celui qui les sauverait. —Gisors, speaking of Clappique, in La Condition humaine, p. 77 (ed. Cecil Jenkins, University of London Press).

¶ On ne possède d’un être que ce qu’on change en lui . . . —another of Gisors’ sayings; ibid., p. 86.

Yesterday in Braley & Noxon’s, North Creek: Peter: “I’d like some 16d nails.” “How many?” “Let’s see: they’re big, so there won’t be too much in a pound.” Ernest Noxon: “No more than 16 ounces.”

September 1–5, 1976

Hanover

We returned from the farm on Wednesday, September 1st. Alec, who had spent the last ten days with us, began to prepare for college. Leander was already in the house, having come to Hanover directly from Timberlake. Thursday: spent shopping and packing. On Friday Alec, Chrysanthi and I took off for NYC while Leander and Daphne stayed. We slept over at 20 E. 74th, and then left early for Philadelphia. I drove down Broad street, Locust, Market, etc., to give them a sense of downtown Philadelphia. We even went past the Liberty Bell (and perhaps would have been the three millionth visitor if we'd gotten out, since the three millionth was announced later as having come on that day. Thence to Haverford. Alec is in Barclay Hall, with an Epstein and a black Liberian as roommates. Leander warned him in advance against "rich New York Jews": how bizarre life can be! He (Alec) is in a cell-like single in a suite, so has some privacy. The poor Liberian, who hadn't arrived yet, will occupy the living room in the center. Haverford still looks nice. The "custom man," Jaime Dunbar, was gracious and helpful. We met Mark Grunblatt on the lawn. He was with a girl. (Then we met him again at lunch. He was with another girl!) Mother made Alec's bed, hung up his clothes: the last ministrations. Tears at the departure of the last son had been shed the day before in Hanover, so this occasion was tearless, yet moving. We left Alec after lunch, and drove via Wilkes Barre, Scranton, Binghamton, and Utica to the farm, arriving at 9:00 p.m. In the full moonlight, we loaded the car with wood, so as to be able to leave early on Sunday, which we did. Breakfast at the diner in Chestertown. Mrs. Millington was there, on the way to work at Bolton Landing at the Sagamore Hotel. Also, I left some books for Donna Trautwein in Riparius. We arrived in Hanover at 10:30, unloaded, piled the wood, had lunch, and got back in the car, this time to drive Leander to Springfield, Mass., to catch AMTRAK for Elyria. Then, finally, back to Hanover. We'd driven 1200 miles since Friday.

September 7–10, 1976

Trevor Blackwell arrived for a visit that turned out to last four days. He was the lecturer at Fircroft whose class Chrysanthi and I attended. The Fircroft situation is worse than ever, with the principal, Tony Corfield, having been reinstated by the Governors while all the tutors have been fired. Meanwhile, Trevor had one year with full pay and practically no duties. This coming year he'll manage nicely on unemployment insurance and savings, while the tutors contest the decision in the courts. A very nice man, product of working class family in Lancashire, with an MA in history and then a second MA under Richard Hoggart in sociology and literature at the University of Birmingham—in other words, “culture and society” à la Raymond Williams. We talked a great deal over the four days, and also had him meet Pat and Mary Scott Craig, Walter and Miriam Arndt, Dee and Noye Johnson, and Harry Schultz. Trevor is now interested, in his personal life, in combining political activism with mysticism—he’s spent a year in India, is an admirer of Christopher Isherwood, etc. I suspect that he’s gay, or at least “bi-”; hard to tell. I of course told him about Kazantzakis, especially the Ασκητική. Trevor has very definite and well-articulated ideas about education, ideas that found a context in Fircroft. He is squarely against the elitist concept exemplified (in part) by Dartmouth, and against the concept of a meritocracy. Education should aim, he feels, not to serve the most talented but rather to maximize the diverse potentialities in every person. Thus it cannot be narrowly “academic.” The anomaly, of course, is that he as a person and as a teacher is academic in the best sense, intellectual in the best sense. He is a Marxist, and far to the left of the Labour Party in Britain, as were all of the lecturers at Fircroft. Harry Schultz pointed out to him, over lunch, that the meritocracy itself is very democratic, since it was that concept which broke the exclusive hold that the aristocracy had over Oxford and Cambridge. Granted, but we must now move ahead, says Trevor. Interestingly, he said that the debate between meritocracy and education of all for diverse talents is precisely the debate now being waged in China—and a very practical one at that, since the outcome will govern the nature of Chinese universities. Trevor lives in a “cooperative house” in Mosely, B’ham 13 (36 Anderton Park Road). Five or six people, otherwise quite unconnected, pool resources for cooking, washing up, etc. . . . I walked him over the length and breadth of the Dartmouth campus, showed him Norwich, Lebanon, White River Junction, etc.—best of all, drove to Franconia Notch and the Old Man of the Mountains, and thence to my favorite place, Franconia College, which always makes me feel that to teach at Dartmouth is a form of decadence and cowardice. Franconia is Trevor’s sort of place, peopled by men and women who “graduated” from the Civil Rights Movement, etc. We had a long and enlightening talk with one of the students, a chap who’d dropped out of UNH and had spent four years in the Navy. Asked what they study at Franconia, he replied, "We study 'survival.'" The place is a large "cooperative house," with students and faculty ordering the food, cooking it, washing up, etc.

October–December, 1976

Lots of non-recorded events to catch up on, but not now. For example: Item: Trip to Providence with Chrysanthi, to lecture on Ο Χριστός ξανα-σταυρώνεται at Rhode Island College and at Brown. The gay host, Professor Wyatt, the Mylonases, the extraordinary university guest house with its bevy of octogenarian eccentrics. Item: MGSA symposium in Chicago, October 28–31. Banquets. Mr. Parry's lakeside villa. Julia Loomis. My taped interview for radio, by F. Litsas. Parry's nice daughters. Mrs. Papanikolaou's moving talk about Greek laborers in the West. Tom Doulis. Item: Life in the Tomb, proofs read and corrected. Item: Leander's new teacher, Frances Walker, whom he likes. Alec installed at Haverford, Our trip there for Parents' Day with my parents. All children and my parents in Hanover for Thanksgiving. Item: my clerking of the Meeting. Item: elected to Board of Pendle Hill, to begin in January. Continuing on Kinhaven Board. Met in October. Mr. Dushkin announced his retirement in two years, at age 81. Jerry Bidlack is heir apparent.

December 9, 1976

Norfolk Hotel, Birmingham

I am here—believe it or not!—with John Rassias to make videotapes of Demotic Greek in the Television Studio at the University, run by Paul Morby. Christos has assembled an all-star cast of local Greeks. Morby's sets, made by his staff, are superb. Yesterday we arrived in Birmingham by rented car, visited the Missionary Guest House (Mr. Mudd no longer there), saw the new wardens at Woodbrooke (Priestmans), where we bumped into Muriel Poulter, who is now more or less a nursemaid to the failing Ann Park. Everyone disappointed that Chrysanthi wasn't along. Christos resplendent in beard and suede jacket, but still very hurt and melancholy over the separation from Meg. Morby was in London but came to see us at night at the hotel. All three very tired. We worried about protecting our copyright. John has visions of money-money-money. I feel so "at home" in Birmingham, as though I'd never left. This morning John and I are going downtown to shop. Then a session with Morby this afternoon. Christos has a couple of Greek graduate students living with him rent free at 52 Haunch Lane, to help with Pavlos. Pavlos is a bit larger, but unchanged. Still does not speak, poor thing. Still restless, pacing back and forth, climbing over furniture like a caged animal. But understands “Don’t,” as a cat or dog understands it.

On the plane from Boston, dozing fitfully, I saw the outlines of a novel I could write about various aspects of my B’ham experience. I was stimulated by Philip Larkin’s Jill, which I had begun. This is so simple and autobiographical; not great literature, yet it captures something. In any case, I saw Christos and Meg incorporated into the Fircroft situation. I saw some marvelous characters. Harry Newton and Liz, George Thomson and family, David Robson, various other Quakers, Sir Robert Burley, the official inquiry in London, Cadbury, the extraordinary meeting we had in George Cadbury Hall, with the young “progressive” who accused Harry Newton of betraying the left. The principal and his horrible wife. Fircroft students: the taxi driver, the IRA bomb-thrower, the secretive and apathetic African revolutionaries, all ex-political prisoners asylumed in England. Various other eccentrics, perhaps Willets, with his vehemence against American action in Vietnam, yet his own warped sense of values, his alcoholism, etc. And above all, Meg and Christos, and Ritsa.

Friday, December 10, 1976

We worked in the hotel with Christos until late Thursday. The same dissensions as always, yet always solved amicably. Off to his office this morning. More work, on Lesson 4. Then we observed a class on Δωδεκάλογος του γύφτου. Christos, despite all his worries—not the least of which is the change of mind of various actors for our “epic” (as Keith the designer calls it)—conducted a fine class, analyzing the poem with acuity and passion. Everything is done in Greek, and everyone understands. I rushed off to Woodbrooke for lunch with Maurice Creasy, who will retire in June along with David Robson. Only Chris Lawson will be left, of the original staff. (I bumped into Muriel Poulter on Wednesday; she retired last year.) Maurice is still fighting his old battle, saying that Quakerism is unthinkable without Christianity. Met Tom Bodine briefly. His niece Lucy, whom Leander used to like, is now married and living in England. Saw Chris Lawson and his wife Christine, who is now the librarian. Talked with Joe Charlesworth about the sad situation at Fircroft. Harry Newton has sold his home and is going to live in London. Bob Milman is studying law via correspondence. Terry Murphy took a job in Africa. Only Trevor Blackwell seems to be fixed for a while in B'ham. They're suing the Governors for making them redundant illegally, claiming that it was "dismissal." The trade unions are financing the case.

In the afternoon we had our first run-through with the actors. Morby magnificent, running the show with gusto. John "dynamic." "Now we shall have fun—have fun—have fun—have a blast—have a smashing time." Morby's sexy secretary Kay gracing the proceedings. (Her all-England rugby husband, the policeman, 6'5" and 14 stone.) Keith and Vincent and Peter Whittaker and the engaging sound man. Keith, afterwards, called the whole thing one of their "epics."

Saturday, December 11, 1976

Work, work. We arrived at 52 Haunch Lane at 9:30 a.m. and worked intensively with Christos, revising the text and drills in preparation for shooting. Christos cooked lunch, φασουλάδα, alas, and let out his injured soul. We resumed. Inevitably, at 3:30 or so, guests arrived: Stelios, an Englishman married to a Greek girl—they'd just come from the consulate, where they had to sign a document that they would raise their children Orthodox, i.e. baptize them—and one of Christos's students, Theano. Lively discussion about idealized "Golden Ages." John fidgeting all the while, said he had to telephone the States. I was annoyed; told him that he had fulfilled Chrysanthi's prophecy, that he couldn't go three days without phoning. When we finally left, however, he explained that it was a ruse to extricate us. As we left, Meg appeared with the children. She delivers them and leaves, without talking much to Christos. Φρίκη!

We returned to the hotel. I typed out some of the materials. Then we went to Meg's for supper. She has a nice flat in the Pershore Road, and is developing a new life. Lots of friends in the apartment block. She's thinking, however, of applying for the new chair in Modern Greek at Sydney. She doesn't have the great bitterness that Christos vented at lunchtime; but he, of course, is the aggrieved party. Both of them, because of the children, are beset by problems that would have driven me, long ago, to the insane asylum. How lucky I am, and most of those I know! How blessed and favored!

Sunday, December 12, 1976

Worked in the hotel until lunchtime. Then went for dinner at Paul Morby's. Lovely wife, headmistress of a girls' school. Son, Valentine, doing A-levels; another son, Ben, working in the Mint. The latter spectacularly handsome, but married to a dowdy girl who said not a word all afternoon. We were terribly late, since I had to go to King's Heath to pick up Christos in our Avis car, and then Christos gave Pavlos and Dimitris the presents I had brought, and then I got lost trying to find Morby's house (20 Clarendon Road, near the hotel). Lovely meal. The two boys completely at ease in company, unlike my Leander, who always looks as though he's got a headache and diarrhea at once. Paul played us one of his Edison cylinders (he's a collector) on one of his many original "His Master's Voice" machines. In this one, Edison himself delivers a little lecture against American chauvinism ca. 1919–1920, saying that it wasn't just the American soldiers who won the Great War, but also the Belgians, British, and French—all were needed. The great man's voice was clear and firm. We left, and went back to Christos's for more work on the text, and also to rehearse John's Greek—he's suddenly discovering that he doesn't know the language! Working with Christos is tedious; he's a nit-picker. But usually he's right. He discovered a way for us to have the Taverna scene without music or a singer, since Morby refuses to record a phonograph disk, breaking equity regulations regarding plagiarism. Back to the hotel. Dinner in a nearby pub-restaurant. The food everywhere is tasteless, except at the Morbys' dinner table, where we even had Christmas pudding! Sleep . . .

Monday, December 13, 1976

Our first day of shooting. Chapters 1 and 16 in the morning, with more of Chapter 16, plus Chapter 2 and a try at the drills in the afternoon. Morby's team is shipshape, everyone doing his bit. The actors are beautifully cast, though "Nikos" couldn't stop giggling, and ruined a few scenes. The real problem, alas, is that John Rassias doesn't know Greek very well. The drills were the worst of the various sequences. The class was stiff and John didn't catch some of their mistakes. We'll have to do this sequence again. At lunch, Paul, who is the soul of graciousness, introduced me to David Lodge, the novelist, who has just gotten a chair here. Paul sees himself as a kind of hub of the wheel, bringing together far-flung parts of the university, who may never have known of each other's existence, but who have one thing in common: they've made films with Paul.

After shooting, Christos struggled on the telephone to secure a παιδί να φέρει καφέ στον κ. Παυλάκη. Then to the hotel, and a nice supper with Paul. More talk about camera angles, about putting music into the Taverna sequence (Paul is understandably hesitant about "plagiarizing" a phonograph record). Good spirits. Then, late into the night, cutting and pasting in order to get the drill scripts ready for John and the first-year students.

John is unspeakably lazy and insensitive and spoiled. I'm getting to know him better, naturally. He is also unspeakably vain. He has to believe that everything he does is superlative; otherwise he can't function. On the other hand, he has a καλή καρδιά, a warm heart, and for that reason is always simpatico.

Tuesday, December 14, 1976

Another full day of shooting, after which we drank four bottles of expensive wine in the Staff House bar, were almost forcibly whisked off to a quick supper at the Burkharts' (friends of Paul's), thence en masse to Ron and Jane Willetts', where Ron and Burkhardt had a classic set-to about the merits and demerits of the current vice-chancellor. Lots of good talk, eloquence, invective, British style, completely foreign to our experience in America. For example: Burkhardt: "I think the V-C is a bloody fool." Willetts: "The adjective isn't deserved." They also told the story of Churchill and Atlee after an acrimonious debate in the Commons just after the war. Both retired to the loo, and Churchill ostentatiously went to the urinal the farthest away from the one Atlee was using, whereupon Atlee called across some conciliatory words, like "Come now, Winston, we're all in this together," or some such. Churchill, not appeased, kept his place, replying, "I'll keep my distance. Whenever you see something big, you want to nationalise it!"

Wednesday, December 15, 1976

John feeling better today. Part of his loginess was due to a bad stomach, which he bore heroically. The afternoon session was very rushed, since Paul had to give a lecture on Caruso to the Dante Society this evening. Consequently, we were forced to accept a Taverna scene that had some bad acting and some verbal slips. This completed all the scenarios. The cast was dismissed with profuse thanks. We did 13 scenarios all in all, a total playing time of about 30 minutes. This required three full days of shooting and ten days previously preparing sets, and will require a week of editing later on. But how good the results are, generally! . . . We all went to Paul's lecture afterward. He is an aficionado of opera, the kind who knows who sang what at La Scala and the Met on 18 December 1906! Lots of old recordings of Caruso and others, taken from Paul's own collection. Then back to the hotel, where I finished typing the questions for Part Four, and John worked with Christos on his pronunciation. Tomorrow we begin the drilling.

Thursday, December 16, 1976

Drilling sessions all morning, with John's new technique of the "oracle," conceived last night in the hotel lounge. Lunch, organized by Ron Willets, in a private dining room, with Professor North, the pro vice-chancellor, Paul, Christos, John, Peter Whittaker (head of the TV and Film Unit), and Professor Dudley, the professor of Latin. Not as stiff as I had feared. Good wine, gracious service. Everything on time. Hot food. We tried to make the pro vice chancellor realize the uniqueness and excellence of the Modern Greek program here. He later came to the studio and saw one of the tapes. It was a good day because Christos had just received a letter from the Ouranis Foundation granting £5000 per annum for three years—i.e., paying for a lectureship.

"Working is the curse of the drinking classes": another of Hugh Burkhardt's aphorisms. We had dinner there, a superb meal cooked by wife Diana, who is a computer scientist and great admirer of Kemeny and Kurtz. They live at 20 Wentworth Road, Harborne, in a home attached to no. 18, which is occupied by Alec's former violin teacher, Louis Ullman. There was another couple, Peter Satterthwaite and wife. No connection with Quakers. He actually comes from the village of Satterthwaite in the Lake District, as did apparently all the Satterthwaites at one time. He teaches history in the 6th form of a comprehensive school in Manchester, and his lovely wife (what a complexion! what cheeks! what a beautiful voice!) teaches French in a primary school there. The Burkharts' children were in evidence. Again, self-assured, at ease with adults, good conversationalists. It all starts young.

Paul Morby works like a demon all day long, with only a very light lunch, with a drink and cigar. But at night he relaxes. Also weekends—gardening, watching television (!), working with his collection of operatic cylinders and early disks.

This evening in the Great Hall of the university, Yehudi Menuhin gave a lecture on "Happiness." One of Morby's men set up the microphones from the BBC. When Menuhin began to speak there was no amplification. General consternation. But John Moseley set it right after he was fetched in the quarters of the Television and Film Unit directly beneath the Great Hall.

Friday, December 17, 1976

What a day! Our last chance to finish the drills— 9:00 a.m. to 6:00 p.m. In the morning session we did only three. Among other things, the vice-chancellor himself came down to see Paul about the "shambles" (the word used in the B'ham Mail) of the Menuhin lecture. That left six to go in the afternoon. But we did it—or, more accurately, John did it, finishing at 5:55 p.m. John lasted admirably, gathering a second wind about 4:00 p.m. The students were marvelously cooperative, as was the oracle and also the Greek cast, several of whom returned at 5:00 so that we could end with a καλαματιανό after the drill: Μια και ήρθαμε, ας χορέψουμε!

John, Christos, Paul, and I had supper together at the hotel, after which we all went round to Paul's house for wine and Christmas cake and lots of talk. Another of Paul's sons came in, an older one, who works in the Midland Bank in Selly Oak. It was lovely to sit by a warm fire with a bottle of claret, relaxing. None of us can believe that the thirteen sequences are actually recorded, considering all the various disasters that could have ruined the project in part or in the whole: power failure, strikes, equipment failure, absenteeism among the actors, sickness, arguments, etc. But everyone persevered until the end, in a spirit of cooperation.

Professor Sinclair, the linguist, came down for a while to observe. He's the one I had met in 1970 or 1971 at the Thanksgiving dinner given by the Whitfields. Also we had lunch with David Lodge, the novelist, and a very pleasant discussion. David spent some time in the studio also.

Saturday, December 18, 1976

How strange not to be televising. I spent the morning in B'ham, buying Christmas presents, also part of the afternoon. Saw my friend Lucifer in the museum. Called home and spoke with Daphne—all's well there. Went to visit Trevor Blackwell in his dank, dark, unaesthetic "commune" in Moseley. He is still pressing for redress; the Fircroft tutors' suit for reinstatement will be heard by the tribunal in January. Called Liz Bryer, who was rather cold and distant, sounding very harassed and lonely. Spent the rest of the evening at Christos's house, with Stelios. Maria, Stelios's wife, cooked us a full dinner: σουσουκάκια. The weather is miserable: sleet, snow, damp. I am catching a cold. Spoke to Alf Vincent on the telephone. He is visiting from Australia. Arranged to meet him and Rosemary Bancroft at Oxford on Tuesday. To bed at 1:00 a.m.

Sunday, December 19, 1976

To Selly Oak Meeting. All the old faces were there. Only Wilfred Littleboy and wife were missing, and I feared they had died. But after Meeting, the clerk read a letter from them: Christmas greetings from Jordan, where apparently they are now living. Muriel Poulter was there with Ann Park, who is indeed very frail, and can hardly walk. Mr. and Mrs. Lawson were vivacious, as always, though he is now on elbow-crutches. She ministered eloquently. Even Doris Newman was in her usual seat, unchanged, unaged. Anthony Wilson spoke about the work of FSC and Friends House in Geneva in relation to the Rhodesian situation (after Meeting). Many people recognized me immediately and came up with warm smiles, including Hilda Jenks. I had called Nina Wedell the previous evening and had been invited to Sunday lunch. She was there with her daughter Cathy. After Meeting, coffee and Christmas carols. Then off to the Wedells. Lunch with their lovely children. Klaus in fine form. He's just been promoted to be a Reader, along with Bryer. Once again, I observed children who had an articulateness, grace of speech, and self-confidence unusual in American children. Klaus and children went off tobogganing in the newly fallen snow; I finished my coffee with Nina and then drove to see David Holton (60 Taylor Road) and his wife and adopted baby Christopher. His wife is now pregnant in her own right. He is continuing in an administrative post and earns about £5000 a year. They live in a house much like ours in Bristol. Lastly, John and I joined the Morbys, Harry David (lecturer in Italian) and fiancée, and Stelios and Maria at Christos's house for a Greek banquet and lots of pleasant talk. Morby is a great talker, but I don't think he impresses his wife any longer.

Our time here is coming to an end. I am beginning to be eager to return home. Received two nice letters from Chrysanthi and Daphne. Tomorrow John and I must “negotiate” with Paul and Peter Whittaker.

Monday, December 20, 1976

In conference all morning with Morby over the opening and closing captions. John being very difficult regarding “copyright” of the “Rasias Method,” which Morby claimed had no originality except John’s vitality and the open chair. John finally agreed to allow his credit to be placed at the rear instead of the front. Christos and Paul will proceed with final editing at the end of January. During lunch I conferred with Christos’s student Θεανώ. These poor Greek post-graduate students are trying to write Ph.D. or M-Litt. dissertations without having had any previous experience either in research or in essay writing. Bizarre. Obviously, and understandably, she was very confused and apprehensive. She is the lovely girl who played the «ωραία γυναίκα» in the Taverna scene, Lesson 17. Then back to the studio for still more negotiations, this time with Peter Whittaker and John Mosely, regarding marketing. The financial prospect is bleak. It will cost us a lot to convert the TV signal to American Standard—£170 per hour in Great Britain—and even more to market the tapes. A thirty-minute cassette costs £10 or £11, and we’ll need 13 of them. We agreed that the University of Birmingham would distribute in the UK, Europe, and Australia at a nominal charge, provided there weren’t too many requests, and that we would worry about the U.S. and Canada. Any further developments, on either side, especially those that bring in a profit, will be subject to mutual agreement. We were told that the studio we used rents out normally at £1000 per day, exclusive of the salary of the producer! This means that our five days in the studio, plus Paul, plus the ten days previous required for scenery, plus one week in January-February required for editing, would amount to perhaps £7000 or £8000, which was in effect a grant from the University of Birmingham to us. Not bad! Now, both John and I are eager to see the results. Back to the bar, the ever-important bar, for final drinks with the whole crew, though I was off to one side conferring with another of Christos’s students, Nikos (the oracle) about his projected dissertation on Φώτης Κόντογλου. Supper with Christos at the hotel, then farewells at his home to Stelios, Mary, and Christos himself. Lots of hugs and kisses.

Monday, December 21, 1976

Shopping in the morning. I picked up the nice suit I'd ordered. Flared trousers, very daring! Drove to Oxford. Shopping at Blackwell's Music Shop, which isn't anywhere as good as Patelson's. At 6:00 sharp we met Alfred Vincent and Rosemary Bancroft Marcus, and passed three and a half pleasant hours learning about Alf's life in Sydney and Rosemary's discouraging life as the wife of a physicist in Oak Ridge, Tennessee. She knows Eleni Rigopoulos; told me that the Rigopouloses are separating. Poor thing, how can she be a scholar of medieval Greek in Oak Ridge? How bizarre for the two of us from New Hampshire to meet Alf from Australia and Rosemary, in Oxford. Alf is full of the excitement of his work, despite the overwork. He would love Meg to receive the chair and go out to Sydney, too. . . . Final leg of the journey. I confused Beaconsfield with Maidenhead, but we finally arrived at the Crest Motel, Beaconsfield, at midnight.

Tuesday, December 22, 1976

To Heathrow early a.m. Very easy and efficient disposal of the Avis car that served us so well. I'm writing this in flight over the Atlantic at noon. Tonight: sleep in my own bed!

1977

---

Hanover	January 1–April 10
Princeton, Pendle Hill, Haverford	April 11–16
Tempe, Arizona; Grand Canyon, El Tovar Hotel	April 17–22
Washington, DC, New York City	April 23
Hanover	April 24–June 21
Riparius	June 22–August 25
New York City	August 25–28
Riparius	August 29–September 5
Hanover	September 6–December 31
Pendle Hill	October 15
Madison, Wisconsin	November 17–18
Chicago, MLA	December 27–29

February 20, 1977

Hanover

From G. B. Shaw, Preface to Man and Superman (Penguin, p. xxxii):
¶ This is the true joy in life, the being used for a purpose recognized by yourself as a mighty one; the being thoroughly worn out before you are thrown on the scrap heap; the being a force of Nature instead of a feverish selfish little clod of ailments and grievances complaining that the world will not devote itself to making you happy. And also the only real tragedy in life is the being used by personally minded men for purposes which you recognize to be base. All the rest is at worst mere misfortune or mortality. . . .

March 18, 1977

Lovely visit with Peter Gardner in his home in Belmont, after so many years. Last summer I'd seen him in a dream—haggard. I wrote. He replied that he was indeed haggard. He'd lost his job, was living on unemployment insurance, and his wife had left him. Now, six months later, he has a new lease on life. He's employed in a consulting firm again, is building up a small practice in counseling, does some professional work as a photographer, and in general seems in good spirits. We talked for five hours about past, present, and future, as though no interval had intervened in the relationship. How nice!

March 25, 1977

I held Life in the Tomb in my hand. A beautifully printed, designed, and bound volume. Finally! But no palpitations of the heart, as when I published my first books. Yet, reading some of the chapters over, I was extremely moved.

April 3, 1977

Gary Sutherland's girlfriend called to deliver the shocking news that Gary had committed suicide. The funeral is tomorrow. His poor mother! No note, no explanation. And his last letter to me had been so cheerful and optimistic, as was his visit several months ago. The girlfriend thought he was beset by financial problems and that his new sideline—advertising—wasn't going well. Among other things, he had never paid his full tuition to Goddard, and I had apprised Goddard of his current address—which doesn't make me feel any better, alas. But why suicide? Surely something much more serious must have happened. Poor fellow. I can't quite comprehend it, yet.

April 16, 1977

Pendle Hill

Story told in Meeting for Worship this morning. An old feeble-minded man for years was seen leaving his house every morning with a package under his arm and returning that afternoon with a different package. Every day the same. The local boys taunted him continually, asking what was in the package, and were told it was none of their business. Finally, they snatched the package from him one day. He went into a frenzy, but couldn't retrieve the package. However, next morning he was seen leaving home as usual with a new package. The boys, meanwhile, had opened the filched package. Inside they discovered . . . a stone. The feeble-minded man had been sent every day out in the town with one stone, to deliver to relatives on the other side of town, when he was given a new package also with a stone. Yet this gave meaning to his life.

En route via TWA, Philadelphia to Chicago, later on April 16th: On Sunday, April 10, I left by AMTRAK for Princeton with a lecture (un-completed) on the Political Comprehensiveness of Kazantzakis's Christ Recrucified. Met at Princeton Junction by Bert Sonnenfeld. We had a long chat over coffee; it turns out that he has had experience with Doria of Royalton College, so we swapped anecdotes. I worked furiously on my lecture in the gorgeous library, finishing it and then ruthlessly cutting it to about sixty minutes. Taught a class on Ritsos's Φιλοκτήτης in the afternoon. I wasn't too prepared, but did the whole thing in Greek. Danny Danforth was one of the students. Supper with Danny and Peggy and the students of the class. Then my lecture. John Weatherby, a former Dartmouth student now doing anthropology at Princeton, showed up; also Wayne Arden '80. About 15 to 18 people in all. I think it went well. Some discussion afterwards. Home then to the Keeleys' Mike, in good form, recounted his early experiences at Oxford, and his meeting with Mary. Slept in Palmer House very elegantly.

On April 12th, suddenly gregarious, I telephoned Joan Wilson, went to see Dr. Tom Wilson at work in his office—a fine-looking pediatrician. Then visited Woody (Ruth) Wilson and finally had a good lunch with Jim Fernandez. On to Haverford in my Avis car. Took Alec out for supper and had a nice chat. Then to a teacher's house, a Mr. Partridge, interested in Greece. Slept in a motel. On April 13th, read in Fox's journal, then visited with Douglas and Dorothy Steere in their house, then a long lunch with Douglas, who briefed me on Pendle Hill affairs. He is splendid, as always, very warm and impressive. Attended rehearsal of Alec's quartet; they're doing Haydn's "Lark" on Sunday—three girls, not too hot, and Alec. Then supper with John Davison and wife Elizabeth and their very precocious son, age 5, who speaks like a fifteen-year-old and gave me a whole lesson on dinosaurs: tyrannosaurus rex, allosaurus, etc., while John yawned. John somewhat cold, but trying. Slept at Pendle Hill. On April 14th, breakfast with Steve Stalonas, a staff member, and Mrs. Hallam Tennyson (!), who had visited Gandhi in India. Marjorie Sykes was also at Pendle Hill but I didn't meet her. Very nice to be there, as though at Woodbrooke. Went to Eugenia Friedman's class on the Hasidic Tales collected by Buber. These are excellent for teaching purposes: very brief and meaty. Then to a class on Zen, rather diffuse. Meeting people all the while, left and right. Then to a very poor class on Friends Educational Principles conducted by Marian Sanders. Then to Haverford to take Alec out to dinner with two Greek students, Gerasimos and Eleni. Lots of nice conversation, mostly in Greek. On April 15th, to Bryn Mawr—what a superb environment, very manicured and classy! Coffee and donuts for all at 10:00 a.m. in Thomas Great Hall. Then a lecture on the houses of Pompeii—competent; then a French class—terrible, fully dead, the teacher delivering a monologue for the entire hour; then lunch; Haverford's troubles with minority problems; then a superb class in fugue by Mr. Boatrite, using Alfred Swan's method of teaching theory via composition—the class did the first section of a fugue, communally, everyone shouting suggestions, Boatrite brilliant throughout. Nice walk with Alec to Haverford Meeting, my old haunts. Alec seems reasonably happy, though the French is certainly a washout. then back to Pendle Hill, another superb environment, though hardly so manicured. Supper; then my first official meeting as a new Board member. The curriculum committee. Lots of impressive talkers. I made some speeches as usual. On April 16th, property committee's tour of the facilities, led by Mather Lippincott, architect of the newer buildings; then business in the afternoon. What good speakers Quakers are! Every one of them. Eloquent, forceful, clear, articulate. The Society really does breed ministers. I was placed on the Publications Committee and the Admissions Committee. Douglas wanted me to be on the Curriculum Committee, however. Saw Emily Wilson, who is getting round only with difficulty, can't walk but can drive, in good spirits. Also Howard Reed, who speaks Greek and Turkish, and Teresina Havens. Also Yuki Brinton, acquaintance from Woodbrooke. The trustees seem terribly caring and efficient. They really do nurture Pendle Hill. . . . To the airport, and now en route. I turn again to Fox's journal.

April 18, 1977

El Tover Hotel, Grand Canyon, Arizona

We drove here yesterday from Phoenix, with a stop at the so-called Montezuma Indian caves, an Indian habitation ca. A.D. 600–1100 carved out of a natural rock face. Then past the spectacular “red rocks” of Sedona, extraordinary formations jutting into the sky, and finally to the Grand Canyon, which is fully as spectacular as one expects. Peter Buseck was always able to explain the geological history, which was very helpful. We circled the rim, going from vantage point to vantage point, each one of which offers new marvels—side canyons, precipitous drops, new colors, a glimpse of the Colorado River below. The canyon is one mile deep and, I think, about 250 miles long. We fed the children (Susan and Paul Buseck, Daphne Bien), left them watching television, and then treated ourselves to a leisurely gourmet dinner in the restaurant. Very pleasant indeed, and unexpected. It is still strange to be here. This morning, pulling back the curtains at 6:00 a.m., I looked out over the canyon to the north face, bathed in the light of sunrise. Alice, Daphne, Susie, and I then took the mule trail down into the canyon, leaving Peter Buseck behind with Paul, who had a slight fever. We of course didn't go all the way down to the campsite (a 4 to 5 hour trip just to get there) but did go far enough down to get an entirely different feel of the canyon, as we gazed up at the precipitous cliffs above us, beetling over their bases. Despite the constant traffic down and up, one can still feel, as well, the vast stillness of the canyon, with the imperturbable sky overhead and a huge inertness all around one. The solitary flight of a raven or hawk from one cliff-face to another becomes a major, and beautiful, event.

Back in the car after two hours in the canyon, we proceeded for further views along the rim and then left the National Park. Peter took us next to the gorge or canyon of the "Little Colorado," as deep as the Grand Canyon but very narrow, like huge, bottomless cracks in the earth, making one fearful to look down. This was in Navaho land, their Reservation. At intervals were the miserable huts of the Indians, and at the overview where we stopped about ten Indians all competing for the sale of the identical jewelry. Some were in pickup trucks, or sitting on mats making more jewelry. They seemed stolid and hostile, and so very sad. Their "land," I now can understand, is hopeless. A desert, scorching hot in summer, biting cold in winter, incapable of producing crops, and hardly capable of sustaining a few sheep or heifers. What a contrast to the marvelous man-made environments (white-man made) that we saw later, such as Taliesin. From here we proceeded to some strange, huge "lumps" in the desert, each about as high as a house. Peter climbed up to the top of one with a hammer and extracted numerous slivers of petrified wood. It seems that each lump has formed around a fallen tree in prehistoric times. When the land all around eroded, the area around the tree resisted, forming these strange mounds in the middle of the flattest, most desolate expanse of wasteland. One final wonder on this day was "Sunset Crater," a huge volcanic mountain pitch black except for pinkish hues at the top. It is formed of ash from the eruption, and the area all around is black from the same ash. Most remarkable of all was the lava flow: solid lava all crumpled and jagged as it began to cool on the surface but not underneath, and turned under upon itself. An expanse of ten or twenty acres—who knows how thick?—of this black, jagged tangle. Peter says they brought the astronauts here for training.

April 19, 1977

I spent the morning and afternoon in the Carl Hayden Library of Arizona State University, reading George Fox's journal. The university is beautiful, with excellent facilities, or so it seems—especially the plantings, which set off the buildings and form numerous promenades of green. Automobiles are entirely excluded from the central campus. Golden lads and lasses everywhere. At noon I ate in the faculty lunchroom with Peter. Their facilities make Dartmouth's faculty lunch look a shambles. Peter explained his work, and gave me a tour of his laboratories. Electron microprobes, computers, intricate mechanisms of all descriptions. He seems to be doing very important work in air pollution, analyzing the composition of the minutest particles. In the evening we saw the rehearsal of a Suzuki violin recital: 125 children ages 2½ up to 10 or so playing wonderfully on pitch and in unison, with a symphony orchestra as back-up. Very impressive. A couple teach them all, year after year.

April 20, 1977

Out to Frank Lloyd Wright's Taliesin West, about twenty miles from Phoenix, nestled under the mountains. Our tour was conducted by Kamal Amin, one of the architects. It's a school for apprentices, a working architectural firm always executing commissions, and a kind of wealthy commune, with all tasks performed by the members. They also have musicians, painters, etc. for home-made entertainment. All the flowers were in bloom, and the walkways were radiant. From there we went to another architectural commune, that of Salieri (?), who has grandiose ideas about a fully organic self-sustaining community for 3000 that is already being built in the desert, in the middle of nowhere. Strange designs, all in reinforced concrete, but innovative and imaginative. Then to Scottsdale, with its dazzlingly beautiful shopping centers, all lined with date palms and flowerbeds. We bought a lot of goodies and made a grand dinner for Yiayia and Pappou for their 50th wedding anniversary, which falls on July 3rd of this year. Their entire progeny was present, except for Alec and Leander.

April 21, 1977

Alice drove us to downtown Phoenix, where we spent several hours in the Heard Museum of Indian culture. Beautiful displays of pottery, textiles, baskets, and spectacular dolls dressed in the various ritualistic masks and costumes. The West does this homage to the Native Americans after nearly exterminating them. So many of the pots rivaled the Greek ones. Thence to the Arizona Biltmore, designed by Frank Lloyd Wright in 1926 and refurbished recently by Taliesin Associates. A sumptuous “complete resort” that reminded me of von Aschenbach’s Grand Hotel des Bains at the Lido. Wright’s pastel colors were especially striking, and also the grounds—a paradise of greens and blossoms. Phoenix attracts the wealthy in a way I hadn’t realized, but five minutes in the Biltmore is testimony to a way of life for . . . some. I then attended Peter Buseck’s weekly luncheon colloquium, in this case a presentation by a second-year graduate student on the problems of air pollution. He demonstrated that the so-called standards imposed by the Environmental Protection Agency are entirely inadequate, almost farcical, chiefly because they’re based entirely on mass rather than the nature of the particles present, and also because their filters are incapable of catching the small particles, which are precisely the worrisome ones, since they remain so very long in the atmosphere. Then to the library, more Fox, preparing for our seekers’ meeting a week from Sunday. Supper, and a quiet evening at home including a long talk with Lori about Thomas Hardy. The Busecks’ children—Lori, David, Susan, and little Paul—are all delightfully warm, affectionate, and bright. Peter seems to combine the efficiency, drive and brilliance of a scientist with the ability to relax and play that probably is necessary for a good father (and which I lack, of course).

April 22, 1977

More wonders. Spectacular houses perched on Camelback Mountain, including a castle brought stone by stone from Europe and rebuilt. Then to the Desert Botanical Gardens, with their thousands of varieties of cacti, all colors and shapes, plus an infinity of other desert plants: yucca, mesquite, rubber trees, etc. I then had lunch in a Greek restaurant—γύρος, no less—with Peter and a colleague named Manin Fisher, presently chairman of the ASU English Department, formerly, for two years in 1961–1963 Fulbright lecturer in the University of Thessaloniki. We of course had many mutual acquaintances, and stories to swap. He seemed a cynical chap, very down on ASU's commitment to the humanities. On my final afternoon I toured the Gammage Auditorium, Frank Lloyd Wright's last major design, again a gorgeous structure all in the pastel colors of the desert—sixteen different shades of the same desert red. Adjacent is the new Music Conservatory, likewise circular, with practice rooms around the circumference and recital and concert halls, and the library in the core. At the top is the Bolton (?) collection of primitive musical instruments, a fine way to understand how our marvelous violins, organs, flutes, and pianos got started. Turtle shells covered with a skin, bows (i.e. from bows and arrows) made into an instrument by the attachment of a gourd, which is then pressed against the performer's body so that the body itself becomes the resonator. The organ started as a series of reeds with stops, all connected to a hollow bone serving as a blowpipe. A final session with George Fox in the library, then supper and another leisurely evening of talk, until Peter, Alice, and Chrysanthi drove me to the airport for a 12:35 a.m. flight to Dulles Airport, Washington.

April 23, 1977

Dulles Airport

So here I am, writing all this at 8:45 a.m. while waiting for ground transportation into Washington. What a nice two weeks since I left Hanover on April 10th for Princeton! I dread returning to Hanover, where everyone will descend on me, wanting this, wanting that. Life in Phoenix was difficult at first, the high temperatures, high altitude, and low humidity made me feel very tired for about four days, but then everything began to fall into place. It's a gorgeous environment, especially now, before the great heat begins. It's really a "new town"—the entire city in its present form, with the exception of a few areas, dates from after World War II. The problem is sprawl, but right now, with the city still a manageable size, and not like Los Angeles, everything is manageable. From Tempe to downtown Phoenix is 15 to 20 minutes, and from Tempe to the desert is less. Then there are the university campus and buildings, the magnificent civic centers and parks in Tempe and Scottsdale, man-made environments that make one feel that civilization has not degenerated, nor capitulated entirely to hucksterism.

April 23

Pennsylvania Station, New York City

Went to Leila Washburn's at 11 a.m., as scheduled, but the door was locked and no one home. The girls in the Greek Consulate across the street told me that the meeting had been re-scheduled for Sunday! I took the 12-noon Metroliner for New York. The usual. On Broadway, a horde of Hare Krishna chanters, with tom-toms, jumping up and down, singing vociferously Hare Krishna (Let me serve Krishna), Hare Krishna, Krishna Krishna, Hare Hare, Hare Rama, Hare Rama, Rama Rama, Hare Hare (Rama = the pleasure potency of God). They were mostly men: young college-age boys with shaved heads and a pigtail, but some older men, too, the leaders black, all the rest white, one woman carrying an infant wrapped in woolens. After the chanting, one of them announced that they were devoted to the Truth, which means not the lies given us by science but the truth that God made the world. This was followed by a primitive attempt at street theater. A girl purported to be a radio announcer interviewing two scientists after man's successful landing on Mars. What a triumph! etc., etc. What cooperation was necessary for this great feat! But as the script continued, the truth of the scientists' motivations becomes evident—pride and self-aggrandizement. The two colleagues end by trying to choke each other, with great gusto. At this point, the narrator stepped forward to point the moral: Don't follow science. To be happy, to conquer all one's problems, all one needs do is chant Hare Krishna. All together now—whereupon the dancing and jumping recommenced.

June 28, 1977

Terpni

Back in the old, delicious routines. Yesterday, for example, worked at my "office" under the yellow pine for four hours, reading Pinchin's Alexandria Still for a Books Abroad review. After lunch: gardening, chain-sawing, mowing with the Allis Chalmers, transplanting. Then a swim with Daphne. After supper, reading the TLS and To Βήμα της Κυριακής with Beethoven's 9th on the newly installed pick-up.

Clea in Durrell's eponymous novel (p. 56) says, "Music was invented to confirm human loneliness." That is true in a way, a nice way. I felt it last night, listening to Beethoven's 9th while Chrysanthi sat crocheting. And one feels it with Leander, music in his case providing an excuse for a failure of human intercourse (part of the time). But what would David Dushkin say? Surely Kinhaven shows that music is a bridge between one loneliness and another, at the very least.

June 30, 1977

The mating behavior of the praying mantis: a male praying mantis will not completely mount and fertilize its female until she has bitten off its head! . . . May this be kept a secret from all feminist agitators!

July 12, 1977

Shakespearian jokes: A Shakespearian actor went to a brothel. When he took off his pants, the whore in bed gave an appreciative whistle. He said, "Madam, we come to bury Caesar, not to praise him." Graffito in the toilet stall in Sanborn House: "Out, out, vile jelly!"

Yesterday, with Chrysanthi's help, I removed a huge rock in the north field, one that had been impeding our mowing for years. Very satisfying to see it gone. I've been trimming around the edges of that field, trying to get back to substantial trees, cutting away alders, etc.

Reading, simultaneously, Herzog, and Mina Shaughnessy's book on remedial writing, Errors and Expectations. Found, and threw away, my manuscripts for The Last Temptation, Saint Francis, L. P. Hartley. Why keep them? But I closed my eyes and gritted my teeth a bit as they went into the trash.

Another small satisfaction: to be having more and more trouble starting the tractor, and then, instead of fighting with the crank, as before, to patiently clean the carbon off the contact points in the magneto, and to gap and insert a new set of spark plugs, whereupon the beast started on the first crank! Sometimes things do work correctly.

We had a stupendous harvest from our cherry tree, the first. It took ten years, at least. And one of the plum trees has fruit this year, too—about five plums!

Nevertheless, I've been basically morose all summer. The reason, I am convinced, is a massive conviction of squandered talents. Once again, instead of attacking the magnum opus, "Kazantzakis and Politics," I am doing one small, inconsequential job after another—and yet these too need to be done. So, one feels trapped. Yet I spend the afternoons in physical work on the farm, unwilling to give that up, while I still have the physical stamina (as I still do, remarkably).

July 13, 1977

John Dewey's definition of education: ¶ . . . the transformation of natural powers into expert, tested powers, the transformation of more or less casual curiosity and sporadic suggestions into attitudes of alert, cautious, and thorough inquiry. —cited in Mina Shaughnessy's Errors and Expectations (New York, 1977), p. 274.

July 14, 1977

From Bellow's Herzog:

¶ The dream of man's heart, however much we may distrust and resent it, is that life may complete itself in significant pattern. Some incomprehensible way. Before death. Not irrationally but incomprehensibly fulfilled. (p. 303)

¶ . . . neurosis might be graded by the inability to tolerate ambiguous situations. . . . Allow me modestly to claim that I am much better now at ambiguities. I think I can say, however, that I have been spared the chief ambiguity that afflicts intellectuals, and this is that civilized individuals hate and resent the civilization that makes their lives possible. What they love is an imaginary human situation invented by their own genius and which they believe is the only true and the only human reality. How odd! But the best-treated, most favored and intelligent part of any society is often the most ungrateful. Ingratitude, however, is its social function. Now there's an ambiguity for you! . . . (p. 304)

July 21, 1977

Re-reading Kazantzakis's Ἡμερώνει in connection with my paper on Kazantzakis and myth, I suddenly thought again of Gary Sutherland, who took the path of Λαλώ in the play: suicide. Yet in the play the reasons are spelled out, clearly, and at length. Gary's suicide, so far as I know, was a mystery. No note even. I wrote to his mother, and never received a reply. His girlfriend seems to have no inkling, or so she says. He passed out of my life as peculiarly as he came into it three years ago.

I've begun the Iliad in Lattimore's translation. How fresh, how vivid it is!

Evening: picnic supper at Saratoga with Bob and Ilona Bell. Then Balanchine's "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Kazantzakis, viewing Greek statues in the Louvre, characterized them as hymns to strength, to life. The bodies of the youths seemed to be praying "Be beautiful, intelligent healthy, rich.” They represented an ideal—that you should be near the gods . . . (all in the Parisian dispatch Χριστουγεννιάτικο). The same pagan freshness and strength seen by Kazantzakis in these statues is conveyed also by ballet. It is a pagan art form: a hymn to mindless strength and beauty—yet a strength that is always controlled, never dissipated.

July 22, 1977

Worked on Kazantzakis and myth in the morning. Spent five hours (five!) removing two large boulders from the fields in the afternoon, with a slight break when Jackie (?), Bruce Girton’s niece, rode up on her horse in mid-afternoon. Hard to tell who was prettier, the horse or the rider. Read Book IV of the Iliad at night, and slept, very tired.

July 26, 1977

A huge mob here: my parents, Paul and Susie Buseck, Leander and his roommate Jim King. Nine at every meal. Leander, Jim and I shingled the north roof of the cabin in twelve hours, all going well. Leander and I will tackle the south roof next. George Johnson, the former police officer in North Creek, came up last Saturday, still looking for the bee tree he’d seen 25 years ago (and of course was still unable to find it). When he arrived I was in my office, so he saw Chrysanthi and asked, “Where’s that boy who owns this place?” Time has obviously been standing still for George Johnson.

July 31, 1977

Finished the south roof. Alec came for the day, and helped. We also celebrated his birthday. Charlie Hamlin came over from Kinhaven, and after supper we had some Mozart violin-piano sonatas.

August 24, 1977

D. M. Gaunt, speaking of Homer: ¶ It does not of course follow that the original audience were always aware of the true force of such epithets. Like a stimulating teacher, the bard offered more than most of his audience would consciously absorb.

I should always remember the last sentence when students complain that my lectures are too full or go too fast.

Jay Parini was here last week with his nice girl-friend Katharine. He told me, among other things, of a Dartmouth graduate who is quickly becoming recognized as a major poet. Kenney, I think his name is; he dates from 1967 or 1968. This Kenney told Parini that it is in my classes that he first sensed the true existence of the intellectual life. That is a nice compliment.

Some things to remember over the previous month: C. M. Woodhouse reviewed Life in the Tomb most favorably in the TLS, July 22. Leander and I rebuilt all the footings for the Guest House, using fieldstone instead of cement blocks. Leander crashed the car slightly after the brake fluid ran out, but was uninjured. Repairs totaled $400. We had nice visits from the Adlers, including lots of music, and also from Al and Mary Zalan, when Leander, Alec, and Al played trio sonatas all evening. Alec arrived last Sunday and is leaving next Sunday for Haverford. We canoed up a tranquil river off Lake Pleasant, with Fran and Irv Shapiro. Tramped around our boundaries, marking them against the Deckerts' woodcutter expected this winter. I wrote 100 pages of manuscript on Kazantzakis and myth, in preparation for my talk at Lubbock, Texas, next January. Read the Iliad slowly, savorily, in Lattimore's translation—quite an accomplishment (the reading, not only the translation). Re-read The Nigger of the Narcissus and am now reading An Outcast of the Islands (for the first time). Heard a terrible concert with André Watts pounding out reprehensible Liszt, preceded by Saint-Saens' boring Organ Symphony. Pulled out some whopping rocks from the fields. Did all the mowing once again (και του χρόνου said Chrysanthi as we finished). Alec tired after a summer playing show-tunes on the Hanover Inn patio, after four hours baking pizzas each day in C & A's. Leander did summer school in Oberlin and is now nursing a tricky knee hoping it won't interfere with soccer season (he is co-captain). We had my parents for ten days—father difficult, as usual—with Paul and Susie Buseck, who are sweet. Alice never said "Thank you" even, when she honored us with a short telephone call after she returned from her two weeks in Europe. Chrysanthi finished a gorgeous patchwork blanket for Alec, begun (but not finished) with wool from our own sheep. Daphne made some fine sketches, showing improvement, after being stimulated by the Adlers and the Zalons, all of whom are artists. Judy Keller, Leander's friend from Oberlin, was here for a few days. Another artist. We cleaned out the organ properly for the first time, and repainted the part despoiled about twenty years ago (!) by a mouse-next. Things move leisurely at Terpni. Patched the leaking roof of the shed. That will probably need to be redone entirely next summer. Garden OK after two killing frosts, the last on June 6th! We expect another one any night. We've never had so much lettuce. Also good beets, snow-peas, beans, rhubarb. A giant head of cauliflower. Some broccoli, etc. The cherry tree bore copiously for the first time, and the plum and apple trees bore sparsely, also for the first time. I transplanted the grapes to the south side of the house, hoping they'd be more protected. Cut back the brush and overhanging branches along the borders of the fields this year, so that we now have stretches where the border is better defined by established tree-trunks. Cleaned up the mess caused by the heavy snow last May, which toppled many trees, including two large old maples at stone piles on the south field. Luckily, "my" yellow birch at the office withstood the worst and seems entirely healthy. Installed bookshelves in the guesthouse and loaded them with volumes taken from my room at 3902 47th Street when the house was sold, and stored up to now in boxes. Threw out many manuscripts of books and translations published. No regrets. Good riddance. Paul Morby & colleagues completed the editing of our videotapes. They should arrive any day. Leonard Rieser and Dean Manuel invited me to address the freshman class—the students' first real contact with faculty during orientation week. I've already sketched out what I want to say: a kind of "Idea of the University." I was approached by Marquis publications for inclusion in "Who's Who in the World"—how ridiculous. Severe drought this summer until just recently. The pond lower than ever. I pulled out some of the cattails but not very successfully since very few came up with the roots. Our well held out once again—old faithful. Pooka, our black cat of many a year, walked off the 3rd day after our arrival and never returned. Lots of mice in the house, not to mention the usual bats, and wasps.

August 26, 1977

To Albany-Rensselaer to deliver Leander to the AMTRAK station. Back to Oberlin for his final year, to study again with Frances Walker and give his senior recital in November. His first teacher was Arthur Dann, who had a stroke and had to retire; then came Bob Black for the sophomore year, and Walker for the last two years. What will become of Leander musically is hard to say. He seems to have only a modest talent (for that league), and I find it difficult to imagine him succeeding as a performer. He's interested in accompanying at the moment, which is perhaps more realistic, and also more sociable. After a month here at the farm he concluded that it was a lovely experience to be here again, really for the first extended period since he was 12 years old. We had the usual frictions—he is so nervous that he makes everyone else nervous—but also many pleasures, especially when working on roofs, foundations, removing rocks, etc. That, after all, is what the farm is all about, at least according to my “ideology.” . . . From Rensselaer, we continued down to Manhattan.

August 27, 1977

A day in New York City. Marvelous exhibition of Thracian archaeological treasures dug up in Bulgaria, at the Met. I was thrilled especially because of having just completed the Iliad, where the Thracian artifacts are vividly described. And there they were! Including matrices for casting scepters and “embroidered” spearheads. Usual dissipations in the afternoon, then to the theater at night: “Sly Fox,” an updating of Volpone, very effective, very funny. Went with Chrysanthi and Alec.

August 28, 1977

After a lazy morning reading the Sunday Times—how scandalously poor the Book Review is compared to the TLS—delivered Alec to AMTRAK, launching him into his second year at Haverford. He was apprehensive, especially about the need to select a major this year, but he has good courses scheduled, and should I hope be stimulated. He’ll be serving as a “Customs Man” in Freshman Orientation and wants to audition for the Schneider Christmas Youth Orchestra, which I doubt he’ll make. Strange: Leander is hyperactive, a kind of incipient manic depressive, and Alec is always yawning, moving about as though he were dragging a hundred-pound ball and chain. Very lethargic character. I have to keep reminding myself (or being reminded by Chrysanthi) that these are “difficult years” for both boys: post-adolescence, or whatever. Drove back to the Adirondacks in 90-degree heat, stopping for dinner at the Montcalm. How extraordinary to be one night at the theater on Broadway and the next night in our cabin.

August 29, 1977

Back under my tree. Finished Conrad’s An Outcast of the Islands, an interesting book especially in view of future technical feats, and the establishment of the obsessive themes of isolation and romantic self-deception. Conrad at this point was fascinated by a white man falling apart, morally.

Alec made a good comment at the Thracian exhibit, which traced Thracian art from prehistoric through Greek and finally to Roman times. The Romans, he said, were interested in realistic depiction; that is why their sculptured faces are often so pudgy and ugly. The Greeks subjected realism to stylization, to an abstract ideal of grace and beauty. . . . Another highlight of last Saturday's visit to the Met was the retrospective Degas exhibit, showing work in various media throughout his life. What a thrill I always get in the presence of first-rate creativity. And, at the same time, how inadequate I feel as I review my own "achievements." The new Lehman wing, which we also saw, struck me as essentially vulgar: an assertion of culture by stockbrokers, displayed over-ostentatiously in relation to the true excellence of the objets d'art, many of which are second rate. There is to be a retrospective Cézanne show at the Museum of Modern Art in October. Must see that. Reading Woodhouse's new book on the Greek civil war, and working on my speech to the freshmen. One week left.

August 31, 1977

Something for all of us to remember, always: ¶ . . . it can hardly be denied that it is not their own deserts that men are most proud of, but rather of their prodigious luck, of their marvelous fortune: of that in their lives for which thanks and sacrifices must be offered on the altars of the inscrutable gods. —Conrad, in the "Author's Note" to the volume Youth in his collected works.

November 23, 1977

Hanover

I like Joyce's simple definition of love: "Love (understood as the desire of good for another) . . ." (in his notes to Exiles, p. 113)

1978

---

Hanover	January 1–May 25
Lubbock Texas, Texas Tech University, January 25–28
Oberlin, Leander’s senior recital, February 18–21
Montreal, chez Linda and Iman Amin, March 25–26
Riparius, Niagara Falls, Oberlin, Riparius	May 26–30
Hanover	June 12–23
Riparius	June 24–Sept. 1
Glens Falls Hospital, July 18–27
Mary Hitchcock Memorial Hospital, Hanover, August 13–17, 23
Hanover	Sept. 2–Dec. 31

February 8, 1978

Hanover

We’ve had immense snows. Ralph Rodgers, a NH native who teaches woodworking in the Hopkins Center shop, told me about his father, who ran the plows and snow-rollers in North Haverhill 40 years ago: “Used to show off by turning the whole rig around, six horses and all, in the covered bridge.”

February 12, 1978

¶ . . . the universal need for a way out of the mentality of acquisition and production, mercantilism and domesticity . . . (p. 126 of John D. Lyons, speaking of Artaud: Intoxication and Its Double, Yale French Studies 50, 1974, pp. 120–129)

February 19, 1978

Oberlin, Ohio

Leander’s Senior Recital went very well. He never played better. Full control, musicality, presence. The program was Mozart’s Sonata in C minor, K 457, Ravel’s Valses nobles et sentimentales, George Walker’s Theme & Variations from Sonata #1, and Schumann’s Carnaval, op. 9. The whole family was there. Chrysanthi, Daphne, and I arrived via AMTRAK from NH and Alec came from Haverford. This meant a lot to Leander. We had good talks with his lovely teacher, Frances Walker, both after the recital and at a leisurely breakfast the next day. She said that all Leander needs is self-confidence. He certainly sounded like an assured professional at this event.

June 10, 1978

Having just finished Volume I of Virginia Woolf's Diary, I am immensely embarrassed at the sporadic nature of this diary. I didn't even record Leander's graduation on May 29th or our trip: en route to Oberlin, first to the farm with Alec and Katy Van Dusen, to plant the garden, then to Niagara Falls, where we took the Maid of the Mist boat and cooled off on that immensely hot day. At Oberlin I met Howie Burnett; we talked for five hours non-stop as though the thirty years since Deerfield had never elapsed. He is totally conservative in politics, ethics, and life-style, but I let that pass. Leander, now a B.M., is reaping the glory by working as a laborer in the Pepsi Cola bottling factory in Loraine, at $4.30 per hour. But he's accepted into Manhattan School of Music starting September.

Virginia Woolf wrote up her diary every day, or almost every day, after tea; so it became a routine, or a habit, which she therefore missed when something intervened. She wrote at breakneck speed, without worrying about spelling or punctuation. She didn't strive to record her inner life, but rather her outer life, which of course in her case was usually immensely interesting and intellectual, as is mine, to a lesser degree. Will I be able to "form the habit"?

Today is the day before Commencement. I am awaiting the students and their parents whom I've invited (if any come): Steve Taylor, Brian Pastuszenski (who did honors projects with me), Walter Meeker (good in English 59), Michael Carroll, Conrad Duncan, Ann Hurwitz (Resource Center tutor), Bob Gray (ditto), Anne Tierney (violinist), Jim Ockenfels (Quaker), John McGrath (arms-control), Steve Holland, Tobey Simpson, Stu Gasner, Fred and John Kutscher. Daniella Veiser-Baron's father, the Israeli ambassador, was extraordinarily ugly, yet full of charm and graciousness. Steve Taylor came with his fiancée, a retiring puff of purity, much like himself. Brian never showed up.

Then we had a dinner party: Lafayette and Mayme Noda, Jack and Kathy Shepherd, and the Davenports. Jack Shepherd has just finished a book on running; he's training for the New York marathon. Next week he's going across country to be on TV shows, etc. to publicize the book. A very attractive man, full of energy, and very liberal in his attitudes. Haverford graduate; Quaker.

June 11, 1978

Commencement was held in good weather. End of my 17th year! The student valedictorian mortified us all by saying that he and his classmates were now “men and women,” which meant that they had outgrown their adolescent intellectual idealism and were ready to enter the job market. If only he were saying this ironically! But he wasn’t. John Rassias marched in ahead of me, embraced and kissed by half the girls in the row of students we passed, while the rest of us just marched solemnly by. Kemeny spoke beautifully, as always. In the afternoon, Chrysanthi protected me, thank god, from a visit by Kristin Lord, which would have lasted hours. I finished the first draft of my Virginia Woolf review. Then Noye and Dee Johnson came to dinner and I was able to rehearse with him, unexpectedly, the defense of humanism against technology that I have to give tomorrow. It was their 25th anniversary. Good people. He’s fighting for standards in grading and discipline (CCSC), etc.

Burns Chalmers telephoned. He wants me to go with him as part of a Quaker delegation to Governor Meldrum Thompson, preceding the Seabrook confrontation. . . . Joe and Emily Connelly have replaced me as Clerk of the Meeting.

July 12, 1978

Hanover

I took part in a panel discussion for Thayer School alumni on “Engineers—Part of the Problem, or the Solution?” I was supposed to represent the humanities. Fred Hooven spoke for the engineering profession, as did a student. Sam Florman, author of the Existential Pleasures of Engineering, moderated, and very well indeed. A luncheon preceded. I developed only one idea (I was limited to ten minutes), viz: that engineering developed when teleological thinking was prevalent; thus the engineer worried about his product—the end—and not about the process—the means—of making the product. Factories producing things meant for the betterment of mankind were themselves hellholes destroying our cities, etc. Now, I continued, existential thinking has superseded teleological, but not in engineering. Technology itself is not evil, but technology coupled with teleology can be very evil indeed. . . . A good discussion followed, and the whole thing was rather fun for me.

Afterwards, I oriented yet another prospective tutor for the Resource Center: Steve Wheeler, a bright lad who caught on quickly.

Tonight, John Rassias is coming to work on Ο ιπτάμενος θαλαμος, if he ever comes. We are about to begin the apparatus for Chapter 9, which I'll have the pleasure of typing into the computer tomorrow. I also have to write a short review of the French translation of Kazantzakis's Ταξι-δεύοντας Πουσία for World Literature Today.

Leon Black telephoned from Wall Street. He's coming up for his fifth reunion; we'll have lunch on Saturday. John Tallmadge is also expected sometime this week.

July 2, 1978

Riparius

In my "office"! We've been here a week and I've recorded nothing. But today is Sunday. Al Zalon and Mary and the Shapiros are coming later. We'll play music, then go to North Creek for the July 4th fireworks. Dr. Grunblatt is coming, too. So the day is somewhat different, even though I worked this morning, reading Καραγκιόζης for the ανάγνωση of Chapter 10 of our Ιπτάμενος θάλαμος, then beginning the revision of my translation of Ritsos's «Η σονάτα του σεληνόφωτος», which Jay Parini is going to publish in his new review.

The final days and weeks in Hanover were hectic, as always at this time of year. Reunion time brought John Tallmadge, Will Lee, Leon Black, and Henry Hart to the house for various meals, and hours of talk. We had our annual commencement party for graduates and parents. I participated in a Thayer School seminar, speaking on the humanists' critique of engineering, etc. But most of the final week was spent preparing MSS for BMGS. What a painstaking job! Then cleanup in office and home, which is even worse. Finally: in the car! Release!

Terpni beautiful and peaceful, as always. My tractor is still on blocks, though, since one rear rim rusted through and has to be replaced. The fruit trees are all laden this year: cherries and plums. Garden survived the frost, more or less. I've spent mornings in the office, still editing for BMGS, but this is now nearly finished. Afternoons "on the farm." Not much to do, really. I replaced the pane broken by burglars, I started to build a new bench next to the fireplace, I mowed with the Jari and sharpened its knives after having to break four rusted bolts with a cold chisel. Chrysanthi and Daphne are busier: picking strawberries, canning, making bread (Daphne is learning how to cook with lots of enthusiasm). Alec is fine in Avignon. He wrote a long, fine letter in French, and I replied in French. Leander isn't doing so well. He quit his job at the Pepsi Cola factory because his hands were so sore he couldn't play the piano. Then he wanted to leave Oberlin entirely and come here, but at the last minute he was offered a job bartending, and decided to stay. Leon Black gave us a lead on a nice apartment in NYC that we are pursuing for Leander's school year.

I must go now and limber up my fingers with scales and arpeggios in preparation for Al Zalon.

Tuesday, July 4, 1978

Al came twice. We played Handel, Mozart, Debussy, Corelli. Very nice indeed, but I wish that our piano were better. It gets worse each year.

Sunday dinner with Irv and Fran, Al and Mary. Then the annual ritual: July 4th fireworks at North Creek, with Jacques and Hilda Grunblatt; then drinks in their house.

I'm revising «Η σονάτα του σεληνόφωτος». It needed a lot of work. Also reading Proust again, which is a real pleasure. Berma's performance of Phèdra, de Norpois, etc. How subtle and understated Proust's humor is.

A woodchuck came and visited me in my office, within two feet, without fear. I suppose he mistook me for a tree.

Donna Trautwein is here tonight, talking incessantly about nothing. She never leaves. I'm doing the best I can, trying to concentrate. Proust is being sacrificed to Donna, alas.

Sunday, July 9, 1978

We're here two weeks, without a drop of rain. Severe drought. Forest fire in Brant Lake region. Gardens languishing. At Saratoga yesterday, the grass all brown and parched.

I neglected to record earlier that our large elm, what the boys call "the talking elm" because of its creaks, succumbed to Dutch Elm Disease. It's standing bare now in front of me as I write this in my "office" beneath the (still healthy, thank goodness) yellow birch. Our great ash next to the house also looks sick, and another elm, near the outhouse, is clearly dying.

On Friday we drove to Lenox to leave Daphne with Yiayia and Pappou for a week. They're staying at Mrs. Veselick's again: "Garden Gables." Met a CBC music producer and a documentary-maker, a Britisher and a French Canadian, vacationing there. They knew Hopkins Center, Joe Losey, etc. They apparently were a very content gay, middle-aged couple.

Went immediately that evening to Tanglewood to hear Brahms' German Requiem, which really I don't like very much; I prefer the Verdi and the Berlioz even, not to mention the Mozart. Dinner in a nice restaurant near Garden Gables. Chrysanthi and I were at Lenox and Tanglewood the first summer after our marriage, she remembered vividly. Leander was four months old, I was working for Pan Am at Idlewild Airport, and had a week's vacation or a long weekend. My parents had rented a cottage on Stockbridge Bowl. We drove up, went to a concert with Leander in the carriage, left the child with grandparents, and then came to the farm, which she hadn't seen before. So this was a kind of reunion, or nostalgic return to beginnings. To make things more complete, the Perkells, a couple who are friends of Yiayia's and Pappou's and whom we visited there in 1955, were still on Stockbridge Bowl, and we had another visit, after twenty-three years. Saturday morning we attended a rehearsal at Tanglewood, Vladimir Ashkenazy conducting, the Soviet pianist Mark Zeltzer playing the Tchaikovsky first piano concerto superbly—very clearly and powerfully. I still don't like Tchaikovsky, however, although the scherzo, the middle of the slow movement, was quite stunning. Then they rehearsed Tchaikovsky's 4th symphony, but we left after the first movement, which was all stop and go, and not much fun. Tanglewood groups still beautiful, the crowd a delight to see—all kinds of déjeuner sur l'herbe. The newly married son of the Stockbridge Bowl Perkells works in the bookstore. We left Daphne and drove back, straight to Saratoga. Two festivals in one day! Leisure buffet in the Hall of Springs, very pleasant, then a good program: "Ballo della Regina" (Verdi), a new ballet in traditional style, very exciting; "Four Temperaments" (Hindemith), among the best I've seen, abstract (despite the programmatic music), profound, leaving one with the feeling that one must see it again, immediately; "Vienna Waltzes" (Strauss, etc.), the poorest of the lot, but nice mise-en-scène, massed effects, scenery, etc. A prosperous gentleman in front of me sat stolidly throughout the entire performance, not applauding once, the brute. Home to Terpni at 12:30 a.m. to find garbage tipped over again by . . . a bear? . . . a coon (more likely)?

Bob McGrath telephoned from Dartmouth to invite me to be co-leader, with him, of a Dartmouth Alumni College cruise (chartered yacht, etc.) in Greece in October 1979. I think I'll accept.

Am re-reading Dubliners, along with Proust.

Thursday, July 20, 1978

Glens Falls Hospital

Surprise! I'm in the hospital, scheduled for an operation tomorrow to have my gall bladder removed. On Monday, July 17, our anniversary, we went for dinner at the Grist Mill in Warrensburg. That was the first mistake. The second was to order Wiener schnitzel with baked potato and sour cream. The third was to overeat. Afterwards I felt bloated but not really uncomfortable. I went to bed at the usual time and slept easily. But at about 2 a.m. I awoke with excruciating pain in the upper abdomen. It felt as though the whole intestines were in spasm. My tummy was hard as a rock. After about two hours of this, Chrysanthi called Jacques Grunblatt at 4 a.m., poor man (he's supposed to be retired!). He came and diagnosed an acute gall bladder attack. Meanwhile I had vomited profusely, broken into a hot sweat, then into a cold sweat and chills. Jacques called the North Creek volunteer ambulance. They came in about half an hour, installed me in the vehicle, and then the vehicle wouldn't start! Dead! I forgot to mention that throughout my travails in the cabin, four bats were flitting about in the living room. I didn't know that at the time, but Chrysanthi told me afterwards. They didn't make her feel any better. We called the reserve ambulance and arranged to meet in Wevertown. We all piled into Jacques' car—Chrysanthi, myself writhing in the back seat, Daphne, Jacques, and two ambulance drivers—and drove to Conway's store, where the other ambulance met us very promptly. I was still very uncomfortable all the way down. A Dr. Morrissey confirmed the diagnosis and turned me over to a young surgeon, Dr. Tucker (who has a brother-in-law who's a Dartmouth graduate). He gave me Demerol, which stopped the pain. Then some tests began: first a die swallowed, which was supposed to make the gall bladder show up on an x-ray. It didn't; the gall bladder failed to absorb it. Next, such are the wonders of science, they used ultrasound to make a "sonar gram," a kind of x-ray produced by the passage of high frequency sound waves through the body. This did show up the bladder and indicated that it was full of stones. So, an operation was definitely in order. What happened in the attack was that the gall bladder, after that fatal meal, was called upon to secrete bile into the intestine to aid the digestion of fats. It squeezed, and one of the stones was forced into the duct, which eventually grew too narrow to let it pass. The stone caused the duct to dilate, and this caused the pain.

After all this happened, I remembered a similar incident three or four years ago. We were in Weston, at the Inn, on the occasion probably of the final weekend at Kinhaven. At night, again at 2 a.m. or thereabouts, I had the same exquisite pain, the same spasm and hardening of the abdomen. Chrysanthi was sleeping in another bed, and I was able to weather the whole thing without waking her. Eventually, after three or four hours, the stone must have either popped back into the gall bladder or out into the intestine, and I felt fine. Stupidly, I suspected nothing more than a severe case of indigestion, and forgot the incident completely, without mentioning it to anyone. So, given this previous attack and the one the other day, one could conclude that I'd have similar attacks in the future. Thus the decision to operate.

I've been in a large lounge converted to a ward, with two others. One, Charles Ovitt of Corinth, had a piece of glass removed from his wrist. It had caused a cyst to develop. He is a farm boy turned carpenter and small contractor doing remodeling jobs on apartments. Nice young man, very sensitive and responsible, with high professional standards of honesty and integrity, or so it would seem. We had good talks. The other man, aged 67, is French, but he's been in this country off and on for 20 years. He owns and runs the French restaurant Chez Pierre on Route 9, and apparently is a professional accordionist. Very thin and spry, speaking nice Parisian French, and broken but adequate English, but a mess physically, with no stomach, emphysema, aneurysm, etc. He, too, had a violent attack, and they are trying to discover what caused it.

Fran and Irv Shapiro came down with Chrysanthi and visited the first day. So did Jacques and Hilda Grunblatt. Pappous and Yiayia of course telephoned from NYC and discussed the case with Dr. Tucker. Even Peter and Alice Buseck telephoned from Tempe. I feel very pampered.

Last week, on the 12th, we went to Saratoga again with Jacques and Hilda, meeting Bob and Ilona Bell for a sumptuous picnic and then another splendid night of ballet. "Ivesiana," "Afternoon of a Faun," and the Prokofiev waltzes. Bob now has tenure at Williams and is very relaxed; Ilona resigned her job at Smith, exhausted from maintaining two residences and commuting. She's writing a book on George Herbert. Bob has turned his hand to short stories, having given up his projected book on autobiography—he says that he really does not have a genuine drive to be a scholar. At least he's entirely honest about it.

Before the attack, I finished Dubliners, continued with the Prevelakis translation and some remaining manuscripts for BMGS that had to be edited, and, most importantly, began my speech for the MGSA Washington symposium on the effect of 1940–1941 on Kazantzakis. Alas, the attack came just as I'd gained some momentum on this; I hope that I can get back into it without too much delay. The large project, the full book on Kazantzakis's politics, daunts me and tends to paralyze me. I am beginning now to realize that it won't get written unless I write it (!), and to realize, in other words, that I may never write it, especially if I procrastinate and divert myself, as I've been doing recently. The cruise in Greece is one more diversion, but yesterday I turned down an offer to be a consultant in a series of radio programs on Homer's Odyssey; that made me feel good. I've got to say No more often, at Dartmouth, too. Maybe last spring's experience with the Search Committee for a new Director of Admissions will teach me a lesson. I thought I could really do some good; everyone told me, "You're wasting your time. No matter what the committee says, they'll promote the current Associate Director, Al Quirk, who is mediocre at best." In the event, they promoted Al Quirk. My long and impassioned letter to President Kemeny obviously made little impression. Maybe the time has come to stop wasting valuable hours on such futile committees.

I am reading Proust in the hospital, "Mme. Swann Receives" at present. Competition exists from television and visitors, general hubbub, but I'm managing. It does seem a little overblown: every emotion and incident and character is analyzed at such inordinate length. But, as Proust himself insists, the redeeming factor is style. The metaphors and the sentences themselves, even in English, are exquisite.

Letter yesterday from Peter Gardner (Chrysanthi brought the mail). He is now installed in his new house together with his ex-wife! A miserable human arrangement endured because it's a splendid financial and practical arrangement, apparently. Poor Peter—such a good personality and such a charmer, yet he's had two disastrous marriages whereas I, with none of his attractions in my personality, have, so far, had a stable and happy marriage. Obviously the main reason was that I found a woman who is willing to put up with me.

The last thing I did at the farm was to make a cemented "lump" containing the pipe to hold the clothesline so that it would stand up straight.

Also touched up the cement on the piers of the Guest House, which still look rather precarious. Every bit helps, but I doubt if I'll do any more this summer. I'll be lucky if I can finally secure the new rim for the Allis Chalmers so that it can be put into service next year.

9:30 p.m. I've been prepped, instructed, showered, and am ready for the sacrifice. Chrysanthi was here again. Another telephone call to Pappou and Yiayia. Good wishes from everyone. I feel coddled and flattered. Leander, too, was informed and offered to come home immediately, but Chrysanthi dissuaded him.

I read considerable Proust this afternoon, and when Chrysanthi arrived with my Creighton dictionary and the text of Prevelakis's speech on Kazantzakis, I did another two pages of translation, very easily and efficiently, that made me feel better. If all goes well, I'll continue after the operation. Perhaps I can write again in this book—not tomorrow, in all likelihood, but on Saturday. I like Myrivilis's ending at this point: Τέλος και ἡ δόξα τῷ Θεῷ.

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

Glens Falls Hospital

¶ I felt in her presence that desire to live which is reborn in us whenever we become conscious anew of beauty and of happiness. —Marcel, after viewing a pretty girl on the station platform during his train ride to Balbec, in Place-Names, the Place (Random House, p. 498).

Thursday, July 17, 1978

Glens Falls Hospital

Marvin brought me pajama bottoms along with the usual gown this morning, inaugurating a new, and final, stage in the hospital portion of my recuperation. Yesterday, Dr. Tucker removed the Penrose drain from my abdomen, pulling it out sleekly like a fish coming out of water, so now I have just a protective screen over the incision, which healed very rapidly indeed, and a 4 × 4 over the drain hole, which this morning was clean. Last night I slept five or six hours at least and was comfortable throughout, whereas the previous night I had lain awake constantly and had rolled futilely from side to side, wracked with gas pains. Of course my roommate here, a plucky old geyser from Fort Edward called Ray Gorham, wretched phlegm as usual (I am almost used to it now), and at one point someone across the hall fell out of bed and began screaming "Help!" maniacally. For ten minutes I felt I was in Bedlam. Then quiet descended again.

The worst moment yesterday was early in the morning, when I sneezed, sending an excruciating pain through my abdomen.

Dr. Tucker assures me that the operation was “a massive insult” to my abdominal organs and that I should be forbearing with them if they seem to take weeks or even months to behave normally again. I will tire easily—I feel that right now, although my total activity today, so far, is to have risen, changed gowns, washed, shaved, walked three times “around the circle,” cut my fingernails, gotten back into bed, and written out this much of today’s entry. But unbelievably, my eyelids are drooping. I’ll have to stop.

Later: Dr. Tucker is encouraged; says I may be able to go home tomorrow. Chrysanthi showed up early in the morning—with Leander! He regaled us with his experiences as Pepsi Cola factory worker and then as bartender at Prestis’s of Oberlin.

Friday, July 28, 1978

Glens Falls Hospital

Thomas Mann was brilliantly right to set the bizarre events of Der Zauberberg against a backdrop of utter routine. The early-morning thermometer, the reading of the pulse, the question “Did you move your bowels yesterday?” begin life anew each a.m. Add to these beginnings so many other “events” that occur in a particular order and at a particular, almost identical, hour, each day, and we get the warp against which runs the web of the patient’s improvement or decline. Marvin arrives with a fresh gown, towel, and washcloth. Someone empties your urinal and enters the amount voided on your chart, opposite the amount imbibed. A lady in green empties the wastebasket, inserting a new, immaculate, plastic liner. At 6:00 a.m. or thereabouts the menu for the following day arrives, so succulent in its nomenclature when compared to the actual objects that arrive on the tray, and you circle your choices. Then there are the shifts of personnel. The night nurse examines your wound and leaves. Then fat Mary Smith, and Ellen, and Marvin and the rest arrive promptly at 7:00. At 3:00 another group comes, including the sweet Angie Barber, and is briefed about each patient’s progress. At 11:00 the night-shift takes over, but by that time you have received your sleeping pill and—more importantly, the ultimate indulgence—your back-rub with crème and then talc, and are fast asleep.

The patients, too, those who are ambulatory enough to be visible, form their little habits and routines that add to the total. I myself have become a “sight,” since I circle the hallways so methodically and so often, always with smiles of encouragement, or friendly jibes, from the personnel. “Wanna race, Pete?” (I move slower than the proverbial tortoise.) “When ya gonna start jogging, Pete?” A group of farmers, fat and growly voiced, sits at the end of one hallway in what I call their “club,” a man with no nasal passages who breathes through a necklace-looking mechanism on his throat, stands sword-straight in the hallway in a white bathrobe and smiles benignly at passers-by. He has no larynx and cannot talk except through his stomach, so to speak. An officious young man with a huge beer belly stares frowningly at television. Aristocratic Mr. Cameron, next door, plays cards with his wife, who seems to be sleeping insofar as I can tell. Still more aristocratic Edith Hudnut, in the middle of the hall, emerges once a day for seven or eight halting steps with a walker. She has an obese private nurse who is colossally bored, sitting hopelessly for hour after tedious hour in the armchair as nonagenarian Mrs. Hudnut sleeps away her days.

Then there is the newspaper boy each morning. “But where is he today?” people ask. Perhaps yesterday’s driving rains prevented the papers from being printed. Instead comes the despairing little offer from a volunteer lady of something from her “craft cart.”

But by far the most important event each day is the arrival of one’s doctor—if he arrives. Dr. Tucker hasn’t missed a day since Monday, though once he didn’t show up until late in the afternoon, which was a real trial.

And so, against these regular, habitual recurrences, one gets better . . . or worse. I of course am getting better. And how remarkable it is to think of the body making all those new cells and fusing together the muscle that was sliced through as definitively as a steak when we divide it into several portions. Today, for example, on my walk around the halls, for the very first time my wound did not hurt at all as I strode tortoise-like on my rounds. Also, I am much less tired now at about 8:30 a.m.—having risen, washed, shaved, walked, and written in this diary—than I was at the comparable moment yesterday. I look forward to my breakfast with a lusty appetite.

Thursday, August 3, 1978

Terpni

This is the first morning that there was no drainage from my abdomen. The drainage hole is beginning to scab over. It is two weeks since the operation and one week since my discharge and return home.

I've been working in my office again, but have lost the momentum and strength to do original writing . . . so far. I've spent my time on the Journal and on the Prevelakis translation. But I continue to read Proust with pleasure and concentration, and I have begun to listen each evening to Alexander Scourby's reading of Ulysses. Yesterday I felt an extreme fatigue in arms and legs, and had to take three naps during the day; but other days I've had a little more energy than this, though still of course greatly less than normal. All this is consistent with the doctor's forecast; thus I can assume that my recuperation is proceeding normally.

In the hospital I had written to both Leonard Rieser and President Kemeny to voice my disappointment over the selection of Al Quirk as Director of Admissions, and I also mentioned my illness. Yesterday, to my surprise, I had telephone calls from both—how kind of them. The president assured me that the situation would be improved because he had given the vice president of student affairs, Ralph Manual, much more supervisory power of the admissions office than had existed previously. Cold comfort! Also, it was the trustees that pressed for an appointment. I told Leonard that mediocrity seems destined to win, and that I was fed up with academic politics. He said that nice things were also happening at Dartmouth—specifically Saul Bellow's address to a packed house the other day. Sorry I missed that. Bellow, among other things, hit out at academia, saying that when novelists—for example, Herman Melville—write, they write because they want to be read by a large public; they do not write in an effort to titillate super-sophisticated critics. In other words, academia has made a fetish of "interpretation" and in so doing has denigrated the novelist's art.

I read a strong statement against universities by Parker Palmer, director of studies at Pendle Hill. What he wants is "Christian community," not the upward mobility and elitism fostered by our universities. I must write to him.

Sunday, August 6, 1978

Terpni

Maybe this is the hardest part: the waiting. Jim Eppersen wrote and said, "Be patient." I find this hard. Indeed, for the first time in my life (that I can remember, at least) I wake up in the morning wishing that the day didn't have to exist. It's not that I contemplate each new day with dread—that would be a gross exaggeration. It's not so much a negative feeling as the absence of any strong positive feeling. Obviously, one should awake in the morning thinking, "Fine! I can't wait. There's so much I want to do and experience between now and nightfall. Hurry!" Such thoughts are entirely absent in me now, even though each day I do do a little of this, a little of that. Maybe it's the change in the color of my urine that has me worried and depressed. Is there blood in it, meaning internal bleeding? Or is the concentration of bile naturally higher, since no bladder exists now to store the bile? Tomorrow morning I'll call Dr. Tucker.

Alec telephoned from George's house in Salonika last night. He'd just arrived in Greece and was tremendously excited. He doesn't know about my operation yet, but I wrote him the other day. Leander signed a one-year lease for an apartment on Riverside Drive and 108th Street.

Monday, August 14, 1978 Mary Hitchcock Memorial Hospital, Hanover
Incredibly, I'm back in the hospital, this time in Hanover. All was going well; I even had a kind of pleasure feeling my strength return, being able to work longer hours without fatigue, experiencing simple pleasures anew, such as sleeping on my side again after two weeks only on my back—all was going well when, on about August 4 or 5, I noticed that my urine was darker, indeed very dark. On Monday the 7th I reported this to Dr. Tucker, who told me to get a urinalysis. This indicated the presence of bilirubin in the urine, and the conclusion everyone came to, provisionally at least, was that I have another stone, this time in the common duct, and that this is partially blocking the flow of bile so that bile is backing up, being absorbed in the blood stream and thence finding its way into the urine. Hepatitis, and/or jaundice are in the offering, if not complete blockage of the duct with dire results. On Friday the 11th I visited Dr. Tucker, who felt that I should go back in the hospital, and who indicated his readiness to operate again if the tests indicated the need. But my father discovered that at none other than Mary Hitchcock Hospital are two renowned specialists in this area, Dr. Thomas Almy and Dr. Karl, the surgeon. It made sense for me to go to Hanover, obviously. So Leander, Chrysanthi, Daphne, and I piled into the car yesterday and came. Leander is camping out in the Meeting House, Chrysanthi is staying with Trix Officer, Daphne with the Rassiases.

Since I arrived here yesterday afternoon I've been questioned or examined by an intern, a surgical resident, Dr. Lou Matthews, and Dr. Almy. Dr. Karl hasn't come yet. The tests have begun. They say that they ought to know one way or the other by Wednesday. The brightest sign, unless I am clutching at straws, is that yesterday and today my urine has been much lighter. Dr. Almy said that stones sometimes do pass through naturally. (Prayers and supplications.) Almy, by the way, is an eminent researcher in this field. He has a $5 million grant and has reached the point where he can dissolve stones chemically and where he thinks he is beginning to understand precisely what malfunction in the kidney makes bile lithogenic. But, he told me, the side effects of the chemical treatment still preclude its use; also, a patient would be dependent on the chemical for the rest of his life. In short, surgery is still preferable. But what exciting work Dr. Almy is doing! If he's lucky, he'll find all the answers, for which surely he should get a Nobel Prize in medicine. None of this, of course, will help me between today and Wednesday, yet it may help my children.

John Rassias came by last night. It's nice to see familiar faces. The girl who came in to do an EKG was a former Dartmouth student whom I recognized, and the technician who drew my blood this morning was Arnie Hawk, who came to Mary Hitchcock in the '60s as a CO and lived in the Meeting House, then stopped coming to Meeting when his service ended and he no longer needed us. I always felt angry toward him, but when he arrived a few moments ago I overcame this easily and we had a very nice visit. His CO service obviously directed his life in a way that seems permanent; he's still here, married, has just built his own house in Thetford, etc.

News came that Jay Walker died in a motorcycle accident in Greece. I'm not surprised. Previously, he had "totaled" a car and seemed to be proud of this accomplishment. Then he took to motorcycling. After his last leave-term, when he returned he greeted me with the words "27,000 miles!" This summer he took off again, presumably aiming at another 27,000 miles on that suicidal machine. Suicidal man. Somewhere in the Bronx he has an old mother, I believe. He was our colleague in the English Department for five or six years or more, but never allowed us to get to know him. He was always gone, either in Washington with his Black Studies off-campus program, or in various exotic places.

In the past week or so I finished Proust's second volume, with great pleasure. One gets into a rhythm reading Proust. The passion for precise analysis is really carried to an extreme and is almost exasperating, yet always so brilliant. Then I began Joyce's Portrait, with undiminished admiration, although this must be the tenth time I've read it. Also, every night we've all been listening to Alexander Scourby reading Ulysses. Saturday, before coming here on Sunday, we reached the great climactic end of Circe. If all goes well, I'll be able to hear the Nostos at the farm before the summer is done. (Prayers, supplications.) It's been a pleasure for me to have initiated Leander, and even Chrysanthi, into the Ulyssean mysteries. Leander seems quite taken with the book, and even Chrysanthi is able to understand the essence of it. Of course most of this is owing to Scourby's magnificent reading. What an instrument his voice is, and how consummately he plays upon that instrument!

I finally secured a new rim for the tractor tire. Now we're trying to get a tube. That problem, too, with luck will be set right by the end of the summer. But my poor fields will not be mowed this year.

My illness has, as always, brought out friendships and decencies that were perhaps latent. How nice to receive sensitive letters from Darrel Mansell, Bill Cook, and especially from Harry Schultz; also Fred Berthold, Leonard Rieser, Ellen Rose, Jim Eppersen, Jim Heffernan, Ned Perrin, Jay Parini, and others. Brenda Silver's was predictably egotistic and infantile. People reveal themselves at such moments.

I have a ferocious attachment to the farm—to Terpni. I realize, especially now, that there is where I want to be. I want to recuperate there, to get well there, to be able to exercise my strength once again—there! I don't feel that way about Hanover, although I do like Hanover, too, in many ways. But it's not mine; I don't belong. The farm has my imprint; it is me and I am it to large degree; it has molded my ideals and strengthened my body all these many years. When I say "I want to go home," I mean there, not to 12 Ledyard Lane.

On Saturday, as a last fling between operations (if indeed I am condemned to the second operation), I wrote a review for World Literature Today of Stylianos Harkianakis's volume of poems Χώμα και στάχτη. How fine they are, and what an unusual man wrote them—a sophisticated intellectual, bon vivant, lover of earthly joys, yet a mystic, believer, possessed of an otherworldly perspective, and withal a prince of the Church: Archbishop of Australia! I would like to try to translate some of the poems; maybe I could place them in the TLS. I've written to "His Eminence" asking for permission.

What did not get done this summer, alas, is the talk I am supposed to give at the Washington MGSA Symposium in November. Somehow, I'll produce it. If only I can escape this second operation and have two or three productive weeks before we return to Hanover.

Leander is going to do a recital at the Hart School with Alice Cognetta, and has been practicing the Franck violin-piano sonata. They're also going to do the Kreutzer.

Tuesday, August 15, 1978

Mary Hitchcock Memorial Hospital

The tests conducted yesterday haven't produced many results. The bilirubin is at 2.4–1.5 is normal. But it could be a lot worse. The ultrasound showed nothing, because apparently the dye doesn't work when bilirubin is elevated. Today they apparently have some more tricks up their sleeves. So, in one way, yesterday was a disappointing day. In another, it was encouraging, since the urine remained clear and the ultrasound was negative, showing a duct that is not swollen, and no sign of a stone.

Audrey Logan came. They've sold their huge house in Meriden and are looking for a smaller one. Miriam Arndt visited, more with Chrysanthi than with me. Leonard Rieser came too, with his huge smile. We talked about Jay Walker. And—lo and behold!—Werner Kleinhardt, recently back from a year in Mainz. Peter Cohen, now a third-year medical student, and just beginning his nine-week tour on the surgical service, visited twice, and stayed and stayed. He's a fluid talker, and turning into a real scientist. He enabled us to understand how really primitive medical science is; what they can do is dwarfed a thousand-fold by what they cannot do and do not understand. And even in the areas where they can do something, very often they don't understand why they are doing it.

In some scattered moments I managed to read a little. I'm in Chapter 5 of the Portrait now, and learning lots on every page. It's a great solace in a place like this . . . or anywhere.

Dr. Karl, the chief surgeon, showed up finally, yesterday. A huge imposing handsome man exuding power and self-confidence. I suppose that's a characteristic of the breed. Dr. Almy returned and gave me a formal examination. I liked the concentration and intensity on his face as he listened to my chest. It must be very pleasurable, really, to practice medicine when your attitudes are good ones—i.e., when you're interested in the patient as a human being and in the disease as an intellectual and scientific challenge. Almy, among other things, was the first doctor who ever looked at my feet. (I'm thinking of the inadequate general physicals given me by Lou Matthews and by Dr. Wright, before him.) Almy was worried about a little mole he noticed on the sole of one foot; apparently moles in such a location are susceptible to metathesis. I must have a dermatologist look at it.

Wednesday, August 16, 1978

MHMH, Hanover

Nothing happened at all yesterday except another blood test that showed the bilirubin at the same level, and the unwanted enzymes still in the liver. This morning Dr. Storey, the resident, said that Dr. Karl will probably want to do a transhepatic colangiogram next. This is a procedure in which the dye that didn't do anything when introduced intravenously, is now inserted directly into the liver by means of a needle through the flank. This ought to enable them to x-ray the entire biliary system and, if there's a stone, to see it. They do this in the OR, because they have to be prepared, says Storey, to operate immediately since the dye sets up pressures, etc. that lead to . . . consequences. Very pleasant! I have had dreams of grandeur from my childhood onward, envisioning myself as conductor of the Philharmonic, as a Nobel Prize laureate, etc., but I never dreamed of becoming Prometheus—and now this dream is about to come true: chained to the OR with a surgeon pecking at my liver. Since the procedure requires OR time, it may not happen until Friday or Saturday. Apparently Dr. Karl will be in to see me today.

The intern was in, and now I understand things better. The danger with the transhepatic colangiogram is, of course, that they are poking more-or-less blindly with the needle and may cause internal bleeding that will require immediate attention by means of an incision, and tying off the vessels. Very nice! He also gave me a better understanding of what is happening in my system. The red blood cells (RBCs) of the body live about 120 days and then die and have to be cleared out. When they die, they become bilirubin; thus there is always a certain concentration of bilirubin in the blood. This goes into the liver, where the bilirubin is combined with certain other chemicals so that it becomes soluble. So it enters as non-soluble bilirubin and leaves the liver as soluble bilirubin.

It leaves through the hepatic ducts that join in the common duct; then it goes into the colon, turns the feces brown, and is excreted.

When there is a blockage in the hepatic ducts, the soluble bilirubin backs up and is reabsorbed into the blood. That is what is happening with me. The soluble bilirubin was 1.8 yesterday; it's meant to be 0.3 or so; the non-soluble was 0.8 (I think), making a total of 2.6. The total, in other words, is not as important as the amount of soluble, which is high, indicating an obstruction.

He said that there are two leading possibilities for the cause of this obstruction. The first is of course our old friend the stone, which is probably embedded in the wall, causing a constriction. The other might be a swelling at the site of the former gall bladder duct, where the sutures were placed by Dr. Tucker.

I'm not sure what the treatment would be for the latter.

Later: Dr. Karl came. He definitely wants to do the transhepatic colangiogram. It will be this afternoon or tomorrow morning. Then, in all likelihood, they'll operate. But there is also a possibility that the procedure won't work, that the die won't enter the ducts. If this happens, they'll try the tube down in the duodenum; there's a 60% chance of that working.

Lots of visitors yesterday: Dick Williamson came twice, John Rassias came again, but I missed him because I was talking to Karen Sheldon in her room; she's having a hysterectomy this morning. Mayme Noda, Andrey Logan, Emily and Joe Connelly all came, too, and Ann Ludwig just for a minute, on her way to her natural childbirth class. Darrel Mansell came, too; such a good man. The only one who angered me was Mary Rassias, who came and then proceeded to talk to Chrysanthi the whole time as though I didn't exist. Maybe I've forgotten some others. I was told that Pat Wykes called the hospital and was informed that I wasn't here! The Schultzes also, I was told, left a note, which I've never received.

Leander is going to telephone Schroon Lake today to check on the tractor tire. It's good to continue to be concerned about life's unimportant things; they are what give a sense of stability and continuance. Similarly, Chrysanthi is worried lest the string beans all mature with no one there to pick them. And the plums, tomatoes, corn. Life's little pleasures suddenly seem inordinately large.

I began The Last Temptation. To my relief, I like the translation, although I shuddered to find "Land of Slavery" instead of "Land of Bondage." But everything is so hyperbolic, so overblown (I mean the way Kazantzakis wrote it, not the way I translated it). Probably the reason why The Greek Passion is his best is the presence there of humor and relaxation, to set off the romantic excesses of emotion, anguish, and ecstasy that seem to be constant in The Last Temptation. Yet the novel has a vividness that is remarkable. One sees, hears, smells, feels the characters and the setting.

Midday: Tom Almy came in with a new theory. One enzyme in the liver function test does not conform to the hypothesis of a stone, but rather to the hypothesis of jaundice caused by an allergic reaction to the anaesthetic I received, named Halithane (or Fluithane). So, they now are going to wait a while, to postpone the transhepatic colangiogram, and to watch the blood analysis for a few days. If it is a reaction to the anaesthetic it will pass, and probably without doing any permanent damage to the liver. Μακάρι!

More visitors: Dick Williamson again, the truly faithful friend. Jim Heffernan, Ned Perrin, Fred Berthold. Eleanor Horne telephoned. The Schultzes sent a note; the Wykeses sent flowers.

I should add that Almy telephoned Dr. Tucker to find out what anaesthetic I'd received. Tucker, he said, was a bit peevish at first, but then cooperative. If it turns out to be Halithane (= Fluithane) I should be very careful to warn any future anesthesiologist with whom (as I hope not) I have to deal.

Thursday, August 17, 1978

MHMH, Hanover

Long talks with Peter Cohen yesterday. He is so excited about the frontiers of medicine, it's a pleasure to see. He also chided me, graciously, for my self-pity when I arrived. The point is that my troubles, even with another stone, are nothing compared to what he sees every day. À propos, Lafayette Noda, who visited last night, told us about Tom Pinder, also a friend of Ned Perrin's, a young man in his 40s who had just set himself up as a carpenter in Thetford when cancer was discovered in his spine. Now he's in a wheelchair, at best, and he'll die in short order. It all started from a mole on his back. And, across the hall, a lady died last night. Another man had an entire lung removed, etc., etc.

Audrey Logan, who sold her house and is systematically disposing of accumulated furniture, is in effect going to furnish Leander's entire apartment. He has ordered a U-Haul truck for September and will move his belongings plus all of Audrey's gifts down to Riverside Drive to set up house. How exciting!

Soapy and Ole Amundsen peeked in last night with a vase of flowers but wouldn't stay. They thought that Peter Cohen was a doctor and didn't want to interrupt. A sign pinned up on the hospital wall is all-too-appropriate for my case: "You see only what you look for; you recognize only what you know." —Merril C. Sossiman. "Positive diagnoses are made at the expense of conscience." —Sir William Osler. "Every self-respecting arrhythmia has at least three possible interpretations." —Rosenbaum's aphorism.

Karen Pelz and Tim Burke visited. How nice! Tim, who is going to be my Head Tutor in the Resource Center, got a little scared when he saw the Personnel Department's advertisement for the job. I explained to him that this was required by law, and is just a formality that is unavoidable.

Dr. Porter, dermatologist, looked at my moles. No problem, he assured me. But I have dry skin, should bathe infrequently (which I do), and coat myself with Nivea after the bath, baths being better than showers.

Don Pease visited. My stay has led to many surprises. Jay Parini came again, then Soapy again, then Susan Chambers with a painting to cheer me up. Brenda telephoned to say that she and Paul would be by later.

But around 5:00 p.m. Dr. Karl suddenly appeared and said I probably should go home! Hooray! He wants some time to elapse in order to see where the bilirubin level is really going (today's level, alas, was up a bit, from 2.1 to 2.3). So I'm scheduled to have blood drawn at 8 a.m. next Wednesday and to see him at 2:30. If the bilirubin is down, he'll do the intravenous colangiogram again, after which we ought to know what's what. Then three possibilities still remain: a stone, inflammation caused by the operation at the point where the cystic duct was severed, reaction to Halithane.

So, without further ado, we gathered up Leander and Daphne and drove back to the farm. How beautiful it was, with clouds scudding across the face of a full moon and a fresh breeze swaying the foliage.

Friday, August 18, 1978

Terpni

Good night's sleep in my own bed. Morning in my office. I took up work on my Washington symposium article where I had left off, and wrote a few pages, not without some feelings of weariness, however. Fresh tomatoes, lettuce, onions from the garden for lunch, and a fresh plum from our tree for desert! Leander has gone off now to try to retrieve the tractor tire. I rested after lunch; my temperature is normal. We'll pray now that friend bilirubin is going down, down, down.

Saturday, August 26, 1978

Terpni

I saw a heron flying across the sky this morning with its thin neck stretched forward and its huge wings flapping ever so slowly and effortlessly. And last night we most certainly had a bear right outside the house, under the ash tree. Chrysanthi heard a "large animal" moving outside, and we all went out with a lantern but of course saw nothing. But this morning we found the characteristic droppings: large, and full of undigested berries. Sherman Frasier visited in the evening and confirmed the finding immediately. Undoubtedly it was also this bear that ate Astro's food the other night, and perhaps raided the garbage cans last month.

Last Tuesday evening we drove again to Hanover so that I could have another blood test at 8:00 a.m. on Wednesday the 23rd. We slept over in Bill and Madeleine Smith's house, ignorant of the fact that the Baums had left our house precipitously because of the illness of his father in NYC. I then saw Dr. Karl in the afternoon, and he told me the good news that the bilirubin was down to 1.1 (1.0 is normal). The enzymes were also down a little, the one indicating allergy quite a lot, and only the serum amylase unchanged. Dr. Karl took me down to the pathologist, who explained that most of the elevated enzymes did not necessarily indicate current malfunction, since they have long half-lives and simply circulate in the blood until they break down chemically. The amylase, however, with a half-life of only a half hour or so, indicates a current malfunction, this time of the pancreas—i.e., of the digestion of starch. In any case, no one was very worried, though we'll check the blood again in a few weeks. Given the low bilirubin, Dr. Karl ordered another try at the intravenous colangiogram. This took almost one and a half hours. The dye invaded the liver nicely but was slow in going into the ducts; nevertheless, they were able to get a view of the ducts which, though poorly visualized, displayed no dilation. Conclusion: no stone. Hurray! Dr. Karl sent me home again, warning me against another dose of Halithane. Subsequently I tried to get more information about liquid paper, which may have sensitized me to the anesthetic. The Liquid Paper Corporation is at 9130 Markville, Dallas, Texas 75231, telephone 214 783-2600. I called, and the chemist, very defensively, said that the formula is secret but that it contains no fluorocarbons. He assumed that Halithane (Fluithane) might contain fluorocarbons.

How nice both Richard Karl and Tom Amy, not to mention Lou Matthews, were to me throughout the ordeal! Karl gave me a truly princely treatment, and it was the first time that I felt glad to be the Third Century Professor in the Humanities, since this obviously made me seem very important in his eyes. Also, Dr. Aaron Feder in New York, a former colleague, had written to both Karl and Almy saying how close he was to the Biens, etc. So, although the doctors still don't know what happened to me, I feel much gratitude for their care and have written them all accordingly, stressing the collegiality I observed at every stage of the proceedings.

Today, for the first time since July 17th, I put on my boots in the afternoon. I raked a good patch of hay and felt none the worse for it. How fine to be active again! Tomorrow Leander, Alec, and I will have to tar the shed roof (which is leaking again) in an effort to preserve it until next summer, when we can re-roof it properly. And apples and plums have to be picked, hay moved into the garden and spread as mulch, the house closed up, etc., all within the next week, when I also hope to be able to finish my Washington Symposium talk in its first draft.

Alec flew home from London today and telephoned from New York. He'll be here tomorrow with lots and lots to tell us.

I finished The Last Temptation this afternoon. It's certainly not a masterpiece, but it isn't bad, really. I wish I'd done some of the translation differently—"land of bondage" instead of "land of slavery," "Why do you persecute me?" (re: St. Paul) instead of "Why do you pursue me?" maybe even "Thy will be done" instead of "Your will be done," but that would have created a terrible mess with all the other times that "you" is used when addressing God.

Sunday, September 10, 1978

Hanover

We returned on September 1st, with Leander going ahead in the Dart, fully loaded, and Alec, Daphne, Chrysanthi and I following later in the Buick, also fully loaded. Alec had been with us for a week, full of stories from Paris, Avignon, Brindisi, Athens, Salonika, Dover, and London. He had splendid summer. In the last few days at the farm we had the Grunblatts (including Mark), the Shapiros, and the Perrymans over for farewells. And Mark took Leander and Alec to Lake George for a spree. We did more roof tarring, last-minute mowing, mulched the garden, etc. And what a garden this year! Lots and lots of tomatoes, corn, spinach, string beans, peppers (for the first time), squash, onions, parsley, lettuce, beets. Then there were the plum trees, too. They all bore, and one of them bore in abundance. (The coons ate everything on one tree.) Sherman Frazier visited one day, too, with a buddy. We talked old times, and the boys marveled at the kind of company I kept before I was married.

In Hanover—packing, packing, packing. Leander rented a huge truck, which they filled with the furniture he'd gotten from Audrey Logan and their own things. Peter Carman came to join them, bringing more things. Supper with his father, professor of religion at Harvard, very quiet at first but by the time dinner was half finished he was delivering a full lecture on the Moonies. Alec managed to get the Dart passed inspection at an "easy" station in Orford. Now I'm trying to sell the heap, which won't start half the time. The boys left at 7:00 a.m. (!) on Tuesday, September 4th, drove to 355 Riverside Drive (apartment 4S), unloaded Leander's things, whereupon Alec and Peter C. continued on to Haverford. Daphne went off to school on the same day; now in 7th grade.

I spent the week in revising The Moonlight Sonata once again and typing the changes into the computer (my addiction!), also in attending to queries in the Prevelakis translation, organizing the office, etc. Procrastinating with course preparation.

On Thursday we went to Peter Smith's for supper in Strafford, with Paul and Margaret Clifford, Paul Clifford of course being the president of Selly Oak Colleges. Very pleasant. We talked about Fircroft. My letter, which, he said, made Christopher Cadbury rabid; the dismal sequel; the place is still closed; the trustees are totally intransigent. Mrs. Clifford, an enthusiast for things literary, is interested in Dryden. I introduced her to David Wykes the next morning, while taking Paul around to see Fred Berthold and others (Rob Oden) with like interests. The contact whetted my appetite for Woodbrooke again.

Yesterday, Saturday, Brenda Marder came. Very vivacious. Hopes to see us in Greece. She told how Bruce Lansdale almost lost his job at the Farm School in a battle of fundamentals with the trustees, who now are businessmen without any idealism. Bruce won this time. It's the same old story: organization vs. community. À propos, the Harvard Magazine had a piece on F. O. Matthiessen. His letters are now available. He committed suicide, of course, in my sophomore year, and I remember old-stone-face Kenneth Murdoch weeping in class the next day. Matthiessen's trouble—naturally!—was homosexuality. Poor man. If he'd been born twenty years later he'd not have felt so guilty and secretive about it perhaps, because of the gay liberation movement in the '70s. In any case what interested me in the article—especially in light of my experiences and frustrations on the Budget Council last year, where I saw the organization men at work—was M's obsession with the "community of scholars," with the university as an organism and not as a cost-effective machine. I was fascinated to learn that he hated Conant and protested to him and opposed his policies during this period, fascinated because it was precisely Conant's policies that made me feel that Harvard was such a "mechanical" place, and induced me to go to Haverford, which I (luckily) found to be an organism and a community still, not an organization or machine.

Sunday October 1, 1978

Hanover

Robert Gerrow, who killed the young man on Waddell Road in 1973, escaped from prison (!), throwing all our neighbors into consternation.

Donna Trautwein even telephoned us here in Hanover to warn us against visiting the farm. But on September 11th Gerrow was found by the police. He opened fire on them (how had he obtained a gun?!) and they killed him. Finis.

So much activity in the last three weeks! I can't even remember much of it. Setting up the Resource Center again; training new tutors; finishing my translation of Prevelakis's "Nikos Kazantzakis: Life and Works"; lecturing on Kazantzakis in Comparative Literature 48 (how pleasing to find four of my students from the Freshman Seminar with me again: Bill Vitalis, Andy Lewin, Allison Pingel, and Kristin Lindgren). Guests and more guests. Michael Tobias, a "Zen mountaineer," who edged out John Tallmadge for the job in Environmental Studies. Bert Minkin, who came to read the poetry of Dimitrios Capetanakis. Ellen de Cesare Kahn. Yiayia and Pappou. Maybe others, too. Bob Daubenspeck came one Sunday and varnished the icon I bought last Christmas in Chicago. Now Leander is here for a long weekend, fleeing his cockroaches. His lessons with Robert Goldsand are going well, and he was selected to accompany one of the violinists on the faculty—so he is pleased, so far. My health is fine. I'm as active as ever, without fatigue. The timing was propitious, since almost up to the moment classes started I felt the need of an afternoon nap. But psychological factors were playing their part, too, I'm sure. One nice evening was spent at the Skiway Lodge for a kickoff dinner for Jay Parini's New England Review. Robert Penn Warren read his latest poetry and Eleanor Clarke read from a novel, a delightful vignette about their Vermont neighbors and their fetish of tidiness. Very clever. Another pleasure was a series of Pinter sketches done by our students extremely well, with Peter Smith also on stage. A "review" with Sondheim songs followed—and such talent! One student's baritone voice was a dream: so effortless, as though reverberating in a deep cistern. And just two days ago, Chrysanthi, Leander, and I went to hear Andy Jennings and Andrew Rangell play violin-piano sonatas in the Hop: Mozart, Ives, and César Franck—gorgeous renditions of all three, but the Ives was the most interesting and moving for me. After it, curiously, the Frank seemed tawdry. Last Sunday I took Yiayia and Pappou on a drive up to Newbury on the Vermont side and then down through Haverhill and Orford, to see the leaves, but there wasn't much color.

They are laying a gigantic drain along Ledyard Lane, finally. Repairing is scheduled for next year. Mrs. Serafini, our octogenarian neighbor, complained to the selectmen. She's been waiting twenty-five years, she said, and she doubted that she'd last another twenty-five.

Jay's poem on "Luk," a student killed in an airplane crash, is gorgeous. A major elegy added to the language. Fresh wine poured into a very old bottle.

Another visitor was Dia Philippidis, newly appointed at Harvard to teach Demotic Greek—using our method and book, happily. A brilliant and delightful girl. So bright! We put her through John's workshop, showed her the videotapes, etc. She's done work on the computer and knows Steve Waite. At the same time Alistair Reid, up for Jay's New England Review supper, slept with us, and we had a nice breakfast together. He's installed in NYC now as a full-time writer for The New Yorker. A pleasant man.

1979

---

Hanover	January 1–June 21
Riparius	June 22–September 1
Hanover	September 1–15
New York City	September 15–18
Θεσσαλονίκη c/o Γιώργος Πιαννακός, Πλαστήρα 1Α, Αρετσου	September 18–October 4
Dartmouth Alumni College cruise:	October 5–22
Athens (chez Marder, then Grande Bretagne), Corinth, Mycenae, Nafplio, Epidaurus, Delphi, Katokolo, Olympia, Navarino, Pylos, Agrigento, Messina, Tauromina, Iraklio, Knossos, Kritsa, Agios Nikolaos, Santorini, Rhodes, Aspendos (Antalya), Perge, Side, Cos, Ephesos, Didyma, Miletos, Delos, Paros, Piraeus, Athens (chez Marder, Δημοκρατίας 61, Π. Ψυχικό)
Athens, London, Birmingham	October 23
Woodbrooke College, 1046 Bristol Road, Selly Oak, Birmingham B29 6LJ, New Wing, flat B	October 24–December 14
20 East 74 th Street, New York City	December 15–17
Hanover	December 18–31

January 7, 1979

Elise Boulding spoke in Meeting to tell us that upon her return to Montgomery House she found that Mrs. Montgomery had introduced into the living room an “authentic prisoner’s pallet” from a Georgia jail, purchased at an antique shop, to serve now as a coffee table! Elise developed this theme beautifully. Should she leave the pallet in place, as a reminder of man’s inhumanity to man? Should she banish it to the cellar—i.e, try to hide this reality?

Elizabeth Ballard also ministered interestingly. Her son sent her a Christmas message consisting of the drawing of a plant. Next to one leaf was a balloon with the message: “The leaf asks.” Next to the plant as a whole was another balloon: “the plant holds the answer.”

Monday, February 19, 1979

We finished the text for O ιπτάμενος θάλαμος tonight—John Rassias, Chrysanthi and I—after seven years! Grammar parts remain.

Wednesday, June 6, 1979.

Cited in a footnote in V. Woolf's Letters, vol. IV, p. 356:

Miss Buss and Miss Beale
Cupid's darts do not feel.
How different from us,
Miss Beale and Miss Buss.

Friday, July 13, 1979

Riparius

Sitting at my table beneath the yellow birch this afternoon I saw a huge fox, as big as a large dog, promenading nonchalantly at the edge of the field. He saw me, and discreetly retired into the woods without accelerating his pace.

August 23, 1979

Riparius

Supper with Edna Michell re: music-poetry-dance for the opening of the winter Olympics. Lukas Foss has been commissioned to do a composition; Yehudi Menuhin and the Cancilena Players will perform it. She asked me to suggest poetry. I gave her Odyssey VIII, Odysseus at the Phaeacian games, and Iliad XXIII, the funeral games for Patroclus.

Possibility of an electric power line across the farm.

Saturday, September 8, 1979

Leander and Wiggy Bond played well in Rollins Chapel. She did a Bach unaccompanied cello suite; then together they did a Debussy sonata, Beethoven's 3rd cello-piano sonata (magnificent) and Fauré's "Sicillienne." Lots of rehearsals previously, with coaching by Norman Fisher of the Concord String Quartet (and advice from me).

I'd finished the first draft of the fourth lecture for the cruise, thank goodness. The other three lectures were done at the farm.

Saturday, September 15, 1979

Worked all week on BMGS, editing the articles in hand, even though the future of the journal seems poor. Blackwell's have raised the price 25% in one swoop.

To NYC today. Tenants in our house.

Sunday, September 16, 1979

20 E. 74th Street

Leander and Wiggy repeated the concert at International House. Chrysanthi went, I didn't. Supper with Charlie Hamlen. Leander very pleased about the performance.

Monday, September 17, 1979

We all went—Chrysanthi, Daphne, Yiayia, Pappou, Leander—to Robert Goldsand's recital at the 92nd Street Y. A prodigious program lasting two and a half hours, all romantics, played with brilliance and a lovely idiosyncrasy. Leander is justifiably proud to have him as a teacher. Met Wiggy there. Coffee afterwards. Late that night, Wiggy telephoned Leander to say that she is madly in love with him. But he doesn't return the sentiment, alas!

Tuesday, September 18, 1979

Working up to the last moment on my lectures, at the Yale Club, a marvelous refuge. 6:15 p.m. we fly to Athens. Alec drove us to JFK and then kept the car.

Wednesday, September 19, 1979

Πλαστήρα 1Α, Θεσσαλονίκη

Athens; then connecting flight to Thessaloniki. Everyone at the airport. We met Odysseas for the first time, and his wife Λένα (Ελένη) and daughter Τούλα with her husband Σταύρος, musicians both. Ο Παππούς healthy and vigorous, but with total loss of short-term memory. Dimitrakis (George's son) is a man now: 3rd year in the university, studying civil engineering. Andreas is in France, touring. We began a round of dinners at George's, Lola's, Odysseas's.

Saturday, September 22, 1979

Supper at Lola's. I asked Odysseas about Zachariadis vs. Markos, and got a good, long answer: that no single person was responsible for the communists' failure; chiefly it was lack of supplies when Tito closed the border and Stalin refused to help. Odysseas and Lena are extremely pro-Russian. Their thirty-three years there left splendid memories, chiefly of the kindness and generosity of the Russian people, and also of the care lavished upon all by the state machinery—health protection, vacations, free education, pensions, no unemployment, etc. A very positive picture of the communist way of life. Odysseas was also eloquent regarding the immense destruction of life and property after WW II, and the great achievement of reconstruction. . . . Also saw Θέμης και Μιράντα Άλτας.

Sunday, September 23, 1979

Went with George and Efthymoula to Halkidiki. Maltepe (Καλλιθέα) is now transformed into a kind of Lake George Village, with rows of “Greek art” shops (with, however, very fine reproductions of ancient vases and statues). We bathed at Sani Beach, where I got a bee-sting in the toe that later swelled and produced an allergic rash. Thence to George’s single stremma near Φόκες, with cypresses, apple trees, and poplars.

Monday, September 24, 1979

In the morning, to the museum with Odysseas and Eleni to see the new discoveries at Vergina, King Philip’s tomb. One of the views excitedly assured me that the pair of greaves of different sizes was proof positive, since tradition depicted Philip with one atrophied leg.

Spent the evening with Vouli and Nancy (?), an Egyptian Greek now in Australia, a choreographer attempting to keep Greek folk dances alive. She knows Χαρκιανάκης well, and has translated some of his poems.

Thursday, September 27, 1979

The other evening we watched, on television, the annual Festival of Song connected with the Salonika fair. Ten songs were heard, and committees all over Greece sent in their votes by telephone. There was romantic trash, and in general the music was wholly derivative and uninteresting. But Greeks listen for words. The winning song was a strong assertion that if Christ returned to earth he wouldn’t have to suffer a slow, torturous death because modern man has found so many ways of instantaneous obliteration. Good for the Greeks! Could popular culture in America ever have reached this level? The runner-up was also indicative: a song by a boy soprano about the hopes and frustrations of children.

Everyone I’ve come in contact with here seems to be a communist, or at least a socialist. Last night we were with Themis and Miranda Altas again. Themis praised Hungary, which he visited recently, as a society far superior to Greece, and ventured that change would occur elsewhere only by violent revolution. His daughter, Mariana, published a purely Marxist analysis of “freedom” in the University of Thessaloniki law review: freedom can exist only when one class ceases exploiting the other, and this can happen only in socialism. Odysseas and Eleni, and Dimitris Yiannakos, are also convinced that Soviet Russia has solved the pressing problems of modern society better than any other culture. Andreas Yiannakos, who is still in France, is from what I hear a flaming radical.

Γιαγιά—that is, the mother of Λένα Γιαννακού, the mother-in-law of Odysseas—was fifteen years in Averoff prison because she refused to sign a declaration of repentance concerning her daughter. Now, as Odysseas told me today, she is again “in prison,” this time in Κολοκοτρώνη 11, where she has to keep a constant eye on Pappous, literally day and night, while the others are out at work. Yet she bears up under this cheerfully, without feeling self-pity, because compared to the earlier suffering this is nothing. A splendid example of Greek fortitude!

Stavros, husband of Toula, comes from a village in Western Macedonia where he continued the gymnasium after returning in 1963 from Russia. He walked twelve kilometers each day each way, and had to endure the sudden shifts of educational politics whereby demotic (under Papandreou and Papanoutsos) reigned briefly only to be replaced by katharévousa when the colonels took over. He seems a gifted musician and an intellectual despite his lack of very much formal training—also a fine painter, and automobile mechanic. He and Toula have established a thriving business in just over a year: an Odeon with upward of seventy pupils at present. Stavros, who already plays guitar, accordion, and piano, is taking cello lessons! Toula went through the standard Russian conservatory training, which, from her description, sounds very systematic, with clearly defined goals for each stage, as in England and France, and (of course!) not in America, where each one is for himself in education as in other matters.

Tonight we dined with Tad and Bruce Lansdale at their home at the Farm School. Vouli was with us, and they had another guest who turned out to be the daughter of Lincoln MacVeigh, a middle-aged woman of great vitality and with a very complete knowledge of Greece going back to the 1930s. Tad struck me as not too bright, struggling nobly to be a Greek + American hostess. Bruce is very powerful and self-assured. A girl served, an old-style υπηρέτρια, looking very unhappy: natives serving their conquerors. Conversation mostly stupid chit-chat, though with moments of breakthrough to something more substantial. A noticeable difference from Greek homes was the failure to pay much attention to Daphne. For Greeks, children awaken a kind of primal delight in youthfulness. This was missing last night, completely.

Tuesday, October 2, 1979

Θεσσαλονίκη

“To the question: ‘How much time in a collegiate course of study should be given to the study of languages?’ I answer as Charles V justly observed to Francis I: ‘With every new language one acquires a new life’; for by the knowledge of the language of a foreign country we are able to get acquainted with its literature, its manners and customs . . .” —Henry Schliemann, as quoted (imagined?) by Irving Stone in The Greek Treasure (NY: Signet, 1976), p. 34 (useful for Rassias introduction).

Thursday, October 4, 1979

Thessaloniki / Athens

Grand sendoff at Thessaloniki airport after some tense moments when we couldn’t find a taxi to get us to the airport. George, Odysseas, Eleni, Takis, Stavros, and Toula saw us off. Other farewells were made yesterday and the day before. We lunched with Kostas and Nikos, saw Vouli, Altases, Pappous, etc. At Hellenikon, Brenda Marder was waiting, and drove us in their immense American station wagon to their home: Δημοκρατίας 61 (renamed from Βασιλίσσης Φρειδερίκης!) in Παλαιό Ψυχικό. Gorgeous home, property of the United States government. Learned to our surprise that Everett will leave the job in June; they’ll return to the States and he doesn’t know what will happen next. Lots of good talk with Brenda, mostly in Greek. In the evening they had a reception for us—the “visiting dignitaries!” Those I remember who came were Jean Demos, the Phylactopouloses, Mr. Johnson (?) from Athens College, who got me to sign all my books in their library, Nikiforos Diamandouros, George Giannaris, Lefteris Prevelakis (the historian), Frank Walton (retired head of the Gennadion), Sloan Elliott (editor of the Athenian), Katherine Butterworth, Alison Pingel (my Dartmouth student, now with Study in Greece), Olga and Ioannis Lappas (friends from Athens College), the new president of Athens College, assorted professors from the University of Athens, Peter Allen, here on a sabbatical, John Rexine (ditto), somebody from a ministry, and others who escape me for the moment. Oh, of course, Kimon Friar. It was very “uplifting” for the ego, to say the least.

I got George Giannaris to agree to look at my nephew Andreas Yianakos’s poems. Andreas, just back from Spain a few days ago, spoke of art and literature in a way that clearly showed an artistic sensitivity, yet he is forced to study law, and hates it. I wasn't surprised when he confided to me secretly that he writes poetry and also prose (βιώματα). He asked me to help him find ways to publish. I had given him a letter of introduction to George Savides, while in Salonika. Now, perhaps, Γιάνναρης will also help.

There was also a nice Greek army general (retired by the colonels) who had been Everett's instructor in the War College. Very liberal.

Friday, October 5, 1979

Athens

Saw Ninetta Nakrinikola and Athena Kallianesi at Kedros. Corrected proofs of the introduction to my Ritsos book, which is now being printed, finally. Kallianesi said she'd like to publish the Columbia UP pamphlets on Kazantzakis and Cavafy. All in all, a profitable morning.

In the afternoon we transferred to a room in the Hotel Grand Britannia, to begin the Dartmouth Alumni College. There have been lots of sudden shifts of gears these past weeks, all handled smoothly (proof of abiding youthfulness?). Lunch with Bill and Elizabeth Ballard. At 5:00 I gave the first lecture of the College, in the ballroom of the hotel, speaking on (a) the decline of Athens, and what that should teach Americans about the probability of our own decline, (b) the Greeks' ability to surprise and revive over fifty centuries, and how that should perhaps encourage us to retain our identity no matter what happens. It was well received, from all that I can gather. Cocktails followed. Everyone was gay, despite the jet lag. Dinner in the hotel, with Harry and Mary Schultz.

Saturday, October 6, 1979

Athens

To the Acropolis with the group. It still moves me: the scale, the approach, the view over the city. And more so, now, since I know the background better. To see Salamis in the distance and remember how the Greeks watched the old temples being destroyed by the Persians was memorable. And I'd never been in the museum. The "Blond Boy" or "Kritias Boy" is splendid, a transition from the archaic Kouros type to the classical type.

We had a nice supper at the Delphi restaurant, Οδός Νίκης, with Sandy McCulloch and wife, Mr. and Mrs. Don McKinley (these are the two Dartmouth trustees on the trip), and an Athenian family, he a top official in DEH, the daughter a Brown graduate (where she met Sandy while waiting table at his luncheon club). The father: a cosmopolitan, cultured Greek. We discussed Herodotus, whom he'd just been reading! And, inevitably, politics. The daughter, very sweet, did classics at Brown and wants to specialize in the restoration and presentation of antiquities.

In the morning, Bob McGrath gave the first of his series of lectures on Greek art and its effect on later art in Europe, a fascinating subject beautifully presented with paired slides.

Sunday, October 7, 1979

Athens

A.M. to the Agora. The museum in the Stoa of Attalos is fine, showing as it does many scenes of everyday life. At noon we met Takis Yianakos and had a quick lunch with him, after which he accompanied the group to the Archaeological Museum. I think I am beginning to like the Kouroi and Kores for the first time. The Santorini room will be more meaningful after we see the excavation at Akrotiri in Santorini. The Schliemann finds reverberated for me in a new way because of my recent reading of Irving Stone's The Greek Treasure, a vivid portrayal, novelistic in form, of Schliemann, his wife, and the excavations at Troy and Mycenae—all the frustrations, the impediments, and Schliemann's fanatical self-assertion despite everything. It was fun to see his mansion around the corner from the hotel; it's now the Άρειος Πάγος.

It was also, of course, an "experience" to spend three days in the fabulous Hotel Grand Britannia. I reminded everyone of Churchill's conference here at Christmastime, 1944. In the evening: an επιθεώρηση built around Theodorakis's music.

Monday, October 8, 1979

En route

Early departure via bus for the Peloponnesian tour. Corinth has a good sixth-century temple—rather, the remains of one—very different from the grace of the Parthenon. Also, we think of course of the sack of Corinth, with so much being carted off to Italy (Cavafy has a nice poem on this). Mycenae didn't send chills down my spine this time, as it did the last time. Yet the placement is dramatic indeed, with a splendid view of the Argolid plain and indeed of the citadel of Argos in the distance (Argos obliterated Mycenae in classical times). We climbed up to the palace level; the alabaster of the floor still shows in places. Nafplio we hardly saw because it was just a lunch stop in the new (ugly) Ξενία Hotel high over the town. But the theater at Epidaurus continues to exercise its charm even on repeated viewing, chiefly because the Romans didn't build over it. Thus the full circle of the orchestra is still intact, as is the dirt floor of the orchestra. We proceeded thence to the port at Palaia Epidaurus and there found our floating hotel, the SS Stella Maris II. Travel Dynamics treated us very well. We have a deluxe stateroom on the top deck, and Daphne has her own stateroom one deck down. A fine meal completed a very full day.

Tuesday, October 9, 1979

SS Stella Maris II

This was one of the high spots of the trip. We sailed overnight through the Corinth Canal (which we saw from the sea yesterday as we passed before nightfall) to Itea, the port of Delphi. A lovely, calm bay to which people came from the four corners of the known world, in olden days. The buses took us up the steep road through a huge olive grove that, from above, looked like a silver-green sea invading the plain and the sides of the enclosing mountains. We went straight to the stadium carved out below Parnassus. There I gave my second lecture, with the group (about 160 people) seated at the curved end of the stadium. The acoustics were adequate, and the whole thing seemed to go quite well despite the inevitable distractions of children running back and forth, other tourists stopping to listen, etc. I tried to show that, despite what we may think at first, the Delphic oracle was a manifestation of Greek rationality. I spoke of the nature of the god Apollo, of the mottos Γνώθι σ' εαυτόν and Μήδεν άγαν, of the political and moral influence of the oracle, etc., but concluded by acknowledging the presence of Dionysus at Delphi as well as Apollo—i.e., rationality's recognition that it, too, must not be carried to excess. The Greek guides on our trip, four remarkable ladies named Nota, Vana, Maria, and Cleo, were most enthusiastic, which pleased me because I arrived at my interpretation of Delphi by examining original sources (Thucydides, Plutarch, etc.) and not by secondary reading. We then descended to the Sanctuary of Apollo, the treasuries, the polygonal wall, the stylobate of Apollo's temple, and also went down to the area of Athena Pronaos. Both in its actual splendor and in what it represents, Delphi remains extraordinary for the visitor.

Wednesday, October 10, 1979

SS Stella Maris II

How could I have forgotten the magnificent Dipylon Vase at the Εθνικό Μουσείο, which wasn't there before, or which I didn't notice or couldn't have appreciated anyway, not having taken Jerry Rutter's course?

Today we docked at Κατάκολο and went by bus to Olympia. The ruins are not too impressive; the stadium at Delphi is much more complete, for example. But the museum is extraordinarily rich. Praxiteles's Hermes, in reality, is a hundred times more impressive than its photos; one never imagines its monumental scale, nor can one fully appreciate the sensuousness of the marble, until one is face to face with this wonder. I ought to have mentioned the Charioteer at Delphi as well, so different and yet so haunting. Also the "portrait" of Hadrian's lover Antinous, whose face and body seem to appear again and again. But at Olympia the major attraction is the pedimental sculpture: the battle of Lapiths and Centaurs so beautifully described by Kazantzakis, and the Gigantomachy. These were available only in plaster casts, pending their removal to the new museum, but even in plaster they were magnificent, especially the lordly Apollo who extends the hand of rationality over the scene, awarding the victory to the Lapiths. Memorable, too, in a different way, is the scenery around Olympia—verdant, calm, lush.

Next we sailed down the coast to the Bay of Navarino. Sphacteria is, visibly, exactly the place where the Athenians and Spartans fought at the first climax of the Peloponnesian War. The bay, of course, saw the defeat of the Turkish and Egyptian fleet, some 600 ships, I believe, by Cochrane's English fleet of about 200 ships, owing to a ruse. Cochrane tricked the Turks into firing first so that the English could then attack "in self-defense" (!). A bus ride took us to the bluff where the palace of Nestor at Pylos may be seen—foundations, mostly, but much more than at Mycenae. The Linear B tablets, so crucial a proof that the Mycenaeans were Greeks and that they occupied Knossos in the final phase, were discovered here in huge hordes.

Thursday, October 11, 1979

SS Stella Maris II

All day at sea, sailing eastward toward Sicily, just as the Greek colonists did in the eighth century and afterward. I lectured again—on the Odyssey, this time from the point of view of colonization and literacy. Bob McGrath continued his lectures on Greek art and the European classical tradition.

Friday, October 12, 1979

We put in at Porto Empedocle on the south coast of Sicily. The look is entirely different from that of Greece. On the pier, waiting for me, was Peter Falzone, the student I'd had in English 5 about seven or eight years ago, and his mother and father, all now living in Agrigento. Earlier, we'd seen Ames Abbot in Athens; he's at Athens College. The Falzones trailed after us to Agrigento, the valley of the temples (archaic Doric, like the one at Corinth, and a huge temple to Zeus, mostly in ruins) and then through the museum, which has marvelous vases, and one of the giants that stood like Caryatids on the façade of the Zeus temple. Our Italian guides were very poor, however, and this detracted. The group went on to see Roman mosaics at a villa about two hours away, while we stayed with the Falzones. They took us to their decaying mansion, one of two, the other being now uninhabitable, and Peter walked with us over the neglected farm that sits on a bluff overlooking the sea. The family had been absent in America for thirty years, during which various relatives managed to expropriate part of the land, ruin the houses, etc. Mr. Falzone told me the whole sad story at lunch in his broken English, impassioned. Peter added more details. The scene reminded me of a plantation scene after our civil war. Following a huge lunch (spaghetti in abundance, marvelous bread, leathery meat, succulent fruit), Peter took us to the Casa Pirandello, where the master had lived and worked, practically next door to the Falzones' "estate." Then we toured Agrigento, visiting Peter's sister, who has a lovely apartment in what seemed an otherwise dismal environment—dirty, unaesthetic. Peter is at medical school in Palermo. They do anatomy without corpses, chemistry without labs, medicine without patients. He says that after his six years are completed, he'll have a license to kill! In any case, this was a memorable and most unusual afternoon, since we entered Sicilian life in a way we never could have done otherwise. The meal in the old tumble-down house, despite the great good will shown me, as Peter's professor, was truly "spooky," perhaps because of the old grandmother, whom the father accused of betraying him in his thirty-year absence.

Tonight the sea kicked up; winds were gale force. I went to supper but couldn't bear to eat anything. I was in a sweat from head to toe. I went out on deck with the wind in my face, and this helped a bit, but after a while I threw up, copiously, and felt much better. As the ship pitched along, the crests of the waves reached almost to the railing where I was standing. Finally I crept into bed. Chrysanthi had been wiser. She avoided supper, remained horizontal the whole time, and did not get sick.

Saturday, October 13, 1979

We entered the straits and docked at Messina, a city much more presentable than Agrigento (because largely rebuilt, I think, after an earthquake). Then by bus to Taormina, a European “watering place” in the grand style. The theater, originally Greek, was converted by the Romans for gladiatorial contests, lions eating Christians and god knows what else. A pit (maybe the origin of our orchestral pit) contained crocodiles who devoured unlucky humans, who could then be conveniently flushed out. We went to a Dominican monastery converted into a luxurious hotel filled with old furniture, tapestries, and paintings. But the actual meal was mediocre: pot roast and pasta. Only the prices were exceptional.

Sunday October 14, 1979

Another full day at sea. Again, Bob McGrath and I both lectured, and one of the guides gave us a briefing on Knossos. My lecture concerned the Odyssey and Iliad as complementary opposites, the former treating a very human hero who manages to survive, the latter treating a more-than-human hero whose strivings guarantee that he will not survive.

Monday, October 15, 1979

I awoke to a view of Γιούχτας from our stateroom window. The morning began excitedly for me, since our first stop was Kazantzakis’s grave. The group lined up, and I spoke briefly, for about five minutes, on Kazantzakis, emphasizing his need for a philosophy of life. I gave the simile of the rower going downstream while he attempts to row, hopelessly, against the current, and who then ships the oars and faces the abyss joyously as he approaches the waterfall. And I concluded with the meaning of the epitaph Δεν ελπίζω τίποτε, δεν φοβάμαι τίποτε, είμαι λεύτερος. Apparently I spoke well—succinctly, movingly—from what various people told me afterwards. In any case, it was a moving and unique experience for me.

Knossos, which I had seen in 1964, really came alive because of our excellent guides. We were led through this veritable labyrinth with its light-wells, its modern sanitation system, its multiple levels. Then we toured the Iraklio Museum, where the frescos are displayed, not to mention the marvelous little figurines of the snake goddess and bull jumper, the tools (axes, saws, adzes, etc.), the tripods and cauldrons and pottery.

In the afternoon we drove east along the shore to Kritsa, where there is a small Byzantine church with fine frescos. The village itself, though quaint, has become “touristy.” But around the church we saw real aspects of village life: peasants returning from the fields on their donkeys (or motorcycles). We then proceeded along a lovely bay to Άγιος Νικόλαος, where Βασίλης, the Travel Dynamics chief representative (and Vastos’s brother-in-law) treated the McGraths, Biens, and the three other Travel Dynamics representatives to a fish dinner on the waterfront: shrimp, then red snapper, and then (by this time we were all stuffed) still another course with a different kind of fish. (Before Kritsa, we went to Gournia, a Minoan small town, well preserved: homes, streets, central square.)

Tuesday, October 16, 1979

How exciting to enter the harbor (I should say the crater) of Santorini! The villages are like a capping of white snow on the very top of the huge cliffs. We went in on tenders and then ascended the 600-odd steps on muleback, amid a welter of confusion, because 600 Mormons were going up and down as well. One of our group caught his leg in the stirrup and fell to the ground; I helped him up. At the top I heard a loud “Professor Bien!” and was greeted by a Dartmouth student who graduated last June and was “doing Europe” with a girlfriend on a Eurail pass. He was one of the tea-pourers in Sanborn. The village of Thera, at the top of the cliff, like Kritsa, is quaint but too touristy. I loved the church, however, and also the streets, courtyards, and floors made of a mosaic of pebbles. We went by bus to Akrotiri, seeing the back part of the island, which has the gentle slope of the original volcano. The fertile ground is all lava—black earth. At Akrotiri are the excavations begun by Marinatos, who died on the site from a fall and is buried there. A whole city was unearthed under a huge layer of pumice: streets, homes, frescos, sewers, a public square. What struck me is how the modern towns in the Cyclades resemble these ancient towns. Akrotiri was presumably destroyed almost instantaneously by a huge eruption ca. 1500–1400 B.C., producing the tidal wave that destroyed the Cretan palaces.

Wednesday, October 17, 1979

We sailed into the harbor of the town of Rhodes, getting a fine view of the famous medieval fortifications, like those at Iraklio. Then by bus to Lindos, which has a very distinctive and beautiful acropolis combining crusaders' fortifications with ancient Greek temples. A long climb to the top, but worth it.

The day was boiling. Fortunately we were able to swim at Lindos beach before lunch. I was proud of the group, because when the escorts offered to let one of the four buses remain so that people could swim all afternoon instead of touring the town of Rhodes, only two people voted for this. So we all returned. The guide showed us the walls, gates, moat, and the Street of the Knights; then the hospital of the Knights of St. John, and the museum, which has a few very fine pieces: a marble grave stele with a woman in marvelously transparent and clinging drapery, for example. Rhodes was beautified by the Italians, who were here until 1947.

Thursday, October 18, 1979

Turkey! From the port of Antalya we went first to Aspendos, one of the many colonies in this section, the ancient Pamphylia. The theater is splendid, though Roman, mostly because the scene building is almost completely intact. You feel indoors, veritably, as though you were in a building with a huge skylight, as in the theater on Πλατεία Αριστοτέλους in Salonika.

Perge had more extensive remains: a stadium, avenues, etc. Also Side. It's good to see all these Anatolian Greek cities, to realize how extensive the colonization was.

In the evening, after dinner, I read Greek poetry to a tired group: Cavafy, Ritsos, Seferis, arranging the poems in three cycles: (1) those dealing with Anatolia and with Hellenistic times in general, (2) those surveying important landmarks in Greek history, (3) those picking up themes or incidents from Homer. This was one way of emphasizing the continuity of Greek culture.

Friday, October 19, 1979

What a coincidence! The first thing I heard upon rising was that Odysseas Elytis had just won the Nobel Prize, for continuing the Greek poetic tradition that began with Homer! I stood up at breakfast and announced this to a pleased group.

Today we spent in Cos. The contrast with Turkey is remarkable. Turkey, despite lots of activity, is depressing. It strikes me as being today the way Greece was 25 or 30 years ago, when I first saw it. But Cos, beautified by the Italians, as was Rhodes, is sparkling and exhilarating. We concentrated on the magnificent Asclepion, the huge center—an extensive complex of buildings and terraces that received those who came for cures. And of course we heard all about Hippocrates. The museum, like that of Rhodes, has some very fine individual pieces.

Saturday, October 20, 1979

Back to Turkey, this time to the port of Kuşadası, which is fairly attractive. A hyperbolically enthusiastic Turkish guide led us to Ephesus, which is truly καταπλητικό. So much is to be seen! One really gets a sense of the entire city in its magnificence. The Library appealed, in particular, to Harry Schultz and to me. Much was made of the brothel, and also of the communal latrine, a 20- (or 30-) seater. By coincidence, I was suffering from stomach cramps at the time, and left my contribution in one of the many little rooms nearby! The theater, too, is spectacular. And the Basilika of St. John carries the history into Christian times.

The afternoon was less impressive—or was it? Didyma has an immense temple to Apollo, with columns about seven stories high. It was the Δίδυμα (twin) of the temple to Artemis, even larger, at Ephesus, of which practically nothing remains.

Tonight we had our captain's dinner: formal dress, and a lovely menu: black caviar, barbecued shrimp with strips of bacon wrapped around, filet mignon, baked Alaska, all served with great aplomb, after which the captain said a few choice words (as they say), the waiters were applauded, and the chef made his appearance and paraded around the dining room acknowledging the applause like a returning general after an immense victory. Luxury is pleasant!

Sunday, October 21, 1979

This morning we landed at Delos, by tender. Again, the Greek guides were most helpful in making us understand why, at one point, 30,000 people lived on this barren rock, which was, in effect, the banking center of the Aegean. The lions were lovely, and the two huge phalluses in front of the shrine of Dionysus made an expected impression on everyone. As at Akrotiri, Gournia, and Ephesus, one could really sense the ancient city with the walls, plumbing, cisterns, lovely pebbled flooring, frescos, courtyards, narrow streets. The harbor—rather the kind of bay between Delos and the neighboring island, afforded a safe anchorage in all weather for ancient sailors.

Last stop, Paros, another lovely Cycladic town, the modern equivalent of all the ruined towns we had seen along the way. The Kastro, and parts of the large church, were obviously built from squared blocks and also column drums taken from ancient temples. We walked along the promenade in the lovely Aegean quiet.

Final night aboard. Amateur night. Lovely skits: parodies of McGrath's lectures, and a parody by Bill Ballard of the Fall of Boston à la Thucydides, with limericks, doggerel, Dartmouth songs rewritten to apply to Greece, etc. I went last with a "newly discovered epic," the Dartmouthiad, in which all our "tribulations" were transformed into Scylla and Charybdis, the Cyclops, etc. Writing it, in bits and snatches during the preceding week, I gained insight into how the Homeric poems must have developed. First of all, it was comparatively easy to apply ready-made formulas to the new situation, weaving a tale by means of frame technique; secondly, I understood the compulsion the old bards must have felt to include their audiences in the story, making slight changes as needed.

Monday, October 22, 1979

Early arrival at Piraeus. Taxi to Athens. I spent the morning depositing money and mailing books. We spent the day again with the Marders, and walked through Psychiko to Athens College. Late at night Ritsa Papatheophilou came, and we had a nice visit.

I've hardly mentioned any people on this trip, and this gives a wrong impression. Obviously, the people were as important and enjoyable as the "stones." Everyone was exceedingly friendly (except Bill Ballard). We passed fine moments with the Schultzes, with Elizabeth Ballard, Mrs. Gass (a psychiatric social worker), Mrs. Beatty (grandmother of Eric Beatty, my student), Ned Yost and his wife and remarkable mother, the McCullochs, the McKinleys, William Robinson (editor of Yachting Magazine, a Princeton man on the trip as a "spy" for the Princeton Club, which wants to do something similar), Vasilis, Vasos, the four guides, the three tour attendants. I also enjoyed the McGraths on occasion, though a barrier always seemed to remain. And the Marders were exceedingly kind, before and after.

Tuesday, October 23, 1979

I'm writing this in an Olympic Airways airbus as we sit at Athens airport. The captain has just announced a delay because of "minor technical reasons." The plane is totally full, and getting hotter and hotter. To get on—checking baggage, getting a seat number, paying departure tax, waiting on line after line—took a full hour and was most disagreeable. I have a headache; Chrysanthi is melancholy. Τελείωσε το όνειρο.

Wednesday, October 24, 1979

Woodbrooke College

The flight left an hour or so late and was routine thereafter. Our spirits picked up immediately upon arriving at Heathrow. How civilized and organized everything is, especially compared to Greece! Everyone polite, solicitous. England always lifts my spirits. We rented an Avis car and drove smoothly to Birmingham, arriving at Woodbrooke just in time for supper. We are installed in Flat B, formerly Muriel Poulter's, and Daphne is across the hall in her own room. On the first evening, already, I heard an interesting account of South Africa's problems by Muriel Ohlen, a white native, and met Godfrey, a black Kenyan whose father had four wives and who turned out to be a devotee of Kazantzakis! He'd read the Saviors of God and considered it his spiritual guide.

Thursday, October 25, 1979

Woodbrooke is as international as always, with people from India, Japan, Thailand, Colombia, Kenya, Tanzania, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, Madagascar, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Holland, Germany, France, Canada, USA. Nette, a vivacious Hollander, has been in India for decades; a British woman has been serving in Africa for eighteen years as a physician. Many of the young people here are preparing to go out to Africa at the end of term, and are here to improve their English before departure.

Sunday, October 28, 1979

Selly Oak Meeting. The Wedells have removed to London. Too bad. But other people remembered us, and a girl remembered Leander's jazz-playing at the Young Friends' Encampment in 1971. Winifred White was there; she'd been decades in Madagascar.

On Thursday I visited Christos Alexiou at the university. Looking well, despite all his problems.

On Friday we joined him at the home of Αγλαΐα and Δημήτρης Λυπουρλής. She is Savidis's assistant at Thessaloniki; he teaches ancient Greek, specializing in scientific literature (Hippocrates, etc.). One of Christos's postgraduate students was there; he turned out to be a self-styled "intellectual rightist" and lover of Franco, also a heavy drinker of Scotch. And as the evening wore on the political discussion grew increasingly heated, with Christos's communist voice gaining ten decibels at each riposte. Also there was Ανδρέας ?, the man who used to manage the Burlington Restaurant downtown, a Cypriot by birth, now unemployed. His wife teaches Greek, using our book.

Folk dancing Saturday night.

Monday, October 29, 1979

To Christos's home for dinner. Lypourlides, Andreas, etc. plus Katerina Davis and her husband, who teaches Italian. She is, I find, antipathetic. Christos's boys are the same: Pavlos still doesn't talk, Dimitris still talks only about buses, in his peculiar way.

Wednesday, October 31, 1979

I found Roger Hunckle, a fine violinist, to play duets with. We'll try the Spring Sonata, Handel, Corelli, etc.

Thursday, November 1, 1979

To the university to see Bryer about BMGS. On the phone to Nicol and Clogg in London. We plan to meet with a Blackwell's director in Oxford. Lily Macrakis is coming from America. Let's see if we can save the journal. Concert in the evening: Mendelssohn violin concerto played well by Wystan, and a fine Eroica, especially marvelous second movement. Russian conductor. We sat behind the orchestra, beneath the huge bass pipes of the organ that had been played by Mendelssohn himself when the Town Hall was dedicated.

Paid my respects to Epstein's "Lucifer" in the Birmingham museum, miserably exhibited amongst teapots. And Moore's "Warrior with Shield" is behind two pillars as though being hidden from the public instead of displayed.

The B'ham library is truly a wonder. Registering, I stood behind a dignified Sikh in his turban and beard. How beautiful to see Indians and blacks in the library!

Friday, November 2, 1979

To Stratford with Woodbrooke group to see Sinden's Othello, an adequate though not distinguished production. His Othello generated into a pitiful bundle of nerves under the pressure of his jealousy, but then regained his stature majestically after strangling Desdemona.

Saturday, November 3, 1979

Writing all day. I finished my section on Κοῦρος a few days ago, and today commenced the section on Χριστόφορος Κολόμβος, which I find to be a splendid work, whereas Κοῦρος is forced and sterile. Ο Καπετάν Μιχάλης is next—a much larger undertaking.

Fancy dress party at night. Chrysanthi and I went as gypsy and Turk. Then British games: rolling peanuts along the carpet with one's nose, etc. Wholesome enjoyment, so different from Dartmouth fraternity alcoholism. Followed by bonfire and potato, for Guy Fawkes Day.

Sunday, November 4, 1979

Today I completed my week's service as chief dishwasher! Each day, and all day Saturday and Sunday, I and the team did all the plates, glasses, silver, and cooking pots, with of course the help of an efficient machine for the plates and glasses.

To Chris and Christina Lawson for tea. Their children are very outspoken and vivacious.

Then coffee in Elizabeth Holmgard's flat, with Muriel Poulter. She is the slave—willing—of her cat. Depressed and lonely after Ann Park's death and her retirement from Woodbrooke. A strange relationship they must have had.

Earlier, while trying to play the piano, I had a protracted conversation with Godfrey, who told me more of his Kenyan customs—how the rituals and ceremonies of the clan are being destroyed by modernization and Christianity. He's the one who admires Kazantzakis.

Letter from Harry Schultz, almost embarrassing in its praise, regarding the Greek cruise, which now seems so far behind.

Tuesday, November 6, 1979

Elizabeth Topley, the doctor who is about to return to Nigeria, invited Woodbrookers last night to listen to Bach with her on the gramophone. She told me that tapes disintegrate in the African climate, that radio either can't be heard or doesn't have classical music, that even a pick-up is not feasible to have. So, about to return, she wanted to hear Bach for the last time, and share the pleasure with friends.

Nette Bossert, who serves in India, is similar. I found her playing Beethoven sonatas, rather well, on the piano. "Do you have a piano in India?" I asked. She then explained the incredible impediments to having a piano in India. Import duties that more than double the cost, to begin with. Lack of tuners and repairmen. But basically, the sense of extravagance. The cost of a piano would feed a village for a year, etc. So she does without.

To the university to hear a boring lecture on Malia by Henri van Effenterre, professor at the Sorbonne. Saw Colin Davis, former dean, Peter Ricketts, who teaches linguistics, Ron and Jane Willetts, and, unexpectedly, Paul Morby. He was as dashing as ever, and accompanied, of course, by his young secretary (not as sexy, however, as the one we knew when we did the television series). He's coming to hear me tomorrow when I talk about Kazantzakis.

Yesterday we visited with Meg Alexiou.

Wednesday, November 7, 1979

I lectured to the Modern Greek Seminar at the university, introduced by Christos. Subject: Kazantzakis and Politics: work in progress. Met Ritsos's daughter, who is a student here. Also Roddy Beaton, the Ouranis Foundation Fellow. Then to dinner at Bryer's with Christos and a Mrs. Petrides, doing her Ph.D. here. Liz Bryer very friendly this time. Bryer convinced Christos to buy BP shares, making him instantaneously a capitalist!

Thursday, November 8, 1979

Heard Mairead Corrigan, who spoke at Central House. An extraordinary experience. She is the young Catholic woman who, together with Betty Williams, a Protestant, began a people's movement for peace, reconciliation, and nonviolence in Belfast. For this she received the Nobel Peace Prize. She was eloquent, and exuded a "soul-power" that really made me believe, once again, that Christianity is a living force in the world, and that the essence of Christ's message is Love—do not kill. It's as simple as that, as she said. Yet the churches themselves speak of "just war." The pope helped recently by declaring "Murder is murder, no matter what name you give it."

She was moved to do something after her sister's three young children were killed in an ambush. She called all peace-loving people to come out onto the streets and display their conviction that the violence must end. And they came, Protestants and Catholics both. Her message is all too simple: you cannot solve anything by violence. Violence just creates more violence, more hatred, more fear and polarization. At the same time, she doesn't scorn or condemn the IRA boys or their Protestant counterparts; she understands what drives them to resort to violence, and she admires, in many cases, their dedication and selflessness. In short, she herself is loving; she sees that of God in every person.

She also believes in the power of the individual. We must never sit back and say "the forces are too big and complicated; little people like me can do nothing." On the contrary, little people with convictions can do much. As the chairman put it at the end, she is an extraordinary ordinary person, which means that what she has done we all can do. (But what have I done, except be comfortable and secure and self-satisfied for the last twenty years?)

Finished writing on Χριστόφορος Κολόμβος the other day; re-read Κωνσταντίνος Παλαιολόγος and wrote a short section about that this morning, as a bridge to Ο Καπετάν Μιχάλης, which I now begin seriously considering.

After lunch, violin-piano with Roger Hunckle. Bach's "Chaconne" with the Mendelssohn piano accompaniment (which is totally superfluous), Mozart's A-major violin concerto, some Bach violin-harpsichord sonatas. I think we're developing a rapport now, after some awkwardness earlier.

Friday, November 9, 1979

Professor Henri van Effenterre here; he teaches ancient history at the Sorbonne and has excavated the town at Malia, Crete. I accompanied him to the Central Library, where Frances Williams showed us the Mingana Collection of Syriac manuscripts paid for by Edward Cadbury (George's brother), the Greek papyri (catalogued by Enoch Powell!), the incunabula, the 1613 edition of the King James Bible, the ninth-century Koran, the Ethiopian Coptic scroll, etc. A marvelous treasure—all. One papyrus, on display and translated, was a letter from a Christian to his mother saying that he was in good health but asking for a new coat. It sounded exactly like the letters sent back home by simple soldiers in Life in the Tomb. Rowena Loverance, Bryer's assistant, was with us. Then we returned to Woodbrooke, had lunch with Tony Brown, attended the staff coffee, where goodbyes were said to Tom Bodine, who came to Woodbrooke for one term and stayed three years (Muriel Poulter on Bodine: "independently wealthy, a homosexual"). Then we saw Woodbrooke's Erasmus Bible, first edition, and the Κύριλλος translation of the Bible into Demotic by Maximos, 1638, etc.

Saturday, November 10, 1979

Four-hand piano with Sam Wong after lunch. Then Christos came with Aglaïa and Dimitrios Lypourlis. I showed them the sailing pond, Bournville Village, the Cadbury factory. They left, and at suppertime Meg Alexiou joined us and stayed the night, talking. Epilogue by Rowena, who played Leonard Bernstein's hauntingly beautiful Chichester Psalms: boy sopranos against deep pedal-point on the organ, very Beethovenesque.

Sunday, November 11, 1979

Service at 9:30 by the Indonesian pastor, with Bible reading by the Malagasian pastor. Third world Christians, newly converted, truly convey the power and fortitude of the early church. He told us about the nature of his call and the opposition of family, teachers, friends. And he gave an exemplary sermon.

Meg came at 10:40 and drove us to the new house she has purchased in Vivien Road, Harborne, an old worker's house that she got cheaply and is fixing up considerably: new floors, wallpaper, carpets, heating. Thence to Bryer's. He, Liz, a friend called Morris Burne, Rowena, and the Biens (except Daphne) set out for the countryside. First a manor house, Hanbury Hall, very elegant. Then a small twelfth-century church at Holt with a nineteenth-century mosaic copying one in Ravenna; opposite it a castle, still occupied. Thence to Worcester, to a friend of the Bryers who lives in a mansion in Victoria Square, a lovely early nineteenth-century home. Lunch of soup, cider, cheese, biscuits, chocolate. The man is a curator in the Birmingham art gallery. I complained to him about the display of Epstein's "Lucifer." He said that they hope to do better next year, which is Epstein's centenary. They have the statue because the Tate refused it. Thence to Stanbrook Abbey, a Benedictine nunnery famous for its printing shop and for an abbess, now dead, who was great friends with G. B. Shaw and Sir Sydney Cockerell. Gorgeous printed books and broadsides. One of the nuns illustrated various passages on trees, including (!) one by Kazantzakis from Report to Greco in my translation. I bought a copy of the engraving.

The same evening: supper with Winifred White, whom we remembered from 1955 at Woodbrooke. She's in a tiny house, having retired from her teaching in Madagascar. We saw slides and learned in a fascinating way about her life there and the country's problems. A fine Madagascan item at Woodbrooke makes all this more real and especially the situation of Christians in that country. The Quakers were allotted a certain region to missionize, the Presbyterians another region, Lutherans and Catholics others. This, to say the least, confused the natives. Then, still the same day, I rushed back to Woodbrooke with Chrysanthi to do the epilogue, reading the passage in The Last Temptation where Jesus begins his ministry (parable of the sower, sermon on the mount) and is hooted and misunderstood for his pains.

Monday, November 12, 1979

Another epilogue, this time Chrysanthi and I, helping Ted and Rachel Benfey, read excerpts from T. S. Eliot's "Choruses from The Rock," the two families teaming up to create an antiphonal effect. As always, I understood the poem for the first time, reading it aloud. It's tragic and strong.

Tuesday, November 13, 1979

In Uver's German car, borrowed, to Stratford to see Twelfth Night, delightful as always: a splendid Malvolio, Olivier, Cesario.

Wednesday, November 14, 1979

To Christos's seminar at the university on the poetry of Karyotakis, followed by a huge discussion, all in Greek. Marvelous articulateness about . . . nothing. Christos returned to Woodbrooke for supper and we worked afterwards on Ο ιπτάμενος θάλαμος, which, thank God, he is not correcting too much.

Thursday, November 15, 1979

To Staff House at the university for lunch with Bryer and Peter Levi, whom I'd last seen almost ten years ago, in Princeton at the MGSA conference. He's now rotund, no longer a Jesuit, married. Attached to St. Catherine's College but earns his living by writing: journalism and coffee table books on Greece. He told me that the TLS sent books out all during the strike. Levi is very Oxfordian: supercilious, clipped speech, gossip about other poets, etc. But he's done marvelous things—e.g., his Pausanias, which I used in preparing for the Greek trip. Bryer also kindly introduced me to a man in the Department of Education who can help Alec next year.

Friday November 16, 1979

To Christos's house for supper. Paul Morby came, also Λυπουρλήδες, Bryers, and, later, Christos's students. I had a long talk with Ritsos's daughter, who is here studying American literature! Her enthusiasm for Thoreau, Whitman, Emerson, Hawthorne, Cooper, even Crèvecoeur was infectious. She's yet to read Melville and Faulkner. Another Greek student was an aficionado of Pynchon; for him Gravity's Rainbow is child's play. I was pleased, and embarrassed at my own ignorance.

Christos's children are the same, of course. A desperate situation, no διέξοδο. Morby has aged a bit. Somber; seems basically unhappy; but is still doing creative things in the TV studio.

Saturday, November 17, 1979

Woodbrooke excursion to Ironbridge, on the Severn. Here, a Quaker named Darby discovered that iron could be cast with coke (previously, charcoal had been used, and the forests were depleted). This made possible the industrial revolution: steam engines, rails for trains, etc. The process was carried to the Lehigh Valley in America by another Quaker, and the iron and steel industry began across the sea. Across the Severn is the first iron bridge, made of cast iron members, not much to look at now but a huge improvement over the wooden bridges that preceded it. We saw all this, including the Quaker graveyard, industrial exhibits, the original blast furnace, and old pottery works on a drizzly damp day, chilled through. Also a mine head, with the elevator still working with original machinery (no safety devices), and mine tunnels—horrible —the men having to bend over for eight to ten hours, and a miner's cottage, again horrible, worse than squatters' shacks in the Adirondacks.

Sunday, November 18, 1979

Service led by Bill Oats, who spoke very well on the Parable of the Prodigal Son. Tea with Muriel Poulter and her cat. She has a magnificent painting over the mantle done by Epstein, purchased by Ann Park. We were subjected to memorabilia of Ann's: letters from C. Day Lewis, one from Isherwood on the day before departure for America, etc., and a saccharine "book of the dead" eulogizing her fiancé killed in World War I. The relation between Muriel and Ann probably does not bear looking into.

"Muriel" reminds me that we saw Muriel Lindsay here last week when Council met. Very friendly.

Monday, November 19, 1979

Off to Oxford with Bryer. Met Lily Macrakis in Blackwell's bookshop at noon. Repaired to Bailliol College to talk and have a greasy lunch, thence to Blackwell's Publishers for a 2½ hour meeting with Messrs. David Martin and David Taylor about BMGS. We got them to bring the price down a bit. They want us to issue it twice a year, 112 pages maximum each time, and to include review articles, etc. Very encouraging meeting. Lily returned with us to Birmingham and slept at Woodbrooke. She told us how all the rich people in Greece are smuggling their money out to Swiss banks, and how we, through her own stockbroker, could get our drachmas out.

Tuesday, November 20, 1979

Lunch at Staff House with Bryer. More talk on BMGS, preparatory to Friday's meeting in London. Lily is also in touch with Cambridge University Press, which is eager, it seems, to "steal" us away from Blackwell's.

Wednesday, November 21, 1979

Seminar on structuralism at the university. Quite poor. Then Christos returned to Woodbrooke and we continued with Ἰπτάμενος.

Thursday, November 22, 1979

Seminar by Ševčenko at the university on Blamires. Very lively indeed. He is rather magisterial, but apparently has very few students at Harvard because of Bowersock's machinations. Bryer's advice to me: beware of Bowersock. Thence to the Town Hall to hear Ashkenazy play Brahms' 2nd piano concerto. His control is magnificent, but somehow the music neither excited nor moved me, perhaps because we were sitting again behind the orchestra and the sound was distorted. But we could watch his marvelous left hand!

Friday, November 23, 1979

To London with Bryer. Lunch at King's with Nicol, Clogg, Macrakis. Donald wasted two hours with drinks and small talk. Then we got down to business at 2:30 and were asked to leave at 5:00. Discouraging. No agenda. Donald not enthusiastic about changes. Wants to publish #6 with Blackwell's in the old way. But we got a vote in principle for moving to two issues per year after #6. Also decided to add Meg Alexiou, John Iatrides, and Nikiforos Diamandouros to the board and to remove Philip Sherrard. Bryer and I enjoyed a glass of wine in the "super loo" at Euston so much that we forgot to go down for our train and had to wait an extra half hour, which brought us late to Paul Morby's for dinner with Liz Bryer, Christos, and that awful Hugh Birkhart (mathematician) and his wife Diana (computer scientist), who made Rassias and me BLTs on toast in 1977 when we did the videotapes. Dymphna Morby was very sweet and gracious. One of their boys just got divorced and is leaving tomorrow for Australia, so a cloud hung over everything and at one point Paul lost his temper unreasonably over a remark about strained relations between him and the boy. He cooked rabbit and all the trimmings, with gusto, then played us recordings of old singers, including a castrato: interesting quality. Strange how empty he is, outside of the studio. His hobbies (old phones and records, Edison) seem all there is. Beyond that, very little conversation. And he asked, as he did last time, if we'd like to watch television after dinner!

Saturday, November 24, 1979

Called Lily in London. Her meeting with Cambridge UP was very encouraging, but still no £.s.p. Dinner with Peter and Monika Ricketts, a very strange couple with strange children. Daphne came, too, unfortunately, and was utterly miserable.

I've forgotten that last week Roger and I played in public! Corelli, Beethoven's Romance, and Purcell. I did better than I'd expected, but still had a chilled, clammy left hand that refused to move properly. Nerves.

Sunday, November 25, 1979

Worked on my review of Virginia Woolf's letters, volume 5, for World Literature Today. The letters are getting rather tedious, after so many volumes, yet there are still wonderful turns of phrase, occasionally. David Holton, wife, and children came for tea. He's now a kind of executive officer for the Faculty of Law at the university, having left Byzantine Studies. Our social life this past week (and wait until the week after next!) is getting so extensive that I'm beginning to feel like Virginia Woolf: "July was like being a biscuit attacked by rats."

Monday, November 26, 1979

I copyedited Terry Douglas's "log" for the Woodbrooke Log. Many hours wasted. Also began to read Christos's book on Seferis, in typescript. It's surprisingly good. What fits that man has, and what fortitude under conditions that are appalling. Yet he still produces—somehow—whereas my colleagues at Dartmouth have everything the heart desires and do nothing. Not all of them, of course. We were reminded of Larry and Sheila Harvey recently because Katy, out of the blue, wrote to us saying she is doing fine, after so many years of mental breakdown. She's living in a small religious community in Connecticut. I immediately wrote back a warm, encouraging letter, and she replied at more length, stating how thankful she was that we still felt kindly toward her (why shouldn't we?) but that she was loaded with guilt. She continued by saying that her family did not feel kindly toward her. Prodigal Son, all over again.

Θεανώ, Christos's lovely student (who plays the "fat" girl in the taverna—lesson 17—on the videotape) was here, worried about her thesis on Βάρναλης, which she is finally—after five years—about ready to submit. I reassured her as best I could.

Tuesday, November 27, 1979

I thought that perhaps one day might pass without any social obligation, but the Oats asked us for coffee after dinner. At least it's here at Woodbrooke.

Last night I heard Alban Berg's quartet on BBC3. Marvelous. I'd never listened to it before.

Spent the day reading Christos's typescript. I've got to go back now to Καπετάν Μιχάλης and try to write something before we leave. There are fewer than three weeks left.

Friday, November 30, 1979

Sam Wong and I are practicing Mozart's Symphony no. 40 four-hands for Log Night. I'm supposed to do something "American" for International Night but so far can't think of anything.

To Christos's in the evening. We finished going through Ιπτάμενος Θάλαμος, incorporating his suggestions, which continue to be good. I had read his MS on Seferis and politics: how he produced this, given the conditions of his life, is amazing. It's extremely good in places, hurried in others. He hopes to expand and revise it, and submit it for a Ph.D. Much of the evening, as always, was spent listening to his complaints about Margaret's unreasonableness regarding the divorce, which of course they haven't yet obtained because they cannot agree. Meanwhile she has taken a lover in the department whom Christos is forced to see every day, which doesn't make life any easier. The child Pavlos was there, still totally autistic, although calm and somewhat affectionate. He understands much, says nothing. I couldn't live under such conditions. Christos is extraordinarily brave. He is building up a cash reserve for the children out of his meager salary, somehow. But this is being whittled away by inflation. His only hope for the future is to move both children to Greece and establish them somehow in Volos with his sister and brother-in-law.

Saturday, December 1, 1979

Wrote some more on Kapetan Mihalis in the morning. Then to London to see Measure for Measure at the Aldwych. The first half was superb, certainly one of Shakespeare's greatest accomplishments, though this does not sustain itself throughout. The Duke was played as a young, excitable man caught up in the enthusiasm of his various manipulations, instead of as a dignified, godlike man who controls human lives with imperturbable wisdom. But the problem was created by Shakespeare, not the director, since the Duke needs to be otherworldly and godlike, on the one hand, but then capable of getting Isabella to marry him, on the other. Today's Duke showed his attraction to Isabella throughout, which made the marriage work well but lost the lovely sense of a moral "given" that is represented in him.

How nice to walk down Southampton Row again, into Bloomsbury Square. Russell Square, though much changed, retains its charm. I proceeded afterwards down the Strand to Charing Cross, thence to Trafalgar Square and then to Leicester Square, indulging in some of its attractions. Then a Chinese dinner followed by the Nell Gwyn club, Bean Street, and a Guinness on tap. A night on the town. . . . Nice chat with a Britisher at half time in the Aldwich, about the play.

Reading William Golding's latest, Darkness Visible. The first chapter is masterful, but I find the remainder rather pretentious and tedious, so far. David Gray lent it to me.

December 8, 1979

I read the following, and some more, from Carl Sandburg, at the International Evening:

Now it's Uncle Sam sitting on top of the world.

Not so long ago it was John Bull and, earlier yet, Napoleon and the eagles of France told the world where to get off at.

Spain, Rome, Greece, Persia, their blunderbuss guns, their spears, catapults, ships, took their turn at leading the civilizations of the earth—

One by one they were bumped off, moved over, left behind, taken for a ride; they died or they lost the wallop they used to pack, not so good, not so good.

One by one they no longer sat on top of the world—now the Young stranger is Uncle Sam, is America, and the song goes, "The stars and stripes forever!" even though "forever" is a long time.

Even though the oldest kings had their singers and clowns calling, "Oh king you shall live forever."

—stanza #14 in "Good Morning, America,"
Complete Poems (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1950), p. 332.

Reviewing the past week:

Sunday, December 2. Coffee with Mike and Betty Lee, who bought Harry Newton's house at 1, Witherford Way. He gave a good lecture the other day on Quakers and industry, believes that we must use money well rather than pretending it doesn't exist. Tea with David Holton and family at their new house. Supper with a Dartmouth grad now teaching at B'ham: Lee Bridges, friend of Harry and Mary Schultz.

Monday, December 3. A splendid production of Julius Caesar at Stratford. Brutus was marvelously characterized. I was cast back into Roman times through the magic lantern of art. The battle at Philippi seemed “near” because of its proximity to Thessaloniki.

Tuesday, December 4. A lovely supper at Katerina and Harry Davis’s, with the Bryers, Lypourlises, Christos, and the girl who played Aphrodite in our video series. I liked Katerina better this time. And she’s a fine cook.

Wednesday, December 5. Christos, Ritsos’s daughter, Lypourlis, and I saw the Ritsos video in Paul Morby’s studio. Ritsos stiff, obviously not enjoying the experience at all, though of course he read well. Christos’s introduction much too long, though fine. Then to the Modern Greek seminar, where Μίτσος Λυπουρλής read a fine paper on understanding Greek adjectives properly as secondary formations from nouns which, in their turn, had been formed from an earlier form of the same adjective. For example, αριστερός-ή-ό (left) → ο αριστερός (leftist) → αριστερός-ή-ό (pertaining to leftists). Thence to Ron and Jane Willetts’ for supper. He is due to retire in two years; fears that the Greek chair will disappear owing to declining enrollments. He warmly urged me to return for a longer period.

Thursday, December 6. Lunch with Elizabeth and Michael Jeffreys, here from Sydney, Australia. He works with Alf Vincent; she is unemployed. Both very stiff and properly English at first, then warmed up. Heard all of this and part of her paper at Bryer’s seminar, thence to Stratford with Meg Alexiou, Chrysanthi, and Rowena Loverance to see Cymbeline, the first time I’d ever seen the play. A strange play, about guilt and remorse, constancy (Imogen) vs. intrigue, all with a happy ending. Having seen Julius Caesar the other day, it was easy to return to Roman times (the reign of Octavian). Judy Dench was a fine Imogen.

Friday, December 7. Sam Wong and I rehearsed Mozart’s 40th, which we’ll do on Log Night; also a nice arrangement of “Country Gardens.” Supper with Tony and Jean Brown, who live in one of the Bournville Estate houses. He does jewelry and collects tin soldiers; she does embroidery and collects doll houses! Daphne went off to a disco at Dame Elizabeth Cadbury School with Sarah Brown; we stayed and talked about Greek καθαρεύουσα (Tony is fascinated with κοινή and subsequent developments).

Saturday, December 8. Henry Hart came from Oxford at tea time and stayed until 8:00 p.m. He has completed his M. Phil. on Geoffrey Hill and hopes to stay on to do the D. Phil. with Richard Ellmann on Tate, Ransom, and Hill. Likes Oxford now, finally. But he's stopped writing poetry for the present (he says)—another victim of academic pressure. At the international evening Daphne and Cathy Gray did the Zorba dance, Chrysanthi read "Awaiting the Barbarians" in Greek, I in English, and I represented America with a selection from Carl Sandburg, who is a remarkable poet unduly neglected.

Sunday, December 9, 1979

Meg brought us to her parents' house. George Thomson was feeling well (he's often depressed, apparently), and described his new translation of the The Bacchae and the introduction he is writing together with a specialist in drugs, who is certain that the states described in the play result from the use of strychnine or something similar. Thomson asked me to help him find a publisher in America. We then went to a pub outside of Henley-in-Arden for a lunch of Guinness and paté. Very nice. Rod and Fran Beaton arrived at the same moment, coincidentally. We're having dinner with them at Woodbrooke tonight. Meg then offered us coffee in her new house, 90 Vivian Road, Harborne, a Victorian row house built in 1894 (?) and very nicely redecorated by her in white with brown carpets. We hope to see her in Philadelphia for the MGSA congress on women in November.

Monday, December 10, 1979

I treated myself to a three-piece all-wool suit, gray striped, £59. Dinner with Mitsos and Aglaïa Lypourlis, very nice new friends. He was πρόταρχος of the University of Thessaloniki during the Mitsakis embroglio and talked at length about the extraordinary opportunism of that character, who strikes me as being an "academic Richard Nixon" in personality and neurosis, a kind of mythomaniac like Clappique in Malraux's novel.

Tuesday, December 11, 1979

Not a single social engagement! Marvelous! I'm writing away, systematically, on my chapter on Ο Καπετάν Μιχάλης—that is, its flaws. I won't finish completely, alas, before we leave Woodbrooke but will have thought out and outlined everything so that the remaining writing can be done, I hope, in New York and Hanover before Christmas. Thus I'll be able to start the new year fresh, with the next chapter.

Donald Nicol still hasn't contacted Blackwell's. But I contacted him and he promised to do so this week. He has vetted and copyedited all the MSS for #6, so they'll be ready to go as soon as MGSA gives its approval, as I hope it will, at the December meeting.

Wednesday, December 12, 1979

Christos came at 5:00 and stayed for supper, which we shared with Tony Brown, who I hope will establish contact with Christos in the future. We finished his vetting of the Πτάμενος Θάλαμος, talked as usual about his problems and future, and then went down to epilogue, which was done by Daphne and Cathy Gray, reading an interminable portion from Winnie the Pooh, lengthened by fits of giggles.

Friday, December 14, 1979

Woodbrooke

The last morning at my cherished desk in the Quaker library. I did 140 MS pages all told in these 7½ weeks. Not very impressive numerically, but not bad if we include the conceptualization of three different chapters: Κοῦρος, Χριστόφορος Κολόμβος, Ο Καπετάν Μιχάλης, plus reading, in Greek of course, of those three works and also Κωνσταντίνος Παλαιολόγος and Prevelakis's Παντέρμη Κρήτη, Ο Κρητικός Α'—το Δέντρο—και Β'—η Πρώτη λευτεριά. . . . Coffee after lunch with Tony Brown, who surprised me with a draft-chapter for teaching New Testament Greek based on our Demotic Greek. Οὗτος ἔστιν ὁ πάτηρ ὁ Ἰωσήφ, etc., ὁ υἱός ὁ Ἰησός, ἡ μήτηρ ἡ Μαρία . . . This is the first fish snapping at the bait I've held out to various people over the years: to develop a New Testament course using Modern Greek pronunciation and the oral-aural technique.

I should have mentioned that yesterday Chrysanthi did the epilogue, reading a moving passage from Jason Demos's translation of Mrs. Tsatsos's war journals, about trying to feed starving children during the πείνα of the winter of 1941–1942.

In the evening we had our Log Night. I selected the passages to be read. The log was almost totally composed by Terry Douglas, who has an observant eye and a lovely sense of humor. We divided it into four sections: first impressions, fun and games, "overheard" comments on personalities, and concluding thoughts, with a different reader for each. I read the last section. Also I played the first movement of Mozart's Symphony No. 40 four-hands with Sam Wong, plus a nice arrangement of Country Gardens, again with Sam. It went reasonably well; actually, I didn't have the jitters at all. Daphne and Cathy sang a song accompanying themselves on guitars. Warm goodbyes were said all around, to the many extraordinary people we've met here this term. By and large I've felt at ease, socially, more so than previously.

Eric Priestman told me that Fircroft is finally going to open again; next September they've advertised for a new principal and three (not four) tutors.

Saturday, December 15, 1979

B'ham-London-New York

Early breakfast. More goodbyes. By Avis car with our voluminous luggage, to Heathrow. Flew on PanAm flight #1, the "round the world" flight. I said to Chrysanthi, and I think I meant it, that of all our sabbaticals, this was the "richest"—mostly because of the Greek trip, of course.

Saturday, December 29, 1979

Hanover

MGSA Annual Meeting in Boston. Lily Macrakis and Mike Keeley, long ago, had "conspired" to have me elected the next president. I was duly elected to the executive committee, but lost the presidency to Keeley. He was in California at MLA and four or five members there had sent in proxy ballots for him. These, added to votes cast in Boston, won him the day. It was good practice for me to apply principles about the pettiness of ambition. I wanted the post but rationally must now praise my fortunes for having been denied it, since it probably would have interfered catastrophically with my writing this year and have ruined the sabbatical. I'll continue as associate editor of BMGS.

1980

---

Hanover	January 1–June 25
Riparius	June 26–August 28
Hanover	August 28–December 15
Philadelphia, MGSA, November
Athens, Hotel Electra, Ερμού 5	December 16–23
Hanover	Dec. 24–25
Houston, Texas	Dec. 26–30

Saturday, February 2, 1980

Hanover

Ernest Renan waxes enthusiastic over Jesus' response: "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and unto God the things that are God's" (Math. 22.15ff, Mark 12.13, Luke 20.20) The background is a movement led by a certain Judas the Gaulonite that held that to pay taxes was a sacrilege since it in effect acknowledged Caesar as equivalent to God. Jesus' response of course was a way of avoiding the snare. The Pharisees wanted to implicate him as a follower of the Gaulonite and thus be able to denounce him to the Roman authorities on these grounds. The response has been interpreted, in later times, as an excuse for complying with the requirements of the state—e.g., for rendering military service even though one is a Christian. But Renan shows the other side; he sees Jesus' response as the first clear statement of separation of church and state—i.e., as a declaration freeing conscience to act independently of the state. Renan sings out: "Mot profond qui a décidé de l'avenir du christianisme! Mot d'un spiritualisme accompli et d'une justesse merveilleuse, qui a fondé la separation du spirituel et du temporel, et a posé la base du vrai libéralisme et de vraie civilisation! (Vie de Jésus, p. 348.)

Thursday, July 17, 1980

Riparius

Our 25th wedding anniversary. Chrysanthi gave me a bar of Cadbury chocolate, to remind me "where it all began." Daphne and my mother conspired to make a huge meal, secretly, and to invite Jacques and Hilda Grunblatt. It was all very pleasant, especially considering the very eloquent letters that arrived—in time, even!—from Leander and Alec. Lots of round numbers: 50 years of age, 25th anniversary. Will there be a 75 and a 50th? And what good, different, and constructive will happen in the next 25 years, if 25 are granted?

Saturday, July 19, 1980

Riparius

This journal has been scandalously neglected since our return from Woodbrooke more than six months ago. If nothing else, I must simply list certain things, viz:

—My first book in Greek, Αντίθεση και σύνθεση στην ποίηση του Γιάννη Πίτσου, was published finally, after much delay, by Kedros in Athens, in a very lovely format. I was thrilled to hold it in my hand, and to read the Greek. Various people have written me about it, including Zisisimos Lorentzatos, and it has received some notices in the Greek press.

—Leander gave a trial run of his Master's recital in Hanover in April, then the real thing in New York during the transit strike. He didn't play very well either time, alas (though some pieces were fine), but he did it. Later, at the last moment, he learned and performed (in studio) Beethoven's 2nd piano concerto, his final requirement, and graduated with all A's. We met Robert Goldsand at the recital. He seems to have faith in Leander, and assured me that he is really better than that recital showed. Let's hope so. At this moment, Leander is living in Alec's apartment in Ardmore, Pennsylvania (Haverford Park Apartments) and working 6:00 to midnight at the Haverford gate, checking incoming cars. Pending is a possibility to be a musician-sailor on the Travel Dynamics cruises next winter (Red Sea) and spring-summer-fall (Mediterranean), along with Alec. Vasos Papagapitos initiated this, but we still don't know if the job will actually materialize.

—Alec graduated with his B.A in music (with honors) and psychology from Haverford in May. He, too, previously, gave a senior recital—his honors project—in which he coaxed and cajoled two others to do justice (sort of) to the Dvořák Dumky piano trio. The graduation was on a rainy and then steamy-hot, humid day, and was rather unpleasant, except for the marvelous Meeting that preceded it, in which Steve Cary spoke eloquently, and many others, including my father, added their own sentiments. The Grunblatts were there, for Mark's graduation. After the ceremonies, we helped Alec move down the street . . . in the heat. Some time before, Alec and I came to an impasse in our relationship when I wrote to him openly against his girlfriend Elizabeth, sending him, stupidly, some choice excerpts from Act III of Man and Superman about predatory women. He told me, grossly, to mind my own business. All this by mail. It made for a very awkward meeting in New York at Leander's recital. But later, I was in Pennsylvania for a three-day retreat of the Executive Committee of the Pendle Hill Board of Managers, and had supper with Alec on Sunday at the conclusion, giving us a chance to talk things over and reach what I think was a mutual understanding of our positions. In any case, everything seems OK now, though I keep silent about Elizabeth. Alec, upon graduation, began work the very next day for Haverford's grounds' crew, learning a lot about landscape gardening and enjoying the black and Italian "regulars" whom he was assisting. Now he's gone out to Eastern College as a drill-master in John Rassias's program for teaching French to thirty Americans about to go to medical school in Lille.

—Winter term, Chrysanthi taught Greek and I was the "spouse." I avoided Dartmouth affairs very well indeed, except tenure meetings (Ellen Rose was denied, along with A. B. Paulson. Brenda Silver and Peter Travis are now tenured; Lou Renza got our recommendation but was held up by the CAP). I worked well in Study 709 of Baker Library, finishing and revising the Kapetan Mihalis chapter in light of some splendid books on Venizelos and Cretan history loaned me by Lily Macrakis, then beginning The Last Temptation chapter. This became a monstrosity, over 600 MS pages, I believe, because to do it right I survey everything Kazantzakis had written previously on the Christ-theme: Κωμωδία, Ξημερώνει, Σπασμένες ψυχές, Χριστός, Νικηφόρος Φωκάς, parts of Οδύσεια, etc. But I think I found good, new, original things to say about Ο τελευταίος πειρασμός, and especially about the relation between religion (eschatology) and politics. This involved going over Kazantzakis's own sources, such as Renan, and much more, plus trying to understand the Bible somewhat better. I didn't work very rapidly, but I like the results. This continued into:

—Spring term: Thankfully, I finished the Τελευταίος πειρασμός chapter just before leaving for Terpni, enabling me to start fresh here with Ο φτωχούλης του Θεού. But a great deal of spring term was spent in Kiewit typing all of Ο ιπτάμενος θάλαμος into the computer, using the new capability developed recently by which I can get Greek out of Rem1 in the same building, and can mix Greek and English even on the same line. Marvels of technology! The only sadness in this connection was John Rassias's indifference. When he returned from France he didn't even call to find out how the book was progressing. Meanwhile, I'd worked intensively with Bob Daubenspeck on the illustrations (now completed), wrote additional grammatical sections and drills, incorporated the suggestions of Χρήστος Αλεξίου, Dia Philippides, and Danny Danforth into the text, etc. Hundreds of hours of work. But UPNE is set to publish it (New director, Tom MacFarland).

Spring also saw some further negotiations with Cambridge University Press to take over BMGS from Blackwell's. Mike Keeley, Lily Macrakis, and I lunched with Sue Porter and Mark Sexton (who turned out to be Haverford '53) in New York, and Mike went to London to iron out remaining differences with Donald Nicol, but at the very last minute CUP got cold feet—for financial reasons, so we're told—and backed out.

—In May, Chrysanthi and I had a lovely few days in Québec and Université Laval. I gave a paper, in Greek; all the rest were in French. We dined with Jim Day, who is now first-chair violist in the Québec Symphony. Our hosts, more or less, were Jacques and Mme Bouchard. Spoke some French, heard lots, returned with four dozen croissants and six baguettes.

—Pendle Hill made me assistant presiding clerk of the Board, and I ran one of the Board meetings, apparently with success. Now they want me to give a short course on The Last Temptation. I'm resisting, so far. The Retreat was a good opportunity to know some of the key people better, like Mather Lippincott.

—Dartmouth gave me a 9.5% raise to help with inflation. That brings me to $37,400, I think.

—The job held by Peter Mackridge at King's College London is now open, and Nicol invited me to apply. But to go from professor to lecturer, from almost $40,000 to about $20,000 (if that) . . . ? Am I stagnating in materiality, despite what Saint Francis teaches us? Yes, obviously: materiality, family, ease.

—All this brings up, of course, the question of the next twenty-five years (if I live that long). I'm now 50. The first 25 were occupied by growth and education; the second 25 by marriage, family, career. Now what? Can there be a new phase, or just a continuation for half that period with subsequent dwindling? Chrysanthi says that it all depends on health. But health, so largely, depends on psychic energies or their absence.

—Now, to see if the tractor will start!

Sunday, July 20, 1980

Terpni

A hot, lazy day. I copyedited Nette Bossert's essay on Ibn . . . in the morning, a possible Pendle Hill pamphlet, written this year at Woodbrooke. Took my parents to the bus after lunch. More Bossert, then tried to improve our driveway by dumping several wheelbarrows-full of dirt in hollow spots. Mowed where the disk harrow had been. Swam. Read Charles Osborne's biography of W. H. Auden after supper. I like what Auden once wrote about the qualities of a good teacher (p. 84): "For a teacher to be of real value to his pupils, he must be a mature and above all a happy person, giving the young the feeling that adult life is infinitely more exciting than their own; he must be prepared to give them all his powers of affection and imaginative understanding when they want them, yet to forget them completely the moment they are gone, to be indifferent to them personally; and lastly he must have no moral bees-in-his-bonnet, no preconceptions of what the good child should be; he must be shocked or alarmed at nothing, only patient to understand the significance of any piece of behaviour from the child's point of view, not his own; to see in the perfect little ape his most promising charge, and watchful to remove as tactfully and unobtrusively as possible such obstacles to progress as he can."

Earlier in the same book I liked Auden's remark (p. 24) that a good teacher is one who is "ready . . . to give the adolescent all the comfort and stimulus of a personal relation, without at the same time making any demands for himself in return . . ."

Irving Shapiro called. He's already back from Toronto, where he underwent a hernia operation only three days ago. Drove all the way himself.

Friday, July 25, 1980

Terpni

Wrote sixteen pages today! Then shopping, laundry, and garbage in Chestertown: one's weekly ritual. Daphne has a friend, Sarah Wilson, from Albany, and is delighted. Last night at Shapiros for supper, and slides of Galapagos, Peru, and Amazon River. Full moon tonight, and totally clear sky.

Jay Parini wrote and among things said the following (is it true?): “I must say congratulations on the 25 years together. To both of you! It’s no small accomplishment to stay wedded for a quarter century in this particular age! I always love to be around the two of you, mostly because of that stability of affection you display, an affection that seems durable but not dull; there’s still electricity there, a flow, and it radiates. I’m glad for both of you.”

July 29, 1980

Alecs’s birthday. We had a nice talk on the telephone. He and Leander have been given the job by Travel Dynamics to cruise to the Red Sea in January, February, and in the Mediterranean from May to September.

Wednesday, July 30, 1980

Terpni

A typical day at Terpni. All morning and half the afternoon in my “office” struggling to write my minimum of ten pages on Saint Francis. Unsettled weather—scudding rain clouds, rumbling thunder, but no rain. Next: chain saw, maul, and wedge, sawing a stump down to ground level. Repairing barbed wire on the garden fence. Filing the saw chain, with much improvement. Then the delicious wash in the basin outdoors, in cold well-water. Then (Chrysanthi said cryptically that she had a surprise for supper), harvest of string beans. Delicious! Then “relaxing” with Thomas Mann’s The Magic Mountain. Finally BBC news and special programs on our new, miraculous shortwave receiver.

Yesterday we had Daphne’s friend Michelle Parsons here, and we returned her to Lake George at 10:00 p.m. and then had a walk around town. Plus a pastrami sandwich!

Monday, August 4, 1980

A good-sized fox came out in front of me at the “office” and stood not ten feet away before sauntering off. (Later): Described the supposed “fox” to Art Perryman. It wasn’t a fox; it was a coyote.

Tuesday, August 5, 1980

Jerry Gardner, son of the editors of the North Creek newspaper, came for supper with his charming French wife, age 22. Afterwards she and I played piano four-hands: Ravel’s “Mother Goose.” What joy!

Wednesday, August 6, 1980

With the Shapiros to Galamian's summer school, Meadowmount. Heard students do Chopin (cello & piano), Prokofiev (solo violin sonata), and Brahms's sextet for two violins, two violas, two cellos—a marvelous experience. We filled ourselves with pizza on the way up, in Schroon Lake, and then gorged on Fran's cake and jam afterwards. At Meadowmount we met old friends of my parents' from Sunnyside, the Pincuses, eighty-ish and very well preserved.

Thursday, August 7, 1980

Very good session writing this morning, on the “ladder of love” in Saint Francis. Then shopping in Chestertown: the routine—laundry, supermarket, dump, hardware, back to laundry; milkshake and ice cream cones (90+ degree heat). Then from 4:30 to 7:30 on the roof, a long, hard session of shingling, and laying the aluminum flashing at the junction of shed and barn. I've done this roof very messily, I'm afraid. Chrysanthi was utterly exhausted afterwards, yet as always we had a lovely dinner (supervised by Daphne). Reading (TLS), radio (BBC), delicious sleep.

Saturday, August 9, 1980

Worked all morning and most of the afternoon on the new roof and finished it. Chrysanthi exuberant, mostly because of relief she wouldn't have to be up high any more (her acrophobia; after four days sliding on her behind she actually stood up today). Because of this and also Daphne going to camp tomorrow, we celebrated by going out to dinner to the (former) Alp Horn restaurant. Superb. Chrysanthi “treated” me (but I paid). Afterwards to Shapiros' for desert. Met David Frost from Schroon Lake. He is a free-lance medical writer, ghost writer, editor, and a very interesting man.

Sunday, August 10, 1980

To the Canaan, New Hampshire, Cardigan Mountain School, to deliver Daphne to the New Hampshire Youth Symphony Orchestra camp. The kids were bunked a mile away in real old-fashioned cabins: no lights, etc. Daphne in good spirits; we left her, with ease. Then to Hanover (xeroxing, mail). Then to White River Junction to Daubenspeck's to see Ἰπτάμενος pictures. His house is an old garage, but he's making it livable. How strange for a man to be totally alone and with practically no resources at age 55+.

Friday, August 15, 1980

Finished the chapter on Saint Francis. Enough!

Sunday, August 17, 1980

Nice concert. Edna Michell, Raphael Hillyer, Glazer, and a cellist did Brahms' masterful piano quartet. Reception in Leland homestead on Schroon Lake; he was Ethan Allen's second at the battle of Fort Ticonderoga. Real Jewish spread: chopped chicken liver, ham, chocolate cake, etc. Talked to Hillyer, who grew up in Hanover and had Leslie Dewing as his first teacher. Asa and Isabel Rothstein were there with their children; lovely people. The son graduated from Haverford in 1970. Also Jerry Gardner and wife were there; he is writing a review. Met head of the Seagle Colony. They employ two pianists every summer.

Monday, August 18, 1980

Finished outlining the Saint Francis chapter. Now: entering G&M in Notes in the filing system, plus some book reviews, I hope. Mowed path into the woods, a hard job. Chrysanthi discovered three good wild apple trees that I'll clear around and prune now.

If I could only muster enough energy—: Adirondack novel. What splendid material I have: Gerrow the maniac. Art Perryman (vice ring in North Creek; his church, fundamentalists). Lou Curth and Co., knee-jerk environmentalism. The Hudson River controversy: Niagara Mohawk's power line, under or over. Jacques and Hilda. The Nazi propagandist in North Creek. Roy Millington, raping the old lady Tubbs. And so much more.

Saturday, August 23, 1980

Burt Pike came yesterday at 1:00 p.m. We talked, literally without stop, until 11:30 p.m., ten and a half hours; then again this morning from 8:00 a.m. until 10:30 or so, when he returned to New York. How nice! Subjects: Kafka, Thomas Mann, Haverford, politics, literacy . . .

Sunday, November 23, 1980

Hanover

"Capitalism will be destroyed, but not by the working class. It will be destroyed by the development of national defense in each country and replaced by the totalitarian state." —Simone Weil, in a letter (cited in Carol Murphy, Four Women, Four Windows on Light (Pendle Hill pamphlet manuscript)).

1981

---

Portland, Maine	February 27–29
New York City	March 18–20
Riparius	July 2–August 29
Hanover	August 30–December 20
New York-Montreal, December 4–6
Portland, Maine, December 12–13
New York City	December 20–31

Wednesday, July 15, 1981

Terpni

Breck Trautwein, now separated from Donna, has taken to Buddhism. He gave me a book obtained at the Buddhists' monastery in the Catskills: Namu Dai Bosa, by Senzaki, Nakagawa, and Shimano. Lots of good thoughts—e.g., “Man is like a bicyclist: He is safe from falling only as long as he keeps on going. If we hold our will like an iron wall against all kinds of trouble; if our breathing is in harmony with the rhythm of right-mindedness, every action of ours will become part of the progressive current of the universe . . .” —Nyogen Senzaki (p. 61). Later: Breck came for supper. I had set four traps around a woodchuck hole in the garden (right in the middle of the string beans) and when Breck arrived we found the animal lamentably caught in three of the traps. He snapped and snarled at us once or twice but then, as Breck said, bowed his head in a kind of Buddhistic equanimity concerning his fate. Breck dispatched him with a sharp blow across the back of the neck. “He was consuming food; now he becomes food,” enabling the life-chain to continue. Despite all this philosophizing, we tossed him unceremoniously in the woods for the foxes, and then sat down to our own obligation toward the food chain, fricassee of veal.

Today was also momentum in that I finished the glossary for Ο ιπτάμενος θάλαμος after about two months' work of the most exacting and exasperating kind. Some of it still remains to be entered on the computer, but this is relatively pleasant, compared to checking and double-checking the meanings of 4000 words. I truly began to understand the difficulties confronting anyone who attempts to make a dictionary.

Here, at Terpni (!), I have a portable computer terminal, which I hook into Kiewit via telephone. Each morning from 7:00 to 8:00 a.m. (when the rates are the cheapest) I “keyboard” for an hour, before breakfast.

A technological miracle of a slightly lower order is the Rube Goldberg device I arranged, using a fence stretcher, to operate the mower from the tractor since Chrysanthi can't mow this year on account of her operation. Fine. Works beautifully. But on the first day of use I misjudged a stump, didn't lift the bar, and ended up by breaking the tongue.

I should note here, in this lamentably sporadic diary, that Chrysanthi had surgery on June 3rd: hysterectomy. What was thought to be a cyst of the ovaries turned out to be just a fibroid, totally benign, so we are very pleased. Her uterus and ovaries, now somewhere in a garbage heap, did their service and are gone where they can cause no more mischief. Menopause had set in about two years ago, so this was relatively non-traumatic. In any case, the recuperation has been going well, with lots of solicitude from various good friends, in Hanover and here.

The boys are at this moment on the SS Regina Maris in the employ of Vasos Papagapitos of Travel Dynamics as a violin-piano duo. Itinerary: Great Britain, Scandinavia, Leningrad, coast of France, Portugal, Spain, Italy, Yugoslavia, Greece, Turkey. Leander will stay through to the end. Alec will leave at Venice to return to Philadelphia to take up his post as a sixth grade teacher of French and English at Friends Central School (headmaster, Tom Wood, Haverford '52). Leander plans to go to Helsinki afterwards to be with Outi, the girl he met at Woodbrooke this past winter.

His year (more or less): Down and out in Philadelphia feeling unwanted; miserable housing arrangements; employ as night gatekeeper at Haverford, then as “picker” in Theodore Presser warehouse in Bryn Mawr; rescued by me and sent to Woodbrooke in January; splendid experience including love affair (history repeating itself); then to Greece; lived with Stavros and Toulia; practiced; gave recital in the hall of Μακεδονικών Σπουδών; return via Salzburg, Bonn, London; short stay home; then off to the cruise.

Alec's year: employ as gardener at Haverford; teacher of French in Rassias program for medical students, Philadelphia; attendant in school bus for handicapped; school bus driver, Lower Merion Township, Pennsylvania; teacher of English in Rassias program in Bourges, France (included reunion with his “family” in Avignon, and sojourns in Paris with Helene Rassias, and quick trip to Woodbrooke to see Leander; return home briefly; off to cruise. Still living in Philadelphia with Elizabeth Dean, unfortunately, but determined to break away (?).

My year: very difficult to return to teaching after five years at half time as Geisel Professor and then a full year’s leave. But I coped. Did Iliad and Paradise Lost in Frosh Seminar plus Joyce-Proust-Mann-Kafka in the fall, Conrad-Joyce-Beckett plus English 5 (Walden, Bertrand Russell, Dubliners) in the winter, Finnegans Wake seminar in the spring. Mad, lovely trip to Athens just before Christmas for language conference; then to Houston, Texas just after Christmas for MLA. Saw Izzy (Gardner) Lipschutz there, and her new husband, Abby, a diamond merchant originally from Amsterdam. Continuing service on Pendle Hill Board. Short course at PH on The Last Temptation, attended by (among others) a Vietnam veteran who entered the Methodist ministry afterwards and said he was chiefly inspired by Kazantzakis. I did this in collaboration with Mary Morrison, who did the Gospel side.

Daphne is currently at Kinhaven, and ecstatic. I have gone back on the Kinhaven Board.

At Dartmouth next year I’ll be chairman of IAS (Intensive Academic Support).

My Αντίθεση και σύνθεση στη ποίηση του Γιάννη Ρίτσου came out in Athens, and I actually collected royalties from Kedros! Jenny Mastoraki is translating my Cavafy and Kazantzakis pamphlets for publication there. Also, the Penguin volume on Ritsos came out in Athens (in English), as a reprint.

Worked hard all year with John Rassias and Chrysanthi on Ο ιπτάμενος θάλαμος, which is about to be printed. Bob Daubenspeck did the illustrations. But I did nothing on my Kazantzakis book save lecture on The Last Temptation for Pendle Hill and Queens College.

In November we spent four days in Philadelphia at the MGSA symposium on women. Phew! Had a stupendous Chinese meal downtown with Alec, Elizabeth, Kristin Lindgren, Kostas Kazazis. Meg Alexiou came, and was in Hanover previously. In February, nice one-day conference in Portland, Maine. Supper with Danny Danforth and Peggy Rotunda, such sweet people. Met a real live Shaker at the conference.

In Houston, lots of time with Alexis Levitin, besides Izzy.

BMGS had a difficult year. We tried to negotiate with Johns Hopkins after the Cambridge UP offer fell through. Bryer, Keeley, Diskin Clay, and I in Baltimore. But they want us to assume full liability. Risky. Nicol very angry, etc. #7 in press, including Lavagnini's presentation of the new poems by Cavafy on Julian, translated by David Sices and the cause of numerous international cables and the loss of ten years, I think, of my life. Glen Bowersock has a piece on all the Julian poems. But #8 is suspended indefinitely for lack of money.

Nice increase in salary, up to $42,000. Chrysanthi promoted to Senior Lecturer.

The December meeting in Athens 1980 deserves extended memorial; it was exhilarating and continually fascinating. Here follow some notes done on the spot.

Monday, December 15: all-night flight. Huge long conversation with Theofanis Stavrou.

Tuesday, December 16 (day of arrival): Smuggled calculator printer through customs, for Dimitris Yiannakos. Bank. Dinner. Ritsos's apartment with Christos and Maya (girlfriend?). Theater "Da" with Manos Katrakis. 350th performance. Ομιλίες, Σανοδινού, κτλ. Archimandrite Ζήσης Σκάρος in next seat. Finish 1:00 a.m. Then τραπέζι: meal, Cretan dancing; finish 3:00 a.m.

Wednesday, December 17: Πρωθυπουργός, καλός, για τη γλωσσική μεταρρύθμιση. Television; lights; press corps. (I was on television that night.) Thomson's message. Ψωμιάδης. Siesta. 5:00 p.m., call from Brenda Marder. Τελετή για το Ζήση Σκάρο, on completion of 3rd volume of trilogy; all leftists. Φωτιάδης, Ritsos's lovely poem, touching. Saw Γιώργος Γιάνναρης, Νικέττα Μακρυνικόλα, Αθηνά Καλλιανέση. Σκάρος, Ρίτσος, Κατράκης, all in στρατόπεδο together. Supper. Coffee at Zonars. Angry at Frangopoulos's article in Kathimerini against Modern Greek studies in USA. Midnight to 1:00 a.m., with Christos, going over his paper and mine.

Thursday, December 18: Παρουσίαση ενός νέου διδακτικού βιβλίου.

Friday, December 19: I chaired one of the sessions, with Vlandes, Bibkur, MacBain, Peter Thomas, Dora Sahayan. Evening, reception at hotel, marvelous food, saw Raizis, Kimon Friar, etc.

Saturday, December 20: morning, good session on dictionaries with Κριαράς, Πολίτης, etc. Then research: I read my talk on the article; seemed well received; special lunch catered by Ministry at Dionysos restaurant, just below Acropolis. Another session, then Εθνικό Θέατρο, very poor play, modern version of Odysseus's return, how the myth is more important than the reality.

Sunday, December 21: last day of symposium; lunch with Nikiforos Diamandouros re: BMGS. Found Tom and Nancy Doulis and children waiting at the hotel. Tom joined us for lunch. Not finished with trilogy, but he has finished volume 1—first novel. We'll have to extend the five-year plan. After lunch, very bad επιτροπή, dissention, no progress.

Final session; awards: I read λόγο for Ίδρυμα Ουράνη. Πέτρος Χάρης came to receive it, but in middle of session ο Αθανασιάδης-Νόβας came, about 95 years old, could hardly walk; very distinguished appearance αλλά ετοιμοθάνατος. He spoke after I did, accepting; barely comprehensible; but very συγκινητικό. Front row: 3 Academy members, Minister of Culture (Ανδριανόπουλος), head of cultural relations: Βασιλόπουλος. Κουτουχέρης, MP for PASOK, spoke about το μονοτονικό. Awards to Arpajolou, Thomson, Vlavianos, Georgacas, Ίδρυμα Ουράνη. Kazazis, the master of ceremonies, forgot to praise Anna Farmakidis at the end!

10:00 p.m., final meeting of committee. Again, deadlock on everything because Anna wanted things her way; decision to vote; we controlled her on an issue (support for computer project on frequency count); afterwards, she whined and complained, still. I said, "Anna, we can't do only what you want!" She then acted like a six-year-old: "I'll resign if I'm pressuring you. I'm insulted, etc. I have no business here." We convinced her, barely, to stay. She sat inert with closed eyes; refused to take part. We continued to act, efficiently now, using parliamentary method, but with a sense of dissention and sorrow that it should all end with such divisiveness. Kazazis and Bien the villains! Others present: Vincent, Mackridge, Messing, Vaporis, Petrounias, Psomiadis, Karaminea, Stavrou, Maskaleris. Decided to publish an information bulletin. 12 midnight to 1:00 a.m., Kazazis and I alone, discussing the sad events.

Monday, December 22, last full day: Kedros, Nanetta, δρ. 7.000 royalties; Stangos-Bien Penguin Ritsos to be reprinted; telephone contact with Jenny Mastoraki. Shopping, Gaïtanos; bump into Petrounias. Bank. Πληρεξούσιο for Leander. Hotel: met Nikiforos Vrettakos and his son, a film-maker. Vrettakos gave me his latest book of poetry. Lunch with Jenny Mastoraki, "my translator"; 1:00 p.m.–4:00 p.m., nice discussion; she was Allison Pingel's tutor. Samarakis at next table; jovial. Rendezvous 5:00 p.m. with Kostas Asimopoulos; offer of apartment in Athens, set aside in a lady's will for use by visiting intellectuals; gift of his novel. With Christos, Maskaleris, to Παγκράτι, to Athens Center of Creative Arts, near Seferis's house; talk with director re: helping Dartmouth students on our foreign study program; they have flats, etc. Other "sympo-siasts" arrive. Film by Vrettakos's son, on the flooding of a village and an excavation site by a man-made lake created by a dam. Then demonstration of teaching methods for Modern Greek by Butterworth's former faculty member (now in U.S.A); left early however because Dimitris Gounelas picked us up. To Gounelas's house in Αγία Παρασκευή, slopes of Ημεττού. Monastery of St. John ο Κυνηγός visible (one faint light) in the distance. Peter Mackridge, George Giannaris. Gounelas's wife: New Zealander, Ph.D. Oxford, teaches Modern British Literature at Deree-Pierce; colleague of Γιάνναρης. Κουβέντα ως τη 1:00.

Tuesday, December 23: taxi to Hellenikon with Nomikos Vaporis, with stop along the way to pick up some modern icons. Good flight. To LaGuardia; then Boston shuttle. Leander drove to Logan to fetch me. Arrived Hanover 3:00 a.m. on December 24th, utterly exhausted.

Thursday, December 25: Christmas at home.

Friday, December 26: left for Texas. Rental car frozen, couldn't start; Alec drove a group of us to Hartford airport in nick of time. Houston 70 degrees.

Thursday, July 16, 1981

Riparius

The hearings on the power line crossing the Hudson were apparently hilarious. The law states that such lines must be "substantially invisible." What does that mean? Niagara Mohawk argued that they would occupy less than 1% of the visual field. The lawyer for the environmentalists then cross-examined the NM witness: "Do you like salad?" "Yes . . . but . . . what does that have to do with electric wires?" "You'll see . . . (more questions, establishing a luscious salad; then) "Would you like a cockroach in your salad?" "Of course not . . . but . . ." "Supposing the roach were hidden beneath a lovely green leaf of lettuce, with only one teensy-weensy feeler sticking out, so little that it occupied less than 1% of the visual field—i.e., of your view of the salad. Would you feel like digging in and eating?" "No, but . . . er, I . . ." "Your Honor, I rest my case."

I forgot to record our saga with Jacques Grunblatt. In April he and Hilda came to Hanover to stay with us while he attended a Spanish Civil War conference at Dartmouth. On the eve of the conference he had a heart attack at 3:00 a.m. We accompanied the ambulance to Mary Hitchcock Hospital. For 3 or 4 days he was in intensive care, unconscious. All the children came: Jesse from Alaska, Mark from Delaware, Ellen from the Midwest. We housed everyone, and also Bill Watson (Haverford '53), who was a speaker at the conference. Afterwards, he recovered nicely; the children left and he and Hilda finally returned to North Creek after about two or three weeks. In the course of all this, I arranged with Jack Shepherd to attempt to market Seven Hells by Thaddeus Stabholz, the book that Jacques had translated the previous winter from Polish. It's about the holocaust. Hilda spent her time typing while she was in Hanover—the perfect occupational therapy.

Friday, July 17, 1981

Terpni

Our anniversary, the 26th. Went out for supper to Pilak's. Very nice. First full sexual intercourse since Chrysanthi's operation. Her capacity for orgasm unimpaired despite absence of ovaries and womb! Mine still exists, too. First penetration without a condom since early days of the marriage when we desired children.

Saturday, July 18, 1981

Supper with Irv and Fran Shapiro. Talk talk talk, easily, until late hours. We are blessed in our neighbors.

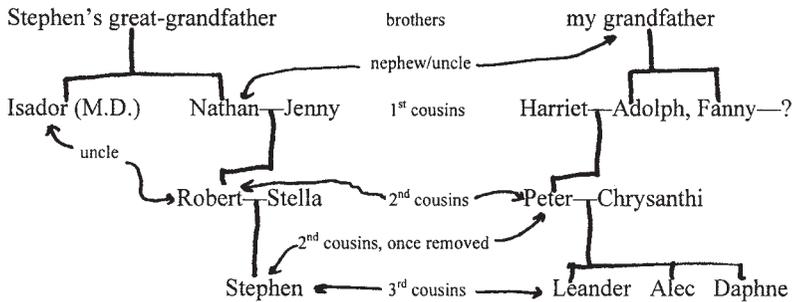

My Rube Goldberg device enabling me to mow without Chrysanthi is not working too well. A few days ago I broke the mower tongue when I misjudged an obstacle. On Thursday I replaced the tongue, getting a beautiful splinter under my fingernail as a reward. Friday had this extracted in Chestertown. Today improved the pulley system, placing the pulley more directly under the lever-arm, so that the rope doesn't rub and break, as before. Mowed the south field satisfactorily.

Sunday, July 19, 1981

Yesterday a doe and her fawn walked past me and into the woods. Today two hummingbirds flew within a yard of my head and hovered around Chrysanthi's hanging pot of flowers on the porch, sticking their stiletto-like beaks into the exact center of each flower to extract the nectar. Up close, they look just like mice.

After supper, to the Grunblatts on the occasion of Ellen's "official marriage” (in Glens Falls temple) to Dr. Steve Bien. He turns out to be my second cousin once removed, as follows:

My father remembered that Nathan and Jenny owned a grocery store in Coney Island, and that Isadore, the “M.D.,” was a criminal abortionist and “anesthesiologist” with a fake diploma from some supposed medical school in Tennessee. Stephen’s father, Robert, who was at the Grunblatts’, remembered meeting Fanny. Otherwise there doesn’t seem to have been much contact, if any. They pronounce their name Bi-en, in two syllables.

On Saturday, Walter Joyce, a programmer at Kiewit who’s making a glossary-alphabetizing program for my individual Greek glossaries, drove over from Hanover, bringing some print-outs. He’s finally getting the thing to work.

I’m reading J. H. Randall, Jr.’s Hellenistic Ways of Deliverance and the Making of the Christian Synthesis. Fascinating. Shows how Christianity really betrayed the message of Jesus in order to make a viable synthesis of Greek, Jewish, Syrian, etc. cults.

Monday, July 20, 1981

Terpni

Hal and Claire Carman visited; special treat was Jane, always a favorite of mine, now married with a replica of herself in Rebecca, aged 4. Sweet people. But burdened with tragedy since Hal, Jr., age 16, committed suicide a few months ago. Inexplicably. No troubles. No reason. No note. No forewarning. Parked his car and calmly jumped off a bridge. They are very family-oriented people, too. Hal is retired from the oil company where he serviced oil burners and now deals a bit in used cars in his retirement. Jane is tax collector for the town in Massachusetts where she lives. Her husband works for a Pyrogas distributor. We talked, as always, about old times: Kitty and Red, Sherman and Freddy, Rabbi Greene and his sons, Anne Barnard. We showed Jane the cellar hole and well across the way. Hal tells me there's a revolver at the bottom of the well that he threw there after someone living in one of the outbuildings got drunk and threatening.

Same day: supper with Lou and Inge Curth. We sat down at 7:00 p.m. and didn't get up until 1:00 a.m.—six hours of steady conversation. Both very interesting (and interested) people; good talkers; good listeners.

Tuesday, July 21, 1981

Barbara Ras telephoned from UPNE. The tape has gone off to the printer's. We expect galley proofs in two weeks. I must forge ahead with the glossary and front material.

Reading Peter Brown on The World of Late Antiquity.

Tuesday, October 31, 1981

Hanover

Peter Levi, former student, stopped by yesterday. I asked what he'd done in the past four years and he answered that, among other things, he'd spent time with an Indian tribe deep in the Amazon jungle. I thought immediately of course of Waugh's Handful of Dust. But Peter had a better reception than Tony Last had. Peter went because his roommate's parents, the Johnsons, had been missionaries there for twenty years. Peter was introduced as part of their family, so to speak. "And," he continued, "this meant that the Indians received me cordially because in their language there is only a single word for the two meanings 'family' and 'friend.'" Bob and Ann Watson were here last night, and I told them this à propos of their efforts to keep a strong family together in the face of the general breakdown of the family in our society.

Last Monday Chrysanthi and I drove to the Fernwood Fish Hatchery in Gansevoort, got 100 trout fingerlings and then successfully transferred them to our pond without a single loss. What fun!

Last Saturday: MGSA meetings all day, then a nice supper with Alec in the Pantheon Restaurant on 8th Avenue and 43rd or 44th Street. He is doing beautifully at the Friends Central School in Philadelphia, teaching French, English, and a little music to sixth graders.

My father had a kidney stone that is still there, but not causing any discomfort.

Leander is in Hauho, Finland, at the home of his girlfriend, Outi Maula. He says he hopes to return with her to the US. No mention yet of marriage.

It seems that our service planned for next fall will go forward, after various impediments made my participation doubtful. But Alan Gaylord and I have now worked out a modus vivendi for my teaching schedule (Alan is our new chairman).

Jay and Devon Parini may rent the Shapiros' house next summer and thus be our neighbors.

In NYC, walking down lower 5th Avenue, I stopped to watch a colossal crane, stationed in the middle of the avenue, lift a boiler to the roof of a 40-storey building. The company consisted of Italians who looked like they all got off the boat from Sicily yesterday. A lovely sight, along with much else in the Big Apple, which is always a feast for eye and ear.

Monday, December 14, 1981

Hanover

Zeph Stewart called to confirm my appointment as visiting professor at Harvard for spring semester 1983.

Leander is here with his Finnish girlfriend, Outi Maula, who is delightful.

Previous weekend in New York, Montreal, MGSA business, plus meeting with Irish Browning re: fundraising for Kinhaven. Montreal with Anna Farmakidis, Harry Psomiadis, and Prof. Messing re: language. Overnight with Linda Bien, Amin, and son Daniel, a handsome fourteen-year-old with sophistication of an eighteen-year-old and lots of rebelliousness. This past weekend: in Portland, Maine. I spoke to the Classical Association of Maine on the Odyssey in the twentieth century. Dinner with Danny Danforth and Peggy Rotunda. Very pleasant. Then Sunday drove to L. L. Bean (!), bought new boots, and showed Daphne Bowdoin College, which she liked immensely. Portland is charming.

December 30, 1981

New York City

Elected president of the Modern Greek Studies Association to replace Mike Keeley.

Nice sojourn in NYC. Saw two plays: The Dresser and Cloud 9; attended 15th Street Meeting on Sunday; walked from 44th to 15th Street and back, visiting the Penington on 15th, Gramercy Park, etc. Two nights at the Yale Club with Chrysanthi; very nice. Wrote an essay review on Elytis and shortened my Buddha introduction for the forthcoming publication. Saw John Tallmadge, Will Lee, Henry Hart, Burt Pike, and others at the MLA convention.

1982

---

Hanover	January–June
Terpni	July–August
Hanover	September–December
Dartmouth Alumni College: October 4–6, Rome, Raphael Hotel, Largo Fevo 2, Piazza Navona; October 7–8, Venice, Hotel Kette, San Marco; October 9, Ravenna; M.V. Illiria: October 10, Split; October 11, Dubrovnik; October 13, Mistra; October 14, Patmos, Ephesos; October 15, Pergamon, Troy; October 16, Istanbul; October 17, Αγίου Διονυσίου, Άγιον Όρος; October 18, Θεσσαλονίκη, Πέλλα, Βεργίνα; October 19, Μετέωρα October 20–21, Athens, Hotel Electra, Ερμού 5. October 22–23, Θεσσαλονίκη
New York, 20 E. 74 th Street	December 22–26
Los Angeles, Hyatt Regency Hotel	December 22–29
Philadelphia	December 30

Sunday, January 31, 1982

Hanover

Christos Alexiou telephoned from England to announce with glee, «Ο Παύλος μιλάει!» This miracle he attributes, quite rightly, to αγάπη, specifically the love lavished on the boy by Christos's sister Katerina in Greece. He said that even Margaret has begun to “see” her own defects, by comparison. In any case, his crisis with the university has subsided, and he and Meg seem to be cooperating more gracefully.

Ten days ago we had an earthquake: 4.8 on the scale. We were having supper with Genevieve Williamson. It was as though the AMTRAK train had passed just outside, or beneath, the house: a huge rumble, and everything rattling and shaking. No damage, however.

Thursday, April 15, 1982

Hanover

Hugh Kenner, as always, is brilliant on literature, and life. I've been reading his chapter on Exiles in Dublin's Joyce. Here he is on Richard Rowan's refusal to marry Bertha properly (p. 87): “Richard's way of neither swearing nor expecting eternal fidelity surrounds himself and Bertha with the constant demands of a moral reality too strong for man. We have neither angelic wisdom nor angelic supplies of energy; we cannot live forever on the passionate qui vive; to be neither encouraged nor forbidden at every point is the condition not of human liberty but of human paralysis. Richard rapt himself and Bertha out of a community of paralytics, only to immerse himself and her in a paralysis still more naked; hence the dead stop to which Exiles grinds. The guidance of a habitual communal order is not an evasion but a human necessity." (Amen!)

Wednesday, June 16, 1982

Signed new wills and created the Peter A. Bien trust on Bloomsday. A good omen. But forgot to have kidneys for breakfast.

Monday, June 21, 1982

Dimitrios Yiannakos died on Sunday, June 13, aged 90 we think. News came by letter today. As Chrysanthi said, she was grateful that I was able to know this great man in his prime.

Summer 1982

This was one of our best, and most varied, summers at the farm. Alec was with us for almost six weeks, Leander for almost two, before leaving for Helsinki, where he'll be living with Outi Maula and studying piano at the Sibelius Academy. He spent the previous eight months in new Haven teaching children and adults. After initial help from John Iatrides, who recommended the first pupil, the others followed quickly. In short, he made a success of it, but as expected he didn't much care for what he was doing, even though in spite of himself he admitted on occasion that he did get some pleasure from being appreciated so much. Outi was with him until May: that helped immensely. As for Alec, he had a good first year as a teacher in Friends Central School, living with Elizabeth Dean. The moment his year finished he went off to Teachers College, Columbia, as a Kligenstein Fellow for a three-week course. Then, in his new pick-up truck, he drove to the farm. His aim: to build a log cabin just like mine (almost): 16 × 20. We started by clearing the upper field of wiregrass, a job facilitated greatly by my power scythe. Next project was to build a well. We thought to get a dowser, but he was too expensive. I suggested a site halfway up a slope, in order to get gravity flow. There were alders but no water on the surface, and Alec gave up. Art Perryman suggested digging in a very wet spot low down. Water everywhere. Alec then dug a ten-foot hole five feet in diameter, which is much harder than it sounds, considering that he had hardpan to contend with, and giant boulders (I rigged up a tripod and we hauled them up with a come-along), and that he was often standing in water up to his knees. Also, the water came in so fast each day that it took him two hours or more to empty it (using buckets) before he could begin, until I bought a small gas-powered pump. With the hole dug, the next question became how to line it. Everyone suggested an aluminum culvert, but I found this idea repulsive. Silvus Daubenspeck came one day and suggested concrete culverts, but these turned out to be too heavy for us to handle. So, to my great pleasure, Alec decided to do it the good old way, with fieldstones. Luckily he had Leander to help him by this time, and a friend from Haverford and Friends Central named Bill Belt. He worked meticulously, and in ten days the job was done. So now we have a cistern with 700 gallons of beautiful water. I got an old pitcher pump working (more or less), so we could pump from the well up on the field 100 feet distant. Water was never appreciated so much. As all this had taken us well into August, we then rushed to start logging before it would be too late to use a spud to remove the bark. Alec cut a new road back into the old balsam stand that I had used (now sadly depleted because of a beaver dam) and could actually drive his truck most of the way. Art Perryman then arrived with his skidder and winch, facilitating everything. I felled the first tree—the expert! Alec and Leander, sometimes with Art, sometimes alone, did the rest, with me skidding what I could with the tractor. Sometimes we had to drag logs inch by inch with the come-along in order to get the chain to them. Chrysanthi (and later Daphne), also Fran Shapiro, helped with the debarking, which was difficult because of the lateness. We cut balsam, pine, poplar and hemlock, about fifty trees in all. Now they're all lined up on the field, drying. Next project: the foundation. Alec dug a beautiful trench from the well to the field, for his water pipe. We moved one huge boulder using two come-alongs. The foundation trench was easy: four feet deep, then filled part way with gravel. Art lent us his cement mixer, but the motor failed. I made a truly Rube Goldberg arrangement, driving the cement mixer with the Jari! What a sight! But it worked beautifully. One day we worked about seven or eight hours continually, mixing and pouring. As a result, the foundation is now complete up to ground level. As a final touch, after we'd returned to Hanover, I went back one day and sowed a bushel of winter rye grass on the cleared area

But that wasn't all. As soon as Alec left, we did a new roof on the east side of the barn. And the vegetable garden was superb. And the Allis Chalmers worked perfectly all summer. Unbelievable! On the intellectual side, I did the following, as well as I can remember now: (1) Final draft of the Χαρκιανάκης poems, plus entering changes on the computer (I had my new "GG" terminal upstairs in the loft); (2) a complete essay on Cavafy's final period, for the periodical Grand Street; (3) all corrections for the Ιπτάμενος workbook, entered on computer; (4) proof-reading for large sections of Ιπτάμενος as the pages came from Steve Waite; (5) lots of background reading for the cruise; (6) two and a half of the three lectures for the cruise, the remaining half finished in early September in Hanover. The lectures were: Pagan Heroism—Alexander the Great; Christian Heroism—Monasticism; Christian and Pagan Heroism Reconciled.

In addition, work for Kinhaven continued. Three visits (Daphne was there this summer), drafting of the budget for 1983, etc. We also managed two trips to Saratoga for ballet, several concerts in Schroon Lake, and even a trip to New York City (Astoria) to meet with Loukas Skipitaris and six to eight Greek actors in order to coach them in their rehearsal for recording the tapes for Ιπτάμενος. Another special pleasure was a trip to Upper Jay to visit with Professor Bernstein of Haverford's Philosophy Department, the contact being his remarkable son, who was one of Alec's pupils at Friends Central. The boy visited us on the day we did our haying and was the perfect person to climb up on the wagon and stamp down the hay, which he did with great glee. Then we returned the visit, delivering him in the process. They have a modern-type house at the upper edge of a huge field giving them an unobstructed view of Whiteface. We found them very simpatico. The professor himself cooked a Chinese dinner—his specialty. He's the one who was the cause célèbre when he was denied tenure at Yale. Very lively, bright intellectual. Over the summer we had visits from Audrey Logan, Mayme Noda, and Sydney Jarvis, Bob Daubenspeck and his son, repeatedly from Shapiros of course, Kitty Barden, Lou and Inge Curth, Jerry and Rosine Gardner, Al Zalan and Mary, a friend of Shapiros who turned out to be the mother of the Mary of Peter, Paul, and Mary, even from Roy Millington, who is still trapping. Also Harold and Clare Carman, looking well after their son's tragic death last year; Frankie Deckert, Sherman Frazier, who brought along his neighbor, a Negro who's had a house in Olmsteadville for two decades, a jolly, fat man who works in New York. And of course the Grunblatts. Saw Norman Fisher and Andy Jennings at Schroon when the Concord played a concert, also Edna Michell. Also visited Rothsteins and met a couple who live on the Garnet Lake Road: Vincent somebody who has annoyed Alec, trying to get him to go rock climbing (Alec was climbing below earth, not above). Visited Don Kurka, the artist, who gave us perennials from his lovely garden. His portrait of Eakins was superb; it encouraged me to go to the Eakins retrospective at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts just before we left for Europe.

Sunday, October 3, 1982

To Boston, to the Museum of Fine Arts to see the Eakins exhibit, spurred by Don Kurka's fine portrait of the artist, which we saw this summer in Bakers Mills. Eakins was a splendid technician who refused to prettify his subjects. By serendipity, the museum had an exhibit of Bernini, who did the fountains in the Piazza Navona.

Monday, October 4, 1982

Roma

In the Piazza Navona, Rome! First stop, Bernini's fountains. Stupidly credulous, when the taxi driver told me that cabs were on strike and he couldn't use the meter. He charged 25000 lire! What a way to begin our stay! But the rest of the day was marvelous. St. Peter's (garish, ostentatious, certainly not to my taste, except for Michelangelo's Pietà). Spanish Steps lovely. Stopped in Keats's house. Room where he died; kitchen balcony overlooking the Spanish Steps. Trelawney's letter re: the burning of Shelley, etc. Lovely memorial. Then to the Trevi fountain, another surprise in the midst of nowhere. But the best sight and site was the Pantheon, infinitely more impressive aesthetically than St. Peter's. The dome is so clean, the space achieved so remarkable. The twelve empty niches aloft must have been for the Olympians, displaced of course when Christianity conquered. Supper in Piazza Navona outdoors, European style, watching humanity pass by.

Tuesday, October 5, 1982

Roma

All morning in the Vatican Museum. Highlights for me: the extraordinarily graceful Apollo Sauroktonos by Praxiteles, and, surprisingly, the Raphael rooms. Michelangelo's Sistine ceiling loses its impact because it is so far away and the details are hard to see. But The Last Judgment, which one can see both close-up and at a distance, is breathtaking in the completeness of its vision. However, the ostentatious wealth and grandeur of the Vatican, not to mention St. Peter's, repulsed me; there is too much Quaker in me to find this sort of "magnificence" impressive, especially since it is so totally contrary to the life message of Christ.

In the afternoon: Piazza Venezia, which takes the cake for grandiosity. One can easily understand why Mussolini was the way he was, given this environment. Also, as shown in the Venezia monument and also in the murals of Roman history in the Capitoline Museum, the grandeur is almost exclusively militaristic. The more people you killed the greater a hero you were. Next: Foro Romano, with the Arch of Titus—very nice until one remembers that it commemorates the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70! The Coliseum of course completes this picture of Roman barbarity, dedicated as it was to mock naval battles, gladiatorial contests, animal fights and the like, not to mention the Christians who were thrown to lions there. We climbed the Palatine Hill, now a park, and also toured the two palaces on the Capitoline Hill, designed by Michelangelo. Here is the lovely Capitoline Venus, the dying Gaul, the Thorn-Extractor, and the murals of Roman "greatness" mentioned earlier. Overwhelmingly, especially in the Capitoline Museums, where there is so much Greek sculpture, one feels the Romans as magnificent robbers, invading everywhere, conquering, plundering, bringing home art and culture in an attempt to civilize themselves. It's easy, also, to see their obsession with bigness: the various colossi exhibited in the Capitoline, for example—statues with feet as large as a house, so hideous when compared to the Apollo Sauroktonos. . . . Dinner in Piazza Navona again, a lovely setting.

Wednesday, October 6, 1982

Roma

All three of us slept like dead until 9:45. Rushed downstairs so as not to miss breakfast. Then to see Michelangelo's Moses in San Pietro in Vincola, off the Via Cavour. Moses, with God's commandments under his arm, stares with disdain at his backsliding people, while at the same time radiating the serenity of a man who has been vouchsafed a divine message. His strength, spiritual and physical, is also conveyed so easily by this marvelous statue. But I don't know why Michelangelo gave Moses two horns on the top of his head. Then we continued, walking always, to the Baths of Caracalla. Chrysanthi remembers having gone to the opera here in 1955. I don't. Splendid space, mosaics; again "big-ness." Then out to the Appian Way to the Basilica of St. Sebastian. This was most worthwhile. All history comes together. Sebastian was martyred under the persecution of Diocletian. Afterwards, the remains of Sts. Peter and Paul were placed here temporarily. Then Constantine in the fourth century erected the basilica to commemorate all this. The catacombs underneath incorporate earlier pagan burials (via cremation); lots of inscriptions in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew still visible: Christ, pray for so-and-so. Literally miles and miles of catacombs on five separate levels: a true maze. Luckily they do not allow anyone down without a guide. We walked a bit further along the Appian Way, now a busy thoroughfare, as it was then. Then we returned foot-weary to the hotel. . . . At midnight, to Venice via wagons-lit.

Thursday, October 7, 1982

Venice

Such swirling life in the Rome RR station, full of school children singing and laughing. Sleeper infinitely superior to AMTRAK. Quiet, No rattles. Coffee served in the morning. All seemed familiar, although we'd been here only three or four hours in 1955. Miserable hotel but well located. Directly to Doge's palace. What gorgeous Titians, especially the Marriage of Bacchus and Ariadne, and its companion piece of the Muses. But, again, one is reminded that all the wealth came from plundering others, shamelessly. Nota bene the fresco glorifying the fourth crusade, which in reality was sheer robbery and greed. By the time we were ready to proceed to St. Mark's, the waters of the lagoon had begun to flood St. Mark's Square and elsewhere. The narthex of the church was six inches deep in water. We removed our shoes and socks and waded. Bizarre sight: priests in full regalia, with rolled up trousers and bare feet. Tourists wandering through the church in bare feet. St. Mark's lets us envision how the Basilica of St. John in Ephesus must have been; the plan is the same. The mosaics, some of which you can see from close up, are as delicate as Raphael-esque paintings, with swirling draperies in ambers and oranges. Yet, as Chrysanthi said, the church as a whole seems somewhat heavy. We'll see if Hagia Sophia is different. The Byzantine influence is obviously everywhere, including in the treasure room, which, once again, reminds one of the plunder that took place, especially in the Fourth Crusade. By 3:00 p.m. the waters had begun to subside. We went off in the vaporetto to the Lido—no, not in a gondola with its soft seat into which one can relax as though in a coffin! I sought out the Hotel des Bains, which sounds like von Aschenbach's even though it probably wasn't. Very disappointing. Like one of the seedy establishments left over in Saratoga Springs. But the beach is lovely and the Lido as a whole, with its rich villas, its casino, its fancy shops, is still an attractive resort. Home to the hotel momentarily and then out to a sumptuous supper at a restaurant on La Giudecca: Carpaccio's, with the McGraths, the MacMillans, Sally Freschette, Jane ?, and the Ballards. I spent $68, which made Chrysanthi angry!

Friday, October 8, 1982

To the Greek Institute. Luckily, Manoussakas was there and let us tour the museum, which was closed. An icon by El Greco's teacher in Crete; a fourteenth-century manuscript of the romance of Alexander, in Greek, with later additions in Turkish; a papyrus roll from the reign of Justinian, written half in Greek, half in Latin by a man in Ravenna, listing certain donations; remarkable icons, including one showing the donor, Western style; an elaborate wooden bible-stand inlaid in mother-of-pearl, ivory, and tortoise shell, done at Ἁγίων Ὁρός. The Greek community is now almost extinguished; the church continues for four or five people. The Institute has four or five scholarships per year. . . . Later, walking in Venice; lunch in working class restaurant, spaghetti and clams; water-taxi to pier. I gave my first lecture, on pagan sensibility. Most people present.

Saturday, October 9, 1982

Good lecture on Ravenna mosaics by Bob McGrath. Then ashore to see them. St. Apollinare in Classe first, outside the city in the old seaport established by Caesar Augustus. Then St. Vitale and the tomb of Galla Placida, then the Baptistery, finally St. Apollinare Nuovo. In the church at Classe a beautiful apse with the theme of Christ as shepherd: all green, pastoral, filled with sheep. St. Vitale like a peacock's tail. St. Ap. Nuovo with its two processions: 22 martyrs and 22 virgins plus the 3 magi in their Persian caps and leggings. And in St. Vitale in the apse, of course, the two panels on either side, Justinian on the left with his retinue, bringing forth the holy bread, Theodora on the right with her retinue, bringing forth the wine. The stones in all these churches are laid so the surface is irregular and can thus catch and reflect the light in different ways when it enters from different angles. The San Marco mosaics in Venice have a regular, smooth service, which is why they look so much more like paintings.

Sunday, October 10, 1982

Split. Diocletian's palace, built in the late third century, is still the middle of the city, incorporated into more recent structures of every era. His mausoleum is today's Roman Catholic cathedral. I continued my lectures, the three of which are: (1) Pagan Heroism: Alexander, (2) Christian Heroism: Monasticism, (3) Pagan and Christian Heroism Reconciled. . . . Quaker Meeting in the morning, aboard ship. Beautiful.

Monday, October 11, 1982

Guided tour through Dubrovnik in the morning. A walled city with gridiron street patterns, beautifully preserved. In the afternoon Daphne went swimming and Chrysanthi and I walked clear around the walls, with spectacular view of the city and the sea. Many good discussions at mealtimes, deriving from my lectures.

Thursday, October 12, 1982

All day at sea. Trypanis's morning lecture—mediocre, as I had expected. Lunch with trustees McCulloch and Freschette, Bob McGrath, and Bill Ballard, to discuss Dartmouth problems.

Wednesday, October 13, 1982

Mistras is a marvelous site and sight. The plain of Sparta below, Taygetos above, the exquisite pastels of the frescos inside the tiny churches, the patterns of brickwork on the exteriors. I had lectured previously a little about George Gemistos, Plethon, and it was nice to see where he flourished and where Constantinos Palaiologos was crowned. Sparta is disappointing: nothing but a modern town.

Thursday, October 14, 1982

Monastery of St. John the theologian in the morning. They have a sixth century book on parchment, with letters brushed with silver. I asked one of the monks what the seventh seal of the Apocalypse revealed, and he didn't know. Said that the entire book was a mystery meant to be understood in time, in the future, not now. I read from Revelation on board, later, and the text came alive for me for the first time. Ephesus in the afternoon. So much more has been revealed since we were there three years ago. Bob McGrath read beautifully from Acts in the stadium. In the evening I read to the group from Sphrantzes's "Fall of Constantinople."

Friday, October 15, 1982

Pergamon. The best part is the Asclepeion down below, with its extraordinary tunnels. The famous Acropolis is mostly stirring because of its elevated location and its commanding view of the plain. Only the theater, huge and steep, is there intact. Of course so much is in the museum in Berlin. To Troy by bus in the afternoon. We started with my reading aloud from Arrian and then from the Iliad: bits of books 6 and 9. How nice to recite Homer to appreciative students in this way and in this place! The ramp reminded me of Mycenae. Here and there the walls are impressive. But generally there isn't much to see, except what is most important: the Hellespont in the distance, and the plain of Troy where the battles took place. The entrance to the site has a hideous "Paris and Helen Café" with drawings making Achilles look like John Wayne. Behind this: a monstrous wooden horse! In the evening, Dan White gave a fine lecture on the Gallipoli campaign.

Saturday, October 16, 1982

Exciting to sail down the Dardanelles and to see before us the domes of Hagia Sophia and of the Blue Mosque opposite. We went immediately to the Hippodrome. How extraordinary to see there the spiral foot of the tripod of Apollo from Delphi, and the base of the obelisk, with reliefs of the Byzantine emperor viewing the games, and a tall shaft stripped completely of its valuable facing by the Fourth Crusade (!). Then into the Blue Mosque, past a gauntlet of urchins and adults hawking tourist objects. Bill Ballard, with his ready wit, commented, "Now I understand why Christ expelled the money changers from the Temple." Blue Mosque is lovely and grand. But of course there is no representational art, consistent with Muslim prohibitions. The contrast came with the Χώρα church, with its intact mosaics from (I think) the twelfth to fourteenth centuries. A gorgeous Ανάστασις—stunning—plus an entire cycle of the Life of Christ in the narthex. We passed the Theodosian walls along the way—the walls that Mehmet scaled. In the afternoon, to Hagia Sophia. My reaction was very mixed, perhaps dominated by disappointment. The grandeur is still there, obviously, as is the marvel of engineering. But the building is so completely desecrated and stripped that one wants to cry. I made the mistake of accusing only the Muslims, having read Sphantzes's commentary the day before. But in reality it was the Byzantines themselves, in the iconoclastic centuries, who first stripped the church. Restoration came, magnificently, after the iconoclasts lost; but the Muslims took care of this. Nothing remains but a few fragments, very beautiful, in the gallery, not one scene in the endo-narthex. The low point of the day came next in Topkapi Palace, where the ostentation and crass, vulgar materialism of the Ottomans is on view. The most interesting part, the harem, we missed. In true Turkish style, we were then deposited in a carpet emporium, where Chrysanthi and I gave way and purchased not one but two Turkish carpets.

Sunday, October 17, 1982

A lovely visit to Μονή Αγίου Διονυσίου at the Ἅγιον Ὄρος. It's next to Αγίου Παύλου, where I was in 1967. It's not what we saw, although once again the natural beauty is something I felt to be unsurpassed, but it was the conversation we had with two monks, both young, that was memorable. Both radiated serenity—I should say ἀπάθεια, αταραξία—unmistakably. One had been a bank clerk in Cyprus. Realizing the futility of his worldly pursuits, he studied the Christian message and renounced the world. Tears came to my eyes.

Monday, October 18, 1982

Thessaloniki. George, Lola, and Odysseas met us at the pier. Chrysanthi and Daphne went off with them. I went with the group to Pella (mostly disappointing, except for the mosaic of Dionysos and the panther) and Vergina. Philip's tomb was closed to us, but I was glad to see the huge palace of Aigai and below it part of the theater where Philip was assassinated. We also saw the Hellenistic tomb called the tomb of Romaios after its excavation and were able to enter it. We'd been here years ago, I think, on the excursion with Petsas. In the afternoon I left the group to go to Αρετσού and have lunch with George, Efthymoula, and Andreas. Andreas is in acting school. Hooray! Parents seem reconciled if not happy. I then took Don White to get an x-ray (he has pneumonia), and visited Themis Altas briefly. Then coffee with George and Odysseas and Chrysanthi. In the evening, “Show and Tell” night. I read a parody of Revelation that I’d composed, and accompanied Arthur White in a Haydn violin concerto. How nice! Beginning to feel like Woodbrooke.

Tuesday, October 19, 1982

From Volos to Meteora. As happens so often, the photographs give only the barest indication of the true beauty and startling magnificence. We visited only one monastery: Βαρλαάμ, which I did not find very interesting except for the fresco of a saint contemplating the ματαιότητα της ζωής by gazing at the sarcophagus of Alexander the Great with its glass top revealing Alexander’s skeleton. But the placement of the monastery—of all the monasteries—is extraordinary. The monoliths are like colossal teeth of smooth sandstone, shaped and polished by the prehistoric lake at whose bottom they once stood. Every moment of the ascent offers a fresh marvel in each direction. To add to the natural phenomenon, a shepherd with his flock was descending from the pastures on the tops of some of the pillars, each sheep with a bell, making a symphony of tinkling in the distance.

At night, the captain’s final banquet, with baked Alaska for desert. I toasted the waiters, assuring them that they would all go to a heaven where they would sit at ease forever and be served by passengers, always smiling. Chrysanthi got angry when I said to Mrs. Trypanis in jest that she loved gossip, and this spoiled the occasion. We ate with Constantine and Aliko Trypanis, and Donald, Joan, and Arthur White. These, and many other people, were most gracious and friendly on the cruise, which all in all was, I think, a success. My attempt to reconcile the pagan and Christian views is, however, something that I wonder if even I believe in.

Wednesday, October 20, 1982

Athens, Hotel Electra

Chrysanthi and Daphne went back to Thessaloniki. I went to Kedros and Efstathiadis. Received coldly at Kedros. The translations of my Cavafy and Kazantzakis pamphlets still haven’t been completed. Ninetta was in the USA. But a nice surprise: Θεανώ Μιχαελίδου was in the office, working on the Varnalis archive. Lovely reunion. Received warmly and courteously by Θεόδωρος Ευσταθιάδης, who agreed to publish my Cavafy, Kazantzakis, and Ritsos introductions in English. Then met with Kitromelides, Peter Allen, and Nikiforos Diamandouros regarding (1) the MGSA summer seminar and (2) possible merger between BMGS and the Journal of the Hellenic Diaspora. The building where Kitromelides has his institute is an old αρχοντικό being restored by the Ministry of Culture. Next door is the home of the Seferiades clan and now of Τσάτσος: Οδός Κυδαθηναίων. Very useful meeting. Strange to go so immediately and easily to business from the unreality of the cruise. I was also able to visit with Πέτρος Χάρης regarding possible help from the Ouranis Foundation for BMGS. He was very gracious, but everyone says he's an old fox not to be trusted. Finally, I got George Savidis on the telephone regarding the Harvard exposition next term. A useful day. Λουκουμάδες for supper, on Panepistimiou, where we always go. A 2nd rate Austrian movie to pass the evening.

Thursday, October 21, 1982

Athens

Returned to Kedros and collected 7,000 drachmas in royalties. How nice! The book has sold 600 copies, almost as many as my Kazantzakis book in America with twenty times the population! Then back to Efstathiadis to sign the contract for Kazantzakis-Cavafy-Ritsos. They hope to have the whole thing set in type by Sunday so that the proofs can be delivered to me at the airport. What a difference from Kedros! Book-buying at Ενδοχώρα. Deposit of my royalties in our account at the American Express Bank. After lunch I walked to the Ναός του Ολυμπίου Διός, which I'd never really seen. One column is toppled, just like a pile of dominos pushed over. Acropolis in the distance, the Parthenon covered by scaffolding.

Friday, October 22, 1982

Thessaloniki

Met at the airport last night by Βούλη and Chrysanthi. We went straightway to a taverna and ate souvlaki. Vouli is young and energetic. Talked about Chris Lincoln, Paula Xanthopoulou, Irish Browning, Bruce, the School—κοινά ενδιαφέροντα—and especially about my Harkianakis translations. Vouli says that the archbishop is truly pleased. Today: an exhausting round of visits and meals. Saw Andreas briefly last night at George's house. The prodigal son. He and his parents do not communicate. He has left law school and is in his third year of acting school. George therefore calls him άρρωστο παιδί. Dimitris has taken his degree and is now in the army. Efthymoula is λυκειάρκισσα. George is διευθυντής τραπέζης ΑΤΕ. We went to the market to buy an extra valise for the rugs and all the books I've accumulated. Then to Themis and Miranda Altas. Their daughter Marianna has grown fat (somewhat); she's now a lawyer doing an apprenticeship. Rather neurotic girl with fits of dizziness, one of which took place as she entered the house to meet us. She is serving on Sunday as a certifier of the authenticity of ballots in the by-elections. Themis talks about retiring after a few years from his position at the orphanage, but he'll continue private practice. He's moved his office across the street. Thus blind Miranda is all alone. Φρίκη. Next: to Lola, Kostas, and Nikos. They went to Russia this summer. Full of enthusiasm. (Later we understood that George's family and Odysseas's never even knew about this journey; obviously one member doesn't talk to the other.) Exchanged a few words with Nikos. That's the best one can manage, since Kostas does all the talking. Fortunately, the usual Greek diarrhea wasn't too bad this time. Then alone to Kolokotroni 11. Found Eleni and Γιαγιά. The latter full of vigor. Asked me how much I understood από τα χωριατικά μου. I said τα μισά. Eleni showed me a photo of Dimitrios in the coffin at the funeral. Very moved. He always spoke very well of me, they assured me. I of course always returned the compliment. He was very resistant to the end—didn't want to believe or admit that he was weak; kept tearing out catheters, etc. Eleni took me to the Attikon Odeon. Nice sounds: Beethoven, Chopin. Stavros emerged from a lesson looking just as much a slob as always. But he and Toula work like slaves and have a following. Now he's opened a store to sell pianos! He imports them from Korea. He has also translated some music books from Russian into Greek and plans to begin a series of publications. Toula is still sweet and youthful. Her students are progressing; they don't take beginners now. Takis came. In the dumps. He graduated from the Polytechnio in June and is now unemployed. Said he "detested" his years at the school. In the entire course they never did practical exercises. He also realized how shoddy the Greek building practices are. Everything is done quickly and cheaply, to realize the greatest profit. Everyone we encountered so far is delighted with PASOK and Papandreou. What a difference from the views expressed by Trypanis, but no surprise. Thence to Vouli's for dinner with Bruce and Tad Lansdale, Vouli's mother, and Κυρά Κούλα. I asked Bruce about Chris Lincoln. He said, "Wait a minute," and pulled a notebook out of his pocket, in which he had a graph called "Happiness Quotient" for newcomers in Greece:

In short: an initial surge of glee followed by utter despondency in which everything is found to be horribly wrong. This lasts for six months at least, with minor ups and downs. Then, with luck, there is a zigzag path upward again. Chris just didn't have patience. Bruce said he'd hire him again if he showed up. Tad liked my Harkianakis translations, which apparently Vouli had showed her. Superb dinner (as usual chez Vouli). Bruce planning for retirement; bought a house in Florida. Back to George's after midnight, to start all over again because Dimitris had arrived from Tripolis, where he's doing basic training for the air force. With him Tilda, his fiancée (as I learned afterwards). She's got one more year of medical school. She's the girl that George has resisted so bitterly because she's Jewish (!). Suffers from migraines, like Outi. Obviously very self-possessed and intelligent. To bed at 2:00 a.m. for four hours of sleep.

Saturday, October 23, 1982

Thessaloniki

Up early to go with Daphne to Anatolia College for PSAT exams. Spent two hours talking with Bill McGrew about the school and Greek life. His dissertation is on methods of recording land ownership (or not recording it). This grew out of his employment with Litton Industries for development schemes that never materialized, επί χούντας. Litton inefficient if not corrupt. He explained to me the historical reasons why Greeks cannot understand our concept of a non-profit school or society. In Greece, everything is either for profit or κρατικό. Nothing in between. If a school isn't κρατικό they assume it's for profit, and also a screen for CIA, spying, etc. Much of this goes back to the Caesaropapism of Justinian and all the successors in Europe, the Napoleonic codes, etc., as opposed to the Anglo Saxon traditions that we inherit. Nice man.

Great supporter of MGSA. Returning to George's I took Andreas out for a cup of coffee and we talked for two hours first about the possibility of his studying acting in America and then about his poems, on which I commented line by line. They are not very good, alas, something that he realizes. When I returned, George cornered me: "What did he say?" Alas, son and father don't communicate directly. Efthymoula, to my surprise, is much more tolerant and rational about the situation. She's saving her salary each month to help him. In the evening, Kostas and Lola came and again we had hours of talk, plus food of course. Talked about Terpni, where they still have first cousins. The house where they were all born still stands, but is unoccupied, with broken windows, etc. Two rooms and a large courtyard, that's all. We heard the news on television and I understood everything now that demotic is used.

Sunday, October 24, 1982

Takis stayed up half the night in order to get Stavros's car to help us transfer baggage to the airport. Good lad! In Athens, Nick Eliopoulos of Efstathiadis was waiting, as promised, with the galley proofs of my forthcoming book "Kazantzakis-Cavafy-Ritsos." Unbelievable! The whole thing finished in two days and delivered into my hands! "We believe in the American system," he told me. (Μακάρι να γινόταν έτσι στην Αμερική!) Met the Rixtons, who are ticketed on the same TWA flight home. Difficult to think that tomorrow there'll be the usual: bills to pay, bank, post office, stove to light, cat to feed. My first project is clear: finish the proofs, add my own translations of the Cavafy poems, getting rid of Dalven's finally, prepare up-to-date bibliographies, send a short curriculum vitae and a photograph for the back cover. Then, I hope, Kazantzakis. Will I ever finish?

December 12, 1982

Hanover

Overheard in Howard Johnson's at 5:00 a.m. while I was having breakfast after returning on AMTRAK from the MGSA annual meeting in NYC: local teenager having breakfast with three others (boys and girls); they'd been at a disco all night. A piece of his bacon dropped on the floor apparently, and he remarked with dry Vermont humor: "Didn't change the flavor none."

December 23, 1982

New York

On the way up Madison Avenue to the Met: Blind man resolutely striding, with cape, and with stick sweeping back and forth. Hesitated at curb. I took his arm and offered to help. Out came gruffly, in heavy German accent, "79th Street, I know!" Blindfold over face. Bizarre. Beckett's Pizza alive on Madison Avenue.

Saw Alex. Exhibit again at the Met. Disappointing after Boston. Frank Lloyd Wright exhibit even more disappointing. Better in the printed bulletin.

Made inquiries re: Australia.

December 24, 1982

To theater with Alec, Daphne, Mother, Chrysanthi to see "Good," a powerful play on the way in which an intellectual is sucked into Nazism almost in spite of himself, gradually; from acceptance of the benign he moves to defense of the horrific (holocaust). The breakdown of rationality and its replacement by casuistry.

December 25, 1982

We all walked and walked. Everything closed. Hoped to board the aircraft carrier Intrepid at the Hudson River and 46th. Closed. Walked clear across town to the East River. United Nations Plaza. Temperature an unbelievable 65 degrees. Sweating. We stopped in a coffeehouse and I ordered cappuccino (memories of Rome!). Suddenly Chrysanthi exclaimed, "Look a sheep!" I twirled around to see this unlikely sheep in UN Plaza, knocking over my valuable cappuccino. But it was only a "ship" sailing up the East River. We all guffawed heartily.

December 26, 1982

To Meeting at 15th Street. After a few platitudinous messages about how good Jesus was, etc., a man stood up and said, "I don't believe in God, don't believe in Jesus. We're not the center of all creation, as Christianity teaches; we're a speck along with billions of other specks in an immense universe, and it is completely indifferent whether we exist or do not exist." He went on, becoming somewhat digressive. An elder said to him, sotto voce, "Make thy point, friend." He replied, in full voice, "I'll make my point at my own speed, and it's going to take a long time." At this, several people walked out. Others stood up, until about 15-20 were standing, a way of signaling him to sit down, apparently. He vowed to keep standing and talking. Someone approached him. "We're not going to have violence here, are we?" he asked, and the person withdrew. He dwelt on the Quaker openness to all forms of truth, accusing his opposition of hypocrisy. Finally, he stopped, threatening to stand in silence as long as others stood. The others sat. He stood, but eventually sat. At break of Meeting the man who'd first eluded him shook his hand. After the Meeting I saw the two of them conversing. Not bad, considering! Quakers do have remarkable forms. An added touch: the one black person at Meeting approached me afterwards: "Professor Bien, etc." He was my student years earlier, a sweet, diffident man, now a journalist in Newark, and a convinced Friend.

December 27, 1982

To Los Angeles via Chicago.

December 28, 1982

Los Angeles

At MLA, Hyatt Regency Hotel. Lunch with Thanssis Maskaleris, Demetris Liappas, Leo Papademetre, Maria Herrey. Then our session, which I chaired in Dia's absence. Herrey's paper on Sofianos was splendid. Ditto for Leo's on alternate forms of the imperative. Evris Bakiridis's less compelling, and Salamone rather digressive and old hat on katharévousa in Papadiamandis and demotic in Kazantzakis. Lots of discussion; good flow. We had ample time, for once. Went from 1:45 to 5:30 p.m. Then off to Santa Monica to TV studio for interview with Thanassis. Done very well by a Greek (Cretan) lady who turned out to have marched in Kazantzakis's funeral as a child. Dinner in a seafood restaurant. The lively waitress whom I thought typically Californian turned out to be a transplant from New York.

December 29, 1982

Los Angeles

Breakfast with Maria Herrey. From 7:45 a.m. to 11:30! We got thrown out, since it was lunchtime. How nice to talk at such ease for so long. A rare pleasure. P.M. saw the promotional for John Rassias's new movie series. Flight left at midnight. Exhausting.

December 30, 1982

Philadelphia

To APA congress at Franklin Plaza Hotel. Dropped in at Quaker Center on Race and 15th, my first visit. Saw Betsy Balderson there. Looking for Lorama Pixton and Steve Cary, but both were out. APA/MGSA session well attended. Papers by Levitt (poor), Kolakidis (good), Athanasakis (fair) and ? from West Chester State College (poor).

December 31, 1982

Hanover

Exhausted after 2nd sleepless night. Up until 2:00 a.m. at Rassias's New Year's eve party. The first without Yiayia, whom I toasted.

1983

---

Hanover	January
Commuting to Cambridge, John Winthrop House K31	February-May
Hanover to Cambridge, Cambridge Friends Meeting	June 5
Boston-San Francisco, All Seasons Hotel, 419 Stockton Street, 94108 (415 986-8737) Berkeley, supper at home of Michael and Teresa and Jane Heyman	June 6
San Francisco-Honolulu	June 7
Honolulu, Friends Center, 2426 Oahu Avenue	June 8
Honolulu-Townsville-Sydney-Melbourne (became June 10 as we crossed the international date line)	June 9
Melbourne. Town House Hotel, 701 Swanston St., Carlton	June 10-13
876 Swanston Street, Carlton 3053 Sydney, University Motor Inn, 25 Arundel St., Broadway, July 23-27	June 14-August 31
Melbourne-Sydney-Papeete, Tahiti, Hotel Tahiti, P.O. Box 416, Papeete, Tahiti, French Polynesia, tel. 2-95-50	August 31-September 1
Los Angeles, Hotel Claremont, 1044 Tiverton Ave., 90024, 213 208-5947	September 2-3
Hanover	September 4-Dec. 31
NYC, MGSA conference, Prince George Hotel, 14 E. 28 St. 10016, 532-7800	October 27-30
Philadelphia chez Alec	October 31
Washington, Library of Congress Kazantzakis celebration, Embassy Row Hotel, 2015 Mass Ave. NW 20036, 202 265-1600	November 1
Philadelphia, Pendle Hill	November 18-20
NYC	December 12
NYC for MLA	Dec. 25-30

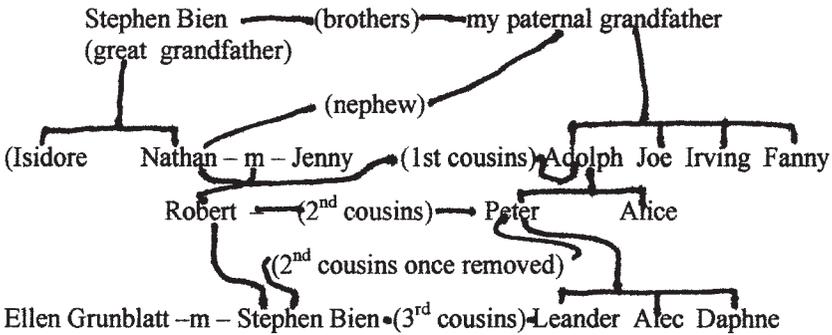

January 1, 1983

Hanover

Nodas here for New Year's lunch. Audrey also and Corindias, etc. Games afterwards. Alec here with Randy, a fellow teacher at Friends Central, an Oberlin grad who has taught two years in China (ESL). Nice, lively person. Alec and I played Bach, Mozart, and Schubert after everyone had left. Joy!

January 2, 1983

I'll record here, again, some notes taken two years ago when we learned of Ellen Grunblatt's marriage to a distant relation of ours. Upon inquiring I discovered the following:

Nathan and Jenny ran a grocery store in Coney Island. Isidore was a fake MD, a self-styled anesthesiologist, really an abortionist with a mail-order degree of some kind. Mean and selfish according to my father. Some roots!

February–May, 1983

Harvard

From February 1st until the end of May I was visiting professor of classics in the Seferis Chair at Harvard, living comfortably in John Winthrop House K-entry #31 (top floor of a neat little private house on the river, incorporated into Winthrop), thanks to the good offices of Jim and Martha Davis, formerly of Dartmouth, now masters of JWH. Scandalously, I wrote not a single entry about the Harvard experience while I was there. Rather, as this extraordinary year (cruise—Harvard—Australia) drew to a close, and we were flying back home to Los Angeles and then Boston—i.e., to work and reality—I recorded some of my memories, working from my appointment calendar for February, March, April, and May. My job was to teach two courses, one at 9:00 a.m. Tuesdays and Thursdays called Kazantzakis and Politics, the other at 10:00 a.m., same days, on Odysseus Across the Centuries (Iliad, Odyssey, Pindar, Ajax, Philoctetes, Metamorphosis XIII, Inferno 26, du Bellay, Tennyson, Cavafy, Kazantzakis's Odyssey, Ritsos, Seferis, Joyce's Ulysses). The first had about eight students, mostly very sleepy—lots of absenteeism. But Mike Antonakes audited faithfully and kept up my morale. Lily Mac-rakis's daughter Michelle also came as an auditor and lowered my morale because she was so hopelessly passive. The course really didn't go very well, chiefly because of the early hour and also because I had to rush to the next class at 10:00 and couldn't extend the discussion. But there were some very interesting students, including one taking it for graduate audit. (I've just had a strong reaction, which shows up, also, in my handwriting.) The other course was entirely different. I've never had such good students in profusion, and such good discussions. We went officially from 10:00 to 11:30 but often to 12:00 since no other class was scheduled. I was amazed at the devotion, the preparation, the intelligence of the students. Also, I had a graduate assistant, a student of Albert Lord's, who corrected all the exams and papers, and made all the arrangements, etc. In short, I was completely spoiled. I commuted each week, leaving Hanover on Mondays at about 1:30, arriving in Cambridge for supper, then leaving immediately after "Greek Table" in Lowell House on Thursdays and getting home at about 11:00 p.m. Strange to return to Lowell House in this fashion, after having been stranded there in 1949–1950. But my lodgings in John Winthrop κ 31 overlooked the river. Secluded, roomy, with refrigerator and hotplate. At Harvard I became gregarious. Perhaps it was memories of eating alone in Lowell House when I was a student. So, this time I arranged almost every meal with someone. I've never had so much social life. Hosts at John Winthrop were James Davis and Martha, co-masters, whom of course I knew when they were at Dartmouth. They were most gracious, introducing me to people, inviting me to luncheons, etc. Each 1st Thursday of the month there was a faculty lunch where one could meet people—so different from Dartmouth. I also had of course the friendship of Dia Philippides, who was my supporter from start to finish. In sum, although at first I was hypersensitive about being alone, I managed beautifully. I had more stimulation at Harvard in the form of interesting people encountered and intellectual conversation, splendid students, in these three months than I've had at Dartmouth in the past ten years. But I have to realize that my situation was special, as a visitor. If I were there permanently, perhaps I'd be just as isolated as at Dartmouth.

What fun to be in George Savidis's office, Widener 175, with of course access to the stacks. I spent my first year at Harvard, 1948-49, in the Widener reading room. Unchanged.

Now, some details.

February 8, 1983

Lunch with Antonakes. How nice that the hard feelings and awkwardness following the failure of his play have disappeared. Met former Dartmouth student Ben Benami and his new wife.

February 9, 1983

Began going to Quaker breakfasts at Lowell House. Went two or three times but didn't continue. Felt a little out of place. All the others are students; I was the only "adult."

February 10, 1983

Helped in an interview for Marshall Fellowship. I'm glad they're using me in Winthrop. Greek table at Lowell tonight, each Thursday. We try to talk Greek; then I rush off to the Greyhound terminal and catch the bus to Hanover.

February 14, 1983

Supper with Martin McKinsey, a young translator of Ritsos, Elytis, etc. Very talented. Auditing the Ulysses course.

February 15, 1983

Comparative Literature Department luncheon. I met Walter Kaiser. Very friendly. Also Cynthia Stallman, Ph.D. candidate who trained in Melbourne under Roger Scott and Graham Harten. Supper with Lily Macrakis, the first of several meetings devoted to our MGSA publication on historiography (Anatolia Report) and also, later, issue #1 of the Journal of Modern Greek Studies. She proved a difficult person with no conception whatsoever of how to edit properly. But I had to humor her, and to try desperately to remain on good terms.

February 16, 1983

Lunch with Kristin Lindgren, Dartmouth graduate living in Cambridge. Sweet girl who's become a little attached to us. Sent her to Greece last year. Supper with Peter Gardner. Very pleasant. He's planning to re-marry, for the 3rd time. Says he's doing well as a "therapist." But I was deeply disappointed because, although I invited him twice (the next time with his fiancée) he never reciprocated.

February 17, 1983

One of many meals with my teaching fellow, Randy Eldevik, a huge Norwegian woman from Minnesota. Very reliable and bright.

February 22, 1983

Kristin Lindgren brought Daniella Wieser-Varon with her for supper at a local Greek restaurant. I asked Daniella to request her father's aid in publishing Jacques Grunblatt's translation of Seven Hills, on the holocaust. Her father was formerly in the Israeli delegation to the United Nations, and ambassador to Paraguay. Later he contacted me and we lunched at the Faculty Club. He gave some leads but so far nothing has happened that I know of.

February 23, 1983

Went to observe the Expos program. The old English A. Richard Marius, the chairman, turns out to be a Greek-American. Chris Flug, in JWH, is involved. Supper with Ames Abbott, Dartmouth student who got a job at Athens College through me.

March 2, 1983

Marvelous lecture in Sanders Theater by Carlos Fuentes, on Marquez. Superb. I never heard him all the time he was at Dartmouth, although I sat next to him once at a dinner thanks to a friend in the Spanish Department, and talked about Vassilis Vassilikos. Went with Will Lee, then to his apartment for supper. He's remarried happily, to an Italian-American.

March 8, 1983

One of many meals with Leo Papademetre, whom I just met in Los Angeles last Christmas. Bright young Greek, Ph.D. in linguistics from Brown. I'm trying to help him. He's helped me on the revisions of Demotic Greek I.

March 9, 1983

Lunch at the Faculty Club with Chris Flug, who seems to have taken a liking to me. I got her invited to the Ivy League Conference at the Minary Center next October.

March 10, 1983

Albert Hendricks, chairman of the Classics Department, took me to lunch. Pleasant, but no one in the department has gone out of his way to be particularly friendly, not even Zeff Stewart, with whom I negotiated. Big smiles, hellos, etc., but nothing further.

March 17, 1983

Alice Buseck here with daughter Susan, interested in Harvard. Found the daughter very stuck-up and disagreeable. I took them to supper at JWH.

March 21, 1983

Invited Sarah and Fotis Kafatos to JWH dinner. He is professor of biology, a Cretan whom we'd met in 1964 or so. Now helping to set up the University of Crete.

March 23, 1983

Lunch with Angeliki Laiou, professor of Byzantine history. A little stiff, but loosened up in subsequent meetings.

March 25, 1983

Drove to Colebrook, Connecticut, to meet Bill McNeill, the new editor of the Journal of Modern Greek Studies. John Iatrides came, too. Then to MGSA meetings in NYC, and on Sunday to the Kinhaven Board meeting in the Riverside Drive apartment of the musical patron Ann Ratnor. One of the nice memories: Arriving on the bus from Hanover around 5:00 p.m., taking MBT to Park Street and buying a donut to eat on the MBT to Harvard Square.

April 4, 1983

Classes resume, after a week's recess. Supper with Irene Kacandes, my graduate student in the Kazantzakis and Politics course. At her home. Husband is an accountant, very "square." Strange.

April 5, 1983

Ihor Ševčenko took me to lunch at the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Sat next to the famous philosopher Quine, who turns out to have known Tom Vance. Also met the editor of Daedalus, former employer of Daniella Vieser-Varon, interested in doing an issue on Greece. Ševčenko most gracious. I'd been unreasonably frightened by him when I first met him at Oxford, with Bryer, and then in B'ham. Told me that the "immortals" of the Academy treated me very well; they can be biting, apparently. Met a youngish assistant professor of Norwegian saga named Steve Mitchell. Albert Lord thinks highly of him.

April 11, 1983

Arrival of Rev. Bob Wessman, whom I'd met at the weekend on Ο τελευταίος πειρασμός. He's come to Harvard to audit my course for two weeks. Great addition in class and out. Announced to class at the first meeting that he had killed so many enemies and friends in Vietnam, he's stopped counting. But Kazantzakis made Christianity possible for him. Michelle Macrakis greeted him the next day by saying, "Ah, here's the killer!" I could have killed her.

April 12, 1983

David Wingrove, one of the most memorable students in the Odyssey course, invited me to a student-faculty dinner at Lowell House. He's a Canadian, son of English emigrants.

April 13, 1983

Lunch at the Faculty Club with Jim and Martha Davis. Drinks at 5:00 with Stratis Haviaras, poet-novelist who runs the Poetry Room at Lamont. Just finished a second novel. To Ševčenko's seminar at 8:00, at his home in Follen Street. Wife Nancy very friendly. Speaker was Roger Scott of Melbourne. Cynthia Stallman of Melbourne was also there plus two Melbourne seminarians at St. Vladimir's Russian Orthodox monastery. Also at these seminars is Ambassador MacVeigh's daughter, whom we met once at Bruce and Tad Lansdale's house at the American Farm School.

April 19, 1983

Lunch at Kennedy Center with Bill Beld, Alec's friend who helped Alec at the farm last summer (1982) and now is doing a master's degree in education at Harvard.

April 20, 1983

To B.U., guest of Steve Salamone, an obese, frenetic classicist doing wonders there for Modern Greek. Saw how they're cataloguing the Lagoudakis collection. Met Vouras, who's in charge.

April 21, 1983

Lunch at the Faculty Club with Mike Antonakes, Bob Wessman, and Mike's friend Bill Wesselooski—three fans of Kazantzakis. Forgot to say that in March Anna Farmakidis came down to Hellenic College for a meeting of the Inter-University Colloquium, and I had her and Dia and Chrysanthi to supper at the Faculty Club. Trying hard to make peace with Anna. Today Donald Nicol talked on Greeks in Byzantium. Angeliki Laiou invited me to the dinner afterwards. Then Donald and I walked around the Yard for two hours and had a coffee together. Very cordial reunion. We both regretted the split that occurred in BMGS, but felt that we could remain friends. He'd been in the Friends Ambulance Unit in Greece during World War II. Knows Donald Swann. Was captured by the αντάρτες during the Dekemvriana, released unharmed.

April 25, 1983

Georgia Noble took me to dinner.

April 26, 1983.

Conference with Judy Anderson, super-excitabile student in the Ulysses class. As soon as the first paper came due, she collapsed, dropped the course

April 22, 1983.

To Boston for a drink with David Godine. Commonwealth Avenue all in bloom, magnolias magnificent. "One of the great streets," David said. He took me to his club, founded by Parkman and others.

May 3, 1983

To Boston for supper with Steve Scully, now teaching under Steve Salamone at B.U., and his wife, daughter of Robert Penn Warren. Small salary; the usual problems. Lunch with one of my students, John Kelly, a poor boy from Cambridge who made it into Harvard. Randy and I gave a party for our class. Greek μεζεδάκια and wine, held in the Tomkins Room of JWH. I didn't feel like doing anything for the other class. Forgot to say that in this same room, at one of the Thursday luncheons, I had the most marvelous conversation with a young psychologist about how the brain functions or fails to function (on pretext of Jerry Bidlack's son Benjy, hit by a car and now hardly functioning mentally and nervously).

May 10, 1983

Drink with Gregory Nagy, my neighbor in Widener. All smiles like the others, but nothing further. I had to invite him. Supper at Martin McKinsey's girlfriend's with an assortment of strange and fascinating people.

May 15, 1983

Dia held a party for us in her flat: Zeff Stewart and wife, Ihor and Nancy Ševčenko. Nice of her. On the 16th I talked on Kazantzakis 19th century 20th century romantic before an audience of about five at the European Center, arranged by Sarah Kafatos. Pouring rain didn't help. (But I used the same lecture twice in Australia, once in Melbourne to about 200 people, and again in Sydney to about 30. Also plan to use it in Cambridge at the Kazantzakis Celebrations next September-October, and again at the Library of Congress in November, so I shouldn't complain of wasted effort.)

May 17, 1983

Great pleasure to have Randy and my "A" students to dinner at the Faculty Club.

May 18, 1983

Savidis is here. I treated him and Lily Macrakis to dinner. He surprised me by complaining about the victory of demotic in Greece. "Our students can't read Papadiamantis. They don't know katharévousa."

May 20, 1983

Gave exam; then flew to Philadelphia for the Pendle Hill board.

May 24, 1983

John Iatrides at Cambridge to discuss MGSA bibliography project. Lunch with Walter Kaiser.

May 25, 1983

Lunch with Laiou and her son. Suddenly she seemed human.

May 26, 1983

Visited Jan Ziolkowski and his lovely wife at North House. Steve Mitchell also. I tried to interest Jan in Donald Swann's bestiary songs, without success. Forgot to say that previously Mitchell had Ziolkowski, me, and Albert and Mary Lord to dinner. The moment I saw Lord, he said with a smile, "Lubbock, Texas!" I enthused about computers. Lord wants to do his next book on a word processor.

May 27, 1983

My last obligation: another exam. Lunch with Mr. Vieser-Varon, who pledges to help re: Grunblatt's translation.

I have of course omitted much, especially the scintillating discussions on Homer, Joyce, etc., another occasional "breakthrough" in the Kazantzakis class, the adventure of living a quasi-bachelor existence with the freedom involved. On the other hand, the joy of returning to Chrysanthi after periods of absence (on one occasion, nearly two weeks, when I went to Philadelphia on the weekend instead of returning home). Working up lectures until 1:00 a.m. the night before, continuing at 6:00 a.m. the next morning; the stamina is still there! Occasional meal alone at Chinese restaurant down the street. Häagen Dazs ice cream in my room, for nightcaps. Talk, talk talk! Cambridge-Harvard must be one of the most stimulating environments in the world. It spoiled me for Dartmouth, alas.

June 7, 1983

Today I am in San Francisco, waiting for a limousine to take Chrysanthi, Daphne, and me on the next leg of our journey to Australia—namely, San Francisco to Honolulu. Three years after being approached by Stathis Gauntlett of Melbourne, who asked whether they could put in my name for a Fulbright grant, the grant came through. Indeed, the morning following our horrendous 25-hour return trip from Athens in October, the phone rang to announce my success and ask if I was prepared to journey to Australia! I am to teach Cavafy, Ritsos, the το γλωσσικό ζήτημα, Kazantzakis's drama, and miscellaneous other things Greek. Chrysanthi is meant to teach the language to elementary students (from Demotic Greek I, which we revised this year and actually printed—Steve Waite did the job) and to intermediate students, from Demotic Greek II, Ο ιπτάμενος θάλαμος, which I saw through the press this year also, not to mention its accompanying workbook, done by me on the computer, as was the text itself, the Teacher's Manual, done by John Rassias, and two cassettes: one with the scenarios read by Greek actors of NYC under the direction of Nikos Skipitaris, the other with dictations produced by Paul Morby and Christos Alexiou in Birmingham, with "Maria" (Kasdaglis's daughter) and other students there doing the readings. Daphne will play in the Melbourne Youth Symphony and the International Festival Orchestra, and maybe study Greek.

In any case, here we are in San Francisco, on the way. The date of departure was determined mostly by Daphne's victory in the Young Artists' Competition of the Hanover Chamber Orchestra. Her concert was Saturday, June 4th; with the other winners (Joy Clendenning and Laura Sices) she did a Vivaldi concerto (nicely) and the Dvořák Bagatelles (not so well). I spoke with the conductor, James Yannatos, permanent conductor of the Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra, who turned out to be a lover of Kazantzakis who is writing a "mass" in which he wants to use passages from Αναφορά στον Γκρέκο. Alec turned up for the concert, having driven from Philadelphia following graduation exercises at Friends Central School. Ellen DeCesare also arrived with her stunning daughter Martha de Cheï-sa-reï, a blond beauty who obviously attracted Alec's eye immediately. (He has broken, I hope, with Elizabeth Dean finally.) Ellen will house-sit for us for the month of June, until Bob and Elborg Forster arrive for July and August.

On Sunday the 5th Alec and I attended Meeting (a good one, warm and deep). Then Ellen drove us to Cambridge, where we stayed overnight at the Friends Center. Too bad that Ed and Marian Sanders weren't there. The person who "greeted" us was as disagreeable as could be, and made me sick at heart. But we slept well in their beautiful guest room in Longfellow Park, rose at 6:00 a.m. and took a taxi to Logan. Good flight to San Francisco. We were meant to stay again at the Friends Center and drove there in a taxi but found it so far out that we decided to stay in a hotel in the center instead. Miraculously, we were able to get to the Berkeley Art Museum by 7:00 p.m. to meet Michael and Teresa Heyman by prearrangement, and their son James, a student at Williams College. The event at the museum was a reception for two interesting artists who made art out of newspaper reportage, the hows and whys of which they explained at great length. Walked through the Berkeley campus a bit beforehand; Not as lovely as I'd expected. The "mythical" park of 1969-70 was there, of course, not looking very mythical any longer. (Compare with Greek sites. Why do they retain such an aura?) Mickey took us to the Chancellor's mansion (they'll be moving in next week) and treated us to a sumptuous dinner. How nice of him, in honor of an old friendship! I compare this with Peter Gardner's indifference after I'd invited him twice in Cambridge. We talked mostly about computers as it turned out. James drove us back to the hotel.

June 8, 1983

San Francisco

Sightseeing with a vengeance! Grayline tour in the morning. Fisherman's Wharf; walking at leisure. A nice city, but not as spectacularly nice as I'd been led to believe. The parks are lovely, and the civic buildings and civic core are exceptional. I remember the civic official I met recently in Cambridge and how proud he was of his city's government. Flight in the evening to Honolulu, 4½ hours. The SF airport was like a teeming oriental city, filled with Philipinos and Singaporeans. The Australians are all very robust and blond and jolly on first impression; the plane is full of them. S.F. is filled with Japanese. A Japanese family ran our hotel; Japanese served in the adjacent fast-food restaurant; a Japanese girl found us our hotel at the bus depot, etc.

June 9, 1983

Honolulu

We slept in the Friends Center, where Gail gave us a properly Friendly welcome, waiting up until 12:30 a.m. to receive us. Jet lag helped us sleep soundly. In the morning, we took the no. 6 bus downtown, enjoying the oriental faces who boarded. This left us at a huge shopping center: open mall, so-called. Lovely! With lush plantings, goldfish pools, etc. A true αγορά, truly a meeting place for friends, not just an emporium, and all possible, of course, because of the climate. Called Al Manoa, I think. From here we boarded a no. 52 bus, all still on the same 50-cent fare used on no. 6. This took us on a rather exhausting five-hour journey around the entire island. Again the faces on board were the most interesting “scenery.” But I saw bamboo for the first time, and coconut palms, and bananas, and sugar cane, and hundreds of acres of pineapples (Dole Co, and Del Monte), and papaya trees. The afternoon we spent deliciously on Waikiki Beach, a delightful place with perfect sand, cleanliness, pellucid water, scenic scenery, and lovely young bodies in profusion. The shopping centers, also, are imaginatively attractive. We also saw some Banyan trees, huge matriarchs spreading their arms. Passed Pearl Harbor, where the “Arizona” lies sunk and visible. (In San Francisco, I viewed a submarine, WWII vintage; it had a Remington Standard typewriter exactly like the one I still use at the farm, the one that was my father’s in the office.)

At this point we are six hours “wrong.” But the worst is still to come. Another eight hours or so before we reach Australia.

June 10, 1983

To Melbourne via Townsville and Sidney. How stupid of me not to have planned a stopover in Townsville to see the Great Barrier Reef, but I didn’t even realize that we were stopping here. Arrived at 5:30 a.m. in the dark and saw the sunrise while in the airport. Thence to Sidney—immigrations, and, with a change of planes, to Melbourne. A Mr. Frank de Greet, obviously a womanizer, took a shine to Daphne and then to all of us, filling us with bits of information. At the airport, Stathis Gauntlett met us, with his Greek wife Maria and child Loukia. He is Welsh on his father’s side, Greek on his mother’s. Grew up in South Wales. Did his degree in French and Modern Greek at Oxford. Our house is not ready, so he put us up in the Town House Hotel for three days. We walked around the university. The whole site and sight, at first, seems very much like Birmingham. Equally drab and ugly. University very unattractive, visually. A hodge-podge of “red brick” Victorian and Oxbridge pretentiousness. Pavlos Andronikos joined us for lunch. He is an Anglo-Cypriot, grew up in London, did his degree in B’ham. I’d met him there at a seminar in 1979. Later, Meg sent me his (poor) translation of Ο Βασίλης ο Αρβανίτης. Now he’s junior faculty here. After lunch, we walked downtown as far as the river, saw shopping areas, the municipal library, etc. Everything as though lifted up from B’ham and transported here. Around 6:00 p.m. we were so tired that we all collapsed into bed.

Saturday, June 11, 1983

Melbourne

We're all waking up at 5:00 a.m., no matter when we go to bed—part of the jet lag still. In the morning we walked to Victoria Market, a huge affair very European in flavors: meats, vegetables, clothing, poultry, hides, cheeses, etc., a wealth of produce. In the afternoon we took the tour to Phillip Island. Saw Koala bears in their eucalyptus trees on a preserve. Lethargically ingesting leaves while perched high up on a branch, their hind legs wrapped around the branch, their front legs used like human arms and hands. They are marsupials, one of the species preserved here and nowhere else, because of Australia's isolation. Then to the "Penguin Parade." The fairy penguins fish all day, swimming long distances. One of each pair stays in the burrow with the children while the other fishes. The next day they alternate. The fisher, upon return, regurgitates its catch for the child. At dusk, all the fishers emerge en masse from the sea, in successive groups. Apparently they belong to tribes. As soon as the tribe comes out of the sea, they line up like soldiers until all ranks are filled. (If not, they turn round, go back into the water momentarily and start all over again from the beginning.) When the ranks are successfully filled, they then march in file up the beach, waddling cutely, and make their way along special paths to their own burrows. Just like commuters returning home from work! We saw all this on the floodlit beach. Hundreds emerged, paraded, marched. Later, we saw them in their burrows, cooing and gurgling. A unique spectacle.

Sunday, June 12, 1983

Melbourne

To Quaker Meeting. Messages very familiar. Met Peter Jones, an English "wanderer," full-time peace worker, who'd been at Woodbrooke and Pendle Hill, stayed overnight with the Bouldings in Colorado, been in Mayme Noda's affinity group at Seabrooke! Small world. Also an American couple transplanted to Australia. About forty people in Meeting, including young people. Singing and lunch afterwards. It's way over on the other side of the city, which will make for difficulties in attendance, alas, unless we get a car. Walked afterwards in the beautiful parks. Saw Lonsdale Street, the Greek quarter. A store had my Efstathiadis Ritsos book! Saw a Greek wedding in progress in a church. The bride arrived in a dress so elaborate that she seemed to be held prisoner within. An older man outside the church told us with pride that he was the cutter in the dressmaker's establishment that had created this "cage." The girl seemed truly to be a sacrifice being led to slaughter, and she looked very very unhappy.

Monday, June 13, 1983

Melbourne

A Bank Holiday, celebrating the Queen's birthday. Beautiful blue skies. The air feels just like Birmingham's on a nice day. We walked to the zoo: koalas, kangaroos, wombats, exotic birds. Saw male kangaroos playfully jabbing at each other and kicking while bracing themselves on their tails. A marvelous zoo, with simulated natural conditions, especially in the gigantic aviary divided into rain jungle, wetlands, and grasslands. Pelicans galore, ostriches, giraffes, zebras, a lovely lion with his harem. But we missed the platypus, open only after 1:00 p.m. Another time.

Stathis picked us up and took us south of Melbourne to his village home. Two sweet girls, Loukia and Katerina. Wife Maria, a Cypriot. She likes it here, as does Stathis. Beyond their home, farther south about one mile or less, the furthest reach of the horrendous bush fire they had last summer. Charred trees. Their house escaped by a hair's breadth, really. After lunch we drove to Mt. Macedon (named by a surveyor who wanted to match it with Phillip's Island). Charred, devastated forests, homes in rubble, with only the hearth and chimney standing, families in caravans on their land where homes had been. From the top, a huge patch of black, destroyed, surrounded by the almost Vermont-like green of the land that had escaped. For three days it had been entirely out of control. The top of Mt. Macedon looked like the rim of the sun, with huge tongues of flame shooting into the sky.

I finished Myrivilis's Ο Βασίλης ο Αρβανίτης finally. Very disappointing. Nice writing, of course—that lovely prose!—but as a “story” it's so episodic and unsophisticated. Stathis liked my translation of Ἡ ζώή ἐν τάρφω and actually remembered with glee the passage about “pale and hardy.”

Tuesday, June 14, 1983

Settled in our house in Swanston Street across from the Uni. Large. Too large. Centrally heated after a fashion (but we really haven't been cold here). Bedroom faces the street, so we have traffic sounds to adjust to. Lunch with the department. Michael Osborne is the new professor: an epigrapher, whatever that is. Robin Jackson has been at Marlboro. The secretary, Loukia, fled Cyprus after the invasion. Her husband, there a solicitor, here teaches high school. John Burke met his Greek wife in Thessaloniki. John Martyr started Modern Greek by getting money from the Colonels. I have an office (Roger Scott's), a Xerox, etc. The library has an ample collection of Modern Greek materials.

Wednesday, January 15, 1983

Took Daphne to University High School, where she enrolled to do music, English, and art. She was brave enough to stay the first day. Next week she goes off to a week-long music camp in the country. Computer demonstration by a Roland Sussex who's doing here what folks were doing at Harvard: developing programs for CAI (Computer Assisted Instruction) in different alphabets. They use GG terminals. He mentioned programs in Russian by Barry Scherr of Dartmouth. Supper in Lonsdale Street with Peter Jones, the Quaker peace worker in Australia. Subsistence living (earns $100 a week to stay below the income tax level); strict vegetarian—in short, a counter-culture type, very bright, Oxford B.A. in history, reads continually, debates in colleges and schools, writes position papers on peace and environmental issues, travels all over Australia (and occasionally the world). A true intellectual leading a meaningful life. I felt parasitical. His copy of A. J. Muste's Pendle Hill pamphlet was confiscated by the Russians when he went through Soviet customs. I hope to get him another. Fine, cheap supper: σπιφάδο followed by baklava and Turkish coffee in a ζαχαροπλαστείο, Also, our first rides on the famous Melbourne trams.

Thursday, June 16, 1983

I'm sitting in my new "study" at home—in the bedroom, as usual—reading Mario Vitti's introduction to Ο Βασίλης ο Αρβανίτης and writing this diary. Traffic roaring outside but there's a lovely green lawn opposite to look at. A strange way to be beginning the summer! Would we have been better off in Riparius? So far, this is not a very different or exotic experience. The main impression is of similarity, and of admiration for the British, who spread their language and culture truly around the world.

Friday, June 17, 1983

Settling in to routines. I placed my desk in our bedroom (as usual!) in front of the large windows. Started revision of Fratricides chapter; Bill McNeill wants part of it as an article for the Journal of Modern Greek Studies by the end of July. Lunch with an Australian Greek poet, Δημήτρης Τσαλουμάς, here since the 1950s, presumably a leftist who fled. Taught French here in high school and hated it; children didn't want to learn. Now retired. One book is translated and published here; he gave me two others, in Greek. Stathis arranged all this, of course. Told me about Mitsakis, how he wrote the infamous letter to the colonels because they wouldn't let him out of Greece otherwise to take up his post at Oxford. Then returned to Θεσσαλονίκη under the colonels because his wife had refused to accompany him to Oxford and he had to get back to Greece for this reason. Δικαιολογία; Ίσως.

In the afternoon, my first function, the staff graduate seminar. The paper was offered by Pavlos Andronikos, on narrative technique in Ο βασιλης ο Αρβανίτης. Not bad, but delivered without energy. I almost went to sleep. He accuses Mario Vitti (rightfully) of equating the narrator with the author, and claims that the fictional narrator is an important part of the story. I'm not too sure.

Saturday, June 18, 1983

A nice, restful day. Worked on Fratricides all morning. Here, the telephone doesn't ring. The "girls" went to Victoria Market. I walked in the afternoon. Here, as opposed to America, weekends are taken seriously. Everything is closed, including the computer center at the university. (I'm going to get my user number on Monday.)

Rented a car. We went across town to Monash University to hear a concert by groups from the Melbourne Youth Symphony, Percy Granger Youth Symphony, etc. Pieces by a British composer, John Hurd, were done. Extremely uninteresting. One was a kind of cantata on Jonah; the boy-narrator enlivened it for me with his pronunciation: And then God spike unto Jonah . . . and Jonah saw a great while, and the like. Beautiful hall at Monash, like Spaulding Auditorium five times as large, with a modern-style organ dominating the stage. Audience (mamas and papas) unsophisticated, clapping during breaks in suites, etc. Level of performance excellent for each level: middle school and high school.

Sunday, June 19, 1983

In our rented car, out early to the Royal Botanical Gardens. The British have such a genius for landscape architecture, while all the buildings in this city are as ugly as sin. Strange. I loved the grass palms; they look like New Guinea huts or masks. Also liked the way they train roses, using a tall pole with a hoop at the top, and a lamp. The roses grow up and then out and down to form an umbrella effect.

Thence to Meeting. People try to be friendly. The caretaker, Peter Cook, remembered me from last week and said, "Glad to see you, Peter." Ministry not very inspiring, but better than last time. I thought of Kierkegaard, as did someone who ministered. When I told Peter Cook that I'd come half way round the world only to find myself in Europe, he replied, "Thank Goodness!"

Then fifty-odd kilometers to Healensville to the wild life sanctuary. Wonderful display of the platypus, a lone survivor of prehistoric development: aquatic but no gills, breathes air above water, lays eggs and sits on them like a bird; webbed feet for swimming but webbing retracts to allow claws to be used; beak like a duck's, for grabbing worms, etc. Males have venom for defense. They dig burrows like otters and beavers. The hole is so narrow that when they squeeze into the burrow all the water in their fur is squeezed out, and thus they entry dry. We also saw a lyrebird at arm's length, very regal. Lots of parakeets brightly colored. Squawking geese in profusion. Koalas sleeping as usual. Wombats. Kangaroos roaming around with the people. Flying forms that look like huge bats. Eagles. Owls. Ostriches. And a lovely display of nocturnal mammals and marsupials, some like tiny kangaroos just as big as the palm of your hand.

Dinner in a trendy Italian restaurant in Carlton. I dared Wiener schnitzel! (It wasn't very good.) Tomorrow Daphne is off to music camp for a week, run by University High School.

READING WHILE IN MELBOURNE

Nikos Kasdaglis, Shaved Heads, tr. Tom Doulis.

Σ. Μυριβίλης, Ο βασιλης ο Αρβανίτης.

Ν. Καζαντζάκης, Ο πρωτομάστορας.

Γ. Βελουδής, πρόλογος στην του Ρίτσου Επιτομή.

Π. Πρεβελάκης, Ο ποιητής Γιάννης Ρίτσος.

Γιάννης Βασιλακάκος, Μελέτες στη νεοελληνική λογοτεχνία.

Lawrence Durrell, A Smile in the Mind's Eye.

Ο. Ελύτης, Προσανατολισμός. Το Άξιον εστί. Ο ήλιος ο Α΄.

Λούλα Ρίτσου-Γλέζου, Τα παιδικά χρόνια του αδελφού μου Γιάννη

Ρίτσου. Γιάννης Βασιλακάκος, Η ταυτότητα.

Ατάντζιο Κατράκο, Ο φίλος μου ο Καβάφης.

Molière, Tartuffe.

Herman Prins Salomon, Tartuffe devant l'opinion française.

Γ. Σεφέρης, Χειρόγραφο Σεπ. '41.

Γ. Ξενόπουλος, Μητριτιά.

Robin Boyd, The Puzzle of Architecture

Sunday, July 3, 1983

Melbourne

Huge surprise today. Last week Daphne went for the seating audition with the Festival Orchestra and emerged convinced that she'd never played worse. We half expected to receive a letter denying her admission to the orchestra. Today she went for the first rehearsal. When she returned she announced that they'd made her concertmistress! Strange.

Chrysanthi and I spent the afternoon at the Victoria Gallery. They have some nice paintings: a Rembrandt self-portrait, some fine Constables, and a very impressionistic Turner; a lovely Matisse nude; Pissarro's famous scene of the Paris boulevard, an early monument of impressionism; a Tintoretto portrait of the Doge, even an El Greco but not a very striking one. Most of the museum is chinaware, costumes, etc. A poor showing, really, but they started late—obviously. We attended the afternoon concert in the Great Hall: Stamitz, Haydn, Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, not very exciting. Then cappuccino and baklava in Lonsdale Street in a ζαχαροπλαστέιο mobbed by Greeks. That passed the time.

Last night, dinner with John and Elsa Burke and Pavlos Andronikos. Returned at 2:00 a.m. and watched Wimbledon on the telly. Nice evening: good, unforced conversation. Mrs. Burke is a Greek-American from Seattle who went to Thessaloniki and taught night-school Greek, where she met John, one of her students. She remembers Mr. Svarnas, or rather his widow and daughter. He was my boss at the Επιμορφωτικό Ινστιτούτο, along with Socrates Papadopoulos. How did I ever remember those names?

Friday I gave my paper on aesthetic defects of Καπετάν Μιχάλης to the staff-graduate seminar. Last Monday I lectured for two hours on Cavafy at Monash University, a dismal experience because of no contact whatsoever with the students. I was wheeled in, spoke, and wheeled out again (so to speak). Horrible. I was depressed for a day. But the staff-graduate seminar is different. It meets each week. I know the people. One of them, John Vasilakakos, asked us for supper next Friday. The week before, Alfred Vincent gave a splendid presentation on scholarship past, present (and future) on Cretan renaissance literature. We were to dinner previously. He's cold, but warmed up after half a bottle of wine. Divorced. Apparently his wife embraced Lesbianism and left him. Seems a sad person, very cut off. We'll visit him in Sydney. We also had dinner with Pavlos and Andria Andronikos in their cramped house in an insipid suburb: she a sweet English girl loaded now with two children. She seemed like a trapped bird to me. Really, to live in a commune would be preferable to this martyrdom in suburbia. It's the worst of all possible worlds. No extended family to help. No freedom that is meant to compensate for the loss of the extended family.

I typed my Fratricides essay on the computer and am about to send it to Bill McNeill for the Journal of Modern Greek Studies. Of course it is too long, as always—at least 10,000 words. Will do the footnotes tomorrow.

Working on Ritsos lectures now. I want to try to give them in Greek.

July 19, 1983

Opera: Eugene Onegin at the Palace Theatre, St. Kilda Beach. Lovely voices and orchestra, not very impressive mise en scène or ballet (stage too small probably). Preceded by superb Chinese dinner. In this way we celebrated our anniversary (which both Chrysanthi and I had forgotten completely two days earlier) and also Daphne's very nice results in her most recent SATs.

July 22, 1983

A busy day. At noon I gave the final of my six lectures on Ritsos, speaking this time on Philoctetes and then the period under the Junta, especially «Το διαξευκτικό ή» and the collection Θυρωρείο. With luck these six lectures, all written out in full, will be of use somewhere else sometime. They cost me three full weeks of work, but it was nice to go back to Ritsos after so many years.

Lunch in Staff House with Pavlos Andronikos, an Anglo-Cypriot who is tutor here and has responsibility for the Ritsos course. He's done a translation of Ο Βασίλης ο Αρβανίτης and was a student at Birmingham.

Next, the staff seminar, given this time by the department chairman, Professor Michael Osborne, on ancient Greek epigraphy, the pitfalls of attempted restoration of texts, how inscriptions may be dated by style of lettering, etc. Very technical, and expertly delivered.

Next, ceremonial supper in Staff House preceding my lecture. I had paté, filet mignon—a rare treat, since Daphne's vegetarianism sees us eating mostly string beans at home—moca ice cream, espresso coffee. John Burke on one side, Stathis Gauntlett on the other, Pavlos Andronikos across the table; also Nikos and Loukia Aloneftis (she's the secretary, he's a Cypriot refugee, trained as a lawyer at home but teaching Greek school here; Maria ? from La Trobe; Chris Fifis from Victoria; Yannis and Maria Vasilakakos from Victoria College; Kostas Prokopiou from Victoria; Chrysanthi.

Huge audience for the lecture, probably about 150+ people. I spoke on Kazantzakis as 20th century 19th century romantic. Afterwards, the questions kept coming without hesitation, good questions that I felt I could answer, so all in all it was, I think, a successful event. Various people came up afterwards, including someone who'd come out from Australia to our language conference in Athens in 1980 and is about to depart for the second one next month in Boston.

Saturday, July 23, 1983

I'm writing this on the Intercapital Daylight Express, en route from Melbourne to Sydney. We left at 9:00 a.m. and are due to arrive at 9:47 p.m. for a four-day stay with Alfred Vincent and Michael and Elizabeth Jeffreys as hosts.

Time to record some things that have happened: Nice dinner at our home with one of the classics professors in the department, John Martyn, born in South Africa, educated in England, came out here for his first job and has remained. Australian wife. It was he who got the Modern Greek program going, by (a) systematically collecting money and good will from the Greek community—AHEPA, church, clubs, etc.—, going to all their functions, working slowly, cultivating; (b) convincing the vice-chancellor about the need and viability of the program; (c) working with school boards. The schools wanted to introduce Greek but couldn't do it until the subject was recognized at university level. The university authorities complained that they couldn't move because there was no Greek in the schools! So, he had to work on both fronts at once. When he'd made progress here, he then went to Greece, under the colonels, and got money from the Ministry of Transport (sic). This was about ten years ago. The key, as always, was individual contacts, friends of friends, persistence, patience.

On another day, I went out to lecture on Cavafy's Alexandrian cycle at Monash University, with Gavin Betty as host. He has translated Samarakis and, as a classicist, is extremely open to Modern Greek. Afterwards, in the car returning to Parkville, long talk with a linguist, Thanasis Spiliadis (?), who's just done a survey of the Melbourne school system and who told me that Modern Greek is the number 1 language studied, above French. Ten years ago there was nothing. The problems are the usual ones: inadequate training of teachers, paucity of teaching materials. But workshops are held regularly as a method of on-the-job training.

Also had lunch with Michael Osborne, Rob Jackson, Dennis Pryer (Pryer served in the Friends Ambulance Unit). Osborne thinks that Modern Greek belongs in classics because classicists must come to realize that life didn't ever stop in Greece. Yet true intellectual cross-fertilization is minimal at Melbourne, although honors students can cross boundaries and do. The real problem is that hordes of Greeks enroll for an easy grade and not because of true desire for the subject. He finds this demoralizing and doesn't know what to do about it because they also have to keep numbers up or be threatened with loss of funds. A familiar dilemma. The problem is complicated because, ironically, the presence of a majority of Greek speakers in the language classes makes those classes too difficult for the Anglophone beginners, who are discouraged and don't enroll in great numbers. An attempt has been made to stream the two groups.

Other recent events: Last Sunday a ridiculously huge lunch at Loukia and Nikos's, a real Greek lunch followed by Greek songs by Mimis, another Cypriot who is very clever on the guitar, and a reasonably good singer. His wife is Salome, another Cypriot; she teaches Greek and French in a high school. The previous day we'd had Dennis and Beverly Dorwick to supper. They stayed overnight and then drove us to Meeting. They are Americans who came out here about fifteen years ago to teach school, among hundreds of US and British teachers systematically recruited and who stayed. They're at Geelong, he at a fancy prep school, doing music, she at a nursery school.

The previous week, we went to a Chinese restaurant with Yannis and Maria Vasilakakos. He is a sad sack type—writes short stories, has done a play, etc. Caught between two worlds. Came out here as a child, went back to Athens with his parents, bought an apartment, realized that he couldn't survive there, returned here to finish his education, then got a job . . . and stayed. The apartment in Athens, fully furnished, is locked; they don't rent it because they fear for their belongings. Here they haven't bought a home because they think—one day—they'll occupy the home in Athens. Misery! He's my age, and I compare his life with mine. Among other things, he just got married six months ago. No children, a few publications but nothing very substantial, mediocre job. Yet bright and sensitive. But caught in the diaspora. Unable να πάρει απόφαση, that he belongs in either one place or the other.

When the Greeks came out here twenty-odd years ago, they were miserable. The whole town closed down at 8:00 p.m. Dead. No place to go, to eat, to sing. No one spoke Greek, or cared. Now of course there is a tremendous difference. Greeks, Italians, etc. have transformed the eating habits, nightlife, etc. of the urban Australians. Translation schools provide personnel for hospitals, courts, and the rest; you don't have to speak English to become an Australian citizen.

We also met our neighbors, Bill Grundmann and family, Americans from Iowa. He's been here for two years, teaching landscape architecture. The whole department is Americans. He says we're way ahead of them in this field, which is strange, considering their superb public gardens.

Met Dimitris Tsaloumas, an Australian-Greek poet who is considered the best of the lot.

Sunday, July 24, 1983

Michael Jeffreys, now professor of Modern Greek at Sydney, took us around the city in the morning: Opera House, Mrs Macquarie's Chair (lovely park), the Greek Archdiocese (Harkianakis is away in Greece, alas); over the Harbour Bridge, then over another bridge that Daphne had studied in school because it is the world's longest single span concrete bridge. Lots of photos. Elderly men and women playing bowls impeccably decked out in their whites. Home to the Jeffreys' for lunch and to meet Elizabeth and Catherine, the daughter, aged 9. Elizabeth, whom I remember from our encounter in England as stiff and forbidding, was nothing of the sort: warm, smiling, hospitable. In the afternoon she replaced Michael and drove us around: to Vaucluse House (unimpressive) and then to the Heads: the entrance to Sydney Harbor, facing the wide Pacific. How beautiful and exciting. Then Michael, again as chauffeur, took us to Alfred Vincent's for an awkward, long supper of desultory conversation.

Monday, July 25, 1983

I sent Daphne and Chrysanthi down to the Opera House to get tickets for Otello. At 11:00 a.m. I gave my paper on Cavafy's Three-Stage Development into Detachment before the Modern Greek staff. Well received, I think. Lots of questions. Dimitris Gounelas told me afterwards that it was a breath of fresh air because they have no intellectual stimulation at all from the outside. Lunch in the Student Union, quite attractive. Then I dashed to the harbor and did the Opera House tour, the best part of which was the delicious blonde who led it. They speak so beautifully, too! The Opera House really is an amazing conception overall, and magnificently located, surrounded by harbor-water on three sides (why didn't anyone think of this for New York or Boston?). But the actual theaters inside are not so impressive, except for the concert hall, which ironically is larger than the opera hall. On the other hand, the acoustics are perfect, which of course was not the case for Philharmonic Hall in New York City. Rushing back, I made it in time for our meeting with three school teachers, and Chrysanthi and I tried our best to promote Ο ιπτάμενος θάλαμος.

Supper with Dimitris and Ruth Gounelas, and Michael Jeffreys. What lovely people! I remember so well the supper we had in Αγία Παρασκευή in December 1980. But tragedy has struck them. Ruth has completely lost the sight of one eye and was a hair's breadth from losing the sight of the other—saved miraculously (for the moment) by laser therapy, for which they had to go to San Francisco. Somehow, a fungus was lodged in the eyes and this causes the blood vessels in the retina to rupture. Each time this happens, an area of vision is lost. The laser apparently seals off the vessels, preventing loss of vision, if the treatment occurs in time. In any case, for the moment the vision is stabilized. She can read, although with difficulty. She has her Ph.D. from Oxford in English literature and is determined to complete a book on three women writers including the New Zealander Katharine Mansfield (Ruth is a New Zealander). They met when Dimitris went out there as a μετανάστης and was working as a waiter. Only afterward did he decide to enter university. As if this were not enough, Dimitris is unhappy in Sydney and has tendered his resignation. His old job at the University of Crete awaits him, but Ruth's job in Deree is only an informal promise, and the question of course is whether her eyesight will hold out. We had several long talks; we find each other very simpatico, apparently. I told him about Pappou's refusal to accept his visual impairment to the point of learning new skills. Ruth, no matter what happens, should learn touch typing, then Braille, etc., so as not to be at a sudden loss if the condition turns worse. Dimitris's problem here has been chiefly a personality clash with Alf (who turns out to be quite neurotic and difficult for everyone, alas), inability to do his own research, general lack of intellectual stimulation. So, he's determined to return, even though a tenured position awaits him here. At the dinner, Ruth was lovely and charming, their 2½ year old daughter sweetly obedient, the meal a treat (roast lamb, Pavlova). Ruth spoke openly about her case, but with complete optimism that she was now cured. Μακάρι!

Tuesday, July 26, 1983

Today I had to speak to a class, plus staff, on Some Modern Greek Responses to the Glory that Was Greece, then repeat the same talk to the second section of the same class later in the day. The first time I was greeted by silence, but the second time there were a few good questions. In between, Dimitris showed me the Great Hall and Panayota Nazou her linguistic dissertation, all kinds of tables and percentages re: various forms of the Greek verb. The university is lovely in appearance, with the Great Hall, the Quad, and other aspects constituting a huge act of faith when they were erected in the mid-nineteenth century. The Quad is transplanted Cambridge pure and simple.

After my second talk: a race downtown to the Opera House to meet Chrysanthi and Daphne and our guest, Elizabeth Jeffreys, to see Verdi's Otello. Alas, the lead role was the weakest in the cast, though Desdemona was excellent and Iago OK. So, all in all, the performance lacked the magic that I'd felt in Eugene Onegin the other night. In this case, the Opera House was better, alas, than the opera. But it was good to see Verdi's treatment, which, as usual, is just the bare bones of the original literary work. At the end, Iago kills himself and Othello is simply forgotten.

Wednesday, July 27, 1983

This was a day of walking. We left the motel leisurely, walked down Paramatta Road into George Street, bought the Ladybird Book of Bridges for Daphne's physics teacher, looked at lovely arcades, at buildings old and new, at the cathedral, etc. Then down to the harbor—Circular Quay—and the ferry to the zoo. Lovely, sunny day; Harbor breeze. It was as though we were cruising in Greece, off the boat, onto a bus, up a hill, then into a site: but in this case to see not dead stones but live monkeys, wombats, parakeets, elephants (bathing!), ostriches, sleepy tigers, wonderful southern fish— anemones, polyps, starfish, electric eels—all in a setting that allows for glimpses of the harbor and city across the water. Foot-weary, we returned to a cup of tea in the Harbour Restaurant of the Opera House, then no. 440 bus back to the motel. Supper (filet mignon!). Daphne and Chrysanthi to Central Station to take the Southern Arrow home. I to the university to lecture on Kazantzakis: Twentieth Century Nineteenth Century Romantic to a fairly good audience, but nothing like the one last week at Melbourne. Afterwards, an enthusiastic Cypriot took Michael, Alf, and me to dinner (!) again, at a Chinese restaurant, the Cypriot club being closed after 10:00 p.m. We all unwound a bit. To bed at 12:30.

Thursday, July 28, 1983

Sydney–Melbourne

Michael Jeffreys unburned himself to me for one and a half hours: losing Dimitris Gounelas, Alf's neuroticism (masochistic workaholic, alienating others, destroying his marriage through neglect), Michael's own desire to accompany Elizabeth to Dumbarton Oaks next year balanced against his need to be here. Poor man, βρήκε τον μπελά του. The department seems to be demoralized. He told me that my presence was refreshing because I seemed so sane! Yes, I think he's right. He continued by saying that I took for granted that the study of literature was something fascinating in its own right—i.e. self-justifying—as opposed to the situation they have, where everything seems to be measured against its "usefulness" for the Greek community: for ethnicity.

Then Dimitris Gounelas drove me to the airport and we had a long talk. Πες μου, είμαι τρελός που θέλω να γυρίσω στην Ελλάδα; We weighed all the factors. Poor man, he's caught in a classic squeeze play. But I think he must go now. All depends on Ruth's eyes, her ability to work again at Deree (if she gets the job).

Flight to Melbourne. In the afternoon, I gave a class on Kazantzakis and το γλωσσικό ζήτημα. Κώστας, one of the few students I've come to identify by name, came up afterward and said, "I'm so glad you're still here; we all thought you'd left after the last Ritsos lecture." That was nice. This lad turns out to be Australian born, but the family moved back to Greece and he went to high school there. Denied a place in the Greek universities, he returned here, on his own, to get his degree. He wants to teach, poor fellow. Having just come from Gounelas's impasse, I was doubly saddened by the realization that so few of these lovely people who want such a career will ever realize their desire.

Supper, at home for a change; bed.

Friday, July 29, 1983

Melbourne

At 8:30 a.m. the telephone roused us. Yiayia and Pappous called from New York to report that Leander returned last week, stayed with them a few days, and then went to New Haven to find an apartment, staying temporarily with his friends the Applewhites. Pappous, normally so critical of Leander, spoke very positively, saying he looks and sounds wonderful, has realistic goals, and apparently is now doing well with Outi, who will come to the U.S. again in December for a visit. So be it!

Saturday, July 30, 1983

Last night, supper at the John Martyns'. They have a mentally and physically defective son aged 20 who occupies most of Alexia's time. He was at the dinner: able to converse, but with a certain strangeness that grows on one, and an almost childish graciousness and openness that then takes the form of monopolizing the conversation. John explained the role of the Governor General, how he once sacked a government.

Today, lunch with David and Susan Chandler. He is Trix Officer's cousin, an expert on Southeast Asia. Harvard '54, then army, then foreign service in Cambodia, then graduate school (Yale) and directly to Monash University because of a job opening precisely in his field and no openings in the U.S. Directs a SE Asian institute. Knew David and Atossa French in Thailand. His wife went to Northfield and Oberlin. Also at lunch, John ?, an Australian specializing in Australian history. Chandler told a good NYC joke. Seems a British philosopher came to lecture at CCNY on linguistics. "You know," he said, "it's noteworthy that in the English language we can put two negatives together to make a positive, as in 'I will not do nothing,' but we cannot put two positives together to make a negative," whereupon a CCNY professor in the back row said under his breath, "Yeah yeah!"

August 3, 1983

Yesterday I had what John Martyn here calls a “breakthrough” in research. In writing on Fratricides I emphasized (a) the Macedonian question and (b) the rivalry between Markos and Zachariadis/Ioannidis, saying that perhaps Kazantzakis didn’t intend these emphases but nevertheless they are there, and help us understand the civil war. My hunches were right. Yesterday I discovered two letters by Kazantzakis I’d not known about, thanks to Yannis Vasilakakos’s paper on Fratricides last Friday at the staff seminar. In the first letter, Kazantzakis asked an informant in Greece to send him everything possible on the Macedonian question. One chapter is half-finished, Kazantzakis continued, and I need these materials before I can go further. In the second letter he announced the completion of his first draft and then added: it is neither the gospel according to Markos nor the gospel according to Ioannidis. How nice!

Stylianos Harkianakis called from Sydney last night, very friendly and enthusiastic, bringing greetings from Savidis, Prevelakis, etc. He thinks we can publish his book here. We’ll see him this weekend. He asked me if I liked Australia and I was not very enthusiastic. Δεν έχει πολιτισμό ενδιαφέρον. —Σύμφωνοι! Δε συγκρίνεται λέει με την Αμερική. How nice, at last, to be able to feel that we Americans are more advanced than someone else roughly comparable. Η Αυστραλία είναι θάλαγα ο αμερικανικός πολιτισμός του γλυκού νερού!

In the evening, Daphne’s concert in Melbourne Concert Hall, a sumptuous interior much nicer than the Sydney Opera House’s interior. Fun program. Daphne was concertmistress. Her group did a Walton overture, Mussorgsky’s Night on Bald Mountain, and Verdi’s Te Deum with a huge chorus. All OK; nothing very inspiring. Before, in the foyer, the University High group, including her Vietnamese friend Hung, did Mendelssohn’s Octet, one of my favorites. The exotic part consisted of songs and dances first by a group from Tonga, then Papua, then Bali, then India, all lovely except that the Balinese music was bad, just warmed over French. After the concert an American college group did jazzy songs that repulsed me, but the leader turned out to be a jazz trumpeter of genius, really. He “sent” me, as they say. Finally, we took Hung and Daphne to the Concert Hall’s coffee shop, overlooking the Yarra, for late-night pancakes. Then the tram home.

Friday, August 5, 1983

Spoke on Ο Χριστός ξανασταυρώνεται to the staff-postgraduate seminar, my last obligation.

Saturday, August 6, 1983

Rigoletto. So infantile as a story. But the music!

Sunday, August 7, 1983

Stylianos sent a priest to fetch us and we spent a nice three hours in lively conversation at the Archdiocesan headquarters in South Melbourne. He is simple and unspoiled. Lively mind; gregarious. Sees poetry and prayer as equivalents. We talked a lot about Βούλη and Δημοσθένης, also about Kazantzakis. I worked most of yesterday and all of this morning on the poems, trying to improve the translations a bit.

Monday, August 8, 1983

Lunch at the Carousel overlooking Albert Lake, with Stylianos and the other priest. I handed over the manuscript. In the evening, he took us to the home of a Cretan living here, and two other Cretan couples came. They still live in a fantasy world attached to the πατρίδα. One man is glum because his company poured three cubic meters of cement and then came a downpour that all but ruined the job.

Tuesday, August 9, 1983

To a student production of Oedipus Rex at the Guild Theatre. They did Teiresias as a paralytic who went into spastic trance and then prophesied in an entirely different voice. But the overall production was slow. The Arnott marionettes had the correct speed for this play.

I've reduced my Fratricides article to 8000 words for Bill McNeill.

Wednesday, August 10, 1983

Lunch at the Carvery with Stathis. Discussed the big conference on "The Meaning of Neohellenism" that they're planning for August 1985. He wants me to return.

Thursday, August 11, 1983

Bought an opal with Chrysanthi. An antique ring, very nice. Lots of gold. Five small opals. $325.00.

Friday, August 12, 1983

Took Pavlos to lunch after his final lecture on To Άξιον εστί and Εγγονόπουλος. He wrote it at 4:00 a.m.! Not very impressive, but generally he's bright and capable.

Supper at the Concert Hall with Stathis, Maria, their daughter, and a friend of theirs who works in the chemical industry. Then the Gala Final Concert of the youth festival. The highlight was an orchestra from Japan—110 children aged 8 to 12 who performed magnificently (much better than the Kinhaven orchestra). There are 350 such orchestras in Japan. They rehearse every day, once before school and once after. Total precision. Remarkable musicianship. Daphne's group also did well, repeating the Walton. Exotic dances again from Tonga and New Guinea, plus Balinese singers. The New Guineans, who resembled naked savages on stage, turned out to be capable of conversing in effortless English when I overheard them in the lobby afterwards.

Stylianos—now I remember—was full of jokes. One went: Do you know what ΔΕΗ, ΟΤΕ, ΕΟΤ means in Greece? Δεν Έχουμε Ηλεκτρισμό, Ούτε Τηλέφωνο Έχουμε. Έχουμε Όμως Τουρισμό. ΔΕΗ is of course the electric company, ΟΤΕ the telephone company, and ΕΟΤ the National Tourist Organization!

Working on my Kouros chapter, which is now ready to be typed into the computer.

Saturday, August 13, 1983

Marxism and literature conference. The first paper was given by Terry Eagleton of Oxford. I had a meal with him when he visited Dartmouth, hosted by Donald Pease. He spoke brilliantly on the history of criticism from a Marxist standpoint: how it developed in the coffeehouses in London in the 18th century as a movement of Universal Reason against the authoritarian judgments of the State, and was at the same time an expression of the emergent bourgeois class. He carried this forward through the 19th into the 20th century. Whereas in the 18th criticism had reflected and consolidated social forces, and been a force in the public sphere, in our own day it is sealed off in the university and is irrelevant: a coterie speaking to itself. Questioned on this, he backed away, saying he wasn't gloomy and that intellectuals in the universities still had a role to play by analyzing, etc. However, their hermetic situation won't be changed by them, but rather only by a radical change in the nature of society, which change will never come from within the universities. He spoke of F. R. Leavis's attempt to break out of the hermetic seal and to resemble the 18th century critics, but judged this attempt doomed from the start because originating from within the university, not from without. The result: another vituperative coterie.

What I've been wondering is whether any of us, any more, can claim to be the spokesmen of universal reason. Modern thought tells us no, yet we continue to yearn for this.

He gave insight into a phenomenon such as Jeff Hart, who—although I suppose in a degenerate form—is trying to be a latter-day Addison & Steele, speaking broadly to all of society's concerns, with a strong literary component. Also, he helped place Kazantzakis in the nineteenth-century milieu, where it was common to project fulfillment into a remote future, to be accomplished, as Eagleton said, by "spectral agents."

In the evening, with Μίμης and Σαλωμή, Λουκία and Nikos and children, and another couple, we went to Stavros's taverna. Chrysanthi danced a bit. Mimis sang. Good bouzouki. Lots of noise. I was OK for the first two hours; the next two were not so enjoyable. Loukia's small son, Petros, spent four hours next to the band, strumming an imaginary guitar. He was the best part of the evening.

Another joke told by Stylianos last week, appropriate for John Raszias: Two women meet. The one is famous for talking only about herself. True to form, she does this for a half hour solid, then suddenly stops and says, "But I mustn't talk only about myself. Let's give you a chance. How do you like my hat?"

Sunday, August 14, 1983

Meeting in the morning. I ministered for the first time, using Pat Scott-Craig's talk on "Give us this day our daily bread." Nice talk afterwards with a theologian teaching in Melbourne. Soulia drove us home. Walked to Melbourne baths, just reopened after renovation: pools, gym, whirlpool, sauna. Lovely.

Monday, August 15, 1983

Die Fledermaus. Amazing how limited my education has been in this sort of area. The music is so familiar, yet I never knew its origin.

Tuesday, August 16, 1983

To see Tartuffe, with Rob Jackson (classics teacher here) and his girlfriend. What a splendid play! And how contemporary, alas!

Wednesday, August 17, 1983

Began to read Tartuffe in French. It's not too difficult, especially now. Continuing with my Kazantzakis book, right now doing the 2nd draft of the chapter about his two-year stay in England and then Paris, June '46–June '48. Typing each day in the computer center.

Thursday, August 18, 1983

I lectured on Some Modern Greek Responses to the Glory that Was Greece, to the Classical Association of Victoria. Dinner before at Staff House with Ken McKay, Peter Connor and wife, Roger Scott. Small audience, but some good questions.

Friday, August 19, 1983

Incredibly, we had seventeen people for dinner: Stathis, Maria and their children Katerina and Loukia; John and Mary Vasilakakos, Soula from the Quaker Meeting; Pavlos, Angela and Nikos and the baby; Loukia, Nikos, George, and Petros; Mimis and Salome, who brought Pavlova!

Saturday, August 20, 1983

To the eighteenth-century exhibition at the Gallery. Nice Bouchards and Gainsboroughs. Then to Stylianos. We telephoned Vouli in Thessaloniki and all three spoke to her. Paula Xanthopoulou had just left Vouli. No news yet from Queensland Press. The poetry editor is on vacation. In the evening: taverna with Μαρία Ιρωδότης, who teaches at La Trobe. I sat next to a charming girl from Tasmania, a nurse. Her fiancé, a New Zealander, works on helicopters, servicing off-shore oil rigs in Western Australia, etc. Good conversation. Also some good dancing by pros, after which everyone joined in. We returned home at 1:30 a.m. to find Daphne and boyfriend still sitting in the living room. I called a taxi and sent him home. It's starting!

Sunday, August 21, 1983

Meeting for Worship lovely. Someone spoke on life and meaning, saying that modern science shows us that meaning is not separate from life but implicit in it. Vitalism invading Quakerism! Bill and Marjorie Oats, whom we knew at Woodbrooke, were there. Also a visitor from Jesus Lane Meeting in Cambridge, who knew Joy and Noel Jones, and Christian Lord. He is the bursar of Pembroke College. Then to the barbecue of the Pan-Cretan Society as Stylianos's guests. Out of town. Six acres with sheep that they kill for food when needed. Building a clubhouse. Food, music, lovely dancing again, this time Cretan soustas, etc. Stylianos uttered μεγάλα λόγια about me and my contributions, and I had to make a short speech in Greek to 300 Cretans. We returned home exhausted, mainly from the noise.

Tuesday, August 23, 1983

Dinner party for Michael and Dawn Osborne, John and Alexia Martyn, John and Erse Burke, and Stylianos Harkianakis. The archbishop had quite a different personality in English.

Denise Harvey wrote from Athens. They're still interested in Χώμα και στάχτη, though they want a subsidy in the form of guaranteed sales. We are also dickering with Queensland University Press.

Wednesday, May 24, 1983

Finished the revisions of my chapter on "Sodom and Gomorrah." I must be strong: cut, cut, cut! Now all the computer programs—Fratricides, Sodom and Gomorrah, London-Paris—must be transferred to tape.

Tasis and Popi Tamis took us to an expensive lunch at the Ilios in Lygon Street. He is a tutor at Monash, specializing in linguistics. Came to Australia for three years as a journalist and never went back. He's written an M.A. thesis on Macedonian folksong.

In the evening, I presented Ο ιπτάμενος θάλαμος to the Greek Teachers Association of Victoria. Good turnout. Mimis Sophocleous introduced me. Kypros Kyprianou is the president. Good question period afterward.

In the afternoon we walked in the Botanical Gardens with the Tamises, hoping to see spring flowers. Too early.

Thursday, August 25, 1983

To Lara to see Dennis and Beverly Dorwick. An extremely interesting day. Morning at a nearby sheep farm where we dug out of a hillside a "cutting stone" sharpened and shaped by the Aborigines. Nice husband and wife, he from Tasmania originally, she farm-bred but now teaching English to Cambodians, etc., in Lara, for extra income. The land reminded me of Ohio. Among other things, there was a McCormack horse-drawn mower just like mine. Afternoon at Geelong Grammar School, where Dennis teaches flute. Like Andover, very posh, entire building for music. Lovely location facing the bay, but they now have a Shell refinery next door.

Telephoned Alec and Leander at the farm. Alec is building a foundation wall and creosoting the logs. He'd just come from a swim. They were cooking steak outdoors for supper. We must begin adjusting to the northern hemisphere.

Friday, August 26, 1983

Marvelous performance of Antony and Cleopatra, the first time I'd ever seen it. It all came back, as though I'd had it memorized subliminally. Duty vs. passion. Reason vs. will. Our good sense tells us that duty and reason should prevail, but in the end passion is more beautiful and Enobarbus learns, to his dismay, that to be irrationally faithful is best.

Saturday, August 27, 1983

Lunch with Stylianos, who'd been in bed with neuralgia but was up. He read some of his newest poems, read them very feelingly. I suppose I'll keep on translating, but let's see what happens with Χώρα και στάχτη first.

Lovely performance of A Winter's Tale in the evening. How nice to be able to book the same day, to sit up close, and to have splendid British or British-trained actors on stage! It's a story about the blessedness of repentance, I'd say. The king, although a tyrant, repents so sincerely that all is restored to him at the end: daughter, wife, friend.

Sunday, August 28, 1983

To Quaker Meeting for the last time. Made some nice friends there, though the clerk is really insufferable. Goodbyes to Soula and to Dennis and Beverly. To Concert Hall at night for an entire evening of Greek folk dancing by dozens of different groups from different regions. Overkill for me. Started  $\frac{3}{4}$  hour late à la grecque.

Tuesday, August 30, 1983

The department had Chrysanthi and me to lunch and presented us a huge coffee-table book of photographs of Australia, very handsome, with everyone's signature. Saw Paul Tuffin at last. Apparently we were appreciated in the department. I wrote a final report trying to be honest about some of the faults. John and Mary Vasilakakos called after supper to say goodbye.

Wednesday, August 31, 1983

Melbourne–Sydney–Papeete

Mimis drove us to the airport. Morning spent frantically filling in Chrysanthi's income tax return in Collins Street. I got my computer tape to bring home: all the programs I wrote at Melbourne. Flew to Sydney and then onward to Papeete.

Wednesday, August 31, 1983

Papeete, Tahiti and Moorea, Tahiti

It's Wednesday the 31st all over again. We left at 5:15 p.m. and arrived at 6:30 a.m. the same day! No sleep, of course. Saw the movie Tootsie in the plane. A huge man nicknamed Tiny taxied us to Hôtel Tahiti. We were given Bungalow 27 and entered it to find someone already inside, asleep! Shifted to Bungalow 15 with more luck. Took Le Truck to Papeete-town. Struck up conversation with two charming native youths about 18 years old, in French, of course. They'd finished high school; the girl was working in an office; sister and brother. I felt like Captain Cook all over again, they were so friendly and "simple." Then took the "Keke III" launch to Moorea. Lovely setting for a swim and lunch. The girls are beautiful, a kind of statuesque, classic beauty. The waitresses at the hotel all wore the single-piece wrap of native fashion with no evidence of anything at all underneath! We saw lots of coral, sun-fish, goldfish, eel-like things, a starfish moving around, anemones everywhere; also bougainvillea, hibiscus, la folie des jeunes filles (another flower), coconut palms, banana trees. Flowers everywhere, and always in the girls' hair. Youths thatching a cottage. I snoozed deliciously in a lounge chair, gazing out across the lagoon to the waves breaking on the coral reef. Chrysanthi picked up bits of coral to take home. Walked around Papeete again in the evening in a light rain. Supper in a hamburger-pizza joint. I paid in dollars and the proprietor credited them at the proper rate instead of the scandalously low rate imposed by a Chinese owner earlier when we bought Daphne a T-shirt. Vous êtes honnête, I said to him. Oui, he answered, ou stupide! Then he crowned Daphne with a wreath of bougainvillea. We slept like the dead in our comfortable bungalow after listening to Tahitan music for an hour and drinking their exquisite mélange des jus.

September 1, 1983

Hôtel Tahiti

French bread and French coffee for breakfast. Chrysanthi et moi, nous avons pris le truck pour aller en ville. Nous avons fait des acheter: une toile pour Chrysanthi, avec des fleurs polynesiens, aussi une corale blanche, très delicate, aussi un baguette et du fromage pour le déjeuner. Alors, nous avons mis les maillots pour nager dans le piscine devant le lagoon, avec le massif de Moorea en bas. La piscine est plein des garçons et jeunes filles qui parlent français; au bord se trouvent des femmes à demi-nues qui font le thérapie du soleil. Partout on trouve des fruits dans les arbres—c'est vraiment le paradis où on ne travail pas pour manger. Je me suis inquiété au petit déjeuner quand on a annonce que tous les vols était en retard aujourd'hui jusqu'à vingt heures. Alors j'ai téléphoné à l'agence de Quantas, où on m'a dit que tout ira demain à l'heure. Nous verrons. . . . J'ai découvert que je n'ai pas oublié le français! C'est bon ici parce que les gens vous parlent avec beaucoup de volonté, n'importe qu'on ne parle pas bien.

Au marché aujourd'hui nous avons vu aussi des fleurs tropicals partout.

Dans l'après-midi nous sommes allés dans le bateau au fond de verre. Le guide était un Tahitan beau come Apollo. Il nous a mène dehors du coral reef, ou on voit des corails, des sea cucumber, des anemones, des sea urchins (blanches et noirs), et—bien entendu—plusieurs espèces des poissons polychromatiques. Au fin de la tour, notre Apollo a entré la mer avec oxygène. a descendu au fond avec de la nourriture pour les poissons, et nous a coupé un sea urchin que nous pouvons examiner après. A la termination du tour, nous sommes rentrés en ville pour faire un promenade avant de manger dans un restaurant français. J'ai pris un filet mignon magnifique, Chrysanthi a pris un poulet délicieux, et Daphne, qui est devenue végétarienne, a pris une salade. À l'hôtel nous avons finis le jour avec un autre mélange de jus.

Vendredi, 2 septembre 1983

Tahiti-Los Angeles

Le vol était trios heures en retard. Monsieur "Tiny" est venu à l'hôtel pour nous conduire à l'aerodrome. Je lui a demandé s'il y a un movement contre les Français ici. Il m'a dit que les gens qui veulent l'indépendance ne font que deux percent de la population. Tout va bien pour nous, il dit. Nous ne payons aucun impôt. Les Français, avec des impôts que viennent de la France, construisent tous les chemins, les écoles, les hôpitals. Tous le monde a d' assurance maladie gratuite. L'éducation est gratuite. Si un élève veut continuer à l'université, il va à Paris où il étudie gratuit. Les hôtels sont américains, mais la plupart des profit mène ici parce qu'on ne peut pas exporter de l'argent. En somme, c'est paradis!

Saturday, September 3, 1983

San Francisco

At Hotel Claremont 1:30 a.m. after hours in the airport finding a locker, etc. Mob scene. Chaos. Today I took Daphne and Chrysanthi to Universal Studios. Then Tim Golden drove us around the city, and finally to Venice to walk on the beach. Supper at his home on Pacific Palisades. Other guests. Father a psychiatrist. Tim drove us to the airport to catch the "red-eye" to Boston.

Sunday, September 4, 1983

Avis car to Hanover. Home!

September 23, 1983

Cambridge, Massachusetts

I delivered the address at the first event of the Kazantzakis Centennial celebration, in Boylston Hall, which was packed—standing room only in the aisles and back. Good audience. Laughs, applause, enthusiasm. Overnight at the Harvard Club with Chrysanthi. Nice to see Harvard friends again. Daphne interviewed. I set her up with various students and she responded so positively that she decided to withdraw her early action application at Yale and to submit it instead to Harvard.

October 8, 1983

Hanover

Nice celebration for Henry Ehrmann: a festschrift, etc., etc. honoring him on his 70th birthday.

October 10–11, 1983

Minary Center

Ivy League Conference of writing directors. Chris Flug here from Harvard, and Richard Marius. Jennifer Joseph, Alan Gaylord, Karl Krum from Dartmouth. On the 11th Chris returned with me and I set her up to learn about English 2 and Intensive Academic Support (IAS).

October 13, 1983

New York

Went to O'Neal's Bar on 43rd Street with mother, to see the show Marisa Smith has produced, with her husband as star. A cabaret review. Mediocre, but with some good moments.

October 14–15, 1983

Wallingford

Pendle Hill General Board. I clerked. Apparently it went well. My desire has been to avoid the stiffness and farce of the Haverford Corporation.

October 16, 1983

Weston

Kinhaven Board. We dispensed with the services of Palmer Goodrich, another move toward Board independence. But lots of flack from Lelah Dushkin regarding the budget.

October 27–30, 1983

New York, Prince George Hotel

MGSA symposium on Greece in a European context. As president, I spoke at the banquet, before Mrs. Kazantzakis, and at the summing up on Sunday morning. Brademas, who opened the festivities, was awful; Stavrianos was incorrigibly leftist. But the regular panels the next few days were fine. I was gratified, since I organized the literary side. Interviewed Carabas and Papademetre for Sydney.

October 30, 1983

Philadelphia

To Alec's, then to Tom Wood's for tea. He is taking leave from Friends Central to direct Alan Cranston's campaign in the Philadelphia area, as a Quaker concern. He wondered why I didn't apply for a college presidency. Thence to Philadelphia. Academy with Joan Tyers. Magnificent concert by King's Singers: sacred, secular, barbershop, cabaret, everything superb.

October 31, 1983

Lunch with Alec in Narberth. Then Kinhaven finance committee at the Hilton with Jerry, Alice. Then train to Washington.

November 1, 1983

Washington, Embassy Row Hotel

In luxury, thanks to the Greek Embassy (George Varlamvanos). I spoke, as did Mrs. Kazantzakis, Patroclus Stavrou, and Thanasis Maskaleris, at the Library of Congress, Mumford Room, James Madison Building. David Kraus chaired. Good audience but not so good as at Cambridge last September. Keeley, Decavalles, and Veis spoke in the afternoon on other poets. Saw Michael Tobias's video on Kazantzakis. Όχι πρόστυχο, as Mrs. K. commented. Stavrou expatiated on her woes, how publishers cheat her, etc. (Later we learned that he's her heir!) ΑΜΤΡΑΚ home, with Κατερίνα Αγγελάκη-Rooke.

November 2-4, 1983

Hanover

Katerina here. Gave poetry reading (good!) on Thursday night. Dick Eberhart was impressed. I drove her to the airport at 6:30 a.m. on the 4th, but the plane was canceled. Put her on a bus to Boston. She arrived in Ithaca 20 minutes before her lecture there! Nice visit.

Friday, November 18, 1983

Philadelphia

At Haverford. Lunch with Ellen Rose. Her tears after telephone call from A-1 scholar coming to the college to be interviewed for Ellen's job. Drink, afterwards, in University of Pennsylvania Faculty Club with Don White. He is persona non grata in Libya because he is publishing findings of his dig not there but here. His belongings, house, etc. will be confiscated. Looked down on our cruise as a kind of pandering and prostitution to the bored rich. Then: board meeting at Pendle Hill. In the middle Charlie Brown turned pale and all but collapsed. Ambulance came within ten minutes. P.A.s, etc., so solicitous and efficient. The best side of America. Long walk with Andy Towl after the meeting. He walks one or two miles each night before retiring.

Saturday, November 19, 1983

Philadelphia

Pendle Hill board in the morning. Then to Centrum Philadelphia publishers. Dalia Miller. They want to specialize in Greek. Eva and Peter Topping were there also. Toured the establishment. Then nice lunch in the Belview Stratford Hotel on Broad Street (the legionnaires' disease hotel, where we took Joan Tyers!). Joan had gone to Seneca to demonstrate against missiles. Sign: From England, with love. We send them missiles and they send us love!

Nice to see Donald Swann at Pendle Hill again.

Thence to NYC and the usual.

November 21, 1983

Hanover

Mr. Fisk of the New York Times interviewed me (and others) re: the use of computers in the humanities. An article should appear.

November 24, 1983

Pleasant Thanksgiving except that parents didn't come. My father felt that he couldn't make it, alas. Alec and Leander are here. Also Irv and Fran Shapiro, Walter and Miriam Arndt, Jay Parini. Shapiros showed slides of their Ireland trip. Then Scott Samuelson, Alec's friend, came in with Joan, his sister. She's the one who placed first in the Boston Marathon two years in a row. Trying for the Olympics next. We all told stories of encounters with presidents: Irv with Nixon, I with Johnson, Joan Samuelson with Jimmy Carter at the White House. Carter came out best, by far. Joan runs 15 to 20 miles a day, training. Such a modest, sweet girl, but she must have an extraordinary drive hidden somewhere. John Rassias came along also, after dinner. We are scheming to produce a TESL book together, and I also have a New Testament Greek method up my sleeve. He's off tomorrow to Hollywood—has just finished another film. After everyone left and the Shapiros retired, the boys and Chrysanthi and I talked far into the night, mostly about Chrysanthi's life in Greece under the Germans and during the civil war.

November 25, 1983

Hanover

Finally, got my Fratricides article off to Bill McNeill for JMGS. Ivar Ivask asked me to write a lead article on William Golding, who has received the Nobel Prize, to everyone's surprise.

The Shapiros stayed, because of a snowstorm. Irv spoke to Leander at length about Outi, who appears to be the worst kind of feminist, espousing principles out of hatred and neurosis.

November 26, 1983

Worked all day on Harkianakis poems.

November 27, 1983

Kate Harvey appeared, out of the blue. Svelte and beautiful, as we'd known her a decade ago before she entered the cave of mental illness. She hopes to become a registered nurse eventually—will be taking the exam for nurse's aide this week. I think she's still on medication and perhaps has relapses, but yesterday she seemed fine. Sheila was beaming, of course.

The Harkianakis poems are now much better, I think, but still no publisher.

English 2 teachers were here for pot luck supper, with Jennifer Joseph and son. Also had to play host to Sean Black, son of Don Black of San Francisco, whom we met on the cruise.

December 21, 1983

Daphne was accepted by Harvard, early action, one of 1600 out of 13,000 applicants over the past few years. Thank goodness; otherwise our Christmas would have been ruined. She had 20 classmates here for supper after which they all went to a formal dance. It's starting!

December 23, 1983

With Chris Brown, Gary Mitchener, Mayme and Lafayette Noda, I visited Senator Rudman in Concord to protest U.S. military aid to Central America. He is most impressive; a forceful speaker; intense; knowledgeable. He told me that he reads a book a day; he's an insomniac, sleeps only four hours a night; doesn't go to parties. Reads reads reads. Gave us a sense of what it's like when you have to make decisions rapidly, on the best evidence available, even though you know full well it's incomplete or biased. He got angry when Mayme implied that he just followed the Reagan line. No, he voted with Reagan sometimes, against him other times, and also against his constituents—e.g., on foreign aid. A most educational visit, more for us than for him, I fear.

Continued on to Boston, bought Daphne a Harvard sweatshirt (!), relaxed over a sherry in John Williams House Senior Common Room, then met Βούλη at Logan Airport. She's arrived from Greece to spend the holidays here.

December 24, 1983

Telephoned Stylianos in Sydney. Chrysanthi, Daphne, Vouli, and I spoke—rapidly! Daphne asked, "How is your hat?" (the old joke).

December 25, 1983

Off to NYC for Christmas dinner. Vouli, too.

1984

---

January–December, Hanover

Philadelphia, Pendle Hill	January 20–21
Boston, NYC for MGSA	January 27–29
Boston	February 3
Philadelphia	February 20
Boston, NYC	March 1–2
Boston, NYC, Philadelphia	March 8–11
NYC	April 8
New Haven for Yale, Princeton	April 12–15
Cleveland	April 27–29
Commuting between Riparius and Hanover	June–August
Rutgers	September 20, October 18, November 15
Cambridge, Providence, Cambridge	November 1–3
Cambridge	November 30–December 1
NYC, Washington, Du Pont Plaza Hotel	December 25–30

February 6, 1984

The faculty passed our COP recommendation against the reinstatement of NROTC—almost 120 to 50. My heart was going pitter-patter. I was in large part responsible for the final draft of the COP report, having edited what the committee wrote. Apparently the report convinced our colleagues. McLaughlin will be furious, of course.

March 16–17, 1984

Elizabeth and Michael Jeffreys, from Sydney, were with us overnight with their daughter Catharine. Nice party on Saturday with Charlie Wood and Peter and June Travis. Steve Scher flew in to leave his cappuccino machine with us for safekeeping while he goes off to Hungary and Germany. I took the Jeffreys to Town Meeting in the morning and was proud of our democracy, the quality of the debate, the excellence of the moderator.

The new Quaker meetinghouse is almost ready—43 Lebanon Street.

It will be beautiful. Let's hope that even those who have been complaining about the way the decision was made will repent.

For the first time (!), I got really adverse criticism regarding my course in Conrad-Lawrence-Joyce, together with enthusiasm in some quarters, it is true. Students complained that I was too scholarly, read my lectures, spoke above their heads. One was furious at the exam, the short answers part. Others complained that the discussions didn't go well, which of course must have been their fault, too.

Daphne was accepted at Haverford but seems to be inclining toward Harvard so far. Haverford is safer for her, Harvard more risky, but more of an adventure probably.

This was a grueling term. English 3 wore me down. I never knew what to do in the class periods. Then there was ROTC—hours and hours, followed by the search committee for a dean to replace Hans Penner. Probably I didn't give as much effort to the novel course as I should have. Now it's break period. I've spent most of it doing my income tax for 1983 and preparing for an audit of the return for 1982. Some holiday! But the day with the Jeffreys was different, and pleasant.

Next term should be better; only one course, a senior seminar.

One bright spot this term was the presence here of John Tallmadge as visiting professor of environmental science. We lunched and dined repeatedly, always with an easy flow of conversation. He introduced me to his colleague and "roommate" Grant Phelps Thompson, a Washington lawyer also teaching as a visitor in environmental science, and a Quaker: clerk of Florida Avenue Meeting. Nice man, very mellow. We exchanged clerking stories. I've asked to be relieved at Pendle Hill. Enough is enough.

I was asked to lecture at the inauguration of the Elytis Chair at Rutgers next fall. Three lectures on Modern Greek poetry, for $5000! Big time!

Dia has accepted a job at BC. Diana Haas will replace her. George Savidis will stay an extra year. Meg Alexiou is all but appointed as his successor, owing in some part to a very strong letter from me, according to Greg Nagy and Albert Henrichs.

I've been negotiating with Stephen Graubard, editor of Daedalus, for a MGSA/Daedalus conference on Greece and Turkey. All this came about because of our chance meeting when Ihor Ševčenko took me to lunch at the Academy last spring. Now we'll see if the MGSA Executive Committee will accept. They may find the big time too threatening.

Tom Wood, Alec's headmaster at Friends Central, was here for the NH Democratic primary. Of course his candidate, Cranston, did miserably. I voted for him, out of embarrassment.

Leander came with Outi, newly arrived again from Helsinki. She's much more open—smiles, talks, jokes. I took her to lunch at the Inn and had a splendid tête-à-tête, which of course was misunderstood by Chrysanthi, causing us a few days' hostility. But we got over it. I'm all for Outi while Chrysanthi is 100% negative. She's threatened by a woman who thinks and who has feminist views.

Saw three Beckett one-actors in New York recently: Catastrophe, etc. Haunting if not always comprehensible. His vitality (even if it expends itself on moribundi) is extraordinary. Always new ways to say the same thing.

April 23, 1984

Cleveland

The Cleveland Museum of Art has a magnificent El Greco, the Crucifixion, and another one almost as startling: Mary, Christ, and Mary Magdalene, in which Mary's blue robe dominates. The Crucified Christ in the first canvas is weightless, already ascending on high. Also a nice Rembrandt: "Old Man Praying." I went with Annouska Remmert and her friend Donna, after a nice lunch of escargot and paté. Then I spoke on "the Glory that Was Greece" to the Hellenic Cultural Society. Seemed to go well. So many doctors, surgeons, some confessing to me a starvation regarding literature. One, a Cretan, actually pulled out an epic on '21, in the scansion of Erotokritos! How warm the Greeks are! Contrast the Dartmouth crowd of last night (though they were very gracious). I spoke about "Why I Teach at Dartmouth." They dined me at the Theatre Club after—the new complex designed by Philip Johnson. Our Dartmouth affair was across the street from Fenn College, now part of Cleveland State. Memories of '61! Annouska is a vivacious Greek from Thessaloniki, married to a stolid American. I hope I don't seem that way to outsiders. Probably do. She craves the noise of Athens, languishes in the dullness of Cleveland. But the city is reviving. Even the lake is no longer lethal. Ανάσταση!

April 29, 1984

Hanover

After flying in from Cleveland, I visited 43 Lebanon Street, our new meetinghouse. Treat Arnold designed it well. The meeting room is cosy, intimate, and has lots of character, yet is utterly simple.

Daphne is going to Harvard. We had to say no to Haverford. Let's pray that this wasn't a mistake. But I'm hopeful.

May 3, 1984

Stavros Souliopoulos is here, the first of our Greek «relatives» to set foot in the new world. A fine, ambitious person. Leander came with Outi and two Finnish friends. At lunch at the Faculty Club we had the bizarre situation of two Finns at one end of the table who spoke no English or French, and one Greek at the other end who likewise spoke no English or French. Leander was in his element, translating the menu (more or less) into both Finnish and Greek.

May 11, 1984

To Manchester to the Harvard Club dinner for new matriculants. Professor Fairbank, the Sinologist, spoke marvelously about the Chinese Revolution. We sat with the Schumanns. Saw Jim Shanahan's parents afterward. I felt pleased for Daphne, to be in a place with people the caliber of Fairbank. He said that not one top official of our government had ever lived abroad. How do we expect them to deal with other peoples with any understanding?

May 12, 1984

Supper at the Schumanns'. One guest turned out to be Paul Sanderson, my Deerfield classmate. We didn't realize this at first, but after we "connected," out came wonderful stories about Mr. Boyden. Sanderson was headmaster of Suffield Academy. Now, "retired," he sends high school children for periods abroad, and brings Europeans here, placing them in U.S. independent schools.

May 13, 1984

Dedication of our new Meeting House at 43 Lebanon Street. A fine meeting. I ministered, talking about the two El Grecos—the madonna so colorful, the crucifixion so wan, birth and death, spring and winter. The paintings hang side by side in Cleveland, and we, I suppose, hang in the middle, or should, partaking of both. Tom Ewell, new field secretary of NEYM, spoke afterwards. Lots of singing; good food; very festive. Only Bob Daubenspeck boycotted us. Even Becky Williams came. Joe Connelly, dying of cancer, tried to smile, but broke down once and cried, as did Emily. We're having a special meeting for him tomorrow.

Dwight Lahr was chosen as the Dean of Faculty. Nice to have him in the Meeting.

My photo appeared the magazine section of the New York Times in an article about computing in the humanities at Dartmouth and elsewhere. The caption read, "Professor Roger Masters of Dartmouth conducts a government class"! A month ago my photo appeared in the Daily Dartmouth, and the caption read, "John Noble." I'm getting lots of ribbing about this, but I think I did better than Masters!

I have shortened and revised my old Columbia seminar paper on D. H. Lawrence's criticism, for presentation at the MLA next December.

Next, I pulled out the essay I did on Thomas Mann's séance scene in Der Zauberberg and am revising this for possible publication. It's fun to work with the German, which I remember as if in a dream, but really do not remember. However, the novel is marvelous. What fun to go back to it, as to an old friend.

May 14, 1984

Lunch with Czeslaw Milosz, the Nobel laureate Polish poet. Lawrence Davies was there (he's editing the Conrad letters), and some students. Milosz talked about realism vs. subjectivism, praising Polish poets for avoiding the latter. He read some fine poems from his anthology of Polish poets. Afterwards, I asked him if he scorned America and Americans (he had accused American poets, from Whitman onward, of being too subjective). He said Yes, he had, at first, when he arrived after the war. But then he confirmed, interestingly, "Yet I came to realize that in every nation, including America, there are huge demonic forces. These were evident—all too evident—in Europe, obviously. But they are also evident in America. Just go to New York. There you see them willy-nilly. So I could no longer scorn America as being naïve and unreal." He went on in a manner that I found especially illuminating. "In Poland and many other European countries," he said, "the demonic forces find their outlet in the political life, through police surveillance, repressions, arrests, general fear, etc. In America and other capitalist nations, these same forces find their outlet in economic life, via poverty, the bums and bag ladies sleeping on the streets in New York and met with indifference by the general populace, etc. In communist societies, fear takes a political form, and the attempt to overcome this fear also takes a political form. In capitalist societies, fear takes an economic form. No one in Poland worries about starving or being ill housed, or being abandoned in old age. In America these fears are real. The attempt to overcome such fears takes the form of the acquisitive drive that of course is blessed by society. Deep down, the compulsion we see in America to make huge sums of money, and then still huger sums, derives from this fear, though probably subconsciously. And this, most deeply, is why American society will never eliminate economic fear by providing the kind of social assurance given by socialist countries—why, because once the economic fear is removed, the acquisitive drive will have lost its psychological justification. Somehow the elite know, perhaps subconsciously, that their position depends on the maintenance of economic fear and injustice at the other end of the social spectrum. This is the form taken by demonic forces in America.” He added that this basic psychological problem is really what divides us from the communists and they from us, making attempts at cooperation futile.

Same day: dinner with three of my best students: John Van Aalst, who is writing an autobiographical novel under my direction, Mark Schoening, and Paul Agostinelli, who got A's earlier this year. John is most interesting, a born-again Christian, gentle, caring, extremely talented. His mother is a Palestinian Arab; he grew up in India.

May 17, 1984

Sloan grant meeting. We are going to move ahead with our computer projects.

Daphne played solo in the first movement of “Spring” from Vivaldi’s “Seasons.” This was her last concert with the Hanover High School orchestra and also was Helen Goodwin’s retirement concert after 32 years struggling to keep music alive in Hanover. Tributes, a cake, flowers, etc.

My student Richard Colman turned in a brilliant play about a Vietnam vet in Queens who goes manic because of his drug habit, at a Christmas party with his family.

Last night, the film “Bounty,” about Bligh, Fletcher Christian, and of course Tahiti. Μέτριο!

June–August 1984

Commuted from the farm to Hanover to teach English 57. Lots of visits to Kinhaven as well, since Daphne was a student and Leander a piano instructor. His amazing student is Ignat Solzhenitsyn, son of the author, an eleven-year-old prodigy. Also funny Walter Chestnut, son of the band conductor.

September 20, 1984

In Penn Station, a man tapped me on the shoulder and said, “I’m Lloyd McNeill. I recognized you by your voice.” I last saw him in 1964. He played flute with our group, and left a painting of Allan Munck, John Stewart, himself, and me, also transformed into Negroes. I went to Rutgers to give the first of my lectures inaugurating the Elytis Chair. Dinner with the president (Blaustein) and Archbishop Iakovos, etc. Iakovos, afterwards, said that, contrary to my thesis, there was nothing mysterious about poetry. He wanted to keep το μυστήριο his own specialty, apparently. He was also intrigued, as was Bishop Silas, with my statement that Romanos the Melodist was of Jewish origin. Alec came to the lecture. The next day I spoke at the ceremony honoring Andonis Decavalles on occasion of the publication of his collected poems, translated by Kimon Friar. Very warm occasion. Dinner afterwards with Poppi and Andonis.

October 18, 1984

Second Rutgers lecture. On folk song. They objected when I said that the Κλέφτες weren’t patriots. Alec came again. Next: to Pendle Hill for the General Board session on the Pendle Hill pamphlets. I am the new clerk of the Publications Committee. Van Gogh exhibit at the Met.

November 3, 1984

To Harvard for Daphne’s Parents’ Day. Also to Brown for tutors’ conference. Ken Bruffee spoke brilliantly on the conceptualization of the “peer tutoring revolution,” placing it in the context of structuralist philosophy. We brought twelve tutors. Then back to Cambridge for dinner with Steve Baran, whom I hadn’t seen since 1950, and his wife Bernin, with Chrysanthi and Daphne. He is a social worker but not doing case work, rather consulting research, etc. Spoke of Neil Hastie, who was too radical for the Episcopal Church, wears his collar but has no congregation. The usual!

November 15, 1984

Third and last lecture at Rutgers. Faithful Alec came again and endured despite a stomach upset. I don't think the audience understood much, except for one young man who came up afterwards to chat. He has asked for all three lectures in hard copy. Actually, Rutgers wants to publish them. Party afterwards. A man lectured me for 45 minutes on Arnold Toynbee as a traitor to the Greeks. Students made an ice cream cake with a poem by Elytis and a ευχαριστώ to me. Fun. But exhausting. Tonio Tripolitis gave me my fee of $5000 (!) on the spot. Will pay for the NH tax-exempt bond I just purchased.

Earlier, lunch at Yale Club with Chrysanthi and my mother. Mother clearly now held prisoner, almost, by father. He is pathetic. Won't do anything because of his self-pitying self-absorption. If she suggests anything unusual he gets palpitations and accuses her of vile intent, just about.

November 16-17, 1984

By AVIS to Kendal at Longwood, with a stop at the Brandywine Museum for the Andrew Wyeth exhibit. His "touch" is very evident in every painting. Lovely setting by the river. At Kendal, 1½ hours with Lloyd Lewis discussing his philosophy and also the chances of developing a similar center in Hanover. Then lunch at Crosslands with Anna Jones. Saw Emily Wilson and Marie Condon accidentally. Anna looks splendid. Walks three miles each day, goes to Symphony fortnightly, had 16 family members to dinner last Sunday. Lloyd says that Kendal/Crosslands puts five to ten years on people's lives. What a contrast to my parents! I'm very tempted to register. Chrysanthi seemed impressed as well.

Long drive back to Philadelphia to return the car. Fire at 30th Street stopped SEPTA. Luckily Alec came and got us, drove me to Pendle Hill. Chrysanthi went with him to a Friends Central play. At PH saw Steve Stalonas after six years. Impressive man. Talked about the nature of silence. My view of the sacerdotal quality of silence is not true to early Quakerism, he says. For them, the silence had no value in itself; it was just an empty receptacle, and the important thing was for it to be filled with enlightenment. Also talked about why God cannot have a name. He says it's anthropological, the move beyond Shamanism. Boring Board meeting Friday night. Ice cream with Colman and Astrid Dorsey afterwards, and Barbara Parsons: we woke up at last. Saturday better. I talked about PH pamphlets, lessons from past meetings of the General Board.

Alec and Chrysanthi arrived. We drove to the Philadelphia Museum of Art to see the Jonathan Borovsky show. Fascinating. He creates his own world of fantasy that is at the same time “real,” touching our political lives and also our dream lives.

November 18, 1984

At Meeting, I ministered on the life and witness of Ken Webb, who died ten days ago. Nice to see Henry Williams at Meeting after a long absence owing to illness.

November 30, 1984

Impulsively, drove with Chrysanthi to Cambridge to hear the Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra (with Daphne playing violin), Jimmy Yannatos conducting. What a fine sound in Sanders theater. They did Smetana’s The Moldau with a senior as guest conductor, doing beautifully; then Britten’s The Young Person’s Guide to the Orchestra—such a fanciful work—which the orchestra did splendidly, since they have spectacular section leaders for the main instruments displayed. The second half: Brahms’s 1st, the 4th movement especially was sonorous and deep in every way. We had other pleasures, too. The person sitting in back of me tapped me on the shoulder and identified herself as a Kinhaven graduate who remembered Leander and Alec, etc. Dale Pratt. Then Steve Mitchell rushed over to say a warm hello. We caught up on some of our news. Also saw Christine, his girlfriend. Plans for a dinner next time. Betty Clendenning was there, too, to hear Joy. And Scotti, Daphne’s friend who spent Thanksgiving with us. And Marie, Daphne’s roommate, whom we took for a Chinese supper before the concert. Daphne went off to a party in Lowell House afterwards. We had croissants and cappuccino in Au Bon Pain, with folk singers blaring outside, then walked to Brattle Street. The whole square has been beautifully refurbished.

December 1, 1984

Slept over in the Harvard Faculty Club. Worked in Widener in the morning, reading Virginia Woolf’s Diary, the last volume, also Dimaras’s History for an article I’m doing for Ivask on Greek poetry vs. prose. Lunch with Daphne in “The Garage.” Then we discussed her paper on Olympia as a religious manifestation. She’s doing this for Expos. I gave her lots of ideas on how to relate it to the Olympics just passed in Los Angeles, etc. Also discussed her next paper: on Saint Francis. She wanted to do Francis and Giotto but I urged her to do Kazantzakis's interpretation.

A lovely twenty-four hours: mini vacation. At home, sent Daphne basic information on Sabatier, the Little Flowers, etc.—my old self coming back Pappous fell last week and broke his leg, which has now been pinned. He's in New York Hospital, complaining as usual. Alice is in New York for a few days. My parents' situation is desperate. One thinks of how different it would have been at Kendal. I wrote for the brochure of the new Quaker home being built outside of Haverford, which seems the most attractive of all. The Arndts are signed up for Guilford, North Carolina.

Working with Elise Boulding and Leonard Rieser to institute a Peace Studies program here, in response to the threat of returning ROTC. Andy Towl gave me a lead—the Bakers—who might give money. We'll visit them in New York in January.

Tuesday, December 25, 1984, Christmas

Drove to NYC with Daphne and Chrysanthi. We brought the entire Christmas dinner this time; my mother was not up to it. Father totally blind now, and very depressed after breaking his leg. Walks with a walker but since he can't see has to be directed: "Two steps forward, turn 90 degrees, one step back, the chair is in back of you, sit." Awful. At night he's urinating continually, can't find the urinal, spills the urine in the bed and onto the floor. Mother has to get up each time, so has no sleep. Truly we become infants once again. But the worst of all is his depression. He keeps calling himself worthless, a jerk, says he wants to die. Physically, he's doing well, healing. . . . But . . .

Bubbles came for coffee, "bubbling" as always. At least mother has her in the building.

Wednesday, December 26, 1984

Worked on my MLA paper in the Yale Club. Chrysanthi and Daphne went to the Van Gogh exhibit at the Met. We all converged at the Plymouth Theater at 2:00 for Stoppard's play "The Real Thing." Including mother. Jeremy Irons acted superbly in the lead. Good theater in general, about the convergence of "art" and "reality" . . . maybe.

After the show, they went home and I went to the Sloan-Kettering Institute at Memorial Hospital to visit Paul Davidoff. He was scheduled for chemotherapy on Thursday. He told me that the cancer had infested his lungs. But he still was active, had worked regularly since the operation, was about to start litigation against the town of Long Beach for zoning discrimination against the poor, etc. He'd lost his hair from previous treatment. Said he'd also tried "alternative" cures: faith healing, diet, etc., including one man who'd subsequently been indicted as a crook. Tomorrow he was going to receive a new type of chemotherapy not even approved yet by the federal regulation agency. Would return in three weeks for another treatment. Carla was there, and Dan, and the other boy, and Linda. We sat for an hour or so and had a jolly time reminiscing about Atlantic Beach and other common experiences. Surely it was his way of saying goodbye forever, though this was not mentioned. He'd given a huge party the week before—another way, I think.

Thursday, December 27, 1984

For Alec, bought Racine's Oeuvres completes downtown in a French bookstore on Fifth Avenue and 19th Street. Wonderful place. Third floor all fine bindings. Worked at the Yale Club. Lunch there with Chrysanthi and Daphne. Then 8th and 43rd. Club car to Washington. Dupont Plaza Hotel. Renewed acquaintance with the marvelous D.C. subway. MLA. Serendipity: discovered Benny Hill on TV late at night.

Friday, Decmeber 28, 1984

MLA all day. Supper with Grant Thompson, Sandra T., and John Tallmadge at Grant's house. Very compatible. It's nice to know that it's still possible to make new friends at this stage.

Saturday, December 29, 1984

MLA in the morning. Lunch with Steve Wheeler, former student, now doing disarmament work in D.C. Talked about placing students for internships should we develop a War-Peace Studies program at Dartmouth. He has hung on for four years, barely subsisting. MGSA session on theater was run well by Stratos Constantinidis. Then I dashed to the other hotel to give my paper on Lawrence's Critical Philosophy. Brian Gallagher was there, also Dick Dellamora. Well received. They want to publish it. Dashed back to MGSA session: business meeting. Addie Pollis arrived. She told me that Paul had died! Shock. Apparently early Thursday morning. He went into convulsions while receiving the chemotherapy. This means that I was the last one, apart from family, to see him alive. But the show had to go on. My presidential address/valediction after a three-year term. Election to Executive Committee. Elections of new officers: Diamandouros, Confoudakis, Hartigan, Chioles. Plans for Columbus Symposium. I left at 7:30 to have supper with Constantinidis and another speaker. Then at 10:00 p.m. went for a beer with Dellamora, now openly gay but no matter. Also saw Mary Dobbie, earlier.

Sunday, December 30, 1984

Breakfast with Brian Gallagher and Marian Askin and Ann, 2¼ year old. Train to NYC. Met Iatrides and Pollis. In Penn Station she called about Paul's memorial service, but we had missed it. At 20 E. 74th I learned to my relief that mother and Chrysanthi had gone that morning. Drove to Hanover. My mother distraught at our departure. We'll probably have to bring them to Hanover.

Monday, December 31, 1984

Party at Genevieve Williamson's. Saw Louis Cornell, whom Mary Dobbie wished to be remembered to. Then to Rassiases' for the annual feast of snails. John knew of my friendship with Paul and had kindly telephoned NYC when he read the obituary in the Times. We've been feasting together for fifteen years. How nice!

1985

---

Hanover	January–May
Jan. 9–11, Amherst
Jan. 18–19, Philadelphia
February 15–16, Cambridge
February 23, NYC
March 1, Cambridge
March 5–6, Columbus, Ohio
March 9–13, Philadelphia
March 22–24, NYC
April 19–22, Philadelphia, Amish country
April 25–26, Cambridge
April 29, Washington
May 11–12, Amherst, Riparius
May 17–19, Philadelphia, Fellowship Farm
Commuting between Riparius and Hanover	June–August
Boston, Rome, Athens	August 28–29
Greece	August 29–September 20
August 29–30, Hotel Grande Bretagne, Athens
August 31, Delphi, Hotel Amalia, Hosios Loukas
September 1, Mycenae, Epidauros
September 2, Pylos, Bassae, Olympia
September 3, Mystra, Monemvasia
September 4, Santorini
September 5, Lindos, Rhodes
September 6, Ephesus
September 7, Troy
September 8, Istanbul
September 9, Samothrace
September 10–12, Athens, Esperia Palace Hotel, Stadiou 22, Athens 10564, tel. 3238.001
September 12–20, c/o G. Giannakos, Plastira 1A, Kalamaria, Thessaloniki
Vienna, Pension Arenburg, Stenbeuring 2 (Olympia restaurant, Kartnerstr. 10)	September 21–23

Paris, Hotel Jeanne d'Arc, rue Jarente 3, September 24–26
 Paris 75004, tel 887.62.11

Driebruggen, Holland, c/o Wim Bakker September 27–28

Woodbrooke College, September 28–December 16
 1046 Bristol Road, Birmingham B29 6LJ

October 21–22, Göteborg, Sweden, Hotel Lindson, Hvitfeldtspatsen 4, S-411 20 Göteborg, tel. 031.10 19 20

October 23–25, Stockholm, Host Hans Ruge, Stiftelsen Wenner-Gren Center, Sveavägen 166, 133 46 Stockholm, tel 08 15 17 00

October 25, Uppsala

October 26, Copenhagen, Hotel Astoria 4, Banegardspladsen,
 D-1570, Copenhagen V, tel 01 141419

October 27, Copenhagen, Göteborg, Heathrow, Birmingham

October 31, Oxford, chez Peter Mackridge

November 2, London

November 7, Oxford

November 11–12, Leeds and York

November 14–15, Cambridge

November 25, London

November 30, Bristol

December 15, London

Birmingham, Heathrow, Boston December 16
 Hanover December 17–31

Tuesday, January 1, 1985

Quaker party at our house. Nodas, Audrey Logan, Soderbergs, Corindias, and also Ellen Kahn and Don Stewart. Μεζεδάρια, multiple deserts, then silly games and Audrey's Trivia game. Very relaxing and friendly.

Wednesday, January 2, 1985

Students back today. Classes tomorrow. Ugh! I'm tired already. Outi telephoned from Finland. Where is Leander? I told her: in Greece. She'd expected him somehow in Helsinki.

Well, as the new year begins, I'm no longer an officer of MGSA (although still on the Executive Board and still associate editor of the journal, which will get Ernestine Friedl as editor beginning in September), and no longer on the Kinhaven Board and no longer clerk of the Pendle Hill General Board. All these withdrawals I've desired, to free me for next year's push on the Kazantzakis book. But will I be left high and dry in the long run? Problems of retirement begin to assume more reality. Lloyd Lewis is coming on February 14 to talk about the proposed Quaker retirement community for this area.

January 9–11, 1985

At Hampshire College for a conference on peace studies. The new dean at Hampshire, Harmon Dunathan, turned out to be a kind of double: we shared so many things in common—Haverford, Kendal, even a Greek wife! Leo Marx was the chief speaker: don't teach contemporary technicalities, teach history, the background to misunderstanding. A horribly liberated woman said that masculinity was totally to blame. I countered by invoking hermaphroditism and was called old-fashioned. Dinner at Adele Simmons'. She's the president of Hampshire, very involved in peace issues: lovely, small children, a very different kind of woman. Afterwards, lunch in the Lord Jeff with John Petropulos. Ansia is at the New School. John never finished his history of Greece. He says, half jokingly, that he wants new experiences in life. Instead of writing books, to go to Nicaragua and cut sugar cane. But he really wants to write on the Greek αντίσταση.

January 18–19, 1985

Pendle Hill Publications Committee, then Board. Andy Towl briefed me on the Bakers, whom we'll be visiting next Saturday. Nice walk with him after the meeting. Colman Dorsey and Astrid on strict diets: no more ice cream parties. Saturday, Alec came and we went together to visit György and Maria Márkus at Haverford, after nineteen years! He has a beautifully resonant voice, with heavy accent. She is a Pole, blonde, youngish, intellectual, professional. I asked him what happened. His group (he, Maria, about five others) had protested the Russian invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968. That put the authorities against them. They were forbidden to teach students, and were "kicked upstairs" to the Academy, to do research, but with restrictions on publishing. All the moderation came because Lukács, whose pupils and disciples they were, was still alive, and the authorities could not risk an international scandal. When Lukács died (1971), György and the others were removed from all employment. They subsisted on translations at slave wages for about four years and resolved to emigrate. The authorities were delighted to see them go. So, when an opening came for a colleague at Melbourne, he and his wife went. They helped Márkus to be offered a post in Sydney, and he went. Maria secured a place in the College of New South Wales. Now the friends are about to transfer to the New School in NYC but Márkus has no job here. He'd prefer New York. Sydney is OK, but too far away, too provincial (but they do like Australian nature). Dick Bernstein at Haverford is a warm friend; They met at congresses abroad, and work in nearly the same areas of philosophy. We talked merily over a glass of whisky for three hours: about Hungary, Australia, America. I gave them Life in the Tomb and Introduction to Three Greek Writers. Then down to Chinatown for a nice meal with Alec, recently back from Greece. And AMTRAK home.

March 15, 1985

Mother is here to look at condominiums for a possible move because of the difficult situation with Pappou. Senseless. If they're going to be on their own in an apartment, better stay put. But The Greens, a group home across from a nursing home, attracted her more.

Saturday, March 16, 1985

I looked at The Greens. Too bad it's out of town. Mother sees it for herself but knows that Pappous will be miserable surrounded by old ladies and will make her miserable. We all went to the Parish Players at night to see David Storey's Home with Tyler the ex-Congregational minister. Not bad, but too much like an old people's home (!) for comfort. Leonard and Rosemary were there, also Nick Jacobson, who knows Gwineth Walker, whose music Leander played.

Tuesday, March 17, 1985

Finished a translation of Seferis's essay Πάντα Πλήρης Θεών involving some nice literary detective work, especially in the discovery of a passage by Ruskin. Darrel Mansell helped me.

Friday, March 22, 1985

New York City

Breakfast at the Yale Club with Chrysanthi and Leonard Rieser. Then Leonard and I visited John and Elizabeth Baker again regarding help with the War and Peace Concentration. After the obligatory ritual they agreed to give $20,000 this year with more to come, perhaps, next year—in memory of Ford Sayre, who apparently was a pacifist. We had hoped for $100,00 but at least did not go away with nothing. Rousseau exhibit at the Museum of Modern Art in the afternoon. Then we met Daphne at Penn Station and went to O’Neill’s Strange Interlude with Brenda Jackson. Compelling, amazing play, so tedious at the start, and then so addictive. All of Nina’s men—Charlie, Sam, and the doctor—are meticulously characterized.

Saturday, March 23, 1985

New York City

To the Guggenheim in the morning to see the last of the three Kandinsky exhibits, this time carrying him up to his death in Paris. What a surprise to learn his admiration for and indebtedness to Rousseau, because both painted from a “dream self.” There was also a splendid letter about a fish and a line: is there any difference? In life yes, says Kandinsky, because the fish swims, eats, and is eaten, but in art, no. Each can be defined artistically in relation to its surroundings. In art he prefers the line, although on the dinner table he’d probably prefer the fish! Then took mother to Sydney Ballet at the City Center. Stunning ballet on Thomas Mann’s “Death in Venice” to Messiaen’s music, wonderful allegorical effects reminding me of Milton’s—e.g., Marriage of Death and Lust, battle of Lust and Love for von Aschenbach’s soul, etc. A very masculine ballet, predictably. Two masterpieces in two successive days!

Sunday, March 24, 1985

New York City

To 15th Street Meeting, alone. Another crackpot speaker, also a sane one who said that we were living in a military dictatorship (!). Afterwards, letter writing in the Yale Club. I have to go to NYC it seems to find the serenity to catch up on letters.

Mrs. Kazantzakis has offered me the Τετρακόσια Γράμματα to translate. I’ve written to say yes, probably, but that I’d prefer a volume of Selected Letters.

After Mother said no to The Greens, I had a brainstorm. Perhaps the Quadrangle being built in Haverford would admit Pappous in his stage of senility. I called Renata Harrison, the director of admissions, and she encouraged me. So we’ve sent in the $1500 deposit for them. It opens in April 1987. Will they be able to hold out?

Monday, March 25, 1985

Hanover

Leander and I are here alone; Chrysanthi and Daphne are still in NYC. I took Leander to the Inn for supper (it's his birthday). Nice, easy, relaxed conversation. Then he returned to Amherst.

Tuesday, March 26, 1985

Term is beginning. My eleventh straight without a full vacation. Senior Seminar on Finnegans Wake and Ulysses with eight or fewer students. Not bad. Nursing four Comparative Literature majors through their theses. Ted Eliopoulos in Greek reading course. Plus Comp. Lit. chairmanship. Enough! But I do hope to start systematically again on Kazantzakis and Politics, to begin to gather momentum for next year.

I should note the nice, rapid trip to Columbus to lecture at Ohio State on March 5. Vassilis Lambropoulos and Mr. Kozyris were my hosts. Nora, Fran Shapiro's daughter, showed up in the audience. I gave my critique of Kapetan Mihalis and had a very fine question period afterwards. What a pleasure and how rare! Flew back early the next morning via People Express to Burlington, in time for tenure meeting. We said yes to Pat McKee and no, alas, to Marion Singleton. Sad.

Elise Boulding has made me co-chair, with her, of the War/Peace group, temporarily, since I'll be away next year.

April 21, 1985

Overheard in AMTRAK club car, two children aged 3 or 4 having heated discussion. One reaches a negative stage and asserts "No way!" whereupon the other replies "Yes way!"

Alec, Christine McCall, Chrysanthi, and I spent today touring the Amish country, specifically Morgantown and Intercourse, Pennsylvania. Saw buggies, men with beards, children in black trousers playing baseball, etc. Not as romantic as the movie "Witness" but, as Chrysanthi said, plowing with horses isn't very new to us. Christine's mother, only 45 years old but the victim of an aneurism, came with us from the nursing home. Christine was very tender with her. Sad.

Yesterday, Friday, General Board at Pendle Hill. I spoke on the new plans for PH pamphlets and other publishing ventures. Wallace Collett is the new clerk. Bain Davis and Colman Dorsey may give some money to Dartmouth for War/Peace Studies.

April 22, 1985

What a day! Arrived at 4:00 a.m. in White River Junction. Breakfast with Chrysanthi at Howard Johnson's. Worked until noon. Lunch at Thayer with a student, Bruce Brown. Office hours in the afternoon. War/Peace Faculty Seminar and supper. Then my class. Finished at 10:00 p.m.

Mrs. Kazantzakis wants me to do an edition of Kazantzakis's Selected Letters in translation. Had a good talk with Lawrence Davies re: his experience editing the Conrad letters.

Working daily for a few hours on the Kazantzakis book—finally. Just bibliography so far, but that's a start.

May 11, 1985

Nice day in Amherst with Leander. I turned pages for him in the Amherst (town) library as he and the violinist, violist, and cellist that make up the U. Mass piano quartet played Loeillet and then the Schumann piano quartet. Four to five people in the audience on a gorgeous Saturday afternoon, but no matter. Fit audience though few. Bester, the department chair, was there. So we met him. And last Wednesday we met Adele Alevsky at the Hop. She played the Franck violin-piano sonata with a superb violinist from Berlin. She called Leander "a dear." We also saw Saarinen's amazing fine arts building, all concrete, hanging in the air. But the inside is drab. Snack afterwards with Leander and the cellist, Elizabeth Rose, a very sweet girl. Leander seems to be recovering from Outi, and seeing other girls, chiefly Liz. (Outi sent me a long plaintive letter to which I have to respond, and she'll be at Woodbrooke next autumn.) Then to Deerfield for reminiscences. A nice dinner with Leander, and drove to the farm.

May 12, 1985

Started the tractor with three turns! Found a way to keep the water barrel "alive" over the winter, so it was tight, ready for use. Small triumphs!

August 28, 1985

Logan Airport, Boston

Waiting for TWA flight to Athens for "Ancient Perspectives" cruise. Last diary entry was in May, I think, omitting the entire summer. So, some recapitulation is in order.

We spent the summer commuting again between Terpni and Hanover since I had to teach: one course, English 57 (Forster, Conrad, Joyce, Beckett, with 15 students, not too onerous). As happened last summer, this was rather pleasant, with lots of meals in restaurants on our weekly trip east on Monday and west on Thursday.

At the farm, the major project was Alec's cabin. He had two periods: about ten days before his six weeks at Middlebury (where he received his M.A. finally) and about three weeks afterwards. We started in June from floor level and erected the walls to about three ranks below the lintels of windows and doors. (I'd made the window- and door-frames, mostly.) Paul Buseck was with us for ten days before we delivered him to Kinhaven. When Alec left, we spent our time mowing and keeping the tractor running. I'm proud of myself for a "magical" repair job to the magneto after the beast died in the middle of the south field. Minimal garden, since we knew we'd leave too early to harvest much. Lots of visits, as usual, with Shapiros. Also saw Perrymans, Grunblatts, Rothsteins, and met some more of the Shapiros' friends. During this period, Alec brought some of his French friends from Middlebury: Annie, who had come the previous summer; Claude, the theatrical director; others. Leander was at Kinhaven. We ventured out to Middlebury once to see Alec in M. Claude's production of Tartuffe, Alec playing M. Loyal very credibly, one of only two non-native French speakers in the cast. We also went to Kinhaven to hear Leander do the Brahms' Horn Trio on Saturday night with Caroline the hornist, and a superb new violinist, Ava. Ike Patch was there; said it was the best thing he'd ever heard at Kinhaven. Ignat Solzhenitsyn turned pages and wept afterwards with emotion. It was very good Brahms. Sunday's children's concert was OK, nothing special. Jerry Bidlack ebullient as always, still battling with Lelia. Both sides have finally gotten appraisals, one at $400,000, the other at $425,000. But the Dushkins still don't want to sell. We brought the Shapiros. Had a lovely supper at the Blue Gentian, by ourselves, and a Sunday picnic with Ava and her Australian husband, Rachel Feuermann, Paul Buseck, etc. Kinhaven continues to charm me. Jerry wants me back on the Board. I said 1986–87, maybe.

Meanwhile, in mid-summer Mrs. Kazantzakis wrote asking me to translate the 400 Γράμματα στον Πρεβελάκη. I replied with an alternative proposal, to do a volume of selected letters. She agreed readily. So part of the summer was spent writing up a proposal for Princeton University Press and then adapting it, in a frenzy just before flight-time, for a Fulbright grant. Lawrence Davies, who is editing the Conrad letters, was very helpful re: editorial principles. I would hope to start in 1987, when Kazantzakis and Politics is finished (μακάρι!).

We also traveled to New York, to bring Daphne to JFK and send her off to the Ionic Center on Chios for three weeks of intensive Greek with Evris Tsakarides. This seems to have worked well, judging from her postcard in impeccable Greek. We'll see her tomorrow at the Grande Bretagne, Θεοῦ θέλοντος. She waitressed at Hanover Inn in June and July, and for ten days was an assistant drillmaster for John Rassias's French program for alumni children, at Mount Moosilauke Lodge, a good experience. Also she was accepted to John Winthrop House, her first choice. She did Group I work in the Freshman year: A- in Greek and Bs in everything else.

The other purpose of the New York visit was to see Yiayia and Pappou. My father is clearly dying . . . slowly. And life for mother is strenuously depressing. He wakes her every two hours all night long, and plagues her with obsessive questions repeated ad infinitum. Little by little, very slowly, she is realizing that she won't be able to cope alone. She now has night nurses as well as day nurses. I visited the Life Care Center Doncaster at Hartford on their behalf, but they are unacceptable there since Dad cannot care for himself. So, they're stuck. Mother says that she'll move to Hanover in January when we return and probably put Dad in the nursing home, if he lives that long.

One nice relief came thanks to Alice, who, having returned from Sierra Leone with Peter (Lori is in the Peace Corps there) volunteered to spend some days in New York with Pappou, so that mother could come to the farm, which she very much wanted to do. She stayed four days. Let's hope it's not the last time.

By this time, Alec had finished at Middlebury and returned to the farm. Dick Williamson came with his new "house-mate" Georganna (ex-Appleton). We've also begun playing music again, after two years' interim. Alec's friend Fred from Middlebury came, too. And the old reliable: Brittles (James McBride). Also Alec's mechanic friend from Philadelphia, Bob, and his brother Mike: good workers. Also Gerasimos, not such a good worker. With Dick, we got the large plate logs up over the windows and doors. Then I helped Alec design the roof rafters. Peter Buseck came for this moment, as he had for the roof-raising of the barn many years earlier. There were some tense moments as I thought the first two pairs of rafters would come apart and crash down on top of us. But all went well, and we framed the entire roof quite quickly. I should add that Leander had arrived by this time from Kinhaven, and took part in the roof-raising.

The sheathing went more slowly, because Alec wanted 8-inch ship-lap, which will be visible from beneath. Then came the corrugated iron roofing, which was quite difficult, especially as it had begun to rain, and the insulation beneath it wasn't meant to get wet. So we got the whole of the back side "tacked" with minimum nails, to cover the insulation. Then came three days of rain, so Chrysanthi and I went back to Hanover where I labored valiantly to (a) finish the Macintosh drills so that I could leave them ready for fall term, (b) complete the Fulbright application, (c) pack, (d) clean the office. At the same time, our Buick sickened and we decided to sell it at the last minute and to order a new Buick for our return in December.

As of today, Alec says that he's closed in the gables. We also put in the windows on the ground floor. The cabin really looks like a house now. Tomorrow (Thursday) Leander will be back at the farm to help Alec with the second side of the roof. So at the end of the summer the building should be well protected from the weather.

What fun watching this cabin go up! A replication—with significant variations—of the work I did 35 years ago. I am even more thankful for the farm as a way of life that has clearly become attractive to Alec especially, to Leander also though to a lesser degree, but not, I fear, to Daphne.

Intellectually, this summer I spent time with την Άλωση, preparing my final lecture for the cruise, reading widely and writing a rather long account treating the siege itself but, more importantly, the educational consequences—the flight of Greek scholars to Italy and France, with such important consequences for the Renaissance. I also re-read Thucydides with great pleasure, and reworked my Iliad/Odyssey lecture slightly. All this means that Kazantzakis and Politics got slighted (as usual). However, I did spend considerable time preparing the prospectus for the Selected Letters. Princeton University Press is interested.

This coming academic year I have no teaching, after twelve terms in a row. So, it's do or die with Kazantzakis and Politics. At Woodbrooke I hope to complete the final chapter on Αναφορά στον Γκρέκο and also to revise MS pages 304–630 comprising Julian, Jardin des rochers, etc. If I can be strong and resist diversions in winter, spring, and summer, I should have a MS ready. I refused my invitation to teach next summer. It's better to be at the farm working on Kazantzakis and the cabin.

But first comes the diversion of this cruise, some days in Athens, more than a week in Thessaloniki, and tourism in Vienna, Paris, and Amsterdam—a full month before arriving at Woodbrooke on September 28.

A word more about my father. Even Mother agrees that death is the only solution. As she says repeatedly, it's distressing to see a once vibrant man reduced to physical and psychological debility. He is so much like an infant: totally self-centered, virtually helpless. But he isn't naïve. He understands his condition, hates it, hates himself, hates everything, and fervently wants to be released by death. My own wish echoes this, with the hope that he will go quickly, while Mother still has some strength left, so that she can have a few final years of peace. By the way, she continues to paint, and thrilled us by taking us to Lever House on Park Avenue, where she has two canvases on exhibit in a show of art by senior citizens.

September 4, 1985

Santorini

I'm writing this in a café on the black volcanic beach at Santorini, after a long swim with our "students" on the tour. Morning at Akrotiri. All these wonders aren't as startling to me the second or third time as they were on initial encounter, yet they're still fine. But Monemvasia, yesterday evening, was new. I climbed to the citadel at the top. Charming medieval, walled city below. But the high spot was Ritsos's house, just inside the gate on the left, up a little alleyway. There is a plaque. The house is still owned by him, but is unoccupied. A resident said that he returned and saw it recently, after 40 years, the tears streaming down his face. Two of my books were on the local stand, the Penguin Ritsos and the Efstathiadis Three Generations.

September 5, 1985

Rhodes

We went to Vasos Papagapitos's parents' house in Lindos, high up in town. Beautiful pebbled courtyard. Living room embedded in the old fortress wall. His mother complained about the tourists. His father met the ship and sat with us at lunch. The government now prohibits construction of more hotels, in a move to save the town's picturesqueness.

Ten thousand Italians, or so it seemed, all disgorged from a Russian ship we saw later in Rhodes-town. Very hot day. Exhausted. Dehydrated. Rhodes-town is like Lake George village: a commercial horror.

I liked Μυστράς a few days ago. Climbed up to the citadel this time. Knew more about Γεμιστός and Κωνσταντίνος Παλαιολόγος. The previous day, got to Bassae. The temple is disappointing (as they all are, after the Parthenon). But the ride through Arcadia is spectacular. Poor humanity, eking out a living from a few square meters of ground terraced with infinite pains. At Olympia the pediments and metopes were back in the museum. Magnificent. I read Kazantzakis's commentary: how they reflect the Persian War. Apollo's expression is breathtaking. Also new, the day before, was Όσιος Λουκάς. Not as good as Karyjes; but a fine Pentecost over the apse. At Delphi I read my lecture again in the stadium. At Epidauros, Bob McGrath, Bob Keeshan (the Captain Kangaroo of television) and I did the ending of Sophocles' Electra, eliciting laughter but not tears. I had diarrhea just then, but managed to find a toilet just before, thank God. I loved the Acropolis Museum in Athens; some of the Parthenon frieze is on display. Tomorrow: Ephesus.

September 6, 1985

Ephesus excavations have progressed greatly, but we still couldn't see the "apartment complex" with the frescoes. The communal privy is well restored. They had clean water to wipe themselves! Also, we could now go inside the Library of Celsus—what richness and detail!

Dinner with the captain. I thought the boy on board was his son and said so, but it is his nephew. Embarrassment. He is unmarried. But he handled it well. Lives with his mother, is 46, looking like an eternal bachelor. Afterwards, Greek dancing and singing, in which the captain participated, as did Chrysanthi. Even I did a syrτος.

September 7, 1985

My big day. I lectured on "Homer as Temporal and Spatial Geometrician" in the morning and on "The Fall of Constantinople" in the evening. In the afternoon we went to Troy from Canakkale, a relatively unspoiled town compared to Kuşadası. Troy still has some charm. Touching to see Gallipoli across the straits. I read from the Iliad in the theater. People felt the magic, I think, or so I was told.

September 8, 1985

The aesthetic height of Istanbul is always the Kariye Müzesi, especially the frescos in the side chapel. The head of St. Michael seemed to me to be the continuation of the pagan Apollo.

September 9, 1985

Samothrace, a new site this time, along with Bassae, Osios Loukas, and Monemvasia. A wonderful surprise. Good ruins in the middle of a forest, with the sea on one side and a huge craggy mountain on the other. I stressed how the private mysteries had formed an essential link between paganism and Christianity. The Rotunda seems to have been the original of the U.S. Capitol in Washington via the Mausoleum of Hadrian in Rome.

In the afternoon we had a final “Symposium” with four students leading off with their reactions (and doing very well). Hal Darbee spoke of the polarity between Greece and India and hoped that we’d achieve a balance between the former’s devotion to symmetrical form and the latter’s acceptance of unformed multiplicity. Don Black spoke well; Steve McCarthy reminded us that tourism flourished in ancient times as well as our own; a philosophy teacher from Wellesley spoke of Plato’s distrust of poetry and questioned my thesis that Homer is geometric.

The final supper was a huge banquet: caviar, soup, lobster, sherbet, roast beef, salad, baked Alaska, champagne! Then came talent night. I wrote an updated version of Philoctetes, with Professor McGrath being tricked to return to Hanover with his slides and knowledge to preserve traditional Main Street by defeating the Galaria shopping center. He protested, preferring to be taken by Neoptolemos to the beach at Santorini, to worship Diana. (The beach was very topless, and sometimes bottomless.) To my chagrin, I’d forgotten that Jack Britten’s wife is called Diana and that she had swum topless. I hope she didn’t take it personally. Bob Keeshan (Captain Kangaroo) played Odysseus, Nuni Bodomer played Neoptolemos, Bob McGrath played Philoctetes, and Dan Lyons was Hercules (i.e., Captain Parisisi)—when the captain speaks, men listen.

September 10, 1985

Athens

Back to reality. Taxi strike! We dragged our luggage to the Esperia Palace Hotel on Stadiou. Met Christos by pre-arrangement. His situation is still desperate: unemployed, living on 1/3 of his Birmingham salary. Some prospects, but not very encouraging. He has a girlfriend, Έρη Σταυροπούλου, who teaches Modern Greek literature (19th century, mostly) at the University of Athens.

I visited Chip Ammerman at the Fulbright office. His Greek wife taught at Halandri for years. He'll probably support my application, but my recent Fulbright will be against me. All meals in Συντριβάνη, Οδός Φιλελλήνων. Our steki. Met Evris Tsakarides there by accident. Walked in Plaka.

September 11, 1985

Athens

Good luck securing Kazantzakis materials at Kollaros Bookstore. Went back to the Εθνική Βιβλιοθήκη after so many years. Improved service. Lunch with Christos after Chrysanthi went to the airport. Then to Efsthadiadis. Discovered that he's published the first two novels of Myrivilis's trilogy; he didn't know that Η ζωή έν τάφω was translated. I think I've found a way to get it in paperback. I wrote immediately to Tom McFarland. My book sold 1000 copies and I collected 15000 drachmas in royalties.

In the evening Christos took Eri and me to a production of Aristophanes' Acharnes by Koun's troupe, outdoors in the Roman agora. Perfect setting under the Tower of the Winds. A lively performance, Aristophanes mixed with Karaghiozis and επιθεώρηση. Lots of phallicism, as expected. A bit disjointed. Yet I appreciated the theme: the attempt to secure peace between Athens and Sparta during the Peloponnesian War. Too bad I didn't assign this for the cruise. Met Σπύρος Ρέπουλης, the new Διευθυντής Μορφωτικών Σχέσεων του Υπουργείου Πολιτισμού, by accident, through Christos. Also met Koun afterwards. He seemed very old. A great man.

September 12, 1985

Athens

Visited Repoulis at the Ministry for 1½ hours, talking about MGSA. Good to have personal contact. He is warm, enthusiastic, wants to do an effective job despite the entropy of bureaucracy. I went to a few wrong offices by mistake; nowhere did I see anyone working. And they all go home at 2:00 p.m. every afternoon.

Spent the afternoon in the National Library writing letters and this journal. I must also begin to translate my Χρίστος Ξανασταυρώνεται lecture into Greek for Amsterdam.

Supper with Isidore Kechagioglou, director of the Ionic Center. An interesting man, from an Asia Minor refugee family on Chios. Went to America to study physics at Olivet, became more interested in philosophy of indeterminism, Buddhism, etc. Wrote a dissertation on the process of writing dissertations, and was denied the Ph.D. (When I told him about Christos looking for a job without a Ph.D. he was sympathetic.) Founded a «Delphic Institute» at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, but decided he wanted to return to Chios and become active there. Founded the Ionic Center as a philosophic school first; Later expanded it to include language, folklore, etc. Great opposition at first. Distrusted because of “queer ideas” (e.g., Buddhism). The original εφορία completely politicized although his scheme was totally apolitical. But he slowly made it work. He talked about my participation, possibly in the summer of 1987.

That evening, flew to Thessaloniki.

September 12, 1985

Chez Yiannakos

Visited Mimis and Aglaïa Λυπουρλής. Hope to get a letter from him for the Fulbright application. She has one desk in a room with 20 others, as her office! Pitiful. 60,000 students in the university. In ten years, they'll all be unemployed lawyers and engineers. Evening with Βούλη and Κυρά Κούλα. Κούλα uses language nicely. Said that the hardboiled eggs were κοτίσσια—i.e., from chickens.

Saturday, September 14, 1985

Worked on translation of my Χριστός Ξανασταυρώνεται essay into Greek, for Amsterdam. Evening to cemetery for Τρισάγιον for Παππούς. Odysseas, Lola, Chrysanthi, Efthymoula, and I. The priest sang the service. Totally impersonal, and was paid on the spot. Odysseas cleaned the marble, lit candles, refreshed the oil, cleaned the photo. George watered some plants he'd planted on the grave. Pappous lived 88 years, 1895–1983. Then we went to the grave of Efthymoula's sister, who died in her 50s of a heart attack. A different priest, holding a black umbrella over his head (against the sun, presumably) the entire time. He spread petals on her grave, spoke the service rather than singing. Again, totally impersonal.

They ask the name of the deceased and then begin immediately, without even speaking to those gathered at the grave.

Supper at Odysseas's. Eleni, Yiayia. They've fixed up the house. Odysseas is building in Καρπενήσι, Eleni's home district, with his προίκα. An οικόπεδο is all that's left of Eleni's home, burned by the Germans in the Κατοχή and then finished off by someone else. Odysseas and George never see each other—only when we come, it appears. Nikos Sphaïropoulos wants to specialize in athletic medicine. He's going to be an orthopedic surgeon.

On the way back, we stopped at a celebration by PASOK youth. There was an EAM/ELAS display, with photos of Aris, Markos, and the rest. Σαράφης most impressive. Everything free now. Saw a man reading Rizospastis openly in a restaurant in Athens.

Spoke with Ruth Gounelas. Her sight has stabilized and even improved. Hopes to get a job here, now that Dimitris will be teaching at the University of Thessaloniki.

Sunday, September 15, 1985

A very special day. With George, Chrysanthi, and Odysseas, went to Terpni and Nigrita. Met about 25 relatives, the sweetest people. First George, the son of Pappous's sister, and his large family. One fat, jolly son named Mimis is a house-painter. A son-in-law is a surveyor. The father, like everyone in Terpni, grows tobacco. Another son, not present, is a schoolteacher—i.e., the only educated member, and much admired. We stayed a short time, then began the rounds. ΣΤΑΡΤ ΗΕΡΕ First to Stergios's house: brother of George. He was in bed in the kitchen, dying of cancer, his wife trying to control her tears. His son is now the tobacco farmer and has two little boys and daughters. Thus three generations were present, from small children to a dying grandfather. Very touching for all. The son has a huge Ford tractor. Tobacco was neatly threaded and hanging to dry in the ground floor rooms; the people live on the second floor. Next: to the mother of Thomas, who wanted to go to Australia years ago. Again: sweet, warm, excitable old ladies in their village dresses; wizened, quiet men, blushing young girls. Always a shady spot in the yard. Always a treat: a sweet, a coffee, a liqueur. Then to still another old lady, renowned as a bon-vivant dancer in her youth, now a γριά but with a wonderful smile. Then her sister, also a dancer and a former village beauty. Somehow in the midst of all this we saw the village church where all the children went (i.e., Chrysanthi, George, Lola, Odysseas), and their home, now a wreck, only half standing, with a half-ruined roof. But the original yard is there, now occupied by someone else's new house. Generally the village is unexpectedly prosperous. Apparently tobacco brings a high price, and all is sold, nothing remains. Then back to George's for lunch. First τσίπουρο (ouzo) and milk-curd and meat, outside, only for the men. How nice! Mimis very expansive. Then indoors for lunch with the women. In the midst of this, Thomas arrived with his brother. He's now a baker with his own φούρνο; does electric work only rarely. Then to Nigrita to see the 2nd Demotic School, where Pappous was headmaster, unchanged from the days when he was there. Then to the Λουτρά to taste Nigrita water. Then to another relative, again an old woman, recently widowed, who was a beauty in her youth (we marveled at a photograph). Nigrita is a small city; she lives in an apartment but spends most of the year in Thessaloniki near her children. Then back to Thomas's mother to meet Mimis. Then with Mimis to still another village to see his house, the most splendid of the lot, with three bathrooms, central heating, a study room for the children, etc. He has a smart daughter and aspires to have her educated—i.e., to escape the village. She's already learning English, at age 8. He drives her to Nigrita twice a week for lessons. Devoted father. Of course they have television, a car, etc. He grows corn as a sideline, after his job as a painter. Also has grapes, makes wine and τσίπουρο, grows apricots, has chickens, etc. Everywhere, μας τάιζαν! Sweets, halvah, more sweets. George said that he feared going to the village until the PASOK government took over, because of Odysseas's history. But now there is no problem.

The whole day (my idea at first) was extremely moving for George, Chrysanthi, and Odysseas, and I think enjoyable for the people we visited, who work very hard all week and really do rest on Sunday.

Rather exhausted, we returned at about 5:00 p.m. Good road. Beautiful Serres valley. Flat tire just before Βαρδάρης Square. Found Dimitris and Tilda at home when we arrived, but they were on their way out. She is like ice, haughty. Said she learned nothing from a year's obligatory service in a village (she's a recently graduated M.D.). Great contrast with the sweet, open people we found in the village. Finally, a friend of Dimitris's appeared, bringing a wedding gift. Works for OTE. We had an interesting discussion about telephones.

Monday, September 16, 1985

Working every morning on the Greek translation of my essay on the political comprehensiveness of Ο Χριστός ξανασταυρώνεται. My Greek comes and goes. When I'm tired, I stumble badly. But sometimes all the words seem to come out all right.

In the afternoon, met two students of Lola's who want to study in America and are applying, among other places, to Dartmouth. One, Κυδωνάκης, is very impressive. Superb English. The other is OK but more hesitant. Both want to study physics and have no use for our concept of a broad education. Both want to live permanently in America. Strange. I'll write testimonials on their English.

In the evening, supper at the apartment of Μίμης και Αγλαΐα Λυπουρλής, friends whom we met in Birmingham thanks to Christos. They live very comfortably in 40 Εκκλησίας, a stone's throw from the university. Living room cluttered with "collectables." Summer home in Πήλιον. They invited Sifakis's wife (he's in Australia), some colleagues of Aglaia's in the Modern Greek department, a historian named Γιάννης Χασιώτης, who, it turns out, is currently writing on Γιάννης Σταυριδάκης and the Greek mission to the Caucasus, using ministerial documents, etc. He says that Kazantzakis did practically nothing, just sat, while the subordinates went out to the villages. Talkative man, monopolized dinner table conversation with his account of the establishment of the Department of Music at the university. The party was not very different from our own. Mimis is going to send me a letter of invitation. (But do I really want to live in Thessaloniki for four months?) Mario Vitti telephoned me at the Lyπουρλises' to say hello. We'll meet in London in March.

Tuesday, September 17, 1985

Another full day. Translation in the morning. Midday meal in a restaurant with Themis, Miranda, and Marianna Altas. Marianna is engaged. Met the boy briefly. Very slight, almost invisible. Seems to be a factory worker; they cut the subject after I'd asked. Marianna is practicing law. Far too many professionals in Greece—lawyers, engineers, doctors, architects. Few have work. Good conversation. Miranda is starved for intellectual stimulation, like so many housewives. Themis is cutting down, working fewer days each week, looking forward to retirement. They have their second home in Νέα Μηχανιώνα still. Theodora is very old but still gets about. Miranda's blindness is much more visible than previously.

In the afternoon, Vouli picked us up and brought us to the American Farm School for tea with Bruce and Tad Lansdale, and, as it turned out, their daughter Christine, who teaches ceramics there and is preparing a huge ceramic mural for the renovated Princeton Hall. The school is a remarkable oasis: green, well planned, shaded. The city is encroaching always. There are even factories now on the road to the school, and a superhighway being built on one edge. The huge question is: Who will replace Bruce when he retires and, as Vouli always insists, who will replace Tad. He hopes to spend six months in California and six months in Metamorphosis, their summer retreat. One of his boys is doing agricultural aid work in Honduras. Another is discovering a way to reforest eroded mountains. I told Bruce that he and I are both ministers manqués. “Not so manqué,” he replied. He gave me the advanced proofs of Mike Keeley’s new novel A Wilderness Called Peace, about Cambodia. I like how playful the students were with Vouli. «Γυρνάει η ρόδα σου!» shouted one in mock-distress as her car began to move. «Άϊ στο διάβολο!» was the proper, and proffered, reply.

We barely made it back to Kalamariá before Δημήτρης Γουνελάς appeared to take us to dinner with Ruth in their new flat in Panorama. They have one daughter, and a beautiful flat that costs one half of their income each month. Couldn’t find anything else. Ruth’s eyesight is stabilized. She drives, and can read with ease. Working on Katharine Mansfield still, and other New Zealand writers. She and I share a love for Samuel Butler; she worked on his papers, which—lo!—are in Williams College. Dimitris is about to begin at the University of Thessaloniki, teaching Sikelianos and Palamas to classes of 200 to 400 in lecture halls. No contact with students. Lots of time for research, apparently. He still can’t figure out why he felt he had to leave Australia, but is glad he did. I told him about Leo Papademetre. One day I hope we can invite Gounelas to an MGSA conference in the USA.

Wednesday, September 18, 1985

Surprise. Elinitsa Athanasiadou telephoned Efthymoula and learned we were here. She came over immediately. Old friends are the best. Her son is getting a Ph.D. in sociology in Germany. She described the new Σχολή Κουφών that she managed to get the state to build, and then drove us there. It’s way way up on the very highest point in Panorama. Delicious! She has a marvelous way with the children. I remembered the extraordinary επιδείξεις that we saw years ago. From sixty-odd children in cramped quarters downtown they've gone to 200+ in this marvelous facility. Seeing these deaf and dumb children one instantaneously realizes that we must not take our own normal faculties for granted. Everything is a gift, undeserved. The struggle and accomplishment of these children puts our own grumblings into perspective. They read lips perfectly, and speak in a way that even I could understand—much more easily, for example, than Jim Farley's English on the cruise. He's had a laryngectomy and uses a mechanical voice-box, like Benjy Bidlack. (Farley told me that he hates McLaughlin.)

We'd had a date with Bill McGrew and his wife (name?) at Anatolia College, and wanted him to meet Elenitsa. She got invited to dinner as a result. Tour of Anatolia. Another oasis. Saw photos of the buildings when they were originally erected, in an ερημιά. Sheep pastures or worse. What foresight and faith! This is the 100th anniversary of the founding in Asia Minor. McGrew was very cordial. We spoke about possible affiliation with his summer school. Chrysanthi could teach Greek, for instance. We could possibly live there if and when we come in the spring of 1987. McGrew, if he ever gets time, wants to study the shifts in population from mountains to plains after the War of Independence, especially in the Peloponnesus. Anatolia College is flourishing, but the American administration doesn't exist, as far as the State is concerned. It's a phantom. Every official contact is with the Greek principals of the four schools. They also have a new Junior College with lessons exclusively in English. Students gain acceptance to Boston University, etc. afterwards for the final two years, and save a great deal of money in the process.

Thursday, September 19, 1985

Lunch with Lola and Costas. Conversation mostly about their trip to Russia. They were very favorably impressed. Their son Nikos is now doing a kind of internship. He wants to become an orthopedic surgeon specializing in athletic medicine—i.e., working with young people instead of old folks. In the evening, Stavros and Toula took us to a restaurant in Panorama. She just returned from Naples where she played her M.A. recital successfully: Tchaikovsky's first piano concerto, Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition, etc. Stavros kept insisting, Έπαιξε σαν άντρας, meaning that she had vigor and strength. She complains about an Italian teacher who wanted to change her technique, learned in Russia, so that everything comes from the fingers instead of the shoulders. They have moved to a new apartment and have enlarged and renovated the music school, now called the Αλεξάνδρειον Οδείου. Easy to talk to them. Stavros is a marvelous autodidact. Reads, thinks. Also totally diverse. Works on his father's farm in harvest time, with tobacco. At home is obsessed with computers. Has an IBM PC plus another, is learning to program, etc. I should send him software for music education. We talked about Cavafy, Kazantzakis, Ritsos. They, and everyone else, said that when Daphne was here all she wanted to do was sleep. Strange.

Friday, September 20, 1985

Marios Karasavvas called and came. Old friendships again. He's married now with children, building a house outside of Thessaloniki and still has his summer place in Χαλκιδική. Struggling to find work; too many architects. Together we visited Dimitrios Yiannakos's office downtown, set up by George, of course—large, airy, light. Silver spoon. I deposited our remaining drachmas in the American Express Bank, picked up some photocopies kindly left for me by Hasiotis on Mimis Lipourlis's desk, wandered through the university. Ugly, dirty, covered with political graffiti. No grandeur. Unimpressive architecture. Sad. I think that the political πάθος ruins everything. Chris Woodhouse, in Melbourne, said that the Greeks are "politically immature," and caused a furor. They are! And yet there is that irrepressible vigor, and love of talk, and company.

Lunch at George's—ο μυστικός δείπνος—with George, Efthymoula, Dimitris and his fiancée Tilda. She distant, squeaky-voiced. George is depressed instead of elated at the approaching wedding. But we made the best of it. Drank a bottle of champagne, very good champagne, given us by Travel Dynamics when we boarded the Illyria. She wants to specialize in ophthalmology, as second choice after pediatrics, which apparently has no places. Right now she's waiting for a residency, doing nothing. The newlyweds will move into her mother's large apartment, with everything ready. Two silver spoons.

Finished my Kazantzakis translation, 60 pages of manuscript, despite recurring diarrhea (olive oil!) and all these visits.

Vouli came to say goodbye. She's very critical of Greece and Greeks. Everything is wrong. Greek youth is passing through the stage that we experienced in America in the 60s and 70s. She said that it was a μεταβατική περίοδος and I read her the conclusion of my essay about Kazantzakis's theory of the αμετάβλητη μετάβαση. She brought me the fourth edition of the libel on Kazantzakis by Λιλή Ζωγράφου. Alas, people are reading this. Even Toula, who doesn't know Kazantzakis's works, asked if he were really so terrible. And she distrusted Cavafy because she supposed he was a pessimist!

Chrysanthi was at a party given by Αλίκη Καλογραία for her and old schoolmates. She returned and we went off to Odysseas's for supper and goodbyes. Present was Nikos ?, Odysseas's κουμπάρος from Tashkent. Married to a Russian, he chose to remain. He and Odysseas fled Greece to Yugoslavia after Varkiza, then returned and fought at Vitsi and Grammos, then fled to Albania and from there to Tashkent. Both were in officers' training school in Russia. Nikos went to university and became καθηγητής μαθηματικών. His three children all finished university and are satisfactorily employed. He had hemorrhages in the retina recently and was flown to Moscow where he received laser treatment, all free, of course. He has a four-room apartment in Tashkent. The city is beautiful, he says, with wide boulevards and lots of parks and gardens (it was completely rebuilt after a serious earthquake). There is a full, high-level cultural life. People don't worry about old age or losing their savings, or whether the stock market will fail. As a Greek, he never felt discrimination; all avenues were open to him. They practice their religion freely, with baptisms, liturgy, etc. He travels freely to Greece whenever he chooses. How nice to hear all this! We must always resist our own propaganda. Regarding PASOK, Odysseas said the one truly positive achievement is the end of the police state. But the other aspects of the αλλαγή haven't occurred. Σιγά-σιγά. Γιαγιά is marvelous, as always—so warm. Beautiful smile. Ο Τάκης came briefly. Handsome. Worried about lack of work, though for the present he has a non-governmental position with the δήμος. He left in order to go with friends to the taverna, as always. Stavros and Toula came after a long day at the Odeon, where Odysseas also was working from morning until 9:00 p.m. Final goodbyes.

Saturday, September 21, 1985

Thessaloniki–Vienna

Lola came with Nikos. He's specializing in orthopedic surgery with hopes to do athletic medicine. Much more energetic than I'd known him. Apparently he wants to be a really knowledgeable physician, not just a time-server.

In the afternoon, George took us to the airport. Stavros appeared at the last minute with the Άπαντα του Βάρναλη, because we'd talked about it previously. And—what a miracle!—lunch in Thessaloniki but at 7:00 p.m. the same day we were in the Vienna Opera seeing Così Fan Tutte. As always, Austria seemed familiar, European, our own, whereas Greece seems somehow outside and beyond. And how poor and άθλια it is when you compare it with Vienna. Ideal city. Clean, no traffic, parks everywhere, exploding with culture, efficient, trolleys instead of filthy buses. And the opera was superb. Such voices! Now I see how provincial Melbourne is, and even Sydney, at least musically. We were high up, near the stage, but saw almost everything by leaning over the railing. Tickets cost $5.00 each!

Sunday, September 22, 1985

Vienna

A day of museums. First the Academy collection. A striking Bosch triptych: the Last Judgment. Wonderful Titian Tarquin and Lucretia. Then hours in the Kunsthistorische. I remember the Cellini saltcellar, scores of Breughels (the elder), especially a beautiful village and river; Cranach's famous panels of Adam and Eve, Dürer portraits, Giordano's Michael driving Lucifer & Co. into Hell, Caravaggio's David with the head of Goliath, Bronzino's Holy Family with an ivory-skinned Madonna, Titian's Ecce Homo. Afterwards, the Ephesus museum was a disappointment, since very little is there, although beautifully displayed. There are tiny bits from Samothrace, also. Highlight in both cases are the reconstructions, including an entire mock-up or model of Ephesus.

At 6:30, we met Waldemar and Trude Zacharasiewicz at the Landsmann café next to the Burgtheatre and opposite the Rathaus. Steve Scher had introduced us at Dartmouth. He teaches American literature, especially of the south; she teaches English to foreigners. They were interested in my Macintosh programs, which I delivered to them safely. Also in the party was the newly arrived Fulbright professor and his wife, from the University of Texas at Austin. He'll teach black-American literature in Vienna. Not a word of German. Zacharasiewicz says that the university is terrible because of a kind of open admissions, and free education for all. Thus there is no incentive to work hard and finish. Also, as usual, there is very little contact with students, at least with undergraduates.

And yet this kind of education, in an environment such as Vienna, seems to produce an aesthetic, literate populace, whereas our “superior” education produces . . . (?).

We walked afterwards along the lovely pedestrian-only street, Kartnerstrasse. Ate Wienerschnitzel without consequences (!) at Olympia Restaurant (Kartnerstr. 10).

Monday, September 23, 1985

Vienna–Paris

In the morning, Traum und Wirklichkeit exhibit in the Kunsthaus. Loos, Hoffmann, social democracy. Schiele, Kokolska, and of course all the musicians: Mahler, Schoenberg, especially. Plus Freud, the first world war (the archduke’s bloodstained tunic after Sarajevo). Theodore Herzl and Zionism. Posters from the Hitler era regarding pogroms. Frank about Viennese anti-Semitism. Workers’ flats and communities constructed by the socialists after the huge crisis in the 1920s. Model of Ringstrasse and explanation of how this filled the space occupied previously by the city’s walls and moat. Brilliant town planning by the emperor not too long before the debacle. Schiele’s ugly expressionism memorable. Reaction against fake nineteenth-century conventions. Earlier expressionists reminiscent of our Kaufmanns.

Flight to Orly.

Tuesday, September 24, 1985

Paris

Hotel in nice neighborhood, between Bastille and St. Paul’s, 4th floor, no elevator. But toilet and bath. Chrysanthi remembered previous experiences in similar hotels and insisted on putting a towel over the pillowcase, which she assumed to be filthy. (It wasn’t.) Lots of walking. First to Hôtel de Ville: Victor Hugo exhibit following his entire career; his love of Paris, involvement in revolutionary politics, exile in Belgium, return to campaign against Napoleon’s son (le petit Napoleon), apotheosis, burial in the Pantheon. One follows much of Parisian history via his life, including the destruction of the old Paris he loved, in order to build the grand boulevards, and then the burning of so many public buildings during the political insurrections later in the century. All this vividly presented. Next: Ile de la Cité. Notre Dame disappointing. Heavy. The spirit doesn’t soar in this lugubrious temple. My heart leaped when I entered the Blue Mosque, but not here. I prefer the Byzantine style, somehow. Simpler. More to the measure of man, yet also spiritual. Palais de Justice. Tried to see a trial, but it was lunchtime. Across to the Quartier Latin, Boul' Mich, Boul' Ste. Germaine. How my memories returned! Librairie Gilberte still there! Sorbonne. Collège de France. Holy ground trod by Bergson, Renan, Psiharis. Tried to get tickets to Molière's Misanthrope in the Comédie Française but it was the wrong night. Settled on Follies Bergère hélas. Bateau mouche. Killed time in Galeries Lafayette, expensive but the Galleria is impressive. Follies execrable, amateur, unimaginative, repetitive, excruciatingly loud. Just one dance number after another with the same cast, either dressed or undressed. Not even sexy. The best number was when trained dogs replaced the people. Dommage!

Paris noisy, strangled with traffic. Very noticeable difference after Vienna. But Parisian neighborhoods and back streets are still charming.

Wednesday, September 25, 1985

The museums were open today, so we started with the Jeu de Paumes, recommended so highly by Alec. Long line. Fortunately, we had, as always, the Περιεκτικότητα του «Χριστός ξανασταυρώνεται» to pass the time. Splendid museum, all impressionists. The best surprises were the paintings I'd seen already in retrospectives in America—e.g., Monet's five views of Rouen Cathedral, Van Gogh's Dr. Paul Gachet, Manet's Olympia (with the black cat balanced against the black servant) and of course the Déjeuner sur l'herbe and others. Alec's favorite was there: Cézanne's Joueurs de cartes. I also remember Degas's L'absinthe, with a working girl sitting abstracted and tired in a café in front of her glass; Pissarro's Wheatfield, Renoir's Le Moulin de la Galette (of course), and Rousseau's nightmarish La Guerre, which we saw at MoMA recently in New York. Jeu de Paumes is small, cosy.

Not the Louvre. Its grand gallery with huge French canvasses leaves me cold. No wonder the impressionists reacted against mythological subjects. But of course the marvels exist also. For us, having just come from Samothrace, it was good to see the Νίκη on her boat. The Aphrodite of Milos has a haunting face, a head strangely too small for her body, and an awkward yet beautiful bodily position. And there is a Roman copy of the Praxiteles Apollo Sauroktonos, not as fine as the one I love in the Vatican, yet graceful. Also some fragments from the Panathenaic procession on the Parthenon. The other highlights for me were the Michelangelo slaves carved for the tomb of Julian II, characteristically emerging from the unworked block of marble. They symbolized provinces that Julian had brought under subjection by the Church. Ugh! The less one knows the better, Art, alas, beautifies and thus distorts truth, unless we're dealing with a Schiele. Of the paintings, I value the Spanish the most: Murillo's Young Beggar, Velazquez's Infanta Margarita, and a single marvel by El Greco: Saint Louis King of France, an unforgettable face. Of course we did obeisance to the Mona Lisa, but the other Da Vincis are just as nice.

Worked a little on my Kazantzakis translation in the Tuileries and then went by Métro to Porte d'Ivry to dine with Annie Camp, Alec's friend and teacher at Middlebury, and her boyfriend Jacques Martin. They live at the edge of Paris in an attractive high-rise development complete with a wonderful supermarket (65 varieties of cheese), restaurants, etc. They had other guests: Jacques' uncle, an ex-sailor in the French navy, a niece from Toulouse. I struggled to make myself understood in French; they did the same with their little English, except for Annie. I asked Jacques for his impression of America. Vous êtes fou! he replied. Said our culture is just as foreign for him as African or Hottentot, but worse because we don't expect this to be the case. He couldn't understand our fetish for athleticism. The uncle had been everywhere, of course, including Tahiti and the first explosion of a French atomic bomb. We had a taste of a veritable repas français, in this case a southeast recipe for duck, preceded by salad with fried liver and followed by three cheeses, champagne, and biscuits. They live simply. He is an auto mechanic, travels on motorcycle; she teaches learning-disabled children. Practically no furniture in the apartment. One couch for us. Everyone else sat on the floor. No beds. Mattresses on the floor. I felt disgustingly rich, a stinking capitalist. Everything is relative. We enjoyed this entrée into French life. Taxi back to the hotel, at 80 mph or so it seemed.

Thursday, September 26, 1985

Paris-Utrecht

Tried to see Centre Pompidou in the morning. Closed until noon. But the outside is striking enough: the end, I suppose, of the tendency begun by Adolf Loos and others to emphasize function in architecture instead of façade. So, every structural element is visible. We walked to Ste. Chappelle, another "must" recommended by Alec. Light, soaring, wonderful glass. Nicer by far than Notre Dame. Origins go back, however, to the capture of Constantinople in 1204, to Baudouin and his successors, i.e., to events better not remembered. A successor king paid a huge sum for the crown of thorns, three times what it cost him to build Ste. Chapelle as a fitting home for the relic. And the masses starved, of course. We walked back to the 4th arrondissement via Île St. Louis, a quiet, aristocratic neighborhood.

In the afternoon: by train to Utrecht, via Rotterdam. Finished την επεξεργασία του κειμένου μου, επιτέλους.

Interesting, after seeing Manet's "Olympia," to read the following in the TLS review of T. J. Clark's The Painting of Modern Life (TLS August 9, 1985): "The argument of Chapter Two is that, in depicting a prostitute . . . , Manet was dealing with modernity in one of its most poignant and difficult aspects. 'When social practice is soaked right through with duplicity, when nothing is spared from the role of illusion . . . , prostitutes are purveyors of essential goods.' . . . the picture of Olympia 'altered and played with identities the culture wished to keep still.' It discomfited because as a painting it ignored the ruling artistic conventions and substituted the particular for the general. Olympia is a person, not an image. She is bare, and not nude; her nakedness is intrusive . . . ; her matter-of-fact detachment is not a sign of artistic transcendence, but of the terms of her trade."

Local train from Rotterdam to Utrecht. Coming into Rotterdam on the Paris train, we crossed the harbor, precisely where I'd first landed in Europe in June 1952. I wonder if Mary Viëtor's father's tugboats are still operating. The local train was delayed for one hour, unheard of for Holland. Wim Bakker met us in Utrecht. The delay was only until Gouda. By car to Driebergen, his village. His wife Joyce is from Chicago. Compulsive talker, platinum blond. Nice house. Slept in their son's room, under the roof, with open skylight.

Friday, September 27, 1985

Amsterdam

Train to Amsterdam Centrum with Wim. Short walk past Dam to Nieuwgrieksseminarium, Nieuw Doelenstraat (where Rembrandt's Night Watch hung, as we learned later). Attended Arnold Gemert's class: επισκόπηση λογοτεχνίας 120–150 αιώνων. His Greek beautiful. Greek wife. Spoke of the tendency after 1204 to cling to roots; thus the return to αρχαϊζουσα γλώσσα. But 100 years later, with Greeks back in Κων/πολη, demotic raised its head again. Literary history: not very imaginative, but necessary, I suppose. The exhibits are the various "novels" (romances). He didn't know about Meg Alexiou's work on the romances.

Afterwards, he took us around town nearby—to an old cloister for unmarried women, preserved today as it was in the seventeenth century and still used for the same purpose; also to Kalverstratt, a shopping mall, nice, but drab compared to Vienna. At 1:00 p.m. we attended the class given by Κώστας Διμάδης on Πλασκοβίτη Το φράγμα. The students spoke beautifully, στα ελληνικά, εννοείται. Δρεπόμουν για τη δική μου αμάθεια. They get a good basis here from Bakker and Gemert, using mimeographed materials (they began with our Demotic Greek I, but eventually produced their own text); then they go to Thessaloniki and, like Daphne, come back speaking. But so well (those we heard; the silent ones presumably were not so adept). Good class on explication de texte. Dimadis, however, was too doctrinaire, forcing his views on the students. At 3:30 I spoke in the theater on Η πολιτική περιεκτικότητα του «Χριστός ξανασταυρώνεται». 70 minutes, alas. Stumbling a bit over the Greek, and once saying “nineteen” instead of δεκαεννέα. I felt a bit silly. But I got to the end. A few questions. Dimadis very complementary, but justifiably questioned my use of the terms εθνικός and εθνικιστικός in opposition. Afterwards, wine and cheese downstairs. Three students were ceremoniously given their first year’s certificate. I spoke mostly with three students who had begun Modern Greek after doing classics. One had used my Cavafy monograph and was delighted to meet the author. How nice that these people who are continuing to teach ancient Greek in high school (gymnasium) will also have a sense of Modern Greek history and literature! Fine dinner afterwards in a Dutch-style restaurant. Waiters with white bibs. Walls covered with dark paneling. Mussels, braised beef, candied raisins and ice cream, waffles. Gemert and wife, Bakker and wife, Chrysanthi and I. Kostas was invited but didn’t show. Wim said that the students liked my lecture because I’d referred to so many historical periods that they had studied. So be it! Back to Driebergen very late, 12:30-ish, Joyce talking continually all the way.

Saturday, September 28, 1985

Amsterdam–Birmingham

We’d changed our tickets so as to have most of the day in Amsterdam. A small, cozy, sensible city. Tram to Rijksmuseum. Museums are best remembered for a few favorites that will always be waiting for one upon return. My favorites here are two magnificent Rembrandts: Jeremiah Lamenting the Destruction of Jerusalem, and the Holy Family (done à la Dutch, with an old woman reading by candlelight that casts a huge shadow, the babe sound asleep, another woman holding a rope connected to the cradle lest he stir). Of course there is the Night Watch, too, with a very helpful explanation of the conditions before and after the commission. I also liked Jan Steen's Feast of St. Nicholas, with the warm smile of the old woman reaching out to children (like the γιαγιάδες in Τερπνίη), and the sniveling boy on the left. "Our" Vermeer is there, too. But the other side of one's visit to the Rijksmuseum is sadness at Holland's loss of so many of its great paintings to other countries. Even the Rembrandt self-portraits here, as grand as they are, fall beneath the one at the Frick.

The new Van Gogh museum, down the street, is an extraordinarily spacious building for relatively few paintings, so it is very relaxing, as compared for example to the awful Louvre. Again, so many splendid Van Goghs are elsewhere. Yet some beauties are here: the Potato Eaters, various self-portraits; seven small scenes of reaping à la Millet which are stunning, the old Arlesian woman in her splendid blue headdress and robe, Wandeling in de Herbst that suggests German expressionism in its eeriness, the Yellow House at Arles, with vividly deep perspective and triangular composition best seen from a distance, and, the greatest surprise, the Pietà à la Delacroix, with a virgin in rich blue.

We walked a bit, heard wonderful jazz in the street, saw dried flowers galore, took a Rondvaart boat through the canals, and went to Schiphol for the flight to B'ham. Amsterdam is dull in its exterior; it mirrors the commercial, somewhat puritanical nature of its past. What miracle produced the seventeenth-century painters in this basically non-aesthetic culture?

October 14, 1985

Woodbrooke College, Birmingham

Meeting with Bryer, John Halton, and Michael Orsinus regarding the future of the department at Brum. I counseled leading from strength, meaning literature and history rather than a full program in literature, which will be impossible with only one instructor (Meg's post is being replaced, Christos's is not). Orsinus, a German, is an Ottomist; he's teaching Turkish to the Greeks!

Supper at Paul Morby's. Bryer and Liz, Morby's secretary, Diana (wife of Hugh—the ones who really saved Paul when he was suspended), Christos, and a philhellene librarian. Italian meal, of course. Christos and Bryer had had another argument, which I'd tried to smooth over in the afternoon. They chatted in private but I doubt that it helped. Everyone here seems angry at everyone else. Katerina Krikos-Davis (she and Harry kindly took us to Stratford yesterday) doesn't talk to Meg. Meg doesn't talk to Bryer, and so on.

My paper at Brum last Thursday, on Ritsos's Painterly Technique, was very well received. Everyone encouraged me to publish it. Bryer said that it was the best they'd had, etc. Last week I gave Kazantzakis, Twentieth Century Nineteenth Century Romantic for Roddy Beaton at King's. Twenty-five people in a large hall, but they listened. Rowena Loverance showed up, delighted with a new job at the British Museum's education department. BBC asked for an interview. Roddy and I had supper after the obligatory hour in a pub with students and staff. He thinks he was turned down at Harvard because of his conservative politics.

Mayme Noda came here the other day for two weeks. I accompanied her in the Verdi Stabat Mater. Am playing occasionally with a good Finnish (!) violinist, Lisa.

Am teaching the Iliad. But half the class doesn't do the reading, so far. Sandra Cronk says the academics are more serious at Pendle Hill.

October 22, 1985

Göteborg, Sweden

I lectured last night to about 100 people on Seferis and Elytis—in English, of course—to Bo-Lennart Eklund's students, plus members of the Swedish Hellenic Society. Good audience. Enough questions afterwards. English seems to present no problem. Anita Eklund, Bo-Lennart's wife, particularly liked my reading of the poems. Huge party (παρέα) at "Olympus" restaurant afterwards: retsina, μεζεδάκια, αρνί. This morning at the department. Bo (pronounced Bou) is mainly into linguistics, not literature. He's doing a computer analysis of the occurrence of interval augment in Greek verbs in the newspaper Τα Νέα. He's also interested in early translations of Greek texts into Swedish. He told me about Knös and Kazantzakis. There are letters in the library at Uppsala. Bo has programmed everything himself, using Basic, sort files, and the like. More than I ever did. Spoke to the Professor of (Ancient) Greek, who fears that his position will be frozen when he retires and that Ancient Greek will be restricted to only one university in Sweden. Just like England. My theory is that the Greeks themselves will have to train Hellenists and Neohellenists in the future. The impetus deriving from the Renaissance is suffering from entropy elsewhere. It's ironic that just as classics should occupy the magnificent building that they enjoy, the specialty should be deemed a luxury by the authorities.

We walked to the harbor and saw a “tall ship,” a three-master used as a training vessel, thence to the museums and cultural center via the commercial district and opera house. This city is like Vienna in that it’s uncongested, clean, quiet, civilized. Only 500,000 population, but all the urban amenities are present, and some of the horrors. Parks everywhere. Shopping streets closed to traffic. Separate bicycle lanes. Public transport everywhere via tram. Municipal library filled with books and newspapers of all languages, including Greek of course. We went to the new building of the fine arts faculty in the university. Charming Scandinavian design, simple, yet not sterile. Long talk with the director of computing; saw projects tagging Swedish language samples to determine trends in syntax. Ate in student cafeteria; sat next to a charming girl who’d been in San Francisco and loved it; wants to go back. The Swedish girls are sometimes utterly stunning, gorgeous! Through the Art Museum with Amilia Eklund as our charming and knowledgeable guide. Swedish painting follows predictable European styles but has its own character somehow. Quite sensual despite the northern coolness. Afterwards we bought some Swedish crystal, but not any computers, though tempted.

Supper at Bo-Lennart’s and Anita’s apartment two miles from the center. Again the simple scan-lines in formation, as in our charming hotel room: everything white. Lovely meal with good conversation. She especially is a dear.

October 23, 1985

Göteborg–Stockholm

By train to Stockholm. Not much scenery, really. Rather, the landscape looks exactly like Southern Vermont, or Washington County, New York: rolling farmland, hay rolled in the same way. Massey Ferguson tractors, barns looking just like ours. We were met at the station by Hans Ruge, a thin, ultra nervous German (Berliner) who came to Sweden as a boy—his father was killed in the war. Our language of communication: Greek, which was nice. Apparently he’s in his third marriage and already having a row at home, so we never saw the third wife or the home (for which he apologized profusely). The second wife is his secretary! (We never saw her, either.) He enthused about Stockholm, especially in comparison to Göteborg, while taking us on the bus—he has never owned a car—to our three-room apartment (!) in the Wenner-Gren center at the end of Sveagäten, the main boulevard. A huge center for visiting scholars, mostly scientists. Our entry had families from China, Poland, etc. All facilities. Apartment exquisitely designed and furnished, as we've come to expect in Sweden. I telephoned Bo's former student Thomas Anfält in Uppsala regarding the Kazantzakis letters to Börje Knös in the library there. We'll go on Friday. Hans showed us how to walk to the university, through the green belt park—no danger—just a few harmless homosexuals in the daytime. Bicycle paths everywhere. Green grass everywhere. No congestion. No traffic even in rush hour. Eight million people only in the whole of Sweden; maybe 1½ million in Stockholm. I lectured on Kazantzakis as a twentieth-century nineteenth-century romantic. The Greek consul, present in Göteborg, came again. Hans's colloquial assistant, Άννα Κυριακίδου, was hyper-enthusiastic; says she adores Kazantzakis. About sixty people, more than Hans had expected. Some good questions, including a brilliant one from a student who asked if Jesus' acceptance of Judas wasn't really the same as Mr. Bloom's acceptance of the suitors, and if so, why is Kazantzakis so different from Joyce? I had a hard time answering! Afterwards, another Greek meal in a Cypriot restaurant near our apartment. Hans, Anna, a Swede who teaches Modern Greek at Lund, another woman. Fun! No shortage of conversation, all in Greek.

October 24, 1985

Stockholm

We walked all the way downtown to meet Hans at the Obelisk-Centrum. He then walked us all over this beautiful, grandiose city with its numerous islands connected by bridges. Why do other cities make such good use of water whereas New York's water is hardly visible? We ended in the old city, itself on a small island or peninsula, and ate in a German-style pub/restaurant. Hans kept emphasizing the German presence in Sweden from the times of the Hanseatic League onwards. But I didn't like the German church at all—too Baroque and cluttered. He left us, and we shopped for Swedish crystal (Kosta Boda and quilts for our bed. Bought opera tickets for tomorrow. Returned to our luxury flat via subway (functional, not beautiful), showered, walked again to the university. L lectured this time in a seminar room to maybe twenty-five, on Modern Greek responses to the glory that was Greece, in English, of course, as last night. This presents no problem. The audience got all the jokes.

Good questions afterwards, including one from the Finnish girl, who wondered why the Finnish epic didn't play the same role in Modern Finnish literature as does Ancient Greek literature in Modern Greek. (She had spent four months in Cambridge, Massachusetts, as it turned out.) We left Hans to his domestic problems and returned by ourselves this time to the same restaurant—delicious μουςακάς, which of course turned my stomach a bit afterwards (olive oil?). All these pleasures are paid for, of course, by the ample fees given me for these lectures.

October 25, 1985

Uppsala–Stockholm

Breakfast in our apartment. No. 52 bus to Central Station. No traffic at 8:30 a.m. Train to Uppsala to see the letters to Knös.

Börje Knös brevsamling
University of Uppsala library
Custodian Thomas Anfält
Call no.: G 137a + volume

Volume 12, p. 191.

From Kazantzakis, 24-11-46, Paris, Rue de l'Échelle 4, chez Segrédaki Cher Monsieur Knös!

Je viens de recevoir avec gratitude Vos oeuvres que je me mettrai aussitôt à lire avec joie. Le figure de Janus Lascaris m'a toujours été chère avec celle de Marc Unsueros et au-dessus de toutes, celle de Pléthon. Une étude sur ce grand homme de notre renaissance qui a voulu réaliser la grande synthèse de l'hellénisme et du christianisme, serait précieuse; c'est une des personnalités les plus fascinantes et les plus prophétiques de la culture néo-grecque.

Je commence à me mettre en contact avec des Universités américaines pour la fondation de l'Institut de la Culture Néo-grecque. Je voudrais, moi aussi, que cela pût être installé à Paris; mais qui pourrait alors le financer? Le Grèce, impossible; la France, elle a maintenant, elle aussi, d'autres chats—et quels chats!—à fouetter. Pourrait-il être installé en Suède? Je ne sais; mais aux États-Unis, paraît-il, la chose est faisable; on veut attirer là-bas—et ils le peuvent, hélas!—font ce qui subsiste encore de sain et du spirituel sur cette vieille Europe décrépite: ils ont hâte de transmuier le dollar en esprit.

La situation en Grèce devient de jour en jour plus tragique; l'intelligentsia la plus pure est persecutée; il faut tâcher de sauver la flamme vaillante; voilà pourquoi moi qui suis resté toute ma vie retiré dans une solitude profonde, je sens à present le devoir impératif de sacrifier ce Bonheur pour courir à l'aide de la race en danger.

10-12-46 [same letter, new page]

Veillez m'excuser, cher M. Knös, du retard; je viens de rentrer de Bruxelles ou j'ai été rencontrer quelques personnalités intellectuelles et visiter l'exposition du peintre Van Gogh que j'aime beaucoup.

Je m'empresse de Vous expédier cette letter tant retardée et Vous remercier, encore une fois, de Votre amabilité de m'envoyer Vos livres.

Bientôt j'espère pourvoir Vous envoyer la suite de Zorbas; je crois que ce roman va être publié en France sous le titre: "Sur un rivage crétois."

Veillez, M. Knös, recevoir l'assurance de mon amitié profonde.

N. Kazantzaki

Volume 12, p. 192.

Postcard to Knös, Freiburg, 20-12-54:

Πολυ αγαπητε φίλε, καλα Χριστούγεννα, καλο ειρηνικο, εφτυχισμένο 1955. Σε λίγες μέρες γυρίζουμε στο Κουκούλι. Σας έχουμε πάντα στο νου και στην καρδια μας.

Έχω πολα να Σας γράψω, μα όταν θα γυρίσω στην Antibes. Απο την Ελένη κι απο μένα εγκάρδιες εφχες στη γυναίκα Σας και Σας, πολυ αγαπητε φίλε!

N Καζαντζάκης

Letters from Eleni to Knös, all in Volume 12.

p. 124: 19-11-57 from c/o Παπαϊωάννου, Ομήρου 6, Αθήνα. Clearly 1957 because she refers to her terrible loneliness, and asks if Knös wants any photos of Nikos's funeral. Yet the date looks like 19-11-51 (November 19, 1951) and is placed in sequence in the Urpsala collection as 1951, not 1957. . . . Θέλετε όταν πάω στο Antibes να σας γράψω στη μηχανη τα Γράματα στον Γκρέκο να δείτε αν θα τα μεταφράσετε; . . . Η εξομολόγηση αφτη στον Γκρέκο δεν είταν η τελευταία γραφη. Είναι η δέφτερη. Νομίζω όμως πως πρέπει να την τυπόσωμε.

p. 127: Antibes, 16-10-56. Ίσως να σας ενδιαφέρει να μάθετε πως αν κι ο Νίκος απαγόρευσε, τις προάλες, το Β.Β.С. να διαβάσει από την «Αγγλία» του (τους έγγραψε πως τόρα πια άλαζε γνώμη για την Αγγλία που καταδυναστεύει την Κύπρο) λοιπον το Β.Β.С. εκανεάφτη την ομιλία 2 φορές συνεχες.

p. 128: Antibes, 17-12-56. Says that Kazantzakis's health is very bad.

p. 129: 3-8-57, Hôtel Slovenski Dom, Rogaška, Slatina, Slovenia, Yugoslavia. Says she'll copy «Ήθελε λείει να μείνει ελέφτερος· Σκοτόστε τον!» Είναι εντελος τελειομένο απο το Νίκο. . . .

p. 130: 26-8-57, from Rigshospitalet Pavillon 61 Copenhagen. Kazantzakis hospitalized after his return from China.

p. 131: 17-9-57, from Universitätsklinik v. Müller, Freiburg. Kazantzakis's arm still μια φοβερη πληγη although his temperature is decreasing.

p. 133: 25-9-57. Heilmeyer optimistic. But the arm is still swollen. Kazantzakis cannot write. Φτωχούλης sold 30,000 copies in France in French translation. In Holland, Χρ. Ξαναστ. has reached 50,000 copies. But in Scandinavian countries Χρ. Ξαναστ. και Καπ. Μιχ. πουλιούνται πολυ σιγα.

p. 134: Freiburg, 20-10-57. Nikos is well. Writes about the Nobel. Φιλελεύθερο party officials support Kazantzakis (prime minister: Karamanlis). Telegram sent by Averoff to the Greek ambassador to Sweden, Alexis Kyrou. Tsatsos also supports Kazantzakis, as does Queen Freiderika. Yet the rumor is that only the communists in Greece support Kazantzakis. Eleni fears that this rumor is the work of Kyrou and Pindar Ανδρούλης, ambassadors and their wives. Kazantzakis has been translated into 24 languages, approximately. Kyrou (αδελφος Κύρου Εστίας) συκοφαντουν συστηματικα τον Νίκο.

p. 135: Antibes, 30-10-57. Writes that Kazantzakis has died. . . . Je n'oublierai jamais que l'oeuvre de Nikos a été conue grâce à vous.

p. 137: 29-11-57. . . . Θ' αρχίσω αμέσως ν' αντιγράψω στη μηχανη την Αναφορα στο Γκρέκο να σας τη στέλνω . . .

p. 145: Antibes, 2-4-58. Again confirms that Ambassador Kyrou ruined Kazantzakis's chances for the Nobel, despite Knös's efforts.

p. 146 (page 2 of the same letter) . . . in the 9 years since Knös first knew Kazantzakis, who had then written only Zorba, this sick man wrote Χρ. Ξανα, Καπ. Μιχ, Τελ Πειρ, Francis, Κούρος, Κων. Παλαιολόγος, Chris. Columbus, Fratricides, Γράματα στον Γκρέκο [note the title]. Kazantzakis translated into 27 languages, she thinks.

p. 147: 25-4-58, Antibes. Ο Νίκος, στην α' του γραφη στα «Γράμματα στο Γκρέκο» βάζει ολόκληρα τα 3 ταξίδια του—Πελοπόννησο-Άγιον Όρος-Σίνα. Δεν πρόφτασε να τα συντομέψει. Τώρα που αντιγράφω το Σίνα (μέσα στα Γράματα στον Γκρέκο) βρίσκω πολυ μικρες παραλαγες. Κρίμα μεγάλο. Γιατι οι λιγοστες γραμες που πρόστεσε ή άλαξε είναι πάντα στο καλύτερο . . . έξοχες!

Αν μπορέομε με τον Πρεβελάκη να βρούμε μια λύση! Πως να τυποθει αφο το χειρόγραφο; 1) Έτσι όπως είναι; Με ολόκληρο τα 3 ταξίδια; 2) Αφαιρόντας τα ταξίδια; προσθέτοντας μόνο μια σημείωση . . . 3) αφαιρόντας τα κομάτια που βγήκαν στο γαλικο βιβλίο; [She means Du Mon Sinai à l'Isle de Vénus.]

Πάντως εγώ αντιγράφω το χειρόγραφο και θα σας γράψω τη γνώμη του Πρεβελάκη.

p. 154: Antibes, 27-7-59. Says that the French translation of Ασκητική was done by Kazantzakis himself, and that he introduced some corrections.

p. 170: Athens, 22-2-1960. Clear that Prevelakis and Kasdaglis are preparing the MS of Report to Greco, the last 70 pages at this point. Eleni will type them and send them to Knös. . . . Jeune, il n'a pas eu peut-être le courage de demander à hauts cris d'être envoyé à la première ligne, pendant la guerre. A la guerre de liberation de 1941-45 il a demandé à plusieurs reprises de monter au maquis. Mais les maquisards, envenimés par ses enemies le considéraient comme Intelligence Service, tandis que les royalists le calomniaient comme agent secret de l'Angleterre. Ainsi on lui refusa cette joie et cet honneur de se mettre activement au service de la liberté.

Knös was Sous-Secrétaire d'État au Ministère de l'Instruction, Publique et des Cultes—Statssekreteraren.

Πέτρος Μαρκάκης (b. 1912) in 1951 was Γενικός Γραμματέας Συνδέσμου Ελλήνων Λογοτεχνών.

Max Tau (b. 1897) in 1951 was Littaraer Avdeling at Johan Grundt Tanum Forlag, Oslo.

Tomas Anfält was Assistant Librarian, Manuscript Division, Uppsala University Library, Box 510, S-751 20 Uppsala, Sweden.

I sat absorbed in the Knös correspondence from 10:45 a.m. until 3:45 p.m. with a break for pineapple pizza (!). Tomas Anfält was very helpful. I brought to his attention the letter dated 1951 that must have been written in 1957 since Eleni refers to Kazantzakis's burial. He didn't know that Knös had returned the Kazantzakis letters in his possession, at Eleni's request. They are published now in Ο ασυμβίβαστος, also I believe in Νέα Εστία. When we get back to Dartmouth I'll send Anfält the bibliographical data.

Uppsala is a very small university town, like a New England campus, especially now in the autumn when the leaves are falling. The cathedral, the largest in Scandinavia, is beautiful—i.e., not Baroque for once, except for the pulpit. Lovely paintings throughout and nice contrast between brickwork and stucco. We had our daily café au lait and pastry, and returned to Stockholm on the 5:05 p.m. train. How lovely the Swedish people are; I see their features everywhere in America now that I think of it.

In the evening we went to the State Opera in Stockholm to see Handel's Julius Caesar. Not one of Handel's masterpieces, to be sure. Yet it has a relentless heaviness that weighs (sic) on one, faute de mieux. The production compensated for lack of superb music (and superb voices) by introducing lots of good "business" in the acting, mise-en-scène, scenic effects, etc. Ptolemy (presented alas as 100% Egyptian, not Greek) was made abominably cruel; Cleopatra a sweet little conniver. The plot treats her affair with Caesar and her eventual siding with him against Ptolemy, her brother. The tickets, obviously subsidized, were about $4.00 each! The theater was half-empty. We had to leave after the second act, to catch the 9:35 sleeper to Copenhagen.

October 26, 1985

Copenhagen

I was under the roof in a three-tier 2nd class sleeper, but the bed was fine: wide, soft, and covered with a quilt. When the conductor awakened us we had just crossed the water and were in Helsingør, near Hamlet's castle. Walked around Copenhagen from 9:00 a.m. until 4:30 p.m. Not as nice as Stockholm, Amsterdam, or Vienna, but maybe it was the gray weather. Nothing playing in the State Theater, no ballet, no opera, just a play in Danish. No concert in the Concert Hall, and it's Saturday night. Stores closed at 2:00 p.m. and the crowded shopping area quickly became deserted. As expected, wonderful design in ordinary things: coat racks, coffee tables, restaurant décor, etc. But the older (19th century) buildings are ugly. The cathedral, however, heavily influenced by the Hellenic revival, and complete with Doric columns, a frieze, and a pediment, is very pure: all white. Lovely. Christ is in the apse, and six of his disciples line each wall of the nave: so the whole family is there, so to speak. We saw the university quarter—lots of bookshops—, the pedestrian shopping streets, the round tower (climbed to the top and saw practically nothing), Nyhavn canal, the docks, the Queen's palace, with changing of the guard, the Museum of Applied Arts (coffee tables looking like Piet Mondrian paintings), an exhibit of 25 contemporary New York artists, which drew great crowds of Danish viewers; the Greek collection in the National Museum, and various parks, squares, gardens (the Tivoli is closed at this time of year). The palace, changing of guards, etc. seemed a bit pretentious for Denmark's size and status. The museums are poor, compared, say, to New York. In a way, we have to wonder why we came here, but it satisfied curiosity of a long-time standing. I shouldn't forget to say that the best sight of all, throughout the day, was the people, who are very beautiful when young. Girls just like delicate flowers, with skin that is translucent. A city full of Renoir models. It's strange then that Danish painting is so poor. And Thorvaldsen, the "great" sculptor, is a pitiful imitator of Greek classicism, with everything "prettified" until one wonders whether he lived in the real world.

Supper in the grill of the RR station. Roast beef, delicious. But we sat next to a couple who smoked continuously—both—and witnessed a little drama. He was obviously beginning what was meant to end in love-making after the meal. But she had a child with her, maybe nine years old. By a previous marriage, evidently. He gave the child small change to "go and get lost" for a time. Fine. When the child returned she demanded her mother's attention continuously, to the man's chagrin. We forwent our coffee, walked, looked at more Danish furniture in the windows of Den Permanente, and had coffee in the McDonald's-type restaurant in the hotel. In the evening, there being no ballet or opera, we bathed, watched a good television program (in English: magician, jugglers, etc.), and read Homer's Iliad.

October 27, 1985

Copenhagen–Göteborg

Huge breakfast in the Astoria Hotel. Cheese, ham, salami, jams, butter, rolls, and all kinds of wonderful Danish pastry. I recalled the Danish pastry chef at Brant Lake Camp (Jack?). He was pleased to see a tall blond boy, Richard Aldrich, when we cycled once to camp ahead-of-season, instead of all those dark squatty Jews. Probably was a homosexual.

Train to Göteborg. How nicely they manage the crossing from Helsingør to Helsingborg! Three wagons go directly on the ferry, with wonderful precision. You can sleep right through it, as we obviously did on the way south Friday night.

Met by Lennart and Anita Eneroth. They, and she especially, became friendly with Alice when all were studying together at the University of Michigan in 1956–57. Subsequently they visited the Busecks in Arizona, my parents in both Sunnyside and Manhattan; and the Busecks visited them in Gothenburg. So we were just another in the series. He is a periodontist and district director of the State dental service. She is a painter and agent for other artists. They drove us to a lookout spot to see the whole city; then to a little harbor near their suburb; then home to a gigantic house filled with strange objets-d'art for sale. Three sons were home; they have four, all blond beauties. She served us a festive meal of fish soup and reindeer meat, which tasted like venison.

Flight to Heathrow and Flightlink bus to B'ham, arriving 1:00 a.m. Long day!

READING AT WOODBROOKE

Homer, Iliad, tr. Fitzgerald.

Racine, Phèdre.

Edmund Keeley, A Wilderness Called Peace.

Philip Butler, Racine, a Study.

Martin Turnell, Jean Racine: Dramatist.

John Milton, Paradise Lost.

Royston Tester, "The Hartlean Male Protagonist. A Search for Self (Ph.D. thesis, McMaster University).

Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida.

David Jones, In Parenthesis.

Πάννης Πίτσος, Φαίδρα.

October 31, 1985

Woodbrooke

Taught Iliad in the morning, the last session. Next week, Paradise Lost.

Train to Oxford, hastily preparing for BBC interview tomorrow. Hour in Taylor Institute Library; thence to 47 Wellington Square and Peter Mackridge. Librarian greeted me, "Ah, Professor Bien, we know you from your books.” How nice! Lectured on Ritsos’s Painterly Technique. Jeffrey Doyle was there with his wife Nancy. Also Oliver Taplin, whom we’d met in Chris Wolff’s home at Dartmouth. Lecture was “attacked” afterward by a rather pugnacious Greek, and also some others. I defended myself adequately, I think. Actually, they’re probably right: that my distinction between temporal and spatial in poetry is overdone.

Oliver then took me off to Magdalen for dinner. A ceremony. Sherry in the SCR. Then in procession to Hall, gown on (not for me). Grace in Latin, everyone standing. Dinner of prawns, plaice, stuffed chicken, ample wine in decanters. Grace again in Latin. Off to a special room for desert. Redistribution: new partners. Two by two. Port, Madeira, and Sack passed in decanters. Fruit. And snuff, my first time. You pinch it with your fingers, then place it in the hollow behind your thumb, then pass the back of your hand beneath each nostril in turn and . . . sniff! Nice sensation. Pure nicotine instantaneously in the bloodstream, so they said. We sat in horseshoe configuration. At the wide end of the horseshoe a “machine” for sliding the decanter of wine from one end of the horseshoe to the other, so no one had to rise. Then off to still another room for coffee and the weighing machine and the “setting book.” At dinner I talked mostly with Oliver, feeling very knowledgeable about the Iliad at the moment. He is just completing a book on Homer. Over port and fruit my “host” was an elderly biologist, very tall and eminent. Turned out to be the teacher of Sir Peter Medawar, and the collaborator of Sir Peter’s early researches into nerve transplants. So we had that in common, since I’d had supper with Sir Peter at Dartmouth. All in all a relaxed evening, very different from the meal at University College in the 1980s when Peter Buseck took me. This lasted from 7:30 until 10:30. Reminded me of Harvard, of course—i.e., the chance to meet and speak to people in other disciplines. On the other side of me was a visiting German, also a biologist. Another man a professor of Portuguese.

Taxi to Mackridges’. More talk with Peter and his wife Jackie. Peter will try to protect MG interests in Brum. He’s on the search committee but without a vote. Christos has finally been allowed to serve, despite Bryer’s connivances to have him excluded.

Friday, November 1, 1985

Letter from Tom Brown inviting me to apply for the position of Executive Clerk at Pendle Hill. Of course I refused, or declined. Sonny Cronk and I had a good talk about it. Chrysanthi said, "Are you out of your mind even to consider that?" Yet I'm haunted by all the times I declined chances for Quaker service in order to remain well paid and comfortable at Dartmouth. I hinted to Tom, however, that if I ever were to come to PH it would be more appropriate to be in an academic as opposed to an administrative capacity.

Mother telephoned from New York. My heart sank. In her last letter she asked us to come home early. She reported that Dad is now in the psychiatric section of Mt. Sinai suffering from severe depression. It's a special geriatric service; they think they can help him. The best help would be to let him die as quickly as possible. Mother in turmoil, of course. But at least he's no longer in the apartment, where it had become impossible to cope.

Yannis Karavidas of the BBC Greek Service showed up as planned at lunchtime to interview me. He uses our book in evening classes and loves it. He asked questions, submitted in advance, on Kazantzakis and Ritsos. Then we improvised on MGSA, MG studies in America, etc. It will be broadcast on ERT in Greece at 1:00 p.m. on the Saturday after next.

Saturday, November 2, 1985

Lovely day in London. First to BM. Saw special exhibit on Buddhism, lots of Egyptian mummies, then the splendid show on the Parthenon and its restoration prepared by the Greek Ministry of Culture. What a pleasure then to see the frieze of Bassae, since we'd been to the site. Lapiths vs. Centaurs, Greeks vs. Amazons, both showing victory of civilization over barbarism. Thence to Elgin Marbles, slowly, with full appreciation of the two great processions meeting at the center with the gift of the peplos: horsemen, and chariots, sacrificial animals. And the wonderful pediments, too, what's left of them. Especially the rising horses of Apollo, so vigorous, on one end and the falling horse of the evening on the other, eyes bulging from fatigue, mouth hanging open. The metopes of Centaurs and Lapiths, again, are also gorgeous.

Taxi to the National Gallery. The demonstration in Trafalgar Square against Apartheid. Gallery showed Francis Bacon's favorites, including Michelangelo's Entombment and Rembrandt's old crone with withered hands. We went directly to the Spanish gallery to see El Greco's Christ Chasing the Moneylenders, a larger version than the one at the Frick, and not quite so powerful. There's also a fascinating study for a large painting in the Escorial: Adoration of the Name of Jesus (IHΣ) showing the Doge of Venice, the Pope, and King Phillip II of Spain kneeling at the base and the name emblazoned above. Other paintings I appreciated especially were Pissarro's Blvd. Montmartre at night, the one that Daphne liked so much when we saw it in Boston; Van Gogh's Long Grass with Butterflies; my favorite Michelangelo the Madonna and Child with St. John and Angels (unfinished); Da Vinci's Virgin of the Rocks, of course; Titian's Bacchus and Ariadne; Rembrandt's Self-Portrait age 34, Balshazzar's Feast and the famous Woman Bathing in a Stream. Finally we enjoyed Vermeer's Young Woman Standing at a Virginal—our Vermeer, that hangs in the bedroom in a reproduction that I bought on 4th Avenue for 25 cents.

Tea in the Strand. Then walked to the Aldwych to see Brenda Jackson play Racine's Phèdre (in English, of course). Not much linguistic joy, but dramatically strong: stunning, although Racine pales before the ancients because the chorus, and thus the lyrical element, is missing. However, the psychotic element of Phèdre did come across. Brenda Jackson seems to like psychotic women: Is Phèdre so different from the heroine of Strange Interlude?

Delicious shrimp scampi and then to Euston and "home."

Sunday, November 3, 1985

Nice conversation at breakfast with Donald Bodley, former actor-director-producer, about Phèdre. And with Peter Ivory on D. H. Lawrence. Afterwards Eileen King stopped me in the hall and went on about things we'd been saying in the Iliad class. All this before 9:30 a.m. Then devotional led by Michael Staines. He read, leaving intervals for meditation between each passage, seven or eight passages from the Old Testament, New Testament, Quaker Faith and Practice, etc., all having to do with water as a metaphor for the spiritual life. Moses giving he thirsty Israelites to drink during the Exodus. Jesus asking for a drink. The Philistine woman: offering her living water. David refusing to drink the water obtained for him at the well of Bethlehem by soldiers at the risk of their lives. Jesus gasping "I thirst" on the Cross. John of Patmos speaking of the river of God descending.

The German biologist who sat near to me last Thursday at Magdalen did research on equilibrium. We spoke about seasickness. He said it's caused by a disparity between what the eye registers and what the inner ear registers regarding stability. The worst thing is to be in a situation aboard ship with the eye registering stability—e.g., to be in one's cabin, reading—whereas the ship is actually pitching. It's best to be outside on deck, not because of the fresh air as is commonly thought, but because the eye then registers the same instability registered willy-nilly by the inner ear. I asked him if any studies had been done regarding seasickness in blind people. He found that a fascinating aspect of the problem and doubted that anyone had investigated it.

November 7, 1985.

To Oxford again. Another Ritsos lecture, better received this time. Saw Christopher Robinson and Roger Green. Nice cream tea with Peter Mackridge at Brown's. Afterwards, supper with Nancy Langston and Jeffrey Doyle, plus one of Peter Mackridge's students, a nice American named Van Dyck who, like Nancy, has a Marshall. She turns out to be the granddaughter of Philadelphia Quakers who are now in Kendal. And they summer in Londonderry and love Kinhaven concerts, so we had lots to talk about.

November 8, 1985

Spoke after worship with Adam Curle, who is here for Council. Again at lunch. I'd just bought his book, True Justice. He is currently negotiating in Sri Lanka; has been back and forth eight times this year. Spent a decade as professor at Harvard. Disapproves of the way his successors are doing Peace Studies at Bradford, because they concentrate too much on disarmament. Curle has a broadly sociological approach; wants to learn how to detect warning signals of forthcoming international violence and then to learn how to "cure" the troubles before they erupt. Katerina and Harry Davis came for supper and we invited Milena, the Venetian, afterwards for coffee.

November 9, 1985

Peter and Monika Ricketts for supper and "silly games" afterwards. Successful evening. Peter seems a real friend and Monika, despite her prim, even prissy, exterior, is warm and fun-loving. I made the same mistake initially about Elizabeth Jeffreys. Also, I suppose, about L. C. Knights. I told Peter about Knights' "confession" to me once at Queens College Cambridge when he poured out his regrets for ever leaving Bristol and his hatred of the pettiness and incessant in-fighting he'd found at Cambridge.

November 10, 1985

No Meeting today, because I was on wash-up. Afterwards, did a report on a Ph.D. thesis on L. P. Hartley's works. Strange how close and familiar they seemed, even after so many years. I remembered everything.

Telephoned Mother yesterday. Alice is there, thank God. Dad's psychiatric drug therapy had to be halted for the moment because he's running a fever. He's in Mt. Sinai, having had a breakdown: severe depression. With luck he'll expire there. Otherwise, Mother plans to move him and herself to Hanover. We've alerted Audrey Logan and Mary Raszias, should this happen before we arrive back on December 16 or 17.

November 11, 1985

To Leeds to lecture to John Smart's pupils. It's a nice city. The audience was mostly classicists, including one named Arnott, and a Viennese who grew up in Bournville. Tough—good—questions afterwards, but very friendly. Relaxed dinner in an Italian restaurant. Good talk. Jollity. Slept in former mansion now owned by the university.

November 12, 1985

"British breakfast"! Taxi driver told me his two children are in university. Bemoaned absence of Brontës from school curricula. Said he'd been to Haworth many times. I chose York instead, regretfully.

Lovely city, but the Minster is cut in half by the rood screen. Fire destroyed a transept last year; all blocked off; also West Window. Memorials on south aisle trace history of the British Empire. This one fell at a mutiny in India; this one in Egypt; this one in South Africa, etc. And one fell from his horse in Phoenix Park! Chapter House gorgeous, huge, gay. I walked the walls, saw the Merchant Adventurers' Hall, and the splendid exhibits at the Castle Museum, whole streets reconstituted as they were in the 19th century. Military section showed the battle of Marston Moor, with Fairfax and Cromwell against the Royalists. I'm reading Paradise Lost! Alas, missed the famous railway museum. York, and even Leeds, reminds one of how dumpy Birmingham is, really.

Returned in time to do epilogue. Played the first movement of Brahms' Horn Trio. The nice Dutch girl, Ingrid, who works in the Groningen Polemological Institute, had to leave. We had a coffee party and all the men made sure to kiss her!

November 13, 1985

Worked on Greco chapter in the morning. Played with Liisa (violinist) after lunch. Tutorial with Dorothy Farrant at teatime. She's completed her radio play on John Woolman. I hope that Donald Bodley will "produce" it in a bench reading.

Supper at Jean and Tony Brown's, with Milena. Tony is editing a Byzantine text, a dialogue of Christians and Jews never before published. His hobbies are amazing. Has a super model railway all homemade. Continues with silver jewelry. Jean collects dollhouses obsessively. Strange.

November 14, 1985

My class in Paradise Lost, Books IV–V. Then off to Cambridge with Chrysanthi. Lectured on Χριστός ξανασταυρώνεται for David Holton. Cambridge is lovely. Nice new "campus" for arts faculties. Classics has its own building, with a huge library. Met Alexis Vlasto afterward, sons of Πέτρος Βλαστός. Brian Phillips came. Also Noël and Joy Jones. Supper with David and Ann Holton afterwards. She's a bit of a pill, but he's mellow.

November 15, 1985

Lectured on «Επιτάφιος» in the morning. We were housed in David's college—Selwyn. Croissants for breakfast. Then an hour with Brian Phillips. He's writing his dissertation on Philip Noel-Baker and Quaker problems at the end of the nineteenth century. I hope to get a Pendle Hill pamphlet out of him. Lunch with Noël and Joy. Lots to talk about! Greece, children, future plans, Vouli, Farm School . . . They drove us to Ely Cathedral. Stunning. No rood screen to cut the view in half. Train to Peterborough. I wanted to see the cathedral because of memories from L. P. Hartley. Lovely cathedral square and shopping precinct, but the cathedral itself is not as interesting as Ely's. Evensong in progress. No one in the congregation. Zero. (Ditto for Selwyn Thursday evening. A strange anachronism.) By train back to Brum. Dinner in Indian restaurant. Nice to return to "home"—Woodbrooke—and be missed. Oscar Wallis with a big smile: "You've been away!"

November 16, 1985

Didn't leave the building. Kazantzakis's Greco in the morning. Nice talk with Frank from Sierra Leone. Read Troilus and Cressida in the afternoon. Practiced piano until accosted by a man who'd been here with us in 1967 and had subsequently joined a charismatic movement. He told me his life story at great length. Then Kathy Gray appeared with a boyfriend. She's doing hotel management at Manchester Polytechnic. Hasn't lost her big smile. Jasmyn did the Epilogue with a very touching account of how she "tamed" her students by means of understanding rather than caning. Talked with David Acqua about work camps in Ghana and elsewhere. He's known Dave Richie.

November 20, 1985

Accompanied a singer in César Franck and Handel. John Punshon's class in the morning, and Liisa in two Finnish compositions for epilogue. I'm finally getting over the jitters accompanying piano in public but not quite. Also played hymns at Central House service a few weeks ago.

November 21, 1985

Taught Books VI, VII, and VIII of P.L. Some of the class are now converts. Lovely to have Muriel Poulter in class. Had tea with her last Sunday. She has an Epstein original, and a newly acquired David Jones drawing. A real intellectual.

In the afternoon sent a "FAX" testimonial—i.e., a whole page via electronic transmission like a photograph—to Sydney for Stratos Constantinidis. Then University seminar. Μιχάλης Χρυσανθόπουλος on Viziinos's "Moskov Selim." How nice to have Ottomanists present! In-different dinner in an Indian restaurant.

November 22, 1985

Discovered Monika Niederlauf: flautist. She's good. We did a Mozart concerto, and Fauré. What joy! Ernestine Friedl telephoned re: JMGS. Crisis: no articles. I'll solicit here.

Saturday and Sunday, November 23–24, 1985

What a lovely weekend! On Saturday Meg came and we went to Stratford with Jasmyn. Superb production of Troilus and Cressida, which I've never seen, and which was a particular treat after reading the Iliad so recently. How delicious to see all those august characters demythologized!

Juliet Stevenson as Cressida was magnificent. The play is so strange, so varied. It's high tragedy at moments (when Cressida learns that she has to go to the Greek camp), low farce at others, and everywhere cynical. All the characters undo themselves, so to speak—i.e., prove themselves trivial and disappointing—except Pandarus, who is that way from the start and therefore is paradoxically the only one with “integrity.” He is really what he is: a trivial skunk. The others pretend. Achilles is demolished totally: a narcissistic faggot and coward. Ulysses is predictably slick, Agamemnon barely competent, Nestor sententious and prolix, Troilus a nonentity, etc. I was drained after the performance, from laughter, tears, wonder at the miracle of good theater.

Met Rodney Morgan in the lobby.

Nice lunch in the theater. Good talk with Meg, Chrysanthi, and Jasmyn. Coffee by order in the interval. All very civilized.

Then we all returned to Woodbrooke to have supper with Meg and Tony Brown so they could meet. Chrysanthi went down to lead Saturday night games.

After everyone left, I worked a bit more on the lecture on Ritsos's long poems for London on Monday.

On Sunday: Fine Meeting at Selly Oak. Muriel Poulter ministered, as did Tom Bodine. A gathered Meeting. But I am usually restless in Meetings; it's difficult to center down. I doubt that I have very much faith. More work on the lecture; getting the handout ready. Then flute and piano with Monika again in the afternoon: Fauré and lots of Bach. After supper, Stuart did a “presentation” using Roland and June Ellis, the Wardens. The idea is that each presents five beloved pieces of music, each of which is associated with a period of their lives. It's really an excuse to tell one's life-history, selectively. They added some slides, too. Meanwhile we were treated to Mozart, Beatles, Verdi, Hatzidakis.

November 25, 1985

To London. Nice lunch with the BBC Greek service team: Yannis Karavidas and the head, Paul Nathanail, who did the Routledge dictionary. Nathanail may tour US Modern Greek programs and do a broadcast on them sometime. He was very complimentary about my interview and my Greek. It was broadcast on ERT last Saturday and rebroadcast on the BBC the same day in the evening. Before meeting them, I put last minute touches on my lecture (“The Long Poems of Ritsos”) in Friends House library. Saw Marjorie Sykes sitting at another table; must be ninety years old; very alert mentally and physically.

The lecture went well. Donald Nicol didn't stay. I met him in the Strand at 4:45 escaping. Said he hates Ritsos. Karavidas asked good questions. Pub afterwards with Roddy, Karavidas, and Eleni Γιαννάκη, a graduate student from Rethymno. I'm trying to get them to submit papers, quickly, to JMGS. Ernestine telephoned. She's desperate.

Read in Paradise Lost on the train back.

November 26, 1985

Sent off my "Kazantzakis Twentieth-Century Nineteenth-Century Romantic" to Ernestine.

Princeton University Press has written accepting my proposal for the Selected Letters of Kazantzakis and offering an advance contract. Success on the first try! I wrote the good news to Eleni, Prevelakis, Lawrence Davies, Anemoyannis, CIES, and Chip Ammerman. Let's see now if the Fulbright comes through; this should increase the chances.

November 28, 1985

Taught Books VIII and IX. Good class. Last night Oscar Wallis at Epilogue played a splendid reading on BBC of the death of Socrates from Plato's "Phaedo."

This is Thanksgiving Day. We had turkey, cranberry sauce, corn, and pumpkin pie for supper.

November 30, 1985

To Bristol to visit Henry Gifford and his wife Rosamund. With great good luck we also discovered our house. I'd forgotten the name of the street (it is Woolcot Street, number 5, Redland). "The Shakespeare" is still opposite. The whole row has been brightened with fresh paint, the coal dust removed. Gentrification, no doubt. Didn't seem depressing at all. Bristol itself is still quite recognizable after twenty-six years, though of course it has some new buildings. Gifford morose (in his jolly way) about contemporary England, everything going to ruin. He retired nine years ago—he's now 72—to avoid being made dean. Says he's never been happier, doing what he wants to do: write. Gave the Clark Lectures last year. Interested in Seferis; will have a piece in Grand Street forthcoming. Krishna Kalia sends him Christmas cards; he's just retired after teaching English all these years in India. He told me that when Queenie Leavis first encountered L. C. Knights on the streets of Cambridge, she greeted him “Hello, Professor Judas”! Poor man. Professor Joseph died jogging in Central Park. Tomlinson is still at Bristol. Willett is at Oxford (or London?). Kitto and Sophie Tucker are dead. Gifford’s daughter is a professional guitarist married to a violinist. She plays on BBC3, etc. Their son is in films.

The train was delayed one hour owing to signal failure. We had a swell Chinese dinner in Brum, next to the old B’ham Rep. in Station Street.

December 1, 1985

Dinner at Harry and Katerina Davis’s. Ron Willetts and Jane there. Willetts had his book of poems “Argo” for me; he expects me to do a review (I’d received it by post already). I asked him how he is and he replied “Geriatric!” He sees only out of one eye, but reads and writes still. Talked with a charmer, Catia Galatariotou, who’s just done a thesis on Neophotos. Aglaïa Kasdagli was there too (ex Maria Pavlaki!); now married to an economist. Also Desmond Costa, a lecturer at Brum.

December 2, 1985

Tony Brown and I went to the graduate seminar at Brum. Paper by Michael Stewart, Ph.D. candidate at Oxford, on Modern Greek marriage and ancient Greek initiation: a bit anthropological, on the significance of diving into a well, or the sea, and of rings and circle dancing and veils, etc. Interesting. We arranged with Catia to sup at Woodbrooke with Tony and me next week. Meg finally got the infamous green card.

Attended staff meeting at Woodbrooke in the afternoon. Agenda: courses vs. “community.” I said that community cannot be “organized”; should derive from courses if these are taught in Quaker style—i.e., with true concern of teacher for student. I remember what E. M. Forster said about Cambridge.

Muriel Poulter for supper. Told her I failed to appreciate David Jones’s “In Parenthesis.” She brought a disk with him reading. She seems very appreciative re: Iliad and Paradise Lost.

December 3, 1985

Supper with Chris and Christina Lawson and their son Peter. Chris told me the amazing fact that Harry Newton, after his death, was discovered to have been an agent for the British M-5 (their FBI or CIA) for thirty years, reporting on the doings of leftwing groups including CND!

A double agent, in effect, although he'd left the CP after the Russians invaded Hungary. I was stunned. For his sake I'm glad it didn't come out until after his death. His wife must have felt like Winnie Verloc in Conrad's The Secret Agent.

December 4, 1985

An exhausting morning and afternoon in Peace Studies devoted to South Africa. Somehow the presentations, including a video, were emotionally draining. Everyone felt this. Resource people included Celeste Roberts; the AFSC representative in Namibia (lawyer turned Catholic priest turned lobbyist for South Africa, turned AFSC representative), the FSC reps in Southern Africa, and a South African white living in exile for five years in the UK and active in the revolution, a black South African. We discussed the pros and cons of sanctions (mostly pro) and of divestment (pro). But Celeste kept reminding us to compassionate the whites who are caught in the middle, between their own government and the coloreds/Indians who are revolting. Also described internal dissent among the oppressed. The question is: What happens when the coloreds win? David Acquab said that blacks in Africa generally were not vindictive after liberation and realize that they need the whites' skills. Others feared a bloodbath. An Indian said that the myriads killed after the Raj withdrew there is the price we had to pay for freedom and stability. Quakers weren't too happy with this. Celeste, who saw friends and familiar locales in the video, was almost ready to throw up, she told me. Aileen King was unable to function for the next twenty-four hours. . . . Strange.

The same evening: Liz and Bryer for supper. We managed, mostly because Bryer is such fun. Liz and Meg barely on speaking terms. They've shortlisted the position: Tziovas, Krikos-Davis, Chrysanthopoulos, Dimertzis, Ricks. Bryer saw Christos in Athens and he agrees. Bryer just back from St Catherine's, Sinai; he brought 250 tourists there. Αίσχος! He reminded me that it was Rendell Harris who first deciphered the Codex Sinaiticus, a palimpsest. Harris sat out in the sunshine in the desert with a magnifying glass and read the Greek beneath the upper layer.

December 5, 1985

Vetted and copyedited Karavidas's paper for JMGS. Practiced chamber music. Did my part (Woolman as narrator/journal-writer) in Dorothy Farrant's play, which we're going to do at Epilogue on Monday. Then to John Punshon's home. Wife Veronica, son Don (in hotel management course), daughter Sophie, all plump. Saw 1936 film by the post office called Mailtrain about the daily express from Euston to Scotland with mail. Music by Britten, a poem by Auden recited by him in the clicky-clickety rhythm of the train. The poem is anthologized for schoolchildren in the UK It's called Mailtrain. Then out to a shabby Pakistani restaurant in Mosely, where we ate with our fingers. Nice to see some Muslims and an Englishman dining together at one table. Then to a Hindu sweetshop for betal-leaf (pan) and spices as a "digestive." (I was nearly ready to vomit at this point). Then to their home again for more sweets. Punshon very friendly. He turned down a job at Earlham School of Religion because, he says, he feels he has a mission here in the UK, to help the Society of Friends achieve renewal. By this he means renewed spirituality, the ability to pray, the ability to feel with the heart as well as to think with the mind and also a revival of corporate living: communes and the like. He is encouraged, thinks the Society is on the verge of something very important.

December 6, 1985

Mostly wasted. Vetted Helen Giannakakis's piece on Eroïca and E. K. Brown and had to send it back as unpublishable. . . . Practiced. Out for Chinese dinner with Jasmyn, Jonathan, Hazel, Chrysanthi. Performed Bach, Loeillet, and Fauré at Epilogue with Liisa and Monika. Heard the tape of my BBC broadcast in Greece. Not bad. It really made sense.

Brian Phillips finally sent his essay on "Quaker Political Culture and the Empire 1989–1901." John Punshon will read it and, with luck, give Brian some advice.

Listened to David Jones reciting from Anathemata. Muriel gave me the record. It doesn't send me.

December 7, 1985

Library in the morning. Chrysanthi and I went to the Science Museum in the afternoon to see the giant locomotive "City of Birmingham" plus all the other machines. Lovely. It all started here in the midlands. Bought Christmas pudding and fruitcake to take home.

After supper, played piano for two hours on the lovely Bechstein. My old Beethoven sonatas. The first time I've done this in five years or more, I'm sure. Yet, if anything, I played better than ever. Sight reading is improving. And I can play in public, at least at Woodbrooke, without getting the jitters, ice cold hands, etc. It has only taken forty years!

December 8, 1985

Sunday. Celeste Roberts did the devotional. A beautiful ritual on the subject of peace. An appropriate hymn, a reading from the O.T., a short sermon (interpreting Christ just as Kazantzakis did), a reading from Isaiah 53, the suffering servant. Then: she asked us to stand in a circle. She took a lighted candle. She said she would pray, either silently or aloud, as she held the candle. Then she'd pass it to her neighbor, etc. About 10–12 of the 40 people, including me, prayed out loud, I for Celeste's children and all our children, that they may live out their life span without knowing war. Then another hymn to conclude.

Rowena Loverance came for lunch. She's working in the educational department of the British Museum.

Read Ritsos's Φαίδρα in the afternoon.

Supper at Peter and Monika Ricketts'. Roast beef and Yorkshire pudding.

December 9, 1985

Meg's paper on MG methodology. Lunch afterwards with Christos. Diana Burkhardt saw us; we then got a demonstration of their project linking computers to video and voice production, for language teaching.

In the evening, did Dorothy Farrant's play on Woolman. I played "Woolman's Journal." Donald Bodley directed. Nice to see a pro at work.

Long talk with Marianne Katappo about her dissatisfaction with Woodbrooke. She said the Jesuit community in India was much more genuine because everyone had a vocation and a similar direction.

Catia Galatariotou passed her viva and is now a Ph.D.

December 10, 1985

Catia here for supper with Tony Brown and us. We showed her the Cyril Loukaris Bible, 1638, and the Erasmus first edition, which is rebound (the binder reduced the size of the leaves, slicing some marginal comments in half). I hadn't realized that it was Rendell Harris who'd transcribed and published the Codex Sinaiticus, Syriac version, reading it beneath the superimposed extraneous text (the Codex is a palimpsest) and with infrared equipment, of course. Hoping that Catia will come to Dumbarton Oaks next year.

December 11, 1985

Rehearsed two Christmas songs with Sheila Smith, soprano, a real “kouk” with a double chin slit from ear to ear with a scar from an operation, maybe thyroid. I did much better than last time, because I listened to her and modified the accompaniment to match her ritards, stringendos, etc. Also did six Christmas hymns, all in John Punshon’s class.

December 12, 1985

A busy day, more like home than the serenity of Woodbrooke. Taught my final class, Book XII of P.L. plus students’ final reactions. Chrysanthi recited a long children’s story based on Adam and Eve in Paradise. Donald Bodley brought the house down with a “letter” from a pagan Greek steeped in Homer to Miltonius, a Roman who’d sent him the MS of an exceedingly long and often boring epic ostensibly modeled on Homer. Muriel Poulter surprisingly did nothing. Scottie had written much in her diary but wouldn’t share it. Ann Howard spoke of primary and secondary epic. Others passed. But we got a general discussion going on the nature of epic, and ended strongly. All in all a good experience. Oh, Dorothy Farrant wanted to read “On His Blindness,” but I’d unwittingly done it first.

To the university MG seminar, given by Saunier of the Sorbonne on folksongs, modifying the Beaton-Herzfeld revisionism and pleading that we don’t throw the baby out with the bathwater. I sat in the back and discovered next to me Friar’s new anthology of contemporary Greek poets (with Harkianakis missing) and the catalogue from the exhibit of German Painting at Burlington House. How I’d like to see this, but how?

Meg delivered the MS of her exaugural, for JMGS.

Rushed back to Woodbrooke. Late supper. Then to Martineau Teachers Centre for an evening given by the Greek Language Club. Christos there, also Monika Ricketts, also ? Prokopiou. And what a surprise! They did a play, with costumes, scenery, props, based on the Χαράλαμπος song in our Demotic Greek I. All British actors of course. The υπόθεση of the song was simply spelt out in dialogue and action: how X., an aged groom, decides at the last moment to cancel the wedding. Bride frantic. Her brother and parents threaten X., etc., who relents. The wedding is performed (crowning, Dance of Isaiah, etc.) and all join hands for a συμπόσιον. At one point they even played the song as recorded on our tape in John Rassias's basso profundo! A great surprise and joy. And how well they all spoke their parts.

December 13, 1985

Another full, frantic day. Spent most of it copyediting Meg's paper, which was as sloppy as usual, but also provocative and sensible (as always). Got it in the post to Ernestine. Rehearsed Corelli Pastorale with Monika and Liisa for Log Night, something we hadn't been asked to do but was nevertheless placed on the program. Then rushed to the university for Meg's "celebration party"—i.e., farewell. I was the speaker, and I think the talk was well received. Got a few hearty laughs at least. Bryer was pleased, wants to publish it in The Gazette. I took pains to refer to Christos as well, and offered a final toast to both, not just to Meg. Previously, from 2:00 to 5:00, the search committee had interviewed candidates for Meg's job: Ricks, Davis, Chrysanthopoulos, Tziovas, Dimertzis. They chose Tziovas, and everyone seemed pleased, except the losers, of course. And Chrysanthopoulos and Davis were there and able to smile bravely. Tziovas apparently did brilliantly in the interview. Peter Mackridge's part of the committee was pleased, as was Christos. Also David Lodge, another member. I had a nice talk with him afterwards. He had Tziovas in his "theory" class, also Vassilis Lambropoulos, and called them both brilliant. I told him how I'd supported Lambropoulos despite all the negative feelings toward him. Lodge is very sensitive to Meg's situation because he has a child with Down's Syndrome, aged 19. But they also have two normal children. He said that the English Department just had to revise curriculum drastically to meet a 20% cut: classes increased in size, fewer offerings, cut in personnel. Everyone totally demoralized. No nobility in the profession. Departments are frozen with the same people, who daren't leave for fear of unemployment. Also saw Mrs. Thomson, who was very friendly. Fortunately I'd given George Thomson the appropriate prominence in my speech. She remembered Daphne (who'd broken her arm in the Thomsons' garden!). Dimitri Alexiou was there, telling everyone that there's to be a bus strike on Monday. Christos accompanied me to the bus stop and we had an affectionate farewell, both of us thankful for the unexpected extent of our contact, first in Athens, then in Brum during the past four months. His prospects look slightly better now, though nothing is definite yet.

Another late supper at Woodbrooke, including a late-night surprise: Pavlova. Then Log Night, with me as master of ceremonies. This went better than expected because half the “acts” listed on my program were wrongly placed, or canceled, or with different people, making my announcements a kind of comedy routine that the audience thought “part of the script” and thus rather clever, whereas in truth it was just chaos! Fun! There were some nice moments, including the staff skit. Monika, Liisa, and I played our Pastorale reasonably well.

December 14, 1985

Typed up the “Meg Celebration” speech and sent copies to Meg and Bryer. Woodbrooke goodbyes, with some unexpected warmth—e.g., a huge hug from Imma. The sadness on this score concerns Outi, who has been avoiding us, and nearly everyone, bathed as she is in her own self-pity. Ευτυχώς γλιτώσαμε!

Off to Stratford in the afternoon, by coach, to see Nicholas Nickleby, Part 1 (four hours). A high-class soap opera, full of incredible sentimentality, exaggeration, villains and heroes, moral regeneration, etc. The first act was tedious in places, yet the portrayal of the school in York is searing, horrid. The second act picked up, and ended deliciously with Dickens’ parody of the provincial acting company doing Romeo and Juliet, complete with a happy ending! We were all in stitches. I left with a tremendous appetite for Part 2, but will have to forgo this. Back late, 1:00 a.m.

December 15, 1985

More goodbyes: Milena, Jasmyn, Elena, the Finnish girl who’d visited us in Hanover. Huge hug: she can be warm. As for Liisa . . . ! Outi again in hiding. So we’ll part without a farewell. Like Milton’s Satan, she carries her hell with her.

The last fling. Off to London, after all, to see the exhibit of German art at the Royal Academy. This covers 1905 to 1985, starting with Die Brücke. Along with the familiars—Kandinsky, Kokoschka, Nolde, Beckmann, Grasz, Ernst—were new wonders (at least for me): Franz Marc’s pastel horses, Ludwig Meidner’s terrifying series of apocalyptic landscapes and cities ca. 1913 unwittingly anticipating Hiroshima and . . . (?) New York. Then these wonderful sculptures: Barlach's "The Refugee" and "the Ecstatic One," in oak, with all attention directed to the faces, the remainder of the body draped blockishly yet also suggestive of movement forward and upward, respectively. Wilhelm Lehmbruck's Contemplative Woman has a gorgeous face that speaks to you; his elongated "Ascending Youth" is a cross between El Greco and Modigliani. And his depressed and falling men are so sad. Unexpected sculptures were Kathe Kollwitz's "Pietà" and "Tower of Mothers," both in bronze but looking almost like oak: small, squarish, with the figures breaking out of the central block of material. Lots of political suggestiveness in Schlemmer's "Fallen Figure with Column," the column, tottering, symbolizing the disintegration of European culture. Ernst's "Europe After the Rain," actually painted in Sedona, Arizona, where he had fled the Nazis, again suggests disintegration, in a totally different mode. Among the more recent—the post WWII abstracts—Günther Uecker's three "Nail Objects" were lovely: nails hammered in a board in a swirling pattern, looking like the back of a porcupine abstracted. Another memorable political statement is Schönebeck's "Majakovski," which, as the catalogue says, "comments ambiguously upon Socialist Realism." Joseph Beuys's sculpture is interesting, like the rusted tram-track next to a canon, suggesting the ruination of civic amenities, I suppose.

We walked from Burlington House to Piccadilly Circus, up Shaftesbury Avenue to Charing Cross Road and Tottenham Court Road into Torrington Place and via Gordon Square to Euston, very familiar territory. It was nice to have a glimpse of London as a final impression, after dingy Birmingham.

1986

---

Hanover	January 1–March 31
Philadelphia, Princeton, New York City, Hanover (via ambulance!)	March 17–20
London, Wellington Hall, 71 Vincent Square SW 1	March 20–27
Hanover	April 1–June 8
Riparius	June 8–September 3
June 20–22, Albany, Philadelphia, Minneapolis, Northfield, Albany, Hanover, Riparius
Hanover	September 3–December 31
December 27–29, New York City

January 1, 1986

Hanover

About to visit Graham Wallis in the hospital and bring him some clippings of poems, but this one I don't want to lose:

DEAD SKUNK

I buried a skunk in the garden.
He was beautiful, dead on the lawn.
Nobody knows whether a dog or poison
Left him there in the beginning of Spring.
I purposefully made his grave shallow
To keep him as near to life as possible,
Just barely under the stuff of the earth.
We should not bury death too deeply
But keep it as if with us.
This was a beautiful of God's creatures.
Striped body, black and white,
A white, conclusive tail.
I put a rock over the place
As if to say resolutely

I honor your life, I mark your death,
And know little of either.

—Richard Eberhart

January 2, 1986

Drove to New York with Alec in his truck. Good talk about his hair problem (sudden, accelerated balding). I cited the example of Bob Reich, how he always disarmed interlocutors first by joking about his dwarfishness before they have time to feel uncomfortable. This clears the air perfectly. Dr. Clendenning attributes the hair loss to “shock” (maybe parting from latest girlfriend?) and hopes it may reverse itself. Also talked about Alec’s restlessness in his job, his desire to have “adventure” now, before settling down. I suggested service in Francophone Africa: some way to exploit Alec’s French.

January 3, 1986

20 East 74th Street

Mother is still hesitant about moving to Hanover and The Greens, but I tried to be firm, and talked her back into it. She set up a trust with Alice and me as executors, finally. The hesitation had always concerned Peter Buseck, who is money-mad. She told me that she’s worth about $600,000 and Pappou over $300,000, so roughly one million, exclusive of the apartment, which is another $300,000. We’ll see how much is left after Pappou’s illness.

To Mount Sinai by bus. Mother lost her balance stepping up. Luckily, I was behind. How long can she continue on her own? That’s the whole problem. Dad was in a reasonably good mood despite his loss of the Foley catheter this morning. He’s calmer, almost placid. Doesn’t fidget, isn’t so self-pitying (though this remains; said he wanted to die, etc.). Troubled by memory loss. Yet remembered Outi and asked me about her. For a time the conversation was perfectly Pinteresque: life imitating art. But then it improved. He also walks now, actually rather vigorously, with the walker, but says his legs hurt. All in all, better than when I last saw him (July?), owing of course to the drug.

Met Blaise Greenwald, the psychiatrist in charge. Young; nice smile. Compassionate. At first he argued against nursing homes. They always aggravate depression. But I think I convinced him that Mother cannot cope at home with Dad. He came to the position that the quality of contact (short and sweet) is important, not the quantity. The plan now is to keep him a few weeks more, then transfer to Hanover's psychiatric unit, stabilize, then prostate operation, then (?) nursing home, with Mother in The Greens. But how many times has this plan been reversed! We'll see. . . . Afternoon, my usual pursuits. Supper with Mother and Alec in the Three Brothers. Viennese-Greek παρέα at the next table. The sophistication of NYC. We'll all enter a new phase when the apartment is sold. It's sobering that neither Dad nor Mother has ever lived outside of NYC. Come to New Hampshire to die! Strange. . . .

All these burdens make me despair about the Kazantzakis book. Since returning from England I've been unable to concentrate, have not touched it. Will this continue?

January 4, 1986

Hanover

Read Frank Kermode's excellent, even brilliant Forms of Attention (University of Chicago Press, 1985), about canons. Some quotes:

¶ There is at this very moment an important argument in progress between scholars who wish to restore the virtues of canonicity, and those who think objective historical method the sole road to truth. That truth is also likely to be imperfectly consistent with the assumption that the biblical texts report things as they really happened, which is why modern New Testament critics are showing some interest in secular literary theory, and especially theory of fiction. It is even argued that the future of Christianity may depend upon a new understanding of fiction as a form of truth. Perhaps this is to be thought of as a new way of opposing virtue to fortune in the interests of preserving the valued object, enabling the canon to survive. (p. 78)

¶ God's world is [one] in which sequence is reduced as far as may be to simultaneity, . . . a world in which trivial events and encounters have great figural power. (p. 91)

¶ We hold our present beliefs because we think they are supported and supportable. We recognize, however, that if new evidence to the contrary arises, we would be willing and likely to change our beliefs. Until that time, there is no reason for not believing what we believe. The belief that beliefs change does not therefore mean that no belief is possible any longer. (p. 93, quoting D. C. Hoy, The Critical Circle [1978], 1980 edition, p. 139)

Some recapitulation:

On December 16, 1985, we traveled from Birmingham airport to Heathrow and then via TWA to Boston. Arrived with all luggage missing: it had never been transferred at Heathrow. So the meeting with Leander at Logan (he'd driven to Boston expressly to help with the luggage) was not so exuberant as planned. Yet it was nice to go directly to Winthrop House (via Friends Center) to see Daphne's room (F-22), with river view (!), to bump into Jim Davis, Lee the senior tutor, Chris Flug, and the house secretary, and be remembered. Walked Leander rapidly around Harvard. It is so impressive! Home that night.

Christmas in Hanover with all three children: different from our practice of so many years of being in NYC. We had to absorb Alec's melancholy re: his hair, set up appointments with Bill Clendenning, etc. Daphne announced that she was going to Florida to see a boyfriend. Chrysanthi despaired. More trouble. Daphne was quasi-morose the whole holiday. Let the cat out on a freezing night (I felt sure that it would be fatal, but it wasn't). I exploded at her. More trouble. Jumpy with Chrysanthi, too. More trouble. But we managed. The usual New Year's Eve chez Rassias. John in bad form—backache, etc. Yet the continuity is important. New Year's Day at Nodas. Better. Played a good game: composing poems on the basis of abab rhyme words given in advance. Leander very adept. Staughton Lynd's son and daughter-in-law were there, new neighbors of the Nodas. Audrey Logan. Ellen De Cesare (now Bebis) with her man, Don Stewart, a morose clarinetist. Kesaya.

Nice to return to Meeting. Some people actually seemed pleased to see us. New couple: the Warings. Bob Metz reports much progress on the Kendal at Hanover scheme.

I spent these 2+ weeks clearing up mail, throwing things away, taking care of promises to send things, etc. to people we'd met in Europe, setting up my study, and getting the office neat—i.e., housekeeping. No Kazantzakis, except I started to put the Greek version of the Christ Crucified lecture on the computer. Also catalogued and summarized all the L. P. Hartley letters. Marvelous letters. I'd forgotten them completely. How gracious and accommodating he was from start to finish! Also spent considerable time arranging Rommel Roberts' visit next week on the South Africa issue.

All the children are gone, finally. What a relief!

Oh, we also got a new car, another Buick Skylark, ordered in advance and waiting for us. That was fun. Then the furnace broke, and soon afterwards the refrigerator had to be replaced. Expensive time!

January 6, 1986

¶The reason we write books is that our kids don't give a damn. We turn to an anonymous world because our wife stops up her ears when we talk to her." —Milton Kundera, The Book of Laughter and Forgetting (New York: Knopf, 1980), p. 91.

January 10, 1986

I brought Rommel Roberts here to talk about South Africa. Nice to think back to Woodbrooke. I ran him ragged (and he me) with TV, radio, student meetings, meeting with the New Hampshire state legislator, faculty seminar. He stunned the radical students by advocating non-violent methods and by insisting that the Afrikaners are by-and-large moral.

Saturday, January 11, 1986

Arnie Alpert took Rommel off to Manchester to speak at NH College. Back for Tucker Foundation supper.

Sunday, January 12, 1986

Breakfast at Meeting. Rommel talked steadily from 8:00 a.m. until 10:30, and movingly. Meeting most impressed. Wants to contribute to his Meeting in Capetown.

January 13, 1986

COP breakfast meeting with Dean McCollum of the Medical School, explaining his woes.

January 14, 1986

My first meeting as a member of the Dickey Endowment governing committee, in Leonard's new quarters. Nice group: Strickler, Scher, Baldwin, Navarro, Stanfeld, etc.

January 15, 1986

Ted Eliopoulos is doing an honors course with me on Cavafy and Έλλην versus Ρωμιός. Slow beginning today, but he will improve.

Friday, January 17, 1986

At Pendle Hill. Nice to be greeted with warmth by various friends who said they missed me. Ice cream with Barb Parsons afterwards. The one real issue was postponed—whether a homosexual couple should be allowed to cohabit.

Saturday, January 18, 1986

PH in the morning, then to Princeton. Three quarters of an hour with Mike and Mary Keeley. He's in a difficult position in Athens because everyone comes to him for favors and pull now that his brother is the ambassador. We might be in Thessaloniki together in the spring of 1987. Very friendly. Dubious about Meg Alexiou's alcoholism. Described how he lost a brother in convulsions during anti-alcoholism treatment.

Then to Princeton University Press editor Robert Brown. Dinner at Nassau Inn. Discussed contract for the Selected Letters. All's well except Prevelakis's opposition. What to do is not clear, except to wait.

Back to Manhattan. Evening show at 46th Street. Saw Charlie Hamlen walk in (how can one miss him, he's so tall). So, secrets . . .

Sunday, January 19, 1986

In NYC. Peter Buseck visited. We brought valises to Mt. Sinai.

Monday, January 20, 1986

Mother and I at Mt. Sinai by 8:00 a.m. final conference with Doctors Greenwald and Pearlmutter. Ambulance at 9:15. I rode in front, Mother in back with the attendant. They reached Hanover in four hours and fifteen minutes, including a stop in Bellows Falls! Excellent reception at Mary Hitchcock. Dad installed quickly and comfortably in the mental health section. How nice, says Mother, to be in a small, intimate hospital. Charles Solow, psychiatrist, and Jim Strickler, internist-gerontologist, will be in charge. Mother installed in sewing room.

January 24, 1986

Lunch with Richard Hyde. He's pursuing his lawsuit against the Dartmouth Review. Currently unemployed. Did the season in California at Esselen, etc. . . . Strange . . .

Interviewed Richard and Jennifer Joseph's son Mark for Harvard. Such a lovely boy, sure of himself. What did we (I) do wrong with Leander and Daphne to make them so filled with hate and self-hate?

We bought a television set—for mother. I'm coveting the 11:30 hour for Benny Hill.

Alec's baldness is unchanged. Doctors stumped. He's going to try an ointment that restores hair in some cases. We recommended a homeopath. His beard, also, is still refusing to grow.

January 27, 1986

Dad operated on: prostate. Hope is to restore his ability to urinate. Spinal anesthetic, thank goodness. We all agreed on "no heroic measures" just in case. Also managed to get him to sign (!) powers of attorney last Friday. John Boswell, the lawyer, came over to witness and notarize them. All this was against the advice of Irving Honigsberg, who says that we mustn't make Mother feel old!

January 28, 1986

Richard Bewley is here from Crosslands. I set up a series of meetings re: the Kendal at Hanover project. Bob Metz is ill, alas, at this crucial moment. Elise Boulding is here, too.

January 29, 1986

Elise, Leonard, Rosemarie, Richard Bewley for dinner. Elise and Leonard want me to coordinate the War/Peace Studies program. Here I go again! That, and Kendal, and Pendle Hill, and the journal. My poor book . . .

February 1, 1986

Leo Papademetre here for the day, full of news and gossip from Sydney and Melbourne but basically pleased he went (phew!).

February 2, 1986

Dad back in the mental health unit. So far the operation is a failure in that the ability to urinate has not been restored. The obstruction caused by the prostate is gone, but the bladder won't contract. They're trying other means—injections. The outlook does not look good. Mother is getting used to the idea of the nursing home as the next step.

Monday, February 3, 1986

Breakfast meeting of COP called by President McLaughlin re: students who tried to demolish the shanties on the green. Last Monday the faculty, led by Mel Spiegel, called for a vote of no confidence, but the motion was defeated and we're going ahead with the governance report.

Monday, February 10, 1986

Playing music regularly again, with Dick Williamson. Flute and piano. How nice!

February 13–20, 1986

A whole week lost in bed with the flu.

February 24, 1986

Richard Bewley here again for the Kendal project, which is going along beautifully.

February 26, 1986

I introduced Bewley to Hanover Rotary at lunch in the Tavern Room of Hanover Inn. Males only. They salute the flag and pledge allegiance. Extraordinary! Also grace before meat.

February 27, 1986

My annual physical with Paul Gerber. Have a slight, very slight, hernia. Take care. Blood pressure super. Also cholesterol. Worried about urination problems.

March 7–8, 1986

Pendle Hill Publications Committee again. Nice to see Rebecca Mays after so many months. I'm back in the old routines again, I guess. Took a month to get adjusted again after Woodbrooke.

Douglas Steere ministered in Meeting on Saturday. One sentence: "God's wind always blows, but we have to raise the sails."

March 9, 1986

Crucial Meeting for Business on the sanctuary issue. We have three Guatemalans illegally in the US. I spoke for. For once I was hoping that the Meeting would act according to its principles. Julie Childs ran the meeting well. Chrysanthi opposed, of course. Also Audrey, Mary Soderberg, the Warings. But they stood aside. I cited Douglas's message of yesterday.

March 11, 1986

Mother and I and Alice (who's here this week) at the Dartmouth National Bank's Trust Department with John Boswell and Mr. Hamilton. Question of custody account. Mother goes back and forth on this, and everything else. I'm trying to get her to write a new will with a trust arrangement.

March 14, 1986

Alice treated to dinner at the Hanover Inn. Can't warm to her much, but she's well meaning. Played piano four-hands.

March 17, 1986

With McLaughlin again. He's worried sick about the rightwing students and threats of lawsuits.

March 20, 1986

Lebanon to Logan, TW to London. Sat next to a Filipino student at Harvard Business School about to confirm a job in London. Talked about Marcos, etc.

Friday, March 21, 1986, London.

Started the day by losing my Lloyds card in the machine. Teller returned it, breaking the rules. Settled in Wellington Hall, Vincent Square, very nice. Huge playing field in front. Building threadbare but adequate. Worked on Kazantzakis chapter a little. Very tired. Jet lag. Walked to the Abbey and Parliament Square. Evening: Raymond Bar beautiful and sophisticated. Echo is about to be unveiled again in Piccadilly. Was shrouded.

Saturday, March 22, 1986

London

Worked well on Kazantzakis in the morning. In the afternoon saw Shaw's The Apple Cart with Peter O'Toole. Scintillating, witty, serious, civilized. A pleasure! Bought David Lodge's Small World to read about myself! Hamburger in Wendy's overhearing a Swiss woman tell a stranger repeatedly how she wouldn't be caught dead in such a dump back home.

Saw Jim Poage on the street.

Met Yannis and Elaine Karavidas at the theatre to see Interpreters, a mediocre play but superbly acted by Maggie Smith. Afterwards to a Greek restaurant. Very nice. Ate καραβίδα (crayfish)! Lovely company.

Sunday, March 23, 1986

Worshipped at Westminster Meeting. Met Thelma Babbitt there. Nice Meeting, in St. Martin's Lane.

Amazed to be greeted by John Burke of Melbourne when I returned to Wellington Hall. We walked and talked and ate supper together for five hours. Unexpected pleasure.

Monday, March 24, 1986

Mario Vitti and wife Alexandra at breakfast. Also the novelist Θηλέμαχος Κώτσιας, and Gina Politi, and John Smart, and Yorgis Yiatromanolakis, and and and . . . Strange feeling seeing people I'd been with in England only a few months before, as though I lived here. Most thought I'd stayed on, said I belonged in England anyway. Saw Peter Mackridge, David Holton, Roddy Beaton, of course. Also the B'ham and London students, and Karen Van Dyck, the Oxford student, etc Telephoned the John Rylands Library in Manchester. They had received the Hartley letters I posted on Friday. Now they owe me £700. Apparently they have some of my letters to Hartley also.

Donald Nicol opened the conference. Very friendly and talkative this time. Morning session had Mackridge and Eleni Yannakaki, the student (very poor). But the novelists afterward were fun. Lunch with Yannis Karavidas across the street in the BBC. Then he interviewed me on the rise of the Greek novel, which I connected with the bourgeoisie. In the afternoon session, Vayenas was controversial on Seferis's Six Nights on the Acropolis, which he thought very poor. I gave my paper, Nikos Kazantzakis's Attitude Toward Prose Fiction. Well received. Got invitations afterward to speak in Scotland and at the University of Crete! Reception. Then home with Richard Clogg. Supper with him and Mary-Jo. They're very critical of Meg Alexiou, think she's a skunk. Clogg now involved with the controversy over the BBC film on the civil war. The film distorts it toward the leftist perspective, he says. By the way, Mrs. Serafis is at the symposium.

Tuesday, March 25, 1986

I chaired the morning session with papers by Vitti, Mihalis Chrysanthopoulos, David Ricks, and Bill Wyatt. All rather good. But Gina Politi's was the best, a stunner! I concluded with the prologue to Lodge's Small World about people who go to conferences on the modern form of the medieval pilgrimage! Lunch with Mario Vitti. He says I'm wasting my time doing the Kazantzakis letters. I should supervise and have a student do the actual work. By the way, Prevelakis died, solving my problem. Buffet supper at King's plus music with Roddy Beaton on folk violin.

Saw his wife Fran, after many years. Also people from Groningen. Nice talk with John Smart.

Wednesday, March 27, 1986

Final session. Banquet at King's for lunch. Sat with Mario again. Talked about children and family. He says we're both remarkable to be married to the same woman we started with. Karl Stead wrote me the same from New Zealand recently. In the afternoon, went to see Mr. Pickles at Quartet Books, Goodge Street. They're doing the paperback of my Life in the Tomb translation. Young man with a ring in his left ear, hair tied in a bun at back, office a shambles, no place to sit down practically. But he knows what he's doing; wants Peter Levi to write the preface. Then to British Museum to meet Rowena Loverance. She took me to her boss, who showed us the icon the BM is trying to buy. Looks like any other icon to me But they're trying to raise £200,000 for it! Crazy! We were there after closing, and wandered in the galleries in the semi-dark. Like the movie Topkapi.

Supper at the Penn Club—more presentable than I remember. Theatre: Mamet's Glengarry Glen Ross. American. Raw. Sarcastic. Obscene. The obverse of G. B. Shaw's The Apple Cart. Superbly acted by the National Theatre, including credible American accents. Afterwards we went across the street to a pub and the cast came in. The head actor assured me that Mamet loves the U.S. when I said I felt ashamed as an American at what the play showed. Mamet wants to expose the rot and hope for a cure. The dialogue is superb.

Thursday, March 27, 1986

Heathrow to Logan. The same Filipino was on the plane, returning. Greeted me with a big smile. He got the job. Sat next to a British woman, a professional stone cutter. Talked for three hours interestingly. Read PH pamphlet submissions and David Lodge. Precision flight cancelled owing to fog at Lebanon airport. Just caught Vermont Transit bus. Chrysanthi very warm and loving. It's useful to go away! This week was a godsend after the tensions of my mother's indecisiveness, and how it infected my relation with Chrysanthi. Beautiful reunion.

Friday, March 28, 1986

Hanover

Alec here. He got the job in Jakarta. I gave him Conrad's "Youth." Coals to Batavia! His alopecia areata is no better but we still hope it will reverse itself. So far the cortisone treatment has not produced renewed growth of hair. He chopped down the mountain ash in the back yard, which is diseased and dying. Pappous very agitated. Urine infected. To Guthrie Theater doing Great Expectations. So poor compared to London. I'm spoiled.

Saturday, March 29, 1986

What a life! Had to drive to Boston to Lily Macrakis's for MGSA endowment committee. John Petropulos and George Frangos. Nice to see Macrakises back in their home. Michelle came in. As strange as always. Still existing as a photographer. Then I went to Cambridge expecting Daphne to be returning from Florida. But she didn't show up. Met Chris Flug, who says that Daphne is very much liked at Winthrop, and by the right people. Chinese dinner seul.

Sunday, March 30, 1986

More at Meeting re: sanctuary. I helped set up a relationship between the woman and Lou's Restaurant. She's supplying them with tortillas. Went to The Greens and hung paintings in Yiayia's apartment.

Monday, March 31, 1986

Yiayia signed the contract for The Greens and purchased the bond. She moves in tomorrow. So we enter Step 2 of this great saga. Let's hope it works. The Madison Avenue apartment is now up for sale. All our lives will change.

April 4, 1986

To Amherst: Hampshire College for a War/Peace Studies conference. Stayed with Harmon Dunathan. Alan Rozycki also there from Dartmouth. Nice woman, Martie Daniel, longtime AFSC Hartford now at Juniata College. We had John and Elizabeth Baker in common. Chrysanthi went off to hear Leander's Longdon Quartet do Mozart and Brahms, chaperoned by Nigel Coxe.

Saturday, April 5, 1986

Amherst

Alan and I agreed to try to have the next conference at Dartmouth, if Leonard helps with $$$. Met interesting Indian who teaches Gandhi-ism. Said India fell apart because Gandhi allowed himself to become the center of a personality cult. When he was assassinated, all the power went out of the movement. Interesting. Was Jesus the same? Somehow no.

Supper at a Japanese restaurant with Nigel Coxe, Chrysanthi, and Leander. Coxe a great talker. We touched on L. P. Hartley among others. He's convinced that England is going down the drain; stressed the "other London," the one I didn't see last week—i.e., the London of hopelessness, unemployment, the perpetual dole.

Sunday, April 6, 1986

Lunch at The Greens with Mother. Mrs. Bernstein made a festive "dinner party" for three families. She and I have much in common. She's a Quaker; knew Ellen Rose, etc.; granddaughter applying to the Peace Corps. I told her about Lori. Fine atmosphere. Mother is lucky in this respect.

Tuesday, April 8, 1986

Rand Jones, whom I first had in English 2–3, took me to lunch. He's a regular intellectual now. Loves Joyce. Lives in Stonington, Connecticut, where James Merrill lives.

Wednesday, April 9, 1986

Lunch with Daniyal Mueenuddin, my half-Pakistani half-American student who is doing an honors thesis on James Merrill. I began reading Merrill for the first time. A marvelous technician. influenced greatly in the early years by Kimon Friar.

At the Dickey Endowment in the evening with a Mexican gentleman, director of their equivalent of the Collège de France, set up after 1936 to house refugee intellectuals from Franco's Spain. We're trying to involve the Dickey Endowment in US-Mexican contacts.

Thursday, April 10, 1986

Bill Cook and I gave our lecture cum poetry reading in the War/Peace Studies course. He's incorrigible. Undisciplined. Garrulous. Ate up all the time and left no time for students to write poems at the end. But he's totally unaware of this defect. Without notes or planning he winds himself up and spouts. Yet the students love it.

Friday, April 11, 1986

A very special day. To Cambridge in the afternoon with Chrysanthi and Mother. (Father stabilized after many crises last week with his catheter, and signs of returning into the nervous breakdown of last November, but Solow's drugs seem to control him. Also, slurring of speech—maybe more strokes.)

Supper at the Harvard Faculty Club with Peter Gardner and his new (third) wife, Susie, plus Daphne, of course. Then at Sanders Theater we heard the premiere of Jimmy Yannatos's "Trinity Mass," a marvelous achievement integrating modern concerns (chiefly that of nuclear holocaust) to the ancient formulas in the Latin Mass and also the Latin requiem. I recalled so vividly the Berlioz Requiem that I sang in Rochester. Yannatos's work is devastating. It captures and re-projects all the guilt that America feels, or ought to feel, for mass destruction. Yet it was never cheaply propagandistic or even political, but genuinely aesthetic in the best sense—i.e., beautiful but at the same time "engaged" with the basic issues of our day. The performance, too, was stunning: huge orchestra, multiple choruses, soloists (Charlie Hamlen's Lucy Shelton, and Jon Humphrey and Sanford Sylvan, all of whom we saw in the St. Matthew Passion at Marlboro. Even Robert J. Lurtsema showed up, in one of the parts. Daphne, alas, was in the audience with us, not in the violin section, but I'm hoping that she'll rejoin the orchestra next year. She's just got a job editing two "Let's Go" books for Harvard Student Agencies, on Greece and France, for the summer.

Ice cream at Steve's with Laurie's parents—D's roommate. Saw last year's roommate, Marie. Also Steve Ledbetter with the woman who's going to review the Trinity Mass for the Boston Globe. Forgot to mention that two of the sections were to texts from the Αναφορά στον Γκρέκο, well sung in Greek by Sanford Sylvan. I was cited in the program as the translator. Saw Jimmy afterwards and conveyed my wonder and congratulations. I didn't realize that he had all that in him.

Saturday, April 12, 1986

Telephoned Charlie Hamlen early to urge him to hear the Trinity Mass tonight when they do it again at St. John's in New York.

Sunday, April 13, 1986

Good Meeting. Raking leaves in the afternoon. Mother for supper. We are slowly settling her affairs. Arranged to begin to equalize her and Dad's assets by transferring stock. Still waiting on Boswell to do the new will and trust provisions.

April 26, 1986

To Amherst. Supper with Rhoda and Bron. She is loud, but nice. He is slimy . . . but he tried. Stopped at Deerfield on the way to show Mother. Leander played a concert: flute and piano with Patty Harper (unimpressive), then piano four-hands with David Abbot (very nice). Ignat Solzhenitsyn was there with Mrs. Shin and his Babushka. Big smile from violist in the quartet, Leander's erstwhile girlfriend.

May 2, 1986

Hooray! We signed the wills. Pappous did beautifully, made a good signature and knew what was going on, despite his confusion at times. John Boswell came to Hanover Terrace for the occasion. Audrey Logan came as one of the witnesses. What a relief!

Yesterday, superb lecture by Professor Holton, historian of science at Harvard. Leonard Rieser urged me to go. Just my style: all emphasis on the material, not on the speaker.

The previous evening: grand supper party with the Riesers and Kenneth and Elise Boulding at Café La Fraise. Ken is living at the Penington. He is so good natured and lively.

I'm creeping along with the Toda-Raba chapter. Seem to do less each day, but the revision is almost finished.

News from Athens. I was awarded a Fulbright Research Fellowship for March–June 1987. My third Fulbright. For the letters. Prevelakis died, which removes an impediment. Still no contract however from Richard Brown at Princeton.

May 3, 1986

Meg Alexiou here. We went to church at Newport. Ανάσταση. Wonderful priest. No ψάλτης, just a reader; rather primitive. Actually, like the early church when probably no one knew what to do. So much better than the perfected "performance" in large Greek Orthodox churches. I was especially moved by the Beatitudes in relation to the Sanctuary Movement. To sleep at 3:30 a.m. Much good talk with Meg.

May 4, 1986

To Meeting. Grant Thompson there. No news yet re: John Tallmadge. Gwyneth Walker introduced herself—the composer whose music Leander has played. I ministered on the Beatitudes and the Sanctuary group just convicted in the southwest: Blessed are those who are persecuted for righteousness's sake. Easter lamb. Meg, Ted Eliopoulos, Michael and Elaine Gaylor and their son, now 14 and beautiful; Daphne with a new boyfriend, Lori + a Cypriot friend; Mother, Mary, Helene, Veronica, Athos. Beautiful meal and fellowship.

Long walk afterwards to Storrs Pond with Meg and Chrysanthi. Then visited Father. Very garrulous. Remembered Meg and the two autistic children. Started on me and Deerfield. He let out that the motivation was anti-Semitism. He didn't want me to stay at Bronx Science and end up just another yid (his word, half-suppressed) with a Bronx accent. Remarkable man! We finally broke away and visited Mother for tea. Then supper at Jesse's and home for more good talk.

I'd finished revising the Toda-Raba chapter on Saturday, so was ready for this nice break.

June 20, 1986

Albany airport

En route to Pendle Hill and then tomorrow to John Tallmadge's wedding in Minnesota. Just left a full house at Terpni: Alec, Leander, even Daphne. Leander was offered an administrative post at the Brattleboro Music School; he's dickering with Putney School to teach two classes a week; is off to Kinhaven on Monday. Alec's hair is growing back on his arms and legs and nape of the neck and temples; his beard is normal. Still bald, but hopeful. He's building the shed off the back side of the cabin and is excited about the impending trip to L.A., Hawaii, Singapore, Jakarta. He read out loud to us fascinating cultural details about the Indonesians from the guide book I got him. He does the cabin very poorly, with no forethought, no sketches, no research, just trial and error, with lots of error. Still, it works somehow. We creosoted some more logs and he is fearful re: another attack of alopecia. Daphne arrived last night after a week in Los Angeles at a boyfriend's. She looked very Californian with her tan and big smile. She's in the midst of editing the "Let's Go" volumes for Greece and France, and is exhilarated by that responsibility.

Saw a deer bound across the lower field the other day. That's always reportable. Also a large turtle, and a rabbit. Went to a meeting of the Upper Hudson group at Jacques': Dennis Conroy, chairman, Mr. Green, and a Smith. The K135 power line is coming through, and will cross the Waddell Road below us. I'm praying. But there are surveyors' ribbons by our old shed, which frightens me.

Exhausting but productive morning yesterday. Up at 6:15. Breakfast.

Then lit the brush pile. Then went round with the tractor and dragged the piles we'd cut previous days, on the edge of the front field. These went on the fire and burned too. Finished at 12:30, non-stop. I napped, and then sat at the Macintosh computer for hours finishing the typing of the Αναφορά στον Γκρέκο chapter so that I could bring it to Hanover this trip and transfer it to Kiewit.

Revised my Columbia University Press Kazantzakis pamphlet and sent it to Scribner's just before moving to Terpni. Since then, I revised the Columbia University Press Cavafy pamphlet and hope to send it next week. Also sent off my "Kazantzakis and the Novel" to Beaton just before leaving. The British Classical Press wants me to do a Kazantzakis book for sixth formers. Draft contract arrived from Princeton UP finally; I've sent the terms to Mrs. Kazantzakis with a request for a more liberal allowance for me.

Pappous has diarrhea. Strickler hopes it will go away, doesn't want to subject him to disagreeable tests for possible cancer of the colon.

It's so good to be at the farm. One's whole body responds to the exercise, clean air, simplicity, reduced pace. What a tonic! And we're not isolated (I love the isolation, but Chrysanthi chafes). Saw Shapiros several times, ditto Grunblatts. At Shapiros one night even the parents of Feld, the choreographer. Interesting to hear about his career. He has classes for slum children, and two have been offered contracts with his company.

I'm struggling along with Kazantzakis and Politics. The documentation is getting out of control. I don't have a good system, yet. How to comprehend the entire scope of that book, to avoid repetition and contradiction, will be the trick. I feel daunted, but must keep trying. It will be my magnum opus if it ever gets finished.

Department banquet last night. Henry Terrie retired. Nice testimonials, including one by his bosom friend Jim Cox. I sat between Dick Eberhart and Cleopatra Mathis and naturally enjoyed myself. My own birthday party came the next day, with Audrey Logan, the Nodas and Corindias. Nice.

June 21, 1986

Philadelphia airport

Good Publications Committee meeting yesterday. We accepted more manuscripts, including a very good one by a Vietnam veteran who went back this year to Hanoi and Saigon. Also, provisionally, one by Bill Edgerton on non-violence, “pacifism revisited,” which brought back memories to Mather Lippincott and me when he described the influence that Gregg’s book had on him.

Supper. Sat next to Steve Cary. Talked about Haverford, which continues to treat him poorly, it seems; also Alec, and sanctuary, and work camps. Discovered that Corbett was acquitted in Tucson because the FBI tapes that would have convicted him themselves were so illegal that the government declined to press charges.

Farewells to Ned North, Dyke Vermilye, and some others, who are leaving. Dyke and Avis are going to South Africa. I told them that I had a telephone call from Rommel Roberts the other day from Cape Town; we’ll try to send him another $500. Ned has no plans. Free and loose. New charmer at Publications Committee yesterday: Julie Cadwallader Staub. That beautiful Quaker wholesomeness, plus brains. Why don’t Leander and Alec meet women like this?!

Breakfast this morning with two refugees from Czechoslovakia—Prague—now living in Indiana. He’s a Unitarian minister. They were pleased that I teach Kafka, who is much read in Prague, they said.

Meeting: We had the AFSC board as well as our PH board. In effect the Meeting was a memorial service for Jim Harvey, a black member of the AFSC directorate who died suddenly. Steve Cary (as expected) spoke particularly well. He said that Harvey had the gift of truly trying to persuade people in confrontational situations, instead of “scoring points.” An example: Once they were closeted with the administration of the Campbell Soup Company in a strike situation. One of the vice-presidents said that he could empathize with the strikers because when he was at college he worked for one summer picking tomatoes. Only later did the AFSC group discover that Harvey had been prohibited from going to college because of poverty, and went instead to work for two years for the Campbell Soup Company picking tomatoes in South Jersey and working in the processing plant. He could have “scored a point” against the V-P by up-staging him with the information. But he resisted the temptation. It would have been a cheap, and temporary, victory, and probably would have caused resentment. When, however, the V-P learned this info later and realized that Harvey had refrained, he (the V-P) felt great respect for him. He was thus in a better position to persuade.

Northfield, Minnesota. Mr. Tallmadge picked me up at the airport. Unhappy about Dartmouth; wants the Indian symbol returned, voted for right-wing trustees. Delivered to home of a psychology professor, Woehrlin, who supports John. Grant Thompson there, and John Elder. Also Elliott Lee, Will Lee's brother, whom I mistook for Will. Toured Northfield: not much to see. Carleton campus is beautiful, like Swarthmore. Wedding in Presbyterian church. Such good music: Bach, Jesu Joy of Man's Desiring. No stupid wedding march. Organ and harp. Reading by John Elder, with harp accompaniment. Young, eager minister. John wrote the litany of responses between the couple and the congregation, uniting us all under God. Full vows, no excisions. Everyone held hands for the final prayer. Decency and solidarity through ritual. Beastly hot; easy to weep, since faces all running with sweat. Reception in the student dining hall. Suddenly Bob and Dagmar Tisdale appeared—neighbors from 12 Valley Road, ca. 1965–66. He's now chairman of Carleton's English Department. Lovely to see them. They took me to their home, all wood inside and out, deep browns, in an oasis of green trees and grass. Dinner at the reception was a whole roast pig. Delicious. Wedding cake, three tiers. Champagne, strawberries, dancing.

June 22, 1986

Minneapolis

John Elder's teaching method. He explained a class procedure as we drove to the airport in Grant Thompson's rented car. Students write one or two pages for every class session. Generally this is a kind of journal entry about their reading assignment for that day. Among other things, this enhances discussion enormously. Everyone has at least one idea or reaction, and John doesn't have to struggle to get the discussion going. Also, constant writing sharpens the writing skills. Also, having to write focuses the reading experience. These scripts are collected, but never graded. They can be read quickly. Comments where appropriate are returned. At intervals during the term, students develop one of these scripts into a regular essay. John has in the meantime suggested which are "pregnant" and which are duds. The essays are still not graded, only annotated. (I forgot to say that the short scripts are circulated among the students, enhancing the classroom fellowship.) At some point later in the term, students choose from one of the essays, to rewrite for a graded paper. So, a process of revision is built into the whole affair. Even at this stage, students may elect to rewrite the graded essay for a revised grade.

John has been doing this for three years and is very pleased. Class solidarity is enhanced; the power relationship between teacher and student is minimized. Writing is improved; class discussion is improved. Grading more accurately reflects a student's total involvement on a continuing basis, as opposed to an all-night stand just before the paper is due.

November 24, 1986

Hanover

I congratulated my student David Dodge on being inducted into Phi Beta Kappa. His reply startled me: "It's just another commodity." Good for him! He pierced through to das Ding-an-sich!

December 27–29, 1986

New York City

A nice beginning to MLA. Lunch with Dick Dellamora, then to Metropolitan Museum together to see the Van Gogh show—his last year—at the asylum and a bit in Paris, before he killed himself. Then with Dick, still, and John Tallmadge to the Juarez Restaurant. John still has no prospects, only one MLA interview, at Idaho! My intervention at Haverford and UNH produced no result. Then with John to Metropolitan Opera to see Fidelio, with Vassilis Lambropoulos, Artemis Leontis, Gregory Jusdanis: my treat. All this largesse was meant for Meg Alexiou, who had to beg to be excused because of a crisis with Dimitri in Brum (he couldn't exist in Greece and had to be returned to England, to live with the Thomsons). Fidelio is so extraordinary. The music! The third Leonora Overture always lightweight-seeming when I'd heard it in a concert, i.e., out of context, now became scintillating as an interlude before the last scene. Hoped to find Herb Wekselblatt but there is no tuba. What a rich day!

On Sunday, to the 15th Street Meeting, then to the Museum of Modern Art to see the Klees. We're to have a faculty seminar on Klee in January. On Tuesday, our MGSA seminar with me in the chair: Vassilis, Artemis, Gregory. Went well. Lots of discussion. "theorists" vs. non-theorists; Chioles playing devil's advocate. Took them all to lunch at the Yale Club afterwards.

Christmas, just before my trip, was in Hanover, of course. No more 20 East 74th Street. Though Pappous had come to our Thanksgiving meal and had eaten and enjoyed himself, the Christmas meal was too much. So we had Yiayia, Daphne, Leander.

December 31, 1986

Hanover

New Year's with the Rassias. Snails and lamb as always. Very gemütlich. Our little rituals.

In New York, during MLA time, I had Daphne's boyfriend Greg Tebbe to supper. How handsome he is! He told me all about Wall Street.

1987

---

- Chicago c/o John A. and Ilyana January 31–February 1
Damianos, 2921 Covert Rd.,
Glenview, Illinois 60026
- Geneva, Hôtel de l'Etoile, March 11–13
17 Vieux-Grenadiers, et chez Bertrand et Michelle Bouvier, 9 Encyclopédie 1201 Genève, 44.81.16
- Zurich, Hotel Limmathaus, March 14–15
Limmatstr. 118, 8005, 01 425240
- Θες/νίκη Στατίστης 18, 40 Εκκλησίες, March 15–June 30 546 36 (Street name changed to Βιζύης-Βύζαντος). Landlady: Zoë Rebelos,
2200 Columbia Pike, #805, Arlington, VA 22204
April 11–12 Hotel Mirto, Litochoro, tel 0352 81398.
April 25–May 1, Ξενοδοχείο Αχιλλέας,
Οδός Λέκκα 21, 01 32.33. 197.
May 18–23, Lató Hotel, 15 Epimanidou 712 02
Ηράκλειο, 081 22.81.03
May 25–28, Hotel Ξενία, Γιάννινα
- Thessaloniki–Frankfort–New York–Boston–Hanover July 1
Hanover July 2–3
- Riparius July 4–September 1
July 17–21, Hanover, Weston, Hanover
- Hanover September 1–December 31
Sept. 18–20, Philadelphia/NYC. Pendle Hill, MGSA
Oct. 3, Rindge, NEYM Committee Day
Oct. 17–18, Kinhaven
Oct. 22–25, Kendal, Pendle Hill, Haverford, NYC
Nov. 5–7, Cambridge, Providence (MGS)
Dec. 3–5, NYC & Philadelphia, PH
Dec. 26, Cambridge (theater)

January 4, 1987

To George Goodwin's in Amherst, for Kinhaven's "Governance Committee," which I chair. Trying to rationalize the administration. Alice Henkin, Joe Contino, Bill Polk, Jerry and Nancy Bidlack.

That evening, crisis in Pappous's health. Massive pneumonia. To hospital emergency room. But they won't let him die. Stuffed him with IVs, antibiotics, and brought him round. Nevertheless, I rushed to make funeral arrangements: cremation, burial of ashes in urn at our farm. Wrote obituaries for various papers and medical journals. All in readiness.

Just remembered and want to record: I went to the farm in November with Merlin Evans to put the piano back together. He brought electric heaters. So: no electricity. Conductors dangling off the top of the pole. Sunday, too. But I called the company and a morose crew appeared within two hours. Hooray! Heroes! "Isn't this the way it's supposed to be?" grumbled the foreman. So our big fire was supplemented finally with electric heat, and with light. Still, Merlin didn't finish. We'll go back in the summer, With luck the piano will now be workable.

Leander coached Ignat and took him home to Cavendish, and entered the Solzhenitsyns' home. But Aleksandr had just gone to bed. They appreciate Leander very much. I wrote to Ignat to ask for info on isbas, for Wyatt's translation of Βυζηνίως, and got a wonderful reply full of information, supplied by Aleksandr.

January 10, 1987

To Haverford. I'm on the Corporation committee. Revised governance with the object of enhancing Quaker values. Nice to meet Morris Evans, and Mrs. Harrington, whose daughter I taught at Harvard. Also Wallace Collett's son, who left a fancy college to teach at an alternative one. After the meeting, Ellen Rose picked me up for tea. She is thriving, finally, at Drexel. Loves Philly. Just bought a home. Working on two books at once. Confident about tenure.

January 16-17, 1987

To Pendle Hill. I continue to appreciate this contact. Margery Walker asked me for ice cream afterwards. Alan will do the study on aging. Two of our books are published: Daisy Newman's and Mary Morrison's.

January 22, 1987

To New York for Kinhaven again. Met in Alice Henkin's law firm, 35th floor, 50 Broadway, just south of Trinity Church. Swirling snowstorm. Thunder (we thought the end of the world was nigh), lightning. Leonard and Rosemarie Rieser joined me at the Yale Club for supper. All stranded. AMTRAK came two hours late and arrived 5½ hours late, but I taught my class on the Portrait on Friday.

January 24, 1987

Jean-Yves Thibaudet, a pianist managed by Charlie Hamlen, stayed overnight with us. He's a master, truly. Aged 23. All Chopin program, including the 24 preludes. Ligeti's Mephisto Waltz as the encore. Such effortless technique. But, more importantly, such intellectual understanding, such precision and restraint combined with sensitivity and emotionalism, to create a romantic music that is totally fresh. Long talk with him the next day at breakfast. He's delightfully modest and unaffected. Grateful to Charlie for taking him on.

January 26, 1987

Met Kate Emlen. I thought she'd be good to design my War/Peace Studies brochure, but she's too expensive. Wants $600–800 just for her fee. She did magnificent designs for AFSC and for Pendle Hill, the cover to Daisy Newman's book.

January 27, 1987

Leander back from Germany and Greece. Good concert with Toula, four hands. Then three concerts in Germany with Eva Grüsser. Her parents and brother very hospitable. Afterwards they blew their wad on a wild drive to Vienna and a night in a deluxe hotel. But no word of any romantic involvement. Alas, Eva is living with someone else, at least for the present.

Leander will be going to Bethlehem three days a week to teach piano at Lehigh.

Lunch with John Van Aalst. After all his efforts working at prose fiction to prepare himself for an MFA, he now announces that he's going to medical school.

January 28, 1987

Dinner party at Tom and Nardi Campion's. Ned Perrin there. Also John Sloan Coffin's brother, Ned, who lives in Stratford. Also Dick ?, former publisher of Country Journal, who had called me about Kendal.

Apropos, the NH subcommittee, which looked like it was to sabotage Kendal completely, voted today 5 to 4 (!) to proceed to develop separate standards for CCRCs, which gives us a chance. The reversal of our fortunes is owing to a consultant we retained and to a lawyer in Malcolm McLane's firm, all this the result of the serendipitous dinner I had with Malcolm and Susan McLane at Rockefeller Center a few months ago, the time when Roddy Rockefeller hauled me over the coals for War/Peace Studies.

January 29, 1987

Working on my speech for Chicago on Η τρωτότητα των ελληνικών γραμμάτων. Good War/Peace seminar. Then to Spaulding to hear the second half of Andy Rangell's 4th Beethoven recital. He did Opus 31, no. 3, which I used to play, and the strangely magnificent Opus 100. He's good, but after Thibaudet . . . !?

Good modernism seminar the other day on Klee, led by Jim Jordan. Klee's treatise is very useful for literary modernism. I've already got a student writing a paper on it.

January 31, 1987

Drove to Boston and flew to Chicago. Overnight at Damianoses.

Mustn't forget last Friday when, after returning so late on the train and teaching my class, we drove to Cambridge, supped with Daphne, and went to the Rep's brilliant production of Pirandello's Tonight We Improvise, the play that Kazantzakis translated and then copied in Ο Οθέλλος ξαναγυρίζει. It was a delicious evening of modernist theater, with all distinctions between stage and audience, director and actors, fictions and real life broken down.

Chicago, continued: dinner at Damianos's with Bishop Iakovos, Θεανώ Παπαζόγλου-Μάργαρη (a short-story writer and journalist who lives in Chicago but writes exclusively in Greek and publishes in Athens), and other friends. Some remembered me from 23 years ago in Chicago.

Sunday, February 1, 1987

To St. Demetrios's for liturgy sung by the bishop. Church full. All ages. Lots of men, lots of children. The full treatment. Altar boys. Psaltes. Chorus. Organ. Assisting priests. Communion sweet, with the spoon going into the mouths of little children with their upturned faces. Then the αρτοκλάσια in honor of the Τρεῖς Ιεράρχες: Basil the Great, Gregory the Theologian, and John Christostomos. Lunch for 400 people in the Great Hall. I sat next to Andrew Kopan. Good conversation; very friendly. Talked about bilingual education; problem of Greek vs. English in church, etc. The program had everything: girls singing folk songs, little children reciting poems, skits, speeches by dignitaries like the Greek consul and of course the bishop, who speaks beautifully. I was the major attraction and seemed to be a "hit" (standing ovation), many compliments afterwards. One man said, Συγκινήθηκα από τα λόγια σας τόσο πολύ που έκλαψα. I in turn was moved, once again, by the sight of the rituals and communal life of the Greek population, compared for example to the isolation of my parents. When my father dies, no one will know or care, whereas here, in church, there were 40-day, 6-month, and 12-month memorials with widows, children, and grandchildren placing candles in the memorial cake. At the end, as the bishop congratulated me and said he wanted to publish the lecture, I complimented him, sincerely, saying, Είστε ποιμένας αληθινός των ψυχών. His answer was touching: Αγώνας! Αγώνας! I can imagine all the backbiting that goes on underneath.

Return to Damianos's house. She chewed my ear off about her father, the journalist Πώργος Φτέρης. John Damianos told me how a ne'er-do-well from Chicago who'd written a letter in praise of Κόλλιας was made Minister of Economics by the junta. They couldn't find anyone else. This fellow couldn't pay his own bills on time. He eventually became prime minister just before the junta's fall.

February 7, 1987

To NYC with Leonard Rieser. Visited with the Bakers again. Result: another $25,000 for War/Peace Studies. We celebrated by going to the Century Club for lunch; sat next to Senator Moynihan. Then to MGSA Executive Committee. Meg not there because George Thomson just died. Drinks afterwards with Dia, John Rexine, Elizabeth Constantinides.

Leonard, while we talked, said that of all the members of the faculty who had not been a dean I had changed Dartmouth the most. I told him I had two more projects: to put War/Peace Studies on a firm footing, and to build Kendal at Hanover.

February 11, 1987

When the Bakers' checks arrived, they totaled $41,000 instead of the promised $25,000. In other words, they brought our endowment up to $100,000. Sweet people!

March 9, 1987

Told Andy Rangell that I couldn't go to his concert on the 11th because it would be the eve of our departure. So he brought us home and played the Hammerklavier Sonata for us, Leander, and Susanne Brown in private. What a savage, frightening piece, especially in the confines of a living room! Andy makes it totally demonic: a fragmented nightmare, in a way. I'm not sure he appreciated my view when I told him afterward.

A few days ago, we saw the Guthrie Theater in Shaw's Candide. Very slow; lots of fuss about—well—not nothing, but almost nothing (for a modern audience). The preacher, though "exposed" by the poet as a windbag, didn't seem so bad. It was the poet who was reprehensible, though Shaw clearly wanted us to favor his unconventionality. It's only Candide herself in the last act who "works," as she chooses her husband over the poetic lover.

A few weeks ago, in New York City, I saw an adaptation from Kafka's "Hunger Artist," "Metamorphosis," "A Country Doctor," and passages from the diaries. Very poor, although sincere. The only really interesting part is when the blond Anglo-Saxon actress playing Gretta, Felice Bauer, etc., became a kind of Jewish mama as the impresario in "The Hunger Artist." The venue was St. Clement's, a radicalized Episcopal parish heavy on sanctuary, the peace movement, etc. On the bulletin board was a clipping quoting an East German pastor who said that he wasn't a communist in East Germany but that if he lived long in New York he'd surely become a communist.

Next day to Haverford. The committee again: Mrs. Harrison, Henry Satterthwaite, Bill Ambler, etc.

Last week: to Manchester to dinner of the NH democrats. Mayhem. At table, sat next to the wife of a British expert on China. He knew Jonathan Mirsky, who is now divorced. Also the colorful moderator of a town near the seacoast, and several residents of Seabrook. Lively conversation. One is in the General Court. He laments the plight of democrats in NH. Impossible to do anything. The main speaker was Dukakis, who'll probably be a presidential candidate. Good speech, not just clichés. He spoke about his immigrant Greek parents. Nice that they, and he, though also successful in America, didn't become reactionaries. Outside: pickets shouting "Dukakis hates gays!" . . . Continued to Cambridge, overnight in the Quaker Center. Next day, March 7th, Junior parents' weekend. Convocation in Sanders Theater. Greg Nagy spoke well about liberal education. Chrysanthi told him afterwards, "Now I understand the different between Dartmouth and Harvard." "How nice that Daphne is here," he replied. Then met Daphne and went to Professor Alfred's lecture on Chekhov's The Cherry Orchard. Charming but chaotic and episodic. We left in the middle. Lunch at Winthrop with Daphne and her friend Haviaris. My former student, Peter Folger, joined us. He has finally finished Harvard. Hopes to go to the Peace Corps. He's the only one from the Kazantzakis class who kept in touch. But recently I saw Emily Harrison, from the Odyssey class. Afterwards I corrected bluebooks in Winthrop Library. What a paradise! Also looked at Dia's bibliography, which needed some editing. Then met Meg Alexiou and her live-in boyfriend Michael Hendys, Daphne and her boyfriend Greg Tebbe. To Pier 4 for sumptuous, relaxing dinner. Meg in good form. Michael is her savior, φαίμεται, despite continued problems with Dimitris. George Thomson died a few weeks ago.

March 11, 1987

Grades in, record time. Andy Rangell ready to move into our house, together with his own Steinway grand. Leander drove us to Logan. Daphne was there, too. Nice send-off. Flew overnight to Geneva.

March 12, 1987

Hotel de l'Etoile, Geneva

This hotel, which we found in Let's Go Europe, seemed totally disgusting at first—tattered, cramped, the hall toilet filled with shit and stuffed. Actually, it turned out to be clean, with sweet ladies in charge, and very cheap. In any case, all the good hotels are full up because of the auto show. Telephoned Mrs. Kazantzakis immediately; fixed for 4:00 p.m. tea. Meanwhile walked around Geneva a bit: the English Garden with its clock, remembered from last time, etc. Mrs. K. very cordial, a little forgetful and garrulous. Luckily (a) I'd sent her a list of desiderata several weeks in advance, (b) George Anemoyannis was with her last week and agreed to prolong his stay in order to prepare my holographs. Thus I was presented with a portfolio containing 153 letters that were available among those that I requested—299 pages, all in all. She dropped some interesting bits of information that I've recorded in my Kazantzakis notebook. At 6:00 we returned to the awful hotel, rested a bit and then took a bus to Encyclopédie 9, the home of Bertrand and Michelle Bouvier. Bertrand had spoken at the 1969 MGSA Symposium and we had corresponded regarding his essay for Modern Greek Writers. Very accommodating. Lovely house, indeed extraordinary residence literally in the middle of the city, with a huge garden, etc. Met a man cataloging Baud-Bovy's archive (he died, a suicide, a few months ago). Michelle Bouvier gave us all dinner, including Mrs. Kazantzakis. More complaints regarding how awfully all Greeks behave and behaved toward Kazantzakis, how her publishers cheat her, etc. She's about to go again to China; there are now some Chinese Neohellenists, sent to the University of Athens for two years to learn the language, which they did beautifully.

To Do Back in America (also see "To-do" file)

Send my offprints to Bouvier; also to G. Saunier, Paris. Ask Keeley if we can bring Bouvier, Vitti, Levi, Lorenzatos, etc. to the MGSA anniversary. Book (present) to Δημ. Ντούτης, e.g. Linguistic Revolution. Offprints to Λυπουρλίδες. Matisse blue/green dancers from walls of Barnes Foundation to Christine Lansdale-Willis. Jack Shepherd's writings on Africa to David Willis (Farm School) if Jack hasn't sent them. Cavafy offprint to Ξενοφών Κοκόλης. Use Κοκόλη Θερμοπύλες in Greek 13 + the method. My study of Zorba and politics to Παπαθανασόπουλος, also books for his museum. Offprints to G. Saunier, ditto to Ερατοσθένης Καψομένος at Jannina. Vouli wants copies of Stylianos's cassette, sent from Sydney, Leander's settings, my BBC interview, my Salonika interview. For Zisi Yannoura: info on Plethon, Toynebee, my lecture, etc. Kaz. and Linguistic Revolution to George Stefanakis. My Ritsos lecture to Christos Alexiou. Send to Keith Dickey, Dept. of Classics, Bryn Mawr, notice for Demotic Greek II, so that his girlfriend Natalia can act as drillmaster and help him improve his Greek. Be sure that UPNE sends paperback Life in the Tomb to Lambis Myrivilis; he complained that no one wrote to him. Send Bill McNeill my article on Kaz's Cristoforos Columbus, and data on Eng. tr. of the play, for his work on Columbia 50th anniversary commission. My Report to Greco chapter to Φαρίνου (address in foreign address book). Gift (a book) to Χασιώτης. Parinis want to rent in the Adirondacks June-July + 1–10 August; quiet, secluded. Send notes 2040–41 to Yorgos Anemoyannis.

March 13, 1987

Geneva

Bertrand met us at 8:45 a.m. on his bicycle and we went directly to the university to do photocopying of the 311 pages using two machines in the hall, interrupted now and then by students, secretaries, etc. Then I sat in the library and checked page by page. Good to have these holographs—for example, to see the stationary that Kazantzakis used, to correct mistaken dates in the published version, to learn that letters published as separate were sometimes actually one letter written over several days. Took valises to the Bouviers' mansion at Encyclopédie 9, named for Voltaire, of course. Bertrand arranged for us to have a special tour of the Voltaire museum by the curator, Virag, a former student of Bertrand's. Voltaire occupied this house for about ten years, used it occasionally for a theater, etc. Good holograph letters, a manuscript, letters from Frederick the Great (who spoke French, not German), interesting editions of Voltaire's works with false dates and provenances to fool the censors. Wax effigy of V. at his writing desk. His ironic smile.

Walked more. Saw the great monument outside the university, to the reformer, Calvin. Quickly through history and art museum. Three superb Rembrandts, especially the one called Christ and the Fishermen; reminded me a little of the Lokös landscape we have, only so much better. Then to Mrs. K. again for another tea. She delayed her trip to Greece just for us; she leaves on Sunday and then later in the month goes to China. Bouvier then called for us and we went to a favorite restaurant of his, as Mrs. Kaz's guests: Auberge de Coutance, Rue de Coutance 25. Lovely pepper steak and mouse with Swiss wine. Sehr gemütlich. Bouvier is doing an edition, with translation, of the apocryphal gospels.

March 14, 1987

Hotel Limmathaus, Zurich

Bertrand drove us to the airport. Huge crowd: skiers. (He has his chalet, too. Nice life!) We thought we'd miss the plane or at least the baggage would, but no! Swiss Air is so efficient, everything was OK in Zurich. And such cleanliness, such organization! Zurich airport a dream. Direct rail connection to the city and everywhere else in Switzerland. Five trams in 11 minutes. Someday must go to Davos Platz: three hours by train from Zuricher Flughafen.

Immediately, after Hungarian goulash lunch followed by inevitable diarrhea, tram to Funtern Cemetery, next to the zoo, to find Joyce's grave. No one there. It had snowed the night before and we tramped through two inches of snow, discouraged, finding only recent graves. Then, on our way out, having given up, Chrysanthi noticed a little sign at the entrance showing the grave's location. And what a surprise! Next to the grave is a lovely statue: Joyce sitting, smiling κάτω απ' το μουστάκι του, holding his "ashplant," and a small cigar, with his thick spectacles, dreaming up a sequel to Finnegans Wake no doubt. So, we did our business. Then back on the tram. Despite the cold, we walked through the old town, the famous Bahnhofstrasse, Zwingli's church, the Rathaus over the Limmat. A lovely city. Then out to the Opera, by the lake. Luckily we got the last two seats, a box over the stage, very expensive. Hamburger (!) for supper. Then saw a stirring performance of Madame Butterfly. What a good libretto! It's the first opera I've seen that has a sensible libretto, with literary merit. We were practically able to touch the singers' heads, and could also watch the conductor from head-on, a young man very much in charge. The Italian singer playing Pinkerton actually walked and stood like an American, and his despicable wife Kate looked just like the wife of a Dartmouth alum! We do have a national image. If this had been a Greek tragedy, Butterfly would have killed the child as well as herself. But it's more touching and memorable, actually, to see Kate hustling the child away from the slain mother.

Number 4 tram took us directly back to the hotel. How easy!

March 15, 1987

Zurich-Θεσσαλονίκη

Tram, train, airport; So easy. Baggage carts everywhere. Spent our last franks on Swiss chocolates. Saw a couple bound for Greece reading Daphne's Let's Go Greece.

Our apartment at Στατίστης 18 is lovely. Attractive and completely furnished; nice neighborhood; much more pleasant street than Κολοκοτρώνη because the houses are only two stories high, mostly. Walking distance to the university and the city. Right on the number 15 bus line. George and Efthymoula came. They're happy because Andreas is finishing his law degree.

March 16, 1987

Θεσ/νίκη

Walked to the American Center, Μητροπόλεως 34, corner Πλατεία Αριστοτέλους. Δημ. Ντούτης, Εκπαιδευτικός Σύμβουλος of the Fulbright office, had my money—90,000 drachmas—for “settling in” plus a monthly allowance of 21,600. All this I duly deposited in the American Express bank. Met another Fulbrighter, David Acker, who’s at the American Farm School in the role of helping Bruce set up a short course system for Africans and Asians. Also met the Center’s director, Mark Crocker, who interestingly admitted that he listens to the BBC for the “real news” and to Voice of America for the “party line. N.B.: He is employed by the USIS. Soon to go to China for three years. Knows Turkish and has been in China before. Good USIS library. Sublibrarian is the wife of John Koliopoulos, whose article I edited for JMGS. Ντούτης, as we entered, was counseling Greek students who wanted to study in the USA. Συγκινητικός. A girl wanted to do Νεοελληνική λογοτεχνία in America! He did not encourage her. Wednesday Ammerman is coming and we’ll meet other Fulbrighters. Thursday there is an official lecture by the U.S. Cultural Attaché in Athens on black Americans’ contributions to American culture.

Lunch in Αγίας Σοφίας. Walked back to our house. I was exhausted. Lay down for  $\frac{3}{4}$  hour and slept for three hours.

George and Efthymoula visited us in our house in the evening. Looking well. Much relieved about Andreas, who’s going to finish his law degree. Cold cold weather.

Tuesday, March 17, 1987

To Odysseas and Eleni and Yiayia for supper. They showed us the video of Leander’s concert with Toula. Very poor. Static. No life. Toula’s Musorgsky mechanical, boring, colorless. Ditto for four-hand pieces (C.P.E. Bach, Bizet) with Leander. Strange. When we spoke to Toula and Stavros she showed that she understood. She was under great strain to do well (i.e., not make mistakes, not have a memory lapse) because the audience were mostly her students.

In the morning at the university again. Aglaïa most helpful. And Mimis. I have a desk in the Σπουδαστήριο των Κλασικών. Library privileges, etc. Met Μαρωνίτης, just back from a celebration in Athens (μνημόσυνο) for Karolos Koun. Said he loves New York because one is relieved from the weight of tradition! Kept referring to his time in prison επί χούντας.

BOOKS READ IN GREECE, MARCH 15–JUNE 30, 1987

Dimitrios Tziovas, The Nationism of the Demoticists and Its Impact on Their Literary Theory

Παντελή Πρεβελάκη, Μνημόσυνο στο Βασιλείο Λαούρδα. Σε:

Πρεβελάκη Δείχτες πορείας

Παντελή Πρεβελάκη, Ο ποιητής και το ποίημα της Οδύσσειας

Ξ. Α. Κοκόλη, Θερμοπύλες και Πάρθεν

Virginia Woolf, The Collected Essays, volume 1

Bernard F. Dick, William Golding

Κώστα Βάρναλη, Η αληθινή απολογία του Σωκράτη

Γιάννη Ρίτσο, Το νεκρό σπίτι, Η ταφή του Οργκάθ, Η Σονάτα του

Σελινόφωτος, Το τραγούδι της αδελφής μου, Ορέστης

Nikos Kazantzakis, The Odyssey, cantos 1–17

Από την αλληλογραφία των πρώτων δημοτικιστών, II

BOOKS READ IN RIPARIUS

Allan Bloom, The Closing of the American Mind

T. Alibrandi, Privileged Information (on Garrow)

Jay Parini, The Patch Boys

Wednesday, March 18, 1987

At university. Bob Jones, from Missouri, read his poetry. Quite nice. Frostian. Alert to nature. He's teaching American Literature this year, in the succession that goes back to 1949. Greece was among the very first to have a Fulbright program. This is the 40th anniversary; it was conceived in 1947. Met Ruth Gounelas, who has a position in the English Department and is very happy. Her eyes are fine. New baby. Afterwards Chip Ammerman took the Joneses, Biens, and Dimitris Doutsis to Χάρκας taverna in Nea Smyrna for a feast culminating in καραβίδα (crayfish). Very expensive. More than Pier A in Boston. Miraculously, my stomach survived.

Thursday, March 19, 1987

Lecture in the American Center on the Contribution of Black Americans to American Technology, by a Black woman, cultural attaché at the U.S. Embassy. Very attractive; good speaker. Started in fine Greek to show that she could. She mentioned, among many others, Ernest Just, a Dartmouth graduate. But in all cases she omitted the sufferings and setbacks and humiliations of all these people, stressing the few recognitions they'd received. I mentioned this to her afterwards and she said that she didn't want to be depressing. It's nice that the Black cause has moved to the stage where the negative can be overlooked and the white guilt overlooked, so that Black people of achievement can be discussed just like everyone else. . . . Expected to see Harry Psomiades, who had not shown up at Χάρκας yesterday, nor today. Suspected he was ill. Afterwards I went to the City Hotel and called him in his room, and indeed he was confined there owing to arthritis, although he managed to travel to Veroia to see a man who had a Pontic archive. He'll be in Athens until May. Met John Koliopoulos at the lecture. I told him about my episode at Rutgers re: the klephts, all on account of him! Also met a woman who'd hosted Mike Keeley and me in Houston after the MLA, years ago. She's here teaching French.

On the way home, we stopped for supper and had αρνάκι σούβλας. And that did it! Diarrhea, etc. Chrysanthi, too, though she had something else. Must be bacteria, because we've both avoided water and oil (but how can you?).

Friday, March 20, 1987

Aglaïa and Mimis here. Christos telephoned earlier from Volos. He's going to B'ham for three weeks at Eastertime to tend Dimitris. I read part of Mimi's new book, Έν παρόδω, a series of meditations on short texts, e.g., from Thucydides. There's one on Thucydides's awareness of the misuse of language in wartime. I told him about George Orwell and about my Thucydidean comparison of the US and USSR with Athens and Sparta. Aglaïa has published an account of Μακεδονικές Ημέρες, a periodical important in this city's literary life. Βούλη came too, for a while. She's helping me with the Museum in Iraklio; her niece knows the director.

I'm reading Tziovas's book, to review it for JMGS. Must get down to serious work here. A week has gone by already. I've prepared a form letter for about fifteen people who have Kazantzakis letters, asking them if they'll cooperate. We'll see. Λευτέρης Πρεβελάκης is the key one, of course.

Saturday, March 21, 1987

Stomach still χάλια. Diet of tea and παξιμάδια. Supper at George's and Efthymoula's: τυρί και τσάι. The sea is being cleaned. Previously, all sewers flowed directly into the bay, from homes and factories. Now everything will go through a processing plant and be piped way out into the ocean, with the result that the bay will once again become swimmable, fish will return, etc.

Heard that Dukakis declared for president.

Sunday, March 22, 1987

Raining. Stomach still questionable but better. Lunch at Lola and Kostas's. Τσάι και παξιμάδι. Nikos there; specializing in orthopedics. He drove us to their new house in Aghia Triadha: magnificent, huge. The village is not too changed. "Our" street is just as before. Alekos the tailor is still alive; his wife Marianthi is dead. Too nasty to walk. Mimika and Nikos came. He's an automotive mechanic. He told us about his six years working in Libya with a Greek firm building roads, bridges, etc. Greeks in charge; laborers from Turkey, India, Pakistan, etc. He said that Gaddafi is very good for Libyans, has made enormous progress there. He is convinced that the aim of American bombing was to kill him, but that he was tipped off in advance and took refuge. Furlough 10 days every 3 months. Complete village in the ερημιά: doctors, x-rays, canteen, etc. Lived in a trailer. Common language: English (sort of). Made enough money to buy an apartment here. Wants to go again for another two years.

Then to the American Farm School. Reception for Africans in a Reading University M.A. program on development. Greece is an example of success: thus their trip here; a week at the Farm School, a week in Athens. Speeches by dignitaries—e.g., deputy Greek minister of agriculture. Chief address by Bruce in his lovely style. He's a preacher manqué, but not manqué—he's found the equivalent. He defined "management" as "doing what you want with what you've got." And/or, as ΠΟΛΚΑ: planning, organizing, . . . , . . . , adjusting. Happiness, which should be the goal of development (as opposed to money, goods, etc.) = to believe in what you are doing now, to love someone (as opposed to being loved), and to believe in the future—i.e., to be working toward an aim not yet realized. He made us all clutch a coin in our fists and then try to caress the person next to us. Not very effective. Then we discarded the coin, and the caresses worked much better! He of course told a Hodja story, about a miser who was roasting a goat on a spit. A poor man placed himself downwind and “filled himself” with the smell, whereupon the rich miser demanded payment for the smell. The poor man protested and the case went to court with Hodja as judge. Hodja made the poor man produce the few pennies he had in his pocket, and asked him to hand them over. As he placed them in Hodja’s hands Hodja let them drop on the floor. Then he turned to the rich man and said, “Did you hear the coins hit the floor?” “Yes.” “Fine. The sound of the coins hitting the floor will be ample payment for the smell of the goat.”

Met a nice young British vice-consul, stationed in Athens, here for a day or two: Jeremy Hart. He looks after British tourists mostly, and the 19,000 British subjects permanently in Greece. He is also director of the British Council here. Cold. Has 25 permanent teachers of English, all British, doing the Cambridge certificate. Wife nicer. They met at Birmingham University. He lived in Selly Oak.

Bruce introduced me to everyone as “the” Kazantzakis translator who stole a Greek girl from the school! Asked me to inscribe my PH pamphlet. I did as follows: “To Bruce, who does what he can with what he’s got, but who also has a vision.” The other day he’d told me that that’s what he likes so much about Kazantzakis: the vision. What I should have added is that Bruce fulfills his own definition of happiness.

Monday, March 23, 1987

Raining. Slight diarrhea continues. Spent all day writing 1200 words: review of Tziovas’s book on nationalism and demoticism. Hard to get started again.

First response to my letters: Stamos Diamantaras telephoned. He’s more than delighted. Has letters to himself and also to Kazantzakis’s father.

Tuesday, March 24, 1987

Raining still. Interesting debate yesterday on television: clergy vs. the minister of education regarding appropriation of monastic lands and goods that the government wants. I sided as did Chrysanthi with the Church. Why make the state all-powerful? It’s no better than the Church and can do much more harm.

Wrote out a clean copy of the Tziouvas review by longhand. From computer back to pen and ink.

Στις Πρεβελάκη Δείχτες πορείας, σελ. 19: Η αφορμή του σύγχρονου δράματος είναι ο «θάνατος του Θεού». Αυτή την περιλάλητη έκφραση, ως την εννοήσουμε ως το θάνατο του Ανθρώπου, δηλαδή ως τη χρεωκοπία μιάς κατ' άνθρωπον ερμηνείας του κόσμου κ' ενός συστήματος ηθικής συμπεριφοράς.

Returned to flat. Couldn't open the door because the inside key was in the lock. Went to Οδός Βιζηνού. Sat for two hours reading the TLS and watching patriotic rhetoric on television. Παραμονή της 25 Μαρτίου. Φριχτό!

Wednesday, March 25, 1987

Holiday. Stomach OK even after the pizza. It's taken a whole week. Went to Πειραιά with Stavros and Toula in their ridiculously luxurious car, a huge Audi that cost Stavros 4,300,000 drachmas used! $32,000 (but if we consider the differential in earning power: more like $64,000), the entire savings of the Odeon, as Stavros told me, up to now! But he has that need. In any case: nice afternoon. Lunch in a ψαροταβέρνα—μήδια, οκταπόδι, καλαμαράκια, κτλ., all bathed in oil, but no ill effect. Long walk on the waterfront. Then to Αφροδίτη for coffee: at the end of the splendid new παραλία, near Luna Park. Lots of good conversation, effortless. Stavros combines a boyhood in a totally primitive village with fifteen years in Russia that made him a cosmopolite. The quintessential αυτοδίδακτος, now with computers.

Returned in time for fifteen minutes' ξάπλωμα before Mimis and Aglaïa picked us up to take us to the Θέατρο Αμαλίας to see a production of Brecht's The Good Woman of Setzuan. Very well played, though a bit tiresome in the first act, which lasted for a full two hours. Yet the Lypourlis children and assorted cousins sat through it all φρόνιμα. A haunting play, longwinded to be sure, but combining fantasy and exoticism with contemporary social problems in just the right degrees. The Good Woman cannot remain good in today's world and must split herself into a fictional cousin who is evil but "successful," until the stratagem is undone by her pregnancy. The three gods who descend to earth looking for a single—just one!—good person were delicious.

This city has much to offer!

Thursday, March 26, 1987

Fascinating debate on TV between two priests, on the one side, and the Minister of Education and the legal adviser to the prime minister on the other, over the government's efforts to appropriate belongings of the monasteries. I sided with the priests, who were eloquent and extraordinarily articulate. But the two sides spoke across one another because the basic axioms were so different. The minister kept invoking Η ΠΟΛΙΤΕΙΑ and his ευθύνες προς τούτο. The priests objected that we are all citizens of God. It was wonderful to see how a sordid squabble over land and money brought out the most basic theory of the conflicting secular and sacerdotal interpretation of the human community.

Friday, March 27, 1987

Surprisingly, ο Γιάννης Γουδέλης telephoned to offer his full cooperation. He owns the letters to Galatea! He's writing a book in which he proves, he says, that the entire πυρήνας of Kazantzakis's work was his sexual impotence! Bitter against both Eleni and Prevelakis, both of whom distorted Kazantzakis for their own purposes, he says. Another call, from Margarita Λυμπεράκη, to say that the Φέξης archive, alas, is lost. I stayed in all day, reading Prevelakis's Ο ποιητής . . . , which I hadn't realized was so critical of Kazantzakis's alleged nihilism in the Οδύσσεια. I'm also realizing how poor my Greek is. I'm looking up every fifth word, it seems. Started keeping a little vocabulary notebook again, as in the old days. How beautifully Bouvier spoke! I felt like an imposter.

At night, Prime Minister Papandreou on TV reporting to the "cabinet" on the latest Turkish provocation in the Aegean regarding oil. Very serious. War possible. People have emptied the stores of canned goods. (We have barely a loaf of bread in the house, though a huge bottle of τσίπουρο from the village of Αγία Τριάδα.) Papandreou ανέστειλε—suspended—the American bases. Saw Ambassador Keeley, Mike's brother, being briefed. Papandreou called for νηφαλιότητα (calm). I had visions of Thessaloniki being bombed. Θεός φυλάξει!

Projects for the future, possibly: Greek translation of Joyce's Ulysses, obviously collaborating with someone. Biography of Sikelianos's first wife, Eva Palmer. In both cases, I have good qualifications. But would I ever dare to quit Dartmouth and exist as a writer full-time?

Saturday, March 28, 1987

Finished Prevelakis's book. Started going through my "volume 1" for mentions of Οδύσεια. I like what I'm reading (Δόξα σοι ο Θεός!). If I can finish the chapter on the Odyssey at least, before we leave Greece.

Chrysanthi and Κυρά Κούλα went round the city taking photos for C's class. Also, C. is taking cooking lessons from her, in order to teach Greek cooking at Lebanon College.

Evening: to Βούλη for supper. Had γεμιστές μελιτζάνες, the first fruit of the cooking lessons. Superb! A masterpiece! Then to Κρατικό Θέατρο Βορείας Ελλάδος for Pirandello's Έτσι είναι αν έτσι νομίζετε, written in 1917—that is, fairly early. Six Characters dates from 1921 and Tonight We Improvise very late: 1930 (he died in 1936 at the age of 69). Apparently Έτσι είναι was among the first in which he moved beyond realism, and it is a fascinating blend of the usual drawing room comedy with the later Pirandellesque elements of subjectivity. The new element enters only toward the end of the first act, although there are hints before. The key is the uncle, Laodizi, who, starting as a character in the play, becomes increasingly a chorus outside the play, even a kind of "director." (In the curtain calls, he applauded the other actors.) Philosophically, the play questions the assumed positivism of the characters and audience—i.e., that the truth can be known, that evidence will show something to be either one thing or the other, whereas Laodizi keeps insisting that it's both at the same time though the two choices are contradictory. Alternatively, it's έτσι αν έτσι νομίζετε—i.e., subjectivity governs "truth." In this early play Pirandello had to employ a chorus figure to tell us all this; a little like the Doctor in Kazantzakis's Ξημερώνει or some of G. B. Shaw's "spokesmen." In later plays, he was able to dispense both with the overt spokesman and with the leftover drawing-room situations. How brilliant he was first of all to make the breakthrough seen in this play and then to proceed beyond, avoiding self-repetition.

The Turks backed away from their position owing, say the newspapers, to διεθνείς πιέσεις. Good!

Sunday, March 29, 1987

Chrysanthi awoke with tears and fright after a nightmare in which I was lost and then killed. She seems to have put together the political situation (she was afraid yesterday to go to the American library, afraid that someone would throw a bomb into it), the picnic we're about to go on with Dimitri and Ruth Gounelas at Χορτιάτι, and the ghost (or was it a ghost?) of the dead woman (or was she dead?) who appeared at the end of the play last night. She calmed down. We tried to call Alec in Indonesia but didn't get through. Chrysanthi went off to church before we left.

Wednesday, April 1, 1987

Heard George Savidis lecture at Τέχνη on deficiencies of Greek scholarship, shoddy editions, etc. The villains: Κατσιμπαλης and other amateurs. Chief exhibit: the Άπαντα του Παλαμά. Αίσχος! Poor man. He sweated throughout. Still obese. But lively, graceful. We exchanged a warm handshake.

Thursday, April 2, 1987

Finally finished the copy-edited typescript of my Cavafy essay and returned it to Scribner's. Actually did well in finding source materials here, in the central library, σπουδαστήριο, από ιδιωτικά χέρια, and at the British Council (E. M. Forster, Bowra). Ξενοφών Κοκόλης gave me his essay on Θερμόπυλες. Excellent; wonderful teaching method that I can use in Greek 13 next spring.

Chrysanthi all day at George's; sewed a blouse with Efthymoula. Very pleased. George came later, explained why the government is right to "expropriate" the Church, because the Church refuses all audits of its funds. Bishops, etc. grow rich at the people's expense. We talked about our two traditions—separation or non-separation of church and state.

Can't see Pirandello tomorrow because the lead player επιστρατεύτηκε λόγω των γεγονότων της περασμένης βδομάδας.

Mother wrote that Dr. Ham died. She kept vigil with his wife in his room, the corpse in front of them, until Dr. Strickler arrived. It's so good that she's in that environment in which the reality of death is no longer hidden, and she can get used to it gradually, to be prepared for Dad's turn, which she said she hopes will be as peaceful as Dr. Ham's.

Sachinis sent me three letters, two unpublished, and all very good. Exciting!

Friday, April 3, 1987

Worked on 400 Letters all day. 5:30 to Γαλλικό Ινστιτούτο to hear Valentini Pappadopoulou lecture, in French, on Proust and psychoanalysis. Pleased because I understood most everything, though much less when the native-speaking Frenchmen asked questions afterwards. She saw Marcel's delight in the triadic arrangement of the Martinville steeples as a return to infancy—i.e., as infantilism—because of its (alleged) equivalency with the comforting triad of mother-father-child. Then she linked Swann's love for Odette with this, describing him as infantilistic in this (like a child clinging to his mother), and in this (as in other ways) an alter ego for Marcel. Chatted with the director afterwards in my French such as it is.

Previously, walked on Σαρανταπόρου. Actually, number 11 still stands, rather proudly, among the modern horrors. Afterwards, to the university for the tail end of the day-long symposium in honor of Kriaras's 80th birthday. He was there, frail but alert, from 10:00 a.m. until 9:30 p.m. I heard Παναγιώτης Μουλλάς speak on the epistolary novel, engagingly, but without any analytical depth. Afterwards, I told him my thoughts: (a) that the form derives from exile, as in Ovid's Epistulae ex Ponto, and that this tradition survives in Ἡ ζώή ἐν τάφῳ, where the sergeant in the trenches is, in effect, an exile from all he loves and is forced to write letters as a kind of psychological lifeline back home. When we come to the eighteenth century, the secret is that the reading public for novels was feminine, chiefly. The women in such novels are "exiled" in their own homes, forbidden to externalize their passions or intellects, and thus they too have recourse to letters (and diaries). Afterwards, Dimitris Gounelas spoke on linguistic theories of Dr. Johnson vs. Coleridge (classic-romantic) and demonstrated the different treatments of the same theme (Ψαρά) by Kalvos and Solomos. Then a Byzantinist revealed documents pertaining to Slavic monks in the eleventh century at Athos; they had diarrhea! At the end, Kriaras said a sweet "Thank you."

Saturday, April 4, 1987

Finally finished going through 700 pages of the 400 Letters looking for omissions, in preparation for the meeting with Lefteris Prevelakis in Athens. Two and a half days' work! Walked with Chrysanthi up and up past the end of the 40 Εκκλησίες into the Δάσος Σεί-Σου, με θαυμάσια θέα του λιμανιού. Supper with Aglaïa and Mimis. There also was Hans Eideneier and his son Alekos, just arrived in Greece from Cologne. He is Professor of Byzantine and Modern Greek Philology and the University of Cologne. Knew my work, he said. He works on language, and on oral literature, the influence of orality on written texts, etc. Present interest is Πτωχοπρόδρομος. Φωνακλάς! The typical extrovert type. His first words to me were: «Α! Βλέπω ότι και οι δυο μας έχουμε φαλάκρα». Lively discussion about Church-State relations (tomorrow there will be a huge demonstration in front of St. Demetrios's). Mimis explained at some length why the bishop we saw arguing so well on television is a genuine bastard. The problem is the Church hierarchy, which collects huge sums and undergoes no audit. Church properties are neglected, or sold indiscriminately; church lands are under-cultivated, etc. The present compromise is for the monasteries to keep their properties but for parish councils to be elected instead of appointed, as at present, by the bishops. This the hierarchy is fighting tooth and nail—for obvious reasons. I discovered a Greek comic who calls himself “Harry Kleen” and whose record is called Πατάτες. We heard a bit. Nowhere as good as Flanders and Swann. But who is? Typical: Πελάτης στον ταξιτζή: «Είσαι λεύτερος;» Ταξιτζής: «Όχι, παντρεμένος».

Sunday, April 5, 1987

Spent the whole day talking. Chrysanthi said she was proud of me. First Ρήτσα Παννούρα came with her husband Ζήσης and drove us to Αγία Τριάδα, where we met various friends of theirs and ended, of course, by drinking numerous cups of coffee, ouzo, etc., and then eating endless plates of μήδια, χταπόδι, κολοκυθάκια τηγανιτά, κτλ. Ζήσης peppered me with questions about Kazantzakis, Quakerism, etc., and we talked at length about the current debate re: the Church. They're all for the State, although they're not against religion per se. Zisis is a Freemason, believes in immortality of the soul, feels all genuine religion is the same because based on love. What a good life they all lead. Lots of R & R, so it seems. Got home at 4:45; barely time for a 30-minute siesta, when Σταύρος, Τούλα, and Stavros's younger brother Βασίλης came. Two and a half hours' talk in the living room; then all of us to Αφροδίτη for another two hours. Vasilis is a journalist for Ακρόπολις, Athens, and has a bi-weekly radio program on the Φωνή της Πατρίδας for emigrants in Germany, etc. He wants to interview me. Told about their village when they were young. No roads. No communication. To take a sick person for medical help: bullocks and a cart for six hours. Their labor they once calculated brought 20 drachmas per hour. Now everything has changed. Their father made money by working as a furrier in Kastoria. Now they have tractors, autos, roads, telephone, etc. Described how the whole village would ostracize a man who left his wife, forcing him either to return to her or to leave the village. Such people took to the mountains, joined together, and became bandits. They had no choice.

Tuesday, April 7, 1987

Yesterday I read Dennis Carroll's novel—four chapters plus epilogue—that he sent me in the US. Not bad. Satirical regarding upper middle class American life of power and wealth, with the hero rebelling. I wrote a long critique and sent it off today. I'd been remiss with so many other MSS he'd sent over the years, and was glad to be relaxed enough here to do this.

Telephoned Μάνος Χαριτάτος, who apparently has the Kazantzakis letters to Φράσος Καστανάκης—the political ones. He told me they'd been published by Αλίκη Σουλουγιάννη, whom I reached finally at the Ministry of Culture. She was very pleasant and cooperative, knew my work, etc. She'll send photocopies. She plans to publish more shortly. We'll see each other in Athens.

Christos called to arrange for my lecture in Yannina, at the end of May. He's off to England to try to deal with Dimitris, etc. Meanwhile, here, Pavlos is exhibiting a great sexual drive, naturally. What to do? Αδιέξοδο!

To the university in search of Archbishop Chrysanthos's memoirs. Miraculously found them in the Σπουδαστήριο Ιστορίας, Χασιώτης very friendly (he gave me the reference last year). And behold! There was an account of Stavridakis's death in Tiflis, plus an insider's recital of the whole problem leading to the Caucasus expedition. Minimal mention of Kazantzakis, but some. A surprise: a photo of a bloated general, Παρασκευόπουλος himself, the original of Balafaras in Η ζωή έν τάφω.

In the απόγευμα went to Nakas's music store to look for piano music by Greek composers, for Leander. Pitiful. Essentially nothing. A few by Κωνσταντινίδης, which I bought, and a piano concerto by Καλομοίρης, which I did not buy.

In the evening, transcribed (μετέγραψα) the three unpublished letters that Apostolos Sachinis so kindly sent me. All three are superb. One is probably the best statement of all regarding the Odyssey. The other stresses Kazantzakis's religious orientation, with art in the service of vision of the Unknowable. The last says that he thinks that he wrote the best prose of his life in Ο τελευταίος πειρασμός. I of course have agreed ever since I translated it 2½ decades ago.

Late at night, read a few more of Mimis's παράγραφους, these on the problem of ancient Greek in the schools, and scanned the Virginia Woolf collected shorter essays that I have to review for World Literature Today.

Wednesday, April 8, 1987

Worked all day on outlining my chapter on the Odyssey. Tedious but necessary. At night: to Farm School for δείπνο για τους δωρητές. We got out of the taxi at the old girls' school, just to see, but it was locked. Looks manicured. Later I learned that it operates only in the mornings, as a day-care center for children of working mothers: άσυλο παιδιών. Walked along the now very busy highway, to the Farm School entrance. That beautiful view from the girls' school of fields going down to the sea is now broken by highways, factories, apartment houses, all in a jumble.

Bruce and Tad just back, literally a few hours earlier, from Labouisse's memorial service in New York. Lovely reception in Princeton Hall. We got a tour from a woman who learned Greek in Oregon from our book. A whole room is full of IBM computers. Sewing room. Weaving room. Library. Ceramics studio. Cooking classroom. Typing room. Talked with David Acker again and with the chap from Rhode Island, Clair Cheer, a chemist on a research grant. He's not doing much here because the computer is so slow. Learning to relax, he says. Met Norman Gilbertson, finally—the British founder of the girls' school, after coming to Greece to work with UNRRA after the war. (Chrysanthi went to the school in 1946.) They hadn't seen each other in 40 years. Both looked the same! Lovely dinner for the donors. The δήμαρχος της Θεσ/νίκης was there. We sat with Norman, talked about Quakerism, his Meeting is Hampshire Meeting in London but he lives in Brussels. Their Meeting struggles because they seem increasingly to attract people because Quakers "believe in nothing"! We were joined by a man whose family has supplied bread to the school since the 1920s, and by the recreation director, the one with the stentorian voice who got the Africans dancing the other time. The program consisted of Βούλη as master of ceremonies, Bruce, who told his obligatory Hodja story and then eulogized Labouisse, and, best of all, five Farm School students, who described the experience of being at the school, emphasizing the lessons that come from having to live together in community, and the rare pleasure (in Greece) of having human contact with their teachers. They spoke beautifully. Then the Πρεσβυτέρα led twenty-odd students who comprise the chorus in Greek songs. Met the priest afterwards, Father George, born in America, served in Newton, Rochester, Annapolis. Here in retirement and loving it. Christine and David invited us for Πιάσχα with the Lansdales and Keeleys, but we'll probably be with family.

Thursday, April 9, 1987

Worked all day. Started my Odyssey chapter. Very slow. But it will accelerate.

Βράδυ: Party given by Πάννης Χασιώτης, professor of history with special interest in Armenians and Pontians. Μουλλάς there, Λυπουρλής, κα. Φαρίνου, who gave a paper at Beaton's conference in London (and told me that the proceedings will not now be published by Bristol but are meant to come out in November somewhere else), some others whose names I didn't catch, and Κώστας Πύρζας, whom I talked to most. He studied English literature, taught for a while, and is now a bookseller in the Βιβλιοπωλείο Κοτζιά, Τσιμισκή 78. (Mimis told me afterwards that he was imprisoned and tortured by the Junta.) All his family are in Melbourne; they went in the 1950s, like so many other leftists, after the civil war. He knew my books. Said that Kazantzakis continues to sell—not spectacularly, but steadily. He's a "classic." Ditto for Myrivilis. Mimis mentioned à propos of the Hippocratic Oath (I told him about Strickler's administration of it at our graduations), (a) that it isn't by Hippocrates, but must be a Pythagorean compilation dating about a century later than Hippocrates, (b) that it includes a clause in which the prospective doctor promises never to cut—i.e., never to perform surgery—and is thus inapplicable. Also includes a clause prohibiting abortions. Interesting.

A postcard came from Mary Rassias. John went to China and Mongolia and back without incident, then drove into a ditch on Cliff Street in Norwich and had to be pulled out by a tow-truck. His explanation: swerved to avoid an elk! (Maybe it was a gnu.)

Mother wrote that Dr. Ham died quietly in his sleep. She sat with Finney Ham in the room, with the corpse, the next morning, until Dr. Strickler arrived. She hopes that Dad will go as peacefully. It's good that she's in such an environment, to share death with others, to support them and in turn to be supported. More and more I keep hoping that our projected Kendal at Hanover will materialize. Mother also wrote that Alice's week with them was very pleasant. It's good that children and parents can make their peace . . . finally! Alec sent us a postcard from Thailand of an elephant lifting logs. What we need at the farm! He went to Singapore and Thailand on his spring break.

Friday, April 10, 1987

Four telephone calls today: two from Athens, one from Adelaide, Australia, one from Cambridge, Massachusetts. The two from Athens were from Ευσταθιάδης and Κέδρος. I have royalties: dr. 12,000 and dr. 5000! Good. Will talk with Ninetta Makrinikola about publishing Kazantzakis and Politics if it ever gets written. The one from Australia concerned the "chair" in Adelaide, which they're about to advertise for yet the third time. Do I know of any candidates? How would Kimon Friar do? Hans Ruge turned them down, finally, as did the infamous K. Mitsakis. Was he hinting that I might be interested? Might I? Chrysanthi, quite sensibly, said No! Why? Our children are in limbo, nobody settled yet, we can't walk out on them. So be it. A propos, the call from Cambridge was from Daphne. She's coming here in June, with Greg. She's been offered a summer job with INC magazine in Boston and at the same time has accepted the managing editorship at Let's Go. I told her it's nice to have such problems. She's also still in the running for the Simon and Schuster trainee's position, after graduation.

Received a letter from the son-in-law of Γιάννης Χατζίνης, now dead, offering assistance. He has some letters.

Dimitris and Ruth Gounelas came for supper. Chrysanthi made the stuffed eggplant she'd learned from Κυρά Κούλα. Ruth, a New Zealander, would like to go to Adelaide but Dimitris, after one bad experience in Sydney, isn't interested. He thought that Xenophon Kokolis might be. I thought of Kostas Dimakis in Amsterdam. We all then went to the Κρατικό to see a ballet do two works by Ritsos: Η γερόντισσες κι η θάλασσα, and Ρωμιόσυνη. French choreographer, some French dancers, others Greek. Wonderfully imaginative. Not much Ritsos in the first, just isolated words subjected to electronic transformations à la Beria. Music varied, from Bach to rock and roll and Stockhausen. Girls dressed as ants and other insects, representing earth, I suppose. Boys representing sea, practically nude, with strips of red wrapped around legs and torso. Spasmodic, yet beautiful, dancing. Romiosyne was the Theodorakis version, which always makes me nervous. But the dance avoided all clichés and bombast. Hints of traditional Greek dances. Everything for the whole ensemble, no solo sections, in keeping with the communal nature of the poem. Saw Aglaïa and Mimis in the interval, with their three girls, whom they like to take to the theater. By mistake we'd gone first across the street to the πρώην Βασιλικό, and found ourselves watching To Boukάλι by Ζιώγα, Beckett-like, until I realized what happened and we shifted to the ballet.

Dimitris bought for me the Greek translation of Ulysses, which unfortunately exists: so that ends my project. It seemed rather good, just from a quick scan. Yet I shuddered when I saw “ineluctable modality” rendered as αναπόφευκτη μορφή instead of μεταβολή or ροή. Also: the diaphane was rendered as το διάφανο instead of the Aristotelian το διαφανές. Also, when Bloom is dozing off at the end of Ithaca the translation doesn't rhyme the Sinbad the Sailor Tinbad the Tailor, Jimbad the Jailer passage, missing the whole point, but translates literally as Σίνμπαντ το Ναύτη και τον Τίνμπαντ το Ράφτη και τον Τζίνμπαντ το φύλακα . . . Δύσκολο!

Saturday, April 11, 1987

Litohoro

To Λιτόχωρο with Ritsa and Mimis. Rain and hail all the way, but the weather cleared later on. First glimpses of Olympus behind the clouds, snow-capped, spectacular. The village is extraordinarily beautiful, like something in Switzerland: clean, picturesque, well maintained, with parks, recreation facilities indoors and out, swimming pool, clubs, lovely churches. A feeling of well-being and prosperity everywhere. Couldn't avoid comparison with North Creek, which is so ugly and miserable. After lunch, a delicious siesta. Then walked through the village, then sat in the hotel lounge and talked talked talked with our hosts and the daughter of the proprietor, then to a lovely tavern on the main road for, thankfully, a sensible meal and more talk talk talk.

Sunday, April 12, 1987

Ξενοδοχείο «Μίρτο», Αιτόχωρο.

Another lovely day. After breakfast, to church. Palm Sunday. Των βάντων. The church full to bursting, men on the right, women on the left. Standing, old style. Beautiful church with frescoes, rich chandeliers. Service transformed because the priest now uses a microphone, and everything that used to be mumbled behind the rood screen is now audible. Greece is so contradictory. On the one hand, this extraordinary unity of a single religion with the communal feeling that this brings; on the other, the well-known factionalism, which continues. But freedom is certainly now the rule here. In Λιτόχωρο, in the main square, placards in huge red letters from the KKE decrying the recent increases in phone and electricity charges, etc., and large cartoons satirizing Uncle Sam.

We then went by car up a long, winding road with hairpin turns, to one of the καταφύγια maintained by the E.O.S. (Ελληνικός Ορειβατικός Σύλλογος), of which Zisis was vice-president (Salonika branch) for some years. Right up the flanks of Olympus. Actually, the peak was visible, snow-covered, from our hotel balcony in the morning, after the mist lifted. Wonderful sight. Like being in the Swiss Alps. At the “refuge,” the sign outside proclaimed “Bean Soup”! They make simple meals and have dormitory style beds, with fireplace, etc., like a chalet. The “keepers” are all friends of Zisis’s. Complained about salary, etc., in village pronunciation, like that of Eleni’s mother. Four rugged, weather-beaten men, about 35–45 years old, used to walking up and down the mountain when the road isn’t passable. We had a coffee and then continued on, traversing a narrower, more scary road through an immense canyon, with perpendicular, craggy walls on both sides, and stripes of remaining snow in the gullies, over fords with rushing water, to another, simpler καταφύγιο called τα πριόνια, at a trailhead leading to still higher refuges and then to the triple summit. Here was another friend of Zisis’s, a forest ranger; the building is merely a shed, very rustic, made of logs with vertical poles for walls. Rushing stream, fountain for drinking, snow-capped summits, but not the summit, visible. We were the only visitors, except for one couple who had pitched a tent. . . . Returned to the original καταφύγιο and went on a path through the forest, walking. At this height, exactly 1010 meters (about 3300 feet) the trees resembled ours at home; we walked over a bed of pine needles and dried oak leaves. Bubbling out of the path at one point was a spring of cool, mountain water. Here and there the first wild flowers: daisies and anemones. Returning, we found a herd of goats grazing around the καταφύγιο, their bells tinkling. Herds and shepherds are still the rule here. There are no fences. Zisis’s friends placed us next to the fire, inside, and served the famous φασουλάδα, with a pork chop cooked over the coals for me, and bread toasted on the coals. Then the long ride down, with lovely views of Λιτόχωρο itself, the plain, the sea. Finally a stop at the seaside “villa” maintained by the Club, just opposite the ancient Dion, whose excavations we did not visit. Home at 4:30. Siesta.

Then George and Efthymoula, and theater: Gregory Xenopoulos's Στέλλα Βιολάντη, beautifully acted by Andreas Zisimatos as the domineering father and Lena Kouroudi-Kompselidou as the lovesick but deluded Stella. Fascinating first two acts, expertly developed, of a clash of wills between the equally obstinate father and daughter when she falls madly in love with a telegraph operator and the father is scandalized because he of course believes that he should name her fiancé, who must be rich and socially acceptable, etc., etc.—all this taken, probably quite truthfully, from the Zakynthos situation in about 1884. The language is superb, with peppering of Italian and English as is proper for that class in Zakynthos, and Xenopoulos lightens the pathos by introducing the comic-ridiculous, foppish brother, Dandis, and softens it with the sympathetic Θεία Νιόνια. In a little blurb in the program, the director, Κώστας Τσιάνος, says quite rightly that this surpasses melodrama because it is not just a clash of wills between a villainous father and a love-struck adolescent daughter turned into an Antigone, but rather an examination of how both father and daughter are prisoners of their middle-class ethos, in the name of which the father destroys his own happiness. As for Stella, despite her rebellion in asserting that she should marry whom she wishes and not whom her father wishes, she cannot go as far as to run away (though the idea occurs to her). She, too, takes for granted her family obligations and positions. She wants her fiancé, but she also wants her father to accept him. Dramatically, all this is developed with consummate skill. As Tsianos says, «Stella Violandi is not just ένα ηθικογραφικό αισθηματικό δράμα. Ο Ξενόπουλος, έχοντας αφομοιώσει τις επιρροές του από μεγάλους συγγραφείς όπως ο Στρίπεργκ και ο Ίψεν, με τη Στελλα, του άγγιξε το θέατρο χαρακτήρων και ιδεών. Συχνά μάλιστα καταφέρνει να χρωματίσει τους ηρώες του με αρκετές ποιητικές πινελιές. Με μια εκπληκτική τεχνική στη δομή του δράματος και με καπάζουσες δραματικές συγκρούσεις ξεπερνάει το σκόπελο του απλού αισθηματικού έργου.» Fine, but then the whole thing is vitiated in Act III where, without sufficient development, the ending comes much too quickly and melodramatically as Stella, hearing that her lover, after being rejected by her father, has simply switched to another fair damsel who, unlike Stella, ξεπόρτισε with him (eloped, ran away from home), simply keels over and dies. Curtain! Ξεψύχησε is the last word, uttered by the sympathetic aunt as she bends over the corpse. We have no opportunity to feel the daughter's agony or to observe her feelings as she absorbs this new shock: that the lover was a fake, just after her money, as the father of course suspected all along. After which . . . well—Shakespeare would have known what to do. I was so amazed that I thought perhaps several scenes had been cut, but speaking afterwards to one of the troupe I was assured that every word was played. The only change was to do Acts I and II without intermission. A shame. In any case, it was good to see the kind of theatre that Greece was producing, as a background to Kazantzakis's productions.

Afterwards, after interminable discussion in which I finally begged Chrysanthi to keep quiet (for which she bitterly reproached me of course when we got home), we ended up going for λουκουμάδες in a place on Aristotelous—dingy, with blaring television, deserted. And Efthymoula wanted to show off her clothes. Κρίμα. Managed a little conversation nevertheless, enough to learn that George really misses his work, which he loved and with which he has no contact whatsoever now except, as he says, to go once a month and collect his pension, and that Efthymoula, true to form, has no regrets whatever. Teaching for her was just a pain, apparently.

The return to Salonika after Olympus was a shock. One has to go away to realize really how inhuman cities can be—smog, noise, outrageous prices (900 for 4 portions of λουκουμάδες) whereas in Λιτόχωρο we had a sumptuous dinner for four, including a bottle of wine, for 2000! Yet the city has the Κρατικό Θέατρο playing Ξενόπουλος!

Monday, April 13, 1987

Worked all day, rather well. What a gift, to sit at my desk morning, afternoon, and night, without other responsibilities! Diarrhea again, however. Καταραμένη!

Price increases in effect today. Postage to U.S. jumped from 46 to 60. Electricity, telephone, airways, etc. all going up considerably. At night, Valentini Papadopoulou came. She grew up here, went to a French high school in Salonika, emigrated to Melbourne, finished the Uni there, married, lived in Queensland, then came to the U.S., and is Professor of French at the University of Houston, but is now finishing her second year as visiting professor here in Salonika. She tells us that all the girls in her classes (and they are 80% girls at least) would jump at a chance to emigrate, and especially to the U.S. Why? No opportunity. A graduate in French might get a school appointment in eight years! If they want to do graduate work they must find a professor to accept them, and the professors tend not to, because it's extra work. Then there's the economic problem. The standard of living, despite all appearances, is very low. Pay for a full professor, at the start, is δρ 120000 a month. I'm getting 216000 from Fulbright, which is 1/3 of what I get at Dartmouth. Yet autos, gasoline, manufactured goods in general, even clothing, costs the same here as in the U.S., and often much more (e.g., Stavros's used Audi, $30,000!). Valentini is caught between taking a 65% cut in income, if she stays here permanently, and going back to Houston, which in comparison to Salonika is uncultured and insufferable. Here she has hundreds of students hanging on her every word and very advanced in French; there she has a handful whose French is shaky. She feels she belongs here, can offer something here. Yet . . . And she thinks of her husband, who teaches at Rice, gets $60,000 a year, and has three students! We talked lots about Proust, following up on her lecture several weeks ago.

Alex McCormick telephoned from Dartmouth re: the student I failed. He told me that the new president has been chosen; he is the current president of the University of Iowa. Let's hope . . . !

Πέτρος Χάρης telephoned from Athens to say "Yes." Also Στεφανάκης, who has lots of letters published and unpublished.

Tuesday, April 14, 1987

Received another fine letter, this one to Χατζίνης, expressing his dialectical system of thesis–antithesis–synthesis–new thesis, etc. I immediately used it in the Οδύσσεια chapter.

Odysseas and Eleni here for supper. More insight into the relative poverty here. Takis, their son, a graduate engineer, gets δρ 60000 a month from the city, his employer, and has to moonlight to make ends meet. Eleni, when she retires in June as a nurse, will have a pension of 35000 from her clinic and 10000 from the πολιτεία, totaling 45000 a month! Impossible to live. Again, we enjoyed the impossible coincidences that have brought Toula, a Russian-trained pianist, and Leander, an American, to play four-hand recitals together.

Wednesday, April 15, 1987

No gasoline in Salonika: strike by haulers of barrels. Massive demonstration this a.m. at the Καμάρα by employees of AHEPA hospital asking for improved wages and conditions.

Nice letter from Leander. He's reading Schweitzer on Bach, my birthday present. Plans to keep Moravian job and probably live with Alec in Philadelphia. Rangell is enjoying our house; he wrote directly and also to Leander. Both Chrysanthi and I are a bit homesick. He savors C's spelling errors, especially the Boston Glob! Also heard from Carol Weingeist re: Kendal at Hanover. Vermont certificate of need is progressing nicely, as expected. NH one, though it seemed that things were going from bad to worse, took a turn for the better at the latest meeting of the sub-committee. Carol said that the people were almost rational!

I'm finding—transcribing Kazantzakis's holograph letters into my notebook—that I can actually read his handwriting now with very little difficulty.

To church in the neighborhood for Μεγάλη Τετάρτη service: το Ιερό Ευχέλαιο (I think). I understood bits and pieces of the Ευαγγέλιο in the original Greek, of course. The δεξιός ψάλτης had his son in the "box" with him, a ten- or twelve-year-old with thick glasses and a lovely, clear face. The boy followed the psalmody as his father sang vigorously, sometimes resting his hands on the boy's shoulders. How nice to grow up with all this! Church full, reeking of incense. The church proper here in 40 Εκκλησίες still isn't ready; service in basement hall. They've been building it for fifteen years, and are near completion.

Afterwards: pizza, beer, sweets, coffee—and stomachache!

April 16, 1987

Μεγάλη Πέμπτη

Awake to a telephone call from Sydney. Archbishop Stylianos! He liked my Chicago speech, and also says he always listens to Leander's setting of his poems—keeps the cassette in his car. He's coming in June. Maybe he'll see Daphne με το καπέλλο της! He has started a theological college; teaches in it and does the administration. Wants to teach theology the modern way, not as in Athens. Obviously he's got to do this to insure the future. He asked me if I'd received his last collection of poems. Yes, but I'd never written. I told him, Άμα γλιτώσω από το Καζαντζάκη ίσως να ξανακαταπιαστώ με το Χαρκιανάκη. Another translator, in Australia, is interested in his poems, so maybe a book will come, after all.

Ο Κάσδαγλης telephoned. He has a few letters regarding the printing of the Odyssey, but he hid them all during the Junta period and now cannot find them. Maybe I'll consult him regarding the method of the edition.

At 8:00 to Lola's, then to Αχειροποίητος for today's service: the 12 gospels. The church was deserted, bare, stripped. Mosaics only in the arches between the Corinthian columns. Full house: we stood for two hours. It's so amazing to see teen-age boys, for instance, regular "guys," come in, kiss the icon, light a candle, cross themselves, stand reverently. The cantors were wonderful, as they were yesterday. How they must enjoy this! (Kostas told me that in another church both cantors are communists!) What whining sadness as they recount the passion! . . . ἔθηκαν ἐπὶ τὴν κεφαλὴν μου, στέφανον ἐξ ἀκανθῶν. . . . Τοῦ νῶτόν μου ἔδωκα εἰς μαστίγωσιν, τό δε πρόσωπό μου, οὐκ ἀπεστράφη ἀπὸ ἐμπτυσμάτων . . . ὁ ἥλιος ἐσκοτίζετο, καὶ γῆς τὰ θεμέλια συνεταράτετο . . . After the 5th gospel (Matt. 27:3–32), ending καὶ ἀπήγαγον αὐτόν εἰς τὸ σταυρῶσαι, the chandeliers are turned off, the church falls into darkness except for the candles, and the priests and laity in procession carry the giant crucifix through the aisles, thrice, to the sound of funeral bells, until it is placed in a stand in the central aisle, whereupon the congregation rush to kiss Christ's feet. All the while, throughout the day and service, flowers and being collected; on the street we saw children with bouquets, all headed to church. At the end of the service the women of the church will use these flowers to deck the επιτάφιος for tomorrow.

April 17, 1987

Μεγάλη Παρασκευή

Daphne telephoned at 7:00 a.m. to announce with glee that she'd been given the job at Simon and Schuster, the first Harvard applicant to be successful in this competition. No details yet. I think it's for after graduation in 1988. If she's in NYC and Alec and Leander are both in Philadelphia that will be a new development. We begin to regret selling 20 East 74th Street.

Vasilis Soliopoulos brought a huge list of questions for the series of radio interviews he wants to do with me. We set next Tuesday as the time.

Η Βούλη visited. Δημ. Γουνελάς telephoned, confined to bed with temperature. We had a long, flowing conversation. He's becoming a welcome friend.

At 8:00, to the neighborhood church. Τα Εγκώμια sung by children's choir, very stiffly; congregation silent. Disappointing. But all three στάσεις still make one's heart flutter: a) ἡ ζωὴ ἐν τάφῳ, b) Ἄξιον ἐστί, c) Αἱ γενεαὶ νῦν πᾶσαι / ὕμνον τῆ σου / προσφέρουσι, Χριστέ μου. And I love the moment at the end, when the thrice-repeated verse Ἰερραναν τὸν τάφον αἱ μυροφόροι μύρα, λίαν πρῶτῃ ἐλθοῦσαι and the priest goes around the aisles sprinkling us all with myrrh. Then after more readings, culminating in the assurance that the Son of God πάλιν επανελθὼν, δια της Αναστάσεως, ἐδωρήσατο ἡμῖν ζωὴν τὴν αἰώνιον, ὡς μόνος ἀγαθὸς καὶ φιλόανθρωπος, the procession around the neighborhood—the cross, children with metal rods topped by circles, the priests censoring, then the Epitaphios flower-bedecked, carried by eight men, then a policeman to keep order, then us. We went everywhere in 40 Εκκλησίες, it seemed. Nice to see people on the balconies, in houses that always seemed shut up and unoccupied. Some showered us again with myrrh, most had candles. We all passed back into the church by crouching beneath the Epitaphios. The ending is particularly beautiful, beginning with the priests carrying in the embroidered representation of Christ that had lain in the Epitaphios, carrying it on their heads, circling the altar thrice with it, and concluding first with the prophecy of Ezekiel, where the Lord exhorts the people: καὶ γνώσεσθε ὅτι ἐγὼ εἰμι Κύριος, ἐν τῷ ανοιξαί με τοὺς τάφους υμῶν . . . καὶ δώσω πνεῦμά μου εἰς υμᾶς, καὶ ζήσωθε καὶ θήσομαι υμᾶς ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν υμῶν, καὶ γνώσεσθε ὅτι ἐγὼ Κύριος· ἐλάλησα καὶ ποιήσω, λέγει Κύριος Κύριος, and secondly with Matt. 27.62–66 regarding the Pharisees' fear that Jesus's followers, through some trick, will empty the tomb and thus make the people believe that Jesus truly rose from the dead.

April 18, 1987

Μέγα Σάββατον

Re-read Daniyal Mueenuddin's honors thesis on James Merrill. A mature, polished work by a truly gifted, yet very humble, student. What a contrast to Ted Eliopoulos! Wrote him a long letter. He's in Pakistan already, about to run his father's chicken farm.

Chrysanthi says that she's a little sad this Easter because she's not doing anything. In America she dyes eggs, makes τσουρέκι, anticipates visits from the children; here she has bought everything and there are no children (although we spoke to Leander today on the telephone and to Daphne the other day; can't seem to get a line through to Indonesia for Alec). We'll have μαγερίτσα tonight with George and Efthymoula, and dinner tomorrow, and another dinner with Lola and Kostas on Monday, but it isn't quite the same. And we both continue to have recurring diarrhea, which obviously cuts into one's enthusiasm.

Thought of, and wrote to, Marian Singleton today. I hope that she isn't dying of cancer, although this is the likelihood. Her case seemed nearly hopeless when I saw her in the hospital in Hanover before we left.

Chrysanthi and Lola went to Odysseas and brought him to George's, thanks to Nikos and his auto. Thus the four αδέρφια were together for a brief time. This is precisely what should happen on Πάσχα. Then Nikos picked me up, too, we passed by their house, Kostas loaded the car with μαγερίτσα and the κατσικάκι, and off they went to Αγία Τριάδα, dropping us at the Farm School for the Ανάσταση. Before the service, I saw Jeanne Demos, looking wonderful at 85. She's still on the Board of the College Year in Athens. I told her about my recent Harvard experiences; she remembered the party at the Marders' where we last met. When I marveled at her health and spirits, she said, "The secret is to keep going, keep going!" The service was disappointing, especially when Father George admonished the crowd, Δεύτε λάβετε φως—λάβετε όχι αρπάζετε! So the church was darkened and in good, proper order we all "got light." The best part was when we all went outdoors, and at 12 midnight exactly burst into Χριστός ανέστη εκ νεκρών, θανάτω θάνατον πατήσας, και τοις εν τοις μνήμασι ζών ηρισάμενος. George, Efthymoula, and Andreas had joined us. It was nice to hear George singing along with the psaltes in the early part of the service; he knows the hymns by heart. Outside, we all cracked eggs, kissed, wished each other και του χρόνου. And the mystery was accomplished. Saw Mary and Mike Keeley. Mike told me that NYU now has $15,000,000 from the Onassis Foundation for a new Greek Studies Center, six endowed professorships, etc. All this is of course Brademas's doing; he's on the board of the Onassis Foundation among other things, besides being president of NYU. He's already saying that they have the greatest Greek Studies Program in the world, whereas at the moment they have nothing. We'll see. Mike also said that Princeton's $3,000,000 has grown to $7,500,000 and they are planning new posts and courses. Also saw Bill McGrew and family; very friendly. We'll call them after we return from Athens.

To George's then for supper at 1:00 a.m.: μαγερίτσα, lamb, sweet, coffee. Will our stomachs endure? Andreas strange, but civil; not an easy conversationalist, to be sure. Of course one couldn't raise the truly important subject: that he's given up the theater (or has he?) and is sweating out the remainder of his law degree, just as papa and momma have wanted, after years of rebellion. He's a strange-looking young man with bad posture and a hard, cutting sort of face, more like Efthymoula's than George's. But we made conversation without too much difficulty, and the evening went well. To bed at 2:30 a.m.

April 19, 1987, Easter Sunday

Worked on the answers for the radio interview on Tuesday. Then to Kalamariá for Easter dinner with George, Efthymoula, Andreas. Went very well. Lots of lively conversation, including a prolonged, friendly debate on why Judas betrayed Christ (George had seen a television production of Angelos Vlachos's novel on Pilate, and also knew Kazantzakis's treatment in Ο τελευταίος πειρασμός), whether or not Pilate was guilty, how and why present-day bishops, etc. are betraying Christianity (Ο Χριστός ξανασταυρώνεται), why the Minister of Education, Ο Τρίτσης, is a hero and martyr, etc. Every time George touched the αντάρτικα, Κατοχή, etc., Efthymoula changed the subject, but we managed a lot, including his impassioned defense of EAM as a panhellenic movement that the communists, for their own selfish purposes, have tried to make seem a communist movement. He also made me realize that all the PASOK ministers are resistance fighters, people jailed and tortured by Papadopoulos, etc. How different from our own pampered culture and our politicians! Andreas was civil and interested, but excused himself after dinner to study for law exams. After more good talk over coffee, we drove to τα κάστρα, lit a candle in the chapel of Μονή Βλατάδων, walked in the upper town, which is like a village, drove to the gates of the infamous Επταπύργος prison, then down to Αγίου Δημητρίου, where the saint was imprisoned and is buried. The original church is now a wing of the new basilica. Huge; plain; service in progress. It occurred to me how utterly strange a Greek Orthodox service must seem to a Westerner the first time. (When we spoke of Judas and the thirty pieces of silver, earlier, I remembered that at the precise, holy moment last night when Father George was chanting Δεύτε λάβετε φως and the church was dark and hushed, one could hear the clinking of coins at the candle-sellers' stand: they were counting the money!) Finally, home exhausted . . . for more conversation. Thirty-minute siesta at 7:00 p.m., and Chrysanthi announced that we had to visit Odysseas and Eleni and Yiayia. They'd been alone all day and were melancholy. So, out again! But it was a joyous visit. Takis came (on command, apparently) and, like last year, stayed ten minutes. Διορίστηκε—i.e., he's got a cushy life-time job as a civil servant with the City. Draws plans, working with an architect, for all civil projects in one section of the city: kindergartens, parks, playgrounds, gymnasia, etc. Lots of plans, but few projects. They used to have 100 workmen; now they have 25. He complained about his salary. But he works on the outside, moonlighting. He does the plans, someone else signs them and takes 15%. At the city office he works from 7:00 until 3:00 with a half-hour break. 60000 per month plus a 120000 yearly bonus. Not much. . . . Yiayia described Pappou's death: sweet, calm, peaceful. Such a fortunate man, she kept repeating. At the end he thought Odysseas was still in Russia. All through the last years he kept enthusing about me: Έχω ένα γαμπρό υπέροχο. Κάθε φορά πούχουμε πρόβλημα, λέει «Δεν πειράζει»!

Monday, April 20, 1987

It's still a holiday. Streets deserted. We took the bus to Αγία Τριάδα and dined with Kostas and Lola. Goat this time. I nibbled, hoping to survive. Αγία Τριάδα still the same, almost, or actually improved despite obvious signs of tourism. "Our" street unchanged. We found Αλέκος ο ράφτης bent over a hoe, weeding in front of his house. He tried hard to remember us but didn't succeed, I think. Κα Μαριάνθη died years ago. Τι να κάνω, μας είπε· περνάει η ώρα. Συγγυρίζω. Ο Μίτσος still lives in the house next door, he told us. But the old café is gone, replaced by a huge building with rooms for rent upstairs. In the summer it's apparently bedlam—mostly Germans. Closing up, Kostas left the inside key in the lock and in effect locked himself out. So we were all a bit subdued on the bus trip home.

To Zisis and Ritsa at 8:00. Good talk. He's consumed, nicely, by Masonism. Talked about Hermes Trismegistus's Emerald Tablet. Imagine! He read me the credo where "As above so below" appears. I also discovered that his Στοά is named in honor of Gemistos Plethon, one of my heroes. Talked about Bessarion, Ficino, Plethon's school at Mistras, the Greeks' failure to have a renaissance. Then a nice "tea," English style.

Tuesday, April 21, 1987

Wrote out a clean copy of my review of Virginia Woolf's Collected Essays, volume 1. Started reading Bernard Dick's book on William Golding, also for review. In the evening, Vasilis Soliopoulos came for the radio interviews, one on my work on Kazantzakis, the other on my impressions of Greeks in America. I'd prepared my answers and more or less read them, but very haltingly, alas. My Greek seems to get worse the more I learn.

Saw a television program commemorating the twentieth anniversary of 21 April 1967: the Junta's coup d'état. Interviews with Salonika residents who were affected. Among them were Θρασύβουλος Μάνασης, who used to live above the Yiannakoses in Σαρανταπόρου 11, a professor of law who recalled the pressures put on university people and finally his dismissal and exile. He recalled his last class: 800 students. He spoke about constitutional liberties, citing Pericles' Funeral Oration. He praised his colleague Maronitis, who then also appeared on the screen. He was sent to prison. He's a communist today still. Maronitis spoke about how difficult it was to rally all the faculty to partake in the resistance. Most wanted to protect themselves or their families.

Surprisingly, Jules Dassin answered my letter of inquiry, via his secretary, saying that he had no correspondence from Kazantzakis since all their correspondence was oral.

Wednesday, April 22, 1987

Wrote a review of Bernard Dick's book on William Golding, which has a fine explication of Darkness Visible but otherwise is mediocre. Finished the "chart"—i.e., plan—of the next big stage of my Odyssey essay, the middle stage and largest, in which I'll treat the text itself. The last part will be critical judgment. Η Βούλη discovered in To Βήμα της Κυριακής a whole page devoted to Kazantzakis's letters to Αγνή Ρουσοπούλου, με παρουσίαση Ανδρέα Παναγόπουλου, the professor who spoke against my version of the klephts when I delivered the speech at Rutgers! He has 72 letters. I immediately wrote him. Vouli also gave us the text of Stylianos's article against government action, surprisingly very poor. Rhetoric; not much thought.

This is the first day since our arrival that I felt sick. Headache, fatigue, listlessness. Some ιός! But I also have something new: a peculiar tingling in the right leg. Previously it's been localized at the hip joint. This morning the entire leg went numb for a while, like falling asleep. Something wrong with the circulation? Όπως είπα στη συνέντευση σχετικά με τον «Καζαντζάκη και τα πολιτικά», ελπίζω να αντέξω!

Todd Rheingold wrote that he's been accepted provisionally as a transfer student and would I send a testimonial to Al Quirk, which I did, of course, with enthusiasm. Just the kind of student we need, I said—i.e., an intellectual, sufficiently so that he doesn't get good grades! The others are all little machines doing everything right, and will never open a book after they graduate. Todd wrote that he, Peter Converse, and Julie Davis continue to enthuse over my Comparative Literature course last fall. How nice!

In the evening to Themis and Miranda Altas. Mariana was there with her fiancé, Dimitris. Lovely, slight, polite young man. Family is disappointed that he isn't μορφωμένος—i.e., isn't practicing a profession. Mariana is doing OK as a lawyer. She said the divorce rate in Greece is 40% or higher. Narcotics are everywhere in the secondary schools and above, with heroin addicts abounding. Also burglary is common in apartments in Salonika, muggings in elevators, etc. Welcome to Western civilization! We went out into a huge traffic jam, just to prove it. Then to their latest discovery, the ψησταριά «Κοντέσσα» for γύρος and κοκορέτσι. Θεός φυλάξει! Conversation sporadic but occasionally interesting. Themis described his medical training in 1942ff. επί Κατοσχής. The Germans occupied half of the offices and lecture halls in the Φιλοσοφική Σχολή (the only building in the university at that time). Themis's class was the first in the newly founded Medical School. They had lectures in Αγίας Σοφίας, Αχειροποίητος, cinemas, etc. No books. Everything had to come from lecture notes.

Thursday, April 23, 1987

Του Αγίου Γεωργίου. Chrysanthi baked an apple pie, bought a potted plant, and off we went in the pouring rain in a taxi. George was μέσα στη χαρά του. Lots of people coming and going: Efthymoula's relatives, ο Μάριος Καρασάβας and wife, several γεωπόνοι, συνάδελφοι, a high school teacher (loudmouth) just back from εκδρομή στην Αμερική, Οδυσσεάς, Ελένη, Ανδρέας, Δημήτρης, Τίλδα και η μάνα της. Chocolates, liqueurs, pittas, pasta, lemonade. Talk talk talk. Marios as bitter as always: no work, οι πελάτες δεν μας σέβονται, wants pension next year at age 58; he'll have 45000 and his wife's 30000. Tilda scathing at lack of opportunity for doctors. She waited a year and a half before being taken to do a residency in ophthalmology. Thousands of doctors in Salonika (and lawyers and engineers) with nothing to do. Thought of going to a small city repugnant: no hospitals. “The most I’d do would be cataracts!” They’d just returned from Budapest: gorgeous, wonderful, gallery with El Grecos, etc. George’s colleague has his daughter in high school in America and wants her to stay there and have opportunity. “Here, the parents have to support children until they’re 45!” Talked about acid rain, nuclear energy (Tilda is “for,” uncompromisingly; she doesn’t listen very easily to argumentation). Odysseas, who really belongs now to the working class, was very ill at ease in this company. Went into the other room and turned on the television. At 11:00 p.m. we left, after one more wish Χρόνια πολλά! Όχι μόνο πολλά, καλά! added Efthymoula, wisely. The συνάδερφος gave George a huge kiss on the cheek. How nice! Obviously, George is a συμπαθέστατος άνθρωπος, όπως είπε ο συνάδερφος.

Friday, April 24, 1987

Η Άννα Σικελιανού telephoned and spoke a long time about how Angelos and Kazantzakis were estranged for so long, how she went with him to stay with Kazantzakis on Aegina in 1942, then they were together in Athens—no reason for letters. The only letter she remembers was when Kazantzakis wrote from Antibes proposing they share the candidacy for the Nobel Prize. Και είχε πικραθεί πολύ ο Άγγελος. She doesn’t have that letter; perhaps it’s in the Sikelianos Archive at the Benaki Museum.

In the evening, Λένα Δασκαλοπούλου picked us up and drove us to their swank villa in Panorama. She’s the mother of Dimitris, our Dartmouth student. Ήθελε να μας περιποιηθεί! Sweet lady; huge supper, etc. Her sister and brother-in-law live upstairs; they joined us. She teaches English in a gymnasium in Pella; he teaches in the Hotel School. In all three years of English instruction they don’t use any literary texts. Only φτιαγμένα κείμενα για τουρισμό, σύγχρονη ζωή, και παρόμοια. They were all interested, I think genuinely, in my involvement with Greek letters.

Ξενοδοχεία Αχιλλέας,

Saturday, April 25

Οδός Λέκκα 21 (01 32 33 197), Αθήνα

Αγουροξυπνημένοι. Η Βούλη μας πήρε στο αεροδρόμιο. The hotel is perfect: lovely room with balcony and private bath on a narrow, quiet street, and only δρ 430 a day. At 5:00 p.m. we were in Lefteris Prevelakis’s apartment in Μουρούσι, going there by the Piraeus-Kifissia subway. Athens is very attractive despite what people say, but probably because it is Saturday and there's very little traffic. Went first to the Εθνική Βιβλιοθήκη and found all my needs in the card catalogue. Hope to find time to read the Ιστορία μιας προσπάθειας by Σβώλος. Prevelakis and his wife extremely affable. First coffee and apple tart. Chrysanthi spilled the coffee on their carpet but no matter—no stains left after much scrubbing. She and Madame then went off together; Madame definitely δεν κάνει κουμάντο. Lefteris ordered her around, left and right, but very softly. He has heart trouble, a by-pass; they moved here for quiet and clean air. Desk in living room. Private library, of course. He's going to give all of Pandelis's books to the Φιλοσοφική Σχολή, Παν/μιο Κρήτης, Ρέθυμνο, and they'll be housed in a special Prevelakis Research Institute. Ditto for the Kazantzakis letters, etc. We then set to work, going through the fifty-odd letters with omissions, to see what Kazantzakis actually said—i.e., whom he cursed. In almost all cases, the ἐν λόγω άνθρωπος είχε πεθάνει, and Lefteris had no objections. But the ones pertaining to Πέτρος Χάρης he retained, and also two pertaining to Γεώργιος Παπανδρέου. We agreed that in a few years, when I actually decide which letters to include, perhaps things will have changed. He gave me some of his books, one with a lovely old map of Crete, which might be good for endpapers for the edition. I promised to send my article on Ο Καπετάν Μιχάλης in return. Affable conversation until we finished, about 9:30. They drove us to the station. We'll do the photocopying on Monday. He is a careful, well-trained scholar, with an Oxford degree. He taught for a time at Athens College and knows Στέλιος Ορφανουδάκης.

Returned to Ομόνοια. Λουκουμάδες in our old haunt on Πανεπιστημίου.

Sunday, April 26, 1987

Athens

Lots of telephone calls in the morning without much success. Finally reached Στάμος Διαμαντάρας, who said Έλα! Taxi to Νέα Σμύρνη. The "old warrior" (communist αντάρτης) welcomed us with hugs and kisses literally. Γλυκαίνετε τη μοναξιά μου, είπε. He was full of stories about his days at the Πυρσός publishing house, where, among other things, he supervised the production of the 1938 edition of the Οδύσεια, of which he proudly showed us his inscribed copy. He also insisted that we take a huge photograph of Kazantzakis in his possession. Talked about the sarcasm of intellectuals when the Odyssey appeared. People used to go to the shop and order  $\frac{1}{2}$  οκά Οδύσεια. In the Κατοχή, Kazantzakis decided he'd fight with the pen and not with the αντάρτες, who in any case feared he was a spy, etc. Diamantaras kept insisting that Greece is still not free, at least not for leftists. He related huge, enthusiastic anecdotes about η γενιά του 30, all of whom πέρασαν από το κατάστημά μας. Also related his first meeting with Kazantzakis. He was 22, Kazantzakis 52. He went to Aegina and they spent the whole day in deep, wonderful discussion, after first taking a nude swim. (Mrs. Kazantzakis told us in Geneva that Kazantzakis always went swimming without her; liked to be by himself in the water, and always nude.) Diamantaras has two sets of letters, one to himself and one to Καπετάν Μιχάλης. Tomorrow we'll xerox them.

Lunch at Συντριβάνι. We then went to the Acropolis and the Acropolis Museum. How marvelous each and every time! The scaffolding is off the west end now, which has been cleaned. Cranes are inside; pillar drums are being reassembled, etc., all funded by the European Community and the Ministry of Culture. Four maidens of the Erechtheion are safely in the museum.

Evening: a delightful κωμωδία με Γιώργο Παντζά. Σαχλαμάρες βέβαια αλλά παίζουν με πολύ κέφι και η γλώσσα—για μένα τουλάχιστο—ήταν πολύ ωραία. Γέλασα με την καρδιά μου.

Monday, April 27, 1987

Athens

I met Mrs. Prevelakis while Chrysanthi went back to Diamantaras to do the xeroxing. Mrs. Prevelakis and I carefully did the fifty-odd letters from the 400. Then I went to the Benaki Museum and discovered to my surprise and gratification a whole collection of letters to Sikeliannos not only there but impeccably catalogued and filed. These I looked over quickly, and ordered to be photocopied. Total cooperation. Went through the museum as an extra bonus. There's a painting ca. 1800 of the Caryatids by a British traveler, showing their gowns colored, their facial features still sharp.

Goudelis on telephone: call back tomorrow. Πηγαίνω στο δικαστήριο . . . κ.τ.λ.

2:00 p.m. to Άλκη Σουλουγιάννη in the Ministry of Culture. Ενθουσιώδης τύπος. She had ready photocopies of letters to Καστανάκης that she'd published, some of which I have, others not. Hopes to publish others. She had a good report of us from her former boss Γιώργος Μαραγκίτης, who visited us in Hanover and who arranged the Lebanon College tour.

5:00 p.m. to Γιώργος Ανεμογιάννης in a messy office on Σταδίου. Less cooperative. "I have so much, it's impossible to do anything. If you have a specific need, let me know," etc. Finally, after much jockeying, I discovered that he has unpublished letters to Γιάννης Σταυριδάκης. He said that he'd xerox these for us.

7:30 to the lovely Πλατεία Βικτορίας to see Απόστολος Σαχίνης and his wife, both of whom had been at the MGSA Symposium in Washington. Very good discussion for several hours re: method of the edition, his impressions of Kazantzakis, etc. He remembers Kazantzakis as enthralled by ideas: ένας στοχαστής! Loved intellectual discussion. Showed me letters to Παλαμάς just published. We'll pick up a copy at Ίδρυμα Παλαμά tomorrow. Also said he'd speak to Δεσποτόπουλος at the Academy regarding the Έλλη Λαμπρίδη archive. He returned to Athens when he retired because, in a sense, he had never left. He'd grown up on this same corner and had played in the square. The whole time in Thessaloniki he lived in one room and considered Athens his home. Now he seems to have a full life with Academy affairs, etc. Of course he decried the current department at Salonika: all the young ones are worthless, there because of their politics, etc. A fruitful, civilized, enjoyable visit.

Tuesday, April 28, 1987

Called Goudelis again. Again: call tomorrow. To Kolonaki in the morning. Walked past the American and British schools on Σουηδίας, then to the Γεννάδειος Βιβλιοθήκη, where I haven't been since we visited Evro and Billy-Jim Layton there years ago. The mysterious blond girl I first saw in the professors' αναγνωστήριο in Thessaloniki was reading there. No Kazantzakis letters, or so they told me. A relief! I'm now dismayed when more come to light.

First appointment with George Stefanakis just off Kolonaki Square. Young lawyer, aged 42. Pleasant, cultured, energetic. Eight months practicing law to make a living; then four months on Spetses: literature, reading, etc. Also has a weekly column in a newspaper. Stood for parliament. Was fascinated by my work. One of the few people we met who didn't talk exclusively about himself. Wants my writings. Forgot to xerox the letters he has (Kazantzakis to his sister, etc.); too busy in court. Come again on Thursday.

Then rushed to Θουκυδίδου in Plaka to see Emmanuel Kasdaglis in the beautiful office of the Cultural Division of the Bank of Greece. His daughter Aglaïa played Maria in our videotape. His letters are “somewhere.” Says they’re unimportant, but as we talked they seemed interesting—e.g., when Kasdaglis discovered that the Odyssey lacked four or five verses from the magical 33,333, and Kazantzakis wrote him to compose them himself. Ditto when he found verses that had 15 instead of 17 syllables, or sometimes more than 17. Kasdaglis hid these and other letters during the Junta years. I’ll keep trying, he said. But we had a very good discussion of the philological method of the edition: questions of footnoting, punctuation, dating, capitalization, division into sections, etc. I was mad at Savidis for refusing to see me; I wanted to consult him on all this. But I actually did much better, I’m sure, with Kasdaglis, and also yesterday with Sachinis.

Next to Melissaris, off Λεωφόρος Αλεξάνδρας. He started with a nice smile, saying “Tell me about yourself” and then I’ll tell you about myself.” I did. His turn: He is a disciple of Nikos Pouliopoulos insofar as law is concerned. But there are no letters—all lost or hidden irretrievably in 1967 owing to Pouliopoulos’s leftist orientation. But he had ready for me three issues of Ελληνική Ανεξαρτησία, a periodical published by Pouliopoulos during the Cyprus crisis, all with good materials on Kazantzakis. These we’ll xerox and return tomorrow. Best of all, he telephoned a friend who’s a judge who had written a book on Kazantzakis and, he said, included letters. The judge, very busy apparently, said we should come over immediately.

So, without any lunch, 2:30 in the afternoon, we went to Judge Παπαθανασόπουλος. He was in pajamas. Welcomed us effusively. Turned out to be another “secret” litterateur, author of many volumes of poems, criticism, etc. He had my book on Kazantzakis and everyone else’s. We went through his library carefully, so I could note everything new to me. He of course gave me his own book. Then came the usual gossip. Γουδέλης: κακό στοιχείο (which is true). Ελένη: Διαστρεβλώνει την αλήθεια, όπως και η Άννα Σικελιανού. Σεφέρης: φασίστης! (I should tell Vassilis Lambropoulos!) On his desk he had dossiers for about thirty divorce cases that had to be judged. Ασ’ τα! Μ’ ενδιαφέρει η λογοτεχνία! With difficulty we broke away at 4:00, and rushed to Καλλιθέα for the next appointment.

Luckily, 15 minutes for a τσστ και καφέ. Then to the home of Γιάννης Χατζίνης. Upstairs to Φρόσω, his daughter. Very strange, with a whining voice and (Chrysanthi thinks) sightless eyes, and her husband Γιάννης Πετριτάκης, the craziest of all the enthusiasts we saw today. Another two hours of monologue at 160 decibels. Γ. Π. In a blue serge double-breasted suit with the inside button secured and the outside not. Oily, effeminate, strange. A lawyer specializing in canon law; gave me his many monographs on church affairs, plus his poems, plus poems by Froso. He declaimed many of his own, fewer of hers. Then he made her sit down and play the piano. Tchaikovsky, miserably. Next, he took us round and explained the origin and meaning of each of his paintings. Then downstairs: where Χατζίνης used to live and that will become the Hatzinis Museum. Desk, eyeglasses, library, bust, armchair, etc. Miraculously, he also had some letters ready for me.

We returned to Οδός Λέκκα exhausted after five visits with four maniacs (more or less) and one sober customer (Kasdaglis). Went to a Chinese restaurant across from the hotel. Not bad; not good either. Small portions, very expensive. The Chinese waiter spoke English to communicate with the Greek waiter.

Wednesday, April 29, 1987

Called Goudelis. Have to go to my shop. Employee sick. Come at 9:30 and θα φιξάρωμε κάτι. I sent Chrysanthi off to get my royalties at Efsthadiadis, see about Who's Who, and return Melissaris's periodicals. Goudelis is a grotesque, fat, drawn caricature of the handsome youth of the 1950s photos. Big growth on his left eyelid. Kept saying Δεν είμαι έμπορος, δεν ξέρω τίποτε για το κατάστημα τούτο, and when customers came in, indeed he didn't know where anything was. In between customers he delivered yet another monologue about the book he's writing on Kazantzakis's personal relations with Zorba, with Sikelianos, and especially with women. Says that Kazantzakis's father kicked the boy in the genitals and rendered him impotent. Never copulated with either Galatea or Eleni. Etc., etc. Πάλι, κατηγορίες για την Ελένη, τον Πρεβελάκη, κ.τ.λ. How much Kazantzakis liked Goudelis. When he first saw him he put his finger on his head and made him turn around (like a top, slowly). Κούκλα! Έχω κούκλα εκδότη! I kept referring to the letters and he kept changing the subject. Finally he let it be known that he “owned” the letters to Galatea and Rousopoulou, and of course if I wanted them I’d have to pay. Δεν είμαι έμπορος! He snatched up my gaff when I mentioned that Katerina Anghelaki had published excerpts. He’s ready to sue, I’m sure. Also xeroxed my copy of the Βήμα article on Rousopoulou’s letters. Gave me one letter! Saying how wonderful Goudelis is! I kept trying to leave. “But you’ll have to come to the house, to see the collections.” Εντάξει. Θα τηλεφωνηθούμε. Έχω άλλο ραντεβού. Finally escaped. And right outside bumped into Chrysanthi. Μεγάλη σύμπτωση.

Together with Νινέττα Μακρυνικόλα at Kedros. They wouldn’t be interested in my “Kazantzakis and Politics.” Can’t do “fat books”; they don’t sell. Greece doesn’t have 1000 libraries to guarantee that a publisher covers his expenses. Collected δρ 12000 in royalties. Bought 20 copies of my own books. Met the new owner. They have a lovely shop, arranged like a supermarket, with wagons.

1:00 p.m. to Πέτρος Χάρης. He complimented me on my Greek: Όση ώρα μιλούσατε δεν κάνατε ούτε ένα λάθος! I said: Περιμένετε. Of course he said that he has no letters, gave them all away, etc. The liar! But everyone knows him. He lamented the presence of the PASOK government. A doddering gentleman who won’t let go of Νέα Εστία.

Chrysanthi meanwhile went back to George Anemoyannis, who gave her a good collection of letters to Γιάννης Σταυριδάκης.

I rushed to the Εθνική Βιβλιοθήκη after lunch to try to read the Ιστορία μιας προσπάθειας by Αλέξανδρος Σβώλος. Luckily, this turned out to be a 45-page pamphlet, not a book. First edition of Τι είδα στη Ρουσία couldn’t be found. They had Ο Κύκλος with an early version of Οδύσεια, but not Ναξιακή Πρόοδος, so my task was simplified.

Then at 7:00 to the Hotel Intercontinental to celebrate the 40th anniversary of the Fulbright Program. Saw Δημήτρης Ντούτης at the entrance, and the black cultural attaché. Then was surprised to see Speros Vryonis inside. His conference was fine; he’s planning another next year at NYU. Maskaleris couldn’t get off Crete because of the wind. Ditto for Katerina Anghelaki—stuck on Aegina, no boats. Sat next to Harry Psomiadis, who’s been working on the Pontic independence movement. Two speeches. Πρίτζης, the Minister of Education, who remembered his Fulbright grant that brought him to Washington, and Brademas, who spoke very well (how bad he was at MGSA in NYC, how unprepared) on Fulbright's vision, the general need for broad educational vision, language learning, etc. (he cited the Perkins' commission report), ending with his plans for a Greek Cultural Center at NYU.

At the reception afterwards I had a nice, long talk with Bob Keeley, the ambassador (Mike's brother), mostly about copyright re: letters. He was interested in the recent verdict in favor of Salinger. Even longer talk with his wife Louise, who ended up ordering tapes for Demotic Greek 1 (she's been using the book). Keeley of course speaks Greek well. Louise says all the other ambassadors come to him for inside info. The Italian ambassador has had eight years in Greece and doesn't speak a word. McClosky hated Greece and never learned, but Stearns did learn. I also met Gene Rossides, young and pleasant; thinks Dukakis does have a chance . . . maybe. Thinks U.S. government is crazy to think that Turkey is strategically advantageous to us, let alone everything else. Also met MacCann, the new president of Athens College, and his wife; they invited us to use their guesthouse any time. Mike Keeley explained his new book: on the presumed assassination of Polk, an American newspaperman in Greece who "knew too much." Non-fiction. When I asked him what Maskaleris is doing on Kazantzakis, he replied with his nice humor: "I'm afraid it's a critical book." Mike and Mary drove us home. He's removed the American plates from his car and has replaced them with fake Greek plates. An American car in Kolonaki is sure to get a bomb under it, apparently. (Yesterday, a whole busload of American soldiers was blown up.)

Thursday, April 30, 1987

Athens

To the Εθνική Βιβλιοθήκη to finish Svolos. Then to the Βιβλιοπωλείο της Εστίας to buy books. Χάος! How do they ever do business? But they're well stocked. Then to Κατερίνα Αγγελάκη-Rooke. She caught the 8:00 a.m. boat. Ουζάκι, κουβέντα. Then the file of Kazantzakis letters, unorganized. She trusted me with it, and I went around the corner to have everything xeroxed: a treasure—letters from 1917–1918, 1922, the 1930s, 1940s, 1950s, 185 xeroxed sheets in all. She's having to do translations to make ends meet. But Rodney recovered from his stroke. He works part time in the Δοξιάδης library at a very small salary. How do they manage? How blessed I've been never to have worried about money!

Stopped at Air Universal to see George Marangidis, who'd telephoned to say hello. But he'd left for the day. I wrote a warm note. Έρη Σταυροπούλου, Christos Alexiou's new girlfriend, left the bibliography of translations that she'd finished. Good job. I'll see that it's noticed in the MGSA Bulletin and journal, etc. Zenelis should review it.

Next: train to Kifissia to see Γιάννης Κακριδής, now aged 86 and suffering from deafness and bad sight. But still alert. He enjoys the solicitude of thousands of former students. When he went to Australia a woman embraced him and afterwards reminded him that he'd failed her eight times and finally sent her down without a degree, but she respected his standards. Είμουν πολύ αυστηρός, είπε. His letters on Iliad/Odyssey have gone to Anemoyannis, but he had a few extras for me, and some clippings on the reception of the Iliad translation. (His Iliad is now officially in the school curriculum.) He trusted me with the originals. We'll xerox them in Salonika on Monday. He had my Linguistic Revolution on the shelf. Nice!

By bus back to Omonoia. Λουκουμάδες. Then got the last two tickets to Koun's Θεάτρο Τέχνης production of Η ήχος του όπλου by Λούλα Αναγωνστάκη, about an eighteen-year-old boy who comes to Athens from the provinces, gets involved with a girl, gets her pregnant, but desperately wants his independence, and resolves to go to New York, deserting her. She too wants "freedom"—i.e., not marriage, but now is desperately afraid, wants to keep the child and to get married. His mother comes and makes things worse. Finally after a furious argument with him she has a heart attack and dies in front of him, making him realize for the first time that people cannot exist on their own terms, "free," something that the girlfriend had already realized. All this against a background of mania for rock and Beatles, a bit of alcoholism, the έξαρση of Greek politics. Superbly directed and acted. A bit too relentless: everyone continually έξαλλοι. (But Greeks can be like that in reality.) I thought of the huge contrast with Scandinavian and Russian plays of domestic conflict, where everything is externalized. In this play, as so often in Greek life, people speak instead of thinking.

Friday, May 1, 1987

Athens

Πρωτομαγιά At breakfast met a Dartmouth student. The group had come in last night and was off to Eleusis today. Missed Jerry Rutter. At last, no appointments. Spent all morning in the hotel putting my "plunder" in order and marking each page, as a precaution should they get out of order. The Anghelaki-Rooke horde is the most impressive of the lot, probably, in bulk and range. But what a nice surprise to get Sikelianos and Stavridakis letters unexpectedly!

Chrysanthi went out to Syntagma. The whole square is red, she told me. KKE everywhere. Thousands of workers protesting price increases, conditions of work, etc. Work to rule, and/or short strikes in all sectors. We finally left at 2:30 and had a huge, leisurely meal at the Delfi. It's nice to be optimistic about stomachs at long last. Bus to Ellinikon. The city is deserted. The airport is deserted. Most flights cancelled because of the strikes. But ours, at 11:00 p.m., is supposed to go. Waited comfortably in the deserted airport for seven hours, writing and reading. It's as good as spending the day at the beach.

Chrysanthi very upset when we returned home and found no mail from Alec; we haven't received any letters since we left America, just one postcard from Thailand. Tried to telephone. Impossible. Called Leander to call Alec. But Daphne's letter brought good news that she's been given a one-year internship at Simon and Schuster for 1988–89 plus a $6000 scholarship for 1987–88 at Harvard. The first Harvard student to be so honored. Richard Marius was on the screening committee and made sure that she be shortlisted at least, so she says.

Saturday, May 2, 1987

Alec telephoned in the morning. He's fine. Says that he wrote lots of letters, none of which have reached us, apparently. He's coming to Greece on June 23.

Spent the day recouping from Athens, organizing my "loot," writing letters, cataloging the Kazantzakis letters I've accumulated, and finishing Varnalis's Η αληθινή απολογία του Σωκράτη, which I don't find so very extraordinary, although it has some strong sections, especially in the beginning (prologue), middle, and then at the end, when Socrates satirizes the Periclean democracy, insisting that all its freedoms and glory are «τὸ τοῦ κρείττονος συμφέρον» (in the interests of the strong—i.e., of the ruling class). Their rhetoric is designed to make the weak think that what benefits the strong benefits the weak as well—i.e., patriotism. Θεός, Αγαθό, Δικαιοσύνη, Πατρίδα κι Ομορφιά . . . δεν είναι μήτε πρώτες αρχές μήτε κ' ἔσχατοι σκοποί . . . μα πλάσματα καιρικά, με νόημα τρεχούμενο κι άπιαστο, μέσα ταπεινά, που με δάφτα κάθε κυρίαρχη φάρα στραβώνει τους υποταχτικούς της και πνίγει την ψυχή τους. Οι άνθρωποι χωριζόμαστε σε κείνους που διατάζουνε, και σε κείνους που κάνουνε θελήματα . . . : σε χορτάτους και σε κορόιδα (σελ. 84, 4<sup>ο</sup> μέρος, §7). After the klepsydra runs out, all the judges rush away to collect their fees; during the apology they've been napping and yawning. Only Plato remains to lead Socrates off to prison.

Would it be worth translating this? A glance at the new Βιβλιογραφία μεταφράσεων νεοελληνικής λογοτεχνίας του Έρη Σταυροπούλου tells me that it's already been translated. In any case, this was appropriate reading for Πρωτομαγιά, with the Greek middle class χορτάτοι—cars, summer homes, etc.—and the workers painting Syntagma red and shouting for a fair wage.

At 9:00 p.m. to the Κρατικό Θέατρο Βορείου Ελλάδος for Pirandello's "Six Characters in Search of an Author." Marvelously directed by Δημ. Μαυρίκιος, with Δημ. Καρέλης as the father, Λίνα Λαμπράκη as the mother, and Κώστας Σάντας as the director. Greek actors are so well trained! Perfect! The play is a delight, especially after seeing "Tonight We Improvise" and Έτσι είναι αν έτσι νομίζετε. The themes of course are familiar: Τι είναι; Ψευδαισθηση ή αλήθεια; Παράσταση ή ζωή; Και τι είμαστε εμείς; Πρόσωπα ή άνθρωποι; Ποιος είσαι εσύ; the father asks the director. Are you one person? Aren't you many? And of course all the six actors wear masks that go off and on. The only chance missed was at the end, when the "dead" boy stood up and took a curtain call instead of remaining "dead" on the boards, as in Cambridge (where an ambulance stood waiting outside the theater also, in most performances). Pirandello himself apparently viewed the work as a kind of ancient tragedy, with the actors being the chorus and the six characters the personae. The chorus members (i.e., the actors trying to continue their rehearsal) are human and thus ephemeral. But the six characters are artistic creations and therefore eternal, though they take different outward forms under different circumstances. They are Platonic ideas (cf. Varnalis, where Socrates defends his search for eternal ideas) whereas the contemporary actors are the true ψευδαισθήσεις. Each has a central characteristic: Father—remorse; mother—sorrow; daughter—revenge; son—scorn. Pirandello once told Κώστας Ουράνης that he was of Greek descent, his real name being Πυράγγελος, which became distorted to Pirandello in Sicily.

Then to taverna for γύρος, ρετσίνα, βιφτέκια. Η Βούλη related how, when Κακριδής came to Salonika for his 80th birthday, all his students fêted him, but the παν/μιο απουσίασε. Apparently he is a persona non grata there. As usual!

Monday, May 4

Θεσσαλονίκη

Catalogued the results of the Athens trip. I counted 221 holograph MSS of unpublished letters and 140 of published letters, plus 74 printed items new to me: 435 letters in all. . . . Started entering the αποσιωπήσεις in the 400 letters. Kazantzakis was a fluent curser, but a polite one: nothing worse than «Το ζώο!»

George and Efthymoula came. George is in the blues again, now because Andreas is virtually locked in his room, studying presumably for the law exams he has to take in June, but refusing to talk, go out, associate with anyone, barely eating. In sum: depressed. They fear suicide. Asked our advice. What to say? The root may be girlfriend trouble. He lived with someone for several years, and now they've separated, it seems. He left the theater of his own will, not under pressure from parents, so they say. When they departed, we realized how blessed we are in our own children. Went out for a pizza to celebrate!

Thursday, May 7, 1987

Working on the Greek version of my lecture on Ritsos's "painterly technique," originally conceived in Melbourne (in Greek), revised in England (in English), and now revised yet again (in Greek). Slow work.

Anthony and Lena Daskopoulos, parents of Dartmouth student Dimitris, took us to a fancy piano bar for supper—the best food I've ever had in Greece, probably frightfully expensive. Fortunately, we arrived early (i.e., around 10:00 p.m.!) before the band started full blast + singer and we couldn't hear ourselves think. Despite that, we stayed until 2:30 a.m. He is an industrialist, manager of Salco, industrial and commercial foods. Fascinating conversation on the Greek economy, which according to him is very weak in productivity, although for fifteen years the growth was phenomenal. The problem is that all the prosperity we see around us is based on huge amounts borrowed from abroad. The economy rests on debt (like ours). He's extremely anti-PASOK or ψευτοσοσιαλισμός. The policy of equal wages eliminates incentives; people have no desire to work hard or well. The percentage of government employees has increased dramatically; the economy is shifting from industry and agriculture to service as its leading component. What impressed both Chrysanthi and me was how very nice these people are, and what a nice son they've produced. In this case, wealth doesn't seem to have corrupted its holders.

Saturday, May 9, 1987

7:00 p.m. Finished the revision of Η ζωγραφική τεχνική του Ρίτσου—57 pages in Greek. Three days' work.

Stavros and Toula came for “tea” and theater: Theotokas's To παιχνίδι της τρέλλας και της φρονιμάδας at the Κ.Θ.Β.Ε. Again, magnificently produced, with sets and costumes and lighting that were magical, actors worthy of the Royal Shakespeare Company, yet the play itself is so mediocre. It's a Shakespearian imitation in large part but in prose and with none of the magic of the Shakespearian comedies. Indeed its problem is that it mixes the Shakespearian elements—history, comedy, and even a few tragic touches—in a hodgepodge that adds up to aesthetic confusion. Key elements fail (perhaps in the production, but I think in the text, too). The comic waiters at the banquet aren't comically rustic enough; the village girl placed in the king's bed isn't sufficiently stupid, etc. No one character “lives” in his or her own right, not even Andronikos the Don Juan of Byzantium or Αρετή the clever virgin. And the bird of the folksong is overdone: once is enough. Then at the end the release of Andronikos from τα σίδερα is too easy. None of this stuff works if an overall fairytale atmosphere fails to be established and maintained, as in this case. So much theatrical talent wasted on a mediocre text!

Bifteki, etc. afterward in Πλατεία Ναβαρίνο. Stavros and Toula talked freely about Russia. The Greek community in Tashkent was a ghetto. The Russians gave land and the Greeks built a self-enclosed quarter: shops, schools, etc. Odysseas zealously kept Toula from any contact with Russian girls and especially boys, fearing that if she married “out,” he wouldn't be able to bring her back to Greece, which was his dream from the start. So: no parties, no excursions. Σπίτι! The Russians in their turn were kindness itself, extending various privileges such as entrance to university without examination, vacations on the Black Sea, etc. Stavros, earlier, played a cassette of a Russian children's choir, ages five to ten. Magic! Such clarity of tone, timing, precision, harmony.

Monday, May 11, 1987

Lunch in Όλυμπος Νάουσα with Zisis and Ritsa. It still functions, somehow. Apparently the State keeps the building from being demolished, and even subsidizes the restaurant. But it's closed at night, and the food wasn't anything special. Too bad: another tradition fallen.

Dartmouth students arrived; most had been in Chrysanthi's Greek 11–12 class. We went for supper with them in the Elvetia restaurant, Αγίας Σοφίας και Εγνατίας. Nice group, but Jerry Rutter says that they show no excitement about what they are doing. (Yesterday we took the students for supper in Πλατεία Ναβαρίνο.)

Tuesday, May 12, 1987

Still struggling with this awful lecture, which is consuming a week of my life. It's still too long.

A letter finally from Alec. It took a month to arrive from Jakarta. He's well, but increasingly concerned about his baldness. He fitted some wigs in Singapore. They feel hot to him (in that climate) and uncomfortable. He's trying to be philosophical—saw a woman in the bus with a severely deformed face and realized that other people get through life with worse burdens, accepting them. He's at this point happy to be leaving Indonesia. One of the best Indonesian "friends" of one of his American friends stole $1000 from the latter. Alec now realizes why the average foreigner is so wry of the natives, whose smiles and solicitude are untrustworthy, apparently. Yet he doesn't feel drawn toward the expatriate group either. So, he's ready to come home. Meanwhile he had another good tour of Thailand (with a girl, of course), and a fine excursion to another city in Java with three couples.

Daphne's letter on the other hand shows her and her circle to be (so far) "golden lads and lasses" in their enchantment. She writes so well, with humor and style. As I said to Chrysanthi, "She's had a good education."

Met Jerry Rutter again. He's so happy to have someone to talk to. He's increasingly bored and frustrated with his students, who are like zombies during the archeological tours. As Alec said in his letter, in this world there are the haves and the have-nots. Alec, even with alopecia, is a have. So are our Dartmouth students, but they're blasé. No excitement. Jerry is considering another job, in Cincinnati. "How can I face another twenty years of this?!" he asks. We walked to see Σαρανταπόρου 11, then had supper, then went to the Amalia Theater to see the Θέατρο Τέχνης in Marivaux's «Η φιλονικία». Superbly acted, as always. And what a sophisticated, brilliant play, confirming my opinion that the Theotokas play we saw the other day is trash. A lord of the French court (18th century), by magic, presents to a lady the nature of love: two boys and two girls, unspoiled children of nature, are allowed to meet. At first all is idyllic; they discover each other and themselves. But then jealousy, self-esteem, and violence begin to govern this “pure,” basic society; the women switch partners, the men’s friendship is vitiated, etc. It’s all done with brevity, with enchantment. No wonder there is a Marivaux revival.

Walked back along the παραλία with Jerry. Coffee and ice cream in overpriced placed on the waterfront. But good conversation. How nice to be in a city!

Still no date for my lecture. Aglaïa is trying to set it up. Mimis had an attack of kidney stone.

Wednesday, May 13, 1987

Still working on the Ritsos lecture, shortening and tightening it. This is ridiculous. Losing time from Kazantzakis. But at least I’m slated to give it three times.

Nice dinner with Bill and Titika McGrew. Things going much better at Anatolia College apparently. The government is not pursuing them actively, although their official policies haven’t changed. Students less paranoid and restless than in the 1970s. Bill says that the universities, however, are a shambles. He is fascinated by Frank Boyden, having just read “The Head.” I supplemented this with many anecdotes.

Thursday, May 14, 1987

They changed the name of our street. Suddenly the placards outside say Βιζύης-Βύζαντος instead of Στατίστης. Κα Θεοδώρα explained. The people in this area are refugees from Βιζύη in Thrace, indeed from the area called 40 Εκκλησίες. Thus the main street is Βιζυηνός. Βύζας was a Byzantine general, she thinks (not the founder of Byzantium, who was an ancient Greek from Megara), born in Βιζύη like the author. Στατίστης is connected with Παύλος Μελάς and thus has no meaning for the residents.

Lola kindly came to hear my lecture and to correct the Greek. There were some booboos. But not many.

In the evening, to the American Center to hear Valentini Papadopoulou lecture on transactional analysis, which seems a brilliantly conceived neo-romanticism, the American reaction to Freud. She gave a good exposition of the theory, and then showed its application to the interpretation of plays and novels.

Friday, May 15, 1987

Gave my lecture on Η ζωγραφική τεχνική του Ρίτσου. I think it went well. Vigorous discussion afterward chiefly from Πάνος Μουλλάς, Σηφάκης ήρθε και Αγλαΐα και Μίμης, Πετρούνιας (γλωσσολόγος), whom I met at Vryoni's conference in the 1970s, also Τσαντσανόγλου, etc. Lunch afterward at "Tiffany's." In the evening the worst theater so far this year: Daphne de Maurier's "Autumntide" (Φθινοπωρινή παλίρροια) with Μυράτ. Chrysanthi sick afterwards, wretched all night.

Saturday, May 16, 1987

Chrysanthi sick. 38° C. temperature (104.5° F.). Nausea, dizziness. Doctor came, prescribed suppositories to empty the stomach. We'll see. Still hoping to go to Crete on Monday. I started to revise my little article on Η ζωή ἐν τάφῳ that Meg Alexiou is encouraging me to publish together with her piece on Δασκάλα and Γοργόνα. Ρίτσα Γιαννούρα very kind; kept telephoning all day, and it was she who sent the doctor, ο Γιάννης Βακόλας, τηλ. 317.256. He didn't want to accept payment; finally I prevailed and he took δρ 3000. Youngish, 40s, came in dungarees. Very professional yet personable, caring.

Sunday, May 17, 1987

Chrysanthi decided not to go. Too risky. I cancelled the ticket five minutes after the deadline; they wanted 30% forfeit. Called Zisis, whose niece works for Olympic. She discovered that they'd cancelled my ticket as well as Chrysanthi's. Rushed to the office. Finally everything OK, including 100% refund.

Monday, May 18, 1987

Hotel Mirabello, Iraklion

To Athens alone. Waited six hours in the airport. Read Kazantzakis's Odyssey. Rather pleasant, except for cigarette smoke everywhere. Nice flight to Ηράκλειο at 6:00 p.m. Cyclades visible from the plane. Stelios Orphanoudakis met me. How nice to see him here! He's a "king": chairman of computer science at the university, with double salary, from the university and also from the State institute in Iraklio, not to mention Yale. Showed me the university. The only university building I've seen without graffiti. Well equipped with mainframe and PCs. They do research, have undergrads also, and train schoolteachers in computer applications. Nice set-up. He took me to the Hotel Mirabello, where I'd booked "in the dark." Depressing place. Noisy, empty. Then to a nice restaurant run by Cretan villagers with Cretan specialties: Οδός Γ. Γεωργιάδου 6. Ate with some German visitors saying with Stelios. Message from Chrysanthi when I returned to the hotel, that she's coming tomorrow evening.

Tuesday, May 19, 1987

Iraklion

No sleep. Scooters, traffic, barking dog all night. Up early. Bus to Rethymno. The new road is a dream compared to the terror I remember. Flowers in bloom on the roadside, at one point a whole "wall" of red blooms. The sea below, terraced fields left and right. Got off at the university, a little before the town. Vayenas had warned me not to be appalled. It looks like a prison, but one new building amidst the converted old ones isn't too depressing. They have a central library for the entire Φιλοσοφική Σχολή, instead of the σπουδαστήριον system. Not bad. All of Aris Diktaios's books are there in a special collection. Pandelis Prevelakis's will be arriving shortly. The librarian is very proud. Met Puchner, an Austrian who teaches permanently in Crete. Also Στυλιανός Αλεξίου, who was very kind. His wife published Kazantzakis letters to Στεφανίδης. He'll call her to give me a copy. His father, Λεφτέρης Αλεξίου, had many Kazantzakis letters but when he and Kazantzakis had a falling out Lefteris destroyed the letters out of spite. Only three or four remain, and these from later years, when the two men were reconciled. Thanasis Maskaleris joined us. He's living in Rethymno, working on Cretan information about Kazantzakis. Hopes I'll come to San Francisco State as a visiting professor sometime. Vayenas says I have an open invitation to visit for a semester in Crete: 2 classes, salary of about δρ 140000. Not very attractive except maybe as a way to improve my Greek. The lecture went well. I feel much more assured now. Lots of questions afterwards, including two from undergraduates (who are all female, it seems). Vayenas says the level is low, since the best go to Athens and Salonika. Alexiou said that I should use ειδύλλιο instead of βουκολικό to render "pastoral" in my translation of Keats. Afterwards Vayenas, Maskaleris, and I had a fish dinner—octopus, βαρβούνια—in the old harbor, which is charming. Thanasis walked me around the old town. Knocked at Michael Herzfeld's door, but no answer. Returned to Iraklio with a check for δρ 16000!

Chrysanthi arrived, looking healthy. Stelios came and we spent four to five hours together, part of it looking for a place to eat in the DEH blackout (strike). First went out beyond Knossos to a tavern where, in the dark, the owner had just put the night's lamb in the stone oven, which had been heated before with coals. He closed the mouth with a stone block and then sealed the edges of the block to the oven proper with mud, as in ancient times. Since there were neither lights nor food we went back to Iraklio and then out in another direction beyond the airport, by the sea. Again no lights, but lots of candles this time. I had shark (γαλέος). OK, a bit sickening. Stelios helped us transfer to Hotel Lato, near the harbor. Iraklio has been ruined architecturally. The waterfront is unavailable to citizens; no park, no παραλία. The old houses are replaced with apartments. More noise than on Madison Avenue. A few remains of grandeur: Morosini fountain, a teenage hangout; the Venetian Loggia (now the town hall), some parks. The bastions unconnected. Can't walk around the walls, as in Chester.

Wednesday, May 20, 1987

Ηράκλειο

9:00 a.m. to the Ιστορικό Μουσείο in the mansion of Καλοκαιρινός, opposite the Ξενία hotel. Λουΐζα Καλοκαιρινού came shortly after. «Συγγνώμη λίγα λεφτά. Με ζητάει ο διευθυντής μου.» We waited. Finally she bought us to the office and introduced the διευθυντής, ο Ανδρέας Καλοκαιρινός, who grunted. He's the orphan (Vouli told us) whom the great Kalokairinos family adopted so that their name would not be erased. Repulsive barbarian, also a bit senile perhaps. "What did I want?" (I'd sent all that in advance, of course.) They don't have προσωπικό, can't do photocopies, no machine in the museum. Why don't I get them by mail, later? I protested. Finally he said they'd try. He had no idea what they possessed. Had never heard of Διαμαντάρας. Louisa told me afterwards that the letters to Galatea were "lent" to Goudelis for publication and were never returned, so those are gone, too. We examined the two rooms devoted to Kazantzakis, copied some letters from the showcases, were allowed inside to look at the books. Not much of interest. But next door, in the Αίθουσα Τσουδέρου, I found three good letters from Kazantzakis to the prime minister on display. We copied two of them and a little of the third. 1:00 p.m. Closing time. Louisa, outside the ogre's office, said with luck we'd have some photocopies tomorrow.

Lunch by the sea: swordfish, very good. Short nap. Then taxi to Βαρβάροι. I was taken the long way and cheated, but no matter. Τίτικα Σακλαμπάνη was waiting for us. The museum is beautiful, tasteful, rich. She's very proud. Took us round personally. Luckily, no one else was there. That morning they'd had a load of schoolchildren, and Friday will be bus after bus of tourists. Emphasis on theater because of Anemomyannis's interests. Scenes, costumes, programs, all kinds of manuscripts, photos, publications in many language. A fifteen-minute slide presentation with recorded narration in a choice of language. Tasteful but too much on the man, little on the works themselves. And too adulatory. Also some factual mistakes (written by Patroklos Stavrou, of course). Titika put us in care of Maria, the warden. (Later learned that this young girl was left a widow with two children when her thirty-year-old husband was killed in an automobile crash. Brave soul!) Frantically copied texts as Chrysanthi read them, hoping to finish before the 8:00 p.m. deadline. Did . . . almost. Just at the end, two good letters on politics, one to Sofoulis, that I could only summarize, not transcribe. OK. Don't be obsessive! Relax! All the showcases, here as in Irakleio, are closed with numerous screws and virtually non-openable. No way to see the reverse side of a page.

Question of how to return. A man, one of the σύμβουλοι, was supposed to drive us to the crossroads at Σκαλάνι to catch a bus (no buses go to Βαρβάροι). But he disappeared. So we relaxed. Sat down at the café. Immediately treated to καφέ, then to τσίπουρο και μεζεδάκια, by a farmer. Lively conversation about crops, the weather, Cretan παλληκαριά. A man from the next table joined in. He had relatives in New York; the children don't know Greek. I explained what happens. Then the σύμβουλος came, talked about the museum, its hopes, its accomplishments. He's an accountant, works in a large fruit processing co-op in a nearby village. Maria came. More talk. Of course we missed the bus. No matter. Another man turns out to have a taxi. He's in no hurry. Neither are we. More τσίπουρο. Finally we left, with Maria, who travels every day from Iraklio. The ταξιτζής didn't want money, but we prevailed, for once. Finished with καφέ και καταΐφι στην Πλατεία Ελευθερίας. Must get Daphne to include this museum in the next edition of Let's Go Greece.

Thursday, May 21, 1987

Ηράκλειο

Της Κωνσταντίνου και Ελένης. Chrysanthi tried to call Kostas. Hard to get a line. Finally got through, but not to Lola.

To Knossos early. How nice to be there without crowds and without a guide! Getting to be a familiar site to us: third time. British archeologists are continuing the excavations. We watched the workers scraping away dirt with brushes, picking out shards. The palace is unbelievably immense and complicated, truly a labyrinth. They say that a river led to Knossos from the harbor they used; boats could come to the palace gate. Also that all the hills were heavily wooded, so there was a watershed.

Back by local bus. Went to the Βικελαία Δημοτική Βιβλιοθήκη in Morosini Square, to untangle my quandary about Μουρέλλος και Διαλυνάς και Νέα Εφημερίς ca. 1925. Very disagreeable librarians. Finally I opened a volume of the paper and saw that Mourellos was the owner and Dialynas the editor. Simple! The director, more polite, took us upstairs to the magnificent quarters that will house Maro and George Seferis's books. A girl is cataloging them. Some, with inscriptions, are displayed. And also displayed is a letter in beautiful Greek from George Thomson to Seferis saying he understands Seferis's reluctance to write a συστατικό for Thomson's son-in-law (Christos Alexiou!!) and that other people, people who know Christos, have written. Small world.

Next, back to the Historical Museum, just in case. Louisa greeted us with a smile: "I have good news for you." "You finished the photocopies?" "No, but we discovered a whole file of letters from Kazantzakis to his family." (Previously she told me that the only letters to the family were those on display.) Then she did hand me a packet of photocopies: 54 αυτόγραφα του Καζαντζάκη προς την Edvige Levi. If I get nothing else out of them, the trip will be worthwhile because of these. The ogre then appeared and affirmed that it would be out of the question—αποκλείεται!—to do any more photocopies on Friday, since they were short-handed. Maybe Saturday. Chrysanthi and I finished copying the third letter to Tsouderos, and looked around the rest of the museum: memories of Καπετάν Κόρακας, risings, Prince George's arrival, the German war, lots of photos of parachutists descending. What do German tourists feel when they see all this? They even had the Firman guaranteeing full compliance with the Organic Statute.

Long siesta after a lousy lunch. Coffee in Οδός Δαιδάλου. Open market, to waste time, but bought some μαχλέπι to take to Hanover. At 6:00 to Stylianos Alexiou's wife, Martha. They live just off the Morosini Square in a house that's now surrounded by the dregs of tourism and commercialism. The usual large living room with desk at one end and bookcases up to the ceiling on all four walls. Martha very bitter about the ruination of Iraklio. They have another house in Rethymno and spend the summers there. She gave me the issue of Αμάλθεια where she published Kazantzakis's letters to Stefanidis, a school day chum. (Actually, I have this at home, but never paid enough attention to it.) She explained who Stefanidis was: lived like an άρχοντας, never accomplished much. She told us a little about the original Στυλιανός Αλεξίου, from the village of Κράσι, and about her father-in-law, Λευτέρης. Ιδιότροπος άνθρωπος. Intellectual families like this, the few, must feel totally isolated in a place like Iraklio. Thank God Kazantzakis left; he would have been stifled otherwise.

Walked afterwards to the Martenego Rampart, to Kazantzakis's grave. Very disappointing in comparison to Joyce's. The famous epitaph is hardly visible; it should strike one. Kazantzakis's name and dates are nowhere. The site is overgrown, unattended. Total disappointment.

Supper in the γνήσια κρητικά εστιατόριο where Stelios had taken me the first evening. We were the only customers. The lights went out again—more DEH strike. The waiter sat down with us and we lamented together about the Cretan economy and the state of the world. Afterwards I had a real old-fashioned stomachache of the particularly Greek kind. But survived intact. The stomach seems to have acquired a defense system.

Friday, May 22, 1987

Iraklio

To the Archeological Museum. Followed a group of Finns and listened to their strange language. Nice to see old favorites: the snake goddess, the ivory acrobat in midair, the helmet of boar's teeth, the delicate pendant representing two bees, the frescos of processions, bull rituals, porpoises, etc., the huge replica of the entire palace as it presumably was at its prime. We "did" the collection leisurely, properly. The Finns had long since been whisked off to Knossos, presumably.

In the hotel at breakfast each morning we see a solitary, elderly old lady, a hunchback. Looks American or English. We've been in the elevator together as well. She seems very alone. But we haven't talked to her. Why?

After the museum I sat in the Βικελαία and looked over the Levi letters while Chrysanthi went on a shopping spree. Some of the letters to Edvige Levi are splendid. Kazantzakis poured out all his passion to so many people. It would be interesting to see the letters that they sent to him. Were they so fulsome, so warm and pleading, as it were, for companionship?

Lunch beneath the Βικελαία in a non-touristy restaurant. I'm so tired of being "propositioned" with "Bitte, café, drink, sandwich, sit down please!" In the afternoon, read Kazantzakis's Odyssey on the hotel balcony. Gusty wind. Like being on shipboard. Watched the two ferries depart, rounding the west coast of Dia. Walked with Chrysanthi out along the long breakwater of the old harbor, past the Venetian fortress, which is so foursquare and magnificent, with marble lions on both sides. Saw flying fish, appropriate for Knossos. A ship tied up to the mole was bringing sulfur in sacks to be used in spraying grapes. It returns to Piraeus with sand used to make cement. A fisherman was selling off a huge βλάχος, which looked to me like a tuna, slice by slice, on the jetty. When we started our walk, it was almost all there; when we returned, just a few hunks were left. Other fishermen were going out for the night, the lead boat with two or three others tied behind to spread the nets.

Just behind the hotel is a street we took to try to reach the harbor. We went down it, turned to the left, wound around, came to a dead end, turned to the right, wound around another way, turned some more, came to another dead end, and finally emerged through a crack in a wall. The name of the street: Οδός Λαβύρινθου! One of the (few) charms of Iraklio is the way they name the streets. Each has an "explanation" below the name—e.g., Οδός Καζαντζάκη: κρητικός συγγραφέας· Οδός Κνωσού: Μινωικό παλάτι· Οδός Βενιζέλου: κρητικός πολιτικός ηγέτης· Οδός—: κρητικός αγωνιστής λευτερίας.

Saturday, May 23, 1987

Iraklio-Thessaloniki

Read a little more in Kazantzakis's Odyssey. It isn't bad, really, if you go slowly. An abridged version would be an improvement. Went out again to the Koules Fortress guarding the harbor; it was open now. What a masterful construction! All based on arches. Walls fifteen feet thick. Beautiful and functional. Skylights admit light. Long slits for cannons.

The courtyard above is used now for a theater in the summer. Next, went back to the Historical Museum. The Ogre thankfully was on his way home. Louisa handed me Kazantzakis's correspondence to his family. The Rahel correspondence was a false lead: it's hers to him, not vice versa. Diamantaras's cannot be found. Galatea's is gone! I told her about Goudelis. She'll keep in touch if anything else turns up.

A little sad leaving Iraklio. It's ugly but charming in its way and has oases like Theotokopoulos Park, in full bloom today. Easy trip back non-stop to Salonika in 55 minutes. At home, mail from Alec, which took five or six weeks to arrive from Indonesia, plus a photo. He's hairless again, alas, and lost weight. But smiling. Lefteris Prevelakis wrote a warm note saying he and his wife had read my book and found it excellent. How nice of him! Diamantaras also wrote, and Sachines sent one of his books. Papathanasopoulos had written earlier. It's nice to meet new friends at this stage in life! Elizabeth Ballard sent an encyclical. She's back in her home doing physical therapy to regain use of her paralyzed side. Brave soul! Kendal at Hanover is collecting funds-at-risk to take an option on land even before the C.O.N. is granted. I sent $500.

Watched parliament for 1½ hours on television. Government crisis. Mitsotakis calling for elections, Papandreou refusing. How vile they are toward one another, especially Mitsotakis, who is a real demagogue. One is worse than the other. Papandreou is clearly losing his grip, and Mitsotakis is like a bloodthirsty vulture sinking in his claws. Θλιβερό!

Louisa Kalokairinou told us in Iraklio that workers in excavations get  $\delta\rho$  33,000 per month. But so far in her dig they've gone two or three months without being paid even that, because the government has no money. I'd thought that  $\delta\rho$  70,000 for a civil engineer was scandalous. 1000 a day. A cup of coffee, for tourists, in Iraklio costs 125. A bus ride is 40, a newspaper 50.

Sunday, May 24, 1987

Papandreou got his vote of confidence, as expected. I visited the Festival of Books with Vouli. So many publishers and titles! How do they all survive? Do Greeks buy these books? I bought Ritsos's novel, Kordatos's History of Modern Greek Literature, and a fancy Λεύκωμα Καβάφη, full of pictures of Alexandria.

Monday, May 25, 1987

Hotel Ξενία, Γιάννενα

By plane to Ιωάννινα. The airport is a strip parallel to a huge mountain range. First impression of the city very negative, but later saw the lake, κάστρα, etc. Πλατεία Ελευθερίας was full of green; huge plane trees everywhere; acacias in bloom; luxuriant roses. Statue of Venizelos. When Yanina was liberated in 1913, paintings of King Constantine, who as head of the army rode into the city on his horse: imagine the feelings after 400 years under the Turks and Ali Pasha and his successors! Actually, Ali Pasha's revolution against the Sultan and his attempt to make a separate Balkan confederation was precisely what convinced the Greek revolutionaries that this was the right time to try to win independence at last—i.e., at a time when the Ottoman Empire was having internal disputes. After walking aimlessly through the town and reaching the lake, we went to the university and had a good talk with the chairman, Ερατοσθένης Καγομάνος. He's the one who edited the first volume of the demoticists' letters. Another colleague joined us: Sonia —, an émigré from the Soviet Union, married to a Greek novelist and teaching Cavafy, etc. Finally Christos arrived (he had a class on Palamas from 7 to 9 p.m.). Hugs, kisses, instant renewal of an old friendship. Each time we see each other it's as though no time had intervened. We went off together to eat in the Εστιατόριον Όασις, on the square. Long recital of current difficulties. Demetrios is fingering all the women he sees, including old ladies. Rejected by the school Meg hoped to place him in. Christos has hopes of a half-way house, but in this case the boy's family should be nearby. If Christos moves now to England he'll have no job there and will also lose his Greek pension. The position at Yanina is OK and could be renewed, but sudden opposition has appeared in the form of Βελουδής, who is using gossip and misinformation to discredit Christos, saying he has no degree, no publications, etc., never taught literature at B'ham. Ugly business. But relations with the rest of the staff are excellent. And Meg continues to balk at helping. She protests that her Harvard salary is $36,000! Despite all this, Christos carries on with the same remarkable fortitude. He has even begun to publish: a piece on Kazantzakis's Prometheus. He gave me his lecture on Sikelianos and the Eleusinian mysteries to read.

Tuesday, May 26, 1987

Yanina

Breakfast with Christos. Then to Δωδώνη (Dodona), a spectacular ride over the crest of a mountain range and into an enchanting saddle between this and the next crest, a true Shangri-la. Gorgeous. The site is thrilling. A huge theater, 18,000 seats, in good condition. Modified by the Romans, but still has astonishing acoustics. An oak planted to remind one of the early form of worship. Various foundations of the oracular complex. As so often is the case, the major thrill comes from the placement, the location.

Then to the Μουσείο Κερινών Ομοιωμάτων «Βρέλλη» in a nearby village. A kind of Madame Tussauds but with scenes from Greek history: the κρυφό σχολιό, the martyrdom of Διονύσιος ο Φιλόσοφος in the seventeenth century, the oath sworn by the Φιλική Εταιρεία in 1814, Κατσαντώνης, the famous Epirot klepht, klephts and armatoli in their hideout, the beheading of Ali Pasha in 1822, and his consort Κυρά Βασιλική (Κυρά Φροσίνη he drowned in the lake). Very touching, realistic reminders of hundreds of years of slavery and hardship, which continued until very recently: Yanina was “returned” to Greece only in 1913 when King Constantine made his triumphant entry into the city. And when the Germans invaded in 1941, Yanina was heavily bombed.

Spent the afternoon re-reading my lecture and reading Christos’s on Sikelianos. My lecture went well, I think. Small audience (total lack of organization; no notices until the last day, etc.) but a good one by and large. Lively discussion, as on previous occasions. The topic seems to be a provocative one. Afterwards, ten to twelve people to dinner in a taverna. Had a nice talk with Sonia, and with Γιάννης Περυσινάκης, a classicist who has written on Kalvos. He reminded us that the ancient Greeks, certainly Herodotus, had a synchronic concept of history. The diachronic concept was introduced into western culture by the Hebrews and of course through Christianity. I was pleased that they all knew of and admired Bergson.

Wednesday, May 27, 1987

Yanina

Christos with me at breakfast again. We all went off to the marvelous cave at the head of the lake, at Perama. The guide, a beautiful boy of about eighteen, told us that it takes eighty to ninety years for one centimeter of stalagmite to form. Thus the scientists estimate that the cave’s formations have taken about fourteen million years to reach their present heights. We went through galley after galley: huge halls, tiny passageways, every stalactite-stalagmite formation different: so many of them “suggest” object such as people, candles, fish, shells, statues, bridges, etc. Earthquakes have dislodged some of the rocks so that the process has started all over from the beginning in certain galleries. From here we went to a mosque, now a museum, inside the walls. Again: so many reminders of the 400 years of Τουρκοκρατία. Chrysanthi bought a silver-plated tray: traditional craft of the area.

To απόγευμα: to the Isle of Yanina, a lovely experience. It’s mainly the village itself, quite aside from the sites. No cars, scooters, motorcycles. Houses and squares in the old style, unchanged. Huge plane trees, running fountains, cobbled streets. Hens, roosters, sheep, a forest at the top of the hill. They show the floor with the bullet holes that attest to the way Ali Pasha was wounded before being decapitated. A document on the wall has his “signature”—the stamp of his ring (he was illiterate). The Greek co-signers list themselves as his “slaves,” including the local bishop. Portraits of Κυρά Βασιλική everywhere, plus a lovely idealized painting of Φροσίνη about to be drowned. A girl of about twelve recited her prepared litany for us about the historical events. Then we climbed up to the Μονή Αγίου Νικολάου των Φιλοανθρωπινών. Marvelously preserved frescoes covering every square inch. We once saw this in Crete as well. Fifteenth- and sixteenth-century paintings. One porch has all the ancient philosophers as well: Plato, Aristotle, Solon, etc., in a row, like saints. The little room where the keeper stays is like an old Turkish living room, with low couches and overstuffed pillows.

To βράδυ: to Christos’s lecture on Sikelianos and the Eleusinian mysteries, sponsored by the Ηπειρωτική Στέγη Γραμμάτων και Τεχνών. Christos recited Sikelianos’s poetry beautifully. Good lecture, delivered in a scholarly manner. Afterwards, drink with the president and secretary of the Στέγη. The president is an ΕΛΑΣ veteran, it seems, probably communist. His eyes lit up when Christos began talking of his activities in the mountains επί Κατοχής και εμφυλίου. The younger man is a writer of verse. Both know Sikelianos’s poems, Kazantzakis’s novels, Cavafy. How nice! There’s an intellectual life in Yanina. Christos waxed eloquent on Sikelianos’s metaphoric power and began reading one stunning metaphor after another from Λυρικός Βίος. Then the three of us went off to the Oasis for our last meal. Returning to the hotel after midnight, we encountered, by the oddest of coincidences, Tassos Boundis, a graduate of Dartmouth who has returned to become a math professor at Patras. He was delighted and flabbergasted to see us, asked about the children. We reminisced about other Greek students at Dartmouth: Stefanides, still in Minneapolis, Orphanoudakis in Crete, Pavlakis sort of lost, probably still in the U.S.

Thursday, May 28, 1987

Yanina-Thessaloniki

My birthday. Chrysanthi gave me presents at breakfast. Zisis and Ritsa had come the night before, returning from Corfu. We rode back to Salonika with them, pleasantly (by pre-arrangement). Stopped at Metsovo, where aged shepherds sit in the square with their γλίτσες, then at Meteora, at a place where floccati rugs are made, at the Κατάρρα (in the mountains, before Metsovo), passed the Platamona fortress, went through the Vale of Tempe between Ossa (= Kissavos) and Olympus. Mail contained a nice letter from Leander indicating some new opportunities opening for him at Moravian. Birthday supper with Chrysanthi at the Tiffany Grill.

Friday, May 29, 1987

Δημήτρης Ντούτης kindly let me use an IBM typewriter at the American Center, and I typed a clean copy of my little piece on the “Accidental Modernism of ‘Η ζωή ἐν τάφω” to send to Theofanis Stavrou. George Anemoyannis sent more letters: some splendid early ones to Ιωάννης Ζερβός. I sent an angry telefax to Melissa Zeiger about her delay in reading Daniyal Mueenuddin’s thesis on James Merrill; she’s had it over six weeks. Θανάσης Παπαθανασόπουλος kindly sent the program for the Έκθεση on Prevelakis that Kasdaglis prepared. Αποθέωσις. Greeks go all the way . . . in both directions. In the evening Daphne telephoned from Athens. She’d arrived, with Phil. Wants to come to Thessaloniki immediately to see us. Chrysanthi and Lola went to the airport. Daphne not on the 8:00 p.m. plane. They returned. Daphne telephoned; she’d be on the 11:45. Chrysanthi went back to the airport with Vouli. Finally at 12:45 a.m. they arrived, Daphne looking wide awake despite the trip. Lots of conversation around the table; lots of good Metsovitiko cheese consumed. Pappous with high temperature again, not very lucid. Will he survive until we return is the question. Yiayia in good spirits, however. Leander drove Daphne and her belongings back to Hanover from Harvard. Visited the farm with his Finnish friends. The house full of Andy Rangell's boxes of unopened belongings, but habitable. The car inspected. Daphne's double interview at Simon and Schuster, cordial with the director of personnel, cold with the director of "corporate communication." Finally at 2:00 a.m. we all slept.

Saturday, May 30, 1987

I remember when we went to Dodona the taxi driver told us about the celebrated swindler Γούτης (or something like that) who had cheated scores of people out of billions of drachmas all by borrowing and lending (i.e., usury), until finally the bubble burst and he fled to his Swiss bank account. Τον βάλανε τραγούδι! Whereupon the taxi driver recited delicious couplets singing the brilliance of this cheat. Thus poetry lives on. On a similar note, Papathanasopoulos sent me the satires by Βαφόπουλος, which are clever and biting: e.g., Η Ελλάδα ολόκληρη μια κολυπήθρα. / Απ' άκρια σ' ακρια γίνονται βαφτίσια. / Φτάνει και μια μονάχα δαχτυλήθρα, / τα «στραβά» μας βαπτισθούνε σε «ίσια». Skimmed the first volume of Ritsos's nine-volume prose set Εικονοστάσιο ανώνυμων αγίων. Disappointing. Short meditations with none of the imagistic power and pungency of his poetry. I continued to read in Kazantzakis's Odyssey, Books VII–VIII. So much stuffing and blather. If only he'd had an Ezra Pound to use the blue pencil! Went with Daphne and Phil and Chrysanthi to the Λευκός Πύργος museum. Disappointing. The parapet is closed. Exhibit spaces had a miscellany. The inside of the structure has none of the raw grandeur of the Koules in Iraklio. Michael Herzfeld called from the airport on the way back to Crete. I'd missed him in Rethymno and he missed me in Salonika. We were in Yanina when he gave his lecture a few days ago. Too bad. He also missed Bo-Lennart and Anita Eklund for the same reason.

Sunday, May 31, 1987

Read Christos's long article on Kazantzakis's Prometheus trilogy and wrote him a long letter à propos. He is a good writer: so lucid. And he has definite ideas. So it's so nice to see something by him in print. The Sikelianos piece I hope eventually to translate for JMGS.

Last night Nikos took Daphne and Phil to a bouzouki taverna, whereupon in walked Τάκης, recognized Daphne (so Daphne thought) and came over with hugs and jollity. Today at Odysseas's house we learned what actually happened, which is very funny. Takis is a womanizer. He walked into the taverna, saw a beautiful woman in the corner, said to himself, "I've got to talk to that babe!" went closer, saw Nikos sitting next to her, and then thought to himself, "Damn it to hell, it's that bum Nikos, and the babe must be Daphne, my cousin!" Anyway, after that he still said hello, and promises to take her out to a dancing taverna tonight with Stavros and Toula.

Spent the day fulfilling obligations (then read a canto of Kazantzakis's increasingly tiresome Odyssey). To Αγία Τριάδα μεσημέρι, to lunch with Nikos, Kostas, Lola. Home on the bus. Then Dimitris Yiannakos visited to see Daphne. I found him insufferable. A compulsive talker and loudmouth; knows everything. You can't contradict him and have a discussion. Then one hour to get to Κολοκοτρώνη to visit Odysseas, Eleni, and Yiayia, who are always so very nice. Stavros and Toula came later. They're even nicer. Spaghetti supper at midnight. Walked all the way home. Daphne's Greek is not bad. She forgets words but has a good sense of grammar. She's delighted with her Let's Go job this summer. Also is pleased to see things in Greece (e.g., αγγεία in the museum this morning) that she has studied in class. Very eager to return to the Parthenon after having studied it in such detail. Phil is a classics major but is going to go to law school. We're teasing him about his ancient Greek pronunciation. His father is Professor of Religion at Florida State and likes Kazantzakis.

Monday, June 1, 1987

Supper with Vouli, Norman Gilbertson, Tad Lansdale, Joann Ryding (from the Farm School), Daphne, Phil, Κυρά Κούλα, Κυρά Στέλλα. I got Norman to talk at length about the girls' school. Joice Loch founded it originally as a refuge for tubercular girls but after a year she realized that an educational program would be needed and it became a school. Joice and Sydney had met in Quaker relief work in Poland in the first world war. Then they gravitated to Greece, settled in the Πύργο in Ουρανούπολη. After Hitler invaded Poland, she helped Polish refugees escaping via Greece and Turkey. Norman and Doreen came right after liberation, sponsored by Friends Service Council but assigned to UNRRA. Full of stories about escapades, close escapes, especially during the civil war. The girls were brought down each night to sleep in the Lansdales' house, behind barbed wire. He remembers the extraordinary emotion when the boys kidnapped by the αντάρτες returned to the school. As each entered, the assembled staff and other students cheered, tears streaming down their faces. He was very negative about the communists, having experienced the horror of the παιδομάζωμα. Said that Gage's book Eleni all rang true. Also told stories about Charles Lindsay, who was a terror—egotistic, adolescent, spoiled, arrogant. When Norman told him that one had to adjust to Greek ways, he replied, "No, Greece will adjust to my ways!" (Cf. Stephen Dedalus.)

Tuesday, June 2, 1987

To RR station with Daphne and Phil. Very little sleep. They took the 8:00 a.m. to Athens. Such memories from that station! In the evening Daphne telephoned to say they'd had a splendid trip, talking the whole way in Greek with various people. Now happily installed in Ξενοδοχείο Αχιλλέας. They witnessed a bit of the Νέα Δημοκρατία rally that I saw on television: Mitsotakis in the rain before hundreds of thousands. Θέλουμε αμέσως εκλογές! Huge boos whenever he mentioned Κύριος Ανδρέας Παπανδρέου. . . . Chrysanthi went out to have a facial treatment. I stayed home and read Kazantzakis's Odyssey (now in Canto XII). It's so bloated, so self-indulgent, so . . . awful! Yet I plough on.

Wednesday, June 3, 1987

Halfway through Canto XV. XIII is the worst of the lot. XIV and XV are better—very imaginative. . . . Βασίλης Σολιόπουλος (Stavros's brother) brought the cassettes of my two interviews on ERT short wave. They'll be broadcast to Europe and America—one on Kazantzakis, the other on Greek immigrants in America and Modern Greek studies in the USA. I expected much worse, and actually was rather pleased at what I heard, although of course my accent is heavy. But there were few χοντρά λάθη, damaging hesitations, etc. By and large, the discourse flowed satisfactorily.

Thursday, June 4, 1987

A quiet day. Hot. Finished Canto XVI of the Odyssey and am pleased to be able to stop for now. It's insufferable, a bloated self-indulgent monster, out of control. If it were cut to 1/3 the size it might have some strength, but even then the defects would abound. The "naturalistic" part is the worst of all. No characterization; no attempt at believable plotting. Dei ex machina always descending. In the "City" he decrees free love, communal raising of children, no family life, and a few pages later speaks of married couples, forgetting. The transmutation from activist in Canto XV to ascetic in Canto XVI takes place instantaneously: no development, no strain. . . . Why am I wasting months of my life with this όγκος?

Coincidentally, read Kordatos's very negative chapter on Kazantzakis this evening. He calls a spade a spade. Τι νόημα βγαίνει από την «Οδύσεια» του Καζαντζάκη; Γιατί έγραψε τόσες χιλιάδες στίχους; Ποια είναι η κεντρική του ιδέα; Απαντήσεις δε μπορούν να δοθούν, γιατί το ποίημα αυτό δεν έχει αρχή και τέλος. Αν ο Καζαντζάκης έγραψε το έπος τούτο για να εκφράσει έμμεσα τις ιδέες του, την κοσμοθεωρία του—ή το «δράμα του ανθρώπου»—δεν το πέτυχε. Και ο πιο καλοπροαίρετος αναγνώστης δε μπορεί να βρει το νήμα των διανοημάτων του. . . . Η «Οδύσεια» του είναι δυσνόητη και ακαταλαβίστικη. . . . Φαντάστηκε τον εαυτό του Δάντη. Όμως μπροστά στο γίγαντα της Φλωρεντίας αυτός είναι ένας νάνος. (Vol. 2, p. 566, 1983 reprint of Ιστορία της νεοελληνικής λογοτεχνίας.)

Spent a few hours in the Central Library of Α.Π.Θ. using the Who's Who 1979 for people mentioned in the index of the 400 Letters. . . . Mrs. Χατζή telephoned from Athens. She's preparing 40+ letters to Elli Lambridi for publication. Will send me a copy. If I get these plus the 72 to Rousopoulou, I'll have collected about 600 items as a result of this trip. Not bad. . . . Sore throat suddenly. Tired. First illness so far, except for stomach. But I also have a recurring numbness in the right leg, like the foot going to sleep. Some circulatory problem perhaps. Must see Gerber about this when we return. . . . Lola finished marking her exams. Came looking refreshed, in a new spring suit. So nice to see Lola and Chrysanthi together so regularly.

Friday, June 5, 1987

Sick. First time, except for stomach. Bad throat. Stayed at home all day. It got worse. Started the continuation of the Odyssey chapter after making extensive charts. In the evening Bob Jones and Dimitris Doutis came for "tea." Chrysanthi burned the πίτες she'd bought, but no matter. Good conversation in English. Jones a very inventive teacher. I got lots of ideas for English 5, which I've filed in the "Dartmouth" file. Mail today indicates that David Kastan is leaving the department; probably appointed to Columbia. If so, it's strange, because he has not distinguished himself via publication, to be sure. Τα μέσα, τα μέσα . . . !

Saturday, June 6, 1987

Still sick. No temperature, though. Chrysanthi got me to gargle with raki. I like that. Made some headway on the Odyssey chapter, slowly. Evening: to the apartment of Βασίλης και Μερσίνη Σολιόπουλος, Stavros's brother. Journalist for Athenian newspaper Akropolis, the sad remnant of Gavriilidis's once great paper. Lovely people. He returned from Russia when he was five years old. Showed a photo of his father in αντάρτης uniform, 25 years old, looking 18, big smile. How could he have known what would follow? Twenty years in Tashkent. The hardest thing was to adjust from Tashkent, a sophisticated city with all the conveniences, to their village with fifty houses and no road in winter. But Yiayia wanted to die in Greece. Vasilis remembers the exiles in Tashkent, when they heard a Σοφία Βέμβω record, shedding huge tears. Such was the nostalgia, although logically they were much better off in Russia. No one had any problem earning a living. Education was superior, etc. They also had a much higher standard of living. When they returned with their TV set and refrigerator, they brought them to a village with no electricity—electricity didn't come until around 1969 επί χούντας. Vasilis is doing radio programs on the side (such as my interview). He likes oral history, λαογραφία. Has one text that sounds like a story by Γιώργος Βιζυηνός, about a Greek girl being abducted by two Turks in order to place her in the Aga's harem. About a village with no καφενείο, where every Sunday everyone came to the square and danced, singing the music since there were no instruments. Such a nice man, αυτοδίδακτος like his brother. Reads! Had the diplomatic memoirs of Άγγελος Βλάχος. We talked four hours straight without sensing the passage of time.

Sunday, June 7, 1987

Writing. Throat better. Stomach still a bit unsettled. In the evening, George and Efthymoula: I can't stand her; gives me the creeps. She wants to come to America for a month! Θεός φυλάξει! Walked in Panorama. George melancholy and distraught because of Andreas, and rightfully so. Told me he feels totally powerless. All he can do is suffer silently. Actually, Andreas took his first exam and even talked a little afterwards. Maybe the whole thing will end on the 26th, after the last exam. If not, there's real trouble ahead. For the moment, a psychiatrist advised George to humor the boy and not pester him about eating, talking, etc.—my advice, too.

Monday, June 8, 1987

George telephoned. Had terrible pains all night. Couldn't sleep. Does he have an ulcer? That boy is destroying him. Doctor gave him a sedative.

Daphne called. She, Phil, and Greg are in a swell villa on Poros, taking side trips to Hydra, Galata, etc. She's speaking lots of Greek and getting to know people already. How nice!

Toula and Stavros came, and we did a very strange thing for Greece: stayed home. Sat on the balcony and talked from 9:00 until 1:00 a.m.

Tuesday, June 9, 1987

George frantic. Convinced that Andreas is going to commit suicide. Efthymoula went to Athens to speak to the girlfriend of five years' standing whose defection may be the major cause of Andreas's depression. George himself will go again today to the psychiatrist. Everyone feels helpless.

Walked to Tiffany's to have supper with Odysseas and Eleni. On the way saw a sad sight. Children here, after their exams, tear up their textbooks and scatter the pages in the street. I saw scattered everywhere half-pages from Homer's Odyssey, the Kazantzakis-Kakridis translation. Kakridis was so happy that his book was being used. But do students value Homer??

Sore throat has returned.

Wednesday, June 10, 1987

Girlfriend telephoned Andreas. She's coming tomorrow. Andreas resurrected. Shaved, showed interest in European basketball championships. Apparently he drove the girl away by demanding she be subservient. He plays the agha and wants a harem. . . . Dia called. How I enjoy talking to her! Was just ready to write on Heidegger and Kazantzakis when George and Efthymoula came. Alas! Sat in pizza place on a main street. Deafening noise from traffic and youths celebrating Greece's entry into the quarter finals in basketball. Urbanized Greece can be a nightmare, especially in summer, when you sit outside.

Thursday, June 11, 1987

I think we're both ready to go home. Chrysanthi unconsciously answers me in English when I speak Greek. I'm slowed down by the heat and humidity. No breeze these days. Went early to A.Π.Θ. Central Library to finish with the Who's Who. Found the article that Kazantzakis read with such amazement on Heidegger, and by accident a useful article by George Theotokas explaining why Σπύρος Μελάς was such a bastard. Am trying to apply phenomenological ontology to the Odyssey to prove that it's not nihilistic. Good luck! . . . Evening: Mimis and Aglaïa Lypourlis plus Ξενοφών και Μαρία Κοκόλης. A good party. Lively talk and lots of food, even ice cream. Learned more about the ins and outs of dealing with a Ministry of Education, which people in Mimis's position need to do constantly. Turns out that Κοκόλης has been in Melbourne. He's a friend of John Burke's. He's lively and cultivated. They say that the group in Athens is insufferable. Toadies, crypto-καθαρευουσιάνοι, etc. When they were consulted by Tritsis about reintroducing ancient Greek into the gymnasium, they of course agreed, with histrionic approbation: Κύριε Υπουργέ, γράφετε ιστορία! Mimis thinks the whole plan insane. The arguments are exactly the same as used by Kazantzakis in 1909 or 1910. We go round in circles.

Friday, June 12, 1987

Keith Dickey, a former student of mine and Chrysanthi's, now doing a Ph.D. in classical archeology at Bryn Mawr, came to lunch with his exquisite Greek girlfriend, Natalia, who graduated Thessaloniki in archeology and now is also at Bryn Mawr. Why can't Alec and Leander find girls like this? That special Greek beauty. Quiet; lots of personality. Keith will be Jerry Rutter's assistant at the digs in Nemea.

Evening. I watched the whole of Greece vs. Yugoslavia in the semifinals of the Euro basket. Greece in early lead, then Yugoslavia ten points ahead at the half, then Greece crept up, two points difference two points ahead, then seven, and they won! Pandemonium. Θρίαμβος! Αποθέωση! shouted the announcer. Everyone in Greece was watching on TV, apparently. Every time Greece sunk a basket huge shouts resounded down Βιζύης-Βύζαντος. City deserted; no traffic. But what bad sports the audience in the stadium is: booed and hissed every time Yugoslavia got the ball. Afterwards the whole city poured out into the streets, including me, and Chrysanthi, who was at Vouli's. We met at the Kamára.

Streams of traffic in both directions on Egnatia all horns ablaze, flags waving from windows. Scooters buzzing with drivers draped in Greek flag, horns blasting. Groups of youths singing cheers off key. Poor little Greece! So insignificant on the world scene, and everyone knows it. So the semifinals in Euro basket are a huge psychodrama counteracting inferiority. Δεν είμαστε μια υπερδύναμη, είπε ένας παίχτης ύστερα, σε συνέντευση, αλλά νά: βάλαμε κάτω τις υπερδυνάμεις. I can begin to understand now what Greece must have been like during the Αλβανικά. That “electricity” that everyone writes about.

Something else in the Greek character, connected I suppose with this same feeling of inferiority: the inability to admit a fault, even an inconsequential one; the way it is covered by evasion. Vouli had invited us both tonight, but then something came up and she had to go elsewhere at 9:00 o'clock, meaning that Chrysanthi could go early but that I couldn't go after my work. When we spoke on the telephone, Vouli couldn't tell me this straightforwardly: θα τηλεφωνηθούμε, etc. The same with the museum at Varvari: no one, including Anemoyannis, said outright that there were no archives. Instead: you'll have to get permission from Patroklos Stavrou. And Stavrou: “You're seeking too much,” shifting the blame to me. Chrysanthi does the same all the time. I think it's a national character trait.

Saturday, June 13, 1987

Very very hot. No breeze. Lots of humidity. Getting close to the end of the Odyssey chapter. With luck will finish tomorrow. . . . In the evening went to Anatolia College (how beautiful!) to a barbecue, invited by Γιάννης Κολιόπουλος and his wife; she works at the American Center library. Lots of professors from the Φιλοσοφική Σχολή—historians, philosophers. McGrews. American girl married to Professor Kazazis; Ted Couloumbis's wife. Most had studied in the U.S. As Koliopoulos said, Salonika is small, and we're able to see our friends all the time. It seems like a circle of interesting and interested intellectuals. At my table, at any rate, the conversation was unforced, about ideas, facts, analysis. Fun! And I can do this now in Greek without strain, provided people speak clearly and don't lapse into the half-pronounced words of the “inner circle” language. Fortunately, I've been keeping a little notebook in which I write down new vocabulary. Invariably when I add a word, I hear it a day or two later, and of course then recognize and understand it. Tonight that happened with επενδύσεις. Also, I was able to use επέτειος correctly, with a feminine article.

Sunday, June 14, 1987

In the morning, finished my Odyssey chapter. 202 A4 pages. This leaves only chapter 1, and volume 1 will be ready. Started revising. So far so good: it's logical. In the afternoon, Eurobasket finals between Greece and the USSR. An extraordinary game. Greece behind near the end, in the last minute tied the score. The Soviets scored a basket with one second to go, but this was ruled out because of a foul. So they went into overtime. Again the Soviets led until just near the end, when the Greeks tied the score again. With 36 seconds to go, a Greek was fouled. Everything then depended on him. He sank both shots! They won! The miracle-worker was Nick Gallis, born in New Jersey! Also the giant Φασούλας, so good on the rebounds. His Russian counterpart, 7 feet 2 inches high, looked like an overgrown caveman. As the announcer kept repeating, it was David against Goliath, a nation with 8½ million against one with 250 million (at least). Papandreou and Sartzetakis were there; they hugged and kissed all the players afterwards. Yannakis, the captain, raised the bowl high in triumph after it was awarded, and kissed it. The crowd ecstatic. Dancing in Omonoia Square. . . . Little Greece had won its place on an international scale. . . . Strange: when America placed a man on the moon, no one went out into the streets to celebrate.

Monday, June 15, 1987

Working on the second draft. Very slow now. Dimitris Doutsis brought me an article of his to vet. Nice letter from Kimon Friar, gloating because a 31-year-old (male) has agreed to be his "secretary." The old goat! Περίπατο στην παραλία το βράδυ με το Γεώργιο και την Ευθυμούλα. Andreas threw all his poetry into the trash. His girlfriend came, which perked him up a bit, but he scarcely paid attention to her. George's great uneasiness continues.

Tuesday, June 16, 1987

Beastly hot all day. How to work? But I'm up to page 93 on the second reading. To supper in Panorama with Dimitris and Ruth Gounelas. Sweet child: Angelica. He's hoping to write on Kazantzakis's existentialism in Κωμωδία. I want to send him the Heideggerian analysis I've been doing of the Odyssey. Talked about the interesting errors in the Greek translation of Joyce's Ulysses.

Wednesday, June 17, 1987

Hooray! The heat wave is over. This morning: breeze. Thermometer down to 25° C. . . . Norman Gilbertson invited us for dinner at the Χάρκας fish tavern in Νέα Σμύρνη, with Vouli. And Glen Grant and his wife Gail. Glen is on the Farm School board and heading the search for Bruce's successor. Also was for five years an assistant to Mickey Heyman at Berkeley. Very small world. They've excluded Greek-Americans (unofficially) from consideration because they want someone who can appeal to the Protestant establishment that has always been the schools' philanthropic base in the U.S. Norman is charming. Runs a health-food store in Brussels. . . . Duncan Rice, dean at NYU, wrote about the Onassis Center. I recommended Speros Vryonis and Mike Keeley for the directorship.

Thursday, June 18, 1987

Parties continue. To Titika and Bill McGrew's for dinner with Bill and Elizabeth McNeill. How nice to see them again after our work together on JMGS! Also Koliopoulou, Ted Couloumbis and wife, and a Mr. ?, a trustee of Anatolia. Ted is flourishing in Salonika. McNeill is writing a biography of Arnold Toynbee and is on the Christopher Columbus 500 anniversary celebration commission, which already has Italian- and Spanish-Americans squabbling. Thankfully no one is trying to claim CC was a Greek! Bill explained Toynbee's sudden rise to fame. The agent was Henry Luce, who in the 1940s felt that Toynbee's view of history explained why the twentieth century was "destined" to be the American century. So he put him on the cover of Time, etc., and that started the snowball rolling. Then a few decades later Toynbee caught on in Japan because the conservatives found him the only possible answer to Marxism. Bill wasn't much interested in my latest Toynbee enthusiasm: Toynbee's claim that the West's ecological mess derives from Judeo-Christianity and therefore we should return to Paganism. His hero: Gemistos Plethon. And mine! The problem with Plethon, says Bill, i.e., the problem for a historian, is that his major work was destroyed. Bill did write about him in his book on Venice, however. . . . Elizabeth, it turns out, was in the first USIS team in Greece, in November 1944, and had to be shipped back to Egypt during the Δεκεμβριανά. Bill was here then, right after liberation, when the αντάρτες were everywhere in Salonika wearing German uniforms with the Nazi insignia ripped off. He remembers Harold Reed, too.

Friday, June 19, 1987

Dinner again. Λένα και Αντώνης Δασκόπουλος, parents of our Dartmouth student, Δημήτρης. Pleasant. Caviar, shrimp, the works! Nice prelude with their sister and brother-in-law. She'd heard my radio interview while riding in a taxi. A Κύριος Αγάπης there; math teacher at Anatolia. Andonis held forth on how awful the Soviet Union is. And it does seem awful from such stories. At the end, very sincerely, they told us how touched and pleased they were to get to know us because for them we represented the care and level of culture to which they had sent their son. How nice! I returned the complement: we see lovely children with good values, good training, etc., and rarely get to know the parents and family environment that produced them. They were touched.

Saturday, June 20, 1987

Amazingly, we went nowhere. I even read a little after supper. Αγαθόν το εξομολογείσθαι, a journalistic collection of the writings of Γιάννης Τσαρούχης on art and architecture. He's rather good on neoclassic houses and the horror of contemporary Athens and Piraeus, which he rightly attributes not to government neglect but to the greed and philistinism of the άρχουσα τάξη. Vouli gave me the book. Stylianos telephoned from Athens. Says that the Orthodox-Catholic dialogue went well this year. Met someone who'd heard my lecture in Chicago. We'll see him on June 30.

Sunday, June 21, 1987

Telephoned Mother. All's well. Telephoned farm. Leander is visiting James McBride but Tod Angstrom answered, a friend from Oberlin days. Leander goes to Kinhaven tomorrow. I reached page 189 on the second draft. George and Efthymoula came at night but there was a μπόρα—rained cats and dogs and we didn't go anywhere. She's afraid of getting her hair wet. George thinks that Archbishop Iakovos is conspiring with Mitsotakis and King Constantine and the Turks to have himself elevated to the Patriarchate. And that if Mitsotakis is elected he'll restore the monarchy. Θα δούμε . . . Ο Στυλιανός has an article in Βήμα about the Junta and everything else, very journalistic. Why do good minds prostitute themselves? Chrysanthi began packing. A good sign.

Why is George so furious at all “fascists,” δεξιοί, etc.? I think it’s maybe because he of course fought on the side of the δεξιοί in the civil war while others took to the mountains first in the resistance and then in the εμφύλιο. All this “black-baiting” is perhaps an unconscious compensation now for that guilt. All his real values are totally bourgeois, at least as evidenced outwardly by his apartment, the way he raised his children, etc. Or perhaps this is all his caving in to Efthymoula.

Monday, June 22, 1987

Hooray! Finished the second draft. We’ll put it on the computer now, in America, and see.

Lola came in the morning. George telephoned. They spoke, and soon a furious argument blew up. What a family! The central villain seems to be Efthymoula, who is an egotistical snob who has ruined George’s life and poisoned the family relations. Everyone views her children’s behavior as nemesis she well deserves, but why should George suffer too? Chrysanthi explained all this at length, and also disputed my analysis of George’s “black-baiting,” saying it has more to do with Efthymoula: he can’t hit out at her, so . . . Also, during the war he was suspected by the king’s forces and actually imprisoned, never given a gun, etc. The problem is that Efthymoula considers Odysseas and Eleni peasants and won’t speak to them. Odd, because Eleni is a real aristocrat compared to Efthymoula. The problem is, you can’t talk to her. She knows everything in advance; she doesn’t listen, doesn’t discuss. Her children are just like her.

Read and vetted Dimitris Doutsis’s article on Henry Miller’s view of Greece, which JMGS rejected—correctly.

To Panorama with Zisis and Ritsa. Their son won δρ 36,000,000 in the λαχείο, and has treated them to a trip to Singapore.

Tuesday, June 23, 1987

Alec telephoned from Athens at 7:00 a.m. Chrysanthi went to the airport to meet him. He arrived looking wonderful, loaded with two violins (the second delivered into his hands at Jakarta airport by the young violin-maker who gave it to him as a gift). Spent three or four days in Bangkok and environs with a girlfriend (!), and three or four days in Singapore, before arriving here. Full of anecdotes and information about life in the East. Great respect for Buddhism in Thailand, how all the youths shave their heads and beg for three months while receiving instructions in their religion. Loves the quiet of the East. People don't shout. We talked continually all day exclusively in Greek (he does so well!). Odysseus came. Then George and Efthymoula, and we all went out to Πλατεία Ναβαρίνο. But we started το μεσημέρι just Alec, us, and Vouli at Tiffany's.

Wednesday, June 24, 1987

Alec: talk talk talk. How good that I finished my Odyssey chapter! This week will be a vacation, more or less. . . . Started reading the 562 letters to Γιαννίδη, Δραγούμη, Εφταλιώτης, Παλαμάς, Πάλλης, Ταγκόπουλος, Ψυχάρης, in order to write a review. Βράδυ: στο Χάρκας ψαροταβέρνα by the sea with George and Efthymoula and their friends Τούλης και Μανώ Δημητριάδης, who'll come to America with them. Planned the dates and itinerary of their trip: mid-September. God help us! . . . To the αγορά in the morning with Kostas to wholesale and retail jewelers to buy an anniversary present for Chrysanthi. Very greasy people.

Thursday, July 25, 1987

Mailed presents to seven people: copies of my books. Τελειώνουμε. Takis took Alec στα μπουζούκια το βράδυ. Returned at 4:00 a.m. Odysseas came to share last meal; he goes to Καρπονήσι later today. Was supposed to get a diploma as participant in the αντίσταση ως παρτισιάνος tomorrow, but the ceremony was postponed until July. Too bad. We'd planned to go, even though George warned me not to, since, he said, the CIA would be everywhere and they'd know I was there. (Sideline: in Greece, Archbishop Iakovos is known as ΣΙΑΚΟΝΟΣ, i.e., CIAΚΟΝΟΣ.) Odysseas gave Chrysanthi δρ 10,000—insisted—to buy herself a present. I learned he'd given Daphne 5,000. Τι να κάνουμε; Έτσι I had to reveal my secret necklace, in case she wanted to exchange it for something more expensive.

Spent the evening with Ξενοφάντας και Μαρία Κοκόλης at their apartment and then at Πλατεία Ναβαρίνο. Maria presented me with yet another Kazantzakis letter, a note to Manolis Triandafyllidis re: Σύλλογος Δημοτικιστών ο Σολωμός. Their lovely daughter, Alexandra, age 13. As Henry Miller says (in Doutis's article, which I vetted the other day), Greek women have “something”: an old world or even primitive γοητεία that new world types lack completely. Little Alexandra was 100% feminine already, yet also a budding intellectual. Talked four hours non-stop without difficulty. Great Greece! We’ll miss it. But a year here and I’d weigh 175. Food and socializing go together. Gypsy boys played clarion and drum: haunting oriental melodies. We walked home and fell exhausted into bed at 1:00 a.m.

Friday, June 26, 1987

Long, nice talk with Alec in the morning. He’s open and communicative about his alopecia, but no one knows what to do, really. By last February he had grown lots of hair, but then it all fell out again. . . . In the afternoon, went to the circus. Italian. Elephants, lion-tiger tamer, chimps, trained dogs, jugglers, acrobats galore, stunts on horseback, beautiful half-naked women on trapezes. Passatempo, grilled corn on the cob. Audience of children, parents, παππούδες. Then Alec went to Dimitris and Tilda. She was “tired,” so the two men went out together and ate κοκορέτσι. Chrysanthi and I went to Eleni Tsantsanoglou. Moullas, Aglaïa, Κυπ. Τσαντσάνογλου (classics). Moullas told me about Ritsos’s revisions: the poems we see in Ποιήματα are commonly revised versions of the original publications, but always have the dates only of the original publications. Scholars beware! To bed at 2:00 a.m.

Saturday, June 27, 1987

Up at 7:00 a.m. Chrysanthi to “facial treatment.” Alec and Takis to Halkidiki: μπάνιο. Finished review of the demoticists’ letters. In the evening: to Θέατρο Δάσος to see an epitheorisi with George and Efthymoula: Σκουπίδια. Squirmed on the concrete seat for 3½ hours. Μέτριο πολύ. Satire of working class μυσέρια in Athens. After Flanders and Swann, nothing pleases any more. George confided what has been obvious all along: that he doesn’t want to come to America in September, really, because of Andreas. Πολύ σωστά. Said the trip is in fulfillment of what his parents never did: travel to see how their daughter lives. Revealed that the other couple really aren’t his friends. The man is δεξιός, κ.τ.λ. Λυπηρό. The other day when Odysseas was here with George and told about the ceremony of award for being a partisan, George’s immediate response was, “Why didn’t they invite me?” I think he is inventing his past. . . . Dimitris telephoned to invite us for lunch tomorrow with Tilda, after 3½ months. We refused. Feeling strange about the trip home on Wednesday. Will we adjust back to American life? Of course we will—and quickly. That is our way. Yet we really have assumed different bodily and psychical rhythms (such as eating supper at 11:30 p.m., like tonight).

Sunday, June 28, 1987

Re-read my “Orestes’ Cow” article and liked it. Carman Karka wants it for reprinting in a journal issue devoted to Ritsos. I’ll put it on the computer this summer. Re-read the poem itself partially on the bus to Αγία Τριάδα. Waterfront still rather nice although they say the sea is polluted. Children swimming; very few adults. Lunch with Kostas, Lola, Nikos, and Joanna, Nikos’s cousin, a first-year student in forestry and ecology. Goodbyes. Interlude of a few hours, then out for pizza with George and Efthymoula, Dimitris, and Tilda. She actually was pleasant. Very sophisticated, but stuck-up. Goodbyes. We’re disengaging. Alec returned late, after a weekend of Halkidiki with Takis, Stavros, and Toula. I started looking at Chapter 1 of my Kazantzakis and Politics—the old Panichas article, which has to be joined now with the Nietzsche article plus an explanation of Bergson, etc.

Monday, June 29, 1987

Started revising the Panichas article, which will become Chapter 1 of my Volume 1. Slow going. I’m removing all the excessive adjectives. Ammerman and Doutsis called to say goodbye. Doutsis very appreciative regarding my vetting of his Henry Miller article. Είναι η μέρα των Αγίων Παύλου και Πέτρου. Lola brought a present. Κυρά Κούλα τηλεφώνησε Χρόνια πολλά. Long talk with Κα Θεοδώρα, who liked my Kazantzakis pamphlet. Maria Kokoli telephoned with more data for Kazantzakis’s note to Triandafyllidis. Alec spent the evening with Nikos. I met Chrysanthi at the Kamára. Πιναϊρή with Lola and Kostas. Nine telephone calls in the evening while I was trying to work.

Tuesday, June 30, 1987

Chrysanthi ready to return to the U.S. after spending two hours in the bank because they didn’t have any money. (We wanted to give Alec drachmas; he’s going to fly to Iraklio to spend a few days with Annie Camp and Jacques Martin.) . . . Nice evening, the final one, with Vouli and Στυλιανός Χαρκιανάκης at Χάρκας Ψαροταβέρνα. Stylianos surprised us by his enthusiasm for the Turks. What progress, diplomatic cleverness (playing U.S. off against Russia), good manners, etc. He told us about the Orthodox-Catholic dialogue, which went well this year. The basis agreed upon is that Christ's churches are like the different persons—υποστάσεις—of the Triune Monada that is God: equally different yet at the same time mysteriously all the same, and part of God. The problem, however, is: once you've gotten this far, how can you justify the pope? They'll worry about that next year. He is delighted with the theological school that is now operating in Sydney. Also, his great pleasure, he says, is in convincing couples bound on divorce to try living together again. It's like building a new church, he says. The sad news is the politicization of the Greek programs in the universities in Australia. (So what else is new?!) As for Greece itself, he feels that it is in deep crisis spiritually, morally, not to mention economically. Too rapid urbanization and "modernization," I suggested. We also talked about Kazantzakis's nihilism or non-nihilism; he agreed that Prevelakis overstated the case but I think he still sides with Prevelakis. And of course we talked about mutual friends in Australia and here. A nice final evening.

Wednesday, July 1, 1987

Thessaloniki-Frankfort-NYC-Boston

Stavros took us to the airport in his father's pick-up. Waited an hour on line before Olympic employees showed up. George, Efthymoula, Toula, Alec, Vouli came to say goodbye. George very low; told Chrysanthi he had a feeling he'd never see her again. And he certainly won't come to the U.S. in September because of Andreas. He also once watched Alec and me talking as "friends" and told Chrysanthi that he never had that pleasure with his children. Sad. . . . Flight one hour late. Chaotic. No reserved seats. Sit wherever you want. Crew mute, robot-like, incommunicative. Αίσχος. Arrived Frankfort late. PanAm said we'd have to stand by. Overbooking. We waited and waited; at the last moment were allowed to board, placed in business class and offered a glass of champagne. OK! Very tired. I brought work to do, but no appetite. However, it was nice to get out of Greece. Spoiled on the way back: lobster or filet mignon for dinner. Wide seats; smiling hostesses. Star Trek movie, a brilliant satire on American life. More chaos at JFK but we finally got to our small prop-driven plane for Boston, together with fourteen teenagers from Finland, all smiling and talkative (Leander had to meet the melancholy type). Stifling heat. Daphne at the airport. Lovely. Upbeat. We deposited our luggage at the Friends Center, saw Kesaya, who's finally graduated from Harvard Divinity School. Went off for a late supper on Church Street. What a contrast between Cambridge and Greece! Everything is so neat, manicured, ordered. Daphne in fine form. Exhausted; to bed about 6:00 a.m. body-time.

July 2, 1987

Cambridge–Hanover

Croissants with Daphne and Lori in their apartment on Frost Street. Then to Hanover in a rental car. Coffee at Hojos in Manchester. Nice to reestablish the old rituals. Found Andy Rangell in our house, which doesn't look too awful. Attended to necessities: picking up tapes at UPNE; bank; checking ORC copy at registrar's; post office, etc. Then to Yiayia and Pappou. Mother overjoyed to see us. Pappous looking the same, reasonably alert, but very short attention span. Supper in Lander's. Slept at the Friends Meeting. Hugh and Rhea have adopted twins about six weeks old.

July 3, 1987

Hanover

Woke at 5:00 a.m. Still on the old schedule, body-time. Morning in the office. Mail. Saw Darrel, Brenda. Lunch at the Greens with Mother. All the familiar faces. Life goes on. We planned to take Mother out for dinner for her 60th anniversary, but she suggested wheeling Pappou into her apartment and bringing Chinese food in. This was a great success. Pappous ate with relish and was patient.

July 4, 1987

to Riparius

Saw deer grazing by my office as we arrived. Everything looking good, thanks to Leander. Piano plays! How strange to be here after Greece! Fran, Irv, Al, and Mary came in the afternoon and we went there for supper. It's started. We skipped the fireworks.

July 5, 1987

Al and I played flute and piano. Bach. He's getting better and better; I'm getting worse and worse. Can no longer blame the piano for missed notes. I'm getting my office set up. Must start tomorrow revising the Scribner's version of my Kazantzakis pamphlet, which has been copy-edited to death, scholastically.

Tuesday, July 7, 1987

Visit from Art and Chris with little Arthur. Art is involved in town politics, opposing James Mead's autocratic methods. A citizens' group now attends Town Board meetings. Our taxes went up 130%! Art foresees condominium developments everywhere, soaring land prices, etc. Waddell Road will probably be widened and paved. We've had 37 years of peace, but how many more? All because of skiing. North Creek is about to become a huge ski center.

Wednesday, July 8, 1987

Working very poorly. Hot. Muggy. Tired. Haven't got a routine yet. I worked so remarkably well in Greece. But the new routine will come. The Kazantzakis Scribner's revision is torture.

Very bad news today: Noye Johnson has cancer of the prostate and elsewhere. Bad. Undergoing chemotherapy. This is why I'm so eager to publish my Kazantzakis book. After age 50 we all live on sufferance.

As solace, went to Saratoga to the ballet: Swan Lake, Ravel Piano Concerto, Fanfare (Britten's child's guide to the orchestra). Marvelous sets and costumes. Dancing always professional, but never really exciting. Mel and Herb Goertz were sitting directly in front of us. She's now a peace activist.

Thursday, July 9, 1987

Finished the damned Scribner MS except for the bibliography and some checking of facts. 90+ degrees. Oppressive. I went for my first swim in the pond. Supper with Shapiros. Chrysanthi using us as guinea pigs for the new dishes she learned in Greece. But they don't taste the same here.

Saturday, July 11, 1987

Jacques and Hilda Grunblatt for supper. Jacques' memoirs of the Spanish Civil War are anthologized, excerpts only, in a memorial volume. Not very literary, I'm afraid, but they document what happened. It's a miracle he's alive: he survived the war, then he escaped from the internment camp in France (where the Nazis would have found him otherwise), then he managed to get out of Vichy France via Casablanca. Said that the real reason behind the swimming pond fiasco in North Creek was Sterling Goodspeed's greed. Without the pond, ORDA must draw water in a pipeline on land that Goodspeed sold to them. Son Jesse is now in Kenya for two years.

Sunday, July 12, 1987

Visit from Sherman Frasier—toothless, high blood pressure, disabled, but chipper. I always find him intelligent and sensitive. He spoke of the beauty of Adirondack views: mountains and valleys, color in the fall. Red Barden is dead; Sherman's colored neighbor is dead. But Freddie is back in the area, also disabled, living on the corner of Route 9 and the Igernia Road. We remembered the Waddell Farm before the house burned down. Sherm lived for a while in the red blacksmith's shop before that collapsed. What a beautiful place! Now it's a tangled jungle.

Monday, July 13, 1987

Heat continues. 90 and 95 and even 100 in the sun. Humidity. I've been pruning the yellow birch at my office. Prune—orange shellac—tar. A healthy new oak is thriving in back of the lean-to. Heard a deer in the woods. Snorting and then galloping; sounded like a horse. Swimming every day in this heat. The first day I could hardly do two strokes. Each day more. Water warm: like a bathtub. Working on 1st chapter. Expanding the Panichas piece. Found the typescript for that, dated Riparius 1968. Nineteen years ago. And I'm still working on the same damned stuff. Chrysanthi is beginning to index the letters; I think she can manage that.

Visit from three men from Niagara Mohawk re: the 115 kv power line. Yes, it's coming through. They're approaching Chestertown at the moment. Will be working here next fall and winter. Told me that the magnetic field for 115 kv is only two feet; no danger. I worry that they'll cut down all the trees along the road and spoil it.

After a few days' problem, I've established the new routine. Work 8:00 or 8:30 to 1:00; light lunch; nap to 2:30; Work until 5:30 (6:00, 6:30); change clothes; farm work until 7:30; swim; supper at 8:00; computer 9:00–10:30; TLS or something until midnight; BBC news; bed.

Tuesday, July 14, 1987

To the Lake George Opera. Rigoletto. Superbly done. We last saw it in Melbourne. Harry Teahan is still the timpanist. He offered complimentary tickets for the Mikado. Chinese dinner with the Shapiros beforehand. Very pleasant. We are beginning to live here, too, like Greeks!

Friday, July 17, 1987

Drove to Hanover last night and slept in Friends Meeting. Spent most of the day at a terminal in Baker Library typing in corrections to my introductory chapter for volume 1. Lunch with Mother and Maisie Wilson at the Greens. Visit to Father in the afternoon. He's more alert than ever, beginning to listen to "Newsweek" again, and to music. Kept asking me "How is our financial condition?" Supper at Dee and Noye's with Trix and Chuck. Noye has cancer: prostate, shoulder. But he was in good spirits, having heard today that it's not in the bone marrow. Going to special cure in Quebec next week. The evening was not at all lugubrious. We had champagne and drank to our anniversary. I gave Chrysanthi the necklace and medallion I'd purchased, with Kostas's help, in Greece.

Saturday, July 18, 1987

Weston, Vermont

To Kinhaven with Chrysanthi and Mother. Board meeting in the morning. George Goodwin wants me to be president but is willing to wait one year. The purchase agreement has been signed: $500,000. After fifteen years' struggle. I've brought Paula Xanthopoulou and Jimmy Yannatos onto the board. Reunion with Leander. As though we'd never been separated. Nice nap on the grass on the afternoon. Then to Ike Patch's rebuilt house for trustees' dinner. Old faces: Mr. Rudolph, Mr. Smith, all the Dushkin children. All previous trustees were invited. Message from the governor, etc. Ike has a fairy castle in the woods, surrounded by nature trails of his own making. Memorial concert afterwards for David Dushkin. Leander played a Bach sarabande and a Chopin nocturne, very well. (I received many compliments.) Fauré Requiem somehow dead. Some of DD's own compositions played; like Bartok mixed with Rachmaninoff. Two pieces by Dorothy Dushkin, worse than mediocre. But the general spirit very peaceful, in keeping with DD's spirit.

Sunday, July 19, 1987

Lovely breakfast at the Blue Gentian, as always. Board meeting in the morning, mostly on question of the proposed Richter TV film. Picnic lunch for all the guests. Children's concert. Orchestra played Shostakovich's Festival Overture very effectively. My committee's recommendations: Executive Secretary and Development Secretary have been implemented, with noticeable improvement. Good supper with Leander afterwards. He's looking forward to living with Alec in Philadelphia.

Monday, July 20, 1987

Finished putting Chapter 1 on the computer. Unexpected lunch with Ned Perrin and Nardi Champion. I seem to be the only one who resents Dartmouth's award of honorary degrees to David McLaughlin and his wife Judy. Am I that vindictive? Ned approved heartily. Drove home in time for Chrysanthi to go folk dancing in Wevertown.

Tuesday, July 21, 1987

Riparius

Terribly hot again. Our newly painted kitchen floor looks splendid. Supper with Shapiros again, this time at George's Restaurant, Monument Square, Glens Falls. Then Mikado. First time I'd seen it. Very funny, with topical emendations in "I've got a little list . . ."

Wednesday, July 22, 1987

Chrysanthi continues to make experimental meals at the Shapiros'. Then slides of Budapest and Prague and the ones Κυρά Κούλα made for us in Greece. I spent the day typing my "Orestes' Cow" article into the Macintosh for Carman Karka, who's going to publish it in The Charioteer. Late at night Alec called from Philadelphia. So now we're all home. He met Jacques and Annie in Crete as scheduled, and stayed in a mountain village. Had a fine time in Paris. Changes in Friends Central: Tom Wood is leaving. No sense yet of what happened.

Thursday, July 23, 1987

Hard to get back to Kazantzakis. I've discovered so much that was left out of the introductory chapter. How to interleaf it all is a problem. The next big task is to write the section in Chapter 2 about Kazantzakis and Bergson. Another huge topic. Where to begin? Where to end?

Saturday, August 1, 1987

Riparius, Weston

Yesterday I read Allan Bloom's The Closing of the American Mind in one sitting, and today Privileged Information by Frank Armani and Tom Alibrandi. Two books in two days—in the evening, after 7–8 hours writing my Bergson chapter, which, happily, I finished today in first draft. Bloom's was recommended by Irv Shapiro. It's an analysis of what's wrong with the university and with American culture, from a conservative position. Recommends Great Books! Standing up to universities with demands, etc. Haute vulgarization. He's always invoking Plato, Locke, Mill, etc., which is bound to impress somebody. Privileged Information was much better: a novelistic account of the Gerrow case. Armani is the defense lawyer appointed by the court. I hadn't realized what had happened. He found out from Gerrow where the bodies of Petz and the other girl were, and actually found the bodies, Petz's down an air shaft in Mineville, but withheld the information because of the rule of confidentiality between lawyer and client. For this he was (later) vilified by the public, press, colleagues, threatened with disbarment, etc. A terrible business; impossible dilemma. He describes an interview with Mrs. Petz in which, though already knowing the girl was dead, and her body decomposing in the air shaft, he had to deny any knowledge. I remember the same Mr. Petz driving up to our farm, speaking to me and then breaking into tears, not to mention the search for her body here along Waddell Road with helicopters, dogs, and squads of men tramping each square yard of ground. Happily, Waddell Road is not mentioned by name; it's just "a country road near Wevertown where he tied Porter to a tree and stabbed him to death." Lots more that I remember is well evoked: the blood lust of the public, people leaving the area or else arming themselves, the consternation during the ten days or so when he eluded the State Police in the woods around Speculator. It all happened in 1973, fourteen years ago. I, of course, was the one who discovered Porter's car parked on Waddell Road and reported it to the police, which led to the discovery of his murder. I remember Yiayia and Pappous were here and when I drove them out to take them to the bus at Pottersville the road was swarming with State troopers. What a time! In any case, Armani, though despising his client, tried to uphold the rules of the legal system and ended up with a heart attack.

Drove to Weston in the afternoon. Met Daphne, Lori Buseck, and Alec at the Blue Gentian. Nice supper, good talk, in Londonderry. Alec related all his adventures in Crete and France. When he went to Βαρβάροι to the Kazantzakis museum he arrived at 1:00 p.m. just as it was closing. He told the woman turning the key (it was Τίτικα Σακλαμπάνη) that he was Peter Bien's son and had come all that way to see the museum, whereupon she threw her arms around him, turned on all the lights again, and told him to take his time. Nice!

After dinner: to Kinhaven staff concert. Leander did the Beethoven Archduke Trio. So sensitively. I love listening to music more at Kinhaven than anywhere else. Nice talks with Ignat Solzhenitsyn, who's about to go off to study in London, and with the Van Winckles. Jerry Bidlack came over and we sat together for a while. I told him that Lelah should be cast as Katisha in the Mikado.

Sunday, August 2, 1987

Weston-Riparius

Relaxing morning at the Blue Gentian pool reading TLS, including a good piece on A. J. Ayer that I can use in my Bergson chapter. Daphne and Lori went back to Boston. Lunch with Alec and Leander, who'll be living together in Bryn Mawr next year and are very pleased. James McBride and his jazz group are playing tonight at Kinhaven at Leander's invitation, but we drove back to Terpni in the afternoon.

August 18, 1987

I was hit in the face by a bat's wing, in the house. It was soft, even soothing. Not at all repulsive.

Alec and I replaced the leathers in the pump, stupidly applying rust remover to the joints in the cylinder. So now we have rust remover in our drinking water.

August 24, 1987

Sent water to Queensbury for chemical analysis. It's full of coliform bacteria and unfit for drinking. Thus the diarrhea we've been having. What to do next?

August 26, 1987

On direction from the State Department of Health, treated well with Clorox to disinfect it, pumping for half an hour and recycling the water into the well, to mix the chlorine. It's probably a dead mouse or frog, or worse, unless it's the dry well leaking into the well. Drinking water from Shapiros and Perrymans.

Alec and Leander are working on Alec's cabin. Alec built a fine front door, and we've put in a lock. They also finished the gables, board and batten.

Leander's gotten a job at Moravian College as well as at Lehigh. And for this semester he will sub for the "artist in residence," getting all the best students. He and Alec will share a house in Bryn Mawr.

August 27, 1987

Jerry and Rosine Gardner for supper. He's got a job teaching French in Moriah in Essex County and is leaving North Creek. They hope to sell the newspaper. Rosine is a compulsive talker, very tiresome.

Friday, August 28, 1987

Nice dinner at Smith's with the boys and the Shapiros. Leander's last night. He leaves tomorrow and Alec on Sunday. And: I finished re-reading chapters 3 to 7 of volume 1 of my book, thus completing everything I'd hoped to do this summer, at the price of no mowing, no projects. Now it all has to be corrected on the Kiewit computer. I've also got all 200 pages of Chapter 8, written in Greece, on the Macintosh now, ready to transfer to Kiewit. By the end of September I should have the MS in the mail.

Saturday, August 29, 1987

Marty Cooper, lumberman from Chestertown, came and we walked through the woods. He identified a tree I'd always wondered about: whistle wood. It's the small tree with candy-striped bark and huge leaves. Worthless. We didn't see much timber, but Marty will return and walk off the logging roads next time to see if we're ready for cutting.

For supper, Alec's friend from Philadelphia and his new wife: Bob and Lori. Bob is the auto mechanic who has helped Alec so much. They're renting the Perrymans' flat in Schroon Lake. Chris and Art came for desert (plum tart, from our tree, which suddenly revived this year and produced); then we all drove to Schroon. Dismal flat, but right on the lake, which is glorious.

Sunday, August 30, 1987

Alec left in the morning. We're closing up. Very easy this year. No tractor to worry about. Started reading Jay Parini's novel, The Patch Boys. I like its humor, but some of the chapters are mere fillers, and tedious. Jay and Devon and Will and Oliver spent an overnight with us about two weeks ago; very pleasant. Jay and I went swimming at 11:00 p.m. in the dark; haven't done that in ages. His next novel is going to treat Tolstoy's last year, when he left his estate and finally died in a railway station. Using the numerous diaries that record the last year from, obviously, different perspectives, Jay will fictionalize everything except Tolstoy's own diary.

Andy Rangell called. He will be out of the house and is even going to move his piano, tomorrow.

Daphne called, a little apprehensive about the minor gynecological procedure she'll have done tomorrow. But work at Let's Go is proceeding splendidly. It's just like Kinhaven, she says. She can't wait to arrive at the office each morning. All 27 people are like a happy family. Poor thing. Wait till she gets to Simon and Schuster next year!

October 21, 1987

Hanover

Catching up:

- It took all of September to do the final documentation, etc. for my Volume 1. Finally mailed it to Richard Brown at Princeton around October 10. 750+ pages. Much—much—revision. I made better sentences, I think.

- Then did translation of Η ζωγραφική τεχνική του Πίτσου back into English. Rather difficult. Sent this off to Costas Myrsiades.

- Nice lunch in Vermont with Jay Parini. He still hopes to spend the summer in the Adirondacks.

- One night we awoke to crashes and discovered a raccoon in the boys' room, climbing up the bookcase and walls, dislodging everything. I called police at 4:00 a.m. He caught the beast in a quilt from behind as it climbed the bookcase again. It had come down through the chimney, ending in the basement. Mercifully ignoring the ground floor, it had come up quickly to Daphne's room, thence to the boys' room, and had panicked. One sign: kaka in huge pieces everywhere. Like humans, they shit when frightened.

- Saturday, at the farm with Alec, I pruned and fertilized fruit trees. He put preservative on his gables. Had two Friends Central students with him. Supper in Smith's Restaurant, disappointing. Coincidentally Daphne was in North Creek the next day. On excursion with her geology class.

- To Kinhaven two days in a row, October 17–18, first to meet with Lelah re: buildings and grounds, then for the regular board meeting. The Steinway still isn't right. We're going to start all over again from the beginning. I'm convener of the nominations committee again, and am also continuing with administrative reorganization, this time concentrating on buildings and grounds.

Wednesday, October 21, 1987

Hanover–Kennett Square

Leander has been here for a few days. Listened together to recording of Schoenberg's "Pierrot Lunaire," which he'll be doing with Jan di Gaetana in April. Incredibly difficult. Even he is scared. Lovely drive with him to Bryn Mawr. Good conversation all the way. Stopped in Bennington to pick up Nancy Bidlack's cello from Cox, the repairman in the woods. Reached Bryn Mawr in time to find Alec and Tom Corindia still at supper in a nearby restaurant. Joined them. Then I borrowed Alec's truck and drove with Tom to Kendal at Longwood.

Thursday, October 22, 1987

Kendal–Bryn Mawr–Pendle Hill

Kendal Management Board at 7:30 a.m. Breakfast with Dr. Perera, Carol's father. Board laid down the Blue Hill project; that was a shock. But Hanover had the pleasure of reporting our successful negotiation with Mrs. Ferguson and the option we signed: $25,000 down, one year to purchase. 64 acres at about $17,000 an acre for a total of $1,071,000. But it was the right thing to do, we all feel. The Board seemed perfunctory. Lloyd Lewis and Alan Hunt officiously control everything. Merely report. No discussion or give and take. Yet twenty-odd influential people were there at 7:30 in the morning. Quaker service!

Returned to Bryn Mawr. Spent a few hours in the Bryn Mawr public library—such a nice facility. Then to 951 Sargent Avenue to interview Stevie Smith, applicant to Dartmouth from Friends Central. Back to the library. Then Alec and I drove to town, dined in style at the Hershey. Filipino waiter; Alec had lots to say to him. Then to the Academy: Symphony: Roger Sessions, which I liked very much; Haydn, very crisp. And a Schumann symphony, 2nd rate, even Mendelssohn is better, I'd say. Saw Alec's colleague Jim Davis, who disparaged the Sessions. Drove Alec home and continued to Pendle Hill in the truck.

Friday, October 23, 1987

Pendle Hill

Seven hours in the Publications Committee: regular meeting first, after caucus with Rebecca Mays; then book committee afterwards. We've already got four manuscripts in hand. Doing well financially this year. Supper. To Yuki's for desert and coffee. Lloyd Lewis there, so we could talk more leisurely about Kendal at Hanover. General Board meeting. Shared a room with Wallace Collett, the Cincinnati millionaire. Very sweet man, active at Haverford as well as Pendle Hill.

Saturday, October 24, 1987

Haverford–NYC

To Haverford for the Corporation meeting—the results of our Interim Committee reorganizing the Corporation. Still rather stuffy. The women on the committee (Priscilla and Eliza Harrison) furious because the new advisory committee is so skewed toward the usual respectable males.

John Cary came up and we stepped out and had a cordial visit. Tom Wood outside as well. He was so complimentary about Alec. Said he—Wood—had stayed on at Friends Central too long, seventeen years, and had gotten stale. He'll be working at Princeton with a firm that places teachers in independent secondary schools. Lunch with Lu Bennett, etc. Stuff. Then Leander and Alec drove me to 30th Street Station. Leander is practicing Stravinsky's Petrushka four-hands to perform in November with Sandy, the other Kinhaven pianist, at Southern Connecticut State College.

NYC. Yale Club. 46th Street mostly boring. New York State opera: Tosca with "supertitles." Excellent.

Sunday, October 25, 1987

To the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Hudson River School. Lovely view of Lake George. The famous painting of Schroon Mountain. Also Adirondack woods. I bought posters for the boys and us. Then to the new wing for contemporary art. Bloom's view of mines and boys jumping in the river recalled Jay's Patch Boys. A remarkable "sculpture" of the Last Supper, in wood, with marvelous facial expressions. Next to MoMA: Frank Stella retrospective. Nice to see his development into the third dimension.

Return via Eastern Express (the Montrealer is defunct, alas). Antipathetic. Terrible pressure in ears coming down, like knives stuck into my skull.

Monday, October 26, 1987

Hanover

Trying to get started on my Bristol Classical Press A-level book. But first I'm finishing the filing of everything brought back from Greece. Chrysanthi is working continually, filing the letters.

Problem of who's going to teach War/Peace Studies 1 next year when Alan Rozycki stops. I'll ask Jack Shepherd.

Wednesday, October 28, 1987

Paul Simon on education in the morning. Impressive. Introduced by John Rassias. Simon: "If John were only a little more enthusiastic, he might be effective." General laughter.

The stock market is down hundreds of points but we're trying to keep calm. Perhaps this will force the government to do something, at last, about the deficit.

Bartholomae: fine lecture on teaching of remedial English. Dinner afterwards.

Kendal at Hanover overseers. Treat will resign because of conflict of interest since he hopes to be appointed as architect.

Thursday, October 29, 1987

Lunch with Jim Jordan. Very cordial. We're sharing an honors student, Matt Streeter, doing Time in the Modernist Novel and in Painting.

Evening: David Wykes's lecture at Howe Library on "She Stoops to Conquer," which I read this afternoon for the first time.

Friday, October 30, 1987

I convinced Matt Marshall, manager of the Hanover Inn, to give a 20% discount to University Seminar dinners. Hooray!

November 2, 1987

Started the Bristol book, two months overdue. Doing the Zorba chapter, largely from preexisting essays.

Roddy Beaton arrived from London.

Tuesday, November 3, 1987

Beaton's lecture on nineteenth-century romanticism in Greece a great success. Good audience in the Wren Room. Lots of questions. Thirty-odd people at home for supper afterwards. Another success. Cordial and relaxed. Chrysanthi's cooking much appreciated.

Wednesday, November 4, 1987

Took Roddy to Andy Rangell's for a private concert. Froberger, Bach, Beethoven's Op. 31 no. 1, Busoni's arrangement of Carmen. Andy in top form, explaining his view of the music before playing. The Beethoven is a kind of parody, a simple theme transformed. Dinner; then with Mother to "She Stoops to Conquer." Well done, especially the second half.

Thursday, November 5, 1987

Widener Reading Room

Up at 6:00 a.m. To Cambridge to go to the Robert Coles's lecture with Daphne. He's a preacher; liberal; compassionate. Spoke of exploitation of underdogs by top dogs, Harvard Club's disgusting "ritual" of boxing match in the dining room; South End Boston kids entertaining the establishment by eating roast beef while dressed in tuxedos. Coles is anti-academic in content and style. Dirty khakis, open collar, rambling lecture, distrustful of “proper methodology,” etc.

Lunch with Daphne. She’s flourishing. Courses are splendid. She’ll do a research project on the “corporate dynamics” of Harvard Student Enterprises: the Let’s Go staff last year and this.

Afterwards, Meg’s mini-symposium. Herzfeld spoke on status of anthropology and Hellenic studies, Emily Vermeuel on status of archeology, very negatively, Greg Nagy on philology: an incomprehensible arabesque, as usual. Lots of familiar faces: Tziovas, for instance. How nice to see the Seferis Chair active in this way.

Supper in a new Chinese restaurant near Pistaccio’s, with Daphne, Lori (her roommate), Roddy. Then on to Providence.

Friday, November 6, 1987

Providence, Rhode Island

Spectacular opening session. Speros Vryonis covered ancient, medieval, and modern Greece and the sea magisterially. Roddy followed this hard act bravely and well. Ed Malefakis reminded us that the Greeks had never achieved anything comparable to the Portuguese. The rest of the conference, at least the literature section, was anticlimactic. Dreary papers for the most part. But nice to see friends. Vassilis very supportive re: my NYU candidacy. Yannis Karavidas jolly and rolly-polly as always, etc.

Banquet grand: three senators (Sarbanes, Pell, Chafee), an ambassador, and the president of Brown. Sarbanes referred twice to me in his speech. Intertextuality! Chrysanthi and I sat with Ernestine Friedl and had lots to say: nice opportunity to visit together.

Saturday, November 7, 1987

Karavidas interviewed me again for the BBC on the founding of MGSA and the status of Modern Greek studies in the U.S. Surprise: reunion with Brenda and Everett Marder. He just finished law school. Is practicing in Boston. What a man! Drove home with Mary Rassias, comfortably, listening to a cassette of Orson Welles’s “War of the Worlds.”

Wednesday, November 18, 1987

Thom Gunn read his poems in the Wren Room. My first contact. They are precisely my type. Straightforward in language, nothing obscure, yet marvelously crafted, including many in rhyme. I loved “Moly” and the one about the snail, and a still unpublished one about a fly being sucked into the “oubliette” of a pitcher plant.

Sent my Zorba chapter off to Bristol Classical Press. The rest is going very slowly, alas, but a little happens every day.

John Tallmadge wrote a long letter. He found a job. Associate Dean of a college in Cincinnati.

Fan mail from Peter Werner, the television director. Says he remembers my courses twenty years ago and wants to recite Cavafy’s “Ithaca” in a speech.

Matt Streeter, my honors student working on “Time in Joyce and Modern Painting,” left a note instead of appearing for his tutorial, saying that the recent demonstration about South Africa left him feeling so guilty that he was thinking of dropping out of school, and couldn’t work. So Dartmouth does have students like this, after all. A propos, two days ago our department met with the new president, James Freedman, and almost everyone sang out his or her resentment at the typical Dartmouth student, the philistine and often anti-feminist jock.

November 19, 1987

Finished the first draft of my Introduction for the Bristol book, combining the talk on the novel form given in London two years ago with Kazantzakis as a romantic.

Peter Demetz lectured on Italian futurism. Very “professional,” as one would expect. Afterwards dinner at the Inn. I had good, long conversation with Steve Scher, recently back from China. “20,000,000 bicycles!” he kept repeating.

Saturday, November 21, 1987

The Dartmouth Symphony played Jimmy Yannatos’s “Tunes and Dances. An Overture for the Uncommon Man,” commissioned in 1981 for the 200th anniversary of Harvard’s chapter of ΦBK—thus “the uncommon man.” Jimmy came for supper. We opened the superb Scotch that Roddy Beaton had brought. Genial evening, with Mother, and Lori Buseck also. But the piece was raggedy, never really got going. Sad. Purely coincidental that it was played the day before Dartmouth’s celebration of its 200th for ΦBK.

Wednesday, November 25, 1987

I lectured to John Rassias's bankers on Pagan and Christian Heroism, the Μέγας Αλέξανδρος lecture. It went well, I think.

December 2, 1987

Graduate seminar for Arthur Kantrowitz's Thayer School engineers on science/technology vs. humanistic views—i.e., my Dartmouth Alumni Magazine article of a decade ago. Kantrowitz has implicit faith in “progress,” science's power to alleviate pain, etc. He predicts cities in space shortly. Students still felt that engineers are morally neutral, and that harm is done by others. Alas! I protested.

December 3, 1987

By bus to NYC, now that AMTRAK is defunct. What a comedown!

December 4, 1987

Publications Committee at Pendle Hill, then Book Committee. Nice to be back in charge again. Rebecca Mays intense, as always. Supper with Alec in Media Inn. He went off to play in the West Chester Symphony. PH board afterwards.

December 5, 1987

Return to Hanover by bus. Eleven hours from PH. Like returning from Europe. The beatnik traveling to Sunapee to see where his rich parents spent their holidays.

December 6, 1987

Went to Meriden to see Fiddler on the Roof, chorus and solo voices trained expertly by Mayme Noda. Very moving.

December 8, 1987

Good meeting of Kendal Overseers with John Clancy. Jim Strickler will lead the group of doctors at the Medical Center in their negotiations with us. We're about to get the Vermont Certificate of Need.

December 11, 1987

Breakfast with Martha Solow and Tom Almy. They want me to be the “humanist” in their scheme to bring theatrical productions around the State to convince people to anticipate old age.

Lunch with Ben Bennani. He says he'll print a book of Harkianakis's poems if I produce one. He loves what I've already done.

Supper at Jesse's with Ned Perrin, who has just finished yet another abortive affair, with a writer in Washington. He says that he wants to remarry but I think that he likes going from affair to affair. He is writing a piece on AMTRAK.

December 13, 1987

Leander and Sandy's four-hand concert in New York went well. They did "Petrushka."

December 16, 1987

Father fell out of his wheelchair and landed on his face, on his glasses, which shattered and lacerated him deeply over the eye. So at night we were again in the emergency room.

December 20, 1987

Father has pneumonia again. Jim Strickler and colleagues again ask if we want "aggressive" treatment. No treatment means death by morning. Mother can't face this. We decided to keep him in Hanover Terrace, not take him to the hospital, and therefore to go the middle route. No intravenous antibiotics, only oral and via muscular injection.

December 21, 1987

Father better again!

December 22, 1987

Brought Jackie Baas to see our paintings, especially the Benton.

December 23, 1987

Noye Johnson's cancer is bad. I visited him after his operation. He lost 25 pounds. Can hardly stand. But out of pain, at least.

Tea at the Arndts' with his sister and brother-in-law from England, and the Sheldons.

December 24, 1987

Christmas eve with Sally and Louis Cornell and Genevieve Williamson, with Steve and Tom Cornell, both rescued from drop-out and doing well.

December 25, 1987

Nice Christmas with Mother and all the children. Got snowshoes for Leander and Alec.

December 26, 1987

Alec went to Davenport, Iowa to get the violin he had brought from Jakarta. We're all full of suspense.

Chrysanthi, Leander, and I traveled to Cambridge to see Gillette at the American Repertory Theater. Disappointing first act, but gained power in the second act, and has a lingering power.

December 27, 1987

Noye died at 5:00 a.m. Dee asked me to write the obituary. I consulted Chuck Drake and Bob Reynolds, to get the scientific part, which is spectacular. What productivity! Noye was the first to identify and name "acid rain," for example.

December 28, 1987

Got the obituary to the Valley News in time. They printed it in its entirety, and we got a photo in as well.

Drove to Weston for Kinhaven Nomination Committee at Ike Patch's, but Ike had forgotten and was gone. Saw his strange daughter, with a beard on her chin.

December 29, 1987

Alec is home, with the violin. It has a beautiful sound but needs repair. He drove to Douglas Cox in Brattleboro and was told it is worthless! Alas!

Ike, contrite, came here for nominations. George Goodwin wants me to be president next year.

Noye's memorial service included a period of Quaker silence. I ministered, remembering the time he'd returned from Pakistan with a jaw 9,000,000 years old.

Stelios and Ava here yesterday with their two sweet girls, who grow nicer and nicer.

Tonight Andy Rangell here. What a talker! He wants me to read Cop-pard.

December 30, 1987

Finished "Nikos Kazantzakis, Novelist" for Bristol Classical Press. 75,000 words. I'll post it tomorrow. They'll probably find it too "difficult."

We went with Alec to Gregory Wylie to get another opinion on the violin. Much more favorable. Said it's worth $5000-$6000, which is exactly what we thought. But it needs $1000 worth of repairs. We left it. He lives now in a converted one-room schoolhouse above Bradford, with a baby named Cameron and an African parrot that talks in a bass voice and sings in a soprano one.

December 31, 1987

To Genevieve's annual party. Then to Rassiases for lamb, βασιλόπιτα, σαλιγγάρια. Nice.

1988

---

Hanover January 1–June 19

Jan. 6, Cambridge (theater)
Jan. 14–16, Pendle Hill
Feb. 14, Cambridge (theater)
Feb. 26–28, NYC
March 4–5, Pendle Hill
March 24, Cambridge (theater)
April 2, Putney (concert)
April 7–10, Guilford College, North Carolina; NYC
April 15–17, Pendle Hill, NYC
April 30–31, Wellesley, Cambridge
May 31, Cambridge (theater)
June 2, Kinhaven
June 8–9, Cambridge: Daphne's graduation
June 16–19, Pendle Hill, NYC

Riparius June 19–September 5

June 16–20, Kinhaven, Hanover
August 6, Kinhaven

Hanover September 6–December 31

Oct. 8–9, NYC, Father's memorial service
Nov. 12–13, Princeton, MGSA 20th anniversary
Dec. 27–29, New Orleans, MLA, Hotel Meridien
Dec. 30, Boston–Cambridge

January 1, 1988

Quakers here for brunch cooked by the men. Lafayette made ham, Roger turnips and fruit salad, I did hashed brown potatoes, Alec bacon, Leander omelets. We were applauded. Afterwards, silly games. Even Yiayia joined in. And Roger laughed!

January 4, 1988

Began teaching after nine months' leave. English 53: Hartley, Forster, Lawrence, Woolf, Waugh, Orwell, Golding. No difficulty lecturing. It comes back, like riding a bicycle. In fact, I'm more relaxed than ever, less glued to notes.

Leander was here with a new girlfriend, Jean Martin, a French hornist. Her parents are both organists. A mainline American girl, mature, feminine, mellow. I like how she sits placidly in the evening and knits. We'll see . . .

January 6, 1988

To Cambridge to deliver Daphne and go to Pirandello's Right You Are (If You Think You Are) done splendidly at the American Repertoire Theater. Seated next to us were Jimmy Yannatos and his wife.

January 10, 1988

To Amherst for Kinhaven board. Jerry very lively. Such a nice group.

January 12, 1988

Lloyd Lewis and John Clancy here for Kendal meetings. Our Overseers group was briefed on financial and other plans for the immediate future. Scheduled opening (pray!) is now Fall 1990.

January 13, 1988

Very busy. Lunch with President Freedman and the Comparative Literature Steering Committee. Lecture. Tutorial with Elizabeth Keenan, working on Joyce, Forster, and Woolf. Faculty seminar: Kathleen Corrigan on icons, how they were introduced to counteract the Monophysists, a heresy claiming that Christ had only a divine nature. Icons were meant to remind believers of his human nature as well. So iconography ceased being symbolic (the lamb) and became realistic. Then the balance swung too far the other way; people forgot His divine nature, causing the iconoclasm of the eighth century.

Then to Kendal dinner at the Inn. Then to Kendal open meeting in the high school. Lloyd spoke well. Lots of questions from the floor.

January 14, 1988

Taught at 1:00. Raced to Springfield, Mass. In the car to catch the train to Philadelphia. Club car from New Haven. Not bad. Got to Pendle Hill at 11:00 p.m. Slept in Walkers' house.

January 15, 1988

Good Publications Committee meeting. Three MSS discussed. Tom Brown keeps telling me that I clerk it well. Rebecca Mays is so nice to work with. Now she wants to study Koiv . Supper in Media with Alec.

He's more restful now, less dismayed by the readjustment to U.S. after Indonesia. But he still cannot accept the extinction of that experience; wants to find some way to connect it to something here and now.

January 16, 1988

Board meetings on salary policy. Should a uniform salary exist for all—teachers, cooks, groundskeepers—since each is infinitely valuable in Quaker sight? Fascinating. Alan Myers approached me at breakfast. He was at Hanover Meeting years ago. He's now separated from his wife and picking up the pieces at PH. I'm working to bring PH on the road to Hanover. Janet Shepherd and Peter Crysdale will be the leaders.

Lift to 30th Street by Lee Bennett, about to return to the Franklin Institute to host 900 boy scouts overnight.

January 17, 1988

Mother's birthday. I gave her a hurricane lantern as a present. Splendid supper at the Norwich Inn with Mother, Chrysanthi, Daphne, Leander, and Audrey Logan. Audrey is going to vote for Dukakis. The rest of us are in a quandary.

January 18, 1988

Film "Passage to India" shown for my class. Brenda Jackson is so sexy and spiritual simultaneously. Too pretty for Adela. The ending is totally changed and distorted.

January 19, 1988

To hospital for class on aging for 4th year medical students, at Tom Almy's invitation. Jim Strickler was MC. Parish Players did the play that we're going to take round to curious audiences in NH under the auspices of H.U.B. I spoke about CCRCs and Kendal. Then lunch with Aris Damianos.

January 21, 1988

War/Peace Faculty Seminar. Oran Young on the Arctic program and the Soviets. We hope to have him direct College Course 1 next year.

January 22, 1988

Lunch with Steve Scher. He brought me a beautiful edition of Ritsos from East Berlin.

January 23, 1988

Finished re-reading The Rainbow. What an experience! I never appreciated its monumentality so much.

Robert Brown at Princeton University Press, on the basis of readers' reports, wants me to shorten my MS drastically. First reader very insistent. Second reader much more positive. Apparently there is a good chance of acceptance if I do this.

January 24, 1988

After Meeting, Jack Shepherd spoke on his recent experiences with Palestinians in Gaza. Lunch at the Greens with Mother.

February 21, 1988

Bob Daubenspeck in Meeting: "A good Meeting should comfort the afflicted and afflict the comfortable."

Alec came last week wearing his new hairpiece. He looks fine, just fine, and feels much more at ease. But he's still eager to leave Friends Central.

Leander came again with his new girlfriend, Jean Martin, a hornist from Atlanta, Georgia, very calm and mature, it seems. I like the way she sits and sews contentedly.

To Cambridge last weekend to see Heiner Müller's Quartet (based on "Les Liaisons dangereuse") at the American Repertoire Theater. Strange postmodernist production, more choreography than drama. Brustein lectured as prologue, saying we're meant to be drawn into a trancelike response, and should not worry about meaning.

Marian Singleton died of cancer. She was born in February 1930, the same year as I.

February 27, 1988

(From here to July 6 is an attempt to catch up, written under my tree at the farm, after the fact.)

To NYC, now alas by driving to Springfield, Massachusetts and taking the train there, since the Montrealer is defunct. Met with George Goodwin, Jim Quinn, etc. re: Kinhaven's capital fund drive. Quick supper with Paula Xanthopoulou; then to Brooklyn Academy of Music's Palace Theatre, a restored "ruin," for a magnificent production of The Cherry Orchard: pure magic from the opening moment.

Sunday, February 28, 1988

Chrysanthi and I walked to 15th Street to the Penington to see it and discuss the possibility of Daphne's residing there next year. (Unfortunately, Daphne isn't interested.) Like the Penn Club, but the inhabitants are younger, more off-beat. Then a quick turn at the Met, and afterwards the Frick, where I was reminded that Whistler's portrait of the Duc de Montesquieu ("Charlus") is in the concert hall. There's a gorgeous Constable of Salisbury Cathedral in the study. I've been teaching Golding's novel in English 57.

Other activities: on the 13th, attended Helmut Schumann's 70th birthday at Hanover Inn. Dozens of people to a mediocre dinner, orchestrated for self-esteem. But he's nice withal. Have been speaking to Arthur Kantrowitz's engineering class re: the humanists' quarrel with technology. Kantrowitz still believes that all problems can be solved by science. It just takes patience. Civilization is getting better and better, etc. His students seem to agree, more or less, except Eric Friez, who has been attending Quaker Meeting.

I've also been meeting with student groups wanting to hold a work camp this summer. Hope to get $$ for them from the Meeting.

Other activities: Worrying about a successor to Alan Rozycki for College Course 1. Perhaps Walter Sinnott-Armstrong. Very complicated administratively. Been meeting with Leonard, Tim Duggan, and the Dean of Faculty. Leonard says I'm too much in a hurry, that I have a low tolerance for ambiguity.

I gave the work camp students lots of leads for possible projects in the area, a better project, one hopes, than last year's at the College Grant. Dottie Campion gave good ideas at a party at the Officers'.

Another project: Pendle Hill on the Road at Hanover Meeting. This is scheduled for April. Janet Shepherd will be the leader, assisted by Peter Crysedale. I've been trying for years to get PH to do On the Road in a big way. They resist, but this is a pilot program and therefore it's important that it work.

Of course Kendal at Hanover also continues. We have Overseers' meetings each month. Slow . . . slow. Lloyd Lewis told me that all the bureaucratic arrangements for Kendal at Longwood took seven months. We've already been working for two years, and there's no end in sight.

March 1, 1988

Lunch with Tom Corindia at the Faculty Club. At the last Kendal Overseers meeting we resolved to gather a “wish list” for the new facility. I’m coordinating this and entering everyone’s contributions on the Macintosh. Tom and I went over our respective lists. What fun!

Then, alas, to Aquinas House for Larry Harvey’s memorial service, led by “Father Joe” Devlin very joyously. Betsy Harvey said we should all remember her father the way he was before the last ten years when Alzheimer’s was destroying his mind and character. Sheila also spoke movingly. Everyone sang Larry’s favorite song, “Dance Dance Dance.” Afterwards, in the reception, Kate, who was standing silent and alone, as beautiful as always, and I exchanged a huge hug.

At 4:00, met with my honors student, Elizabeth Keenan, a bright, high-strung girl from New Orleans who is working on the moral vision of Forster, Woolf, and Joyce. Her history with me is panic near the end of any project. We’ll see.

March 2, 1988

Meeting with David Wykes and Matthew Rawlinson re: English 17, the second half of the survey course—eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth centuries. I’m quaking. It’s like going back to graduate school. This will begin in a few weeks but my lectures luckily don’t come until May.

Did I note anywhere that Princeton returned my “Kazantzakis and Politics,” volume 1, with a strong endorsement from one reader but equally strong complaints from the second reader that the work is far too long. So I’m systematically shortening it, and having to agree that this is improving the MS considerably. I wanted to display all my research and this just is not good.

March 3, 1988

I’m championing Jack Shepherd as coordinator for College Course 1. Today he spoke well to our Faculty Seminar on his experience in the Palestinian camps. Walter S-A will do an advanced seminar on the morality of nuclear defense if Jack does CC1.

March 4, 1988

To Philadelphia. No publication committee, so I arrived in time for supper with Alec. Met him at Overbrook Station. Then he delivered me to PH for the board.

March 7, 1988

Jean Brophy is here, a candidate for the administrator of Kendal at Hanover. She's a Lesbian, was accompanied by her "spouse," a delightful woman. We all had lunch and I showed them the glories of Dartmouth.

March 10, 1988

My sister Alice is here to visit Yiayia and Pappou. Lunched with her today.

March 11, 1988

To Ned Perrin's for waffles, as always. His daughter quite sociable.

March 18, 1988

Tiles in upstairs bathroom failed. Water pouring through them into the dining room ceiling. Gene Boisvert wants $1000 to install a new shower. We got a man to regROUT the tiles for $35. Boisvert then charged $70 for his consultation!

Sunday, March 20, 1988

To Cambridge for the American Repertoire Theater. First lunched with Daphne at Pistaccio's. Then Six Characters in Search of an Author. Such a pleasure! Such fine acting! We've finally discovered this theater. Will we keep going after Daphne graduates?

Did I note that the monograph "Nikos Kazantzakis, Novelist" that I did for Bristol Classical Press was also returned, this time also because it's too long but in addition because the language and concepts are too complicated for the projected audience, most of whom will not be native speakers of English. So I'll miss publication this July but will be scheduled for July 1989 with co-publication by Caratsas here in the USA. So this, too, needs to be rewritten.

Still another project, a fruit of the luncheon with Jean Brophy. I want to abridge Elizabeth Gray Vining's Being Seventy, concentrating on the parts applicable to those contemplating entrance in Kendal at Hanover, just as she, when she wrote the book, was contemplating entrance in Kendal at Longwood.

March 23, 1988

Breakfast with John Van Aalst, whom I continue to enjoy. He has given up the hope of being a full-time writer and is preparing for medical school, but he still hopes to do a novel based on his two years with Palestinians in Jerusalem.

A few days ago I spent two whole days doing a "Hypercard" training program for the Macintosh.

March 28, 1988

Spring term. I have the survey, and also Greek 13. Enrollment: 7 students (today one dropped; 6 left). I'm frantically trying to get books for Greek 13. The Nathanail dictionary is out of stock. I telephoned Yannis Karavidas in London (BBC) to send me some. And Pavlos Andronikos's translation of Ο Βασίλης ο Αρβανίτης has never arrived from Australia. But I'm starting with Ritsos, using photocopies, and will then go to Cavafy before reaching Myrivilis.

March 31, 1988

Peter Martin gave the annual Beebe Lecture, about the South/West News Service. An ego trip galore, unplanned but charming in its unabashed self-glorification. He even brought his high school teacher, who first taught him to write beautiful sentences, to exult in his success. Afterwards, more of the same at the banquet. I sat next to Barbara Gilbert's husband, which was fun.

Friday, April 1, 1988

Stood with the Nodas, Barbara Bartley, and others, at our annual Peace Vigil on Main Street. This always gives me a good feeling, but I suppose we seem ridiculous to our fellow Hanoverites.

First meeting with Frank Stanbach, the student who is meant to create Hypercard programs enabling me to have a computer supplement to Demotic Greek I.

Crisis: Alan Rozycki seems to have had an aneurysm or slight stroke. What to do about CCI? Leonard and I met. We've convinced Tom Powers to coordinate it at least for two weeks.

April 3, 1988

Visited Alan in hospital. He's fine but apprehensive re: cat scan results. Tom Powers was there and we had a good talk afterwards. It was he who brought Alan into the peace movement.

In the evening: to Putney with Yiayia, etc. to hear Richard Goode play an all-Beethoven program at Landmark College, the old Windham College. A superb concert, utterly exhausting emotionally. Made even more pleasant by the discovery of Ignat Solzhenitsyn in the audience, with his mother and grandmother. We had a nice reunion, hugs and all. Ignat is happy with his teacher in London but homesick in other respects for the USA. Mr. and Mrs. Shin were there, too.

April 5, 1988

I had to introduce Tom Powers to College Course 1 and tell them about Alan. We're all rooting for him.

Evening at Hopkins Center. Four British actors (4!) did A Midsummer Night's Dream brilliantly. The second half was poor, obviously unrehearsed: Shakespeare vs. Shaw. But one of their quotes from Shaw is a perfect epigraph for my Kazantzakis book since it enunciates a vitalistic view of religion. Now I have to locate it.

April 7, 1988

ταξιδεύοντας

Early flight to Greensboro, North Carolina, to attend the Quaker education conference. What a day! Took 14 hours to reach Guilford College. First fog at Lebanon; missed connection. Plane took off finally for Boston instead of New York. Motor trouble. Returned. Waited two hours. Next flight to Boston. Shuttle to NY delayed. Missed the last flight to Greensboro. Got on a plane for Charlotte on a dare. Missed the last connection to Greensboro. Took a plane to Winston-Salem. Then a thirty-mile taxi ride to Greensboro, in time for the evening presentation, more or less.

April 8, 1988

Greensboro, NC

Alec is here with others from Friends Central: Joe Ludwig, the acting headmaster (Tom Wood stepped down last December), Doug, and one other: engaging people. Reunion with Bob Hunter after many years. Also saw David Martin, now a mason in Greensboro. And David Gray from Woodbrooke. Opening session brilliantly done by David Mallory of Friends Council on Education. I must use his techniques in my section of English 17. Visited Friends Homes, the retirement community across the road. Drab. Discouraging architecture. What Kendal at Hanover must not be like. Mather Lippincott (also here) told me it was extremely low budget. Workshop with Sally Scattergood: her sex and drug education project in Philadelphia—the quintessential “Quaker lady” doing good works. Len Cadwallader of Farm and Wilderness was sitting next to me. Nice to meet him after so many years. Another workshop, very well done, led by Don McNemar; also nice to see him again. Then a terrible one with Leonard Kenworthy, who subjected us to a monologue for 1½ hours. At one of the committee meetings the man who founded and ran William Penn House in Washington told me about being briefed in the White House by Dinash DeSousa (!) on the pinko-faculty at Dartmouth who suppress conservative opinion, etc, etc.

Tonight is Leander's big concert at Lehigh: Schoenberg's "Pierrot Lunaire" with Jan Di Gaetana.

Sunday, April 10, 1988 Greensboro, NC–Hanover
Routine flight back, thank goodness. Stopped at NYC, met Leander, attended Richard Goode's Beethoven recital at the 92nd Street "Y," the same concert that I had heard at Putney, but this time I was unmoved. Strange. Saw Peter Smith and Ned Perrin, also in the audience. Nice supper with Leander. His concert went very well, he says. 9:00 p.m. flight home, via Keene.

April 14, 1988 Hanover
Bill Cook and I gave our annual "war poetry" extravaganza (son et lumière) in College Course 1. Alan Rozycki, mercifully, is fully recovered and back in charge.

April 15, 1988 Philadelphia
Pendle Hill Publications Committee. We've accepted another of those terrible "touchy-feely" pamphlets, against my better judgment.

April 16, 1988 Pendle Hill–NYC
Went to Wilde's Importance of Being Earnest in a church on Park Avenue. Semi-amateur performance but adequate. The play still has charm.

Sunday, April 17, 1988 NYC
Kinhaven Board in a Park Avenue apartment. Jimmy Yannatos thought it was yesterday. It seems that I am going to succeed George Goodwin as president. Θεέ, βοήθεια!

April 19, 1988 Hanover
Dinner for Overseers of the Tucker Foundation. A woman came up and threw her arms around me. Katy Van Dusen! After so many years! She's married to a biologist she met at Monte Verde in Costa Rica and who is studying at Cornell. After that they aren't sure. Meanwhile she's an overseer of the Tucker Foundation. As is Dave Webber, another old acquaintance. Katy and I gabbed all night, but also listened to the impressive presentations by interns, especially one wisp of a girl who'd spent four months with convicts on death row in Alabama and had found them, all murderers, very "human." Asked why she chose such an internship, she said that she'd gone to a Quaker school (George School, as it turned out) and had always heard that the death penalty was wrong. Afterwards, Dave Webber and I had a long drink at the Inn and caught up on much news. He told how splendid David McLaughlin was as chair of the Board of Trustees.

Friday evening, April 22–Sunday noon, April 24

Pendle Hill On the Road at Hanover. Full house. Alan Myers came from Maine. Others too, from Dover, NH and from Massachusetts. Janet Shepherd spoke for too long, but at least she spoke well. The small workshops were the best, however. Peter Crysedale complemented her nicely. Very little organization, but somehow it worked. People felt rested, and loving. It was particularly nice for several young mothers in our Meeting, enabling them to get a furlough from family responsibilities. But did any of this have anything to do with religion? With God? Hard to say.

Saturday, April 30, 1988

Wellesley–Cambridge

To Wellesley for a Peace Studies conference. Bill Durland there from Pendle Hill, bitter against Margery Walker's style of administration. The place is in turmoil, according to him. Everyone is leaving. The "beloved community" isn't very beloved. And trustees like me seem the last to know. Ditto with Dartmouth trustees and David McLaughlin.

Met Chrysanthi and Daphne afterwards in Cambridge for supper and then another splendid performance at the A.R.T. This time Uncle Vanya directed by David Mamet. Pamela Gien, a sexpot, in "Six Characters" and "Gilette," was miraculously transformed as the spinster sister: gray hair, sloping shoulders. But the Doctor stole the show.

May 4, 1988

I should note that chamber music continues. Dick Williamson, Allan Munck and I have met most Wednesdays this year. It's a great pleasure, as always.

May 9, 1988

Annual check-up with Dr. Paul Gerber. He says that I'm in the pink of health. Lost ten pounds since last check-up. With luck my cholesterol will have gone down also, thanks to the strict diet imposed by Chrysanthi.

At 5:00 to Lucy Briggs, Mrs. Ellis Briggs, wife of the former ambassador to Greece, in order to meet a couple called Fox from Kimball Union Academy who are about to go off to the American Farm School, which has an exchange with KUA. I lent them Brenda Marder's book with my introduction.

Then to a fancy dinner at Wethersfield Inn hosted by the Classics Department for Stephen Lattimore, Richmond Lattimore's son, who gave an excruciatingly boring lecture this afternoon. But the dinner was fun. Doenges, Rutter, Wiencke, Tatum, Bradley, Tomkins. Wine galore. Then the bill: $40 per person.

May 10, 1988

To Alumni Hall with Ned for a luncheon honoring the fifth anniversary of the Dickey Endowment. A Chinese story-teller "performed" (in Chinese). Then we all filed out to the plaza in front of the Hop to welcome the Secretary General of the UN. Leonard Rieser and Sandy McCulloch said appropriate words. At 5:00 the Secretary General spoke to a good crowd in Thompson Arena. Chuck Braun and I sat together. The Secretary General was "diplomatic" in criticizing the US's failure to honor its obligations to the UN.

May 12, 1988

What a week this has been! Today: Nice lunch with Dan Tomkins. Then to President Freedman's for supper with Saul Bellow, whom I hardly spoke to—he was at the wrong end of the table. But he seemed jolly and humble and simple. Lots of good anecdotes about William Faulkner, etc. No one dared ask him about Allan Bloom! Said the Nobel Prize didn't mean much to him; the one prize that really meant something was his first, the National Book Award, because this showed him that he really could make a career as a writer. Then we all filed off to Cook Auditorium to hear a jovial lecture/reading full of impish humor, followed by portentous questions directed at him by Blanche Gelfant and Don Pease.

May 13, 1988

Still more! Went to hear Helène Cixous at a feminist symposium. Very disappointing. She's brilliant, but seemed to get trapped in her own cobweb. I left in the middle.

May 15, 1988

More! Steve Scher's symposium on music and literature. I went to the final session today, with Joseph Kleman and Hayden White. White spectacular despite a kind of stutter. Then Karin and Panos Rodis arrived, to replace Laura Gouthreau (from the Adirondacks) in our guest room. Panos bushy-haired all-too-Greek, but Karin rules the roost, I suspect. She'll direct our writing program; he'll be unemployed.

May 16, 1988

Kendal Overseers. Lloyd Lewis and John Clancy are here. Plus architects and engineers.

May 17, 1988

Lloyd, John, Tom Corindia, and the director of Mediplex (which is providing the venture capital) met with Bob Field and Cary Clark re: Kendal. Field half asleep, but Clark wide awake. Helped us considerably on questions of sewer and water (he's a director of the Water Company). Mediplex man very impressive. Lloyd isn't, in public, but his accomplishments speak for him. Kendal public meeting at 5:00 in the high school auditorium. About 300 present. We'd been briefed yesterday on the site plan, which is a brilliant accommodation to the sloping terrain. Now the drawing was on display for all.

May 18, 1988

Frank, the student supposedly doing my Hypercard program, has disappeared. The project is aborted, it seems.

May 19, 1988

I lectured at 9:00 a.m. Then we jumped in the car and drove to Riparius to plant peas, lettuce, radishes, etc.

May 20, 1988

Elizabeth Keenan collapsing, as expected. She says she has gone to her room and wept every day for a month.

Sunday, May 22, 1988

Lunch at the Greens with Mother. Then we all went to Andy Rangell's to hear a preview of his next concert. Played early Beethoven sonata most eccentrically. But I liked his version of Schumann's Carnival.

May 23, 1988

Good! My cholesterol is down, almost to normal.

Seamus Heaney lectured in the afternoon on Joyce. His great preference is for Joyce over Yeats. Read hilariously from the opening chapter, which is so funny if savored, slowly.

In the evening we brought Mother, Muriel Bernstein, and Clay Sykes to Heaney's reading of his own poetry. Stirring, wonderful stuff, consummate in technique, yet so simple and human withal. The opposite of Cixous & Co.

May 24, 1988

War/Peace Faculty Seminar: an interesting man who had worked in the Pentagon. He assured us that all arms reduction efforts are purely to satisfy public opinion. The government does not wish to reduce arms.

Rushed home to confer with Leonard Bain, the financial consultant we've retained. He'll project out my retirement prospects for thirty years.

Worried about AMTRAK Montrealer. The ICC will be ruling soon on the effort to force the Boston and Maine to sell their track. I wrote to the Valley News urging people to encourage the ICC to rule in AMTRAK's favor, and of course wrote my own letter and got others to write.

May 28-29, 1988

Children home for Pappous's and my birthdays, mostly Pappous's. He's 86, I think. We brought him home for a meal and it went fairly well, as well as can be expected. He's sinking slowly . . . slowly . . . in mind and body.

Princeton now has a revised report from the reader who objected to my book's length. He is much more favorable, though he keeps insisting that my question "Was Kazantzakis really a communist?" is a red herring. In any case, Bob Brown will present the revised MS to the Princeton board on June 20.

May 30, 1988

We've had some stirring faculty meetings this term, particularly the special one called by petition (instigator: Jon Appleton; I signed) re: the Cole case, vs. the Dartmouth Review. Appleton denounced Jeffrey Hart from the podium. Jeff in defending himself only made himself seem more ridiculous. The best part however was Jim Freedman's brave denunciation of the Review as poisoning our atmosphere. The students have been suspended. Their sentences were not revised. None of the cowardice shown by McLaughlin, who caved in under weight of alumni and trustees. Freedman is now a total hero for all of us. Thus today we willingly granted him his reorganization scheme.

Outdoor picnic for the Tucker Foundation under a tent at 29 Rope Ferry Road, now Jim Breeden's residence. I spoke on the international work camp movement, competing against thunder, lightning, and pelting rain.

May 31, 1988

To Cambridge and the A.R.T. with Leander to see 'Tis Pity She's a Whore, not one of their successes, alas. Played in Mussolini's Italy. The claims for this text, as an avant-garde statement of existential freedom, seem bloated. What came across was the murderous antics of a sex-maniac/psychopath. Robert Brustein and his minions were sitting near us, in the last row, feverishly taking notes during the performance. They presumably know it doesn't work and are trying to salvage something.

June 1, 1988

Annual Comparative Literature luncheon. Farewells to Kevin and Marina Brownlee, who have been seduced away by the University of Pennsylvania. False friends, both. Lew Renza is stepping down as chairman, to chair the English Department, replacing Peter Saccio, who resigned in pique. He's never been one of my favorites.

June 2, 1988

To Weston in the morning to meet with Lelah, Joe Contino, and Pat re: buildings and grounds management. Pat wants no janitorial duties. We humored him.

Then back to Hanover to the town's Planning Board hearing on Kendal, with Carol Weingeist, Tom Corindia and John Clancy. Chief in the Board's minds as a problem seems to be traffic congestion.

June 5, 1988

Wonderful exhibit at the Hood: Paul Sample. Among others is the original of the reproduction that I grew up with and that is now Leander's—of the hunters in the snow, eerie, with no footprints. Learned for the first time that it is an allegory of a passage in Lamentations. Bob McGrath, who mounted the exhibit, said they started it as an act of piety and only later discovered that Sample was truly a significant painter.

Wednesday, June 8, 1988

Cambridge

The great day: Daphne's graduation. Drove early to Cambridge with Mother, Chrysanthi and Leander following in his car. He stayed at Kesaya Noda's apartment on Wendale Street. We started with a picnic in the Yard; met the Carys. Then Class Day exercises. Tom Woolf was the speaker, and a fine one. Said that the total breakdown of civilization, morality, the death of God, etc. in our age should be considered a challenge. How lucky we are to be able, perhaps, to fashion something new ex nihilo. Student speakers amusing, self-assured.

Then to Masters' reception at Winthrop House. Jim and Martha Davis, Chris Flug, old friends. I of course felt very much at home. By this time, actually during class day, Alec had joined us; he'd come up from Philadelphia by train. I dashed off to Emily Harrison's tea party in a huge house near Porter Square. Met her father, who spent many years in Pakistan, and saw Eliza Harrison again; she's still on the Haverford Board, and is just a bit apprehensive about the new president; she obviously supported someone else. Emily is going out west to be outdoors! Interesting to see this wealthy Philadelphia Quaker clan; scores of uncles, cousins, etc.

Then to the Faculty Club where I hosted dinner for eight: Mother, the five of us, Greg Tebbe, and Daphne's girlfriend from B.U. A fine event in just the right place; not the least bit hectic. Afterwards we all trooped off to Meg Alexiou's in her new home, very Victorian, just like the one in Brum only in much better repair. Meg vey strange at first, as though drugged (drunk?), but afterwards she warmed up and became her old self. She allowed as she thinks she should help Pavlos's upkeep financially! Dimitri will be coming here for a spell later in the summer. Classes are going well at Harvard but students rate her poorly as a lecturer: boring. She's content-oriented rather than process-oriented. Diana Haas is leaving, to Meg's relief, and one of her own gang is coming, which means that Demotic Greek I & II will be restored at Harvard after the Farmakidis interregnum. We toured the house; the third floor is Michael Hendys's, full of Ottoman treasures, like Topkapi Palace.

Thursday, June 9

Cambridge

Rain! Slight, but a continuous drizzle. Armed with doughnuts and coffee, we arrived at the Square at 8:15 a.m. to discover about 5000 people who had done the same. Waited 1½ hours on line in the rain, to enter the Yard finally, too late to get anywhere closer than Widener. But I wandered off and Alec and I eventually discovered a fine escape from which we could see and hear everything—see in other words the tops of 5000 umbrellas. Chrysanthi and Mother joined us eventually. President Bok was marvelous in his citations. The various groups were stirring in their enthusiasm: Business School waved dollar bills; Public Administration grads waved red tape. A good show, even in the rain. Then picnic in Winthrop courtyard, Gore Hall, with the rain having stopped. Then degrees, announced by Chris Flug and handed by Jim Davis, after which Martha hugged everyone. Lots of hugs and kisses all round: very intimate and touching. They did the alphabet backwards, so Daphne was one of the last of the 160 or so grads. She signed the book, and that was that.

We loaded Leander's car for the apartment in New York and our car for Hanover. Alec went to South Station, Greg to Logan Airport, and Daphne and Leander took off for the city while Chrysanthi, Mother, and I headed home. Listened to continuation of the ceremony. Arias Sánchez, President of Costa Rica, was the speaker. Said that he earned his doctorate (he'd just been awarded an honorary degree) the hard way. Stirring speech about Costa Rica's experiment: no army. And about the obligation of Harvard grads toward the millions of the less privileged in the world.

On Interstate 93 on the way back I dozed; the car struck the guard rail on the left and bounced off, waking me (of course). I didn't even stop. How lucky! We could have flipped over or smacked into another vehicle and all been killed. Mother and Chrysanthi very shaken. Stopped at the Riverside Grill for supper and saw that the impact had been absorbed by the left front hubcap, which had been ripped off. Front light smashed; scratches along the door and fenders. That's all. Close call.

Friday, June 10, 1988

After all that happened in the last two days, very draining emotionally, I had no energy to go today to my Deerfield 40th reunion, even though Bill Knox had telephoned a few weeks ago, strangely, without identifying himself at first, to see if I'd be there. I hadn't spoken with him for almost 40 years! He'd had a nervous breakdown at Princeton but had pulled through. Is now a professor of sociology, married, with family. I remember visiting his apartment in NYC and being glared at by his aristocratic grandfather. Also Bill throwing his clothes on the floor to be picked up by servants, as in Hartley's The Go-Between. All those people are now dead, he tells me, and the apartment has been sold.

But we did go for a lovely, long supper at the Covered Bridge Inn in West Woodstock, with Michael and Teresa Heyman. He's always jolly and sociable; she is strange, but civil at least. Lots of good conversation about the David McLaughlin situation among others, and Sandy McCulloch's amazing growth under this crisis. Michael is apparently still thriving as Chancellor at Berkeley despite all the travel involved, jockeying with the State legislators, etc. He asked me especially about Czeslaw Milosz, who of course is on his faculty but difficult to get to know. I told him of our interesting lunch, when Milosz had spoken so decisively of the similarity between the capitalist and socialist systems, both motivated by fear of mortality, but reacting in different ways, capitalism through the accumulation of wealth as a supposed insurance against contingency, socialism through state guarantees at the expense of individual freedom and initiative. I also recounted Julie Childs' observations when she accompanied her ex-husband to see her father-in-law get a Nobel Prize in biology: all the gaiety and joy of the occasion, except for Milosz, who brought a pall to everything, even there.

June 12, 1988

Dartmouth graduation, which I skipped, although I ought to support Freedman. Tragically, a girl graduate, Stacey Coverdale, whom I taught in English 2-3 four years ago, was killed in an auto accident a few hours after receiving her diploma. Again I realize our good fortune the other day when I'd dozed at the wheel.

June 14, 1988

Kendal Overseers. Alan Hunt came to explain the contract, and we were able to point out some discrepancies, etc. The application for the Certificate of Need will go in shortly. We are resolved now to purchase the land when the option expires in October. I presented the Vining abridgment.

Thursday, June 16, 1988

NYC

Drove to Springfield with Mother, although she is afraid to drive with me now. She'll visit Irving and Clarice tonight, and Amy and Roy, will sleep over, go by chauffeured limousine to Gertrude tomorrow, then have supper with Bubbles, stay at the Yale Club, and visit Edith Buseck on Saturday, then meet me at Penn Station.

I went to Mamet's Speed the Plow, brilliantly performed. It's about a movie mogul confronted with the temptation to do something worthwhile as opposed to something lucrative—and almost, but not quite, succumbing. Just three characters. Marvelously responsive audience.

June 17, 1988

Philadelphia

Publications Committee. Rebecca astounded me by revealing that she's separated from her husband. She too! This wholesome Quaker woman! They'll try once more, this summer, to make it work.

After the Board, long visit with Margery and Alan Walker. I tried to console and encourage her re: this year's problems. She's not ready to resign, she says. Will keep trying. They're eager, and apprehensive, about Kendal.

June 18, 1988

NYC

To Kinhaven campaign meeting at the Chamber Music Society of America, 8th Avenue and 38th, sleazy neighborhood. David Bury, Jim Quinn, George Goodwin. We're making progress. Quinn is wonderful.

Relieved to find Mother at Penn Station as planned. She did everything. Saw Gertrude presumably for the last time; she's very old and very sick, with round the clock nurses, but still compos mentis. Irving also looking old and sick. Mother had no regrets when she reentered 20 East 74th Street. George Goodwin and a daughter accompanied us on the train; then we delivered them to Amherst and got home by midnight.

Sunday, June 19, 1988

Hanover-Riparius

Kent Hatch and family for breakfast. He's working for GE in Cincinnati, editing their in-house magazine, having left the teaching profession. To Meeting. Jean Brophy there, newly arrived with her "spouse" to take up the administration of Kendal. Jack Shepherd will be the new clerk (and also the new convener of College Course 1). I'm still archivist. Peter Stettenheim looking well after his triple by-pass operation.

Daphne home after settling in at 220 West 93rd Street. House full of her Harvard friends for a last fling, including the estranged roommate Lauri, who decided to be pleasant at the end.

Frantically packed for the summer. Waited for Dick Dellamora, who'll be occupying the house for six weeks. He came and we left at 5:00 p.m. Rendezvous with Leander (already at the farm) at Montcalm restaurant. Free at last!

Monday, June 20, 1988

Terpni!

Today the Princeton board meets on my book. ICL has met several times on AMTRAK, always favorably. But the big decisions come at the end of the month. Couldn't start the tractor, even though I'd spent $50 on the magneto, as usual. Smoke, but that's all. Probably faulty timing. I've resolved to get a new one. We have $18,000 surplus because Daphne is no longer in college, plus raise of about $7000 in our combined Dartmouth salaries. Went immediately with Leander to look at a Ford in Queensbury, then a Ford in Granville. Leander continued on to Kinhaven to begin the season there.

(Forgot to mention the crisis there between Jerry and Pat as a result of our committee supporting Pat's abhorrence of janitorial duties. Head-on collision. Jerry ended by hiring a cleaning agency. Pat threatened to resign but didn't.)

June 21, 1988

Looking at tractors. To Schroon Lake for John Deere. Prices vary considerably. Meanwhile we're also worried about the well. Is it still polluted? Took a sample to the lab yesterday. Spoke to Art Perryman about tractors.

Wednesday, June 22, 1988

To Bud Rodick in Schroon at Art's recommendation. He has Kioti tractors, imitation Kubotas made in Korea. Quite cheap. Went to Keith Leggett in Chestertown, who bought one and is happy. But I fear an upstart company. Who knows if they'll exist 30 years from now, or 5. But Rodick has a six-foot used sicklebar mower for $800. We're going to buy this instead of a rotary. Lead, via Art, on a John Deere place in Hudson Falls.

Thursday, June 23, 1988

A great day! (1) Purchased a new 1988 No. 850 John Deere tractor from the Glens Falls place and received delivery a few hours later. (2) Received a letter from Bob Brown saying that the Princeton board had accepted my book, unanimously. Also Tom Trezize's on Beckett's Trilogy, which I had recommended to them.

But the well is polluted. Can't win. It is undoubtedly the dry well for the kitchen sink, which I'd stupidly placed 15 feet from the well, thinking all water followed the ground course of the water table toward the Hudson River.

I've started preparing my MS for Princeton. The computer version can be sent to them over Bitnet. But I've got to put in all the Greek with the Macintosh.

June 24, 1988

Jacques and Hilda Grunblatt for coffee. They're finally going to publish one of Jacques' translations.

June 25, 1988

To Johnsbury high school graduation at 2:00 p.m. because Ellen Grunblatt was the speaker. She spoke well about women's lib, sweetly and rationally, not angrily. Then to picnic at Art's: surprise party for his 50th birthday. Long talk with Ann's husband, a dairy farmer south of Syracuse. Lots of his neighbors are Amish and they all get along beautifully. His farm never jeopardized, like those in Iowa, because he and his father before him never bought anything on credit. It's as simple as that, he says. Also met Jim Smith, who's running for town board on the Republican ticket. Formerly head of maintenance at the Sagamore; now a sign painter, locally. And Sarge Van Keuren and his wife Alice, whom we haven't seen for ages. And Arnold, who makes Art's frames and is a fellow Republican councilman.

Sunday, June 26, 1988

Alec arrived, excited about a marvelously stimulating conference at Westtown run by David Mallory. He explained it all over dinner at Smith's, where we ran into Jerry and Rosine Gardner, newly arrived home after Jerry's ill-fated year as a French teacher in Moriah. All our stomachs are queasy owing to our polluted well. Chrysanthi is boiling all the water, but we've got to start importing drinking water from elsewhere.

Monday, June 27, 1988

Daphne starts work today at Simon and Schuster in their offices at Columbus Circle, in the "travel book" section. Actually, they're trying to develop a competitor to Let's Go.

Driving the John Deere and studying the manual. It's complicated.

Wednesday, June 29, 1988

Mr. Frank West of NiMo (Niagara Mohawk) came to discuss the possibility of electricity for Alec's cabin. Best bet is for us to dig a trench and lay the cable. Bud Rodick delivered and hooked up the mower. I'm mowing! Six feet at a time, effortlessly (but it's still work, of a sort).

Michael Dixon, a friend of Alec's from the Westtown Conference, is here for two days. A black raised in the inner city of Cleveland and appalled by crime, violence, drug addiction, etc. Currently teaching on the Kentucky border of Ohio in a vocational school—white hillbillies totally antagonistic to education of any sort. At Dartmouth and at Friends Central we are in a different world, and don't always realize this.

Van Keuren will give me an estimate on a septic system. Says we should drill a well; will never salvage our existing one. I hate the thought of this modernization. Even the John Deere seems wrong here, to tell the truth.

July 2, 1988

Alec is putting a collar around his well to keep out rodents and ground water. We should do the same. Marvin (Pinky) O'Dell, electrician and general handy man, will put in a service entrance. He's a character: born-again Christian whose business card declares "My boss is a Jewish carpenter." He's about to sell his house and go off with family in a trailer to be a carpenter/electrician missionary, donating his services for subsistence to worthy causes.

July 4, 1988

No fireworks for us this year, thank God. Chrysanthi went folk dancing and Alec and I went to Art's cabin to meet Richard Stewart, the man who writes so many letters to the North Creek Enterprise. Lots of good gossip. He hoped we'd keep our dug well and restore it.

July 5, 1988

Heat wave. The pond is delicious. We traveled back on the NiMo cutting yesterday as it goes toward North Creek, all the way back on Waddell Road to the end, then maybe another mile through this path through the forest, a remarkable feat of engineering. But it suddenly stops. Presumably they'll come in from the other end to do the remainder. Richard Stewart was scathing about the high-handedness of NiMo in dealing with individual landowners. We luckily escaped by a hair's breadth. They could have cut our farm in half, as they did the Waddell farm across the road, rendering it worthless.

July 6, 1988

Chrysanthi went to Granville to pick strawberries with Chris Perryman. I was telephoned by Adam Seessel in Raleigh, NC to be interviewed for his newspaper re: the forthcoming movie of The Last Temptation which, even before release, is exercising the fundamentalist Christians, who are denouncing it. I sent him my PH pamphlet. Some haying when it cooled off. Then a delicious swim, then violin-piano with Alec: Corelli, Brahms, Kreisler. How nice! I've finished going through the Kazantzakis MS and must now enter the changes on the computer when we go to Hanover.

July 7, 1988

To Saratoga to ballet matinee with the Shapiros. [This brings the diary up to date.] Picnic lunch joined by another couple with three obnoxious grandchildren: two sullenly silent girls and a boy who declared that the only reason he came was to get away from his brother for the afternoon. The program was "Interplay," which Jerome Robbins did for Billy Rose's Ziegfeld Follies in 1945: abstract, colorful, delightful; then "Tea-Rose" to music by George Gershwin that I found consistently third-rate, but nice dancing, and some humor; lastly Balanchine's extravaganza "Stars and Stripes" to music by John Philip Sousa, with a lovely pas de deux by Kyra Nichols and Jock Soto. As always, ballet carries one out of this world to a fairyland of abstract youthfulness, weightlessness, and harmony, which is why it's so satisfying. Saw Mel and Herb Goertz during intermission by accident, just as we had last year.

Home to hamburgers with Alec. Then to Johnsbury Town Council under the new Supervisor, Bill Montfort, and the new openness (Glasnost!) that encourages observation and participation. Held this time in Wevertown Town Hall; fine until the mosquitoes invaded through the screen-less windows. Norma Rawson gave me a warm "hello" at the coffee break. Hilda and Jacques were there, of course; and the dowser, Ted Kaufman; and Arnold, Art's friend, who read a prepared ordinance very impressively; and Mrs. Rodney Sargent, whom I asked to convey belated thanks to her husband for the ambulance service that saved me when I had the gall bladder attack; and the new highway superintendent, Fred Hitchcock, very young. It wasn't at all as grim as Art and Jacques had led me to believe. On the surface, at least, Montfort seemed to have a cordial relationship with the Councilors (all Republicans): Leon Prouty, Art Arsenault, Helen Cornwall (she came up to me with a big smile and said how nice it was to collect my taxes for 27 years). The Councilors spoke, didn't just glower in silence, as I'd been told. Montfort garrulous and repetitive, but bright, dedicated, well prepared. The chief issues were recycling and garbage collection; ORDA was not on the agenda.

July 12, 1988

So many visitors, all in one day. Marty Cooper came to say that our forest really isn't ready for cutting. He'd walked it last fall. There's a good stand of pine along the road, however. Then Michael and Laura Gouthreau showed up to see Alec's cabin (the electric wiring is almost complete, although we've decided to go the route of a generator, which means gas stove, lights, and refrigerator); then Irv and Fran and then Rosine in the evening to convince Alec that turning 30 isn't so depressing after all.

Carson Bunker will come in two weeks to put in a septic tank and seepage pit (dry well). I'm resisting a drilled well, however. I want to keep us pumping by hand, resisting mechanization even if in inconsistent, symbolic ways (the tractor is the other side of the coin, of course).

Last Sunday, in Alec's truck, we explored the new high voltage line all the way back on Waddell Road and then through the forest, on and on, until it suddenly stopped in the middle of nowhere. Presumably they'll come in from North Creek and meet in the middle. An amazing feat of engineering, although horrible in that it's all generated by skiing, as Michael assured us: he sits at the top of the gondola and runs the electric motor, now at the limit of the capacity of the existing amperage.

Mowing progresses. We've had 98° weather for a week, which slowed everything down, but now it's better. I've done ten hours on the new tractor and must service it today Finished a spate of books on World War I and its literature. What a horror! Yet we're ready to repeat at any time. I'm encouraged in my pacifism.

July 13, 1988

First trouble with the mower. A rock knocked the blade 30° out of line. But I discovered later that this is a safety measure—i.e., it's meant to happen. So Alec and I restored things to normal.

July 14, 1988

Ballet again with Irv and Fran. Balanchine's "Slaughter on Tenth Avenue," short ballets with music by Cage and Gottschalk, then Balanchine's "Who Cares" to songs by Gershwin, starring Patricia McBride and Robert LaFosse. Lovely, as always, and varied. Met Donna by accident, on an afternoon's break from a conference. With her the head of mechanics' training at BOCES. Told me that no one is simply a mechanic any more. Motors are too complicated. They graduate with specialties in electric, hydraulic, ignition, etc.

July 15, 1988

Sir Ernst Gombrich says that "the humanities are the memory of culture." Cited by Frank Kermode, Forms of Attention, p. 27.

Saturday, July 16, 1988

Up early. Breakfast in the diner in Lake George, another one of our στέκια. To Blue Gentian Lodge: another στέκι. Swim in pool. Sweltering heat. Board meeting. The big question is: should Kinhaven run for five weeks to ease recruitment? If so, it could add a two-week program for pre-teens. I'll be in the middle of this controversy as the next president.

Supper at Ike Patch's, elaborately catered (alas). Met Jim Quinn's wife and daughter. Then faculty concert. Leander played only briefly, a modern piece for piano, trumpet, and trombone.

Sunday, July 17, 1988

Board, a.m. Alec brought Yiayia from Hanover for the children's concert. Very fine groups. Shostakovich's symphony stirring. James McBride also in the audience. He's now a songwriter/jazz musician. To dinner with Alec, Leander, Yiayia to celebrate our 37th anniversary. They even paid the bill!

To Hanover. Dick Dellamora is renting our house. Nice to catch up. He's disgusted with the petty politicking of the School of Criticism, especially the feminists.

Monday-Thursday, July 18-21, 1988

Working hard on the computer to prepare the final version of my MS for Princeton University Press. Finally transmitted the entire book to Princeton via Bitnet. But Greek passages have to be entered on hard copy by hand. Lots of trouble printing them out on laser printer because of incompatibilities in the "system." Ordered books for WWI course in the fall and for English 2. Dinner Wednesday with Walter and Miriam Arndt. He is suffering physically somewhat (muscle disorder) but still witty and playful; she compulsively talkative.

I altered the preface to Being Seventy because Mrs. Vining wrote to say that she has 14 honorary degrees, not 13! Thursday p.m. drove directly to Saratoga. Alec met us for dinner in the Hall of Springs. Then delicious ballet, especially "Space," which ended with dancers in furious orbit, like planets, around four dancers in the center. Also on the program: Copland's "Bounding Live," and Bernstein's "Fancy Free," all part of the festival of American dance.

Friday, July 22, 1988

Riparius

Back here after almost a week away. Started pasting in the Greek on hard copy. Alec's "quartet" arrived: two young Japanese, Naoko (viola) and Matsuo (violin), he a research biological engineer working for the Olympus Company and placed in the University of Pennsylvania for three years. Lovely couple. We played after supper: Haydn, Mozart. Later came Steve and Diane, psychiatrist and obstetrician. He's the 'cellist.

Saturday, July 23, 1988

Finished pasting. MSS are wrapped and ready to be posted on Monday.

Big controversy re: the film of The Last Temptation. Campus Crusade for Christ is trying to ban it, to buy up and destroy all copies. Αίολος!

Played Haydn and Mozart again, this time with the 'cello. Worked on the slow movement and the Mozart Quintet. Then mowed.

In the evening, we "performed" for Shapiros, Gouthreaus, Gardners, and Perrymans (plus Art's sister Diane and her beau, Phil, a Kentucky lawyer), and assorted children. The living room has never been so full. I played without the customary nervousness. Phil is interesting. He was stationed as a Navy lawyer during the Vietnam War. Obsessed with the East. Suffered depression upon return, as did Alec. Identified with the Marlow figure in Apocalypse Now.

Sunday, July 24, 1988

Alec's quartet is chinking the cabin. It's now about ½ done, with okum, that is, and wire mesh for the mortar. Later in the day Leander arrived with Larry Wright (trumpeter) and Caroline (hornist). We had a jolly supper—two huge steaks—and were then kept in stitches by Caroline's good humor. Richard Hyde, former Dartmouth chaplain, whose book I vetted recently, came last of all. Full house.

Monday, July 25, 1988

A larger crew is chinking. Nice company, except for Hyde, whom Chrysanthi despises as a sponger and egomaniac. But I enjoy him intellectually if not morally. We had a lovely conversation this afternoon, both floating for an hour in the pond. He understands perfectly Kazantzakis's major point: that when a culture begins to fall apart ethically, the cause is the lack of a viable myth. Everyone left by suppertime, to Chrysanthi's great relief. Then Art Perryman and I drove to Blue Mountain Lake in Art's Cadillac to hear Bob McGrath lecture most excellently on Tait's and Homer's depiction of the sporting scene in the Adirondacks. Bob is wildly enthusiastic about Winslow Homer, calling him the equal of Cézanne, etc. On the way back, however, Art was perceptive about Bob's probable excesses of interpretation—e.g., that Homer's flying trout depict a Darwinian rather than a providential universe. Asa Gray rather than Louis Agassiz. Returned to the Perrymans' and talked until after midnight. They're going to set up a trust fund to insure that taxes and upkeep on their Adirondack property are met.

Big controversy re: the movie of The Last Temptation. Campus Crusade for Christ and that ilk want to destroy all prints and prevent distribution. Universal Pictures printed a full-page ad in the Times reaffirming freedom of speech, multiplicity of truth, etc. My PH pamphlet is totally relevant, but of course no one at Universal ever heard of it.

Finished mowing. Και του χρόνου!

July 26, 1988

Reading Vera Brittain's Testament of Youth. Brenda Silver exhorted me to include it in the WWI course, to give women a place. It's mediocre on literature, and flat stylistically, but poignant "informationly."

To Rossini's The Barber of Seville at Lake George Opera, complementary tickets furnished by Harry Teahan, the percussionist and my former student. So deliciously funny, a romp, able to mask over all cares . . . temporarily. Proceeded by dinner at the Jade Palace with Fran and Irv and Aser and Evelyn Rothstein.

July 27, 1988

Finished Vera Brittain. Bob and Susan McGrath stopped for lunch on their way home from Blue Mountain Lake. Bob is genuinely enthusiastic about my cabin, and appreciative of its Thoreauian origins.

Yesterday, at supper, Mrs. Rothstein asked if Alec and Chrysanthi had read my Kazantzakis and Politics in manuscript, and I had to reply, "No. No one in my family reads anything I write." So be it!

July 29, 1988

Alec's birthday. Age 30. He's done all the caulking with okum and has almost finished with the metal mesh. Next comes the cement chinking. I gave him a large toolbox plus some trowels—very timely.

Reading Mary Rose O'Reilley's The Peaceable Classroom, submitted to Pendle Hill. Very fine. For example: ¶ I think the question for each of us—doctor, lawyer, storekeeper, priest—is Does your daily work contribute to peace and justice, or does it not? This brings us . . . to something like the Buddhist concept of right livelihood. "Select a vocation which helps realize your ideal of compassion," as the Vietnamese Buddhist Thich Nh'at Hanh phrases it. And having selected it, select it again every day, lest you get bogged down in bureaucracy and paperwork and forget what you are doing.

Another heat wave. Worked with the Jari around several rock piles. Carburetor needs adjustment. Exhausting work. But I'm not over-extending myself any more. Stopped when my heart was pounding, and took a delicious swim.

July 30, 1988

Yasuo and Naoko are back. We had a long conversation over breakfast about life in Japan vs. America. Am working today on JMGS business—a response to Vassilis Lambropoulos’s critique of MG scholarship, and a review of Kazantzakis’s children’s novel At the Palaces of Knossos. I feel impelled to write a long letter to Bill Knox, my Deerfield classmate who surfaced last month after 40 years.

July 31, 1988

Removed a nest of worms from behind the barnwood sheathing of the kitchen. Used our new gadget, an electric-powered “weed wacker” from Sears: a trimmer.

Aser and Evelyn Rothstein for supper. She’s a blabbermouth but he is extraordinary. Not only a world class scientist but one with the gift of explaining his work clearly to a layman like myself. He brought us up to date on the amazing breakthrough that occurred in his institute: the location of the mutated gene responsible for cystic fibrosis. This is presumably what causes a malfunctioning in the cells of the trachea and pulmonary passages, preventing them from secreting sodium chloride (salt), which in turn attracts water, which lubricates the passages, allowing mucus to pass up and down freely. Aser’s own research involves the mechanisms (involving hormones, chiefly) that trigger the passage of chemicals through the cell walls. The problem now is to find precisely where, along the chain of cause and effect, the defect occurs. That’s still a mystery. But knowing the gene enables doctors to identify foetuses with cystic fibrosis and to give the mother a chance to abort them. I felt, as Aser went on in his totally lucid manner about all this, that truly there must be a God. What a wonderful machine is the human being!

Queried about alopecia, Aser said that scientists now firmly believe, through lots of evidence, that the immune system is affected by psychological states. Thus the likeliest explanation for Alec’s disease is the breakup with his girlfriend, not the creosote applied to his logs.

August 4, 1988

I’m writing an op-ed piece for the New York Times on Scorsese’s film of The Last Temptation, more precisely on the fundamentalist opposition to it. Finished Barbusse’s Under Fire, very good toward the end. Yesterday read H. G. Wells’s Mr Brittling Sees It Through, useful for the civilians' point of view of the war. This afternoon Alec and I spent six hours putting in outlets and switches.

August 5, 1988

Finished the wiring of Alec's cabin. To Shapiros for supper with the Adlers. Daphne is coming. She's unhappy in her apartment; the landlady seems to be a kleptomaniac. I'll try to convince her to go to the Pennington. Must start work on a talk on nature to be given to the Rotary in North Creek next Wednesday.

Milly Adler showed us her latest work after supper, a series of portrait-heads of imaginary people, all "typical," and most destitute, old, tired, tense. "Today's world!" as Art Perryman astutely commented. Wonderful work, inexhaustibly imaginative. Milly confessed that at age 16 she was sure that she would make the world a better place through her art. Ah . . . fond dreams. But, as Shaw says, such art does teach us to see better, to feel more sensitively. All these faces are evident daily on the New York subway (where Milly sometimes furtively sketches), but we gaze downward or bury our own faces in the newspaper.

The Scorsese imbroglia is getting more acute. Zeffirelli called the film disgusting but Scorsese says that Z. never saw it. My op-ed piece is good, I think.

Daphne is in better spirits than we expected. She evidently has recuperative powers. She'll put a lock on her door. Now she suspects one of the men—Shaun—as the light-fingered one, and hopes that he'll move.

August 6, 1988

Working on the nature talk for the Rotary. Then dove to Weston, alone, since Chrysanthi chose to stay here with Daphne. Dinner at the "Inn at Long Last," in Chester, Jack Coleman's place, with Ned Perrin and Janet Alquist. Then to Kinhaven concert. Leander and Sandy played Mozart four-hands very nicely.

August 8, 1988

Riparius

I'm in contact repeatedly with Howard Goldberg, op-ed editor of the Times, regarding my piece against the critics of Scorsese's The Last Temptation. Goldberg at first gruff and hurried, but loosened up gradually; eventually confided that he's married to an old friend of mine, Beatrice Tauss! (No longer teaching at Juilliard; at home, writing.)

August 9, 1988

Bob Morse, real estate agent in Wevertown, invited us to supper to see Don Kurka, here on a visit with his son. Nice reunion. He's painting, as always; hopes to build a cottage on the land he wisely retained when he sold his house. Also there: Tortora and wife, father of Julia, whom I uncharitably call the "putana." More telephone calls to Goldberg. He has made me add a new first paragraph to come in more angrily at the start.

August 10, 1988

We're continuing to pump out the well, but it fills up more quickly than our little pump can drain it. This afternoon I dug out the offending dry well and put a temporary pipe to another hole far away, behind the privy. Swam and then joined Art Perryman to go to Rotary, where I spoke on "The Nature of Nature." Electricity went off as we started dinner, plus the air conditioning, but luckily it came on again in time for my talk (which would have been impossible otherwise, since I read it, of course), then went out again soon after we'd finished. Lucky. Kurka and his son came, also Tortoras, Grunblatts, Jim Smith, Art and Chris, and lots of people I of course didn't know.

Meanwhile, people keep calling me about The Last Temptation. Apparently Scorsese on television said he didn't like the translation: too flowery. My piece will be in tomorrow.

August 11, 1988

Telephone call from a Boston rabbi at 8:00 a.m. to say he liked the piece but wished I hadn't slurred the Pharisees who, ironically, were devoted to interpretation, not literalism, as I implied. At least I used a lowercase "p." . . . Visit from Rev. Giles, Methodist, born-again, vacationing in the campgrounds in Riparius, to try to explain the horror of true Christians at what Kazantzakis/Scorsese had done. Courteous young man. Said that Renan, Higher Criticism, etc. were what misled everyone: the whole truth is in the gospels. Period! Calls from California, Boston, and NH Public Radio for interviews. A busy time.

August 12, 1988

Nice letter from Bob Oden praising my piece. Also from the editor of Adirondack Life. Telephone call from Warder Cadbury, whom I'd been thinking about recently. Other letters, all supportive, except one from a born-again Christian. Letter from Donald Swann in London. I sent him my piece; he wants to publish something in the UK re: the controversy.

Christos Alexiou has a daughter by Eri Stavropoulou, out of wedlock. What next? I've written my congratulations and have sent my op-ed piece.

Saturday, August 13, 1988

We've finished building up the well a bit to raise it above ground; made a cement lip to seal the cap. Started the plywood form for the cap. Can't seem to empty the well, however, with our little pump; it fills in too quickly. No matter. Maybe repeated Clorox treatments and removal of the offending drywell will do the trick.

Sunday, August 14, 1988

In the morning, Pinky O'Dell rushed in, all dressed up for church, to check Alec's wiring. All in order, he says. Next project: installing the chimney and stove. Doug Ross is here with Jeremy and Ann, his two beautiful, exemplary children. He's loving, warm, but at the same time firm when he says No, a winning combination, it seems. He and Alec are cutting a hole in the roof for the metal stovepipe.

Monday, August 15, 1988

Yannis Karavidas telephoned from London to arrange a BBC interview. Three questions: (α) Τι ήταν η άμεση αιτία του σκανδάλου, (β') Τι έγινε όταν εκδόθηκε το βιβλίο; (γ') ο Καζαντζάκης είναι δημοφιλής στην Αμερική; The interviewer will be Εροφίλη Μαρωνίτη, κόρη του καθηγητά. I have until Wednesday to prepare.

Reading Jaroslav Hašek's The Good Soldier Švejk and His Fortunes in the World War, utterly delightful and brilliant.

Tuesday, August 16, 1988

Caught Alec's cold. Headache, sore throat, fatigue. Horrors! But I've finished the cap for the well; worked all day yesterday, practically, mixing six batches of cement, using reinforcing rods, wire mesh, etc. Now it's so heavy, we won't be able to lift it.

Wednesday, August 17, 1988

All day in bed, except for the BBC interview, which went well enough, I think, since I'd prepared extensive answers. Leander arrived, enthusiastic over the best Kinhaven session since his first year. The little girl from Honduras was a brilliant success, ending with a fine performance of the Trout. At first she could hardly play, and was totally withdrawn. The whole school cheered. Leander had given her a lesson every day for two weeks, and she worked and worked. Now we have the problem of whether to go to a five-week session. The staff are opposed, Jerry and Nancy in favor, and I, as president, will be caught in the middle. Our first meeting is on September 11.

Nice letter on my op-ed piece from Bob Gersten at Brant Lake Camp, another from former student Bruce Brown.

Thursday, August 18, 1988

They're stringing the wires on the high tension line. Also, the town has finally come to scrape our road, which has been chopped up terribly by all the construction this summer.

Feeling better. A day in bed does wonders. Nurse came this afternoon to examine me for TIAA life insurance: $150,000, recommended by Leonard Bain, our financial consultant. My net worth is over $1 million, which of course doesn't mean much these days but still sounds nice.

Friday, August 19, 1988

Another full day. Began by going to Chestertown Health Center for blood test associated with the TIAA exam. Returned to drag former well covers, by tractor, up to Alec's well, where they'll serve temporarily. Then the three of us (Alec, Leander, and I) tipped the new well cover up on end and removed the wooden mould, and turned the cover over on the other side so that that half could cure. Then tried again, egged on by Alec, to empty the well. First with pails-full, hauling the pail up on a pulley, the rope pulled by Leander and me as though by two yoked oxen. Chrysanthi was in hysterics. Then tried with the little gas pump we have, but it wouldn't draw, so we lowered it into the well where it drew but filled the well with CO<sub>2</sub>. So we placed a fan at the lip to draw out the fumes. All of this accomplishing practically nothing since the pump draws so little. So Alec called various people in various local fire departments, and finally got John Armstrong to promise us a pump at 5:00 p.m. from the Riverside Fire House. This Alec got, but the intake hose barely reached to our water level. Finally we got it to work. It spewed out gallons and gallons all over the ground, there being no outlet hose. A mess. But we got the water level down to about 15 inches from the bottom. By this time it was 6:00 p.m. and we were due at Jerry and Rosine Gardner's for dinner at 6:30. Called them and explained. Lowered a ladder. Then John Alexander drove up with his two adorable children and helped. Alec went down the ladder and into the water and felt around. Nothing. No carcasses, no dead bodies. Raised the ladder. Washed and dressed. Returned the pump to the fire station. Appeared at the Gardners still shaking. Their children, Simon and the girl—hyperactive, relentless, undisciplined—drove me to distraction. But somehow we got through the meal and crawled home thankfully into bed.

More nice mail re: my op-ed piece. A lovely letter from a former student who said I'd taught him to appreciate literature twenty years ago.

Saturday, August 20, 1988

Everyone sick. Alec's throat culture came back positive. Strep throat. He and Leander went off nevertheless to Hanover to see Ignat Solzhenitsyn's recital tonight. But Alec landed in bed and we got Jacques to telephone a prescription for antibiotics to Eastman's.

More mail, including a lovely note from Jim Clancy.

Still sick, but no strep throat yet.

Yesterday Elizabeth Marleyn telephoned from Bristol to interview me. She and Robin are well. He's retired at age 50.

Today a student from the "D" interviewed me. We'll see what gibberish he makes of my statement.

Jacques and Hilda came for supper.

Started reading Arnold Zweig's The Case of Sergeant Grischa.

Sunday, August 21, 1988

Cold worse. All day in bed. To lose a day like this is horrible. At least I typed up my BBC interview to send it to various people. Telephoned Leander. Alec still sick, in bed. Leander met Alexander Solzhenitsyn at Ignat's concert. He was all smiles, very gracious. Pappous fell again. His legs can't support him at all now, just collapsed under him.

Monday, August 22, 1988

Long phone conversation with Tom and Becky Shankland, to get Elizabeth Marleyn's address. Both of their children went to Harvard but didn't know Daphne. Becky teaches 12th grade high school and advanced placement. She's very happy in Los Alamos.

Cold a bit better. My eyes didn't burn this morning.

Saturday, August 27, 1988

James McBride is here for the weekend. He liked my piece in the Times. Is now a song writer, doing journalism sporadically. Whole family went to the movies in Queensbury.

Tuesday, August 30, 1988

Carson Bunker has finally arrived to excavate for our septic tank and seepage tank. A “character”—tragic (lost two daughters to muscular dystrophy, a third barely survived leukemia) but irrepressibly joyous. A noble spirit: honest, simple, grateful. Very religious. Convinced that leukemia survival was a miracle engineered by God. A marvel with his machine; makes it veritably human. The huge hole he dug for the septic tank was perfect on the first try: walls vertical, size exactly right, bottom precisely level. We all appreciated his language: after a beautiful maneuver with the backhoe, picking up a huge boulder as though it were a pebble, “Darn bit better’n a hand shovel!” Anything great in quantity or quality is “more than you can shake a stick at,” etc.

Wednesday, August 31, 1988

Carson back. Plus Sarge Van Keuren to lay the pipes. The tanks were meant to be delivered at 12:30 from Greenwich. Carson, Sarge, another local, and I “chewed the fat” until the truck came finally at 2:00 p.m. The tank weighs five tons; the trucker lowered the two sections with precision and delicacy, articulating one onto the other exactly right. Who says machinery dehumanizes the worker? These men exult in their skill; they are craftsmen just as much as a medieval worker was. Sarge fitted the sewer line to one inlet on the tank, and the seepage line to the outlet, connecting to the seepage tank, out beyond the electric pole. 90 feet of pipe all told. I mapped everything so we’ll know if and when the tanks need to be cleaned. Carson also excavated for our future bathroom (which I really don’t want, and which Chrysanthi, who demanded it earlier, is also now no longer so eager to have).

Thursday, September 1, 1988

Carson again, to finish the back fill and smoothing out. Again, beautiful work. He waxed enthusiastic about Mosher’s Diner, where the daily special is only $3.95. We thanked him profusely (and also paid him $1500). Leander wants to write a thanks to be published in the News-Enterprise.

Friday, September 2, 1988

Half asleep last night, I thought of a kind of extravaganza to write about Carson, and typed it out this morning:

Watching Carson Bunker on his backhoe makes me remember what we often forget in these days of high-tech: that tools and technology are extensions of human or natural capability.

What is the bicycle, after all, but a better pair of legs to run with? What are binoculars but better eyes to see with? As for digging, the gopher carves out a tunnel lickety-split with two incisors, and a mole can burrow more than seventy-five yards in a single night with its tiny forepaws. But the backhoe, combining as it does the gopher's teeth with the mole's claws, puts both to shame. And when Carson Bunker is at the controls, it becomes positively human—a twenty-foot anthropoidal extension of our puny arm, complete with elbow and wrist joints, capacious palm, and talons that make your blood run cold.

Carson's backhoe has all the emotions of the human hand. It slaps, scratches, bangs, and punches when it's angry; but it can also caress, pat, and smooth with the tender delicacy of a mother putting her child to bed.

Enough of the fashionable reaction against machinery! One hears that pride in work is passé and that craftsmanship is dead, all because of technology. Carson Bunker refutes this nonsense.

Watching him on top of his monster, smiling from ear to ear as he fingers the controls with divine assurance, I finally understand how God created the earth. It was with a backhoe. A backhoe sporting a neck three hundred million miles long.

God climbed up onto his machine in heaven and saw the mess below. "What chaos!" he exclaimed. "We'll have to do something about that." So he gathered the waters under the heavens into one place and let dry land appear. And he smiled just like Carson, because he saw that it was good. Then he exalted the mountains and debased the valleys. And in a moment of inspiration, with one huge swipe, he carved out Lake George, swung the arm round to North Creek, and dumped the fill to make Gore Mountain, loading it with garnet on the inside and ski-slopes on the outside as a sign of his supernal beneficence. And the angels applauded. "Darn bit better than a hand shovel!" quipped God, smirking from ear to ear. Then, to show off, he dug more septic-tank holes than you can shake a stick at—60,000 in ten minutes, with his eyes closed, working the levers with his toes. (“Look, seraphim, no hands!”) And he said to the Archangel Gabriel, “Hop into the bucket and I’ll deposit you in the holes so you can check them.” And Gabriel went down into the holes and found that each and every one had walls absolutely vertical, angles absolutely square, and a bottom absolutely level, on the first try. And God stood up on top of his machine to get a better view and he saw that they were mighty good.

But even God makes a bit of a mess when he works. So he swiveled the seat on his three-hundred-million-mile backhoe, turned round the other way, and sped down to earth to put things right. He scooped up all the unwanted stones into his front-loader bucket, packed down the back-filled trenches so they wouldn’t settle later on and spoil people’s lawns, and smoothed the earth until it shone like glass. Then he loaded his machine onto its carrier and sped back to heaven. But half-way home he had a sudden notion to turn round again. “Drat,” he exclaimed to himself, “I forgot to excavate a natural swimming hole beneath Gore Mountain. That means they’ll need a dam.” But he continued on his way. “Better let them deal with that on their own,” he decided with divine wisdom, “and not get myself into hot water.”

And God returned to heaven, satisfied. And it was the end of the sixth day. So God rested from all the work that he had done, taking a wee nap. But at suppertime he decided to celebrate. So he treated himself to the Saturday night special at Mosher’s Diner—chicken and biscuits, a heavenly bargain at only $3.95!

Saturday, September 3, 1988

Decided to eat at Mosher’s Diner to verify menu and price. Met Mary and Maureen Fitzgerald, who invited us to their table. Spent a pleasant two hours. When I recited my Carson Bunker piece to them they warned me strongly against publishing it, saying it would be misunderstood, perceived as ridiculing Carson rather than praising him, and also perceived as blasphemous toward God by Carson and other fundamentalists. I got the message.

Monday, September 5, 1988

Mother called that Father had pneumonia again. We agreed not to move him to hospital but to treat him in the nursing home. Likelihood that he would die. We did all we could to close the place, and returned home late.

Tuesday, September 6, 1988

Hanover

Father still alive. I confirmed all the funeral arrangements, made during the first pneumonia in 1986. I want to bury the urn at the farm. Mother likes the idea. Chrysanthi doesn't. By evening, his temperature decreased.

Wednesday, September 7, 1988

Riparius

I skipped back alone to Riparius to finish closing. A long day, 7:00 a.m. to 1:00 a.m. Fertilized area that we reseeded, over the excavation. Completed putting up the tractor, after having gotten some rust inhibitor, etc. from Tim Havens in Hudson Falls. Took care of the barrel, etc. Nice Italian dinner in Lake George; beautiful blonde waitress. Life's small pleasures!

Thursday, September 8, 1988

Hanover

First obligation: meeting for freshman advisers. Boring. Letter from Donald Swann, who sent my New York Times piece to the Manchester Guardian, whose editor wrote a large editorial citing it and, in effect, plagiarizing most of it. Same day: letter from Herb Wekselblatt, long lost friend. Also one from . . . David McLaughlin!

Friday, September 9, 1988

Working steadily on the shortening and simplification of my Bristol MS. As always, the result is better. Mother and I had long talk over supper. She admitted that she was actually disappointed that Father didn't die in the past few days. He wants to die; we all want him to die. His life is no longer meaningful; he is almost totally unresponsive to us, hardly acknowledges even Mother's presence; can no longer walk or hardly talk. We agreed that henceforth there would be no antibiotics, just aspirin. Later, his temperature went back up. I instructed the doctor as we had decided; Mother concurred.

Saturday, September 10, 1988

NYC

To Amherst to see George Goodwin, who turned over the Kinhaven files. Chrysanthi felt she should stay home, to support Mother. I concurred, although we'd planned the weekend with Daphne. AMTRAK to New York. Daphne and a friend met me at the Yale Club. We had a nice supper and went to the theater: "M. Butterfly," a startling reversal of Mme Butterfly in which the one who is humiliated turns out to be the Western male rather than the oriental female. Daphne is a lovely companion, bright, talkative, a charmer. Fortunately, she likes New York. She likes spending money, going places, parties. The job at S & S is immensely satisfying so far. Only the living arrangements are disappointing, but bearable.

Sunday, September 11, 1988

Kinhaven ad hoc committee: the "5-7" committee on the question of whether we should keep the 7 week session or change to a 5 week one. This is my first official time as the new president.

Monday, September 12, 1988

Father still alive when I returned last night. But Mother and Chrysanthi had a hard time yesterday. Trying to feed him, they were petrified when he choked, turned purple. Nurse had to suction out phlegm. Decision henceforth not to try to feed him. I saw Jim Strickler by chance at breakfast at Anchovies with Jean Brophy about Kendal matters. Later he called and I hastened to the Terrace. Father very agitated, sweating, gasping, looking very uncomfortable. Jim the exemplary physician. Told us it was the end. Mother concerned solely that Father be peaceful. Jim said he'd administer morphine, not a lethal dose, but enough to bring "euphoria" and also, perhaps, to strain the heart of a man of that age. We agreed. Took Mother across to the Greens for tea. Father much calmer an hour later, but breathing heavily. Jim administered oxygen to help. We went home. At 11 p.m. they called; he had died. We all gathered in the room. He was on his back mouth open . . . quiet. Mother said he looked just like he did when he slept in the old days, always with his mouth open. Mother very brave. No hysterics. The nurse who'd been sitting with him when he died, told me, "He must have known, because at the very end he shed a tear from each eye."

The worst part was seeing the body removed. We waited for Mr. Ricker of the funeral home. He was very compassionate. The body was placed in a sack and wheeled away on a stretcher. In four days we'll have an urn with ashes.

I reached Leander, who sobbed, "I'll miss Pappou." Also reached Alec. Telephoned Alice in Norway. We'll arrange a memorial in New York City, somehow.

Tuesday, September 13, 1988

Reached Daphne. Susie Buseck arrived late last night and is with Chrysanthi and Yiayia. I telephoned in the obituary to NYU Medical School, Queens County Medical Society, NY State Medical Society. I placed the following obituary in the New York Times:

BIEN, ADOLPH F., M.D., 86, on September 12, 1988, in Hanover, New Hampshire, after a long illness. Survived by his loving wife Harriet, children Peter and Alice, and seven grandchildren. Much admired as a skilled and compassionate pediatrician in Queens from 1927 to 1962, he was forced to retire early because of blindness. A lover of books and classical music, a lifelong liberal in politics, a freethinker in religion, he was exemplary in his intellectual curiosity, service to others, and devotion to wife and family. A memorial service will be arranged in Manhattan.

Retrieved insurance policies from the vault; told the bank trust department; told John Boswell.

Wednesday, September 14, 1988

To Boswell with Alice. Learned about the intricacies of probate. Jim Strickler visited Mother again—the perfect physician. Bill Spengemann let me off grading English 2–3 papers.

Thursday, September 15, 1988

Freshmen advisees all day until 3:30, then dash to Burlington airport.

Friday, September 16, 1988

Pendle Hill

Agreed to donate $1500/year for three years to the capital campaign. Coleman Dorsey “dunned” me. Publications Committee rejected everything except a good piece on Thomas Kelly, and Carol Murphy’s journal. Spoke to staff for an hour on my adventures with The Last Temptation. I seem to be a celebrity more or less. Supper with Leander and Alec, both doing well. Then Executive Board.

Saturday, September 17, 1988

PH–Hanover

Executive Board in the morning. Took me ten hours to fly home. Found Karen Van Dyke and Charles Stewart here, plus Daphne. Karen turns out to be a Rhoads, and is a 2nd cousin of Carol Weingeist's. They were up for Rassias training, at my invitation. To bed at 1:00 a.m.

Sunday, September 18, 1988

Chrysanthi infuriated me by suggesting that my Frosh advisees eat their lunch standing up in the kitchen so they couldn't dirty the living room carpet.

To Meeting. Peter Stettenheim surprised me by writing warmly about Father's death. Also nice letters from Len Rieser, Tom Almy, Helmut Schumann. Azaleas from Comparative Literature (Kay Wegner's touch, I conjecture). At Meeting, I spoke briefly about Dad (as I did at PH): how he voted for Norman Thomas, spent a day in jail for supporting COs in WWI, stood by me when I declared CO status despite pressure from Bill Schweitzer, etc. An unspectacular life, yet one spent largely in service to others.

After Meeting, I was approached by a woman whom I did not recognize. She turned out to be Jeanne Ludmann Kenyon! After 33 years! Divorced from John Kenyon. Three children, all carpenters and the like. Lives in California. We talked for an hour. I kept looking at her trying to comprehend that we were once, ever so briefly, engaged to be married! She didn't look so bad after thirty-odd years. Good genes. Her mother is 92 and still going strong.

October 2, 1988

Weston

My first full Kinhaven Board meeting as president. Went smoothly. We voted the six-week session.

Saturday, October 8, 1988

NYC

Memorial service for Adolph F. Bien, M.D. in 15th Street Meetinghouse, all arranged by me. About 110 people in attendance, with most staying for the catered lunch afterwards. We did it Quaker style, of course, and there was no shortage of testimonials. Leander's was especially fine. Dr. Aaron Rausen spoke about Pappous as a medical educator. I read several letters sent by folks who couldn't come, and spoke at some length about Pappous's values, all handed down to children and grandchildren. Among those came were Mason, Pappous's oldest friend, I imagine; Al Silbert, 93 years old; Blaise Greenwald, the psychiatrist at Mt. Sinai; Henry Stern, NYC Commissioner of Parks, Peter Buseck's cousin; Herb Wekselblatt; Charlie Hamlin; James McBride; Danny Wilkes; folks from the 92nd Street Y; slews of relatives, even Joan Bull; Jerry and Mildred Davidoff; Linda's son Danny from Montreal; all the Buseck children of course and their grandmother; Rhoda; Ruth Cafarelli; and John, Mary Helene, and Veronica Rassias. Such good friends! I distributed this:

ADOLPH F. BIEN, M.D.
May 29, 1902–September 12, 1988

The heart asks pleasure first and then excuse from pain and then those little anodynes that deaden suffering and then to go to sleep and then, if it should be the will of its inquisitor, the privilege to die.

This memorial meeting for Adolph Bien will be held in a spirit of quiet peace. Natural sorrow there will be, but we should also feel thankfulness for a career of service that touched the lives of others in uplifting ways.

Please gather in silent meditation. There will be no "program," no pre-arranged eulogies.

Everyone who feels moved to speak about the life of Adolph Bien should consider it his or her duty and privilege to do so.

Please stand and speak briefly. Let your words emanate out of the silence, not interrupt it. In this way, the spoken messages will flow back again into the spirit of quiet peace, enhancing it.

At a suitable time, a member of the family will end this memorial meeting by shaking his neighbor's hand. Please shake your neighbor's hand then as a gesture of our fellowship with each other and with the deceased.

Lunch will be served afterwards in the cafeteria.

Mother took it very well. She, too, rose to speak, very briefly. Rhoda told me afterwards how important Dad was for her, because he proved that the family could escape its origins and rise into the educated classes.

Afterwards the Biens and Busecks gathered for a Chinese banquet at China Peace on West 44th Street, and then a group of us and Dan Wilkes went to see Scorsese's The Last Temptation of Christ, which I found rather mediocre, a failed attempt, sincere but just wrong—actors miscast, language too colloquial, no charisma in Jesus, etc. Very “Hollywood” despite the low budget. Gandhi was so much better.

Sunday, October 9, 1988

Busecks and Biens breakfasted at the Yale Club. I went to MoMA, then enjoyed the Hispanic Parade: music, costumes, dancing on Fifth Avenue, with the Roman Catholic archbishop greeting the marchers from a throne outside St. Patrick’s.

November 9, 1988

A great event. Our department is about to vote a four-course load per year. This means that in any given year I’ll teach two terms only, have one term as vacation and one as an “R” term: residence—committees, honors’ students, etc.—but no teaching. Immediately, this will help immensely in progressing with the Selected Letters of Kazantzakis.

Working hard on my new course: Literature of World War I, chiefly improvisation. Nice to teach Myrivilis finally.

Trying to finish “Nikos Kazantzakis: Novelist” for Bristol Classical Press. Going slowly. Hope to submit soon, with publication slated for spring. Princeton will do my Kazantzakis and Politics, volume 1, in the spring.

With the four-course load, I’m encouraged not to retire until age 65.

November 11, 1988

NYC

En route to MGSA: afternoon at the Metropolitan Museum, Degas exhibit. He isn’t as startling as Manet, Van Gogh, etc., yet the retrospective was, as always, a unique opportunity to trace an entire career. Saw Alexis Levitin, at home last week with his Portuguese poet, Eugenio de Andrade, who was slated to read except that Alexis, confused, came one day late! So we had a dinner for Andrade in his absence, with Ridge Satterthwaite, now teaching Spanish, formerly head of Farm and Wilderness Camps, and others. The next day, another dinner with Andrade, who spoke with me in French, Alexis in Portuguese, and Joy Kenseth in Italian. A European gentleman of the old school. Too bad we missed his reading.

Λοιπόν, after the museum: lovely supper with Daphne and Chrysanthi at the Yale Club. Daphne continues to do well at Simon and Schuster.

She's now in sales. She'll go to London to see Greg (and Ignat Solzhenitsyn) in London over Thanksgiving. Then we continued on to Princeton.

November 12, 1988

Princeton

Breakfast with Michael Herzfeld and Victor Papacosma. How nice to see old friends and colleagues from MGSA's history; we are celebrating the twentieth anniversary. The biggest surprise: Tom Doulis. We laughed about our "Five Year Plan" established in 1976: a free beer to whoever published within five years. Neither did. I'm about to bring out  $\frac{1}{2}$  of my Kazantzakis and Politics; he's still working on his trilogy-novel, now reduced to a diptych. Other old timers: John Anton, George Yiannaris, Anna Farmakidou, Kostas Kazazis, Jim Warren. Dia Philippidis introduced me to her venerable mother, an aristocratic matron full of dignity. Julia Loomis was present. Elizabeth Constantindes, recovered from an operation, says we should visit in NY with her and Daphne. It was she who got Daphne the room in 220 w. 93rd Street. Others from the past: Peter Topping, Andonis Decavalles, Professor Sanders, Mike Keeley, Ernie Friedl, Bill Wyatt, Theofanis Stavrou, Meg Alexiou, Danny Danforth, Dorothy Gregory, Lily Macrakis, John Iatridis, Irene Kacandes.

In my talk, I tried to bridge the gulf between the old-timers in literary criticism and the Lambropoulos revisionists, calling self-scrutiny healthy if sometimes painful.

November 13, 1988

Princeton

I spoke qua ex-president: a plea for some response to what I project as a post-nationalistic age. Senator Sarbanes was in the audience. I wonder what he thought. (Had supper with him last night at the banquet, but he was at the opposite end of the table, monopolized by Lily Macrakis.) The talk, I conjectured, would fall on deaf ears. Yet several people came up afterwards and assured me of the opposite.

Then we were whisked away by John and Woody Wilson, who are now masters of a Princeton House. Lovely reunion. He is chief of the Princeton church and state project. We reminisced about the Fulbright days in England in 1958–59.

November 22, 1988

To Kendal office to speak with Jean Brophy re: Mother's apartment. Mother wants a studio but Jean says these are for people with modest means and Mother is rich enough for a one-bedroom apartment. Chrysanthi and I both agreed with the Kendal philosophy and said that although the studio was all that was needed, we honored the overall policy and would accept the one-bedroom apartment even though the initial fee is almost $50,000 more. Mother concurs.

November 25, 1988

A particularly joyous Thanksgiving, celebrated with the Rassiases and Mother. Only Daphne missing; she flew to London for three days (!) to be with Gregory. Fun and games, charades, etc., afterwards. We all laughed and laughed.

November 26, 1988

Kate Harvey for supper, with our boys. She is "back from the dead," so to speak. And radiantly beautiful, as she was before her illness.

November 27, 1988

To the farm. We cut a Christmas tree; I pruned and fertilized our "orchard"; we surveyed a path through the woods to Alec's cabin; the chain across the front entrance was stolen. Otherwise everything OK. The day beautiful, warm. Super at Smith's Restaurant. Then Alec and Leander continued on directly to Philadelphia while Chrysanthi and I returned to Hanover.

November 28, 1988

Comparative Literature 1, "Literature of World War I." A marathon class, four hours, at home, with break for a snack. Fine reports. One of my more enjoyable classes. One of the students wrote in her evaluation: "At last, a class in which the students listened to each other and not only to the professor. A class in which friendships developed. A class in which you got out of it only what you put in." I was pleased, also, to be able to use my Myrivilis translation.

December 9, 1988

To PH. Publications Committee as usual. But I skipped the Friday board in order to go to Alec's Christmas concert at Friends Central. Leander came too. And Naoko. Met the new headmaster, David Felsen. John Davidson came over and said hello. Concert quite respectable, with Kinhaven type chamber music well coached and the orchestra doing a symphonic movement. Chorus led by Jim Davis, orchestra by Alec. A nice environment.

December 10, 1988

PH board. Then to NYC. Supper with Herb Wekselblatt, Daphne, and Greg. Then to the Met. Herb took us backstage. Madame Butterfly very well sung.

December 11, 1988

Yale Club breakfast with Helmut and Karen Schumann. A nice surprise. On the train, finished Comp. Lit. 1 essays. Another term finished! Next year we start the four-course load. Only two terms of teaching a year. Heaven!

My Bristol Classical Press book is in the mail. My Princeton UP book is being copyedited. A productive year..

December 12, 1988

Began “Can a Minor Discourse Produce a Classic?” for MLA. Hard to get in this mode again. All day just thinking.

December 17, 1988

Finished, at least in first draft. Relaxed by going to supper at Steve Scher’s with Oxenhandlers. Pleasant.

December 18, 1988

Excellent Meeting today. Turned down offer to speak at all–NH Friends Gathering in January on Quakerism and the arts. Too bad. Conflict with PH.

Lunch at Soong and Rogers Elliott’s. Lucille Smith gave tips on New Orleans. Long talk with Leaton, who just came back from Australia.

Reading the collection of essays by grad students assembled by Vasilis Lambropoulos. Irene Kacandes cites a marvelous poem by Cavafy, one he rejected (!):

ΟΔΗ ΚΑΙ ΕΛΕΓΕΙΑ ΤΩΝ ΟΔΩΝ

Το περιπάτημα του πρώτου διαβάτου· του πρώτου πωλητού η ζωηρά κραυγή· το άνοιγμα των πρώτων παραθύρων, της πρώτης θύρας—είναι η ωδή,
ην έχουν την πρωίαν αι οδοί.

Τα βήματα του τελευταίου διαβάτου· του πωλητού του τελευταίου η κραυγή· το κλείσιμον θυρών και παραθύρων—είναι της ελεγείας η αυδή, ην έχουν την εσπέραν αι οδοί.

ODE AND ELEGY OF THE STREETS

The gait of the first passerby the lively cry of the first vendor the opening of the first windows of the first door—compose the ode of the streets in the morning.

The steps of the last passerby
 the cry of the last vendor the closing of the doors and windows—compose the sound of the elegy of the streets in the evening.

December 25, 1988, Christmas

We celebrated with the Rassiases since, for the first time in twenty-odd years, we'll miss our New Year's Eve with them. (They'll be on a Caribbean cruise.) Alec is in France, but Daphne and Leander are home, as are Veronica, Athos, and Helene Rassias. Escargots and lamb, as always. Then a jolly time doing charades. We laughed and laughed. Afterwards to the movies.

December 26, 1988

Lunch with John. He still wants to do a Rassias-Bien English language text for China! I'm willing.

December 27, 1988

Hanover–New Orleans

Leander and I drove to Cambridge and Logan; flew to New Orleans. Hotel Meridien. We entered to Dixieland jazz. Leander oohed and aahed regarding the luxury of the hotel. We couldn't resist, so took our first turn through the French Quarter, especially Bourbon Street. What a lovely experience!

December 28, 1988

New Orleans

I gave my paper at the MLA: "Can a Minor Discourse Produce a Classic?" Others: Gregory Jusdanis, Vassilis Lambropoulos, Artemis Leontis, Mary Layoun, and Gene Holland as respondent. Our discussion was fluent and interesting, until noon; then off to lunch in the Sheraton Hotel.

In the afternoon, Leander and I took the St. Charles Street trolley out to Tulane to see the wonderful mansions and gardens. Then walked to Jackson Square and the cathedral, a European scene. Then a splendid meal: frogs' legs and oysters Bienville. Then more jazz, culminating in the experience of Preservation Hall. $2.00 admission; audience cross-legged on the floor; musicians old and stiff, sleepy, hardly able to rise off their chair; yet as soon as they start blowing their clarinet or trumpet or strumming their banjo they seemed youth itself, with wonderful exuberance. The man who sang "Georgia" was especially poignant. And "When the Saints Go Marching In" galvanized the house.

December 29, 1988

New Orleans–Boston

Leisurely breakfast with Bob and Ilona Bell. She has a Bunting in Cambridge. He is writing a book on humor in Joyce, and will start with a quote from me. He and Groden are my two Joycean protégés. Also saw Jay Parini, who I fear is a false friend . . . but I keep trying. Leander and I took a last stroll down Bourbon Street, saw a children's band; that's how they start. Then: more oysters at Felix's, and Creole shrimp. Delicious. Uneventful, pleasant flight back to Logan. I read Homer's Odyssey. Overnight in Friends Center.

December 30, 1988

Boston

Sightseeing. We walked from Government Center to Copley Square. Freezing cold. Lovely incident on the Common. The city is making ice sculptures for the celebration tomorrow. A derelict came by, shouting drunkenly: "Ice! It's winter! Who needs more ice?! Spend the money to get the homeless off the streets!" . . . Organ recital in the church on Copley Square. Steve Scher's lecture has infected me: I see humor now were it wasn't intended. In other words, the variations on Adeste Fideles were ridiculous. I had to suppress my laughter in the sacrosanct atmosphere.

At 1:40 we met Chrysanthi and Alec. Lunch in the Park Lane Hotel. Alec recited his adventures in France. Then we took the "trolley tour" of the city, with a witty guide. Dinner in Cambridge, Chinese restaurant with the sweetest oriental doll as a waitress. Then to A.R.T. to see The Serpent Woman by Gozzi, commedia dell'arte. Overdone, much ado about nothing. But still fun.

December 31, 1988

Hanover

Ignat Solzhenitsyn came for lunch. He played a Mozart concerto for us, not bad, but not spectacular, certainly. We talked politics: he mimics his father, surely: Gorbachev is a fake, seducing the West to lower its defenses, etc. The French and English are giving him huge loans, with which he'll build tanks and missiles to destroy the French and English, etc. Perestroika is incomplete so long as Solzhenitsyn is still banned, etc. His mother is up at 6:00 a.m., typing; his father works sixteen-hour days. The lost history of Russia is almost completed. Now the English translator is beginning, and that is a huge headache.

New Year's Eve feast with Helene and Athos. We nicknamed him "Mount": Mount Athos. Pleasant, warm time with good friends. Leander also saw David Noda after many years. He's the vice-president of a bank in California. I made baked Alaska for dessert.

1989

---

Hanover	January 1–June 17
Jan. 14–15, NYC, Kinhaven Board
Jan. 20–21, Philadelphia, PH
Jan. 22, Cambridge, theater
Jan. 25, Glens Falls, Grunblatt memorial
Mar. 4–5, Cambridge, theater
Mar. 9–12, Philadelphia, PH, New York
April 13–16, Philadelphia, Bethlehem, New York, PH, Leander's recital, Kinhaven
May 16, Haverford
May 19–21, Pendle Hill
June 8, Cambridge, theater
June 15–17, NYC, Philadelphia, PH, Joyce, Annenburg
Riparius	June 18–September 4
June 26–28, Hanover–Cambridge
July 15–16, Kinhaven
July 24–25, Hanover
July 27–28, Hanover
Aug. 9–10, New York
Hanover	September 5–December 31
Sept. 8–10, New York
Sept. 22–25, PH, Wilmington, Hotel Du Pont
Oct. 1, Weston
Oct. 2–3, Cambridge
Oct. 11–13, New York, Rye, Scarsdale
Oct. 20–22, Minneapolis, Radison University Hotel
Oct. 26–29, Cambridge, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Boston
Nov. 3–5, NYC
Nov. 14, Baltimore
Nov. 19, Concord
Nov. 28–29, Riparius
Dec. 7–10, Pendle Hill, NYC
Dec. 11, Court, North Haverhill
Dec. 18, Court, North Haverhill
Dec. 23, Monterey, Mass: Gould Farm

Dec. 28–30, Washington, MLA, Dupont Plaza Hotel, 1500
New Hampshire Ave., NW 20036

January 1, 1989

Late lunch with the “gang”: Nodas, Soderbergs, Sydney Jarvis.

January 3, 1989

Conference with Panos Rodis to try and coordinate English 3 better than we did English 2.

Kendal hearing before the Planning Board. More on traffic, sewer lines, etc. Boring.

Wednesday, January 4, 1989

Music, at long last, with Dick and Allan. Baroque + Haydn. Our first meeting since last June.

January 5, 1989

Meeting with Oran Young and Jean Hennessey re: Northern Studies University Seminar + War/Peace collaboration with their project of the Arctic as an International Zone of Peace. Now I need to convince Leonard, Jack, and Al Rozycki.

January 6, 1989

Good class and discussion of Odysseus’s traits as seen in the Iliad.

Screening of The Last Temptation in Spaulding. I did the program notes. Packed. Hundreds turned away. Chrysanthi and Mother had to sit in the projection booth. I liked it better this time, but still felt that Barbara Hershey was terrible as Magdalene and Dafoe very artificial as Jesus. Here are the notes I wrote:

THE LAST TEMPTATION OF CHRIST

(USA 1988)

Jesus	Willem Dafoe
Mary Magdalene	Barbara Hershey
Judas	Harvey Keitel
Saul/Paul	Harry Dean Stanton
Pontius Pilate	David Bowie
John the Baptist	Andre Gregory

A Universal Pictures and Cineplex Odeon Films Production.
Produced by BARBARA DE FINA. Executive Producer: HARRY

UFLAND. Screenplay by PAUL SHRADER based on the novel by NIKOS KAZANTZAKIS. Photography by MICHAEL BALLHAUS. Music by PETER GABRIEL. Edited by THELMA SHOONMAKER. Directed by MARTIN SCORSESE. (163 minutes)

When a movie is based on a novel we usually affirm the cinema's right to distort its source even if we lament departures from the literary work in question. There is no need to do this for THE LAST TEMPTATION OF CHRIST. Although advertised as a personal statement by Martin Scorsese, it is almost 100% Kazantzakis. Despite some minor omissions, substitutions, shifts of emphasis and one addition (the bizarre moment when Jesus removes his bloody heart), the movie offers a message identical to that in Kazantzakis's novel.

What message? It is that Jesus is just like us. Does this deny his divinity? Certainly not, for in Kazantzakis's view we are all partly divine. Indeed, we fulfill ourselves (attain salvation) in proportion to our success in transcending the bodily part of our being in the interests of the spiritual part, which is identical to divinity. We do this with difficulty, and so does Jesus. Because he is just like us, he is tempted to resist the call to spirituality. He agonizes at every stage in his ascent from ordinariness to non-bodily fulfillment, makes choices, sometimes regrets them, but in the end succeeds. Kazantzakis's point is that we can do the same. The novel presents a model whom we are meant to follow.

According to Kazantzakis, Jesus's career has four major stages, each of which is clearly shown in Scorsese's movie. The first stage is the attempt to remain ordinary. Jesus does not wish to be the Messiah. On the contrary, he wants his life to be governed by happiness rather than meaningfulness. So he resists the call to spirituality in the most blatant way he can, fashioning crosses to help the Romans crucify Jews. (This is where Kazantzakis, but not Scorsese, includes a travesty of psychoanalysis, making Mary take Jesus to a rabbi to be cured of his "neurosis." Kazantzakis himself was once instructed by a famous Freudian: "To search in order to find the world's beginning and end is a disease. The normal person . . . gets married, has children, and does not waste his time in asking whence, whither, and why." This foreshadows the last temptation, when Jesus, on the cross, momentarily imagines a normal, “healthy” life for himself instead of a “diseased” life of spiritual striving.) In the second stage of his career, Jesus ascends to vocation, overcoming the temptation to remain ordinary. Instead of agonizing about his own happiness, he begins to do God’s work—i.e., to toil for the salvation of everyone. He exhorts his fellows to love one another; but no one listens except a small band of ineffective, doubting disciples who join him for the wrong reasons. (Kazantzakis strives to reconstruct the career as he imagines it really developed, not as it is presented by the Gospels, written as they were after the fact to convince people to believe.) Having failed as a pacifistic idealist, Jesus enters his third stage, in which he joins Judas in preaching violence as the best way to attain God’s kingdom. (Here, Kazantzakis uses the Gospel story to mirror the belief of certain idealists of our own day that Communist revolution is the only effective means to overcome evil.) But Jesus fails again; he is no more successful as a revolutionary than as an apostle of love. So the one path remaining to him is abdication; this is the sole power he can still exert. Only by freely willing his own death can he overcome the forces of evil. Abdication is the fourth and last stage, the one in which (to cite Kazantzakis’s favorite formula) Jesus fully “transubstantiates flesh into spirit” by sacrificing his biological existence. But then Kazantzakis appends the epilogue that gives the book its title. On the cross, between the cries of “My God, my God” and “why hast thou forsaken me?” Jesus fantasizes about the normal, healthy life of sexuality, domesticity, and fatherhood that he had renounced. Yet he ultimately resists this temptation too, choosing vocation over ordinariness, meaningfulness over contentment, spiritual goals over bodily gratification. Reaffirming his mission, he attains salvation in death.

It is not surprising that this interpretation of Jesus’s life has aroused so much opposition among fundamentalist Christians. Kazantzakis does not pretend to offer a gospel that is orthodox in belief. (As for the official church, his scorn for its self-serving hypocrisy is conveyed in Jesus’s hallucinatory interview with Saint Paul, the quintessential organization man.) But neither Kazantzakis nor Scorsese aims to denigrate the life of Christ. On the contrary, each presents this life, deliberately altered so that it corresponds more directly to contemporary thought, as the strongest possible metaphor for spiritual accomplishment.

—Peter Bien

Peter Bien is a professor in the English Department and translated Kazantzakis' novel from the Greek.

January 7, 1989

Received the following letter from Leander re: our days in New Orleans:

Jan. 5, 1989

Dear Dad,

Now that I've had a chance to reflect upon the time that we spent together in New Orleans, and now that I've returned to all which constitutes my world (Bethlehem, practicing, teaching, cold weather, bills, and phone messages), I am all the more grateful for having had the opportunity to take that little all-expenses-paid journey into a new realm of sight, sound, smell, and taste. I really enjoyed myself more than I can remember. Why go abroad? New Orleans is right around the corner. Everything we saw and did was so interesting, so informative, and so stimulating. I really feel as if I took a piece of that vibrant culture away with me when I left. The images of the Preservation Hall players will not fade quickly, and of course I will never listen to Dixieland jazz in the same way from this day on. I came away touched by what I saw and heard.

I hope you feel as if your time was better spent carousing about the French Quarter than attending seminars at the MLA. When next the convention occurs in Cleveland, you can make up for it! I really enjoyed your paper, and the topic was all the more interesting to me after you'd explained it ahead of time.

I can't imagine having had a better time with anybody else. We really "hung out" and got our fill of all we wanted. Thanks for making it possible for me to go with you, and thanks for being a great companion! Next stop — Nashville!

The Auburn football team lost on Monday. Too much Dixie beer and oysters and not enough practice, I'd say.

See you soon,
Love,
Leander

To Kay Wegner's art exhibit in Lyme. Lovely watercolors. Long talk with Murray Washburn, owner of Peter Christian's, mostly about The Last Temptation, and Kendal.

January 8, 1989

Meeting, Business Meeting, lunch at The Greens with Mother. Three Greek students for supper.

January 9, 1989

We're revising the Comparative Literature curriculum, yet again. I'm re-writing course descriptions for Modern Novel, Major Authors, Modernism, Postmodernism. Marianne Hirsch is now chairman, and a fine one.

January 10, 1989

Lunch with President Freedman and some other senior professors. He's worried about his image, that he is remote, inaccessible. Wants to have informal meetings with faculty and asked our advice re: format, etc. Tom Champion tipped me off that the president and Sheba, his wife, are despondent over the latest reversal re: The Dartmouth Review. One of the reinstated students, John Sutter, the Review's managing editor, joined my Odysseus class the first week, came twice, and never appeared again. He seemed a morose character; told me how much good journalistic experience he'd gained while on suspension, working for the Herald Tribune. I'll end up failing him, of course.

To the White Church to attend the memorial service for Marsha Baldwin, who died of cancer. Same age as me. I embraced Lee and lamented that it's always the nicest people who get hit.

Next to Dickey Endowment to convince Leonard to let War/Peace join forces next year with Oran Young in emphasizing the Northern Zone of Peace. Leonard voiced all sorts of objections; that's his style. But I said that this could become a kind of metaphor for others, New Zealand for instance, or various seas. He came round in the end, and Jack Shepherd, afterwards, congratulated me "on the way you handled Leonard."

January 12, 1989

Memorial for Seth Feldman '92, who died of a brain tumor over the holidays. One of my Frosh advisees. His parents were dignified. I spoke to them of Johnny Gunther, who died at Deerfield before going to college.

Seth at least had one term at Dartmouth and very much appreciated that. Poor service; disorganized rabbi; Bill Cook reciting an irrelevant poem ("Fern Hill") at great length. But one of the students spoke genuinely, as did both parents.

January 14, 1989

New York

Lovely supper with Daphne. She's a charmer. Still flourishing at Simon and Schuster. Then to Thornton Wilder's Our Town, about New Hampshire, but more reminiscent of North Creek. We both felt like insiders. It's a strangely static yet effective play. He found a new way to treat all the old clichés: adolescent love, domestic boredom, tragic death.

January 15, 1989

Brooklyn

Out to Grand Army Plaza, Flatbush Ave., to Alice Henkin's apartment for Kinhaven board. We had to set new salaries for Jerry and Nancy. I let off the "bomb" that maybe Jerry wasn't performing very well. I'd like to institute evaluations, but how, without making the place a hotbed of suspicion? Joe Contino, George Goodwin, and I mulled all this over on the drive back to Springfield.

January 16, 1989

Made enlargements of two nice photos, one of me on the John Deere, another an aerial shot of the farm taken by Sarge Van Keuren.

Karen Van Dyke here with her boyfriend, Nelson Moe. Nice to have a "Greek" colleague for a change; we share so much. Rand Jones showed up at the same time, awkwardly.

January 17, 1989

Mother's birthday. We went to Norwich Inn with Audrey Logan, like last year. A nice "tradition."

January 20, 1989

Pendle Hill

Promotion Committee, Publications Committee, supper with Alec and Helene Rassias, Executive Board. I enjoy these people so much. Long talk afterwards with Margery Walker about evaluation procedures (thinking of Kinhaven).

January 22, 1989

Cambridge

Drove to Cambridge with Leander and Chrysanthi for A.R.T. production of Chekhov's Platanov, a play he wrote when he was about 20, very accomplished, but he put it in a drawer and it was discovered only posthumously. It's an early version of The Cherry Orchard, same subject, some similar characters, only much more "busy," without the later play's silences and also without its central symbol. Seeing Platanov was like going to an exhibition of early Picasso or Kandinsky, fascinating because of one's knowledge of what came later.

Met Warren Thompson at the Cambridge Meeting House. Also Andy and Merrilie Towl, she looking cadaverous.

January 23, 1989

Kendal Overseers. Herb Schiele has joined, also Erica Brinton.

January 24, 1989

Lunch with Shirley Williams, British M.P., in the Dickey Endowment. She's a live wire, so very articulate, and rational; very liberal, appalled by Thatcherism but admiring Maggie's persistence. Her problem is her training as a scientist: no appreciation of humanities at all. She's a 100% technocrat.

Hanover Planning Board hearing on Kendal. Everything went wrong. Our figures for traffic on Route 10 differed from someone else's. And the chairman, Bud Eaton, harped on our desire to "escape" taxation. We emerged despondent. Long talk with Jean Brophy afterwards about strategies. I'll draft a letter attempting to rebut Eaton's position that it's immoral for an over-65 to escape taxes in Kendal while another over-65 pays taxes in a private home.

Hilda called. Jacques died in Mexico last Saturday. Heart attack. But he was comfortable at the end. Thankful that he could die "in Paradise." She asked me to speak at the memorial tomorrow. Had to cancel our usual Wednesday music with Dick Williamson and Allan Munk.

January 25, 1989

Glens Falls

Rushed to Glens Falls after teaching. Strange to be in that area at this time of year, but so pleasant. It's like going home to a foreign country. Service in synagogue. The rabbi spoke very well. Others were Dr. Shalita, a Glens Falls doctor, Dennis Coney of the Environmental Action Committee, and me. I likened Jacques to Odysseus. Whatever you say about him, the opposite is also true. Universal man. A fighter in war yet propagandist for peace. An exile yet very much at home. A model husband yet a lover. A man of the body (eating, swimming) yet an intellectual. A loner, set apart, yet exemplary citizen. At the end: Odysseus a model for the future, so is Jacques. I'm so glad that my children knew such a man.

Nice to see Jesse, Mark, Ellen, Ellen's husband (a Bien), Jaime (from Spain), Art Perryman (who told me that Jacques used to coach soccer), Mrs. Morse, Mrs. Sargent, Laura, Janet Greene, Donna and Chandra, etc. We will all miss Jacques Grunblatt. I implored him for years to write his memoirs, but he always refused. Now it's too late.

January 28, 1989

Party for Larry Radway's 70th birthday. A mob scene at the Outing Club. His wife made a quilt containing everyone's signature.

Then to the Arndts for supper. Walter has cancer but is productive still. Just published a translation of the Letters of Bruno Schulz; about to begin translating another Pole. I told him about Basia Nikonorow, my student last term.

Sunday, January 29, 1989

Lunch at The Greens after a very good Meeting.

Conference call to agree on papers at the Minnesota Symposium of MGSA. Michael Herzfeld orchestrated it very well. Others on the line: Χουλιάρης, Παπακοσμάς, Λαμπρόπουλος, Σταύρου. Big controversy over Danny Danforth's paper about Greek suppression of Macedonians. But we agreed we could not suppress it since we believe in academic freedom. If there are consequences, we'll face them.

January 30, 1989

Jean Brophy and I went to the Selectmen's meeting, but were told that Kendal wasn't on the agenda. Instead, I'll write yet another of justification, to be sent to the Selectmen.

January 31, 1989

Lunch with Carl Thum, whose Reading Skills program is blossoming. I filled him in re: all the gossip about our new regime headed by Karin Rodis, which is quite stimulating.

John Finn and Michael McClennen sat with me re: the Greek computer project, which had aborted and now seems to be about to be reborn.

February 1, 1989

Department meeting. Reappointment of Matthew Rowlinson. Lou Renza, very new chair, is a relief after some of the previous ones.

Music, as always.

February 5, 1989

Mother and I sat over her records and I did her income tax once again. I seem to be doing three or four nowadays.

February 7, 1989

Tea with Professor Peter Burian, visiting from Duke. He's interested in Italianate Modern Greeks like Foscolo. I told him about Solomos, Kalvos, etc. Will lend him Mario Vitti's book.

February 8, 1989

Theater: Dartmouth Players' production of Joe Orton's What the Butler Saw, a delightful farce, so British! I wish Benny Hill had been the lead.

February 9, 1989

I arranged a lunch with Walter and Basia. Very cordial. I learned more about Walter's Polish phase. A rich relative wanted the young Walter to become an engineer and take over the relative's factory. Same as Bill Schweitzer's desires for me.

Supper at Faculty Club for War/Peace Seminar. Visiting professor who'd been three years in North Africa, including Libya (he's Belgian, so could get in).

February 10, 1989

Breakfast with Paul Schrader, the film producer and scriptwriter who wrote The Last Temptation of Christ. The Dartmouth Film Society showed his latest last night and honored him. I had him all to myself this morning for one and a half hours, driving him to the airport for his flight. He did The Last Temptation in 1981, when Paramount was interested in producing it. His own background is fundamentalist, Calvinist. His family were not allowed to go to movies. He graduated from a Bible college, majored in Christology, and has written a theological book. He's no longer a believer, but the background is important. His own father was one of those active in the campaign against The Last Temptation. He prepared for his job just as Kazantzakis did, by reading extensively on Christ and by traveling to Israel and walking over all the ground in question, accompanied by a Biblical scholar he hired to act as consultant. He and Scorsese wanted to make Christ Jewish, to place the events firmly in their Jewish context. Israel then was one of the commercial crossroads of the world, with people of all races and religions intermingling. This is why it was such a fertile place intellectually. The mix is shown in the scene of men waiting for Mary Magdalene's "services." I commented on the disparity of the Nordic faces chosen for Jesus and Mary Magdalene, and Schrader agreed. "We should have had Latin types," he conceded, "but Scorsese took who he could get, and we were lucky to get an actor as good as Dafoe, a white boy from Minnesota! The problem was that this was a low budget film shot under difficult circumstances. The actors had to agree to spend three months in Morocco at minimum wage. This limited our choice." In preparing, Schrader made a catalogue of every single incident in the novel, spread out his notes on the floor and then systematically excluded the scenes not directly relevant to his particular interests, which were: the Jesus-Judas conflict and its larger implications (love vs. the axe), Jesus's hesitations and agonizing, the last temptation itself. This is why so little was done with individual disciples beyond Judas. He admitted that the relation with Magdalene was not satisfactory in the movie because he'd eliminated the antecedent action in which Jesus had spurned Mary Magdalene in marriage. (Scorsese ruled all antecedent action out of bounds.) I lamented the absence of the Rabbi and therefore the satire against psychoanalysis, which helps explain the last temptation at the end. Regarding language, the script had more "poetry" than actually survived into the film. Scorsese forbade any biblical language at all on the theory that people hear only the words and not the meaning. Schrader attempted therefore to reword everything so that it might be in the current vernacular. (To my mind, this was a big mistake, for the biblical language would have come to life when coupled with the visual impact of the scenes—an opportunity lost.) I explained my own quandaries re: "Mandarin" King James overtones and how to create a vernacular without seeming both parochial and ridiculous, which is what happens in the film, alas. The music was by a rock composer who recorded a lot of Moroccan musicians and then incorporated this into his score. Actually, Dafoe is a kind of rock star type. That's what Scorsese's "demotic" Jesus comes down to. Regarding the "angel" at the end, who of course is really the devil, they couldn't keep it Kazantzakis's Negro because they'd be accused of prejudice. Scorsese's point was that the devil ought to be the very picture of an innocent angel: thus the sweet girl straight out of paintings. But Schrader couldn't defend the disparity in accents: he merely said weakly that Scorsese tried to minimize the accents and failed. As for success, they are not discouraged. Only 40% of film receipts now come from theaters. 60% comes from television: network and VCR. They expect that the film will do well on television and have a lasting impact. But the industry is mad at them because it feels the film got "unfair" publicity via the opposition. Thus it's being passed over for all awards. (Weak argument.) Both Scorsese and Schrader were, on balance, delighted with the controversy. As Schrader said, "Imagine, questions that once concerned Church councils in the 4th century were spread across the headlines again" (referring to the debate about whether Jesus was truly tempted). He was negative toward film students. "In my generation [1960s], we saw the cities burning, we lived through Vietnam, we wanted to use film to make statements, to say something. Today's students ask, as their first priority, "How can I get an agent?" Why should they have an agent if they have nothing to say?"

February 11, 1989

To Thetford with Chrysanthi and Mother to see the Parish Players in Athol Fugard's The Road to Mecca. Static, but nevertheless moving. No technical interest. Could just as well be a radio play. No theatricality. Yet the plight of Miss Helen, being urged to go into an old people's home by the Afrikaans minister and urged to protect her independence and creativity by a disillusioned British woman much younger, was real. Miss Helen forges out an existentialist religion of hope (fantasy) to replace the moribund Afrikaans Church. Her physical debilities are sentimentalized, but it works. We feel she is right in refusing the old people's home.

Mother found it painful, remembering our experiences with Dad at Hanover Terrace. The solution, of course, is a CCRC: Kendal!

February 12, 1989

I ministered in Meeting based on the Fugard play, which replaces love with trust as the central religious principle. This is perhaps what Jesus meant when he told us to become like little children—viz. to emulate their absolute trust. But in whom can we place absolute trust? Only in God (cf. Kierkegaard).

Lunch at The Greens with Mother. This afternoon, at tea, she is going to play violin duets with Bunny Little for the group. How nice to go back to the violin after sixty-odd years! Maybe there's hope for Daphne.

February 13, 1989

Chaney Brokaw, Barbara Gilbert, Erica Brinton and I met with Jean Brophy to vet the new Kendal brochure prepared by Barbara Parsons. And good we did, because it needs lots of improvement.

February 14, 1989

Saved by the skin of our teeth! After the Planning Board debacle two weeks ago, Jean and I struggled over how to react. She drafted a letter to the Selectmen. I didn't like it very much, and drafted my own. She liked this. We showed it to Overseers, to Lloyd, etc., and revised it a bit, and got it to the Selectmen yesterday. Today Jean telephoned. Last night the Selectmen read it and approved our position that the Health Center should not be taxed. Then we learned that, if this had not happened, and had not happened in time, Dr. Eaton at the Planning Board tonight, was prepared to say that the Town was not yet ready, financially, to bear a Kendal, and to call for public hearings on whether we should be taxed or not. This would have been a disaster for us because of the confrontational nature and, chiefly, because of the delay. However, given the Selectmen's decision, Eaton is now not going to do this. He'll strike Kendal from the agenda tonight and put us on for February 28, by which time the KMS Board will have agreed presumably. They meet tomorrow, and Alan Hunt says he'll recommend that they do agree. Then on the 28th, with the tax situation settled, we'll have only traffic to consider, and we hope to receive our preliminary approval. Phew!

February 26, 1989

Dinner party: Elliotts, Scotts, Laasperes. I made oysters Bienville for hors d'oeuvres. Success.

February 27, 1989

President Freedman telephoned to say that I came in first in the faculty election for CAP and would I serve. I agreed. It will be nice to be close to him in this way for three years. I'm of course gratified at the confidence shown by the faculty.

Kendal Overseers met. The architects now have detailed drawings. Over 150 apartments are sold. Sandy Stettenheim wants me to take over clerkship of the board. We'll see. Tomorrow we go back to the Planning Board.

Carol Weingeist visited afterwards. She and Jean Brophy don't get along, alas. The first signs of the Devil's intrusion.

Speaking of the Devil, I ministered yesterday at Meeting à propos. The impetus was Reese Prosser's excellent description of Star Wars at our War/Peace Seminar last Thursday. We concluded (some of us) that scientists, who listen to the "voice of the Lord" telling them that all research is in God's service, are really being deluded by the Devil.

Leonard Rieser, Alan Rozycki, Oran Young, and Jack Shepherd, and I met again to try to see where War/Peace can lead next. Leonard is resisting the Arctic proposal, so we're back to square one.

February 28, 1989

Planning Board gave Kendal its preliminary approval, easily. Phew!

March 3, 1989

Poetry reading jointly by Cleopatra Mathis and Tom Sleigh, both very accomplished. Cleopatra's about her Greek grandmother was especially memorable.

March 4, 1989

To Cambridge. I worked in Widener, checking references for Pieris's submission to JMGS, a disgustingly sloppy job with everything misquoted, undocumented, etc. Fun to be in Widener. Lunch in the terrific hamburger place across the street. My old haunt.

Supper with Mother (who'd returned from Tempe yesterday), Chrysanthi, Lori Buseck, and her boyfriend Clive, a computer programmer. Then to A.R.T. for "Mastergate," a satirical farce with Oliver North & Co. as butts. Clever for the first half hour, then repetitive.

Overnight at Cambridge Friends Center.

March 5, 1989

Supper at Jean Childs's and her new husband's, John Schumaker, who owns Gnomon Copy. We're happy for Jean, who finally got married. John is a Vietnam vet and a coffee fancier.

March 6, 1989

The computing seminar convened, finally. I've tried for one and a half years to get Chris Jernstedt to move. Finally he did, and gave a brilliant presentation on the psychology of learning.

Wednesday, March 8, 1989

Music continues every Wednesday night with Dick and Allan. We're doing lots of Haydn, and it's wonderful. I think we're actually getting better, especially Allan, who is always off-key.

Friday, March 10, 1989

Pendle Hill

Publications Committee went well. Poor Rebecca Mays. Her marriage is on the rocks. She'll be another single parent. . . . Supper with Alec.

Saturday, March 11, 1989

Philadelphia–NYC

Lee Bennett drove me to 30th Street. He's a good friend. Supper with Daphne and Greg. (Daphne is so relieved to have him back.) Then theater: Driving Miss Daisy, brilliantly acted by Earle Hyman and Frances Sternhagen, about a wealthy Atlanta woman who in old age needs a chauffeur companion, black of course, resists at first, but then finds that he is her best friend.

Sunday, March 12, 1989

Yale Club

Daphne came and we did her taxes. Then brunch. Long talk about Gregory. She sees the next few months as the real test of their relationship, because for the first time their contacts will be frequent and more or less normal, instead of commuting between Cambridge and NYC or NYC and London.

March 13, 1989

Lafayette Noda is in the hospital. Visited him today. He had blood clots in the lungs, but is lucky they didn't go to the brain. De-coagulants seem to be working. He'll be OK.

March 15, 1989

I spoke to the Hanover Rotary Club about Kendal. Nice to be in this totally different group and atmosphere. Roy Banwell brought me greetings from Paul Abramson of Sunnyside.

March 16, 1989.

Good inaugural lecture by David Montgomery on science and ethics. He said plasma physics used a Greek word meaning “jelly.” Wrong, of course. It means something shaped or formed.

March 17, 1989

Dinner at the McGees at their new home in Sharon, an extravaganza, not to my taste. As we grow older we should simplify, not build mansions.

March 18, 1989

I seem to be doing everyone’s income tax thanks to the computer program I got for my Mac.

March 20, 1989

Steve Scher’s NEH applications, vetted by him, Bill Summers, and me. How lucky we are at Dartmouth compared to the poor souls exiled in Tennessee or Kansas or teaching 15 hours a week!

March 22, 1989

Drink with Jean Brophy to plan agenda for next week. I’m now clerk of the Overseers for Kendal.

March 23, 1989

Carl Thum and wife Lisa to supper to talk about Greece.

March 24, 1989

Leander has been here all week, practicing diligently for his April recital. Tonight we made oysters Bienville for his birthday (actually tomorrow).

March 25, 1989

To Warren, NH, to Nancy Ševčenko’s for supper with her, Meg, and Michael Hendys. He was the chef, as always. Meg in good form, although both she and Michael drank themselves soporific by the end of the long long meal. She told me that if Michael got a job somewhere far away, she would leave Harvard. “A relationship is important.” It is! So far he has nothing. A brave man, to give up his post at Birmingham.

March 26, 1989

Brunch with Rassias children and Mary. Easter.

March 27, 1989

Off to the farm with Alec, who is here for the week. We plotted out the position of the new storage building. Supper at Mosher's Diner. Alec remained; we returned. He's had an offer again from Jakarta and seems to want to go. His current girlfriend, it turns out, has genital herpes, an incurable venereal disease highly contagious. If he goes to Indonesia, it's a way of ending that relationship. She is wonderful in every way . . . except . . .! He understandably feels that he doesn't want to spend his life dealing with her disability when he has his own, his alopecia, to concern him. Friends Central, alas, is no longer a challenge. They sent him for an MA and then never used his training; he's still doing elementary French year after year.

March 28, 1989

We gave supper to Lloyd Lewis and the entire Kendal Board of Overseers and Jean, Carol, and Naomi. Then Overseers meeting.

March 29, 1989

Kendal "Founders' Luncheon" in Alumni Hall. I spoke briefly on the Quaker aspect of our endeavor, but decided not to start lunch with silent grace, since Barbara Gilbert had such imaginings last night. Lloyd fielded questions afterwards. At 3:00 we transferred to Hanover High for another meeting, this time for people on the priority list. We've sold more than 160 apartments.

March 30, 1989

Lunch with my student Basia Nikoronow. What a charmer she is!

March 31, 1989

With Mother to theater at the Hop, a surprisingly superb production by the Houston Alley Theater of Arthur Miller's A View from the Bridge. Such a strong play, perfectly crafted, a modern Greek tragedy about Italian immigrants trying to adjust. Alec and Lori Buseck came, too.

April 4, 1989

Planning Board. First hearing for final approval. Another hitch owing to new regulations voted at Town Meeting re: zoning that excess land cannot be more than 25% of it in slopes of 75%. We don't qualify. Our lawyer is going to devise a strategy. We meet again next Tuesday.

April 5, 1989

Leonard and I are still trying to come up with a proposal for an additional War/Peace course. The newest version will go to the Steering Committee next week.

Alec has decided to go to Indonesia. Chrysanthi is pleading with him to sign only a one-year contract. We are both despondent, somewhat irrationally, I suppose.

April 7, 1989

Finally sent agendas for both Kinhaven Board and War/Peace Studies Steering Committee, both next week.

Sunday, April 9, 1989

Interminable monthly meeting over State of Society report. Poor Jack Shepherd, the clerk, wanted to go home to do his taxes. The meeting went from 11:30 until 3:30. I left at 1:30. I ministered earlier on the "justice" that led to John Sutter's separation from Dartmouth. I gave him the final E! The court case intended to injure Dartmouth and aid him ended by injuring him so much that he lost his chance for a Dartmouth degree. It is difficult not to gloat. (Even George Fox gloated when his enemies were laid low.)

Reading Πλασκοβίτη Το φράγμα, which Kedros want me to translate. Unexciting. Vassilios Lambropoulos wisely advised me to say No and concentrate on Kazantzakis, volume 2. Actually, to accept this commission would have been a not so subtle way, self-destructively, of postponing the more important project.

April 11, 1989

First of the sections for English 17. I had the students write "birthday poems" imitating Swift's to Stella, or mock epics like the Dunciad, or Modest Proposals. They are so clever. Rhymed tetrameter or pentameter they do in stride. Then they all become stockbrokers when they graduate.

George Kennan, testifying before Congress, said that communism is finished. "Why?" asked Claiborne Pell. "Because it has no answer to the problem of death," said Kennan. Wise man. The latest joke in Moscow is: "What is communism?" "I don't know, tell me." "Communism is the longest possible road to capitalism." Kazantzakis predicted this in 1929!

I lectured to John Rassias's City Bank students on pagan and Christian heroism. One of them,  $\frac{3}{4}$  the way through, revealed that he didn't understand the word "monk." He'd thought I'd been discussing monkeys! Sometimes I feel like a trained monkey on occasions like this. My definition of Christianity in the lecture is surely impossibly narrow. A few nights ago we had two of them to dinner: Joy from Taiwan and Juan Maria from Argentina. Such lively, friendly, bright people, especially the Chinese woman. Taiwan is prospering enormously, from all accounts. We had a long discussion on the position of women, which apparently is quite equal now, which means that children are in day-care, like here.

At 2:30 Ross Waller for tutorial, his third course with me. He is re-reading Ulysses very enthusiastically. We're setting up a "Bloomsday" reading but not on Bloomsday, of course. President Freedman will read "Calypso."

At 3:30 another candidate for our Renaissance position. I can't work up much energy or enthusiasm any longer for departmental affairs. All three candidates so far have been repulsively arcane.

Supper with Walter and Miriam Arndt in good spirits. Hospital reports say that nothing has metastasized. They are going to enter Friends Homes in Guilford, and will withdraw from Kendal, which is four times as expensive.

Planning Board again. Blair, the lawyer, solved last week's problem about slopes by deciphering the statute's actual meaning. We pass. More delay re: easement for environmental protection. However, Bud Eaton said at the end of an hour or so that, in effect, we are approved! They'll draw up the exact language and give us the certificate on April 25. Hooray! We all went to the Inn and drank champagne. Now we need to (1) secure financing for construction, (2) sign on a contractor, (3) finish the architectural drawings, (4) buy the land—and, with luck, break ground in July. Eaton asked us to name all the internal streets. That will be fun.

April 12, 1989

8:00 a.m., breakfast meeting of the War/Peace Steering Committee. We commiserated with Elise re: her dying daughter-in-law. She was excellent in focusing our proposal to the Hewlett Foundation for a 2nd core course. Jack Shepherd, Alan Rozycki, Leonard Rieser, and Lee Baldwin all spoke helpfully. We have 70 students in College Course 1, double any previous enrollment.

Spent the rest of the day administratively, sending out notices to all University Seminar leaders for next year's ORC, and formulating a new Hewlett proposal in light of this morning's discussion.

Dick came by to beg off music tonight; he's got a sore throat. We went to Collis together and had lunch with Martin Arkowitz, to whom I showed Sanborn's treasures afterwards. How lucky I am to spend my professional life in these paneled precincts instead of in the cinder block environment of the Math building! As for the people in Sanborn . . . well, some of them are nice, but there has never been any real intellectual community in the English Department.

Pot luck supper at the Meeting House in Elise's honor. Peter Stettenheim very friendly for a change. Elise optimistic about world affairs and especially about renewed respect given the UN.

Thursday, April 13, 1989

Hanover-PH

En route to Philadelphia via AMTRAK from Springfield, This a.m., last minute phone call to Jack Casey re: insurance for the Kinhaven van and to Barbara Lloyd re: ventilating the concert hall. Ignat Solzhenitsyn has written from London to say that his parents are experiencing financial straits and he doubts they can give much to the Kinhaven Capital Fund. Well, I tried.

Arrived at Pendle Hill at 7:30 p.m. Glad that Mother saw it finally. To the Walkers' for ice cream—our ritual. They had a friend from Alaska, a lively black woman, a lawyer, new to the Board.

Friday, April 14, 1989

PH-Bethlehem

Book Committee. Gay Nicholson very appreciative of my support. She's finishing Elise Boulding's MS on the family. We accepted Sonny Cronk's on apophatic theology, which got rave recommendations from me and from four other readers including a Russian Orthodox monk in St. Vladimir's Seminary. Breakfast earlier with Anne Thomas and her husband. So-so meeting.

Publications Committee, but just before it Paul Alexander sequestered me as part of Rebecca's annual review. She's slacking off, poor thing, distracted by a marriage on the rocks. Late on correspondence; one pamphlet had to be completely reprinted because of embarrassing mistakes. I said that when people begin to be obsessed with how overworked they are it's perhaps time for a change. Cf. Barbara Parsons. If they didn't spend so much time discussing their overwork, they'd be able to do what they say they cannot do. But Rebecca is still delicious in her enthusiasms and devotion to Quaker faith.

Good Publications Committee. Cate Van Meter came in with her new baby. She'll resign. Can't continue now.

I played hooky for the remainder of the Board meeting. But George Peck said he'd read my translation of Ritsos's "Peace" at the show and tell Saturday night. Heard Oliver Rodgers practicing his violin selection—awful. But he's such a nice man.

Alec picked us up and we drove to Bethlehem. Daphne and Helene Rassias drove in from NYC and joined us. Leander's recital was fine. He did an original composition: hymn tune he'd encountered at Woodbrooke, followed by jazz variations, Mozart four-hand with Sandy, much more forceful and seasoned than when we'd heard it at Kinhaven last summer, Rautavaara's "Fire Sermon" sonata, electrifying; 2nd half, Beethoven's opus 7, OK but not seasoned, very strong forte-forte, lots of abrupt changes, as though Beethoven were a madman, definitely not Mozartian or "classical"; then Petrushka with Sandy, again electrifying. Full house, including Pat Wood, Tom Wood's wife, Masuko and Naoko, who got lost and arrived at the interval, their Japanese friend who is Leander's current girlfriend, very silent and sexy; also Jerry and Nancy Bidlack. I thanked Jerry "for making all this possible." Mitch, the Bethlehem Steel engineer who will take us round tomorrow; the Greek garage owner who said he'd bring the entire κοινότητα; Moravian Music Department chair and her husband; Larry Wright and pregnant wife. Leander has a following. The chairwoman spoke to me at length. She so appreciates Leander's versatility. So few pianists are able to do both solo and chamber music, "And he's such a superb accompanist, too." I expanded on my philosophy, my dismay at the emphasis on solo repertoire in conservatory. Pat Wood very gracious, too. And others. Whenever Leander goes he makes friends and inspires admirers. "And he's so modest," said the chair. It was a very respectable recital: an unusual program, varied, scintillating.

Afterwards, drinks at the Hotel Bethlehem. Sleep.

Saturday, April 15, 1989

Bethlehem-NYC

Breakfast all together, including scrapple. Then "Mitch" took Leander and me to Bethlehem Steel. What an experience! We saw the oxygen furnace where the molten iron is converted to steel through reduction of carbon content and addition of alloys. Huge caldron fired with oxygen. It was like the sun itself. Then they pour off the slag and add aluminum, which combines with the oxygen, removing it. Other alloys are added, depending on the individual order. Then we saw the huge caldron carried on a crane, placed over the forms, which are filled one by one with molten steel to make huge ingots. These, when cooler, are removed from the forms.

Next, we went to the rolling mill, where the ingots, reheated, are put through presses that shape them, as though they were clay or bread dough, into girders of specified lengths, widths, shapes. We visited the control cabins, with surly, burly workmen (all seemingly of a similar body type) before computer screens, televisions, etc. showing every detail of the operation, how each pass decreases the girder by  $\frac{3}{8}$  inch. Previously, a man had somehow fallen on one of the red-hot girders and been horribly burned. Another had been killed when a caldron exploded. We saw a caldron that had cracked, oozing molten steel. Dangerous business. (We had on hard hats and goggles.)

Each order is custom: specific girders for a particular building.

Then at the end of the huge mill we saw the finished girders set out to cool under a spray of water.

One part of the factory was built in 1908 and powered by steam engines still functioning. Adjacent to it was a new mill built in 1980, automated.

Initial impression: I was back in Birmingham! Identical architecture, smog, even the fine rain.

The plant made $100,000,000 profit last year, after many years of difficulty. But it is operating only at about 60% of capacity.

What a wonderful opportunity, thanks to Mr. Mitchell, father of one of Leander's favorite students.

Bus to NYC. Yale Club. In Port Authority, homeless bums. One shouting, another with drugs. New York New York!

Oasis in the Yale Club. I went to the bar and ordered a bloody Mary.

Nice supper at La Maison Japonaise with Daphne and Gregory. I recounted my experience at Bethlehem Steel. Then to Roundhouse for Member of the Wedding. Well acted all round, and well directed, but oh so slow, so non-dramatic. But slowly it did grow one as a portrait of adolescent trauma. The black-white themes, and the atom bomb, however, did seem to be introduced somewhat gratuitously.

Sunday, April 16, 1989

By taxi to Grand Army Plaza. Breakfast on Flatbush Avenue—what different, interesting people (compared to Hanover), including black-white couple having a most literate, intellectual conversation, and old ladies sharing breakfast, or single men with NY Times, lingering over their bacon and eggs.

Then Kinhaven Board at Alice Henkin's. Jim Quinn led us through the campaign, which isn't making great strides at this point. David Bury wants still more money to solicit foundations actively. Paula Xanthopoulos dubious. We'll receive a more concrete proposal in July. At the full meeting, beginning at 11:00, we welcomed Dr. John Austin, who I think will be a very good addition. Irene Mendelson is doing wonders with the annual fund. The main substantive question was the one I raised regarding evaluation. Janet Greene spoke strongly against, from the staff's point of view, but not seeing the full picture, and especially not that our real purpose is to evaluate the director. But others supported me, especially Alice Henkin and George Goodwin. We decided nothing, but will try to let the trustees' position be known to the staff this July.

Irene drove me to Penn Station. Missed the 4:14 but made the 4:59. Daphne, Mother, and Chrysanthi were waiting; they spent the day walking in the rain and visiting Daphne's apartment after a leisurely breakfast at the Yale Club.

May 12, 1989

Dwight Lahr telephoned to say that the CAP has elected me the first Frederick Sessions Beebe '35 Professor in the Art of Writing. No time off, but it does include a yearly fund of $1000 for research.

Yesterday heard the celebrated Grace Paley read her short stories. Very slight. But her personality, the real Jewish mama, is large.

Heard Chief Justice Rehnquist lecture on Daniel Webster in Spaulding. Jim Freedman's introduction was the better of the two speeches. He said afterwards that the Chief Justice would graciously answer questions, but only on the topic of Webster. (The Court is considering a possible reversal of Roe vs. Wade on abortion. I'd attended a rally previously, again with Grace Paley.) So a student asked, "What would Daniel Webster have thought about Roe vs. Wade?" Rehnquist rose to the occasion, answering, "Webster would have sided with whichever faction paid him the most."

This was followed by a dinner in Alumni Hall to honor Charles Wiltse upon his completion of the Webster Papers, after 22 years. Sad to see Wiltse in a wheelchair, a cadaver. But his voice was young and vibrant. Thumbing through the Papers, I opened accidentally to Webster's 1824 speech defending the Greek War of Independence.

May 13, 1989

Dinner at the Schers'. Diana Taylor there with her husband, Eric Mannheim, M.D., who's hoping to do a geriatric study using Kendal.

Mother's paintings on exhibit in Howe Library are OK, nothing great, but she enjoys this diversion. Also, she's taking violin lessons after 70 years and playing string quartets.

May 15, 1989

Busy day. Breakfast with Jean Brophy to discuss the Kendal agenda. Lunch with the Comparative Literature Steering Committee. Afternoon at the Meeting House for Finance Committee, watching Sandy Stettenheim try to put together a budget. 7:30 again at the Meeting House for Kendal Overseers.

May 16, 1989

Lectured at 8:45 a.m., then drove to Manchester airport to fly to Philadelphia. Plane delayed one hour. Disagreeable moment at Philadelphia airport when another man went up front before the seatbelt sign was off and I followed him, hoping to save time getting off. We were vilified by other passengers and returned sheepishly to our seats. Alec met me and drove me to Haverford, where I was 45 minutes late for the Corporation Nominating Committee but still able to contribute something. John Jones, Tom Kessenger, Bennett's wife, others I didn't know. Told Kessenger about Alec's return to Jakarta. Alec drove me back to the airport just in time. A whole day traveling just for a two-hour meeting.

May 18, 1989

Alice Wright read her MALS project, an autobiographical novel about a girl growing up with very little love from her parents.

May 19, 1989

Off again, to Pendle Hill, which I always enjoy.

May 23, 1989

Peter Burian and Nancy Bekavac for dinner. She's Lloyd Lewis's friend, fellow trustee of Swarthmore, now assistant to Jim Freedman. A live wire! Lovely intellectual personality. . . . Earlier, Dickey Endowment meeting. We've applied for $75,000 to start a new War/Peace course in conflict resolution.

May 24, 1989

Lunch with Tom Corindia, whom we see so seldom now because of his sudden burden of four children. He's in the thick of the hospital's complicated growth.

Spoke in College Course 1 on conscientious objection, along with Tom Waring (who did CPS) and an impressive man from Norwich who was a medic in Vietnam. Resurrecting the past is strange—bittersweet.

Then to hear Mary Beth Basile defend her thesis on Vergil and Milton.

May 25, 1989

Jon Laaspere's wedding, on a riverside meadow in Norwich. Bride and groom arrived in canoes. The service was disappointing; no music. Unitarian female officiant. All ritual gone.

War/Peace Seminar addressed by Israeli writer-activist Yoram Kaniuk, who argued persuasively for an independent Palestinian state.

May 26, 1989

Dashed to Terpni to clean the outhouse and plant the garden. How nice!

May 28 1989

My birthday. 59. Chrysanthi and children banded together to get a single present: a VCR. Now I can watch Benny Hill!

May 29, 1989

Pappous's birthday, the first after his death. Sad. Dr. Radebaugh asked me once after Meeting if I missed my father, and I said "Yes, but not in the state in which you saw him here in Hanover." Mother went to the grave and wept a little.

Lunch with Mr. Scherman, the man who in effect raised the $1,000,000 for the Beebe Chair. Formerly chief financial officer for Newsweek, which Beebe owned.

Drinks with Jim Tatum to worry together about Basile's thesis, which is surprisingly bad, after all the ballyhoo.

May 30, 1989

Lectured well, I believe, on T. S. Eliot, the end of English 17. Lunch with Steve Scher and Jim Jordan to see if we can revive Scher's Faculty Seminar. Then to party for the retirement of Charles McLane and Larry Radway.

Evening: "Installation" of Karen Sheldon as tenured priest at St. Thomas's. A huge affair, very "high church," with chanting and good music. Some nice, touching elements to the service, especially the "gifts" presented to Karen by Peter Camp, the bishop, students, etc., each with a real and symbolic purpose. The whole Sheldon family in attendance, including their six-foot eight-inch Marine son who looks so grotesque.

May 31, 1989

Met with Susan Tenney, who is replacing John Finn as director of my computer-drill project. She is businesslike; he is flaky, but firm. Under him, all year, we accomplished nothing.

Ceremonial Comparative Literature lunch with majors, including Johannes von Moltke, who also helped with War/Peace Studies.

Afternoon: Kendal open meeting in Alumni Hall. Surprise: Dorothy and Oliver Rodgers came from Kendal at Longwood to describe their emotions upon entering. Also some others, all effective speakers and sweet people. Oliver admitted that, notwithstanding the joy of unloading possessions, he had hired a storage space. I then hosted a dinner for all concerned at Jesse's, after which Oliver and Dorothy came home for a bit. What a nice couple! They are my ideal Quakers.

June 1, 1989

Lunch with Karin Rodis discussing our future cooperation now that I'm the Beebe Professor.

Surprise invitation from Sheba Freedman to dine at D'Artagnan with her, Sandy McCulloch, and Jared Freedman. A pleasant occasion. Sandy is becoming increasingly liberal in his old age, a delight to see.

Trouble with Basile. She wept for an hour in my office because of the B+ we gave her. I counseled her to accept "injustice Christlike." But she's a scrapper. She complained to Bradley and got a week's extension to re-write, incorporating our suggestions. Her subject is Fama (glory). She seems to have incorporated some herself—the need, that is.

June 3, 1989

John van Aalst's wedding to Cynthia Cook, at Rollins. Very exuberant, as always, given the Fellowship. Ritual here is not lost. Lunch in their new church. We sat next to Bob Beck and learned much about the success of the movement. They've formed their own parochial school.

June 5, 1989

Computing seminar. Fascinating on how nerves transmit impulses, and how this relates to machine intelligence.

June 6, 1989

Basile's revised thesis is much better, thank goodness. She told me that she learned more in the last four days than all term long.

Supper at the Kleinhardts' with Dimitri Gerakaris and wife. He has evolved from a blacksmith to a sculptor in iron, doing monumental works for parks, shopping malls, etc. Truly, an alternative life style that has worked.

June 7, 1989

8:30 a.m. Tatum and I gave Basile an "A."

9:00 a.m. English Department meeting, disagreeable as always. Hag-gling over awards. Too bad that I've spent an entire career with a hateful department, but there have been compensations in other quarters. Basile ended up getting the Perkins Prize.

Retirement party for Bill Smith. Long talk with Marisa and her husband, who is a literary agent. They encouraged me to do the Kazantzakis biography and offered to try to place it. But I'll need to write a sample chapter. I'm getting tired! For Bill, OISER did, appropriately, a video with lots of gags. E.g., Q: "What will he leave behind?" A: "His parking space."

Dee Johnson is in hospital with cancer of the uterus. With luck they'll remove all the affected parts before it spreads.

June 8, 1989

Leander and I drove to Cambridge. Nice supper with Peter Gardner, who astonished us by announcing that he is going to have a baby with his third wife, via artificial insemination, since he had a vasectomy years ago. One can now “shop” for precisely the right quality of sperm! Brave New World. Then Leander and I saw a brilliant production of Molière’s The Miser with Alvin Epstein in the lead.

Previously, met with “communications group” and Greg Prince to devise an approach to a rich alumnus, Jerry Goldstein.

Andonis and Lena Daskopoulos arrived from Salonika.

June 9, 1989

Took the Daskopouloi around Dartmouth. Nice to talk Greek again.

Dinner at the Sheldons’. Met Professor Mike Manheim from Toledo, but he lives in Strafford. He went to Columbia with me, etc. Coincidence after coincidence, as with Harmon Donathan.

June 10, 1989

Ayoko Kano visited. She’s the Japanese who did so spectacularly well in my Ulysses course some years ago. I recommended her for graduate school. She was accepted everywhere and chose Cornell, where she starts next week.

Our usual “at home” was very nice. Martha Boss came with her parents. So did Eleni Tsacopoulos with Angelos and her stepmother, arriving in a stretch limousine and chauffeur. He seemed childishly simple and genuine. Eleni was ecstatic about her Greek study-tour. Ross Waller came, too, and the infamous Basile, all smiles. And lots more, e.g., Peter Converse.

Daskopouloi took 14 people to dinner: Don Nielsen, Dimitri’s friends, and us.

June 11, 1989

Graduation. I went, for a change. The address was a good one: on boredom, by the Russian poet and novelist whose name I’ve forgotten. Surgeon General Bork got a standing ovation. Obviously, a public official who bravely demonstrates integrity is now a rarity.

Afterwards, to the Drews’ in Vershire for a picnic with Daskopouloi, etc. They have a lovely apple orchard.

June 13, 1989

Peter and Evie Dale for lunch with Nicole, their daughter who just graduated.

June 15, 1989

To NYC with Chrysanthi and Mother. Supper at the Yale Club with Daphne and Greg. Very pleasant. Daphne is excited about a possible new apartment on Madison and 63rd, discovered by our cousin-in-law Roy Bernstein.

June 16, 1989, Bloomsday

To Philadelphia to the last day of the Joyce Symposium at the Curtis Institute. Nice talk with Morton Levitt, but Ellen Rose wasn't there. Papers uninspiring Joyce and Bakhtin, etc. Then to Philadelphia Art Museum. Met Alec and saw the Annenberg collection of impressionists. Then to the PH board. I harangued them about Pendle Hill On the Road. Dorothy Rodgers will take the responsibility again and try to resurrect it. This year nothing happened.

June 18, 1989

Riparius

To the farm. Finally. Leander already here. Lots of mowing done, despite all the rain. Garden intact.

June 19, 1989

Leander is off to another Kinhaven season. I started the John Deere tractor without difficulty. We're boiling water, just to be sure. And I have a filter that's supposed to eliminate all coliform bacteria.

June 20, 1989

Busy preparing Kinhaven agenda. Trying to induce the Board to accept internal evaluation. Also complicated insurance questions. And, as always, how to escape the Dushkins.

June 21, 1989

Second proofs of Kazantzakis, Politics of the Spirit arrived. I'm reading them with an eye to the index, also looking for typos. The English is fine, the Greek horrendous, as always.

June 26, 1989

To Hanover. Alec there, having moved everything from Philadelphia.

Kendal Overseers. Good news. The Bank of Ireland (!) will guarantee our bonds, so financing is now possible. And the contractor's price seems OK. We've set August 29 for groundbreaking: a party.

June 27, 1989

Bradley, Greg Prince, Lu Martin, and I met to plan strategy for getting another donation for Greek from Mr. Tsacopoulos. I'll write a case statement, part 1, and Edward will do part 2.

To Cambridge with Alec and Chrysanthi to see Calderón's Life Is a Dream at the A.R.T. Another splendid production, with Cherry Jones, Derek Smith, J. Geidt, Thomas Derrah, Pamala Gien. A problem play; emphasizes the illusory nature of reality but then undercuts its own thesis in the 2nd half as Segismundo comes out of the dream. Also, really ought to have been a tragedy rather than a romantic comedy.

June 28, 1989

Back to the farm. Materials delivered for the pole barn. Interesting driver, son of an Amish family. At age 16 when his father offered him his own horse and buggy, he said he wanted a car. So he left. And now he drives a tractor-trailer rig.

To dinner at Merrill McGee House in Warrensburg with Shapiros and Laura Gouthreau, and Alec. Very un-Adirondacky, as Alec said. But nice. A leisurely 3½ hour meal, with easy conversation the whole time.

June 29, 1989

Late. The crew arrived to build our pole barn. Foreman: Randy. Though it was dusk, they started at once, squaring the site, stringing the lines.

June 30, 1989

The crew back at 7:30 a.m. Six young men, aged 18 to 32. Such vigorous, coordinated workers. Randy never walks, always runs. By 9:30 they had the holes dug and the poles lined up. By 11:00 a.m. lunch break the building was almost completely framed. They resumed at 12:00 and went steadily until 6:30, finishing! We stood in awe. They wanted to avoid another night in a motel and be able to get home (around Elmyra, NY) for the weekend and July 4th. The building is surprisingly beautiful—lovely blue walls. It'll have to add some "embroidery" to compensate for the irregularities in the land, but otherwise it's ready. Cost: $5800 only.

July 1, 1989

Finished proofreading my book. Now have to transfer all marks to the master proofs.

July 3, 1989

Finished the transfer. Now: the index. Al Zalon came at 2:00 and we played flute and piano all afternoon. Bach, Vaughan-Williams, Fauré, Rachmaninoff, Albéniz, Prokofiev. Alec returned from a weekend in the Catskills and visiting Tom Wood. In the evening Al returned and we played trios. My cup runneth over.

July 4, 1989

The index is a terrible chore, but must be done. I continue to encounter errors in the text. Discouraging.

July 6, 1989

Up at 6:30 a.m. to get in four hours of work before leaving for Saratoga with the Shapiros and Evelyn Greene. A wonderful afternoon, starting with “Apollo” with Ib Andersen. I was extraordinarily moved by both the music and, of course, by Balanchine’s brilliant choreography. Mozart “Serenade” by Peter Martins was disappointing. No imagination at all. But “The Four Seasons” (Verdi, not Vivaldi) redeemed the afternoon. Jerome Robbins this time, with brilliant execution by Kyra Nichols, Mock Soto, and a newcomer, Gen Hariuchi, a tiny Japanese, who was electrifying as the faun.

Alec, meanwhile, took our old Packard organ, built in 1893, to Barre, Vermont, to be rebuilt. Thanks to Vic McGee for the contact.

July 7, 1989

Worked 13 hours upstairs on the computer and finished the index! Alec and I are going to build a fake foundation in the pole barn to keep out animals (and humans) and a real foundation for the projected bathroom off the porch. For a moment I weakened and thought to hire a contractor (a man who came for the well and told us to chlorinate it—the only remedy), but then I remembered the spirit of this place.

July 8, 1989

Annie, the French girl who teaches at Middlebury, is here for the weekend, looking lovely. We last saw her and Jacques in their apartment in Paris. Ordered the cement blocks for our projects, cheaper delivered from Hudson Falls than picked up at Murphy’s. I’ve been picking up loose ends before turning to the Tatum project. Kinhaven Board affairs for next week, PH pamphlet affairs (possible revision of Francis Nicholson's essay on money), JMGS proofs. Everything has come at once.

Alec and I prepared the ground for the bathroom, leveling it and squaring it by triangulation:  $a^2 + b^2 = c^2$ .

July 9, 1989

More French people. Alec's professeur from Middlebury and his wife, also a professeur. We spent six hours talking in an equal mixture of French and English on a huge range of subjects: Proust, Beckett, the EEC, Japanese economic imperialism, mushrooms, rustic country homes, the parking problem in Paris, Middlebury's defects, etc. They left at 5:30 and I promptly took a delicious swim. Spent the morning writing letters to Dick Dellamora, Tony Manouosos, Alice, and others, all long overdue. Also reviewed my "Ritsos's Painterly Techniques," which I still rather like. Hope to send it to Morton Levitt at JML, after a few corrections are added.

July 11, 1989

Delivery of 10-inch and 8-inch cement blocks, the former for our new extension (bathroom), the latter for a skirting around the pole barn. Yesterday we squared off the bathroom site, 8 feet by 6 feet, and leveled it, more or less. Today we began the first course. I've decided to confine my Tatum article writing to the mornings, and to work with Alec on the foundation in the afternoons. Chrysanthi is joining in, too, with customary good humor. We make a good team.

Jerry and Rosine Gardner here for dinner. Lots of gossip about town politics.

July 13, 1989

We're on the third course. Going well. Of course each of the walls has a little twist, or curve, or bend, but no matter. We are amateurs. Also, we're proceeding without plans or a permit, as in the old days (per Art Perryman's advice). The code says this, the code says that (e.g., to start four feet beneath ground level). We started at two and a half feet.

Hilda Grunblatt for supper. One of Jacques' translations is finally in print, full of misprints, of course, since Fischer-Galati is the publisher (remembrances of Stewards of the Land).

Mr. Carpenter delivered his proposal for chlorinating the well. $700 instead of the $300 I'd foolishly expected. Don't know what to do. Art says to wait. . . . Dinner at Mosher's Diner.

July 14, 1989

Fourth course finished. We need a fifth. Daphne and Greg arrived from New York for a late supper, and a delightful one. Daphne has signed the lease for the apartment on Madison Avenue and will move on August 1st. She's reading lots of books, all the new S & S list: a potpourri of fiction, exposé, health advice, etc. She's also enjoying the beach house Greg has rented. He continues to strike me as decent but empty-headed. I think his major interest is sports.

July 15, 1989

Up early. A woodpecker pounded away on our roof, seemingly since 5:00 a.m. Daphne slept in her old bed, we of course on our new inner-spring mattress extravaganza. Off to Kinhaven for board meeting. I'm writing this next to the swimming pool at Blue Gentian Lodge. Chrysanthi did not come, owing to Daphne's visit (plus Mary and Veronica Rassias are expected), but said how she regretted missing this little vacation. As expected, I'm the only one in the motel.

Full board meeting with good attendance. We passed the new Junior Camp, appointed Nancy director, and gave her a salary; also hired David Bury to do twice as much fund-raising, now extending to foundations. More tomorrow. The school provided lunch and dinner, very credibly. It was nice to see Nicolas, the boy who had auditioned at Dartmouth when he was a Kinhaven student, now back as a violin teacher. Also, Ardis Chapman told me that Eric Beatty, now a professional mime, is living in the Bidlacks' home in Bethlehem. Such a small world. Lelah officious as always; kept telling us to wash our mugs. Dorothy's sister Trudle was here, a sweet woman, retired twenty years from the Smith College music faculty. Ike Patch came for supper. He'd followed up my lead re: the Soros Foundation, for assistance with Russians and will go to Tashkent in September to try to arrange for next summer. The concert was varied, as usual. A Mozart quartet with Albert Tan, Leander's partner, as second fiddle and a delicious first violin. The Stravinsky "Rag-time," not the best Stravinsky, but fun. Then Leander in Poulenc's Trio for piano, oboe, and bassoon, with Mary Watt. Fun. The rebuilt Miss Mann piano is splendid. Then percussion ensemble in a piece by Varèse, with Jerry doing castanets and Peter Schultz taking out all his aggression against the tympani. I sat next to Paula and caught up with her. She's struggling, now managing 21 singers. After the concert, watched the delicious dancing that is now a Kinhaven tradition. Even Leander was dancing! With his little piano student, the one who, he says, is better than Ignat. Lastly, to the Inn at Long Last in Chester with Leander, Albert Tan, Sandy Dennis, and Carolyn Wall, for a beer. Jack Coleman was there; said he remembered Alec and me. We talked about the Haverford Board and he said that in his presidency the difficulty in securing Quakers arose largely from regionalism; they never looked further than the northeast corridor. Nice talk with Albert, who makes his living as a computer programmer for a New York bank and does free lance violin.

July 16, 1989

Breakfast at the Blue Gentian. I was alone in the dining room, our little private hideaway. Board 10:00 until 1:00. Controversy again about evaluations. Jerry made a speech against; I spoke strongly about the dangers of self-congratulation and carried the day. But will Jerry do anything—that is the question.

Children's concert a delight, as always. Leander has a particularly good pianist this year; she did the Mendelssohn trio with aplomb, making a professionally assured recovery at one point after her fingers turned to jelly. I made a little speech in the intermission, telling about our adventure with the Russians, and about the Junior Camp. Afterwards, two gentlemen came up to say how impressed they were with Kinhaven and could they make a financial contribution!

Supper in Ludlow afterwards with Leander and Albert Tan. A long, leisurely meal with lots of good conversation. The sorrow is that Jerry is not at all respected musically by staff and also by most students. What to do is the question. Will our evaluations help or hinder? Tan was concertmaster of the Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra just before Daphne started. Gave up violin for a year afterwards, then resumed. He said the best tactic is to join an orchestra so you can play without having to hear yourself—i.e., how awful you are.

July 18, 1989

To Saratoga to celebrate our 34th anniversary. Stuffed ourselves in the Hall of Springs. Program started with Mozart's Divertimento no. 15, Balanchine. Perfect congruence between dance and music. So much better than the Mozart we saw last time. Then a new work by Michael Torke scored for two pianos, two marimbas, and orchestra. Much better music than David Glass, although it too was minimalist in that its basis was repetition. Peter Martins' choreography very imaginative, with especially fine numbers by Jock Soto and Heather Watts and then Damian Woetzel and Kyra Nichols. Last came "Firebird" with the Chagall costumes and scenery, danced by Valentina Kozlova, who is electrifying. Of course the piece as a whole is quite static, based more on tableau than on dancing, somehow, except of course for the middle when the magicians and animals suddenly overwhelm the hunter. I like "Apollo" better.

July 19, 1989

The cellar for the bathroom is finished. Alec and Chrysanthi started laying cement blocks in the gaps in the pole barn. Alec slept last night for the first time in his cabin, under mosquito netting (Jakarta style). He's put a blue carpet on his loft floor and moved his desk upstairs. Home sweet home.

I am slowly getting the Ford mower ready to use, making (or trying to make) all the adjustments described in the manual. Nothing was done last year. But our Jari is "sick." Took it to Dave Whitty, whose son now does the work; it needs a valve job, probably.

I can't decide whether to proceed with Mr. Carpenter's proposal for the well. Procrastinating.

Long visit from Mary Fitzgerald, who is on the town's Democratic Committee, and is learning the secrets of politics, she says. She's clearly for Bill Montfort.

Working each morning on "The Re-emergence of Greek Prose Fiction in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries" for the Tatum conference next week.

July 21, 1989

Naoko and Yasuo arrived: Alec's Japanese friends, the violist and second violinist in his quartet. Chamber music immediately. How nice that our piano is now in such good condition!

July 22, 1989

Steve, the cellist, and his wife Diane arrived. They rehearsed Mozart's Dissident together and then Dvořák's Bagatelles with me (but no viola).

At the same time Jim Dwyer was here for the well. I've said No to Les Carpenter. Dwyer says: Pump it, chlorinate it, pump it again, test it, then decide.

For supper we had 25 people! Perrymans, Mary Fitzgerald, Laura and Michael. Then we performed the Mozart and Dvořák. In my old age I am finally able to play piano in public without going into a total funk. Life's little victories!

The Jari is dying. Motor shot, body about to collapse. I'm wondering what to do.

July 24, 1989

To Hanover after lunch, for Kendal Board. Previously, met with Susan Tenny re: my hypercard computer project, which is finally going well. She already has some prototypes.

At the Kendal meeting we named the various clusters of buildings, but my nomination "Come-to-Good" was rejected as "too difficult." Groundbreaking is now September 5th and looks definite.

July 25, 1989

Back to the farm. More info on a new Jari from Joe's Equipment. Lafayette has a Kinco that he likes. Yasuo is off to the Gordon Conference. Naoko, Alec, and I played piano-violin-violata. Alec in my absence cracked the Pitman rod on the Ford mower by stupidly backing up into it, and broke off the swathboard. He feels terrible and swears to set things right.

July 26, 1989

Struggling to shorten my talk to twenty minutes.

July 27, 1989

To Hanover again, alone.

July 28, 1989

Met Meg Alexiou on the street just before 9:00. Our session also included Roddy Beaton and Ole Smith. I read mine quickly, in twenty minutes. Steve Scher came to listen: a true friend. One paper was in French but we had transcripts and thus could understand perfectly. Afterward, a three-hour lunch with Meg and Roddy at the Faculty Club; very cosy. Dimitri is in a group home in Oakfield Road, Birmingham, and doing very well. He can stand outside of himself, so to speak, and say things like “I used to be like that” (pointing to a totally autistic person). But Pavlos in Greece is not improved: still totally autistic.

Picked up a modem to make me capable of e-mail at the farm.

Drove back with Mother.

More chamber music, again with Yasuo, who returned from his conference. Carol Weingeist came over from New York Yearly Meeting at Silver Bay, for supper.

July 29, 1989

Alec's birthday. I gave him a helmet and earmuffs for use with his chain saw. He went off to Kinhaven with Yasuo and Naoko, to hear Leander and Sandy play Petrushka. Mowed: nothing broke. Supper at Mosher's Diner followed by indigestion.

August 1, 1989

Tarred the outside walls of our new foundation. Beginning to work on the Kazantzakis letters, finally.

August 2, 1989

Filled in the dirt around the foundation, and landscaped the ground. Picked apples. Extraordinary amount of fruit this year. Chrysanthi made applesauce—tons.

August 3, 1989

Alec and Chrysanthi drove to Hanover with Mother. Mother's a good sport, even went swimming yesterday. But says she can only take the outhouse so many days. Alec has to make last-minute arrangements in Hanover, doctors' appointments, etc., prior to leaving.

August 4, 1989

I'm alone here. Got used to it very quickly, actually. Results of well test came back. Still polluted. 5 coliform. The lowest yet, but not good enough. So the contamination is clearly in the water that's entering, since all this was new water. Jim Dwyer pumped the well dry twice last week.

Went to Chester Diner for supper. A loudmouth local there kept saying how boring his parents were. But he had to condescend to spend an hour or two with them on Saturday night, poor fellow. I wish I'd been brash enough to tell him that when he gets sick his parents will be the ones who tend him whereas all his “interesting” friends will disappear.

August 8, 1989

Finally solved the ground fault interrupter mystery. Tried new outlet at start of line (behind red couch). Didn't work. At first I thought the outlet defective; then the refrigerator. No, still didn't work even with refrigerator disconnected. Tried it in outlets further down the line. It worked. Then realized the trouble was probably in the refrigerator outlet, which I'd rewired for a three-pronged receptacle. And sure enough, opening it I found that the ground wire had broken in two. Repaired it. Reinserted the ground fault interrupter device. And it worked. Good sleuthing combined with patience.

Alec put up his truck and closed his cabin. His time approacheth. Leander is now here, after a good summer at Kinhaven. But they lost 35 tuition checks. And Jerry was confronted with his incompetence in orchestra and in a way apologized publically. Things are developing . . .

I've been editing S. Francis Nicholson's pamphlet on "Quaker Money" to make it acceptable for the PH series.

Alec's second hairpiece arrived via UPS, just in time.

August 9, 1989

Riparius-NYC

Morning in my "office," reading the Παπαθανασόπουλος letters. Then we all drove to NY, stopping for lunch at a McDonald's. In the Yale Club by 5:00. Daphne and Greg joined us. Leander as usual fulminated against Ivy League necktie-wearing elites and I tried, gently, to tell him how enmeshed he is willy-nilly in the capitalist system. He is snobbish (reverse snobbery) and very immature on this issue, as on others. Nice dinner on the roof at this capitalist haven. "The Last Supper." Then visited Daphne's new flat at 717 Madison Avenue, between 63rd and 64th Streets. She dropped her keys down the elevator shaft, but otherwise everything was fine. A nice pad, with a terrace out back looking upon brick walls. Amazing location. She's delighted but discouraged in her job because of insensitive boss. We all drove to JFK and waited with Alec as he checked in at Korean Airlines for the flight to Seoul via Anchorage; then change planes, to Singapore. Overnight. Then to Jakarta, where he arrives at 4:00 p.m. on Friday the 11th (equals 4:00 a.m. our time). A hall filled with hundreds of Koreans, Indonesians, Filipinos, as though all of New York were oriental. Few Caucasians. Finally, at 11:45 p.m., we kissed goodbye. Chrysanthi shed a few tears (afterwards) but generally bore it well. Alec had a catch in his voice, appreciating our presence. And off he went. Then we returned via Gregory's key; he had tried unsuccessfully to duplicate Daphne's neighbor's key. To bed at 1:30 a.m.

August 10, 1989

Yale Club–Riparius

Delicious shower. Breakfast with good conversation with Chrysanthi, trying to cheer her up. I'm writing this in the Yale Club library, my delicious home away from home. Met Daphne and Leander for lunch in a delicatessen: pickles, chopped chicken liver—i.e., New York! Then up to Simon & Schuster's offices. Met Roz, the difficult boss; she was swell with us, on her best behavior, Daphne said later. Temperamental type; blows hot and cold. Most in the office were charming and gracious, especially Eileen, Daphne's special friend, who left a higher salary at Merrill Lynch in order to taste the glamour of publishing. "We talk to Reagan, to Nixon!" she exclaimed. Daphne seems appreciated. A civilized environment, quiet, carpeted, full of books. Only the publisher, McEwen (I think) was a boor: no manners, cold as ice. Everyone hates him, Daphne said, but admits that he's a good worker. Mike Korda was out to lunch, so I couldn't say hello.

Then to Bancroft's on Madison and 45th to buy a suit for my anti-elitist son (and another for his elitist father). Left Manhattan at 3:30 and arrived home around 9:00 after Italian dinner in Lake George. Lost: one hubcap and one Cross ballpoint pen.

Friday, August 11, 1989

8:00 a.m. promptly the telephone rang and it was Alec calling from the Strand Hotel in Singapore. A good trip, only about four hours delayed; stopovers in Anchorage, Seoul, Bangkok. . . . I mowed in the afternoon.

Saturday, August 12, 1989

Rain all day. I'm filing Kazantzakis data. Very tedious work. Letter from Bob Brown at Princeton says that there are already 500 advance orders for my book. I'm becoming frightened. Peter Mailloux sent his huge biography of Kafka with a dedication thanking me for first introducing him to Kafka—at Dartmouth.

Sunday, August 13, 1989

Alec telephoned from Jakarta. Delighted, even thrilled, to be back; knows so many people. They're all in a hotel initially for orientation complete with cocktail parties, ambassadorial receptions, and the like.

Gary Wolfe and Jim Dwyer here. I ordered a drilled well.

Went to visit Jacob Stern on his island in Schroon Lake, Robbins Island, his wife's family. He's a classics professor at CCNY, friend of Burt Pike's, Diskin Clay's etc. Nice family. We rode in his speedboat to Adirondack, past Camp Redwing, now defunct. Drank wine on his porch. He says after four or five days he longs for Manhattan!

Wednesday, August 16, 1989

Wonderful full eclipse of the moon from 9:30 p.m. to midnight in clear skies. We sat on the Shapiros' deck with them and Milly and Jack Adler, gazing through Irv's binoculars. The shaded area of the moon seemed so globular, just like a ball.

I'm contriving a Rube Goldberg device to stabilize the swathboard on the outer shoe of the Ford mower. So far it's not working very well.

The new Jari came yesterday. I assembled it carefully and then couldn't start the motor.

Thursday, August 17, 1989

The Jari to service center in Glens Falls. The problem is damage in transit. Trying to get shippers to reimburse me.

Alice and Peter Buseck arrived. Lots and lots of talk over supper and far into the night.

Friday, August 18, 1989

Swathboard works, finally.

I'm doing the boring job of filing Kazantzakis letters. But thinking at the same time of the talk on Kazantzakis's religiosity to be given in Wilmington in September.

Peter left. Alice, Chrysanthi, and I supped at Mosher's, met Michael and Laura there for their ritual ice cream.

Leander has chronic abdominal pains. Jim Strickler suspects a hernia or muscle bruise with possible need for surgery. Ignat called. His father's "Gulag" is meant to appear in Novy Mir momentarily.

Wednesday, August 23, 1989

Princeton page proofs of references arrived. Still mistakes in the Greek. I want the book to be clean.

Thursday, August 24, 1989

Finished mowing. Και του χρόνου!

Very sociable. Dinner party at Bob and Marilyn Morse's with Rothsteins, Paul and Nancy Cormack, Les and ? ?. Morse and Cormack are real estate developers; Les is an M.D. who is retiring here and is already on the Planning Board. Morse is supporting Thomas for supervisor. Thinks Montfort a disaster. We learned all the latest, including the imminence of Monter's Oven Pond development in Michael and Laura's "front yard." Nice crowd. After dinner, all the men told how they came to the Adirondacks and found their wives.

Friday, August 25, 1989

Wrote review of Kavadias's poems translated by Gail Holst. Took Ford mower off the tractor. Needs a new guard and some bushings. It's so much more "delicate" than the old McCormack mower; everything has to be in perfect adjustment. Cut down cherry tree by the well; lots of memories went with it, but it was ant-infested and nearly dead.

More socializing, this time at Gore Mountain Motel buffet. Maureen and Mary Fitzgerald invited us, but when we arrived we found Bill Montford and his wife also, so we had a fascinating three hours of Democratic politics to balance the Republicans of last night. Bill is so resentful of Jerry Gardner who, he says, distorts all the news. He finds Thomas a menace because of all the people who are backing him—all those who want their power returned as it "used to be."

August 27, 1989

Decided to let Gary Wolfe drill a well for us. He'll do it in September or October. Mary Fitzgerald came to dowse the site. Does she really believe this nonsense? I perhaps can give credence to the "action" of the rods above a good vein, but when she began asking them, "Is there water at 500 feet? 400? 300? 350? 325? between 325 and 300?" etc., I became a total doubter. Suppose one talked Greek to the rods?

August 28, 1989

Art Perryman is very ill—bleeding ulcers. He vomited much blood, was rushed to the hospital, treated with cauterization. We had a long talk in his living room, next to the huge sculpted deer, now mounted rather grotesquely on an even larger root. His ethos of manliness interferes greatly with his willingness to treat himself sensibly.

August 30, 1989

Jari repaired! Miracle! We retrieved it and brought back Chinese take-out to celebrate. Leander went off a few days ago, first to Bethlehem and then to Minneapolis to his new girlfriend, so we are alone, which is rather nice. With the Jari finally operative, only the organ remains μετέωρα.

August 31, 1989

Picked up all needed parts for Ford mower repair from Bud Rudick, ready for next year. Tractor is now ready for the winter, always a chore.

Art had a relapse: palpitations, etc., heart straining to pump an inadequate supply of blood. We traveled to Glens Falls to visit him in hospital. Looking better after three transfusions.

September 4, 1989

Riparius–Hanover

A full day doing last-minute chores, such as covering the new foundation with boards to keep water and snow out. Home by 11:00 p.m. to face piles of mail.

September 5, 1989

Hanover

A great day. Groundbreaking for Kendal at Hanover. I was master of ceremonies—speaking, then introducing Lloyd Lewis, Sara Townsend, Joe Parks, and Alan Hunt; then putting the first spade into the earth. When I tossed the dirt high there was a great cheer from the crowd. Lloyd, to whom I sent my speech earlier, censored ¶2 in its original version, since I referred to him as the sperm and me as the egg. The revised version depersonalized the metaphor and made it less obviously copulatory. But the extended metaphor, especially the mitosis, seemed to work well. The text, more or less, was as follows.

REMARKS AT KENDAL AT HANOVER GROUNDBREAKING

(revised 8/28/89)

Peter Bien

Occasions like this tempt us to divide time into lumps instead of considering it a continuous flow. Everything before today was the past; right now is the present; the moment Kendal at Hanover opens—that will be the future.

Today we are not celebrating a birth; that will come in roughly twenty-six months and will undoubtedly occasion another celebration. Today we are celebrating the beginning of embryonic development: mitosis, the process by which a fertilized egg divides in two and then four and eight and on and on until it becomes a viable fetus still dependent on its umbilical cord (in this case, The Kendal Corporation in Pennsylvania), and then finally, at birth, an independent although still fragile being.

In the language of John's Gospel, we are celebrating the Word becoming Flesh. That is happening in the present. But what about the past? John helps us again when he writes: "In the beginning was the Word"—or, in the original Greek, "In the beginning was the Logos," the outward form by which an inner idea is expressed.

To return to our embryonic metaphor: In the beginning was a shared idea that put a gleam in various people's eyes in Pennsylvania and in various other people's here in the Hanover Quaker Meeting. The Pennsylvanians' idea was an eager desire to plant the original Kendal seed in northern New England; ours was a corresponding receptivity: an eagerness to have our potential activated.

The union of those two ideas took place in the autumn of 1985, exactly four years ago. Between then and now the fertilized egg has lain dormant while the amount of activity on its behalf, and the number of people dedicated to its nurture, have multiplied and multiplied. In those four years we secured Kendal's future home—this land; insured its financial support; protected it from regulatory forces eager sometimes to see it aborted; prepared its layette, hired its governesses, and recruited an extended family of hundreds of foster-parents to guide it through its future difficulties during infancy, childhood, and adolescence. How can we even begin to say a proper "Thanks" to all of these good souls? To Lloyd Lewis, to Alan Hunt, to Richard Bewley, John Clancy, Dick Dewees, Barbara Parsons, Tom Miller, and others in Pennsylvania; to Bob Metz, Tom Corindia, Sandy Stettenheim and all the local Quaker Overseers; to Carol Weingeist, our first full-time employee on site, to Jean Brophy, to our wonderful secretary, Naomi; to Steve Marion, who helped us so much in securing our Certificate of Need from the State of New Hampshire; to those at Dartmouth who were always ready to listen to us: Bob Field, Cary Clark, Gordie DeWitt; to Susan and Malcom McLane, who guided us with their wisdom at a crucial moment; to Governor Lane Dwinell; to our architects and engineers; to Jim Strickler, Lou Matthews, and others in the medical community; to Mrs. Ferguson and the Hanover Improvement Society; and to all the Founders, for their faith in something that, until this moment, has remained nothing more than a Word, an intangible idea, rather than tangible Flesh. Without a single line of advertising, but simply by word of mouth, we have developed a family that currently numbers, besides the Founders, over 500 individuals or couples on the priority list for future entrance, and a mailing list of 1500 others who have expressed interest.

What about the future? Although opening is more than two years away, it is not premature to think ahead to our life with this new creation when it becomes an independent although still fragile being. Those who have raised children know that this endeavor can give meaning to their existence as well as to the child's. What we hope is that the experience of living in Kendal at Hanover after its birth will challenge our Founders to develop it into a supportive community appropriate to their own stage in life and to the fact of mortality, a community enabling them to share both joy and bereavement. What Kendal offers each of us is the chance to continue to control our life in its final third or quarter, just as we have attempted to control it in youth and maturity, instead of feeling increasingly controlled.

In any case, now in the present let's celebrate the inauguration of mitosis, give thanks to those who protected the dormant egg for so long, and hope that the Flesh to be born will be healthy, beautiful, civilized, and temperamentally serene.

Afterwards, the Overseers and the Philadelphia visitors ate at the Meeting House. I had a long talk with Delmar Brock, a Dartmouth and Tuck graduate who is chair of the new Kendal at Hanover Corporation. Alan Hunt seemed standoffish. Maybe I hurt him, jokingly calling him a Philadelphia lawyer. After the ceremony, Mr. Ferguson, husband of Mrs. Cummings-Ferguson, who sold us the land, came up to say that the metaphor ought to have included something about mothers who see their child being taken from them. That is how she felt, at least partially.

I enjoyed meeting three bankers, two from First New Hampshire and one from the Bank of Ireland, its owner, and guarantor of our loan via a letter of credit.

The whole thing was very emotionally exhausting.

Wednesday, September 6, 1989

Nice supper with Dick and Karen Sheldon, and Mother. Mother's Aunt Eva died a few days ago, aged 95. "Big Yiayia" was the oldest of nine children. With Eva's death, only one remains: Trude Deliman, 88, who lives in Florida. Mother has been asking her about the family background, which is so vague. We now know that my great-great-grandmother came from Holland, and great-great-grandfather from London. They settled in Pennsylvania, apparently.

Thursday, September 7, 1989

Daphne still suffering under Roz, her boss, who seems to be an insensitive sadist.

I'm slowly getting things organized. Hope to work well this term, my "R" term without teaching, on the Kazantzakis letters. Finished going through the complete file at the farm, checking index cards against xeroxes in the loose-leaf folders. Many xeroxes are missing. Lots of dates are imprecise (let alone the O.S./N.S. problem), but occasionally finding where a stray piece belongs is very pleasurable.

Friday, September 8, 1989

Hanver-NYC

To Yale Club via AMTRAK from Springfield. I've been reading Walter Arndt's latest, The Best of Rilke, beautifully produced in a bilingual format by UPNE. Must get to work, however, on the Wilmington talk on Kazantzakis's religiosity. But a lot of time for this was spent instead of preparing the Kinhaven agenda for the October 1st meeting.

Supper with Daphne. She's complained to the publisher about Roz. Publisher very frank: others have complained, the situation is well known and familiar: a job too big for her, so she persecutes her subordinates. At the same time, Daphne has been offered an editorial position, but still hopes to stay in marketing. Afterwards we walked to 717 Madison Avenue. The apartment has lots of potential but needs to be furnished and decorated.

Saturday, September 9, 1989

Yale Club in the morning trying to chart out my Wilmington talk.

Greenwich Village in the afternoon to Paula's flat on Greenwich Street, a monumental building just off Christopher with its male boutiques! George Goodwin, Jim Quinn, David Bury, Jerry Bidlack. Paula in effect told me we needed to proceed more professionally. So we'll spend more money in order, with luck, to collect more.

Supper at Orzo, very expensive but good, on Restaurant Row, 46th between 8th and 9th. Greg, Daphne, Chrysanthi, and me. Then to an effective farce/comedy Lend Me a Tenor full of ridiculous fun against the stirring music of Verdi's Otello.

Sunday, September 10, 1989

NYC

Leisurely breakfast on the roof, reading the New York Times. The last fling before work. Then nice two hours with Vasos Papagapitos of Travel Dynamics, unshaven and in sneakers, having just come from tennis with his brother George. The business is going well, despite competition. If only we were rich, we could go on the Indonesia tour they're planning for March.

September 12, 1989

Hanover

Support Committee for Jo Ann Unruh at Meeting. She's divorcing after ten years. I felt honored to be asked.

September 13, 1989

Spoke at Comparative Literature open house, with Marianne Hirsch and Lynn Higgins, on my involvement with Kazantzakis à la Comparative Literature.

September 14, 1989

War/Peace open house. I did a mini version of my war poetry lecture, with Jack Shepherd.

September 17, 1989

Lunch at The Greens with Mother and Maisie Wilson, who recalled Leon Black and his father's suicide—the whole catastrophe. I said I'd write to Leon, who now is married, apparently, and is vice president of a brokerage house that is being accused of illegal activity. This man, who had so much money, vowed to devote his life to making more. What a travesty! Our education is worthless, it seems. . . . In Meeting ministry: “We are not called to succeed. We are called to be faithful.”

September 20, 1989

Nice lunch with Tom Corindia, weighed down by diabetes and four infants, but coping.

Department meeting. Lou Renza, now chairman, has developed logorrhea, contrary to all expectation. It seems to accompany the chairmanship. I vow to be terse when I conduct meetings. Am I?

Alice Swersey has responded positively to my pleas for her to rejoin the Kinhaven Board and head up the development program.

September 22, 1989

To Pendle Hill. Margery fired Coleman Dorsey. She is really embattled. The “perfect community” is full of recrimination.

September 23, 1989

Philadelphia

Nice meeting with Rebecca Mays and Gay Nicholson re: Publication Committee concerns. Let’s hope that the Francis Nicholson pamphlet on “Quaker Money,” which I edited this summer, will be accepted.

September 24, 1989

Philadelphia

John Gray and two other Woodbrookers are at PH. Nice reunion.

Lunch in downtown Philadelphia with Ellen Rose. But first, Central Philadelphia Meeting, 15th Street. All the ministry was about the two homeless people whom the Meeting had forced to leave the day before. Afterwards, explanation. They’d vowed to evict them non-violently. They were urinating on the steps of Friends Center, and breaking into cars in the neighborhood. Friends were under pressure from the neighbors. They formed groups to hold vigils round the clock, telling the two that they had to leave by a certain hour. Then they confiscated their cardboard boxes, etc. The two hesitated but did not resist, and finally left. Friends have tried to place them in shelters. It’s clear that Quakers are basically conservative; we render unto Caesar but not at the expense of principle. The removal, after all, was nonviolent. They did not call the police; they used “soul-force.” . . . Nice Meeting. Lots of young people. The man in front of me turned out to be a former Dartmouth student who remembered me.

Ellen Rose is flourishing. When I told her that Kate Brandenburg, dean at PH, had asked me to teach in the fall of 1990, when I have a sabbatical, she was enthusiastic. "Do come! Philadelphia is wonderful. You and Chrysanthi will flourish here." I was encouraged.

Then to Wilmington and the super deluxe Hotel du Pont, built in 1913 by the du Pont Company to house their visitors. Their offices are upstairs. Tom Clark, my host, is a lawyer for du Pont but a closet intellectual who seems frustrated writing contracts for a living. Dinner with him and Coleman and Astrid Dorsey. Then to "du Pont country" of estates, wealth and more wealth, to an Episcopal parish built by the du Ponts. They're just replacing the organ for $900,000! Good crowd, including Elizabeth Vining and Bain Davis and Don Pease's father (a vice president at du Pont). I lectured on "Kazantzakis's Religious Vision." Then back to the Hotel du Pont with Coleman and Astrid to hear the worst about his clash with Margery and his firing. Whom to believe? She told me that he was incompetent; he told me that she was incapable of patience, that he was cultivating people, which takes time. Now he has to rebuild his law practice, which had foundered during the years at PH.

September 25, 1989      Wilmington-Philadelphia-Manchester-Hanover
Flew back to Manchester. Met Curt Torell on the plane. We had a good lunch together, during which he enlightened me re: Kendal's policy toward research. Then dinner with him and Jean and Carol and Chrysanthi. Then Kendal Board of Overseers, in which he convinced everyone, including me, that the current proposal for research from Rosenberg, Manheimer, Gerber is premature. The Founders themselves ought to be the ones to decide. We'll have to wait until the facility opens. But I stressed that we mustn't appear to be against research.

September 26, 1989

Lunch with Bill Scherman and Karin Rodis re: the Beebe professorship. He's going to bring Art Buchwald in the spring, the same day that I give my inaugural lecture.

Susan Tenney demonstrated the good work she's done on the Hypercard software for Modern Greek drills. Now it's up to me to type in the drills. We'll be the first to have computerized instruction in Modern Greek, I believe.

To the president's house for dinner with three authors, including Arthur Herzberg, published by Simon and Schuster: a history of Jews in America. The other, Jill Ker Conway, was a former president of Smith College who was raised on an outback sheep farm in Australia and has written an account of how she escaped the restrictions (especially for females) of that environment.

September 27, 1989

Takis Metaxas demonstrated to me a very good computer program for doing Greek.

September 28, 1989

Lunch with Kate Cohen. Such a fine student!

September 19, 1989

Lunch with Ned Perrin. His marriage is going well, so he says. We lamented together the imminent death of the Faculty Club.

September 30, 1989

Breakfast with Kate Cohen's sister, a Yale classics student who has discovered Modern Greek and wants to combine MG studies with classics in graduate school. I counseled her regarding the opportunities here and abroad.

Noon: lunch at Hanover Inn with David Dushkin, Jr. and his Danish wife Maria. Very cordial, despite my refusal to let his son have a rock concert at Kinhaven last June. He wants to contract to occupy the main house in exchange for a large financial contribution that will help him tax-wise.

October 1, 1989

Kinhaven Board at Weston. Afterwards, Bill Polk, Jerry, Alice Henkin, and I easily rejected David Dushkin, Jr.'s proposal. Now I have to write to him.

October 2, 1989

Cambridge

To Cambridge to hear the 25-year tribute to James Yannatos. Concert of his works, old and new, including a new solo for horn and dancer performed well by his daughter. Not brilliant music but very competent, with lots of variety and imagination. We saw him and embraced.

October 3, 1989

Cambridge-Lynn-Boston

By "T" and taxi to Lynn to see Mike Antonakes about our collaboration on the Kazantzakis letters. He's willing to play a subordinate role. We laid out expectations for him from now until February. He'll select the letters from 400 Γράμματα, Eleni's Ασυμβίβαστος, maybe also Επιστολές προς τη Γαλάτεια. I'll do all the rest.

By bus back to Boston. Chrysanthi and I lunched in the Parker House. Then to Cambridge. Quick "research" in Widener, xeroxing some Kazantzakis letters. Then consultation with Charles Stewart, whose family turns out to be friendly with David Buseck's fiancée in Cincinnati. Then to Kirkland Street to lecture on "Residual Orality in the Re-emergence of Greek Prose Fiction in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries," the full version of the abbreviated talk I gave at Tatum's symposium in July. Greg Nagy was there, also Ihor Ševčenko, and of course Meg and Irene Kacandes. Nice to see old friends. Bumped into Chris Flug in the Yard, as well. Some helpful comments afterwards from the professors, and more informal contact with some of the students. Harvard is always extraordinarily stimulating for me.

Supper with Meg and Charles Stewart in a Thai restaurant, not very appetizing, actually. Saw Michael Hendys briefly, but he did not join us. Meg revealed a schism in MGSA with Speros Vryonis the villain. Alas! Alack! Hendys, without work, may return to Scotland. Then what will Meg do?

October 4, 1989

Drove back to Hanover. Glorious color around Sunapee. Turkish carpets spread across the landscape.

October 5, 1989

Long hours trying to date Kazantzakis letters in the 1909–1911 area. So many pitfalls. In one letter, in the printed version, he speaks of the φιλολογικό βιβλίο he was writing at Krasi. But when I checked the holograph I found that this was an error for φιλοσοφικό. I thought it was the Nietzsche dissertation, and assigned it to 1909, but he wasn't in Krasi then. So it must have been "Bergson," and I assigned it to 1912. Later, in another letter, to Zervos, I found the answer: neither Nietzsche nor Bergson but a book on relativity—the long-lost book on William James, it seems. Still how to date this? I've not put it in 1910 or 1911. All this is fun, like a jigsaw puzzle. But very slow.

October 6, 1989

ΦBK Steering Committee with Jere Daniell and Hilda Sokol. We're inducting John Rassias as an honorary member this year. Also voted to induct Boghosian, Laurie Snell, and Gene Lyons next year.

Lunch yesterday with Jeanne West, new acquisitions editor of UPNE. She actually wants to do a series of Modern Greek translations. I vetted one for her: of Terzakis's Violet City, full of errors but possible.

Walter Arndt has done his essay for JMGS on verse translation, lifted largely (ipso facto plagiarized) from his Rilke book. Poor man! Saw him on the street, with sores on his lips. His cancer is enervating him slowly but he jokes about it and works 3-4 hours a day, his limit now.

October 8, 1989

I ministered in Meeting on the homeless evictions in Philadelphia. Business Meeting afterwards. Ricardo and his brother were arrested for disturbing the peace while alcoholic, and the Border Patrol was notified. The Meeting is in a tizzy. Telephone calls flying round at 4:30 a.m. Bob Watson advanced $1000 for bail. They're now in the Meeting House, sleeping. Meeting decided to admit them into sanctuary. I visited Bob afterwards. He continues to support them against the authorities even though he might be in jeopardy as Ricardo's employer.

Jane O'Connell from North River here overnight. She came to see how we do our peer tutoring and run the Composition Center. She's at Green Mountain State College at a salary of $18,000 a year. Her husband walked out on her last March and she's all alone in a house on the river, commuting to Poultney, poor thing.

October 10, 1989

John Lanzetta died. Funeral in Rollins today. A poor, emaciated service led without spirit by our chaplains Gwen King and Jim Breeden. Mostly music. Lots about Jesus saving us and ensuring eternal life. (I think of Kazantzakis and his Comedy, which I recited in part in Wilmington recently.) One "remembrance" by a colleague. Nothing spontaneous. No testimonies from those who obviously could have spoken so well about him. A hollow ritual with neither the age-old reverberations of the Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, or Jewish service, nor the genuineness and spontaneity of the Quaker one. A Protestant shell: empty. I told Chrysanthi that when I die I hope someone will do better by me.

October 11, 1989

NYC

7:30 a.m. in the dentist's chair. I now have a gold crown. "A nugget," as Dr. Logan called it. Very impressive, but hidden in the very back of the mouth where no one can see it.

Drove to Springfield; AMTRAK to NYC. Met Margaret Devlin in the Yale Club. She wants to talk about another cruise, next fall, following the trail of St. Paul.

Then to Anne-Marie's Cooking School, 30th Street between Park and Lexington, for a private dinner with the Kendal team, underwriters, Bank of Ireland, First NH Bank, Bank of Australia, lawyers, etc., all involved in the closing. Actually, things did not go so well. One of our people (Blair Wood, in Stebbins' office) hadn't prepared. But with lots of champagne, and a very nice dinner (at probably $100 a head), spirits were lively. Anne-Marie explained each course as it arrived, telling us at the start that she'd cooked for kings and presidents, etc. The best were the soup and desserts. Afterwards: speeches. I read Jacques speech on the seven ages of man from As You Like It. The others talked "sense," about money, interest ratings, marketing. They seem to feel that our project is exceptional. Nice long talk with the banker from Dublin about James Joyce, his city, the British Empire.

Managed in the afternoon to read a little from the translation essay I'm preparing for MLA.

October 12, 1989

Yale Club

Breakfast with Lloyd, Jean, Alan, Nancy Webber, Bill Yost, and others from the Kendal team, all at the Yale Club as my guests. Saw Jim Freedman in the corner and introduced him to the lot. He's on our priority list, of course.

Nice message from Daphne: "Welcome," with her new telephone number at work.

Worked on translation essay in Yale Club library in the morning, finding Jusdanis's book useful. Then to East 70th Street for lunch with Vasos, George, and Margaret. Emerged from the subway in the midst of Hunter College with students outdoors on a beautiful day, eating hot dogs. What a different look they have from Dartmouth students, the boys mostly with earrings, the girls in skin-tight jeans, and of course a preponderance of swarthy and dark skins. Travel Dynamics has a gorgeous brownstone between Lexington and Park on one of the nicest streets in New York. The house across the street, Vasos told me, is owned by the Mellon family—a beauty. We lunched on the top floor in the paneled conference room, discussing a cruise/tour that might be based on St. Paul's travels, but more broadly on the conflict of Hellenism, Hebraism, and Christianity. I could teach Cavafy, Matthew Arnold, use Peter Brown's books, etc. We thought of a second professor: Bob McGrath again, or Kathleen Corrigan, or even Rob Oden if he could leave Hotchkiss.

Then to Camera Repair Company headed by my new-found cousin Rick Rankin, whom I luckily caught just as he was about to go out for lunch (at 3:00 p.m.). He'll make my Leica like new, he tells me. I accompanied him to Pig & Whistle on West 48th and had a gin and tonic while he ate . . . and talked . . . for 1½ hours. The taciturn man of last weekend's visit turned out to be voluble. He started as a commercial artist, then took up photography, answered a want ad 27 years ago for the Repair Company, and now owns the company. He is proud of his Scots ancestry, loves Scotland, returns there often. Their son James is an extraordinarily gifted boy. I encouraged him to think of St. Paul's summer program, or an exchange year in England, followed by an Ivy League college.

Then an interlude on 42nd Street and return to the Club. Daphne came and we went to a Korean restaurant. She's delighted with her new boss, Fred Hills, and her new work, which involves reading proposals and submissions sent in by agents and winnowing them, plus all sorts of arrangements and contacts with the agents and the authors themselves at each and every stage of the publishing process. She works hard but also seems to have many diversions: dinners, trips to California with Greg, evenings with the Bemelmans, museum visits, lunches with friends; and she likes her new apartment on Madison and 64th. So, all's well.

Returning to the Yale Club via 46th Street, I found a note from Jean: "Thursday, 2:00 p.m.: Peter, time to celebrate!" In short, they signed the closing.

October 13, 1989

Yale Club

I faxed my congratulations to Jean. Then read a PH pamphlet submission in the Club library. Then to MoMA for the Picasso-Braque exhibition "Pioneering Cubism." Disappointing because the canvases leading up to cubism and inching toward it via a Cézanne-like lack of perspective, etc. were more pleasing than the cubist works themselves. Indeed, room after room of cubist paintings, most looking exactly the same, was boring. A touch of color in one corner, after a half dozen years, inaugurating a new phase of cubism, was a major relief. I particularly liked Picasso's "Friendship," "Farmer's Wife," "Woman with Vase of Flowers," "Reservoir at Horta," all pre-cubist, and, of the cubist paintings, "Violin and Pitcher" (1910) and "Violin and Grapes" (1912). Braque left me cold. But seeing this exhibit helps one "place" the constructions, collages, etc. of Boghosian, what the catalogue calls "a complete break with the monolithic tradition of carved or modeled sculpture," not to mention "the transposition of banal, mass-produced elements into 'fine art,' . . . one of the major aesthetic strategies of Cubism," and "the teasing, delicate balance between abstraction and representation." Lunch in the Members' Restaurant using Daphne's card. Overpriced, bloated lunch obviously popular with socialites.

Mother, Chrysanthi, and Daphne showed up at 6:00. We dined at the Club, then walked cross-town to see The Heidi Chronicles, well acted but not very well crafted as a play, yet with some intellectual content, which is so rare—about the feminism of the 1960s, 1970s, 1980s, its delicious impetus for young women but also the consequences of loneliness and childishness that overtakes these young feminists/Lesbians when they reach their 40s. Heidi in the last scene adopts a baby that she raises as a single parent. Greg joined us, somewhat haggard after a day on the Street in which the Dow fell 197 points.

Saturday, October 14, 1989

Commuter RR to Rye, taxi to a spectacular temple, for Lisa Schweitzer's Bat Mitzvah. Since Gertrude is too sick, Joan alienated, Irene and Clarice uninvited, we were the only "Honigsberg" relatives. Lisa's Negro nanny arrived from Brooklyn, transported in a limousine provided by Peter and Susan. The rabbi went to Brant Lake Camp and has a house there; fishes with Bob Gersten in the early morning; says they were talking about me last summer re: The Last Temptation controversy. The service was long but lovely, with a glorious soprano as cantor, and two male voices and organ; stunning music that somehow avoided becoming "entertainment." Lisa in resplendent white dress and high heels (!), was sweet, poised, intelligent, reading all the Hebrew passages with ease and making a little speech about helping the homeless, avoiding waste, spreading resources. In effect the Bat Mitzvah welcomes her ritualistically into the diachronic and synchronic life of a "People" and challenges her to play a role in that People's future. Very touching.

Driven to the Schweitzer mansion in Scarsdale by one of Susan's brothers (I think) in a huge Mercedes, seemingly the standard vehicle in this crowd. Peter drives a Rolls Royce! But he has one or two Mercedes for the kids! Lovely house and grounds, with an abstract sculpture by Gertrude on the lawn, tennis court, pool. Three busloads of Lisa's classmates were fed in a tent with a dance band and dance floor the 12- and 13-year-old girls all in high fashion much too prematurely. 60 or 70 guests fed inside in a catered meal the epitome of the waste condemned by Lisa in her speech. Δε βαριέσαι. The irony was that it wasn't even tasty. Peter has very few Schweitzer canvases; he seemed uninterested. Ritual cutting of bread in the garden. Interesting people. Susan's other brother is a high-level bureaucrat in the office of the president in Washington. Another relative is a senior researcher in ETS, Princeton. Many folks told us of Peter's remarkable fatherliness, how he took Susan's three children under his wing and gave them a true home. Susan very appreciative of our presence.

AMTRAK home from New Rochelle station. Listened to the remainder of Moby Dick in the car.

October 16, 1989

Hanover

Spoke with Marty Cornish about the cruise. Kip Soteres for lunch. He wants to spend three years in Greece and "become a writer." Then to Kendal office for "Donations Committee." Carleton Chapman wants to give us his huge electronic organ: three manuals. Delightful! We accept! Pot-luck supper at the Meeting. We're continuing to support Jo Ann Unruh in her divorce. Turns out she was raised a Mennonite. So was Rich Kremer, who was at Meeting yesterday. I told him all about John Baker and Peace Studies.

Wednesday, October 18, 1989

Delightful lunch with Nancy Bekavac, an intellectual, enthusiast, easy talker. It's bracing to experience a meeting of minds now and then.

Continuing every day with the letters. I'm now at 1917.

Dick and Allan for chamber music. Bach, Martinu, Haydn.

Thursday, October 19, 1989

Lunch with Jan Tarjan. Very touching in her appreciation of my teaching, years ago. She's the chief force behind the Tucker Foundation's outreach programs, including the International Work Camps, which I've been supporting financially. Told me about her ancestral farm in Blue Hill, Maine. No electricity or plumbing. Her aged grandmother still lives there, somehow.

First meeting of CAP. Freedman and Jim Wright very efficient in covering the agenda. Lee Baldwin and Chris Wolff there—old friends. Afterwards I spoke to Freedman again about the Faculty Club, but it's hopeless. He confided that he and Sheba are invited nowhere. He's bitter about this. Strange.

Friday, October 20, 1989

Minneapolis

Drove to Logan. Weather too foul to fly from Lebanon. Good flight. Minneapolis so attractive. First face I saw at the symposium: Tom Doullis. He's rejoining MG studies after a decade.

At 5:00, met Leander (here for the weekend) and his girlfriend Deanna Lee for supper. She's a large, squarish Chinese with a very funny face and a strange malformed nose. Unattractive, actually (physically). But mature, easy-going. We talked about the Jerry Bidlack mess, about Juilliard, orchestras. Her father migrated from Taiwan, penniless, no English. Ended up with a Ph.D. in engineering and has worked for decades for Boeing in Seattle and Washington, top secret military work, alas. Deanna's mother died; father went to Taiwan and returned with another wife, by arrangement, a "house slave/servant." Deanna was a prodigy. They sent her to NYC to live with a relative and study at Juilliard Prep. Somehow she survived. The entire family is very success oriented, also very ethnic. She's the only one who associates at all with Caucasians. (All this told me by Leander, afterwards.) She went off to a concert. Leander and I had a long talk, very easy and open. He likes her, she likes him, but marriage seems very difficult. He's not ready to give up his situation at Moravian and start again from scratch. She may be open to leaving the St. Paul Chamber Orchestra, but only if she can get a job in the Philadelphia Orchestra or the New York Philharmonic. For now, they look forward to a solid month together in the summer. After that, who knows?

Then to Constantine Boucalas's keynote speech. Passionate and intelligent.

Saturday, October 21, 1989

Minneapolis

A full, enjoyable day at the symposium. My session had one very poor paper, two good ones. I, as the respondent, spoke about misuse of “theory” for theory’s sake, the trouble with the first paper. Then a long lunch with Ernie Friedl and Michael Herzfeld discussing the transition of the journal to me as editor, beginning September 1990, and Michael as associate editor. I hope I can sustain this job. All these years I’ve been comfortable as associate editor, which may be my proper level. If I am overreaching as editor, at least I can escape after three years.

Lots of good conversation with old and new friends. Among others, Norman Gilbertson telephoned. He’s married. His wife lives in Minneapolis and they have a commuting marriage between Minneapolis and Thessaloniki! Says Bruce and Tad are fine. The new director is in place and OK. Bruce hopes to go to Africa next year—i.e., not to hang around the Farm School. Vouli is fine.

Banquet. Sat with Tom Doulis. Met Aristeide Caratzas, my publisher, who despite the bad reputation of his firm turned out to be charming, intelligent, cultivated. Also Lars Baerentzen from Copenhagen. Also a scholar from Jerusalem who told me that the current Israeli ambassador to the UN is named Bien, which they pronounce Bein (báin). Speaker: Eugene McCarthy. Terrible. Anecdotal, unprepared. But he did know George Seferis. Afterwards, Tom insisted on paying off his debt, the beer he owes me for our five-year (become thirteen-year) plan. I published first. I upgraded it to a Scotch. We were joined by Caratzas and Baerentzen and by a stunning blonde from Copenhagen, Caratzas’s mistress, Christina, who manages a restaurant in Soho. She described the hopelessness of Swedish and Danish society for anyone not satisfied with mediocrity, which is why she fled. Also met Stathis Trahanatzis, the iconographer, whose work I’d bought in Chicago in 1976. He embraced me and brought greetings from Sophia Tsacharopoulou, who has his work too, and recognized mine when she was in the house last June from Eleni’s graduation.

Long talk with Thanassis Maskaleris, who just lived through the Oakland earthquake. He wants me as a visitor at San Francisco State in 1991 or 1992.

Sunday, October 22, 1989

Minneapolis–Boston–Hanover

Business meeting. Official announcement of my editorship. In the panel, I spoke out again about perfunctory use of theory and of course was misunderstood as being against theory. Δε περιόζει. Quick lunch in the airport with Meg Alexiou and Irene Kacandes.

October 24, 1989

I had to officiate at the ΦBK induction, reading the nominating committee report. John Rassias was inducted as an honorary member and gave his usual speech about passion in teaching, sweeping all and sundry off their feet.

October 26, 1989

Cambridge

Interviewed for a “profile” of me to be sent out to Beebe donors. I spoke about the musicality of words, mostly. Drove to Cambridge with Chrysanthi and Mother. Overnight in Friends Center.

October 27, 1989

Boston–Philadelphia

To Logan early. Chrysanthi and Mother went off to Cincinnati, I to Philadelphia. Met Jane Zavits on the plane. All day meetings at Pendle Hill. My heart pounded during debate on Francis Nicholson’s “Quaker Money,” which I worked so hard to revise, because it seemed they were going to reject it as “not sufficiently spiritual” (which it isn’t, but who cares?). But they took it, provided a preface be included. Book Committee afterwards. Then a ceremony honoring Carol Murphy, who has written seventeen pamphlets. A strange, shy, private, lonely woman almost out of a Tennessee Williams play, with a fine mind that somehow sustains her. Rebecca said she was uncharacteristically voluble afterwards; she normally doesn’t say a word. I continued “negotiating” with Kate Brandenburg over next autumn; it seems that we’ll come, even if we do the cruise as well. Then still another meeting with Rebecca and Gay Nicholson, who is going to be editor pro-tem for three months while Rebecca unwinds.

Saturday, October 28, 1989

PH–Cincinnati

Invigorating breakfast with John Gray, who’s become interested in illegal immigration and sanctuary; hopes to meet Jim Corbett and to visit the Mexican border. I gave him Corbett’s pamphlet that we published. Then by Avis to the airport; flight to Cincinnati; message at the hotel that Chrysanthi and Daphne and Mother had gone to the zoo! John Tallmadge picked me up, showed me his offices at Union Institute, where he's associate dean setting up programs for students who are pursuing the Ph.D. part-time while continuing to work. A fine solution to his problem. Then to his home, suburban and totally bourgeois. We laughed. Pam holding the baby Rosalind in her arms, obviously a full-time occupation. His minister and wife came. Lover of Kazantzakis. Preached a sermon in favor of The Last Temptation. I read it; remarkable comprehension. It's so pleasing to meet people like this where there is a total meeting of minds. Wife had grown up with Paul Schrader and also attended Calvin College. We had a lovely tea. Then John drove me to the dinner arranged by the Levine family with four other couples. Huge mansion, nouveau-riche with a vengeance, in horrendous taste. Closet full of fur coats. But met lots of people, including of course the bride, Linda, totally extraverted and thus very un-Bienlike. But David Buseck seems equally extroverted. Met Eksteins and others from Tempe who've been so kind to the Busecks. Also Levines' friends the Stewarts, Charles Stewart's parents. He's a developer; cornered me complaining that academics are too much in ivory towers, should be instructing business people in anthropology, psychology, etc. D'accord! Finally dinner at 9:00 p.m., disappointing. As at Schweitzer's, great expense, meager quality.

Sunday, October 29, 1989

Cincinnati-Boston-Hanover

Walked around Cincinnati's downtown, remarkably reconstructed with "skywalks" enabling pedestrians to escape traffic. Wealth everywhere. Even exquisite bus-stops. The city filled with people having brunch, preparatory to a football game. I do think that Americans are a happy race, but the wealth is obscene. A PH pamphlet we considered yesterday described a meal in India. People sit on the floor. The food is placed on banana leaves. You eat with your fingers (right hand only). No furniture, no plates, no silverware.

The wedding took place at 12:30 at a club called the Phoenix. More wealth. But a thoughtful service under the chuppah (wedding canopy) which symbolizes the couple's future home. The vows were sweet. And it ended with the traditional breaking of the glass, a reminder of the fragility of marriage and also of the destruction of the Temple at Jerusalem. Then L'Chaim! To Life!

We sat at a table with the Stewarts and, unbelievably, four other businessmen and their wives, all of whom had been hired originally by the Dartmouth alum Irvin Bettman, with whom I served on a committee. I danced briefly with Mother. She was in fine spirits, and obviously very "prominent" throughout the festivities. Now the ice is broken. Who will be next? Leander? Alec? Daphne? Lori? Susie? Paul? Also Olivier, Emily's daughter, now a student at Antioch. Long flight back. Home at midnight, amid impenetrable fog.

Monday, October 30, 1989

Breakfast with Jean re: agenda for Kendal Overseers. At the meeting, I presented my concern that we do something for the broader community; we will be, after all, an enclave of the rich. Not much response . . .!

October 31, 1989

Working now on the article on the appropriation of Cavafy by the gay community, concentrating on E. M. Forster. For MLA.

Saturday, November 4, 1989

NYC

Yale Club overnight. To David Erlanger's for meeting of the Evaluation Committee to consider feeling by both staff and students that the weakest link in Kinhaven's structure is the director/conductor, Jerry Bidlack. What a mess! But at least we are not now in the position of other boards, being the last to know anything really important. Good meeting with David, Alice Henkin, Robin Hendrich. We developed a strategy to try to break the news gently to Jerry. Walked across the Park with Alice and her husband. Splendid day. People everywhere. Civilized and serene, despite what one reads. At the Met I saw, with great emotion, the Velasquez exhibition. Here is a painter the equal of Rembrandt in native genius and psychological penetration, though probably more limited in range of subject matter. His portraits are uncanny in their ability to penetrate to the character of the sitter, whether it be the innocence of royal infants or the hauteur of Philip IV's second queen.

Then to Daphne's. Leander arrived at 6:00. His concert with Albert Tan last night was so-so, he says, because Albert, although an elegant violinist, is severely limited in expressive range. They did two Mozart sonatas, one early, one late, followed by Beethoven's first trio, with Nancy Bidlack on 'cello. Before the concert, when Leander was in the men's room, an elderly gentleman entered, recognized him, and said he'd come specifically to hear Leander, because he played “in the old style.” Dinner at China Peace, then to see the Three Penny Opera with Sting and Alvin Epstein. Slow first act, but it then picked up. The lyrics are amazing, the music even more so. Every convention is inverted. Lovely spoof on operatic conventions, on conventional morality, on romance. The moral seems to be “food comes before morality.”

Sunday, November 5, 1989

Back to the Met, quickly through Velasquez, this time blissfully free of crowds. Then to Canaletto exhibit. Quite different. Again, an extraordinary technician, but he never painted individuals, just huge compositions chiefly of Venice, with people appearing as “urban species.” The wonder is the simultaneous ability to produce extraordinary details, so many “pictures within the picture,” and an overall composition that is perfectly right. But Canaletto was trapped in his own success. He did one thing so well that he couldn’t grow.

Leander, Daphne, and Greg joined me for brunch at the Club, relaxed and sumptuous. Greg continues to bore one every time I see him, but let’s hope he is more interesting to Daphne. Leander is now speaking openly about Deanna. She has decided to return to Kinhaven this summer rather than taking up her fellowship in Italy. The web thickens.

Worked a bit on Forster and Cavafy yesterday. A varied, rich weekend.

November 6, 1989

Hanover

Met with Bill Scott re: the cruise. He’ll go. He wants to emphasize the Roman Empire. I’ll do pagan-Christian conflict and Hebraism-Hellenism.

November 7, 1989

Met with Jack Shepherd and Alan Rozycki re: strategies for War/Peace Studies. Leonard Rieser is re-submitting the grant application to Hewlett for $75,000 for conflict resolution. I revised the letter, under pressure of deadline, as always.

November 8, 1989

Observed the English 2 class of John Donaghy. Mediocre. He has a Greek girl and a Bulgarian boy, a Dane, two Chinese.

November 9, 1989

To the University Press re: reprint of the Workbook for Demotic Greek I. It needs careful revision to bring it into conformity with the new edition of the text. Meanwhile, Takis Metaxas is typing its drills into our new Hypercard drill system.

November 10, 1989

Gertrude Schweitzer died. Mother is now the last, very last, of the Honigsbergs. Leander is here. He took her for dinner. She wept; they talked; it was good. We went to President Freedman's for a dinner with the trustees. Nice to see Mickey Heyman, who told me he is going to quit the chancellorship and return to teaching. Ten years are enough. He wants to leave while he still feels good about everything. Also, he says that what he set out to accomplish is done. Rosy Rosenberg was there, too—my Deerfield classmate. Nice conversation with Douglass as well. At long last, with Freedman's arrival, I feel part of the "senior professoriate."

November 11, 1989

Leander, Mother, Chrysanthi and I to the Hop to see an excellent student production of The Taming of the Shrew. What fun! But the director wrote an essay about women's lib, to make sure that we didn't see only the fun.

November 12, 1989

We all made a surprise birthday party for Mayme Noda. She was invited to our house for supper. Arrived. Saw table unset. We said we were lazy and we'd all go to the Norwich Inn instead. There, Treat and Molly, Sydney, Mary and Roger, and Audrey were waiting, with a reserved dining room. It was splendid.

Today's Times had the following on Gertrude: GERTRUDE HONIG SCHWEITZER, 79, AN ARTIST [note the "Honig" instead of Honigsberg!]. Gertrude Honig Schweitzer, an artist whose works are in collections at several prominent museums, died Friday after a brief illness, at Monmouth Medical Center in Long Branch, N.J. She was 79 years old and lived in Colts Neck, N.J., Palm Beach, Fla. and Santa Fe, N.M. Born in New York City, Mrs. Schweitzer graduated from the Pratt Institute. She was elected to the Outstanding Women Artists of America and has won several awards, including the American Watercolor Society Medal, the Philadelphia Watercolor Prize, and the American Artists Professional League Medal. Her paintings are in collections at the Metropolitan Museum of Art, the Whitney Museum, and the Chicago Institute of Art, among others, and her sculptures at Columbia University, the Santa Fe Museum of Fine Arts, and the Society of Four Arts in Palm Beach. Surviving are a daughter, Joan Bull of New York City; a son, Peter, of Scarsdale, N.Y., a sister Harriet Bein [sic] of Hanover, N.H., and five grandchildren.

There was also an obituary in the Times, as follows: SCHWEITZER, Gertrude Honigsberg, of Colts Neck, NJ., Palm Beach, FL, and Santa Fe, NM, passed away November 10th, 1989, in Long Branch, NJ. She was the widow of William P. Schweitzer, an Officer and Director of the Kimberly-Clark Corporation. She is survived by her sister, Harriet Bien, of Hanover, NH. Mrs. Schweitzer is the beloved mother of Joan Bull, of New York City, and Peter William Schweitzer, of Scarsdale, NY, and devoted grandmother of Penelope Forest; Sally, Michele, Lisa and Robert Schweitzer. She was born in New York and attended Girls High School, Brooklyn, NY, and graduated from the Pratt Institute. During World War II, she directed the Arts and Skills Corps of the American Red Cross, Ft. Jay, Regional Hospital, Governor's Island, NY. Among her accomplishments, Gertrude Schweitzer was elected in 1975 to the Outstanding Women Artists of America, and has won such stellar prizes as the American Watercolor Society Medal, Philadelphia Watercolor Prize, and the American Artists professional League Medal. She has been represented by the Hirschl Adler Gallery in NY, Galerie Charpentier in Paris, and the Hokin Gallery in Palm Beach, FL. Her works are in the collection of the Metropolitan Museum of Art and the Whitney Museum of Art in NY, the Chicago Institute of Art, the High Museum of Atlanta, GA, the Museum of Fine Arts in Santa Fe, NM, the Society of Four Arts in Palm Beach, FL, and the New Britain Museum of Art in New Britain, CT. A stainless steel sculpture adorns the grounds of Columbia University. Interment will be private. The family will receive visitors on Monday and Tuesday from 3 p.m.–8p.m. in Scarsdale, NY.

November 14, 1989

Baltimore

Flew to Baltimore from Manchester, leaving the house at 5:30 a.m. Met Michael Herzfeld in the Hotel Belvedere on the main square near Peabody. Taxi driver told horrendous things about this city: murders, muggings. But life goes on. After lunch, in which we discussed JMGS, we went to the Johns Hopkins University Press to meet with Denise Plowman, Marie Hansen, and the new typesetter. I'm going to try to introduce computerized Greek. They're willing. We'll see. The Greek keyboard they use is totally insane; thus all the typos. Marie of course wants to do a "campaign" to get more subscribers. But is it worth it? We have about 600 subscribers, which isn't bad. Home at midnight. A long long day.

November 15, 1989

Spoke to Alex Ogle about House Party's conflict with Kinhaven. We still haven't resolved it. We'll meet tomorrow.

November 16, 1989

Ogle very pleasant. We had drinks at the Inn. They'll accede to our needs this year, but may look elsewhere in the future.

To Boswell's because Mrs. Cook's probate figures and mine don't agree. What a bother!

Susan Tenney has upgraded the Hypercard program. She's a dream. So efficient and pleasant.

Working daily on Kazantzakis letters, right now in the middle of the letters to Galatea, all of which I want to include. Chrysanthi, after reading the 400 Letters to Prevelakis, concludes that Kazantzakis was a damn nuisance.

November 17, 1989

Breakfast with Jean to plan the Kendal Overseers meeting. She is worrying about sales. We have only 165 units sold and we aim to fill the place by opening, which is now scheduled for July 1991.

In the afternoon, Fleet Bank Trust Department with Mother; Mrs. Neily and Don Vogel, discussing investments. Trust + Mother's custody account, etc. comes to about $1.1 million. Very comfortable.

Sunday November 19, 1989

Concord

Nice outing after Meeting to Concord to lunch with Douglas and Susan Marshall and their daughter Laura. They've built a new, very modern house on a hilltop 10 miles from Concord. She's a lawyer working for the State government; he teaches Greek at St. Paul's School but is spending this year at Dartmouth, where of course he started out. Nice people.

November 20, 1989

Lunch with Bill Sherman, Karen Rodis, and Sandy Gregg to discuss my inaugural lecture, now set for March 28. Art Buchwald will deliver the Beebe lecture the same night, gratis. What am I going to say? I'm collecting ideas and filing them, but haven't found a path yet.

November 21, 1989

With Jean and Brokaws and Earl to Carleton Chapman's to see his organ, which he wants to donate to Kendal. It's glorious, even if electronic. Three manuals. Can sound like a harpsichord. Can be tuned up and down by turning a knob. Can be played silently, with earphones. Naturally, we accepted.

Lunch at the Inn with a charming candidate for a professorship in Spanish. I told her about my love for Unamuno, which she shares.

Chapman, by the way, had Greek inscriptions on the molding of his library—like Montaigne. As a youth, he was an avid student of Greek, and of the organ; then he entered “the medical thing,” as he called it.

November 22, 1989

Breakfast at the Inn with Margaret Devlin (from Travel Dynamics), Bill, Mardy Cornish. We established “conversion” as the cruise theme. Itinerary: Istanbul, Philippi, Thessaloniki, Veroia, Meteora, Athens, Santorini, Patmos, Ephesus, Istanbul (more or less), with a three-day option before in Jerusalem and a three-day option after in Rome.

At 11:00 Susan Tenney presented the Hypercard results to David Bantz and Larry Levine at Humanities Computing. Thus phase one is nearing completion. For phase two I have to involve Dia again.

Crisis with Rassias. Veronica fell in love with the son (David) of the owners of Gould Farm, where she was sent by Mennonites. John is furious. “The boy has a beard!” he screamed in our house. “He's a clodhopper!” Et cetera. David, although he did three years of college, is a general handyman, carpenter, etc. on the farm. John, a snob, wants money and position. A mess! Mary is afraid to speak.

November 23, 1989, Thanksgiving

To the Rassiases to meet David. John cool and distant. Athos offensive. David himself struck me as cultivated and charming, a very Quaker type but not John's style, obviously. They want to marry on December 23 and John is determined to convince them to wait, at least. Of course he is grooming someone else for Veronica, probably a stockbroker. Poor girl. Daphne here, and sympathizes.

November 24, 1989

We had a second turkey with Daphne, Mother, Kleinhardts, Officers. Very jolly. Very different from yesterday. But this morning we had Veronica, David, Mary, and Helene for breakfast to plan the wedding with Chrysanthi's help. They can't do it in their own house. Later, Helene broke down and wept. She's caught in the middle.

November 27, 1989

John convinced Veronica to postpone, and she left all the wedding paraphernalia at home. But when she and David reached the Gould Farm, she telephoned to say that no, she would not postpone, but would defy John and would Mary send all the items by post. Good girl!

November 28, 1989

Riparius

To the farm. Gary Wolfe called last night. He's ready to begin drilling the well. I arrived at noon on a rather warm day to find Gary, his father, and his helper (Richard Stewart's stepson, a jazz drummer) all standing round with some visitors. They'd gone 65 feet. By the end of the day they'd gone 120, all with casing (which means $17.00 per foot). So far no ledge: lots of hardpan, then sand, then gravel. Gary works beautifully. The "rig" is a marvel of ingenuity. Each new section of casing is welded to the previous one, then driven down by the rig. This will continue until ledge is reached.

House in good order. I lit fires in kitchen and living room. Kept the electric heater going, and actually was quite comfortable. Snow threatened but never came. I got the kitchen up to 50 degrees, which felt wonderfully warm compared to outside (about 33). Leisurely supper in the Route 28 diner. Sat by the fire and read three Quaker MSS for PH pamphlets.

November 29, 1989

Riparius

Slept quite comfortably with sleeping bag on the convertible couch. Temperature 0° F. when I got up at 7:00 a.m. Gary had come at 6:30 to start his motor, then left and returned at 9:00. Kitchen was 30; I warmed it again to 50. Made coffee. Ate donuts. All the comforts of home, except that I've got two layers of thermal underwear on, a heavy sweater and lined parka—indoors! Cold brilliant day; sunshine. It warmed up to 10°. Garry had to thaw out all his lines. Finally at 10:30 he got everything working again. But I doubt that we'll reach water today. Flies are coming out of the woodwork, seduced by the 50° heat in the cabin.

Some talk about local politics yesterday. They're all cynical. Devil take the lot attitude, especially re: Sterling Goodspeed, who apparently was almost a crook. They're resigned to the Republican victory because the chief factor is, they say, "nativeness." Montfort was resented because he came from Brooklyn. That's worse than being a Democrat.

Returned to Hanover in time for Kendal Overseers meeting, trying to enhance the marketing of the remaining flats. We've still only got 165 more or less committed out of the 248 total.

Gary telephoned at 10:00 p.m. He's down 200 feet, all with casing (thus $17 a foot) and still in the crumbly rock. He'll continue tomorrow . . . and tomorrow . . .

December 1, 1989

280 feet; no water. Rock beginning to harden as of last night. But at 10:30 p.m. tonight Gary telephoned to report success. Hooray! 40 gallons a minute; enough, as he said, for 15 houses. This was achieved at 365 feet, 280 of which are with casing, 85 drilled through the rock. Cost:  $280 \times $17 = $4760 + 85 \times $10 = $850$ , total $5610. Of course there'll be more for the pump, trench work, etc. But the pump can go in at 150 feet because the whole system is now filled with water.

Telephoned Alec the good news. He was washing his car (there it was Saturday morning).

December 6, 1989

The Meeting received a tax bill for $3000. We were astounded. Sandy Stettenheim and I went to see the new tax assessor, Don Monro. He began by telling us that he's a Quaker! The rest of the interview went very well, the tax being reduced to $210! The larger figure was simply a mistake.

December 8, 1989

Pendle Hill

To New York last night with Chrysanthi, who got off at Penn Station carrying a βελέντζα for Daphne's apartment while I continued on to Philadelphia. Met Gay Nicholson this morning. I've rewritten Andy Towl's introduction to "Quaker Money" by Nicholson, but Gay seemed reluctant to use it. Perhaps I'm stepping on her toes. Andy wrote to me last week that the introduction was the last thing he and Merrilie did together. They'd finished it, and the next morning she went into a coma and died in a few days. Good Publications Committee meeting. Lots of people seemed pleased that I'd be teaching Milton next autumn, although they don't all like the idea of my hiding to do my own work. Speaking of work, Bob Brown wrote from Princeton that my book has already sold 900 copies. It's got a smashing cover. A pile is in the Dartmouth Bookstore already, in time for Christmas. Big snow today, canceling the Executive Board. We had coffee at Jim Thomas's, then a nice sing in the Reading Room. Good visit again with John Gray, who's helping AFSC re: position paper on government and refugees. I finished Ann Armbricht's (Ann Forbes's) book on Tibetan refugees in Nepal. Not well written, alas, but nevertheless informative. Joy Heinrichs wants me to do a profile of Ann for the Alumni Magazine. We'll see. Started re-reading Under Western Eyes; somewhat disappointing this time. I fear my students won't find it very compelling. But it's so much better than the Katharine Mansfield stories we listened to on tape in the car on the way to Springfield. So mediocre! And to think that I used her as a model when I was trying to craft short stories in the 1950s.

Saturday, December 9, 1989

Pendle Hill–NYC

Stimulating breakfast, as always, with the diverse "characters" that PH attracts. Executive Board did meet this morning. We raised tuition 5%, alas. Then to Manhattan and David Erlanger's for Evaluation Committee meeting with Jerry. He was relaxed and in good humor. I doubt that the real message of all this got through to him or, if it did, he masked any apprehension brilliantly. He treated deficiencies as failure of logistics and facilities: unruly behavior in brasses because acoustics are so bad they can't hear him. He never has similar trouble in the Bethlehem Youth Symphony, etc. He agreed, however, to seek out a guest conductor/composer for a session. Also to one day off (in six weeks) for the staff. So, we didn't really accomplish our purpose (yet) but we did start a process, at least. Will the Board be brave enough to make a signal via salary in January? Our committee couldn't confer separately afterwards, and I had to run to meet Chrysanthi and Daphne for supper. As events turned out, our rendezvous was vitiated because of my lateness but we managed a quick dinner at China Peace and then went to Maugham's The Circle with Rex Harrison, Glyns Johns, superbly acted "entertainment," second-rate G.B. Shaw in its attempt as social satire.

Earlier, stopped to see Benton murals at the Whitney annex downtown. Disappointing. Too mannered, distorted, predictable. Orozco much better.

Sunday, December 10, 1989

Nice overnight at Daphne's flat, which is looking better and better now that it has some furniture. I hammered in holders for curtain rods. Now she needs paintings. Returning last night, we of course had to acknowledge directly outside a homeless man lying on a grate, a "permanent resident" there, Daphne says. Croissants and coffee "at home." Then to the Whitney for the Benton exhibit. Better than the murals. I especially liked his portraits of his daughter when he wasn't trying to "say" anything. The "statements" seem mannered and forced.

Monday, December 11, 1989

Jury duty in North Haverhill. Bill Cook and Bob Russell, too. I was chosen for a kidnapping case, then excused on a peremptory challenge, feeling paranoid, especially since Cook and Russell were retained. But then I was chosen again for a Driving While Intoxicated case, and retained. It starts next Monday.

December 18, 1989

I finally served on a jury. Sam Smith, accused of DWI. The three troopers who testified, especially the first, were antipathetic, and Smith was pitiful. The defense lawyer was golden-tongued, the State's attorney ineloquent. In the jury room 9 were for guilty, 2 undecided, and I—one—for "innocent." But my arguments were just as inconclusive as the others'. Thus I deferred. Afterwards, and only afterwards, we learned that this was a second offense and compounded by various other offenses. The judge congratulated us (privately) for a just verdict. I'm glad I deferred.

December 20, 1989

Reading a fine book, submitted to PH, on A. J. Muste vs. Reinhold Niebuhr in Christology, ecclesiology, eschatology, and pacifism.

December 23, 1989

Monterey

Drove to the Berkshires to Veronica's wedding at the Gould Farm. John looking weary, suffering from flu. But he made a semi-coherent speech at the wedding and embraced bride and groom. Rev. Smith, David's father, and director of the Farm, very impressive. Wants to go abroad to teach English to foreigners when he retires. Daphne and Leander joined us there, arriving from NYC. A very simple ceremony. David: open-necked shirt and suspenders, no jacket, no rehearsal. Smith spoke very meaningfully of the four traditions of the four grandparents: Roman Catholic, Greek Orthodox, Presbyterian, and Mennonite. Long talk with David's brother, who is working with Guatemalan refugees in Texas. He gave tips on our situation in Hanover with Ricardo.

December 24, 1989

Hanover

Good Meeting today. Deep silence and good ministry. I spoke on Muste and Niebuhr. Afterwards, Tor came up and said he liked "sermons" in Meeting occasionally. Leander came! Even stood up and introduced himself. Daphne stayed home. (Patience!) So many lovely people showed up for Christmas: Bob and Mary Metz, Ellie Cadbury, Ann Wentworth, Len Rieser (Jr.), Kesaya Noda—a warm group. Afterwards, lunch at The Greens with Mother. Then giving Chrysanthi her birthday presents. I got her a videotape exercise program.

December 27, 1989

Leander and Daphne still here. Audrey wrote Leander about deciding re: Quakerism. He can't stay a junior member forever. We must talk. I feel he should be honest and discontinue membership. Too bad! Evening: to the Meeting House to hear Christine Shepherd, folksinger. Her songs are good but execution needs much improvement. Sweet personality. Long, lively talks with Leonard Rieser in the library. Then AMTRAK Montrealer to Washington. My first time since restoration. Two hours late at White River Junction.

December 28, 1989

Washington

Union Station gleams. How different from the last time I saw it. Shops, cinemas, a true ayopá. After our session at MLA I took the Red Line to Silver Spring to dine with Grant and Sharon Thompson. Both unemployed. He told me the horror story of his ouster at the League of Women Voters after three and a half years owing to enmity of one person, the president, whose regime has resulted in mass exodus of staff. Grant hopes to become director of D.C. Red Cross at over $100,000 a year. Meanwhile he's consulting at EPA and drawing League severance pay. We had a relaxed, lengthy dinner with easy flow of conversation.

Regarding Jerry Bidlack, he advised me to be “up front” with both Jerry and the board, and to suggest a mere 3% salary rise. Hard, but necessary.

December 29, 1989

Washington

MGSA/MLA session began at 8:30 a.m. One of the best I’ve ever experienced at MLA. Karen Van Dyck’s paper excellent, the others all interesting and different: Gail Holst, Helen Kolia, Stratos Constantinidis, Irene Kacandes. Mine was on “Gay Appropriation of Cavafy.” The only disappointment was the respondent: long-winded and unprepared. He accused me of homophobia. Why? Because I tried to place Cavafy’s specifically gay outlook within a larger modernistic outlook favoring process over result. Lunch en masse afterwards; nice talk with Mike Keeley, who’s working on a new novel about the Nazi invasion of Thessaloniki. Then Mike, Mary, and I went to the Phillips Collection. My first time. Highlights: the two versions of repentant Peter, by Goya and El Greco. El Greco stunning and mystical, but Goya superior in psychological insight. John Sloan’s 3rd Avenue El and Staten Island Ferry. Calder’s Mobile/stabile. And of course the spectacular Renoir, “The Luncheon of the Boating Party.” Afterwards, cappuccino with Martin McKinsey and his nice wife, a technical editor. I think he is the best translator of all. Then more MLA followed by a meeting with a grad student who wanted to know about Dartmouth and by extension four-year colleges. Then supper at my hotel with Bruce Brown and Dick Dellamora. Bruce has a Mellon Grant for graduate study but it deferring it to intern at the Washington Post. I’m hoping he can get me a review of my Kazantzakis book. Dick is enjoying Toronto and his liberated self. We spoke openly of his gayness and of Cavafy and my theory about the establishment co-opting even gay liberation as a way of neutralizing it. How nice to sit around a supper table for four hours (last night and again tonight) without the least sense of strain or tedium. Late at night, I discovered for the first time the attractions of “pay television.”

December 30, 1989

Washington

Checking out, encountered Randy Eldevik, my Harvard TA. She’s teaching in Oklahoma and has a baby. I sat with her for a second breakfast, catching up on Harvard gossip. Then to the National Gallery for the wonderful Hals show. I’d never appreciated him before, but now, perhaps prompted by Velasquez, I’m more alert to the magic of portraiture.

My favorites were “Young Man with a Skull,” ca. 1628, and “De Regentesen van het Oude-Manneshuis,” 1664, when Hals was over 80. In the East Building, there was a huge retrospective of Frederic Church. His “Niagara” (1857) is magisterial. There’s also an interesting “Parthenon” done in 1871. And of course the famous West Rock, New Haven, and other Hartford, Connecticut valley scenes. The National Gallery is of course filled with treasures. I loved Rembrandt’s “The Apostle Paul” and El Greco’s “St. Martin and the Beggar” (two versions), “Laocoön,” and “Christ Clearing the Temple.” But the Gallery’s self-portrait by Rembrandt (1659) isn’t as penetrating as the rather similar one in the Frick. There was also an expressionism show. I liked Otto Dix’s “Hugo Erfarth with a Dog” (1926) and of course Grosz’s “Metropolis” (1916). The East Building tower had the Bolton Landing sculptor David Smith with nice photos of his snow-covered field filled with welded pieces. Museums are a joy!

My 4:20 Montrealer loaded all its passengers and then remained in the station for three hours while a faulty engine was replaced. I stretched out in the dark in my roomette and dozed. Once moving, we were fine. Supper in the roomette, time to read, sleep until 7:30 because of the lateness.

December 31, 1989

Hanover

Meeting. I’m working on Canadian contacts for our Guatemalan refugee, Ricardo. Spoke to Linda today, who says her husband Iman is expert at placing illegal Egyptians in Montreal, so why not Guatemalans? We skipped Genevieve Williamson’s party owing to icy roads, but did make it to the Rassiases. John tells me that our New Years together began in 1969. I told him that 1989 was special because for the first time we had a married child: Veronica, with David Markwood Smith. And Helen was there with her beau, Phil, very different: a Dartmouth B.A., Harvard M.B.A. now working as a management consultant. But after Dartmouth he wore a pigtail, worked in a home for delinquent teenagers, rode a bicycle from coast to coast, and threw pots in Berkeley. Nice man. Helene, strangely, looks beautiful now. We had a jovial time. The coin in the Βασιλόπιτα went to Mary. Chrysanthi and I ended the year and the decade with the rites of love.

1990

---

Hanover	January 1–June 15
Jan. 3–4, Cambridge, Boston
Jan. 13–14, NYC
Jan. 19–20, PH
Feb. 10, NYC, MGSA
Feb. 17, Weston
March 4, Weston
March 9–11, Ithaca, Philadelphia
March 17, Cambridge
March 24, Cambridge
April 8, New Haven
April 20–22, Philadelphia, NYC
April 23, Weston, Londonderry
April 27, Cambridge
May 4, Haverford, Princeton
May 7–8, Cambridge
May 11–13, Bethlehem, Hotel Bethlehem
May 18–19, Philadelphia
May 20, Riparius
May 26, Cambridge
June 5, Chester
June 7, Weston
June 15–16, Mystic, Connecticut
Riparius	June 16–August 31
June 24–25, Hanover
July 12–18, Hanover, Weston
July 21–23, Hanover, Weston
July 31–Aug. 1, Hanover
Aug. 28, Kinhaven
Hanover	September 1–12
Sept. 1, Weston
Sept. 12, Pendle Hill
Travel	September 13–October 18
Sept. 13, NYC

January 3, 1990

It's nice to be teaching again. I have a large class of about 60, for Conrad, Joyce, and Beckett. Rushed to Cambridge to sup with Dia and go to A.R.T.'s Twelfth Night, a free interpretation with much mélange of chronology, costume, etc., superbly acted by Cherry Jones as Viola/Orsino. They did it very sensually, filling it with homosexual and Lesbian overtones. Met Jimmy Yannatos and wife. His poor daughter pulled a muscle when we saw her dance and hasn't danced since.

January 4, 1990

Boston

To Boston College with Dia to meet Michael Connolly and see his computer program for annotated texts, and show him and Dia ours for Greek drills. Nice man. So gracious. Then to Anne Forbes's (after a quick turn in Widener that produced another Kazantzakis letter) to interview her about Tibet and Nepal and the Dalai Lama. She said that my course (probably the Conrad-Joyce-Beckett one) helped arouse in her the sense that she had to seek meaning instead of merely receiving it ready made.

Chrysanthi furious that I kept her waiting 45 minutes. Αλλοίμονο.

Listened to Marguerite Duras's "The Lover," a compelling story beautifully read by Leslie Caron.

January 11, 1990

Craig Nova, novelist, here as a candidate for our creative writing position. I had lunch with him qua CAP member. Turns out to know David Major, the Harvard student with whom I breakfasted so frequently in Winthrop House and who is now sheep-farming in West Westminster, heading up a spinning cooperative. Nova's reading was superb, like Cheever but better.

January 12, 1990

Breakfast with Jean. We cleared up the problem re: combined Kendal-WISE benefit. Channey and Chrysanthi complained about the favoritism. Kendal now has 181 units sold. Richard Bewley, the first coordinator from Kendal in Philadelphia, is now back in Kendal and will be coming again to Hanover. Nice memories of going to Rotary with him three years ago.

I taught at 1:45 as usual, then raced to Springfield and arrived in NYC in time for 46, very satisfying, also TV at midnight, strangely.

January 13, 1990

Visited John and Elizabeth Baker with Jack Shepherd, whom they wanted to meet. They are well preserved, still. Delighted to tell them that Elise has been nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize by AFSC. John Baker waxed enthusiastic about Jean Monnet and, of course, about Eisenhower, whose Brethren mother, says Baker, accounts for his anti-war stance. Baker also chastised the peace churches for doing less than the Roman Catholics nowadays. Good, cordial meeting for two hours. They rarely go out, and enjoy visitors. No one talked about money. We'll see . . .

Then to Kinhaven Development Committee meeting in George Goodwin's hotel. Alice Swersey is back on the board. Jim Quinn is going to step down, as am I. New blood needed. For the first time, I heard sentiments that we should get a mortgage and buy the property soon, instead of waiting. Big affair scheduled for Cambridge in April; hope for another in NYC next fall chez Mrs. Emmerich.

George, Jim, and I went to dinner joined by Daphne. Pleasant and relaxed. Daphne is very good with "adults" despite Chrysanthi's admonitions to me not to involve the children with our own friends. Then we walked to West 52nd Street to see the musical City of Angels, sold out at $50 and up a ticket. I'm a snob. To me it was vulgar junk; mediocre music; clever book but only intermittently so. But well acted and sung, and with lots of ingenious stage machinery. But the critics rave. Awful!

Walked home with Daphne and visited a bit in her charming "pad." She seems happy and fulfilled in her job and is enjoying social relationships.

January 14, 1990

Brooklyn

To Alice Henkin's for Kinhaven full board. Apprehension because the agenda included the evaluation report with its condemnation of Jerry. But David Erlanger handled this beautifully, and I of course had prepared Jerry by showing him the report in advance. Then Bill Polk, without any prompting from us, recommended only 4% increase for the director's salary and 0% for the conductor's (we had hoped to get away with 3%). The board agreed readily. We also secured a day off for the staff, a rise in base salary to $1500, practice sheds, a rental home for married staff, ventilation of the concert hall, and other "victories." Now I'm going to work on getting Jane Siepmann to donate her piano, April and July meetings . . . , and I'm done!

Drove to Springfield with Joe Contino and George. Joe's marriage is on the rocks; he's living in a neighbor's house, alas.

Discovered on return that Charlie Brown's talk at Meeting went well, with good attendance. But at Business Meeting afterwards Tom Waring complained that it hadn't been "a spiritual journey." Channey spoke well, I'm told, in defense of Brown. Waring can be a pain.

January 16, 1990

Hanover

Interesting students in my course, including an Indian straight from the subcontinent, and a recent graduate of Germantown Friends who is all tied up in interesting intellectual knots.

The dean asked for the title of my inaugural address. I still don't know what to say. But I had to give a title that would allow flexibility. Thus: "Thoughts on Literacy, Past and Present."

To Becky Williams's with Audrey and Mary Soderberg to look through Henry's books and take those that will be appropriate for the Meeting. He has a rich collection of Quakerana, including that wonderful long poem, "Peaceable Kingdom."

January 17, 1990

Music with Allan only. Beethoven's 1st cello sonata. Great improvement over last week. If only I practiced . . . !

January 18, 1990

Lunch with Leander. Talked about Audrey's letter. He rightly feels that to maintain Quaker membership without participating or feeling a need to participate would be hypocritical. I urged him to resign his membership, accordingly. Then, surprisingly, he said maybe he would try the Bethlehem Meeting and see if he liked it. By indirections we discover directions. So the plan is to wait a few months and see how he feels in May.

Lecture today on "The Dead." My enthusiasm for Joyce grows and grows.

Department meeting trying to choose among the four candidates. Bugged down in legalities, desire for a black colleague, desire for a woman colleague . . . We ended by doing nothing.

To the Norwich Inn to celebrate Mother's 85th birthday (actually yesterday). Leander, Chrysanthi, Audrey, and Kay Wegner as a surprise. Very gemütlich. A relaxed, jovial occasion.

January 19, 1990

Boston–Philadelphia

Up at 4:30 a.m. after a night with indigestion. Drove to Boston to catch an 8:50 flight to Philadelphia. Reading Kaster's Guardians of Language as possible help with the inaugural. Listened to Woolf's "A Room of One's Own" on tape. It's terrible, so pretentious, so unfocussed, so self-indulgent. A great disappointment. Ditto for Graham Greene's Stamboul Train, which I "audited" on the last trip. But Nevil Shute's "A Town Named Alice" was more skillful.

January 23, 1990

Practicing Schubert's "Der Lindenbaum" to play with Dick. Chrysanthi came into the room and burst into tears. "I must tell you about that song," she said as soon as she had regained control. "When my mother and I were in prison, every day we used to hear a child in the apartment building across the street singing it in Greek. The whole experience comes back to me now, as if it were yesterday."

January 28, 1990

Sydney Allrus, Harry Teahan's ex-girlfriend, gave a recital in Faulkner. She lost weight and is now beautiful. Lyric soprano. I sat next to Nancy Bekavac, an added pleasure.

But this morning's Meeting was dreadful. Shirley Waring gave her "spiritual journey" in a near-hysterical manner, self-absorbed. Toward 10:00 a.m. Elizabeth Ballard, finding the door closed to Meeting because Shirley was still talking, became truly hysterical. Jean Brophy rose to let Elizabeth enter. Tom Waring told Jean to sit down. Jean refused. Shirley selfishly continued. We were all appalled.

January 30, 1990

Achebe, the Nigerian novelist, spoke to our Literary Criticism seminar. A sweet, modest man. I liked his story about the people who asked if it's still possible to view tribal customs in Nigeria. "Where do you live?" he asked. "Scarsdale." "Well, he replied, "you have no need to go to Nigeria to see tribal customs." He is very negative regarding "Heart of Darkness" as presenting the blacks as savages. His essay against it is important, but not the whole story.

February 1, 1990

To North Haverhill to Probate Court for a hearing before the judge on Pappous's estate. Still some minor questions that needed input from John Boswell's office and then we should be done. The judge looked bored and was certainly unfriendly, indeed officious.

February 3, 1990

Moving memorial service for Tim Duggan, who died of a heart attack at age 61. Lots of jokes about his sense of humor . . . and his alcoholism.

February 6, 1990

We toured the Kendal site. They're using immense jackhammers to chip through frozen ground seven feet deep to be able to pour footings for the community center. Work much slowed owing to the weather, but progressing.

Nancy Bekavac for supper. What a talker! We continued until 11:00 p.m.

February 8, 1990

War/Peace Steering Committee breakfast. We've secured the $75,000 grant from the Hewlett Foundation for the Conflict Resolution course.

February 9, 1990

Dave Lemal, Lee Baldwin, Ray Hall, Mary Jean Green, and I have been meeting with lots of candidates, owing to our CAP positions. Today met with a black man from Texas, just him, Ray, and me. First time I've experienced two blacks together like this; they're like two Greeks meeting in Fiji. They sense an immediate affinity that sets them off from the dominant group—in this case, whites. A separate culture or sub-culture. But this man was "all for #1." Reprehensible.

February 10, 1990

Nice lunch near Penn Station with Daphne. A lovely companion, as always. Then to the New School for MGSA. I'm the editor-elect of JMGS now, but not on the executive board. Got them to agree to a subscription campaign by Hopkins. Meg Alexiou helped swing the vote. Theofanis Stavrou was officious, as usual. Said we'd published an article already published in his Yearbook, but wouldn't name the author.

February 11, 1990

Lunch with John and Mary Lincoln. John seems to have discovered Quakerism.

February 12, 1990

Meeting with Mardy Cornish, Bill Scott, and Kathleen Corrigan to agree on final itinerary for the cruise. I brought Kathleen “on board,” thankfully.

Clearness Committee over supper for Jo Ann Unruh, who’s going through a divorce.

The Kendal Overseers. Richard Bewley is back.

February 13, 1990

Good open meeting for Kendal with Richard Bewley.

Planned out Hewlett War/Peace strategy with Leonard.

February 14, 1990

Breakfast with Richard Bewley. He’s urging me to check up on Jean, in a legitimate way. Discussed Jean’s relationship with Carol Weingeist.

Department meeting. Tenure for Ivy Schweitzer. Splendid teaching but somewhat weak on scholarly side.

February 15, 1990

Flurry of activity because the Hale House, directly across from Kinhaven, has come on the market. Bill Polk wants to buy it for Kinhaven.

Good student theater. Anouih’s Antigone, a fascinating re-evaluation of Sophocles. I remembered the Sophocles we saw in the X.A.N. basketball court with Irene Pappas and Manos Katrakis—electrifying.

February 17, 1990

To Weston to view the Hale House with Bill, Barbara Lloyd, and Chrysanthi. It’s simple but would be a splendid addition.

Dinner for Andy Towl. Arnolds, Brokaws.

February 18, 1990

Andy spoke to the Meeting about “Quaker Money.” Claudie and Lynmar Brock attended. Then we all had a leisurely lunch. Lyn told me afterward, “What stimulating conversation!” If this was stimulating, I despair regarding his normal level of conversation in Philadelphia.

February 19, 1990

Clearness for Susan Stark, who is languishing in various ways, artistically, financially. I'll try to get her a booking at Kinhaven.

February 20, 1990

Lit. Crit. seminar on Adorno and Habermas. What rot! So much convoluted language for so little result.

February 23, 1990

Beveridge Webster and his wife Frances and son Michael at home with invited guests: Christian Wolff, Jim and Sheba Freedman, Dr. and Mrs. Almy, Dr. Clendenning, Sheila Harvey. Websters were here for their Kendal interview. Afterwards we had a splendid old-fashioned soirée. Bev. played Bach-Busoni, Schubert's "Moments Musicales," an extraordinary Debussy, then Brahms's 1st clarinet sonata with his son Michael, then lots of Chopin encores. He is 82 and had been up since 5:30 a.m. with no nap. Lots of chatter in between. Michael and I hit it off immediately. Bev of course doesn't play the way he used to, but for age 82 he's a wonder. When we passed the punch afterwards, Frances whispered in my ear, "There's no alcohol, is there?" That's the problem: he's an alcoholic.

February 25, 1990

Leander's piece for two pianos, flute, and trumpet was performed in Bethlehem tonight.

February 27, 1990

Kendal Overseers. Long meeting on the Websters. We reaffirmed our rejection of the Walkers, who showed themselves as bigots and liars. But the Websters were more complicated. I argued for his contribution to the community. Others accused me of favoritism, saying it was un-Quakerly. Jean very negative toward alcoholics from her family experience. Finally we agreed to accept Frances and to reevaluate Bev's application at opening if he enters a care program immediately and sticks with it.

March 1, 1990

Met with Edward Bradley. He wants us to set up a Foreign Language Program with Modern Greek. Tsakopoulos says he'll subsidize it up to 50%.

March 2, 1990

Oliver Taplin here. We walked to the river and back. He's just published Greek Fire, based on a BBC series. I gave him my Kazantzakis and Politics. Then we lunched with Bob McGrath and Ada Cohen, a Greek Jewess who is being recruited for Art History. Ada is a delight. We met earlier, talked for a half hour in Greek. She's an Athenian. Graduated from Pierce College, then Brandeis and Harvard.

Supper with Officers and Greenleys. Then to Parish Players to see Dottie Campion in The Glass Menagerie. Passable. Sheila Harvey, too. Then to Lee Huntington's to pick up Huntingtons' brother-in-law from Haiti, a fascinating gentleman with an extraordinarily sexy daughter. Here for the memorial tomorrow.

March 3, 1990

Bill Huntington's memorial. In the Norwich Congregational Church, but dominated by Quakers, and using silence and impromptu ministry in part. Steve Cary came, also a Friend who worked with Bill in Algerian relief. A life of Quaker service, including a time at the Quaker UN mission. Good music, too, especially Rochester a cappella singers. But Don Stewart's accompanist for Mozart was "like me"! Bill's brother, the convert to Catholicism, and now a priest, spoke poorly. He's too old. The sexy granddaughter barely managed. Lee, the widow, very dignified and aristocratic. Susan Stark sang as her ministry.

March 4, 1990

Special Kinhaven board meeting to consider the Hale House over Alice Swersey's objections. We met in Sam and Barbara Lloyd's house. Everyone was for the purchase except Alice, and she acquiesced gracefully. Bill Polk a marvel of lucidity and articulateness, as always.

March 6, 1990

Nice talk by Angus Fletcher of CCNY. Dinner afterwards at Peases'.

March 7, 1990

Breakfast with John Rassias. Ken Smith of the Gould Farm has been fired, but David and Veronica can stay on. Veronica is pregnant. John was snooping re: Edward Bradley's proposal to us for a LSA in Greece.

March 9, 1990

Manchester–Ithaca–Philadelphia

Flew to Ithaca from Manchester after sleeping in a motel last night. Met at airport by Gordon Messing. Lunch in Cornell Faculty Club makes me triply mad that our Faculty Club is being discontinued. I chaired a session in a conference on women's lib in Greece organized by Gail Holst. But spent most of the afternoon visiting with Katy Van Dusen and her husband and baby, and Ayako Kano, my former student. Supper with Messings plus the delightful mother of their son's wife. Lift again to the airport. Reached Pendle Hill late, but in time for ice cream at the Walkers'!

Saturday, March 10, 1990

Pendle Hill

Book Committee. I was not very enthusiastic about Doug Gwyn's MS—poorly written, needs lots of revision. But I liked the other one, on Muste and Niebuhr.

March 12, 1990

Supper at Sheila Harvey's with Jim Knowlton from the University of Reading, who is writing a new biography of Beckett. The Oxenhandlers also. He says the Deidre Bair biography is "dreadful," mostly because she doesn't discuss, or understand, the works.

March 13, 1990

Lunch at the Inn with Margaret Devlin from Travel Dynamics to wrap up the cruise itinerary, finally.

Met with Leonard to secure $1000 for Maura High to help Jack Shepherd in War/Peace Studies, which now has 130 students (last year 72, previous years 25 to 30).

March 16, 1990

Leander here. His piece went very well. Other composers congratulated him. He brought a tape but I accidentally erased the beginning. But we heard most of it. It's minimalist à la Philip Glass, but better than Philip Glass in my opinion. Where did Leander get this gift? He's a slow developer, but there's lots to develop.

March 17, 1990

To Cambridge to A.R.T. with Leander and Yiayia and Chrysanthi to see Strindberg's harrowing tragedy The Father, brilliantly acted by Christopher Lloyd, who turns out to be Sam Lloyd's brother (Sam and Barbara Lloyd were drawn to Weston because of the Weston playhouse). It's an anti-feminist diatribe, showing how women, lacking overt power, possess all kinds of covert power that is far superior to a man's.

Listened to Archie and Mehitabel on the way down. I can use the Spider and Fly for my inaugural lecture..

March 20, 1990

Horrible toothache. I had to have root canal work on it. Pain!

March 22, 1990

Lunch with Bill Scherman to firm up Beebe plans for the 28th. Then to Karen and Pano Rodis for supper in their new house in Sharon, built largely by Pano. A real accomplishment. But they've got their hands full with two babies. No sleep for either parent.

March 23, 1990

Surprise visit from Mary Layoun, who'll be Book Review Editor for JMGS. She's a Palestinian, I discovered. What a strange team we now have: Bien-Herzfeld-Layoun for this journal of Greek studies.

March 24, 1990

To Cambridge again, this time to see Major Barbara. Again superb. Cherry Jones as Barbara was perfection, and Jeremy Geidt was at his best as Andrew Undershaft. What humor and intellectuality and typicality! I'm full of admiration for Shaw. Saw Michael and Elaine Antonakes in the theater. He'll review my Kazantzakis and Politics for Balkan Studies.

March 26, 1990

Finished my inaugural, thank God. Now I have to shorten it.

March 27, 1990

Kendal Overseers at 7:30 a.m. but nothing controversial this time. Then my WWI literature class. We're doing Remarque and Tuckman first. Then I was interviewed by an Alumni Magazine reporter. Then to the Hop for Abbey Theatre, Dublin doing O'Neill's Moon for the Misbegotten. I walked out at the interval. A.R.T. spoils me. This was turgid and badly paced and sentimental. Bad play acted well but not well enough. Spent the rest of the evening shortening my talk for tomorrow.

Wednesday, March 28, 1990

Inaugural

The great day! Of course I taught Greek 13 as usual. Then at 3:30 to 3 Rockefeller for my inaugural lecture. The hall was packed—bigger audience than at my previous inaugural, I was told. Jim Wright did a nice introduction. My talk went very well, from everything I was told afterwards. Best of all, it was short enough to allow questions. Tom Laaspere started by asking if we should allow infinitives to be split. This allowed me to expand in sorts of interesting ways, and also to end the question period by saying, in response to Alan Gaylord's question about the future, that in the future there would be many more split infinitives! Afterwards I was introduced to all the Beebes who were present. Then a reception at the Inn. Jim Freedman said he hadn't heard the talk because, arriving late, he couldn't get into the room; people were standing five deep in the doorway. Then a huge dinner. I sat with Andrew Beebe '93, Ned Perrin, Tom and Nardi Campion, etc. At desert I MC'd a program: Jay Davis and Kate Cohen did splendidly; Karen Rodis, Jan Tarjan, and I spoke briefly about Carl Thum's efforts and Steve Calvert's, and introduced all the other English Department members who were present. Then to Webster Hall to hear Art Buchwald's hilarious talk on politics (nothing whatsoever about the Beebe subject). Then to the Inn bar for an hour with Colonel and Mrs. Brent (she's Fritz Beebe's widow, now remarried), and Beebe's sister, etc. They seemed very pleased, invited us to their apartment in New York, etc.

March 29, 1990

No rest. Katerina Anghelaki-Rooke arrived. I had a long CAP meeting. Dinner party for Katerina, with Vera Vance, Cynthia Huntington, Takis Metaxas. I was late but caught up. Katerina read to a full house in the Wren Room, with me introducing her. Read very well indeed. Her poems are real poems, even in English.

March 30, 1990

Bus strike. Had to buy air ticket for Katerina. But got her off at noon, just before a snowstorm.

Nice letters about my inaugural from Brenda Silver, who says it was brave, Bill Scott, David Montgomery.

April 1, 1990

Director of Nursing at Kendal at Longwood met with us and was very illuminating on how the nursing service will work.

April 2, 1990

Good meeting of the new Steering Committee for War/Peace Studies' new course on Conflict Resolution. Lots of good ideas, especially from Oran Young and Gene Lyons.

April 3, 1990

Werner Kleinhardt lectured on European utopia. Awful. He has a strangely twisted mind. But he's interesting!

April 4, 1990

Music went well even though I don't practice. Chrysanthi practices violin religiously every day for ½ hour.

April 6, 1990

Working on the Greek conversion for Hopkins. Splendid production at the Hop of Aristophanes' Clouds.

April 7, 1990

Spent all day getting the Hopkins conversion to function. Finally succeeded around 5:00 p.m.

April 8, 1990

New Haven

Kinhaven board meeting. I'm getting tired, I see. But we persevere. Poor turnout. The board is viable because of only three or four responsible people.

April 9, 1990

I'm vetting Chuck Officer's book on geological change. He's aiming for a best seller. Fascinating material, but it's so badly written.

April 10, 1990

Steve Calvert wants to develop a literacy program for adults involving Kendal. We had a working breakfast.

Bantz got the Sears grant. I'm a participator. Project involves Greek texts on the computer.

April 14, 1990

Ann and Peter Forbes here. She showed a marvelous BBC video on Tibet, with films of the old culture now destroyed by the Chinese. Dinner afterwards with them and Jack and Kathy Shepherd. Peter Forbes is doing environmental work. Such a fine couple!

April 15, 1990

Long talk with Peter Stettenheim after Meeting, on deficiencies of scientific writing.

April 16, 1990

Faculty Dining Committee. Impossible to save the Faculty Club. Ned and I are reconciled to a change. We toured the Faculty Lounge as a new lunchroom possibility. Committee chose this over Thayer.

April 17, 1990

Conflict Resolution meeting. Jack worked up a rather poor proposal, but we'll go ahead in any case. Had to get all the faculty together to discuss it. We want Jimmy Carter (!) as the visiting fellow.

Lunch with Tom Corindia at the Faculty Club. He keeps admiring my efficiency in answering letters. Wondered whether I wasn't compulsive. Am I?

Jim Cox lectured on Henry Adams, and then digressed to everything else. Very chaotic, but force of personality carries the day, alas.

Supper with Lucy Briggs and her grandson and daughter. Daughter an old maid, poor thing, and looks it. Grandson a fitness freak, and looks it. She told stories about Ernest Hemingway, whom she and Ellis knew when Ellis was ambassador to Cuba. How Hemingway doted on children.

April 18, 1990

Met with Leonard to try to iron out $$ for Conflict Resolution. Getting him to act is a chore. But he acted with alacrity on making me a subscriber to the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists.

April 19, 1990

CAP; then to Manchester hotel, where I discovered the pleasures of video.

April 20, 1990

PH

Marathon Publications Committee meeting, five hours. Nice interaction at supper with Donald Swann and his “companion,” Allison. Donald is rejuvenated, creative, euphoric, composing again. Last time I saw him he was depressed and sterile. Lots of talk about The Last Temptation film in the UK. Turns out that he and Allison love Kazantzakis’s Saint Francis as well as The Last Temptation. Too bad I’ll miss his concert tomorrow.

April 21, 1990

Meeting at PH, then to NYC. Met Daphne, Chrysanthi, and Daphne’s friend Eileen. Caffe Cielo for an expensive (!) dinner, but pleasant; then to Cat on a Hot Tin Roof in a superbly acted and directed production. Slept in Daphne’s apartment very comfortably.

April 22, 1990

Breakfast provided by Daphne. Then we walked down Sixth Avenue to see Earth Day celebration. A festival! But lots of litter despite cans everywhere for recycling. Home by Ambus: train to Springfield, bus to White River Junction.

April 23, 1990

To Londonderry for closing on the Hale House. It’s ours now. George Lamb donated his services. Bill Polk sanguine about getting a donation from Bay or Paul foundations.

April 24, 1990

Kendal Overseers at 7:30 a.m. We toured the property, which now has foundations and structural steel and electric conduits. Lilla Bradley has objected to our purchase of General Electric dishwashers because GE is a military contractor. What to do? We said we’d speak to the contractor but doubt whether any change can be made.

April 25, 1990

UPNE is reprinting Demotic Greek I again. I’ve submitted some minor changes.

To Fleet Bank Trust department with Mother for financial review. The estate is now $1.2 million. Vogel wants us to sell Kimberly-Clark but I’m resisting.

April 27, 1990

Lunch with James MacPherson, Pulitzer prize author, who is being recruited by Dartmouth. Says he's burnt out, doesn't want to teach writing.

To Cambridge for Kinhaven benefit in Jock and Ariadne Forbes' mansion at 3 Gerry's Landing. They have three acres in the middle of Cambridge, an immense house built in 1912, with two similar houses belonging to cousins on either side. But strangely, maybe no money. Bare walls, no paintings, no carpets. All inherited. We had trios, quartets. I made a speech; then we all sang Kinhaven rounds and madrigals, effortlessly in four-part harmony. They they put together a Brandenburg, the 5th. Forbes' girls are splendid cellist and violinist. All very stimulating. But few people came. George Goodwin remarked afterward, "That was the most pleasant and disappointing affair I've ever been to."

April 28, 1990

Three-hour breakfast & coffee connection with Meg Alexiou. Dimitri is now well placed in a halfway house in Brum. But Pavlos is not doing well in Greece. Christos is legally married and well employed half by the University of Central Greece, half by the Ministry.

May 1, 1990

Planning for Humanities 1-2 with Jim Tatum, Marsha Swislocki, Chris Wolff, Fred Berthold, Walter Stephens.

Jay and Devon Parini here. I missed his lecture, but saw them at dinner at Don and Pat Pease's. His Tolstoy book is forthcoming.

May 2, 1990

War/Peace Steering Committee with Elise Boulding to report on the new course.

Meeting Finance Committee. Sandy Stettenheim is a responsible treasurer. But donations are off. I gave another $300.

May 3, 1990

Ugh! Root canal work, so disagreeable. After the Novocaine wore off I had so much pain I resorted to codeine. Drugged, sat through CAP. Then to War/Peace seminar to hear Elise on pluralism. I said in the question period that I thought assimilation was still a significant goal in many people's lives. Dinner; then to Manchester again.

May 4, 1990

At Haverford for 9:00 a.m. meeting of the Corporation Nominating Committee. John Jones cold, impossible to converse with. But Tom Kessinger was gracious. Afterwards visited SWAIN travel in Ardmore; they're working on my round-the-world ticket. Then to Princeton. Lunch with Ernie Friedl and her step-daughter, who teaches ESL at Queens College. Nice woman. Ernie walked me through all her routines and systems for JMGS. She is remarkably organized. By comparison I am a slob, even though Tom Corindia considers me compulsive.

May 6, 1990

At Meeting, met Mike Kehoe, new marketing manager of UPNE, a Friend.

May 7, 1990

Cambridge

To Harvard for Alec Shuldiner's viva. Meg, Kimberley Patten (senior tutor) and another smashing blonde from Holy Cross. I found his thesis mediocre and his oral defense the same. Lots of articulate gab, but weak on facts and on real analytical powers. But the others were more charitable. He'll get a low magna. Nice supper afterwards with Meg at a Spanish restaurant. She gave me good advice re JMGS.

May 9, 1990

Showed up at OIS video studio to record my opening lecture for Paradise Lost for Pendle Hill next fall. Strange to see myself "in action" for the first time. Dartmouth provides such extraordinary amenities.

May 10, 1990

Chrysanthi organized the Howe Library senior citizens' art show again. Good work. Mother had two paintings, "Trudging Toward Spring" (representational) and "Occum Pond" (somewhat cubistic), which I liked best.

May 11, 1990

Hotel Bethlehem

Left at 7:30 a.m. for Bethlehem. Leander met us at the hotel in good spirits. Lovely dinner. Then across the street to hear Leander and Martha Schrepel and two percussionists do Bartok's "Sonata for Two Pianos and Percussion." A demonic piece of genius. So driving! Beautifully played. Earlier, we'd gone around the historic district—"God's Acre," etc. Lovely. Talked with Schantzes afterwards and met "Mitch" again.

Also Naoko and Yasuo arrived in the nick of time. Very old-homelike. Then to Larry Wright's for a drink. Larry's sister was there, an Episcopalian priest, with "boyfriend" who teaches Italian at Hunter College. A strange, improbable pair.

May 12, 1990

Leander took us to a working class diner for breakfast. People look different here. I had scrapple despite Chrysanthi's disapproval.

Lunch with Nancy and Jerry Bidlack to talk Kinhaven business while Leander, Chrysanthi, and Mother went shopping. Then to Packer Chapel for the "B-minor Mass," which I'd last heard here in 1950, with Peter Gardner. Eva Gürkstner concertmistress. We had a long, cordial talk both before and then during the interval. But the performance was lackluster, except for beautiful instrumental solos. I was much more moved at Marlboro four or five years ago. Orchestra full of Kinhavenites: Mary Watt, Eva, Paul Chao. Long dinner afterwards with Leander.

May 13, 1990

Another breakfast haunt. Then to Central Moravian Church for the "Love Feast" service. Very good music, directed by the Schantzes. Brass quartet. Bell choir. But the music usurps the religious part. Love Feast involved about 12 hymns, then biscuits and cider distributed to everyone in the pews. A show, but not for me. Afterwards, talked with a church official about Moravians, the oldest surviving Protestant denomination; started in fourteen hundreds under Jan Hus. Also met the president of Moravian College, a Quaker.

At 2:00 p.m. Leander's students' recital again. Peter (Πιέρτερ) Hall. Very moving to see Leander's products. Brenda, the fat wife of a coal miner, flubbed a bit but displayed her musicality. A Korean high school student played with absolute self-assurance. Wonderful to see these people, predominantly adults, so immersed in Beethoven, Scarlatti, Schumann, etc.

Trip home very long. Huge traffic jam before the George Washington bridge. I turned around and went circuitously to the Tappan Zee bridge. Another traffic jam, but not so serious. Finally reached Hanover at 1:00 a.m.

May 14, 1990

8:00 a.m. breakfast with Jean to plan the Kendal board meeting. She didn't like my initiative in writing to Lilla Bradley about the GE washers. All letters have to be approved!

May 15, 1990

8:00 a.m. cruise meeting. Professor Richard Grant of Chicago, a celebrated scholar of early Christianity, will be joining us.

9:00 a.m., George Demko and Elliott in my office asking advice on setting up a College Course.

10:00 a.m., Bill Cook and I did our annual poetry reading in the War/Peace course. Better this time than ever before because we were strong and cut out enough to allow us to finish. Thunderous applause!

12:00 noon, Comparative Literature Steering Committee followed by a cup of coffee with Laurence Davies.

2:00 to 5:30, conferences. English 7 students preparing their projects. Nice to see the class jelling.

6:00, pot luck at the Meeting for Kendal overseers and the six Crosslands/Kendal residents who've come to speak at our open meeting tomorrow.

8:00, theater with Chrysanthi and Mother. "Widows," about Pinochet's oppression of dissidents in Chile. A somewhat tedious and overly long and unsubtle political statement, but very well acted by our students.

May 16, 1990

The Kendal meeting went well. But afterwards Carleton Chapman asked me, "Why do we always hear only the good? There must be something bad."

War/Peace x-hour. As usual, some students wrote brilliant poems stimulated by our presentation yesterday.

May 17, 1990

For the first time, I went to CAP unprepared. No time to do the reading. But it hardly mattered.

May 18, 1990

Pendle Hill

At Book Committee we decided on a moratorium until the review is completed next year. The real problem is that Rebecca is burned out. Too bad! I was hoping we could do Letts' book on Muste and Niebuhr.

Spoke at length with Mimi Wright, who wants to live in a Greek village. Καημένη.

May 19, 1990

Pendle Hill

Moving ministry at Meeting. A woman spoke about pottery class. She fashioned a clay hand but then felt compelled to pierce it with a nail to suggest Christ's hand. At first she had planned to remove the nail, leaving the hole. Then she decided to leave the nail as well. Why? As an indication of what we, today, are doing to God.

May 20, 1990

Riparius

To the farm. Planted, using the new frost protectors for tomatoes that Bob Watson told us about. Cleaned out the outhouse. Started the new Jari. Saw Jim Dwyer, who has already buried pipe and cable for the pump, and installed two hydrants, one for the garden and one for Alec's cabin, next to the henhouse. The place is a mess after the backhoe work, of course. I'll need to harrow and then re-seed.

May 21, 1990

7:30 a.m. to 11:00 at Dr. Logan's in session 1 for two crowns, one over the root canal tooth, the other over its cracked neighbor. Listened to Beethoven's violin concerto twice on Walkman, played beautifully by Anne-Sophie Mutter.

Meg Alexiou got hit by a car as she crossed the street looking the wrong way, British style. But she's OK, merely fractured her thumb.

Jack Shepherd showed a student-made video about the 60s at Dartmouth. All those people and scenes came back: Quaker vigils on the Green, Peter Sorlien ceremoniously quitting ROTC, Donald Pease going to Canada, etc. Ned was one of the narrators, juxtaposed with . . . Jeffrey Hart, who of course belittled everything.

May 22, 1990

Kendal Overseers at 7:30 a.m. We've sold 195 units. David and Atossa French will join us next month.

Out to Quechee for a premature birthday supper for my 60th. Mother treated. Allan Munck, John and Mary Rassias. John in good form.

May 23, 1990

Music with Dick. Three Bach sonatas plus a modern piece he's studying.

May 25, 1990

Lunch with Pano Rodis. He's working for John Rassias in Language Outreach. Says it's totally chaotic: no planning, no materials. How does John get away with it, year after year? Answer: charisma.

More charisma at the department dinner. I was resplendent in my 1948 tuxedo, which still fits. Retiree: James Melville Cox. Lou Renza, Henry Terrie, Horace Porter, Blanche Gelfant spoke warmly of his friendship, which certainly was never extended to me. Jim spoke digressively, as usual, calling upon us to value teaching over research and dwelling movingly on his farm in Virginia where he lives again, in the house in which he was born. "We are all failures," he said, in that we accomplish much less than we had ever hoped for ourselves. At dinner I chatted with Ernest Hebert, who grew up in a French Canadian family in Keene, and with Ned. Ned's retirement dinner will be in 1992. Mine? 1995 probably. Will anyone come? Will anyone speak with warmth? Doubtful. What will I say? It's very scary.

May 26, 1990

Cambridge

Wonderful day. Superb production of The Caucasian Chalk Circle at the A.R.T. with Cherry Jones, now my favorite actress, as Grusha. A zany mixture of sentiment, vaudeville, acrobatics, music, spectacle, mise en scène. The moral is easy: devote oneself to a helpless child rather than to ego, wealth, and position; justice comes from unofficial magistrates, not from the establishment, etc. Just missed Brustein's introductory talk. Too bad. Daphne, looking beautiful as always, drove up with Greg. Afterwards we supped together in Concord. Daphne's job at Simon and Schuster is still varied and stimulating. She's now re-writing (more or less) a book called "20-20 Vision" about financial projections. Greg, too, is stimulated in his very different field of trading foreign currencies. He expects to be sent to Tokyo for a month or so in the fall. It seems that he'll be moving in with Daphne in Madison Avenue, too. What comes next?

On the way home, Chrysanthi had violent diarrhea from the meal.

May 28, 1990

Another birthday gathering. Corindias, Nodas, Daphne, Greg.

Greek 13 class for supper with Τάκης Μεταξάς και Ειρήνη Γεωργακούδη. Susan H. was such a fine student; also fun to have Sean Hemingway (Ernest's grandson) as an auditor. But Nick Mourlas and Ji Yeon Choi were terrible. Hopeless. Still, I enjoyed a new, close look at Seferis and Cavafy.

May 29, 1990

Last class. Students gave reports on WWI books. A good group. I have 16 term papers coming.

Retirement dinner at Quechee for Matt Wiencke. He basked in love and esteem.

May 30, 1990

Bought a new car. Another Buick. Skylark, but this time with air conditioning and cruise control and automatic windows for Chrysanthi's arthritis. But obligatory automatic shift, my first.

May 21, 1990

Dinner honoring Kathleen Corrigan's tenure, at Bob and Susan McGrath's. Bob read an "epic" of praise. Long talk with Peter Travis, who is separated from June, poor fellow.

June 4, 1990

Breakfast with Jean Brophy. I urged her to interview Peggy Hebert, who is losing her job at the Faculty Club. Lunch with Steve Scher.

CAP. I spoke at length to Jim Freedman and Jim Wright about the advisability of retaining Marianne Hirsch. How good she is for Comparative Literature, and how important Comparative Literature is for all of us. Then CAP dinner. Pleasant but a bit forced. But I really like Karen Wetterhahn, the new associate dean for sciences.

Jim Freedman mentioned that President Arias of Costa Rica might like to visit Dartmouth. I'll write recommending him for a Montgomery Fellowship, so we can use him in War/Peace Studies.

June 5, 1990

Chester

To Chester, Jack Coleman's "Inn at Long Last" for dinner with David Bury, Fred Bay, Bill Polk, trying to get Fred to pledge a substantial gift to Kinhaven. We failed.

June 6, 1990

Lunch with Jim Jordan, who wants to buy the house next door. He started as a painter, I discovered.

Afternoon: Meeting Finance Committee. Sandy Stettenheim, at our urging, has balanced the budget for next year.

June 7, 1990

Weston

To Weston to the Bidlacks' to meet with David Bury and his nice assistant Allison, and Lelah, to go over the planning document. Fred Bay as an onlooker. Fruitful meeting.

Dinner at Schers' with Ray and Pam Sobel.

June 8, 1990

Went to Julie Davis's film, her Senior Fellowship project. Sat with Steve Scher. Both of us sighed and sighed as it went on and on, tediously. Subject: French occupation, anti-Semitism. Pretentious and too overly moralistic, but interesting camerawork. Julie wrote, directed, and filmed it. She's off to Hollywood next year to try her luck.

June 11, 1990

Dr. Logan's. He finished my two crowns. The end of the root canal saga. Price: $1500.

Supper at the Brokaws' in Strafford, with David and Tossa French. Brokaws' view spectacular. But what a crazy place to live. Frenches will join the Kendal Overseers.

June 15, 1990

Mystic, Connecticut

To Mystic in our new, air-conditioned car. In comfort. Sumptuous buffet lunch at the Inn at Mystic. Then toured Mystic Seaport. Fascinating whaling ship; exhibits about shipbuilding, caulking, etc. A nice holiday.

Supper with New England Foundation for the Humanities. Then I delivered my "literary" talk. Question period somewhat antagonistic, accusing me of omitting oral aspects and stressing writing over reading. Steve Calvert organized all of this.

June 16, 1990

Riparius

Mystic to the farm. At last.

June 17, 1990

Alec arrived. We raked and harrowed the field that was dug up for the water.

June 18, 1990

Finished seeding, after liming and fertilizing. Perrymans visited.

June 19, 1990

Started work with Alec on the bathroom extension. First project: the deck and trapdoor over the foundation.

June 20, 1990

To North Creek high school for open forum on Commission on the Adirondacks. Audience extremely hostile, except for Art and Chris and Mary Fitzgerald and Evelyn and Don Greene, etc. Natives are appalled at thought of a year's moratorium, what they call 2000-acre zoning, etc. Alas, the report is treated as all black, whereas some of its 200-odd provisions are good, others not so good.

Thursday, June 21, 1990

Jim Dwyer here again with his helper-apprentice Larry Mozer. We have running water now in the kitchen!

Art Perryman's birthday. He drove me back to his cabin, which he is remodeling very expertly. He told me, however, that his winter was awful because he has no direction, no clear desire to do anything. His art, alas, has slackened although he did a little sketching.

June 22, 1990

We've got two walls framed and created for the bathroom.

Hours and hours of talk with Alec after supper about Indonesia. Among other things, he participated in a small Meeting for Worship in Jakarta with four or five other Quakers. How nice! Leander too, against all probability, elected to retain his membership. He sent the following letter to Ministry and Counsel:

¶ After some debate, I have decided to transfer my Junior membership at the Hanover Meeting to a Senior membership. For some time I was uneasy with the thought of retaining my membership in Hanover when I am so infrequently present. But it seems logical that until I find sufficient need or cause to join another Meeting or to attend a different church, I should keep my ties with the "family" of Friends here in Hanover.

¶ I'm sorry it has taken me so long to respond. I had hoped to experiment with the Meeting in Bethlehem, PA, this spring, but have not made a real effort to do so. It is fairly clear to me that the Hanover Meeting is the only religious setting which provides me with any significant degree of moral and sacred inspiration. Perhaps in future years I will develop a great commitment to faith. For the present, I feel fortunate and honored to retain my ties with such an extraordinary body as the Hanover Friends.

¶ Thank you for your understanding, and I'll look forward to seeing you the next time I'm at Meeting in Hanover.

He was here briefly with Deanna Lee on the 18th on their way from Minneapolis to Kinhaven. She turns out to be very lively, smiling, playful. We liked her.

June 25, 1990

Hanover

Quick trip to Hanover for me to meet Μαρία Παντελιά, who is here on John's DANA program. I'm her "consultant." She'll extend the drills I did on Hypercard. She teaches Modern Greek at Hellenic College and Ancient Greek at UNH. Says that at Hellenic College the students still cannot speak a sentence of Greek even after three years of classes. But they know the grammar!

June 26, 1990

Terpni again

Supper with Fran and Irv. Fran pulled her Achilles tendon and is in a cast. But in good spirits.

Alec and I are working every day on the bathroom, which is now looking quite handsome. It will have red cedar shingles outside, and vinyl tile on the floor. Alec is building a beautiful door. I cut through the wall of the kitchen to "realize" the door I planned three decades ago.

Saturday, June 30, 1990

Yiayia is here with Lori, who was last here when she was about ten years old but says she remembers.

Laura and Michael Gouthreau came for supper. They have gotten Eliot Monter to abandon the golf course that would have engulfed their home. Michael now has a completely functional system of solar-generated electricity.

July 2, 1990

Alec and Chrysanthi drove to Montreal to pick up Jacques Martin at the airport, but he telephoned from France later to say he wasn't coming because of a strike. They couldn't even go shopping because it turned out to be Canada Day and everything was closed. But they heard a jazz festival in a Montreal deserted by traffic.

July 4, 1990

We treated ourselves to ice cream sundaes at the new Stewart's in North Creek. Ah, the simple pleasures!

July 5, 1990

Jacques arrived finally. His French is the real Parisian patois, difficult for me to understand.

July 6, 1990

Again to Shapiros for supper, this time with Jacques. Laura and Michael came for dessert, and slides of Mexico.

July 10, 1990

Jacques left for Washington. He did the entire east wall of the bathroom in cedar shingles, beautifully.

Art and I went to David Moro's in North Creek for a meeting of those who support the Adirondack Commission. Erwin Miller was there, also Evelyn Greene, one of the APA commissioners (John Collins), two of the staff for the governor's commission's report, a staff member of the Adirondack Council, and many locals. Moro is gifted and assertive but also quite domineering. Agenda: name the group, agree on central principles, consider how to respond to specific proposals in the Commission's report. An intense time for 2½ hours. Then more talk on the street afterwards with Art and two conservation officers (I learned that Scarroon Manor was meant to be a campsite, but then they ran out of money and just let it grow wild). Then still more talk at Art's house, going over his presentation for the next meeting. A good group. The controversy is a nasty one, with lots of name-calling.

July 11, 1990

Delicious evening at the ballet, with dinner at the Hall of Springs. Alec's intestinal inflammation (colitis), brought from Indonesia, is now fine; he had a full meal. Met Donna Trautwein. Shandra is at Haverford. Nicky is a striking, tall adolescent. Donna is about to complete her doctorate. Lots of miracles. Ballet is still, for me, the "purest" art form; it transports one into a faerie world of abstract beauty.

Alec returned to the farm whereas we drove to Hanover. To bed at 2:00 a.m.

July 12, 1990

Hanover

Chrysanthi started her Rassias ALPS Greek program. I started translating my Myrivilis article for Νέα Εστία. Also, printed and mailed the first installment of checklist of Kazantzakis letters to Wim Bakker, for Mandatoforos.

July 14, 1990

Weston

Kinhaven board, my last as president. In the evening, Leander played Brahms's clarinet trio. Lovely, but just a bit tentative. He said later that he was petrified the whole time, which is unlike him. Pizza later with Leander, Alec (who came from the farm), Deanna, and Caroline. Fun! Overnight at the Blue Gentian. Dick bedridden with osteomyelitis of the spine, poor fellow.

July 15, 1990

Weston

Board continues. David Erlanger, Paul Rudolf, and I, the Evaluation Committee, urged evaluation this year. Jerry is doing better with discipline but is still not respected musically. John Austin will be the next president. What a relief! All our financial eggs are now in one basket: Kresge Foundation. Lelah officious as always. But the place is still physically and spiritually beautiful. Children's concert fine.

Returned a bit early, craving a milkshake, which I bought finally and then spilled all over our new car.

Spoke after supper to Chrysanthi's ALPS class (7 students) about Greek literature, το γλωσσικό ζήτημα, etc. Read some Cavafy and Ritsos. Interesting group, including a family of Americans that converted to Greek Orthodoxy.

July 16, 1990

Hanover

Kendal picnic at Storrs Pond, a large turnout. Mother says that everyone is friendly and in good spirits. Kendal construction is now spectacular: huge buildings taking shape. We've sold 197 units. Bill Lederer showed up; hadn't seen him since the mid-'60s when he went to report on the Colonels in Greece. Now he's writing about CCRCs for Reader's Digest. Nice to see Lloyd. Long talk with Kate Emlen's parents. Bob and Mary Metz there, too, and Frank Fetter, looking very old, and sad. Dinner later. Lloyd and I were able to cover lots of ground, chiefly about Pendle Hill, Alan Walker's MS, etc. Lloyd wants to build a Kendal at Lehigh.

Alan Hunt's wife greeted me with, "Thanks for being so nice to Alan." Strange.

July 17, 1990

Hanover

Full day. 7:30 a.m. at the Meeting House for Kendal Overseers with Lloyd, Alan, and Sally Worth, our original Kendal Corporation member. Very useful on intricacies of governance.

Then met with Patrick Kearney about Meeting archives. He's replacing me as archivist, thank God.

Then lunch with Faculty Dining Committee. Our latest scheme is to have faculty lunches in the big dining room of the Inn. Ned was there. Said, "Are you back from the Catskills?" (sic). He's a very if-y friend, alas.

Then to Steve Calvert to discuss his Alumni Writers' College idea. Also talked about Teeter's obsessive opposition to my talk at Mystic; he threatened to resign on account of it, etc. Steve complained that Jean Brophy was very cold and unfriendly toward Patti, who wants to be a geriatric nurse. Alas, Jean can be cold and unfriendly. I told him I expected he'd find Carol Weingeist quite different when she returns.

More work on the Myrivilis translation. And, oh yes, I purchased a FAX machine and now have to learn how to program it.

Then to the Norwich Inn for supper hosted by Alec, for our 35th anniversary. When I awoke this morning and said "Happy anniversary" to Chrysanthi, she responded, "Don't remind me. It's been so long, and so short." Alec, Yiayia, Audrey Logan, Leander, Deanna. A jolly time, talking about life with Alec and Leander as babies. Audrey gave us a set of blue and white towels for the farm bathroom. Daphne sent a "jade" (color for 35th) address book. Nice.

July 21, 1990

Riparius–Weston–Hanover

To Kinhaven to hear Deanna play in Dvořák quintet. She's a fine violinist, obviously, but lacks the magic of an Eva Gűrstner, for example. Met Bruce Adolphe. David Erlanger and Bruce himself are pleased at the guest composer/conductor experiment. Bruce would be willing to come for two weeks next year. But how will Jerry react? Adolphe's piece played by staff wasn't all that spectacular.

July 22, 1990

Worked on Meeting archives. Mobs at Meeting all eating pancakes to raise money for First Day School. Saw Anna Jones. Corrected Myrivilis translation according to help given by Takis, Maria, and Chrysanthi. My Greek is poorer and poorer, alas. Supper with Tom and Nancy Corindia. They've enlarged their house, another palace. Another non-simple Quaker.

July 25, 1990

Started working in my "office" under the tree. Half the summer gone. I'm still catching up on correspondence. But we don't build bathrooms every summer, either. Working now installing the insulation. Gary from Murphy's up for lunch. He's totally against the Adirondack Commission proposals, of course. The plywood we ordered for siding was out of stock, and he personally drove some up in his truck. Nice man. Also, we measured Alec's windows and ordered No. 2 common pine for inside frames as a birthday present.

July 26, 1990

All day in the office. Then a quick swim. Then with Aser and Evelyn Rothstein to the Hall of Springs and ballet. Lovely, as always. Aser brought me up to date on the cystic fibrosis breakthrough in the institute he used to direct. The Chinese scientist who heads the team was hired by him, and indeed it was he who decided eleven years ago to concentrate on genetic diseases. The problem is one amino acid in a chain of a thousand or so. He described the extraordinarily complex process by which the team narrowed things down to this. How meaningful it is to be a scientist! At times like this I feel my life wasted in triviality. On the other hand Evelyn told me of a physician they know who had me at Dartmouth years ago and remembered the class with extreme gratitude. And recently I received a letter from another physician (as it turns out) saying much the same. But what is all this in contrast to discovering the secret of cystic fibrosis? Aser also recounted the recent experiment with fish proving Darwin's theory of evolution for the first time in nature itself as opposed to the laboratory. The fish, over 160-odd generations, changed gestation lengths, number of offspring, etc., in response to a change in environment: a different sort of predator.

July 27, 1990

Applied inner wall to the bathroom. I'm eager to have something to show when Alec returns tonight.

Yesterday re-read the extraordinary letter Eugenia Friedman sent me narrating the horrendous circumstances of her upbringing as a Greek-American, with a father who was a chauvinist, a mother (arranged marriage) who hated everything Greek and ended in the insane asylum, grandparents illiterate in both Greek and English, a Greek school at church in which nothing was learned. This is the kind of story that needs to be acknowledged, along with the myths of family solidarity, etc., etc. in our ethnic communities.

July 28, 1990

Daphne and Greg here. I'm getting used to Greg more. He's moving in with Daphne next month—no choice. He's a good worker. Mowed without complaining. We worked on interior finish of the bathroom, painting it with polyurethane. Alec started positioning the shower. I began the electric wiring. Lamb dinner for Alec's 32nd birthday, actually tomorrow. We gave him a credit at Murphy's for the frames and trim of his cabin windows. Chrysanthi made Alec's "traditional" blueberry pie. All very festive. Then to Perrymans. A long day.

July 29, 1990

Alec finished leveling and plumbing the shower-stall. I cut out the four-inch diameter hole in the floor, which luckily came between rafters. Also inserted the medicine cabinet, given as a castaway by Andrea Leskes and Tommy, our erstwhile neighbors on Ledyard Lane. Started the electric also. Jay Parini telephoned; he and Devon will visit in August. He's being lionized over the Tolstoy book. Says that he read my Kazantzakis book cover to cover and admires it. But where are my reviews?

Greg and Daphne here this morning; helped with the Jari and the bathroom. Then I drove them to Bolton Landing to catch a bus. They seem increasingly like a very nice couple. I'm getting used to Gregory.

August 3, 1990

Frustrating day. Tried for hours to get two three-way switches to work with the overhead light in the bathroom. Nothing. Finally reasoned out the system and concluded the switches were defective. Only then did Alec look at the box and discover he had wired them wrong. Now everything is ready: shower installed, lavatory mounted, electricity finished, toilet purchased. We await Jim Dwyer for the hookup.

August 4, 1990

Satisfying day. Mounted mower, lubricated it, fixed a bushing (with difficulty), and, after much trial and error also improved the release-problem so that I mowed half the front field without incident. Also, Alec and I built a scaffold for the new roof we have to put over the kitchen willy-nilly.

Right now, as I write this, Alec is playing Mozart's Dissident Quartet with Naoko, Yasuo, and Matola (?), a Japanese friend (doubling) and Saul Schwartz, the cellist from Schroon Lake. Before, we did Shostakovich's lovely suite with me at the piano. Fun. This follows a hearty meal of hamburgers outside on the picnic table.

August 7, 1990

Leander came yesterday with Deanna. She's a good sport; helped in the garden, etc. We played the lovely Shostakovich piece, with Chrysanthi joining in. Leander, Alec, and I started immediately on replacing the kitchen roof.

August 8, 1990

Fifteen people in the house tonight. Jay and Devon Parini came with Will and Oliver; Mother came with Susie Buseck; Al and Mary Zalon showed up at the Shapiros, too. So, after a day on the roof, quick swim with Jay, picnic supper, and then wonderful music: highlighted by Deanna and Alec doing Bartok duets, Alec elevated to new heights owing to Deanna, and then Deanna and Leander doing a Mozart sonata and finally, at my request, the first movement of the Spring Sonata. She plays like a dream, rich, full tone, total precision. Yet she's modest and complimentary to us amateurs.

Jay's book on Tolstoy is a sensation, but he's strong enough, I think, to survive the adulation. He read my Kazantzakis book and liked it, he said. He even inquired at Holt re: my second volume, but Holt asked various members of the Greek community (who?) if anyone was interested in Kazantzakis, and the replies were all totally negative. So, I'm working on someone who is passé. Alas! But no surprise. Jay was kind in feeling confident that the cycle will revolve and Kazantzakis will have a revival . . . some day.

We'd hope to have toilet, etc. operative for Mother, but not yet.

August 9, 1990

Got up early to hear an interview with Jay on public radio, but it was bounced owing to the Kuwait crisis. Guests departed, finally. Leander and Deanna left to drive to Minneapolis via Niagara Falls. Alec and I finished the roof. Jim Dwyer finished the bathroom. So we now have toilet, shower, and washbasin. All three of us took hot showers and then went to Smith's Restaurant to celebrate.

August 10, 1990

In my office, finally. No summer has ever been like this. Wrote a long letter in French to the Société des Amis de Nikos Kazantzakis, summarizing my book. Then a long letter in Greek to Stylianos. Alas, I still haven't translated any more of his poems. Supper with Mary and Maureen Fitzgerald at Gore Mountain Inn Buffet, four hours of heated conversation. North Creek is like a primitive society, Scotland in the heyday of the clans. Everything hinges on class and family affiliation.

August 13, 1990

"Last supper" with Alec at Copperfield Inn. The décor is totally inappropriate for North Creek and the clientele vulgar and New Yorkish. But the food was superb. Long talk with Alec afterward about his teaching. The orthodoxy there is no grammar or spelling, only "individual creativity." Alas! He demurs. I told him this is irresponsible.

August 14, 1990

Alec left. Chrysanthi handled it well; very few tears. We had long long talk, went out for dinner, visited in bed. I told her that what Alec needs to give his life direction is a wife and children. He rationalizes now by saying he's helping cultures to understand one another. Fine, but for how long in the present circumstances?

August 16, 1990

Finished this year's mowing and detached the Ford mower, which performed beautifully now that I've adjusted it better.

Leander arrived. Saw Alec off at the airport last night, with Daphne.

After supper, to Bolton Landing for Town Meeting arranged by David Moro's Residents' Committee to Protect the Adirondacks. Well done. Generally friendly audience. Honest-to-goodness Adirondackers testified in favor of the Commission's report. Opposition was silent for the most part. We expected fireworks and there were none. I sent David a process evaluation à la Pendle Hill board, afterward.

August 17, 1990

The cruise is definitely going. Received Grant's books. I started working on my lecture on Hebraism and Hellenism, reading Matthew Arnold and Vassilis Lambropoulos.

Figured out that the whole water and well and bathroom and septic system will cost about $15,000. But my pocketed take-home pay is now over $1000 a week, so $15,000 isn't too bad.

Wednesday, August 22, 1990

Sandy Dennis called Leander to say that Benjy Bidlack stopped breathing, was taken to hospital in Hanover, continues in a coma in intensive care. Poor Nancy is coping—rehearsing, directing Junior Camp, which doesn't end until Sunday. I wrote all the trustees.

August 24, 1990

Leander felt he should visit the Bidlacks in Hanover. We offered them the use of our house. Leander had been Benjy's chief friend at Kinhaven: took him to the movies, on outings, etc., and also experienced several occasions when he couldn't breathe. But Jerry, being present, knew what to do. The other day, no one was present. Leander is very moody, couldn't practice, mad at the world, at me, at Moravian for exploiting him. But probably Benjy's plight is the cause. At midnight we spoke with him. The nurse at Hitchcock told him that Benjy is brain dead and will be a vegetable if he lives. Alan Rozycki is the pediatrician. Jerry is already speaking about donation of organs; apparently they're resolved to let him die peacefully. Leander said also that he was so glum because of having to leave Terpni. Understandable. This place is obscenely beautiful. As for the new bathroom, it still strikes me as a miracle every time I use the toilet, wash my face, or take a shower. How fine that we experienced the "sanitary problem" and its solution step by step, and built our own facility, instead of simply purchasing something ready-made. It's high-tech in a way, yet also in keeping with the Terpni ethos. Of course, speaking of high-tech, I of course now have not only my computer, with e-mail connection around the world, but also my new FAX machine. Today, for example a FAX came in from Singapore, just like that!

Went to Glens Falls this afternoon to take water samples from the two wells for retesting, to buy more oakum, and to get a Los Angeles tour book from AAA. Supper in Chestertown diner, another “discovery.”

A few days ago, visited Jacob Stearn again on Robbins Island. He had Alan MacCormick as a guest and it was fun reminiscing about Dartmouth in the 1960s. MacCormick teaches two days a week at City University and lives in the Berkshires. Obscene.

August 25, 1990

Making new shutters for bathroom windows. Serviced Jari and put John Deere up on blocks. Need to flush the cooling system this year, the 2nd of service. In the house, we're fighting the invasion of mice, chipmunks, and bats. Poison and more poison. Tried to tape up gaps in insulation in our bedroom.

Daphne and Chrysanthi both want to cancel their trip to Greece owing to the crisis in the Gulf. Too bad. I'm still hoping the cruise will be cancelled, but Travel Dynamics seems determined to run it, even though there are only 35 registrants. I continue to work on Hebraism and Hellenism, thanks mostly to Vassilis Lambropoulos's MS book on the subject. Will two weeks be lost and wasted if the cruise is cancelled? Perhaps it could be reworked as a Pendle Hill pamphlet with applicability to Quakerism.

Sunday, August 26, 1990

Sitting under my tree writing and reading. What a blessing! Yet this summer has been so anomalous. For six weeks I was here under the tree only twice, I believe. The bathroom took precedence. We drove on, first to do the deck, to cover the tank, etc. Could have stopped there. But no, we then started the walls, which meant that we had to get a roof over it to close it in, against the weather. Could have stopped there. But no, we did the exterior shingles, the interior insulation, floor, and finished the inner walls. Could have stopped there. But no, it must be functional. So we installed shower and sink, purchased the W.C., did the electricity, got Jim to hook everything up. And then, finally, we did stop. Much more interior and exterior finish remains, but that will occur next year (maybe). The result: I did nothing on the Kazantzakis letters except send a short bibliography to Wim Bakker; I did nothing on translating more Harkianakis poems; I did nothing on preparing for Humanities 1–2 next winter; I read only two books to review them, and lots of material for Hebraism and Hellenism, which may never be used. I did nothing on my address to the conference in Sydney. Oh, yes, I did translate my Myrivilis article into Greek and did send it to Νέα Εστία. And I surprised Maria Pantelia (after a fashion) in Rassias's DANA program. But the mowing was accomplished. That's good. Και του χρόνου! And poor Alec, good Samaritan, did nothing on his own cabin. But, the noble bathroom is there, a monument to his self-denial.

August 27, 1990

Kate Cohen came with her boyfriend and we discussed their "home-sitting" at 12 Ledyard Lane and, more importantly, Kate's work as my copy-editor/assistant for JMGS. For once I hope I can delegate some work and not do everything myself.

August 28, 1990

To Kinhaven to hand over my presidential archives to John Austin. David Bury came too. He's upbeat re: the Kresge grant. More importantly, Chrysanthi and I visited Jerry and Nancy in their bereavement; Benjy died a few days ago. Found Jerry mowing the lawn. "It's good to mow the lawn," he said ruefully. He looked pale and tired. But Nancy managed a smile. We muttered appropriate consolations and learned about arrangements for a memorial service next Saturday.

Wednesday, August 29

Daphne's ticket is non-refundable. Chrysanthi decided to go after all.

We're frantically closing up because we've decided to leave three days early, in order (a) to go to Benjy's service and (b) to see Daphne and Greg in Hanover over Labor Day weekend. Lots of delay servicing the tractor because my antifreeze gauge was broken and I (erroneously) thought I had to keep strengthening the antifreeze concentration to prevent freezing over the winter.

Thursday, August 30, 1990

Drained the new water system for the first time. Irv came over and showed me good techniques for the toilet. The whole process is not too difficult, but I still feel very ambivalent about our capitulation to electricity and high-tech systems. The outhouse and hand pump have a solidity, an immemorial quality, that our new plumbing lacks.

Saturday, September 1, 1990

Hanover–Weston

Drove home last night with the car full of Kazantzakis letters that I'd never opened, and computers. Off to Weston this morning. The service was conducted by Ardis Chapman's husband, a minister. Half-programmed, half Quaker style, with impromptu testimonials. We all stood under Benjy's favorite tree, with the family facing and the rest in a semicircle. Rev. Chapman excellent—laconic, non-rhetorical. Readings were from the Psalms, emphasizing God's goodness despite everything—"Though I walk in the shadow of darkness"—and from Ecclesiasticus on "a time for living and a time for dying"—that is: everything, even tragedy, is "ordained." For the testimonies, Leander sent a tribute that I read for him, recounting his friendship with Benjy and the latter's sense of humor, and utter honesty about his feelings. Others spoke less formally, recounting dialogues and incidents. At the end, Jerry played an audiotape that Benjy had recorded of the Kinhaven students doing three Bach chorales. An honest, effective service, more a tribute to the parents, in a way, than to Benjy. And the attendance itself was such a tribute. Lots of staff came from afar, Charlie Hamlen came, lots of board members, friends from Bethlehem, etc.

Nice supper afterwards at Jesse's with Daphne, Greg, and Yiayia.

Sunday, September 2, 1990

Lunch at The Greens. Yiayia in fine fiddle. Meeting today was fine. I ministered à propos of Benjy's service recounting how I'd asked Nancy, at its conclusion, if she could feel, despite everything, that God was good. "I don't think so," she replied, "but I'll keep trying." Probably that "keep trying" is better than an untested, unwavering optimism.

September 4, 1990

Gamma gobulin shot for the trip. Dentist. Peter Armstrong re: foreign study possibilities at Anatolia. He was encouraging.

September 5, 1990

They'll allow me to keep my Baker study. But Sheehan will be in my office. Both Chrysanthi and I are frantically cleaning. Susan Tenney is preparing a final version of the Hypercard stacks for me to take to Australia.

September 6, 1990

Paul Buseck here, visiting Yiayia. He's an inquisitive, gentle soul. Wears a shaggy pigtail. As Peter Buseck says, "That's 1000 times better than drugs."

September 7, 1990

Managed to get to the opening of Ray Sobel's exhibition at AVA gallery. Remarkably "clean" and inventive reinterpretation of Greek myths, in cast iron and steel. Met Mary Scattergood there and had heart-to-heart talk. She feels Quakerism as utterly oppressive because of the family history.

September 8, 1990

David Bury finally sent part of the Kresge application. Sloppy in details, needing lots of editing. But, as he described it, "Strong without being rhetorical."

September 9, 1990

Chrysanthi picked up Elizabeth Ballard from Hanover Terrace. She can barely walk, poor thing. She spoke "thrice" in Meeting and we all thought of Henry Williams, who surely would have elderd her good-naturedly. Her first message was, "I'm 78 years old today and I still feel that I was put on this earth in order to do some good for others."

Supper with Trix and Chuck Officer at Dee's house. Nice to be with familiar friends. Last night we were at the Nodas, with David and Kesaya both home, and Audrey. Kesaya is beginning a Ph.D. in Shintoism at Harvard.

Tuesday, September 11, 1990

Again supper with the Nodas, an elaborate Japanese meal that made both of us slightly ill. Somehow, we've finished packing and the car is loaded.

Wednesday, September 12, 1990

Hanover-PH

Our ritual of breakfast out at the Polka Dot; then drove pleasantly to Philadelphia listening most of the way to St. Paul, read so meaningfully by Alexander Scourby. Romans I and II, Corinthians, Galatians. It's good to hear it all at once instead of chopped up into verses or just set pieces like I Cor. 13, which really has very little to do with all the rest. He repeats himself in order to reiterate that keeping the law is not what matters. What matters is belief, faith. In the best interpretation: what matters is an inner condition rather than an outward exhibition. The rest is his struggle to keep unruly groups together. The early Christians, it seems, were as bad as the later ones.

We settled into Room B in Main House, a large room with a private bath (for me). Books in place; desk ready. But Chrysanthi convinced me not to install a telephone.

Thursday, September 13, 1990

PH-NYC-Los Angeles

Breakfast with the new dean, John Anderson. Margery very friendly, as always. Left my videos for Rebecca. At Meeting it occurred to me that this was the last meaningful event before my trip, and that upon my return the first meaningful event would be, again, Meeting. I developed the analogy of the Meeting as a fishing boat letting out a net in which experiences were caught but then withdrawn back to the ship—to the Meeting—in order to be “processed.” Also, the ship/Meeting always mends the nets before they are cast out again. In this way, our lives are not merely linear but also circular.

Trinity Limousine to JFK over the Verrazano Bridge. What a soaring beauty! Daphne arrived at 5:30, driven in a Simon and Schuster company car. And so we parted with kisses and admonitions to be careful.

In LA, at the Avis desk, I realized that I'd deliberately left my driver's license home. Fool! But they gave me a car, illegally. Overnight in an unpleasant Comfort Inn on Santa Monica Boulevard.

September 14, 1990

Los Angeles

How beautiful Santa Monica is! Palm trees, Spanish architecture, perfect weather, an esplanade, endless beaches, smart shops. I drove along Lincoln Avenue to the J. Paul Getty Museum in Malibu. A transplanted Mediterranean villa with olive trees, terraced landscape, herb garden, vista of the sea. The Greek antiquities are fine; the paintings strike me as second tier with some notable exceptions: a wonderful Van Gogh “Iris,” an interesting Rembrandt Saint Bartholomew, and Millet's famous “Man with a Hoe.” There's a wonderful miniature Greek satyr in bronze; also a life-sized bronze athlete, one of few bronzes to survive more or less intact. I asked the attendant if Getty had left sufficient funds to maintain all this (the museum is free, and was creeping with groundskeepers and curators). “That's an understatement!” was her reply.

Drove then to Venice Beach to see the weirdos, as Daphne would say. Most people looked quite normal. Most memorable was a beggar or “bag-man” dressed in a bikini bathing suit, stopping to survey each trash can. He looked about 60 or 70 years old—a Californian gymnosophist. On “muscle beach,” yes, there was one perfectly built blond specimen in a g-string and an overall tan.

What most strikes me about L.A. is the Mexicans. They seem to hold all the menial jobs; blacks are not in evidence. And at the airport the lines for Air Mexicana were immense, with everyone exporting huge boxes of TVs and the like, similar to the scene at Korean Air when Alec left.

I finished Professor Grant’s second book, the one on Christianity from the death of Augustine to the death of Constantine. Too detailed for my taste. He was A. D. Nock’s student and tries to emulate the master, but doesn’t have Nock’s magisterial quality.

Sunday, September 16, 1990

Sydney–Adelaide

Fourteen hours via Qantas non-stop to Sydney. They give you ear plugs and an eye mask, and I slept rather well. Also, wrote a bit of my keynote address for the Sydney conference. Transferred to Ansett at Sydney airport at 8:00 a.m. Met at Adelaide airport by Leo Papademetre, who has turned gray in the five years since I last saw him but otherwise is happier than before, well-placed here in a lively department and a country house. We talked talked talked all morning, lunched, then drove down to the city center, which is both quaint and lovely. Parts look like the set of a western movie, parts like Fifth Avenue in New York, parts like London. Lots of green, parks, ponds. Arts Center, huge municipal library, museums, Adelaide University right in the middle of town. Then five kilometers to the sea, a kind of Lido with hotels, promenade, Luna Park, restaurants galore. Beautiful people, no slums, no homelessness. But there is crime. Leon double-locks his house and car.

All this I weathered splendidly, with practically no effect of jet lag, probably because of the feast-fast-feast-fast system I followed (more or less).

Monday, September 17, 1990

To Flinders, a beautiful campus on a green hill overlooking hills, city, and sea. Met Dimiroulis, the professor: young and energetic, a book collector who has amassed a significant library of MG books in less than two years. Wonderful what money, efficiency, and perseverance will accomplish. Also met Dimitris Kapsalis, a “reader” for Kollaros/Estia, trained in lit crit at Georgetown, who is here temporarily on a fellowship. Will send him my Kazantzakis book in hopes for publication of a translation. Lunch in spacious faculty club (ah! what they did to us at Dartmouth!). Some time by myself in their library. Then my lecture on Kazantzakis’s Religious Vision, to a reasonable audience. Some good questions. But never really on the central issue I was discussing.

Tuesday, September 18, 1990

Chris Fifis at La Trobe wants me to do Ritsos’s Painterly Technique tomorrow. Changed Ansett flight to an earlier one: 6:25 a.m. Today to the College of Advanced Education downtown with Paul Hellander as host. He’s a Norwegian who settled in the UK, finished at B’ham, came out here, married a Greek woman who insisted on returning to Tasmania with their children. He does classes on translation and interpreting; teaches students not only to translate properly but to format their translations on the Macintosh, to reproduce the original. Very practical work for future jobs in the social service sector. Met Κυριάκος, an older man who fought in the Αντίσταση, finished Φιλοσοφική Σχολή Θεσσαλονίκης, διορίστηκε, and ended up here to join his family. Teaches Greek language and literature. Reunion with Paul Tuffin, remarried with a new family, now working for the state government developing uniform testing procedures for languages. Hellander gave me lots of computer software: Greek fonts, a complete Macintosh system in Greek, laser drivers, etc. Lunch at a Greek restaurant. I gave my talk on Cavafy’s Alexandrian cycle, which was supposed to be for beginners but turned out to be for an audience including people like Καψάλης, so I was a bit embarrassed at the introductory nature of the talk. Large audience. Afterwards walked downtown to Greek restaurant where we feasted with about twenty people as guests of the students. A lively bunch. They want to set up a world-wide Association of Greek Students, have exchanges, etc.

Wednesday, September 19, 1990

Adelaide–Melbourne

Up at 5:00 a.m. to catch 6:25 flight. Met at airport by Chris Fifis and another familiar face. He drove me to La Trobe where immediately I encountered Loukia (now Lucy) Aloneftis, who is their secretary now. Big hug! Immediate questions: “How is Daphne doing with her violin?” “She doesn’t play any more.” Consternation. I try to explain. Also why Chrysanthi didn’t come. I’ve discovered a good reason: If she visited Alec in Indonesia she would in effect by that act somehow bequeath legitimacy to his residence there, whereas by refusing to visit she’s saying in effect that his residence is temporary and abnormal and of course displeasing to her. Maybe I’m right. Others there: Μίμης Σοφοκλέους, Τάμης, και φυσικά ο Παύλος Ανδρόνικος. I did “Ritsos’s Painterly Technique.” Not much discussion, but some. Lunch in Faculty Club with the Dean of Humanities, whom of course they want to impress with their international visitor. Pavlos drove me back. He’s mellow and more settled, writing poetry, trying to develop a semi-independent program at Monash. My motel is in Lygon Street—very familiar. Lovely reunion with Stathis Gauntlet and John Burke, also Scott, whose office I had occupied. John Martyn was away in Portugal. Too bad. His son Simon, the one who was defective, has died, I was told. Michael Osborne is now vice-chancellor at La Trobe. They’re happy to be rid of him. John Burke in front of his Macintosh. It’s fun to see everyone with Mac-Pluses. I gave them my Hypercard program and received various software packages in return, especially from Pavlos and of course yesterday from Hellander. Robin Jackson was lecturing but I skipped this, having been active since 5:00 a.m., treated myself to a Malaysian meal in Lygon Street, and sleep.

Thursday, September 20, 1990

Carlton

Work in the Uni’s library. Such a nice environment. Lunch with Stathis and John. Supper with Stathis, Anna Hatsinikolaou, the one who’d come to Ithaca and lost her luggage last spring, and Dimitris ?, who’d been a student here in ’83 and is now an assistant lecturer. I lectured on the Re-emergence of Prose in John Vasilikakos’s course; small audience but a good one. Stathis reminded me about Korais’s Ο Παπατρέχας, which I’d omitted. To a pub for some beers afterwards, with John. Good, easy, relaxed conversation.

Friday, September 21, 1990

Carlton

Re-did my Cavafy in order to incorporate Greek texts. Lunch again with Stathis, trying to convince him of certain omissions in his draft constitution for the new association. Didn’t get far. Robin Jackson came over to say hello. Married and a father. Then we sat with the department: Peter Connor, some new ones, Scott, Roger Just. In Modern Greek, everyone knows everyone else, internationally, which is so nice. Talked at 4:15 on Cavafy and homosexuality. Large crowd this time, people standing in the aisles. Good questions. Afterwards, drinks in Staff House. Met a bookseller who imports Greek books. Lively fellow, Διονύσης Μυλωνάς, a bit obnoxious. Discussion about why Demotic Greek I has been virtuously dropped by schools here. More chance to get to know Roger Just, the anthropologist. Then most of us went downtown to the Malaysian restaurant with a stunningly beautiful waitress like a miniature doll with perfect features, complexion, posture.

Saturday, September 22, 1990

Carlton

To translators' conference with Stathis. People doing Aboriginal texts, Romanian, Russian, etc., as well as French and German. A Romanian playwright complained that actors changed his lines. Not much sympathy from the crowd. I was asked to speak about the situation in America. Some of them thought that translation was thriving there as compared to Australia. I disabused them of this fantasy.

Lunch in a Malaysian restaurant in Lygon Street; repeated the delicious spinach but not the waitress. Then Pavlos Andronikos came to bring me home to his family for tea, after a quick look at the Suleimann the Magnificent exhibit downtown; everything from Topkapi Palace's collection, and somewhat familiar to me. There was a festival of Turkish dancing too; lots of Turks now in Melbourne. Pavlos has a lovely British wife, Angelica, and three sweet children: Niki, Roberta, and Kimon. Roberta, only 6, types long documents on the computer and reads like a high school student. Remarkable. It was a lovely household swarming with the children's friends in and out. Angelica stopped working in order to be a mother. Pavlos demonstrated to me the computer programs and synthesizer he uses to compose songs. They are called "Deluxe Music Construction Set" (Electronic Arts) and "Performer" (Mark of the Unicorn). Basically, they enable him to produce a written score of what he composes, and also to compose one line at a time, hear it, add to it, subtract, alter, etc. It is terrific. I've written to Leander à propos. But poor Pavlos is still struggling academically; hasn't finished his doctorate and is non-tenured, and rather bitter.

Sunday, September 23, 1990

What a day! Bev and Dennis Dorwick picked me up in the morning and we drove to the Quaker Meeting in Toorak. How cold they were, compared to all the Greeks! But friendly in their own way, I suppose. In the introductions after Meeting I of course mentioned my association with Pendle Hill. Afterwards a woman, Kathryn Officer, I believe, told me at length how meaningful her sojourn there had been, how “healing.” It’s wonderful how a more-or-less sick organization like PH can nevertheless appear to function healthily.

Then Nikos Aloneftis came and drove me to the northern suburbs to dine with Lucy and their children, George and Peter. Nikos, as in 1983, embittered and frustrated, only more so. Trained as a lawyer in Cyprus, he was reduced to teaching Greek and legal studies when the Turkish invasion forced the family to migrate to Australia. He has a dim view of the Australian secondary school system, as do many others. Says that teachers feel trapped, unstimulated, etc. by students who care nothing for education. But laws have changed, enabling him to receive more credit for his previous training, and he hopes to qualify as a solicitor in Australia. The boys are charming. George is a first-year student in medical school. He was very curious about the USA. As usual, I was stuffed with food and had to beg Lucy to stop. The back yard is Grecian in its tropical lushness: apricot, lemon, and peach trees; swimming pool even. Nice family; communicative children who don’t seem alienated or bored with adults.

Nikos then drove me to the Archiepiscopate in Dorcas Street to see Stylianos. He was in good form, despite a headache. Also present was Bishop Ezekial, a lovely, gentle man, Stylianos’s first appointed bishop. Immediately we telephoned Vouli in Thessaloniki. She reported that Daphne and Chrysanthi have had a nice visit, staying in Aghia Triadha, visiting Bruce and Tad in Metamorphosis, the Drapers in the Farm School, etc. At that moment, Daphne was at the airport for her return flight. No strikes, thank goodness.

Regarding Stylianos’s poems: the selection of 100 was made by Pentzikis, not Stylianos. I have Stylianos’s permission to include others or to exclude. We’ll explore Leros Press in Canberra as a possible publisher, but he’d prefer Paintbrush if that works out. I tried to explore the difficulty between Stylianos and the Department of Greek at Sydney. He grew very heated. It seems to boil down to Michael Jeffreys' refusal to hire Pieris and his general neglect of Modern Greek literature as opposed to Renaissance and Byzantine. Έχει μια σειρά ανθρωπάκια, λέει. Stylianos is particularly chagrined because he feels that his original support of Jeffreys was crucial in Jeffreys being chosen as professor and that there had been a promise that MG would be fully represented. Stylianos now adamantly refuses contact, even though Jeffreys has repeatedly invited him to the conference next week. For similar reasons, Stylianos doesn't want to come to America, because he finds Archbishop Iakovos "disgusting" and could not pretend to be friendly. Stylianos is of course fascinated with words in their own right, their etymologies, original meanings. He's doing poems on individual words. . . . Then we all drove to another suburb, Fawkner, to the inauguration of the Fourth State Youth Conference with the theme Παιδιά σήμερα, γονείς αύριο. Stylianos was enthroned in full regalia during a short service, sweating and obviously very uncomfortable. But the reception afterward was rather joyous. I was impressed by how friendly the parishioners seemed to be with their priests, so different from Greece. Then, of course, Stylianos made me speak. I told him that any time I'm with him βρίσκω τον μελά μου. I said something like this: Σχετικά με το θέμα σας, παιδιά σήμερα γονείς αύριο, σκεφτόμουνα πόσο είμουν τυχερός που παντρεύτηκε μιαν Ελληνίδα, που μεγάλωσε με τόση μητρική στοργή τρία ωραία παιδιά [applause] και βάσταξε ο γάμος ως τώρα τριάντα-πέντε χρόνια [laughter] που, ξέρετε, είναι λίγο δύσκολο στις συνθήκες της Αμερικής. Σκεφτόμουνα επίσης το μεσημεριανό φαγητό σήμερα που τρώγαμε κοιτάζοντας τρία πουλιά σε κλουβί. Έμαθα ότι οι δύο ήταν οι γονείς που γέννησαν πρόσφατα το πουλάκι τους. Έμαθα πόσο θαύμασαν οι κάτοικοι του σπιτιού αυτού τη στοργή της μητέρας και τη συμπεράσταση του πατέρα. Εμείς οι άνθρωποι καυχιόμαστε συχνά ότι είμαστε ανώτεροι από τα ζώα, ότι έχουμε ψυχή. Ωστόσο σας λέω ότι τα ζώα είναι συχνά πιο ανθρώπινα από τους ανθρώπους. Όσοι θα γίνουν γονείς, ας λοιπόν μιμηθούνε τα ζώα. Lots of nice conversations after this, including one with a Κύριος Παπαδόπουλος whom I'd met in 1983 and who reminded me that he was the first to introduce Demotic Greek I as a text in the Melbourne extension division. He doesn't use it now because it's seldom that the students are beginners needing the oral-aural method. Also long talk with the outgoing Greek consul in Melbourne—being transferred to Germany—who had a very low opinion of Australians as uncivilized brutes incredibly ignorant about the rest of the world.

Meanwhile we'd been joined by John and Mary Vasilakakos. They have a baby now and another on the way. Ioannis is stuck in Australia permanently, he now feels, whereas seven years ago he still dreamed of settling in Greece. His play Η ταυτότητα ran over 100 performances in Melbourne. But I doubt that he'll do much more; he doesn't seem sufficiently driven. We all adjourned to the home of the local priest: Yiayia, seven children, one girl recently married, with her husband, two other priests, the bishop, Stylianos, Vasilakakides, and myself. Again, what a lovely atmosphere, with the blessings, the easy, gracious conversation, the compliments on the food (κοκορέτσι!!). And such a strange feeling in church, earlier, with 20-odd priests present, the archbishop, the bishop, the full-throated ψάλτης. Was I in Australia? In Byzantium? The coziness, the security of all this is marvelous. As is, of course, the language of the Ακολουθία that was sung, e.g.: Τῆ Ὑπερμάχῳ Στρατηγῶ τὰ νικητήρα, ὡς λυτρωθεῖσα τῶν δεινῶν εὐχαριστήρια, ἀναγράφω σοι ἡ πόλις σου, Θεοτόκε (To thee, the Champion Leader, do I, thy City, ascribe thank-offerings for victory, for Thou, Mother of God, have delivered me from terrors.) Δόξα σοι τῷ δείξαντι τὸ φῶς (Glory to thee, who hast shown forth the light) Ελεήμων γὰρ καὶ φιλόανθρωπος θεὸς ὑπάρχεις καὶ Σοὶ τὴν δόξα ἀναπέμπομεν, τῷ Πατρὶ καὶ τῷ Υἱῷ καὶ τῷ Ἁγίῳ Πνεύματι, νῦν καὶ ἀεὶ καὶ εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνες τῶν αἰῶνων (For Thou art a merciful God and lovest mankind, and to Thee do we send up all Glory: to the Father and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit, both now and ever and to the ages of ages). Ἀμήν. Back to Lygon Street at 11:30 p.m. A full day.

Monday, September 24, 1990

Melbourne–Sydney

Taxi to airport. Long conversation with the cabbie re: crisis in Iraq, which is hardly reported in Aussie news compared to sports. Met at Sydney airport by Michael Jeffreys and spent the rest of the day at the Jeffreys' home with Elizabeth and their daughter Catherine. Shortened my Reemergence lecture. Lots of talk about the situation in Sydney and hopes for the conference. Telephoned Daphne easily via ATT card. She was back in the office and reported a good stay, mostly at Αγία Τριάδα with Lola and Costas, swimming. George very depressed and peculiar. They had to invite themselves to a meal. Daphne thinks he's greatly in debt and can't extricate himself. Chrysanthi doing well. Daphne said that lots of her Greek came back.

Tuesday, September 25, 1990

Sydney

To the university. Found George Markus immediately. He told me about their tragedy: son George, Jr. who'd just finished a Ph.D. in philosophy, hit his head in a soccer game, was in a coma for 2½ months, and emerged with severe, permanent brain damage. Impaired vision, practically no speech, inability to walk and go to toilet, a semi-vegetable. We'll have supper together tomorrow. Today I gave my Reemergence lecture at 11:10 to a small audience, mostly of staff. Then lunch, then my Painterly Technique at 2:00. Alf Vincent asked if I'd submit it to Yofiri and I guess I'm trapped. Alf still neurotically withdrawn. He and Michael have a modus vivendi but no real friendship or intellectual camaraderie (same with Stathis and John Burke).

Wednesday, September 26, 1990

Blue Mountains

Excursion with Michael to the Blue Mountains, a two-hour drive. There's a huge canyon, like our Grand Canyon. We went to Govett's Leap, a high waterfall, and walked down to an overlook partly down the canyon. Then for cappuccino in Hydro Majestic Hotel, in Medlow Bath, an Edwardian gilt-edged curiosity on the edge of a cliff, former spa now full of Japanese honeymooners. Then to Hartley, a town developed in the mid-nineteenth century chiefly to prosecute recaptured convicts who had succeeded in crossing the Blue Mountains. Sandstone courthouse à la Doric temple. English-style churches and cottages. A curiosity. Finally to the Paragon Restaurant in Katoomba, a former tearoom, very beautifully paneled. I've been overeating scandalously, have already gained five pounds since leaving the farm. Michael was last there with Bryer, so it's a sort of ritual for foreign visitors. Lastly to an outlook to see parrots in the wild. Saw some parrots, but many more Japanese.

Then to George and Maria Markus for supper. They introduced me to the invalid son, who smiled and grunted. He was watching television. He's totally blind in one eye and has 35% vision in the other. He can apparently play cards very well, and chess very badly (he used to be a whiz). Then they closed the doors and left him in front of the television. I didn't see him again. Later, the other son came for dinner and afterwards put George to bed, helping his mother. Their lives are completely controlled by this tragedy. One or the other parent must always be at home, and both have professional lives. George has given up research since he cannot now go to Germany, where his materials are. But they all plan to go to Hungary next year, George, Jr. included. No desire, however, to resettle there permanently. George has been reinstated in the Academy but Marxists are not now in favor of course. What a sad, tragic life! We spoke of our meeting in Haverford (probably 1985), twenty years after our first meeting at Dartmouth, when I chaperoned him when he came to speak to Great Issues. To cap everything, his office at the university was set on fire by an arsonist, and he lost valuable books. All of us who have escaped these vicissitudes of fate, politics, etc., and have children uninjured, surviving, productive, happy, are so fortunate.

Thursday, September 27, 1990

Another full, eventful day. In the morning I was interviewed by Βάσω Μόραλη, a young journalist from EPT in Athens, serving in Sydney for a year, for a Sydney Greek newspaper. Pleased at my Greek, which is serviceable if I'm not tired. Then Stylianos's deacon picked me up and took me to Redfern to the Archiepiscopate. I hate the obeisance that surrounds Stylianos—υποκλίσεις—and so does he, I believe (does he?). Again, I asked if he'd relent and make an appearance at the conference. No way! Out came the same complaints, that they're Marxists, that they trash Το άξιον εστί, saying that it has no relation to the Church, that they underplay modern literature, that they refused to employ Pieris, and then he revealed that he knew I'd voted against Pieris when I vetted the dissertation! So much for confidentiality. (Jeffreys told me later that he'd given my appraisal to Pieris—stupid! No name, but the spelling made clear that it was an American. By process of elimination he determined that I was the culprit. This was why he was absent when I lectured in Crete. Too bad. Maybe he would have been the best person, after all.) We went off in a chauffeured car to a ferociously expensive fish restaurant on the shore, owned by a Greek. I started speaking Greek to the waiter without looking at him. All laughed, since he was Chinese. Lovely lunch: oysters, soup, fish, chocolate cake. Stylianos very pleased with St Andrew's Theological College, which he has set up, with ordaining priests and elevating them to bishoprics, etc. But he won't step inside the Modern Greek Department at the University of Sydney. The deacon, driving me back after we returned for coffee and a tour of the theological college, told me that he's taking a correspondence course from Arrendell to improve his Greek, because Stylianos forbids him to register next door at the university. Κρίμα και ντροπή!

I had just enough time to go over my talk once more, then walked to Sancta Sophia College for the conference. Leo there of course, and Δημηρούλης, and lots of others I'd seen on this trip or the previous one. Supper in hall. Then my Keynote Address on the MGSA and what lessons we can learn from its successes and failures. The Greek consul-general in the front row seemed to listen intently. Jeffreys told me that when the conference was organized the consul was furious because of the decision to bring me instead of a Greek from Athens. I hope I proved to him the logicity of the choice.

Friday, September 28, 1990

Conference all day. Ansett air strike prevented Stathis and John from coming to Melbourne, but otherwise the attendance and spirit were fine. Initial session on the constitution resulted in Michael, Pavlos, Toula, and me being appointed a drafting committee to produce an improvement over Stathis's draft. Then we all trooped in a convoy across Sydney to the consul's palatial house—disgusting!—for a reception. Long talk with a sweet girl, Patricia, I think, a Greek-Australian who spent a year in Thessaloniki doing Cavafy under Παναγιώτης Μουλλάς. Also nice chat with Αντώνης Δρακόπουλος. Then back across Sydney to the Cretan Club, an extensive premises with bar, slot machines, dining room, dance floor. This is typical here. They dined us for free, very nicely. Heavy, delicious food. Good talk with Toula, a “character” who does adult education, mostly English to foreigners, and loves it. How women especially—Yugoslavs, Greeks, etc., after 20–30 years in the home raising children—have “come out” and want to learn English finally. Tired, somewhat inebriated, our drafting committee moved off to another table to finish the constitution. My idea of a nominating committee was adopted, among others. Tired. To bed.

Saturday September 29, 1990

Sydney

Final day of the conference. Toula chaired the constitutional session with massive authority (she told me she learned it in the labor movement), getting our draft approved despite some attempt to amend it. Phew! Then we proceeded to implement it, first with elections to the Executive Committee, a session that I ran, then with the formation of working groups: bibliography, computers, conferences, newsletter, journal, teaching materials, Greek–Australian literature, etc. And, while my back was turned, tabulating results on the blackboard, Elizabeth nominated me as the new association's first Honorary Member. Extraordinary. And also nice, these days, to have people say that they read my writings, especially the ones in Greek, on Cavafy, Kazantzakis, Ritsos. They are occasionally even set texts in courses. But Demotic Greek I is no longer used, it seems. But there was great interest in my Hypercard stacks for Greek drills, demonstrated before 15–20 people. I left copies here and in Melbourne.

So, the conference accomplished its objective. The Modern Greek Studies Association of Australia and New Zealand now exists. I told them that I hope they can look back in 2010 with as much satisfaction on their first 20 years as we were able to in America after our first 20 years.

Across the city again, this time to the Kastelorizo Club, equally resplendant, for a press conference with Βάσω and others. Again, we spoke at length; she recounted her experiences with Stylianos's obstinacy and narrowness in various areas. Then Leo, Toula, Diane (an American living in New Zealand) and I went to a fancy fish restaurant for a leisurely dinner and good talk. I said I'd be leaving Sydney without seeing the Opera House. So Toula kindly drove to Circular Quay and toured downtown a bit. I find Sydney generally ugly and congested compared to Melbourne, but Markus says it's the only place to live in Australia. The three cities I visited were small–medium–large. Adelaide is beautiful but restricted. Melbourne is just right, for my taste.

Sunday, September 30, 1990

Sydney–Singapore

To Sydney Friends Meeting downtown. Meeting House built in 1903. Five people attended a decade ago; now 50 and growing, as the city center is rebuilt and attracts people again. A lovely quiet. The clerk quoted John Punshon afterwards. And a lady, talking to me about the Pendle Hill pamphlets, said she particularly enjoyed the one about the author—you know—the same one that did Zorba the Greek. I revealed my identity as the author and she asked for three more copies. Nice. A pleasant group. I feared the Meeting would be moribund, but it clearly is not.

To the airport. Fond goodbyes to Elizabeth and Michael, with mutual thanks. I enjoyed them. Michael is a worry wart and a bit of the nervous type apt to fly into a rage over a trifle. Elizabeth controls him masterfully. She's the more gifted, clearly, and he knows it. They've made a good relationship out of a situation potentially disastrous.

Monday, October 1, 1990

Jakarta

Overnight last night at Sea View Hotel, half way between Changi airport and downtown Singapore, so I never saw the city. But the airport is spectacular, putting us to shame: huge halls, fountains, potted plants, amenities such as showers . . . And the drive into the city is lined by parks on both sides, not used car lots, as in Queens. This morning I arrived in Jakarta. Temperature 95° F. (34° C.) but it's really no different from Philadelphia in the summer. I was reasonably comfortable. Alec looking fine—healthy and vibrant. We spent the morning touring. It's a national holiday: Pancasila Sanctity Day, celebrating the "national ideology" that prevailed over the communist coup in 1965 and previously against the Dutch colonizers in 1945. We went to the National Monument. Lots of people, mostly young. One-hour wait to go to the top, so we skipped that. But we went to the huge lower hall that has a series of dioramas depicting Indonesian history from prehistoric times to the late 1960s. A series of aborted insurrections against the Dutch, who obviously don't get very good press here; then occupation by the Japanese; then independence; then communist coup in 1965 and its suppression, leading to the present dictatorship of Suharto. A refreshing mineral water outside in the shade. Then to the city's industrial fair, the Indonesia pavilion, which exhibited not only various handicrafts but also actual craftsmen demonstrating their skills. Saw actual shadow theater puppets and talked with a girl in that booth: how the puppet theater is chiefly for weddings and festivals. The characters look very much like Καραγκιόζης and his crew. From there we went to a hotel for lunch. (Alec had played cocktail music here last Saturday, filling in for the usual violinist.) He's wanting to show me how "civilized" the city is. Indeed, it has many Western features, but generally is a hodge-podge without unity. Then we drove around wealthy neighborhoods with huge mansions, all nouveau riche ostentation. Then to Jakarta International School, which was mostly deserted because of the holiday. An excellent campus with tennis courts, swimming pool, a huge gym, outdoor cafeteria, arts center with two theaters. All new and very manicured. Indonesian servants everywhere, cleaning, watering the plants. We spoke with one who'd been seventeen years with the school and loves to work overtime. The people here have beautiful open smiles and are extraordinarily friendly. Finally, Alec took me to the supermarket where he shops: exactly like an American one, with many of the same products but also dried fish, etc. that we don't have. Spotless and hygienic. Then home to Alec's house, which is huge, and beautiful. He has a self-contained apartment with bedroom, bath, and study. Andy has a similar apartment. There are two living rooms, a dining room, porches, gardens front and back, and servants' quarters. Watti left; there is a new couple. I showered—how lovely! And rested a bit in my air-conditioned bedroom. At 6:30 guests arrived for a dinner party: (1) an old woman, recently retired, widow, her late husband a businessman, descended from a Sumatran king; they lived abroad, years in Holland, Japan, etc.; she taught Dutch at JIS; now substitutes; a compulsive talker, with fluent English, but interesting; she brought a gift for Chrysanthi. (Someone else sent a huge bouquet of flowers for me; someone else Chinese sweets. Alec's friends are gracious.) (2) and (3) a couple: wife teaches Indonesian and French, husband is professor at Jakarta University specializing in systems for infrastructure at the village level: drainage, water supply, transportation, etc. They, too, like the older woman, are cosmopolitan Indonesians with experience in the Netherlands. (4) a young man, a violinist who'd just returned from the International Youth Orchestra Camp in Kuala Lumpur. Of Arab background, I think. He removed his shoes at the door. Complained that the British in the orchestra were very snobbish. We talked about racism. The older woman felt that the JIS children look down on Indonesians, whom they encounter of course as drivers and servants, not as equals. "We are their hosts," she vociferated, "and we're just as good as them." Andy joined us later; he'd gone to Pizza Hut with his Indonesian girlfriend. (Why doesn't Alec have a girlfriend, native or foreign?) Nice conversation with Alec and the violinist after the others had left.

Telephoned Travel Dynamics. The trip is still going forward, despite State Department warnings to Americans about possible terrorism in Europe. Alec telephoned Chrysanthi at Lola's. She was very emotional. We really miss each other. She'd just been to lunch with Lena Daskopoulou. Never received any mail from me because there's a postal strike (also garbage, buses, hotel workers). Says she wants to go home. So do

I, but the blasted cruise is still scheduled, with about fifty people. And I still have two lectures to write.

Tuesday, October 2, 1990

Jakarta

Alec gets up at 5:30 a.m. I was given until 7:00. Servant laid out breakfast. Driver came to bring me to school. Immediately saw the older lady from last night and the young teacher of Indonesian and even the cleaning woman. Nice to be familiar. Alec set up a day-long schedule for me. Started by meeting Constantine and Diane Georgiades, she an Ohio farm girl (“I grew up haying and castrating pigs”), he a Samiot who’s doing a Ph.D. in history at Ohio State. They met in East Africa. He read Kazantzakis appreciatively in the 1960s, told me that Kazantzakis was neither far right nor far left, and that was so refreshing when everyone else was polarized. I convinced him to join MGSA. Then to Alec’s 7th grade English class. Students from Holland, Brunei, USA, UK, Hong Kong, Philippines. The children had written riddles as an exercise in perception. They each described a favorite food but kept its identity secret. Today they trooped off to a primary school class where each of Alec’s students read his riddle out loud and the smaller children were asked to “solve” the puzzle. And they did very well indeed. They speak English clearly, with total ease, although in many cases their first language is of course something else. And both classes were so totally attentive, disciplined, bright-eyed.

Next: to high school strings rehearsal. Vivaldi and Bach. All these beautiful oriental faces, plus a few Anglo-Saxon ones. Alec gave them some exercises in bow control, simultaneity, etc. Then they began, sight-reading, as I learned later. Under Alec’s useful direction, a raggedy Vivaldi became a much more controlled Vivaldi forty minutes later.

Then to another section of English. Students this time from Holland, Yugoslavia, UK, Canada, USA, Brunei, Philippines, but most had lived in four or five countries, e.g., Kenya, Saudi Arabia, etc. A different world from Hanover. They had a good discussion of the contrived elements (i.e., unconvincing bits of characterization and plotting) in the novel they were assigned. Then they were turned loose to question me on my career as a writer. This they did intelligently and sweetly. Did I rhyme rhymed poetry? Wasn’t I bored doing page after page? How long did a novel take? Could I translate from English into Greek?

Along the way, I met with Diana Kerry, Alec’s close friend. She does drama. Then lunch devoured in the midst of a Middle School faculty meeting, held fortnightly, in which teachers raise problems with administration, pedagogy, etc. Then quickly to Middle School orchestral rehearsal, this time Haydn's Surprise Symphony, again produced with increasing precision in tempo and intonation owing to Alec's energetic direction. At the end he switched to a Schubert piece and I played the piano part on the school's new Yamaha upright. Alec is obviously a very good conductor/coach at this level, and he told me that he loves this part of his job exceedingly.

Then home for a wash and short rest. Back to school for my lecture: Thoughts on Literacy Past and Present, the Beebe lecture adjusted a bit to focus on secondary rather than tertiary education. Luckily in the teachers' meeting earlier today they had distributed some statements of goals, all of which were oriented toward "truth" rather than power; this enabled me to "personalize" the lecture. Lots of questions at the end, starting with one from the headmaster, John Magagna, about the literacy crisis in the US. Afterwards, people told me that the lecture was a tonic because they have so little stimulation from the outside at JIS, Jakarta being off the "circuit" for just about everything.

We then went to Magagna's home, palatial, of course, for drinks, hors d'oeuvres (including venison he'd brought back from Pennsylvania), and a nice dinner, Western style, ending with ice cream and strawberries. His young Korean wife, pregnant when I saw her in NYC, now has two children, very sweet and beautiful. Other guests: Mr. and Mrs. Solomon, he a former Deerfield master, she a vivacious Brahmin educated at Smith, I believe. Her father in India has the task of rewriting all the English-language schoolbooks after independence, to make them reflect Indian, not British, reality. Another couple, Scotch, the man with a thick brogue, in the oil industry, the wife a teacher at JIS. He said Indonesia's resources are enormous, not only oil, coffee, and rubber, but tea, rice, copper, tin, coal, etc. Magagna told me how highly Alec was esteemed by Tom Wood, and also by the relevant principal at JIS. He's a born, gifted teacher. He's also almost unique in his success in penetrating the native culture, something that I've been witnessing, of course. How long will he stay? From speaking to others, I conclude that six or seven years is about maximum. The headmaster himself is leaving after seven years. He said what bothered him most was having nowhere to go and nothing to do on weekends, except the office, because of his inability to penetrate the local culture.

At 8:00 p.m. the day was not yet over. We got in the car and went searching for the house of Ibu Tiwi, a rich Indonesian woman whose parents had been in the IMF in Washington and who had graduated at an American high school. She is an expert on gamelan music and traditional dancing; she trained as a dancer herself, starting at age 5. After some difficulty Alec calling other JIS teachers in the neighborhood to his assistance, we found her and drove clear across town to see the Ubiyang Orang, traditional dancing, in a small, almost empty theater. Gamelan orchestra in the pit: gongs of all sizes, dulcimer-like instruments, flute. The “show” is a combination of oratorio, drama, opera, and dance. Narrator, singers, dancers male and female. We arrived during an interval in which four clowns were lounging on stage cracking jokes, all with painted masks. Then the drama resumed. Ibu Tiwi explaining it to both of us since the language was Javanese dialect (Java is pronounced Jawa here). Basically: good guys vs. bad guys. Bad guys want to molest a good girl. Her brothers react. Both sides appear before a guru who questions the motives of each. Then a series of danced battles in each of which the good guy downs the bad. Costumes extraordinary, all gold, intricate design. Huge head-gear, masks, skin powdered to appear white. Boys effeminate; girls impersonating boys. But also some gorilla-like men with long scraggly hair (wigs, of course). The guru done comically: half-clown. Gamelan players have no music; they improvise, as do the actors, to some degree, over a predetermined template, as in jazz. Each night there’s a different story, in repertoire. Dancers are paid about US $3.00 a day. Part of their training, from childhood, is to bend the fingers backwards unnaturally in a curve; this gives extraordinary grace to the gestures, which are so important. Torrential rain for ½ hour or so while we were inside. This is the pattern of the rainy season, which will begin in a few weeks and last into December.

Indonesians, from what I’ve seen, are extraordinarily gracious, with huge smiles. They are also very quiet people. Alec says he’s never heard anyone screaming at anyone else. No φωνακλάδες here. In other respects, however, the entire scene is so completely reminiscent of the Greece I knew in the 1950s and 1960s. . . . Home at 11:30. To bed!

I’ve said nothing about food. We ate “Sate” at the hotel and also at Alec's dinner party last night: meat and chicken on skewers, with pungent sauce, and rice. Hors d'oeuvres of bean sprouts and other vegetables immersed in chicken soup, with spicy pepper sauce spread on top. Delicious.

Wednesday, October 3, 1990

Jakarta-mountains-Singapore

Another rich day. Although my stay in Jakarta will have been ridiculously short (I've been told this repeatedly), I've probably done more in 2½ days than many visitors do in a fortnight. Today Alec and I drove north on the new toll road to the volcanic mountains, about one hour away only. First, near the summit, we stopped to see tea plantations, stretching beautifully in all directions, often on almost vertical slopes. Then we found a group of peasants harvesting the tea leaves and stopped. A beautiful, vivacious girl of about 17 explained how they pick only the leaves at the very top, the new, fresh, tender ones. The older, more brittle ones are avoided. They grab the leaves in clumps, fistfuls, and dump them into large wicker baskets. The leaves are then baked in an oven, processed through a machine, and packed for shipping. The plants produce for five years, then must be cut down, and the field replanted. Alec took a nice photo of me with her, wearing her hat. When I reached into her basket my finger encountered a razor-sharp knife and cut it, but we applied alcohol and antiseptic. Then we continued up another steep mountain to a European compound: country villas for Phillips and other industries, and JIS's cabin, actually a deluxe country villa that sleeps eight. Perched at the very top of a crag. Clear air. Coolness. View of terraced rice fields, volcanic peaks. The caretaker, Alec's friend, greeted us with the typical broad smile. We then followed him to his village, a ½ mile away. This is the other side of Indonesia. Poverty, but community, dignity, tranquility. No streets once you leave the main road. No electricity. Narrow paths following the water channels, which were full and racing. These, by a system of sluices going to each family's plot, flood the rice fields. By closing the sluice the field is then drained while the rice matures. We then left even these paths, passed a house (they have rattan walls, dirt floors, tin roofs) with old grandfather in a fez, toothless, a grandma minding the baby, continued on the narrow strips of raised ground, a considerable distance, to our guide's cottage. Kerosene stove, no chairs; they eat on mats, cross-legged. His daughter was there and grandmother and grandfather. His wife works as a servant for Japanese in Jakarta. It started to rain, and the oldsters hurried and gathered up the sheaves of rice that had been laid out to dry, putting them under cover. It's chiefly a barter economy. One rice field feeds them; the others are used to trade for needs. No money is exchanged. When the rice plants are pulled up, he does need money (almost US $5.00) to rent a water buffalo and driver for a day to plough under the old plants. He showed us rice in various stages of readiness: four months to harvest, two months, and post-harvest. He had an umbrella in the house, so we formed an unlikely procession on the way back, with me as honored guest under the umbrella and the others behind, hoping not to slip in the mud. Saw a coffee tree with branches hanging over the lane and a solo bean.

We then had a quiet lunch of sandwiches in the car, parked on another back road, watching children returning from school. Then drove directly to the Soeharto-Hatta airport. It was a good visit, short and very sweet. I can see now that Alec has a normal, interesting, useful existence, with a remarkable relationship to the host country. He told me, for example, of a school servant (there are hordes of them, drivers, guards, gardeners, cleaners, an assistant in every classroom, busboys, etc. in the cafeteria, dressed in black bow ties) burned her face in boiling water and just disappeared. No one cared or noticed. But Alec inquired, found she'd gone to a miserable local witch doctor, and personally escorted her to the Western clinic used by the expats. I felt best not to query him about future plans, but from his own conversation two things seem clear: (a) he's not going to stay here forever, (b) he's not going to return home next year. He spoke about returning for 1991-92.

Sitting now in the extraordinary hall of Singapore's Changi airport. Planes going to Moscow, Bangkok, Penang, Kuala Lumpur, Dakar. Lovely Singapore Airlines hostesses much in evidence, in their parti-colored gowns, tight bodices, slit in the front. Arabs and Japanese much in evidence plus Africans, Chinese of course, and lots of European types. Each day the newspaper speaks of Iraqi preparations for terrorist acts against Americans, and yet we are going ahead with this inane and unnecessary cruise. Chrysanthi and I will both feel immense relief when we touch ground at JFK on October 18th.

Thursday, October 4, 1990

Athens–Istanbul

Arrived Athens around 4:00 a.m. local time after an uneventful flight of about twelve hours. Athens airport a shambles, especially compared to Singapore. As the porter in the men's room said when I asked if there weren't a plug for electric razors, "Τι λες, βρε; Οι προεστώμενοι, μόνο χρήμα θέλουν." Upon inquiry, since my afternoon Turkish Air flight wasn't posted on the departure table, I learned that there was a morning flight via Olympic, and took that instead, driven to the other terminal by a surly driver. The terminal was lined wall to wall with tourists sleeping in sleeping bags or on nothing on the floor. As I was checking in, a voice sounded in utter astonishment, "Professor Bien, what are you doing here?" Turned out to be a Greek who did his B.A. at Yale and heard me when I lectured there. Then he did an M.E. at Thayer. Knows Stelios, of course. Nice interlude. Flight to Istanbul with miserable excuse for breakfast because Olympic catering is on strike.

Taxi to Laleli district of Istanbul, Ordu Caddesi, downtown. Horrendous traffic, bumper to bumper. Talkative driver but of course I didn't understand a word. Lots of sea wall in evidence driving along the Bosphorus. Ramada very fancy, superb architecture. Restoration that joined together four older apartment buildings. But I discovered to my shock that my extra day is at my own expense at $140.00 a day plus $12.00 for breakfast. Lovely shower and change of clothes. Nap. (Jet lag in evidence; I didn't pursue the feast-fast-regime at all.) Then: quiet working time in the room, writing my "Cavafy on Conversion" lecture. Walked outside a bit. A vibrant city, very modern yet still somewhat oriental with outside bazaars, etc.

Friday, October 5, 1990

Istanbul

Telephoned Ünsal family. We'll have supper tonight. Telephoned Father Meliton at the Patriarchate. Told me to come anytime between 9 and 4 including Saturdays. Worked more on the lecture. I picked up lots of material, some by design, some accidentally, in Melbourne and Sydney. Almost finished. Travel Dynamics group arrived later in the afternoon. Bill Scott, Kathleen Corrigan, Laura Borzumato-Kalogris from the TD office, and Peter Croyle, the trip director. Also Robert Grant, University of Chicago professor, and his wife. Change of plans (failure to provide slide projectors) made me the first lecturer. So, from 6:00 to 7:00 I gave my stirring account of the Άλωση, from the Greek point of view, of course, spending lots of time on the last mass in Αγία Σοφία and also on the transfer of books and manuscripts and knowledge from Constantinople to Italy, France, and England as a result of the Fall. Sleepy audience, but most seemed awake. Then cocktail reception, during which Mr. and Mrs. Ünsal appeared. I extolled their daughter to them, truthfully, because Selen (from Σελήνη) is truly a remarkable student and human being. They took me to the Κύμκαρι section, like the square in Thessaloniki with all the restaurants, only more so. Young men on the street corner took charge of parking the car; traffic and parking downtown is very bad. Good system. Hundreds of restaurants, one next to the other; thousands of customers around tables on the sidewalk, and inside. Mostly men, παρέες of ten to fifteen; much camaraderie. Street musicians wandering from table to table, gypsies mostly. Aout (like a huge mandolin, with curved neck, held against the chest), clarion, drum, tambourine, violin played without being tucked under the chin. We went to Selen's favorite, the K r agop restaurant, Hos Geldiniz Afiyet Olsun, which was mobbed, but they found a table for us upstairs. Mr. Ünsal obviously very important. Owner obsequious and efficient. Found ourselves in a room occupied mostly by a wedding party. Groom in tuxedo, bride in flowing white gown. No menu. Mr. Ünsal ordered—mezez, delicious of course, all kinds, wave after wave: shrimp, squid, salad, cheese; then a delicious baked fish served in the ταψί in which it was cooked. All this done very leisurely, over several hours. As Mrs. Ünsal said, all these diners were overcoming stress, so why hurry? When the gypsies arrived and began to play, the groom jumped up and began to dance, soon joined by others, including the bride. Dances very similar to what I know in Greece, but no circle dances, rather men dancing individually face to face with the partner, male or female. Sexual gyration of abdomen à la belly dance. This got wilder and wilder (with several intermissions) until the groom's bow tie and jacket had been shed and he was dancing on top of the tables, as were several others. But the bride retained her clothes and decorum. Tremendous youthful vitality. I thought to myself, No wonder the Turks make such good soldiers! Put a gun and bayonet in these hands and . . . watch out. Our youth is so flabby by contrast, sleeping all morning, drinking to soporific point. Here there was dance, song, laughter. No alcohol (except champagne rather late in the evening).

Saturday, October 6, 1990

Istanbul

Tour to Αγία Σοφία, Blue Mosque, Hippodrome, Topkapi. The first two fail to move me now as they did when I first saw them, although I continue to appreciate, of course, the wonder of Αγία Σοφία. Much of it behind scaffolding didn't help. When I mentioned to Kathleen how shameful it was for the Venetians to have plundered Constantinople, she replied that if they hadn't we would probably no longer have the wonderful horses, which would have been melted down. Topkapi I liked this time immensely, whereas previously I hadn't. Reasons: I took the harem tour with Bill and Kathleen. A whole world: 400 rooms, most of the walls covered with decorative tile in colorful patterns. Here the wives and concubines lived with their Negro eunuchs; here the sultan's children were educated. Swimming baths, outdoor porticos. But I enjoyed the rest as well, because done more leisurely than in the past, and I skipped the porcelain. The pavilions overlooking the Bosphorus are delicious.

The three of us then had an adventure trying to find the Ecumenical Patriarchate in the Fener district. The cab driver didn't know exactly where; he dropped us in a street, and pointed uphill. So we started uphill. Neighborhood just like Naples, swarming with children who all had a sentence or two of English to try out on us. Laundry, including Turkish carpets, strung out across the street from building to building. Everyone gave us a different direction, and we went round in circles until a tiny girl asked "Orthodox?" and very authoritatively led us in the opposite direction, to the right place. A strange enclave of comparative splendor in the midst of the pullulating poverty. (Also, we saw one of the Phanariot mansions nearby, now fallen into ruins.) Guard at the gate. Courtyard. Some priests old and young. Asked for Father Meliton, Patriarch's secretary, whom I had spoken to on the telephone. Βγήκε. Strange coldness; no one approached us to speak. So we stood awkwardly while the 4:00 o'clock liturgy began in a totally empty church. But a half hour later, sudden commotion and in strode the Patriarch and Meliton and others, back from the airport, as we later learned. Patriarch imposing. Everyone doing obeisance, kissing his hand, groveling. He walked past us without taking notice. Meliton approached. He'd forgotten yesterday's telephone call. Αύριο, είπε. Είμαστε πολύ απασχολημένοι σήμερα. Στις 4:00 η ώρα. So we left.

Then the Ünsals came again, this time taking not only me but also Bill and Kathleen out to dinner to a very sedate restaurant, meat instead of fish, way in the northern suburbs. How well the middle class seems to do here! For coffee we adjourned to their comfortable apartment, filled with paintings. Mr. Ünsal expressed his fear of the Islamic fundamentalist movement that threatens the secular state set up by Kemal Atatürk, and indeed at that moment, turning on the news, he heard that a liberal MP who'd been outspoken against such fundamentalism, had just been assassinated. Returning, he drove us through the campus of Robert College, which is adjacent to their apartment on a slope overlooking the Bosphorus.

Sunday, October 7, 1990

Istanbul

Morning excursion to Suleiman Mosque (disappointing), then to Church of the Χώρα, where the ascension fresco is breathtaking. Nice to see this monument again. But I now realize the definite Westernization of post-iconoclastic mosaics. Viewed the walls on the way back and then got out again at the Fener. More of the same. Ο σκοπός outside hesitant. No, Meliton wasn't there; everyone was gone on a picnic. He found an old monk inside whom he called Παππούς, and somehow got permission to take us round, although it was forbidden. So he opened doors to rather resplendent rooms: the throne room where the Patriarch receives δεσποτάδες, the refectory, and a room with portraits on the walls of the entire succession of patriarchs from the start to Δημήτριος today, including of course Χρυσόστομος and the other greats. Outside: the black door from which Γρηγόριος was hanged in 1821 or thereabouts. I asked the σκοπός πού πάει ο Ελληνισμός της Κων/πόλεως. He answered: Δε μας πειράζουν αφού είμαστε λίγοι . . . και αν μας πείραζαν οι Αμερικανοί θα διαμαρτυρούσανε. Interesting. Did he think of emigrating to Greece? Όχι. Τι να κάμω εκεί. Δεν ξέρω καμμιά τέχνη. So here he has his little unskilled job and is OK. As for my two συστατικά γράμματα, we slipped them under Meliton's and the Patriarch's office doors, respectively. Του κάκου!

Monday, October 8, 1990

Istanbul—at sea

Morning excursion up the Bosphorus past resplendent palaces, past Robert College, past the Rumeli Hissar fortress built by Mehmet in 1452 to control the sea passage, beautifully preserved. Then by bus over the Bos-porus bridge to the Asiatic side and back again. Nice lunch with Bill and Kathleen. Boarded the Illiria later in the afternoon. The stewards are now all stewardesses—Filipinos. Didn't know anyone; different captain. Only Vane, our guide in '79 and '82 ran up to say hello. They're allowed to have 1/3 crew not Greeks, and they hire Filipinos because they can pay them less.

Tuesday, October 9, 1990

Καβάλα, Φιλίπποι

Nice tour of Philippi. I remember the huge load of corn (kernels only) being loaded onto a boat at Καβάλα pier, exported by Greece and made into corn oil elsewhere. At Philippi: the stream where, supposedly, Paul preached and baptized; Lydia Hotel (!), remembering his convert Lydia; Roman forum with two huge basilicas, one just foundations but the other with central pillars and arches intact, very impressive. Telephoned Chrysanthi. She'll come to the boat tomorrow with Lola. Bob Grant lectured interestingly on Paul in Salonika, stressing that his language shows him speaking to Jews much more than to Gentiles. Grant's point is that Paul thought like a Jew, not a Greek, although he tried to think like a Greek just a bit in Athens, in order to appeal to a very different audience.

Wednesday, October 10, 1990

Θεσ/νίκη

Chrysanthi and Lola pulled up in a taxi just as we docked. Nice reunion with lots of hugs and kisses. Breakfast aboard. Then they went shopping and I went to the American center in Metropoleos to begin thinking about my Hebraism and Hellenism lecture. Saw Δημήτρης Ντούτης. Long talk; he's fine, still doing college counseling, and teaching a bit, working with the Fulbright office. Also Mrs. Koliopoulou, the librarian. Nice to be remembered so readily by people. Met Chrysanthi and Lola. Όλυμπος Νάουσσα with Costas, Stavros, Odysseas, and Nikos also there. Odysseas the most lively. Nikos doing orthopedic research and hoping for more time in Birmingham. Stavros now doing offset printing and desktop publishing. Then to Vouli's to meet the Drapers, new heads of the Farm School. Bill McGrew was there as well; we discussed the proposed Dartmouth Neohellenic Foreign Study program, which now seems possible. He actually knows Tsacopoulos. Norman Gilbertson there as well, but not his young wife. After September 1991 they'll be back in Minneapolis. Bruce and Tad telephoned from Metamorphosis to say hello. They're flourishing there in retirement. Drapers exceedingly nice. All had learned Greek from Demotic Greek I and were most appreciative. Chance to see Vouli more intimately after they left; also her mother and Κυρά Κούλα. Talked about Stylianos, of course, but I held back the degree of his obstinacy. Chrysanthi's goodbyes very easy and unemotional, with family earlier and now with Vouli. She's delighted to be leaving Greece, it seems. Later, in the boat, she expanded on the hateful relationships in the family, especially regarding George, who seems now to be psychologically sick although he pretends that it's Andreas who is sick. It's a mess, full of gossip and misunderstanding and enmity. Good to escape. And Lola and Costas's life, now that Lola is retired, is utterly boring. They talk about food, watch television, gossip about all the χωριάτες και αγράμματους that they can look down upon, etc.

Spoke with McGrew about the new "universities" proliferating in Athens and Salonika. Very suspicious and exploitative, he says, confirming what I've heard from others. Caveat emptor.

Thursday, October 11, 1990

Volos

Skipped the Meteora trip. Worked on Hebraism and Hellenism lecture, but the highlight of the day was a visit to Christos Alexiou's sister Κατίνα Καψάλη, where we found as well Christos's mother, aged 90, his other sister, and, of course, Pavlos. Pavlos is a hulking, hairy 24-year-old. We found him eating. Then he rose with some grunts and jumped up and down and paced back and forth (as he used to). But we learned that he is perfectly sweet and benign now. Also, he understands everything in both Greek and English, can translate, can do arithmetic, etc., and also has self-consciousness; he knows that he cannot talk and that this sets him apart. But he can talk. Like a deaf person, with minimal skill at forming the sounds. He says his name (more or less), his father's name, etc., when asked. But he doesn't initiate conversation or, indeed, put entire sentences together. Katina, who is fiercely intelligent and articulate, although virtually uneducated, went on at great length, and with fervor, about their life. The difficulty of his puberty—people told them to take him to a prostitute; they refused. Now, as Katina says, he relieves himself via masturbation in the toilet and has no idea whatsoever of the connection between his desires and women. If he sees a woman in bed he cuddles up to her as a child to a mother, and goes to sleep. He is therefore inoffensive to women on the street, which is a blessing. Katina was eloquent about her role. She is 65 and has had him for fifteen or so years. She was unable to give birth to her own child, so Pavlos is a substitute. She is resolved that he'll never go to an institution. She feels, quite rightly, probably, that if she'd had him earlier his condition would be considerably better. She wants to "give," not to "take" in her life, and she connects these ideals with her early involvement in the Αντίσταση and then the εμφύλιο, where both she and her husband were captured, imprisoned, tortured. She is lame. I think she was mutilated under torture, but she is such a beautiful, strong spirit today despite, or perhaps because of, privation. Her witness should be more widely known. If only Christos could write the whole story . . . or why not me?

To return to the spoiled, overfed clientele of the cruise is difficult.

Friday, October 12, 1990

Ephesus

I'm writing this actually on October 15 on a balcony of the Grande Bretagne Hotel in Athens while a newspaper photographer photographs me for an interview in the Greek Herald of Sydney. In any case, it was good to visit Ephesus again. I read from Acts in the theater and this was much appreciated.

Saturday, October 13, 1990

Patmos, Amorgos

The library at Patmos has a volume by Janos Laskaris on display; I'd forgotten that. Also several Aldine press books, à propos my lecture on the Fall of Constantinople. We talked with a twenty-year-old monk who joined the monastery at age sixteen and was very sweet and content. He is from Patmos. When Chrysanthi said how nice it was that he could be close to his family, he replied that he wished he were further away. I read from the Apocalypse in St. John's cave. People seem to appreciate these on-site readings.

Then to Amorgos, totally non-touristic. Maybe the high spot of the trip. We had rough seas that delayed our arrival until almost 5:00 p.m., near sunset. Long bus ride in a rickety bus with garrulous driver who kept taking his hands off the wheel to gesticulate, making everyone nervous because the road has hairpin turns and precipitous cliffs without guard rails. Forgot to say that the tender that brought us in had a rudder no different from that on Odysseus's ship; the boatman stood on the back deck holding the rudder in one hand and manipulating four strings attached to various levers on the engine, as though he were holding the reins of a horse. The bus deposited us finally on the opposite side of the island, high above the water, in an area totally desolate. Then one begins the ascent of 400 steps. And lo! about  $\frac{1}{3}$  of the way along suddenly the Hozoviotissa Monastery comes into view, a totally white tear-drop glued to the cheek of the cliff. The whole thing is about five storeys high but only ten feet wide. It's built into a kind of depression in the rock. When we arrived the sun had set and the monks (only 5 now out of a possible 35) had lit candles and oil lamps—no electricity up here. We ascended narrow stairways to a reception room where the traditional loukoumi and lemon brandy were served with great diligence. Then to the chapel to see the wonder-working icon, and to the “museum” to see incunabula and manuscripts, but nothing approaching the treasures of Patmos. Darkness descending apace, we left hurriedly, and barely got down in time as the light faded. The bus trip back was just as frightening as the trip up, but uneventful. An extraordinary site as well as sight, totally different from any other monastery. . . . I lectured on “Cavafy and Conversion.”

Sunday, October 14, 1990

Santorini . . . Piraeus

We got into the caldera but the gale-force winds prevented the tenders from operating and the captain, unable to anchor because of the water's extreme depth, was most uneasy as the ship kept being blown this way and that. So we decided to go directly back to Piraeus.

Monday, October 15, 1990

Athens

We didn't go with the group to the Peloponnesus. Went directly to the Grande Bretagne Hotel with the amazing “Clem” sharing our taxi. Βάσω Μώραλη came with a photographer to interview me for Ένα magazine, mostly on Kazantzakis's letters. Telephoned Mrs. Kazantzakis, but she couldn't remember my name; she has lost her memory, poor thing. Reunion with Christos at the hotel, then at his flat, with Έρη Σταυροπούλου and their delightful child Ασπασία-Μαρία. Christos still in the dumps. His positions, both at the υπουργείο and the πανεπιστήμιο, are threatened. He doesn't know from one year to the next if he'll be renewed. And the problem of Pavlos remains very difficult because Katina and Thanasis will grow old and die, and what then? No care in Greece at all, practically, for defective children. This is Christos's assignment in the Υπουργείο but there's no money. But their child is a great pleasure and Eri is an intelligent, productive scholar in the Παν/μου Αθηνών.

Christos wants to help me find a suitable publisher for a translated Kazantzakis and Politics.

Tuesday, October 16, 1990

Athens

To Ευσταθιάδης to collect my royalties: δρ 21,000 in three years, about $45.00 a year! But he had my book displayed in the shop windows, which is nice. Stopped at Θεμέλιο, Γνώστης, και Κολλάρος à propos of translation projects, but the director of Θεμέλιο was very cold, the director of Γνώστης resides elsewhere, and Καψάλες wasn't in yet (at 11:30 a.m.) at Kollaros.

Acropolis tour with the group. Bill Scott's lecture this morning was excellent: Periclean Athens, the triumph of human rationalization over bestial instinct. Lunch in Συντριβάνη with cruise people. Rested in the afternoon; bad cold. Then λουκουμάδες with Christos. More talk about publishers and about people to act as Greek representatives for JMGS.

Wednesday, October 17, 1990

Athens

I lectured on "Hebraism and Hellenism." Good response. A general of the US Army attended as a guest. Then the interview with EPT, Athens radio, about the Dartmouth group, my work as a translator, etc. Then rendezvous with nephew Andreas and his bride Βέτα for lunch, but they never showed up although they sent a gift and a card expressing expectation to see us. George went to Lola in Salonika and Lola telephoned earlier conveying George's instructions to us not to try to contact Andreas. All very strange. So we ate alone in Συντριβάνη, where we are treated as "regular customers" already. Nap. Bad cold, cough, maybe temperature. Then Ιάκωβος Τσαλίκογλου picked us up and drove us to his comfortable villa in Psychiko, his wife's ancestral home (her parents winter in Lausanne). Sweet family, including a daughter at Campion School who speaks Greek with British intonation on the vowels. Their son was rejected from Dartmouth and is attending Connecticut College. Iakovos has a love-affair with Dartmouth. Says it formed his moral character (cf. what Matt Wiencke says about Eleazar Wheelock's purpose). He's teaching now in La Verne College, which he says is fully legitimate, unlike so many other "colleges." He and his wife are thinking to develop a book-supply service to England and the US. He gave me some leads for JMGS contributors, etc.

Going to his house for supper, we missed the farewell dinner at Delphi

Restaurant for the cruise participants. People seem pleased. But this trip didn't stretch me, personally, the way the previous three had done. And Chrysanthi keeps saying that she has no desire whatever to visit Greece; she's disgusted with her family, unjustly because the only real problem is in George's household.

In the morning I visited Ninetta Makrynika at Kedros. She says they don't do criticism any more; sales are too low. So she wasn't interested in my books. I collected the grand sum of 9000 in royalties for three years!

Thursday, October 18, 1990

Athens-Paris-JFK-Pendle Hill

Up at 5:00 a.m. for final breakfast at the Grande Bretagne. Forgot to mention that yesterday at breakfast we encountered Norman Gilbertson and his young wife Diane, just arrived on the overnight train from Thessaloniki. She is charming. She's a painter, but is here on a Fulbright to study Byzantine painting's treatment of women. He looked handsome and dapper, and half his age. Said that Draper is a very good thing for the Farm School because Bruce, although creating a terrific atmosphere, was a poor manager and Draper is a good one. Draper's Greek is coming along nicely. Faculty meetings are normally in Greek, and he manages.

Friday, October 19, 1990

Pendle Hill

Traveled 22 hours yesterday. Very lucky; landed at JFK before the severe storm that would have complicated things, make us miss our limousine, etc. But everything worked fine. This morning: breakfast at 7:30. Meeting at 8:10. Class on Milton's Paradise Lost, Book 1, at 9:30. I have about fifteen students as a result of the two videos I prepared for the two previous Fridays. Good class. But jet lag set in afterwards a bit.

Saturday, October 20, 1990

Daphne came to Philadelphia. Met her at 30th Street Station. Brunch at the New Orleans Café I know near Curtis. Walked to Penn's Landing. She's fine, still prospering in her job at S & S. Planning on going to Tokyo with Greg over New Year's. But we'll all convene at Pendle Hill for Thanksgiving.

Monday, October 22, 1990

Jack Wright is my "consultee." He was in CPS, then went to a work camp in Finland, slept with a Danish girl there, married her two months before the birth of their first child, spent forty years in Sweden teaching English to foreigners, and now his wife wants to divorce him! Sad. What am I supposed to do? He says he wants to study philosophy, to catch up with all those lost years. But John Anderson, the nice dean here, says all he needs is a friend, someone who can listen. I'm going to put him in touch with John Tallmadge for a possible correspondence course.

Going through piles of mail. Paying bills. Back to reality.

After supper, Monday, Wednesday, Friday I sweep and/or mop the dining room with teammate Ted Webster.

This place is extraordinarily beautiful. Wide lawns, old trees, a mile-long path through the woods. Also, nice shopping center nearby. It's a pleasure to have a car here. Meeting people, slowly.

Oliver Rodgers asked me to be clerk of the search committee for Margery Walker's replacement. I accepted. Here we go again!

Set up computer, printer, and FAX. Home, sweet, home.

Leander sick in bed with a cough. We'll see him when he gets better.

Friday, October 26, 1990

Class in the morning. Then Publications Committee from 12:00 to 4:15. Mopping the dining room. Then General Board. A full day.

Saturday, October 27, 1990

At Haverford Corporation in the morning. Told Tom Kessinger about Jakarta. He may ask me to be Quaker visitor at Haverford. Spoke to Tom Wood about Alec, hoping he'll tempt him to return home. Tom spent ten years overseas himself, in Greece, then mostly in the UK. Not too sympathetic to our parental yearning. Lee Bennett very friendly. Also Wallace Collett, who's just remarried a professor of Greek archeology who is digging at Troy. Also his son. Haverford prospering. They don't have the curse of the Dartmouth Review.

Very nice PH program tonight. Reminiscing by Dan and Rosalie Wilson, Mary Hoxie Jones, others (e.g., Dorothy Steere) who knew Anna Brinton and Lydia Cadbury. Lots of laughs at the foibles of these great ones.

At afternoon session I presided over a helpful discussion of the problems of governance, hierarchical vs. Quaker, as they pertain to the selection of a new director.

Sunday, October 28, 1990

After Meeting, to Philadelphia to see the matinee of Les Miserables. Chrysanthi harangued me about taking on the clerkship of the search committee and neglecting the Kazantzakis letters. Etc., etc. Then laughed and said she really resented sharing me with so many others! Tension relaxed. The show mostly bored and annoyed me, because such mediocre music and sophomoric lyrics are so successful. But I warmed to it toward the end. Voices inadequate to the demands of the music. Good mise en scène, however. The story is simplistic (convicts are ethical, policemen are ogres), yet compelling despite all its artificiality. Supper in Chinatown. It's nice to be in a city again.

Monday, October 29, 1990

I'm into the letters again. Jack Wright asked me why I elected to do such drudgery. Edward Bradley has gotten the go-ahead for the Modern Greek program at Anatolia. I've submitted a prospectus now for the required committee approvals. Thanasis Maskaleris wants me to be visiting professor at San Francisco State in 1992. But I think I'll say No. Too much work (3 courses) plus I'd lose my "R" term at Dartmouth.

Tuesday, October 30, 1990

Dinner at Media Inn with Margery Walker. It's a treat to escape PH occasionally, as nice as it is.

Wednesday, October 31, 1990

Our men's group showed a video starring Robert Bly, who's obsessed with the proposition that males, in our culture, are incapable of feeling. He's blown a half-truth into a simplistic absolute.

Life in one room is no problem. I project to our future time at Kendal. Both Chrysanthi and I are easily adaptable, it seems. "But what will you do with all your books?" asks Chrysanthi.

November 3, 1990

Leander here with Deanna for supper. He's bought a grand piano. Also, one of his compositions was played on the radio. He and Deanna will do the Kreutzer Sonata in April. I'll send him Tolstoy's story.

November 4, 1990

Swarthmore Meeting. John Moore there, and Paul Mangelsdorf. I sat with Oliver and Dorothy Rodgers. Huge meeting house built in the 19th century by the College itself. The College grounds are sumptuous, like a country estate. Avenue of oaks planted 100 years ago. Rose gardens.

Then to Longwood Gardens with Larry Ingle and his wife. He's writing a new biography of George Fox. Chrysanthemum festival; orchids. Lovely. Then showed the Ingles Kendal.

November 5, 1990

Paul Lacey lectured tonight. Rambling 1¼ hour long. Disgraceful, although he had twenty minutes worth of good material on the "inner teacher."

November 9, 1990

Last Temptation video screened here. I spoke before and after. Video has been cut, compared with the film. Many of the shocking episodes are excised. Much improved, but still too long. Yet I liked the film more and more.

November 10, 1990

A nice anecdote from Kazantzakis's letter of February 8, 1932 to Istrati: ¶ Au moment où Abdoul Hassan, le grand ascèse musulman, agenouillé, priaît Dieu, il entendit une voix qui disait: "Abdoul Hassan, Abdoul Hassan, si je révèle aux hommes tout ce que je sais de toi, ils te tueront à coups de pierres!" Et alors Abdoul Hassan répondit: "Eh Dieu! Prends garde! Si je révèle aux hommes tout ce que je sais de toi, malheur à toi!" Alors la voix du seigneur si fit entendre: "Chut, chut! mon cher Abdoul Hassan! Garde bien ton secret, je garderai aussi le mien, ô mon frère!"

Dinner with Bernie Haviland and Jim and Susan Thomas. Mrs. Haviland is a Lamb. She stupefied me by saying that the Lamb business dissolved. It no longer exists, owing to mismanagement by a hired director after Harold Lamb got too old. Also, the Bewley tea shops went bankrupt and were bought by someone else. So, the two most established Irish Quaker businesses in Ireland are no more. Havilands are saddled with a more-or-less delinquent grandson who refuses to stay at home because he hates his stepfather. Poor people! He sleeps on their living room floor and causes them no end of worry.

Sunday, November 11, 1990

To Kendal Meeting. Very touching. Probably 60-70 Friends gathered in the Kendal library. Good ministry. Leonard Kenworthy, Mary Hoxie

Jones, Elizabeth Vining, Dr. Perera, the Metzses, the Rodgers, the Bain Davises—these are folks I knew. Met Francis Nicholson, author of “Quaker Money,” wheeling out Mrs. Jacobs, who was celebrating her 99th birthday. Nicholson a bit foggy regarding our collaboration on his pamphlet, but not at all foggy re: complaints that people hadn’t written to him praising it after it was published (!). Then to lunch with Bob and Mary Metz, preceded by drinks in their nice flat. Bain and Mrs. Davis joined us. A nice meal—small, sensible portions, served by high school students. Bob suggested we visit a du Pont estate called Winterthur. We did. They show period furniture from America: colonial, federalist, etc., stage by stage. Interesting but extremely pretentious.

Continued on to the Hotel du Pont in Wilmington. Supper with Tom Clark. I lectured this year on “Paradise Lost: Still Meaningful or Just a Dead Classic?” Twenty-five came from Kendal, in a bus. Good questions afterward. I used Hellenism/Hebraism material from the cruise, plus a TLS article on Toulmin’s ideas about Cosmopolis. A relaxed beer afterwards at the hotel, which was “jumping” with two wedding parties and a fund-raiser for Jewish refugees. Pianist playing Chopin in the lounge for three hours, poor soul.

November 12, 1990

Consultancy as usual with Jack Wright. Such a strange man, cut off from wife and family after 41 years. Very good lecture by Char Madigan, who runs a shelter for the homeless in Minneapolis, a nun, also nonviolent peace activist and practitioner of civil disobedience. Great admirer of Dorothy Day. Such a “whole” woman, capable of true mourning for the injustices of American life, but equally capable of raucous, infectious laughter.

November 13, 1990

Lecture-demonstration by Dimitri Pokrovsky, a troupe of dancers/singers from Moscow. The names! Sasha, Masha, Siga, Piotr . . . They did folk songs, but the most beautiful was part of the Orthodox Easter service: a female “narrator” against a background of five or six male voices, very low, à la Boris Godunov. So sad, so expressive. Many of the folk songs and dances resembled Greek ones, but always with differences. It was extremely moving, partly because so intimate. But it’s frustrating not being able to have long conversations with Sasha, Masha & Co. They don't know English.

November 14, 1990

To Kendal again, this time to Oliver and Dorothy Rodgers. Drinks (non-alcoholic), dinner, then chamber music: Fauré, Bach, Corelli, Telemann. He's a good violist, plus a violin maker. In his retirement he's continuing a study of the physical properties of sound in relation to the violin, writing research papers, etc. What a nice man! Once a week he spends as a volunteer at AFSC in Philadelphia. Once a week he spends at Pendle Hill (after quartets in the morning). Thrice a week he's in his acoustics lab at the University of Delaware.

November 15, 1990

Four-hour supper at Media Inn with Rebecca Mays: a sweet but very complicated woman, scarred by abandonment by her husband after they'd had two children together. She helped me understand the staff dissatisfaction at PH, among other things. The major problem seems to be inflexibility: the "fetish" (my word, not hers) of "community."

November 16, 1990

Conference with John Anderson, the dean, regarding the Executive Secretary search. I want the staff to be more involved, and he agrees. We'll solicit nominations from staff.

John gave me a second conferee: Reinhold Schroeder. Another sad case. Cared for his invalid mother for fifteen years. Then a half-brother appeared, got her to give him power of attorney, and promptly removed all her money from her bank account, leaving Reinhold in effect disinherited. He's a man in his late 40s or early 50s, without any skills. A Quaker "in the spirit," often ministering in a semi-hysterical way at Meeting for Worship. He's only skill: caring for the aged. What am I supposed to do?

To Haverford in the evening for Alfred Swan memorial concert. He was born in 1890 and would have been 100 years old. John Davison played with a cellist, and solo. Then the Haverford/Bryn Mawr chorus and Dickinson College chorus did liturgical selections for Russian Orthodox liturgy. As I expected, the music seemed exceedingly unexciting and mediocre. The choral works better than the instrumental, but still unexceptional compared, for example, to the Paschal liturgy we heard the other night. The real fun was to see Jane Swan again. She remembered me, hugged me, remembered that I'd been working for Pan American Airways (!), knew about my translations, etc. And there was Ayosha (Alexis, whom I'd last seen at age 2. Also Al Clayton, still teaching at Germantown Friends. John Davison unfriendly, as always, but we made some conversation. Jane is remarried, to a wealthy man again older than she. They live most comfortably in Haverford with a backyard swimming pool, etc. She served vodka at the reception. Davison follows Swan's pedagogy only partially, he admitted.

November 18, 1990

To NYC to David Erlanger's for Kinhaven Evaluation Committee. Alice Henkin there with her four-month-old baby. John Austin, Paul Rudolf also. Reports are kinder toward Jerry this year, but still quite critical, especially re: the chorus. We must begin to think about replacing him . . . gradually.

November 19, 1990

Reading Jay Parini's novel on Tolstoy. It's superb, so "teasing."

Have I recorded here that Deckerts' land is up for sale? Mary Lou died last summer and John is eager to sell. Asking $500 per acre. Chrysanthi is opposed. Alec is in favor.

John Anderson lectured on his battle to insert holistic medicine into medical school curricula. I thought of Dr. Bill Chambers, who was such a prophet in this regard, and so disregarded by his professional colleagues.

November 20, 1990

Men's group: George Kramer, Ignatio Monreah, and me. It's a lovely format: men gathered together to talk about their "maleness" without reference to business. Inspired of course by the women's group, which meets concurrently.

November 21, 1990

Mother arrived via AMTRAK. Gorgeous summerlike day here. We went together to Longwood Gardens to see the chrysanthemums and orchids again. Then to Kendal. Dinner with Oliver and Dorothy Rodgers. Tour. Mother uneasy, afraid of so many people she'll have to get to know when she enters Kendal at Hanover. But she didn't balk when I suggested this view of Kendal at Longwood. I think she's failing ever so slightly, alas. Certain inconsistencies in her discourse that I never noticed before. Lastly, to Margery and Allan Walker for dessert. Their new home in Groton, Vermont, is looking lovely. Their niece, Maria Cox, was there; she's a Lutheran pastor in the DC area, very vivacious.

November 22, 1990, Thanksgiving

Daphne arrived in the morning, as did Leander. Lovely to have everyone together, except Alec, of course. Leander is enjoying his new piano. Daphne is excited about forthcoming trip to Japan courtesy of Goldman Sachs. Fun at 1:00 p.m. Storytelling, singing, Doug Gwyn's satirical song about an incurable addiction to . . . cheeseburgers. Douglas Steere greeted me with a smile: "So now you're in charge of everything!" (referring to my clerkship of the search committee for the new executive secretary). One hundred twenty people for turkey dinner at 2:00. Very jolly and relaxed and delicious. Chrysanthi made spanakopita for the vegetarians: a treat. We walked the path afterward, talked and talked, about the Deckerts' property among other things.

November 23, 1990

Pendle Hill—New York City

Good Meeting today. About joy coupled with sorrow. I held my class, although half the students were absent. Free discussion; went well. Tutorial (consultantship) with Reinhold afterwards. He's better now; convinced that he is doing the right thing by leaving at term's end. Then to 30th Street to deliver Mother to the Montrealer. Continued by car with Daphne and Chrysanthi to Manhattan. We're really making this into a four-day holiday. Supper at Daphne's new favorite, Vagabondo's, on 62nd between 1st and 2nd. Very Italian, as though run by Mafia. No menu. Bowling alley in one of the rooms. Checkered tablecloths. But good food honestly priced. Overnight in Daphne's apartment at 717 Madison, freshly painted, with posters on the walls, looking quite nice now.

Saturday, November 24, 1990

Worked all day at the Yale Club on Addie Pollis's article for JMGS, miserably written, alas. Supper with Chrysanthi and Daphne at China Peace on West 44th. Then to Brooks Atkinson Theater to see the play about C. S. Lewis, Shadowlands, beautifully acted by Nigel Hawthorne and Jane Alexander. It opens with Lewis lecturing on suffering as good because it forces us out of complacency. The point, however, is that for Lewis these are just words. His comfortable academic life has insulated him from suffering and indeed, in a way, from life itself. The play is actually a devastating critique of Oxbridge complacency, reminding me of the Senior Common Room experience I had with Oliver Taplin at Oxford. But into Lewis's life comes a brash American admirer, and an attachment develops that he tries to prevent. When she suddenly comes down with cancer, however, he marries her and they experience a few months of joy before she dies. Then Lewis rages against God. This suffering does not seem just, does not fit within the neat justifications mouthed by Christianity. Yet when all is said and done he retains his faith, by a hair's breadth. At the end he delivers a lecture like the one at the beginning, but with the huge difference that he now feels what he is saying.

Chrysanthi spent the day with Daphne, talking about Gregory. Daphne is still hesitant. She says that he is wonderful, with good values, caring, sober, etc., but has one defect: he's not warmly demonstrative of his love. He's like me, she says. She wants someone more attentive, etc. Chrysanthi "lectured" her, as usual, saying that to desire perfection in a husband is ruinous and praising Greg for the virtues he does indeed possess. We'll see . . .

Also regarding Shadowlands, Chrysanthi differed from us, and from the critics, in concluding that Lewis, as depicted, was still only intellectual, that he never entered a non-mindly relationship with his wife. Again, I see myself as the target of all this, alas.

Sunday, November 25, 1990

Yale Club again. More work on JMGS, this time Artemis Leontis's article. Chrysanthi and Daphne met me and we lunched at the Skating Rink in Rockefeller Center. Then Daphne left us and we two saw Maggie Smith in Peter Schaefer's Lettice and Lovage, which is really about architecture, I suppose, also about myth vs. history. But mainly it's a vehicle for a bravura performance by Maggie Smith, with very fine support from Margaret Tyzack. Sophisticated comedy, not really as good as GBS but worthily in that vein. The audience rose en masse to give a standing ovation, something very rare in super-sophisticated NYC.

Monday, November 26, 1990

Back to reality. Mail. JMGS. Jack Wright consultancy. Piano practice. I sight-read the Pathétique Sonata for the first time in years. Actually, my playing is getting better despite my neglect. Swept and mopped the dining room after supper.

Tuesday, November 27, 1990

Supper at Kendal. Music with Oliver Rodgers again. Very satisfying. He's a splendid partner. In our search for the Executive Secretary of PH we now have two candidates: Dan Seeger and Edwin Hinshaw. We're hoping that Asia Bennett will also apply.

Returned at 10:00 p.m. to hear the telephone ringing. It was Daphne overjoyed, to announce that Greg had proposed and she had accepted! "I'm going to get married!" Chrysanthi and I overjoyed. Chrysanthi justifiably pleased with Saturday's lecture. Wedding to be in the summer so that Alec will be here. In Hanover. Chrysanthi and I are so excited, we couldn't sleep all night. I faxed Alec.

Wednesday, November 28, 1990

Alec telephoned congratulations to Daphne, saying that with luck her action will speed up his own. Let's hope.

Reading Books X and XI of Paradise Lost. How fine Book XI is! One truly senses how lamentable human sin is, given the possibility of human perfection that we sense but cannot attain.

Discovered by accident:

There was a kind curate in Kew

Who kept a large cat in a pew:

There he taught it each week

A new letter in Greek—

But it never got further than mu.

December 1, 1990

Dinner at Tom and Pat Wood's mansion in Wynnewood. And of course Alec telephoned from Jakarta, prearranged by Tom. Interesting crowd, including an American woman born in Beirut who had lived recently in Kuwait. Said what Saddam really wants is an outlet to the sea, and to save face. Another woman, an archeologist, has lived for decades in Athens and is now translating from Greek to English. Tom wonderfully cordial. Seems to have "adopted" both of our boys. Never had children of his own, although now he has step-children.

December 2, 1990

Beautiful ceramics and jewelry at the Art Center next door. All locally made by craftsmen. Supper with Naoko and Yasuo in a Japanese restaurant on City Line and Haverford Avenue, next to the Jewish delicatessen that Alec took me to some years back. Neither Chrysanthi nor I much liked the Japanese cuisine, but it is a sort of experience especially with Japanese friends. They'll be moving to Stony Book in June.

December 4, 1990

Lunch at Haverford with Ed Bronner. Tom Kessinger wants me to be the Rufus Jones Associates' visitor this year and I'm scared stiff. I seem to be turning into a "weighty Friend" and this is not deserved. Met Emma Lapsansky, Ed's successor in the Quaker collection. Charming. She knows Alec; her kids went to Friends Central. High opinion of him. She's joining the PH Publications Committee.

December 6, 1990

Asia Bennett came to talk about the Executive Secretary opening. She'll apply but wants it hush-hush until next year so she doesn't become a lame duck at AFSC.

December 7, 1990

Hectic day. Final class 9:30 to 12:00. I stressed Milton's teaching that Adam (i.e., we) must avoid both despair and euphoria as we experience the world's evil, on the one hand, and God's loving-kindness, on the other. What's required is balance, patience, endurance. Then Publication Committee until 4:00. Again we rejected all MSS submitted, including John Tallmadge's, alas. Then Kate Cohen from 4:00 until 7:30, going over the articles for the next JMGS. She's done a good job as copyeditor. Then PH Executive Board from 7:30 until 9:30.

December 8, 1990

Executive Board in the morning. Supper at Kendal with Oliver and Dorothy Rodgers and then chamber music. Delightful. Schubert, Bach, Vaughan-Williams.

December 9, 1990

To the Jewish delicatessen for omelet with lox and onions. Then to Bethlehem. Leander's piano, a used grand, is fine although far from perfect. Attended Moravian College Christmas vespers in the Central Moravian Church. Dick and Monica Schantz, choir director and organist, respectively. An exquisite two hours: brass choir, mixed chorus, bells, winds and strings, soloists, moving prayer by Clarke Chapman (Ardis's husband, who officiated so well at Benjy Bidlack's service). A "show" yet it transcended this to become truly a service of praise at Advent. Dick's sense of contrast is exquisite. And when all stops seemed to have been pulled out, then he introduced a boy soprano soloist to top everything. Candlelight service at the end, with the huge congregation holding lighted candles in the darkened church and raising them in exultation toward the illuminated Star of Bethlehem over the altar. Such joyous and mellow singing by the congregation! We were extraordinarily moved.

Flat tire on the way home. But we pulled off the road into a floodlit parking lot, the perfect place to change it. So, the day ended well.

December 10, 1990

Lunch at Kendal with Lloyd Lewis. He's furious at Pendle Hill for proceeding with the extension to Brinton House, and has resigned. I told him that his resignation has had a powerful effect. We are doubly attentive to shunting money now back into programmatic areas. But he is convinced that we're robbing the endowment all the same. Regarding Kendal, he's mildly apprehensive about Jean: her inflexibility and coldness. Actually spoke of perhaps firing her, but hopes this can be avoided. She alienates subordinates and won't obey the wishes of superiors. But Carol couldn't replace her; not enough experience or skill.

December 11, 1990

I arranged for three scholarly papers to be included in Festival Week: Larry Ingle's on George Fox's source of funds and whether one can "like him"; mine on Paradise Lost as meaningful or just a dead classic; and Doug Gwyn's on Fox and Covenant. Gwyn was poor, Ingle excellent, and mine seemed to go well. Lots of compliments afterwards and requests for copies. Alas, not much else of a scholarly nature has been produced this term. After supper, to Philadelphia Orchestra at the Academy of Music, with Margery and Yuki. Sibelius's 7th and Beethoven's 3rd.

December 12, 1990

Trying to help Daphne plan her wedding. When, where, how? Festival events today included Jack Wright on Mary Webb's poetry, and Richard Sanders on concepts of freedom. John Reader on Captain Cook's Quaker artist. Doug Gwyn singing satirical songs.

December 13, 1990

Had a mirror cut to fit Chrysanthi's oval mirror-frame in ceramic, one of many objects made under Sally Palmer's guidance.

1991

---

Hanover	January 1–June 14
Jan. 5–6, Hanover
Jan. 12–13, Harrison, NY
Jan. 18–20, Pendle Hill
Feb. 21–22, Haverford
Feb. 23–24, Cambridge
March 8–9, Pendle Hill
March 22–23, NYC, Kinhaven
April 6–11, Bethlehem, Haverford, NYC
April 14, New Haven
April 18–19, Pendle Hill
April 26–28, Kendal at Longwood
May 12, Cambridge, A.R.T. King Lear
May 17–18, Pendle Hill
June 6–7, Cambridge, Londonderry, Kinhaven
Riparius	June 14–August 31
June 22–25, Hanover
July 13–14, Kinhaven
July 15–16, Hanover
July 29–30, Hanover
August 1, Indian Lake
Aug. 8–12, Hanover (wedding)
Hanover, Europe	September 1–September 19
Sept. 2–6, Boston, JFK, Dublin, Galway, Dublin
Sept. 7, Ayr, Alloway, Kirkoswald, Culzean Castle
Sept. 8, Heysham, Lake District
Sept. 9, Wales: Fishguard, St. David's
Sept. 10, Bristol, Bath
Sept. 11, Scilly Isles
Sept. 12, Dorchester
Sept. 13, Zeebrugge, Paris, Talge Express
Sept. 14, Madrid, Toledo, Hotel Carlos V, Plaza Horno de Magdalena 1, 45001 Toledo (825) 222100/05
Sept. 15, Toledo, Madrid

Sept. 16–18, Madrid, Hotel Madrid, Carretas 10,
 28012 Madrid 91 5216520
 Sept. 19, Madrid, NYC, Boston, Hanover
 Hanover September 20–December 31
 Oct. 6, Kinhaven
 Oct. 26–28, Pendle Hill, NYC (Kinhaven)
 Oct. 31–Nov. 3, Gainesville, Florida (MGSA)
 Nov. 7–9, Harrisburg, PA (Morehouse Publishing)
 Nov. 24, Cambridge: A.R.T.
 Dec. 6–7, Pendle Hill
 Dec. 13–15, Amherst, NYC (Kinhaven)
 Dec. 28, Riparius
 Dec. 31, NYC

January 21, 1991

Hanover

Alec telephoned from Jakarta. A bomb was discovered at the American ambassador's residence (and defused). This led to the closing of the Jakarta International School as a precautionary measure, but the school will reopen tomorrow with increased security. Also, they've removed the school's name from all the vehicles that transport students. This is the closest that the Iraqi war has come to us, personally.

Deanna auditioned all day today for the Boston Symphony. Last week she was one of 50 applicants and survived to the short-list of 3. Today she survived again to the "finals" of 2. Then she was selected as the winner, only to be told at that point that the job would not be offered to anyone! But they invited her back in October and said that she could start at the semi-final stage. The bastards!

I was at Pendle Hill last weekend. Warm welcome, all hugs, from lots of last term's students. How nice! Our search for a new director still has only three viable candidates, Asia Bennett, Ed Hinshaw, and Dan Seeger, all of whom are also applying for the FWCC position. We'll start interviews on February 8. Last Saturday was a full day. Executive Committee in the morning, Publications from 12:30 until 4:00, Search Committee from 4:30 through supper until 8:00. But then Oliver and I adjourned to Upmeads and played music for two hours. What a lovely tonic! In Publications Committee we started the reappraisal of the book publishing venture. Over the years it actually made money and I thought that this could make things easy. But various members—Nancy Strong, and also John Anderson, who is not a member—felt that we should lay down the experiment and concentrate exclusively on pamphlets. I made an impassioned speech when things seemed at their worst. We stopped in the middle, leaving as possibilities “an occasional book” or “zero to two books a year.” At least we approved two pamphlet manuscripts, finally, one by Sonny Cronk on “Gospel Order” and one by George Peck on appreciating the Psalms, the latter after its fourth submission.

I spent Sunday morning at Pendle Hill beginning a re-translation of Stathis Trahanatzis’s speech on Byzantine art that he’s due to give at Dartmouth in February. The translation that someone else did for him is pure gibberish. This chore continued most of today, a nuisance but, as always, good practice.

January 22, 1991

Hanover

Faculty Dining Committee: Ned Perrin, normally Gene Garthwaite (but he’s in Iran), Bruce Pipes, etc., meeting with Matt Marshall to assess the new Faculty Club arrangements we devised. Working well, apparently. Ned is pressing for a common table, I for a second choice with half-sandwich and soup. We got both.

January 23, 1991

Another one of those days with three classes in a row. 12:30, section of English 53 on The Rainbow; then rush to Humanities 1 section on Paradise Lost at 1:45; then back at 3:00 for second English 53 section. Exhausting. But the students seem willing to talk this term without excessive prodding. Finished at 4:15. Then a student conference. Then to Hanover Inn for a drink with Panos. Then home for supper and chamber music.

January 24, 1991

Bill Scherman keeps pressing me about the Beebe Professorship. Can we raise more money? What am I doing with it? Etc. Lunch with him and Karen Rodis to plan our moves.

January 29, 1991

Jim Breeden wants to start a University Seminar in ethics and religion. I told him about the old Tucker Fellowship that lasted for 35 years. He’ll never do anything, though.

Dinner at Carpenter Street with Leonard and Rosemary Rieser. He has in many ways been my patron since I arrived at Dartmouth, although he constantly ribs me. Without him I couldn't have "invented" War/Peace Studies, to cite just the most recent collaboration. He's a strange case of a man who really never did anything as a scientist yet established a huge reputation for wisdom and integrity, well deserved, as an administrator and kind of scientific statesman: head of AAAS, etc. and now of the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists (he took out a subscription for me). He's a terrible namedropper, but he does seem to know "everybody" important. Nice man. A real, tested friend (but who can tell, as my experience with John Rassias on New Year's Eve showed).

Saturday, February 2, 1991

Daphne here, with Greg. He now hugs me, awkwardly, and calls me Peter instead of Mr. Bien. We "checked out" the Norwich Inn again; a better dinner this time. Took them to Pierce's. Greg likes it, so we'll have the rehearsal dinner there. But they are unadventurous concerning the ceremony. They've vetoed my inclusion of Greek Orthodox στέφανα and also my hope for a time of Quaker silence with spontaneous testimony. Must keep pressing to have some of these elements at least.

Wednesday, February 6, 1991

Influenza. 103° F. No energy, not even enough to read. I skipped class today, the first time in my thirty-year career. Felt OK about it because I'd expected the BBC video on Paradise Lost would be shown but learned later that OIS goofed and the students had to be dismissed. I'll type up my lecture and distribute it later.

February 9, 1991

To Dr. Gerber for my annual checkup despite the flu. Generally I'm truly healthy, he says. Enlarged prostate, incipient hernia, hemorrhoids are the only chronic difficulties. Good blood pressure, heart, etc. Reasonably high cholesterol but not disastrous. Slightly overweight. I was beautifully trim at the end of the summer, but two weeks in Australia and the cruise fattened me up again.

Friday, February 8, 1991

Still in bed, instead of traveling to Pendle Hill for Search Committee interviews all weekend with Seeger, Bennett, and Hinshaw. And I'd planned to speed up to NY tomorrow for MGSA Executive to talk about JMGS. All cancelled. No matter. People did very well without me.

Monday, February 11, 1991

Teaching again, but still sick and weak.

Tuesday, February 12, 1991

Long breakfast meeting with Jean Brophy concerning Kendal, which will open now in July, ahead of schedule. Even the negotiations with Hitchcock Clinic are going well. Essentially, all our desires of two years ago, when the Clinic was so standoffish and arrogant, now seem acceptable to them.

Wednesday, February 13, 1991

Breakfast with a computer science candidate named Felia Makedon who turns out to be a Greek from Thessaloniki. She was amazed at my Greek, etc. She seems a master at self-advertisement.

Kathleen Corrigan's lecture on the development of icon-worship started our Byzantine mini-celebration. Later, Stathis Trahanatzis arrived; I picked him up at Lebanon airport. What a charmer! The stereotype of the artist in his beret, cravat, and small mustache. He brought as a present a large lithograph of the Adoration of the Magi, but not something I like or want to frame, alas, because he has mixed Western stylistic motifs into the Byzantine and the result is kitsch. Too bad.

Thursday, February 14, 1991

All day with Stathis. Tour in the morning. Lunch with Aris Damianos and Don Sheehan, who is studying iconography in the Russian style. Also Kathleen. Then Stathis's lecture, which went quite well, considering that he couldn't pronounce many of the more abstruse English words I introduced into the translation. But he spoke "feelingly" and the message somehow got conveyed that Byzantine painting is a religious not just an aesthetic act. When at the end he projected slides of his own work, the audience gasped, they were so powerful.

Reception and dinner afterwards, all very pleasant.

Friday, February 15, 1991

Brought Stathis to the Hop at 9:00 a.m. for his "practicum." Again, success. Forty to fifty people attended, and he was still there at 1:00 p.m.

after having painted a saint's head from start to finish, with meticulous commentary at every stage. He left after lunch with effusive thanks.

Attended talk by Bill Gavin of CCCO on the draft and conscientious objection. Scary. If the war continues a draft could be begun instantaneously; all the mechanisms are in place. And draftees will not know what hit them, or what their options are unless they receive counseling ahead of time. Quakers, as usual, are mobilizing to be ready to offer such counseling.

February 18, 1991

Steve Scher and Ulrike for dinner, without his cappuccino machine! I received the ultimate compliment: praise from Steve Scher for my coffee.

February 19, 1991

Kendal open meeting. As opening nears, many people are saying kind words to me. Mother got cold feet and decided not to enter until she got a touch of flu, couldn't find Dr. Strickler, couldn't get to the clinic without Chrysanthi driving her in the snow, etc. This convinced her that Kendal will be right for her, after all. Overseers' Executive Committee lunch afterwards. We're writing by-laws for ourselves, and going through a self-study akin to an accreditation exercise. Dick Brokaw is becoming increasingly useful in all this.

Wednesday, February 20, 1991

I'm in the conference mode, with English 53 classes suspended. 78 conferences plus repeats for people like Diana Polley, who must have come six times.

Thursday, February 21, 1991

By train to Haverford. Slept on the third floor of 1 College Circle, Tom Kessinger's house. Nice to talk to him about Jakarta International School, John Maganga, Tom Wood.

Friday, February 22, 1991

Nominating Committee of the Haverford Corporation. Steve Cary took me aside to sing Asia Bennett's praises re: the PH directorship and to worry about Dan Seeger who, he says, ran his own show in NYC and didn't cooperate very well with headquarters in Philadelphia.

Saturday, February 23, 1991

To Cambridge. Saw matinee of Ibsen's When We Dead Awaken directed by Robert Wilson—or rather saw a new play by Robert Wilson. Robert Brustein in his lecture preceding the show said that Ibsen and Wilson are a perfect match because of the “apocalyptic symbolism” of both, or some such phrase. I found Wilson's version full of Wilson clichés, breaking up the text so that language loses its semantic value and displays mostly rhythmic and tonal values instead, conveying meaning (?) by suggestion rather than statement. Everything is choreographed, nothing even remotely natural. It is his revenge against the Ibsen of A Doll's House, with a vengeance. Strangely, I found a similarity between Wilson's work and the Indonesian traditional theater/opera/ballet/oratorio that I saw with Alec in Jakarta. Except that that evolved organically and somehow expresses a community whereas Wilson's expression seems to be chiefly the product of an individual consciousness that is totally self-conscious in wishing to progress by revolution rather than evolution. The three interludes of blues singing/vaudeville with Honey Coles were the most enjoyable part, and a brilliant touch.

To Huntington Avenue after supper for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. My first time in the hall, I believe. Could I never have gone during my two years at Harvard? Too many trips to the Old Howard in Scollay Square, instead! Actually, it's a rather cramped hall, without the μεγαλείο of the Philadelphia Academy of Music. Simon Rattle, guest conductor, did Mahler's 7th Symphony, not my favorite, but nevertheless an “experience,” and beautifully performed.

Sunday, February 24, 1991

Cambridge Meeting very gathered. Several heartfelt testimonies about the Gulf War and/or previous wars. Saw Andy Towl briefly. Then Janet Shepherd convened a Pendle Hill “event” at which I was the principal speaker, recounting my impressions as a teacher and board member. Good audience, mostly of people who had been to PH and were already full of enthusiasm, but also a few who hadn't been and wanted to know more.

Went to a Greek provision store for ταραμάς, etc. in Watertown but it was closed on Sunday afternoon. Next time.

Monday, February 25, 1991

Met with Nancy Davies and Otmar Foelsche re: Sears grant and “annotated texts.” It’s advancing slowly. They want me actually to type in some Greek samples now. I’ll get Takis Metaxas to do this. David Bantz has gone to Chicago and everyone seems relieved.

Ed Hinshaw phoned to announce his withdrawal from the PH race. I think he was turned off by the staff, who apparently were very mean to him. This leaves Dan and Asia. I wrote to each saying we’d really have to know before April 8 if they’d take the job if it were offered to them.

Lloyd Lewis here, this time with this son Paul, who is to become Jean’s immediate superior. Lloyd is still worried about Jean, mostly in the marketing area. He spoke to me glowingly about Dan Seeger, whom he’d heard at the Pendle Hill interviews I had missed. “Will we be brave enough to choose Dan over the totally competent but ‘safe’ Asia?” he challenged me. Overseers had a lovely dinner in the Norwich Inn, Lloyd and I yapping constantly together at the head of the table.

Tuesday, February 26, 1991

Important Overseers meeting. The major question was: Should the Overseers remain 100% Quaker (we’re drafting our by-laws or guidelines) or allow a percentage of non-Quakers? Audrey, Mayme, Sydney, Barbara, Lafayette (i.e., all those about to enter Kendal) strongly for 100%. Chaney and Dick Brokaw against. Lloyd at Longwood had told me he was for, but today he argued that Quakers no longer go into banking and business; thus it’s hard for an all-Quaker board to get the necessary skills. We went back and forth for an hour or more; it was a difficult clerking job for me. Finally we decided to remain 100% Quaker. This can of course be changed later via the amendment procedure. Chrysanthi is only an attender, but everyone agreed to overlook that and grandfather her in.

Still having conferences with students. Also, the oral reports are starting. Eight sessions with 10 to 11 people speaking at each. Endurance. Yet how well some of them speak! Second paper due today. Thank God I have Bob Ransom to grade ½ of them.

Telephoned Dan Seeger. He wants to visit here in order to meet me and talk. Next week.

Friday, March 1, 1991

Sandi Adams came last night to start the mediation workshop in College Course 1: Conflict Resolution. I'd heard about her at Pendle Hill. She moved from Philadelphia to Montpelier in January, so she was perfect for our needs. And what a delightful, bubbly young woman! We took to each other immediately over a long breakfast that ended with a spontaneous hug. Someday she and Nancy Bekavac should be brought together into the same room, and then we'd watch the fireworks! (Lloyd, by the way, says he'll try to make Nancy the next president of Swarthmore.)

Tuesday, March 5, 1991

Long, good breakfast meeting with Jean about self-study process for Kendal, etc. Then at 11:00 a.m. Dan Seeger appeared at my office, as arranged, and we talked steadily for five hours without repeating ourselves. He is so sharp! His analytical powers regarding the group and individual dynamics at a place like Pendle Hill are refreshing; he probes right to the root instead of hovering at the periphery. At the same time his intellect is not at all cloistered; his life has been devoted to Quaker activism. He writes with great facility; I've heard that he's a great public speaker. He'll be so good for PH. But will he frighten them, intimidate them? That is the question.

Thursday, March 7, 1991

Good meeting of the Dickey Endowment advisory board. Leonard is trying to determine future directions in advance of his retirement.

Friday, March 8, 1991

Pendle Hill

The fateful meeting of the Search Committee. Five hours. We went back and forth between Asia and Dan, then discussed what PH itself needs, whether strengthening of the internal aspect, the community, or outreach beyond to affect the entire Society of Friends. I of course stressed the latter and therefore Dan, whereas those who stressed the former preferred Asia. The lineup started as follows: Eirené and I for Dan; Hal Cope (absent, but he'd telephoned me to say he was for Dan); Gordon Browne for Dan; Ellie White for Asia, Betty McCorkle for Asia; Oliver Rodgers for Asia. So, four for Dan, three for Asia. Then Gordon Browne made a long, surprising speech in which he concluded: Although I favor Dan I recommend that we appoint Asia. Again, for "safety." So: four for Asia, three for Dan. Then Eirené, although 200% for Dan, said she'd also be happy with Asia if the committee went in this direction—i.e., she'd capitulate. Then I said I would not capitulate, at least not yet, that Dan was too good to lose, that PH could stand some lack of safety internally in exchange for making a real impact outside. Deadlock. Gordon suggested that we go out for a walk and then enter silent worship. Fine, agreed, whereupon Oliver said, "Listen, let's offer the job to Dan first, and if he turns it down (as Oliver felt he would because of the low salary) then we'll offer it to Asia. Miracle! Everyone agreed. Finis! We went for our walk anyway, Eirené and I jubilant, then entered the silence, then cleared up minor matters of timing and procedure. Top priority: secrecy, until we'd determine who would actually accept.

At Executive Committee in the evening, we received authorization to offer Dan up to $10,000 besides the stated compensation, and to make the appointment of either Dan or Asia without reconvening the Executive Committee.

Saturday, March 9, 1991

Pendle Hill

Not so successful with Publications Committee, which again failed to reach unity regarding book publishing. At the end we asked Nancy Strong and myself to try to break the impasse and report back next month.

Sunday, March 10, 1991

Back at 5:00 a.m. on AMTRAK. Student exam at 9:00. Full class in the afternoon. Meeting in the morning and lunch with Yiayia. Our saving routines. Leander here, practicing hard for the Ravel trio and the Kreutzer.

Monday, March 11, 1991

Huge telephone conversation with Dan Seeger trying to negotiate salary and compensation. He's going to TIAA to see what his retirement pension will be, given different levels of compensation. I'm having the Personnel Office here research the same. Poor guy wants to be able to afford Medford Leas in ten years.

Tuesday, March 12, 1991

More vigorous negotiations with Dan. We hope to "break through" by tomorrow. Dan is convinced, after speaking to Oliver, that Oliver is antagonistic, really hoping he'll withdraw so that Asia Bennett may be appointed. Possible. I'm trying to convince Dan that he, too, must give way somewhat.

Lunch yesterday with Jim Jordan, our yearly ritual. Spent most of the time telling him about Kendal.

Lunch today with Tom Corindia, whom I hope to get back on the Kendal Overseers once the negotiations with Hitchcock are completed. They are going well. Kendal was clearly a factor in Hitchcock's decision to accept Medicare assignments, one of our original conditions.

After some difficulty regarding timing, I've managed to secure Jim Freedman as a speaker at Kendal's ribbon-breaking ceremony in July.

Wednesday, March 13, 1991

Dan will yield somewhat in his demands for a pension of a certain size. Oliver is encouraged. They'll try to agree on a contract letter today.

Thursday, March 14, 1991

Success! Oliver turned around, after Dan had yielded, and actually granted him more than he'd asked for. Asia has been informed, also Margery. But no one else must know until Tuesday, by which time Dan will have informed his staff.

Sunday, March 17, 1991

All weekend spent grading essays. It gets harder and harder. But on Sunday I did fifteen!

Monday, March 18, 1991

All day computing grades. Handed them in at 5:15 p.m. What a relief! Such a difficult term, and the worst of all is that the course evaluations for English 53 are shocking. Many are positive, of course, but the negative ones are greater in number than I've experienced before and also greater in anger. Many accused me of not honoring viewpoints different from my own. Many objected to the diaries, the sections, the orals (which were, of course, tedious with 78 students); many objected to an assistant grading their papers—justifiably. And some said that I never spoke about the books themselves, only about background and authors' lives. Unfair! One accused me of inflicting D. H. Lawrence on him (or her) for two whole weeks. Well, if the net effect is to reduce the enrollment to 35 next time round, so be it.

Trying with Nancy Strong to move forward on the PH book publishing problem. My idea is to co-publish with a house that could take over marketing, sales, and distribution. She likes this idea.

Tuesday, March 19, 1991

Vacation! Wonderful. So I spent the morning doing my income tax! Earned over $100,000 (in inflated dollars) this year for the first time.

Lunch with Jack Shepherd and Leonard Rieser to plan agenda for War/Peace Steering Committee. We hope to inaugurate a mediation group on campus. Sandi Adams has already set these up at Haverford and Swarthmore. We need to re-resurrect the University Seminar, which is moribund under Alan Rozycki's leadership. We might want to move forward administratively to enable students to get a certificate in War/Peace Studies as a minor subject.

Oliver announced Dan Seeger's appointment at PH today, after Meeting.

I'm reading Tom Luxon and Roman Jakobson in connection with my Haverford Rufus Jones lecture, which is coming all too soon.

Wednesday, March 20, 1991

Chamber music with Dick only. Allan is in bed with a bad back. Played particularly well: Mozart's flute concerto.

Saturday, March 23, 1991

NYC

Kinhaven Development Committee. We really all hope to purchase the property in June; we need a $400,000 loan. Bill Polk is working on this. I've been asked to write to Mr. Van Dusen (Katy's father) and to Jill Conway, both Kresge Foundation trustees, to alert them to our application.

Went to Fauve exhibition at the Met. Garish colors inspired by Van Gogh, but deliberate anti-rationalistic misapplication—e.g., yellow sea-water, green sunsets, etc. The movement lasted only three or four years, around 1903–07—Matisse, de Vlaminck, Derain—and gave way to cubism. Then some of my old favorites: two magnificent El Greco's (Toledo in the Storm and Christ Healing the Blind Man), Rembrandt's self-portrait and his Aristotle Admiring the Bust of Homer.

Sunday, March 24, 1991

Daphne here. She rose at 6:00 a.m. and we talked and talked, mostly about her trip to see Greg's mother's relatives in San Francisco, and various wedding plans. Leander doesn't want to play; says he'll be too emotional. Actually, for him to play at the end will be tactically difficult because of the need for photos. But I hope to convince him and Deanna to stay on the program at least in the beginning. We've gotten to the stage now of designing the invitations. What a "production" this is! Quaker simplicity is obviously abandoned. But Daphne already dissociates herself from Quakerism. Didn't come to Meeting with us this morning, for instance. I say nothing. She may return fifteen years from now, like Mary Scattergood. But she says she wants to go to the Ανάσταση with us in Bethlehem two weeks from now. In the afternoon I helped her with her income taxes, remembering at the very last minute that she can deduct her IRA, saving her a cool $560 on the taxes. We had fun.

Channy Brokaw found lots problems still with the Overseers' guidelines, and I had to make yet another draft for Tuesday's meeting.

Monday, March 25, 1991

Beginning of spring term. Light teaching load, just Humanities 2 with Jim Tatum, Walter Stephens, and Marsha Swislocki. Odyssey, Ulysses, Don Quixote, Princesse de Clèves, Nietzsche. My immediate need: to finish my lecture for Haverford. Then comes next issue of the Journal. Will I do more on the Kazantzakis letters this term? And there will be a heavy CAP load.

Leander's birthday. For Christmas we gave him $300 to buy a bed—his first. He likes it. Now I gave him $250 to get a humidifier/dehumidifier for his piano.

Tuesday, March 26, 1991

Overseers still unable to complete our guidelines. Jean impatient, under great pressure from Lloyd to do marketing. We now have 38 empty units. We'll lose more as well, because people will die before entering Kendal, and some will withdraw because they can't sell their houses—e.g. Lily Paxson (whom I'm happy to see excluded). We'll hold a special meeting in April just for the guidelines. But we did adopt policies: no alcohol, smoking, and tipping. I wish we could have wine at table.

Wednesday, March 27, 1991

Classes started. So soon! I'm doing only Humanities 2, however, with three colleagues: Jim Tatum, Walter Stephens, and Marsha Swislocki, so I can't complain. Four teachers and twenty students! Odyssey, Nietzsche, Ulysses, Princesse de Clèves, and Don Quixote. Went to see Mike Choukas, Jr. about writing to alumni about Kendal. He'll probably refuse. But I got Jim Freedman to agree to speak at our opening on July 16th.

Doing income tax. Also working on my lecture for Haverford, stimulated by Tom Luxon's book in manuscript about the similarities between linguistic theory—"code" and "message"—and theological conceptions of "the Word" and words. It's going well. I do believe that Quaker worship, its mixture of silence and speech, is an amazingly pregnant ritual that simulates our existence as creatures in a larger pre-creaturely context.

Lunch with two AFSC fundraisers. They're trying to convince me to set up an annuity at AFSC.

April 2, 1991

Finance Committee at Meeting. Sandy Stettenheim is an energetic treasurer, but she talks too much. Al Converse, Tom Corindia, and I were half-asleep, listening.

Went to hear Andy Rangel with Mother. Wonderful programming: in the first half, four examples of theme and variation: Sweelinck, Nielsen, Christian Wolff (on a Beatles' song), and Beethoven's variations on an original theme. If Andy would only do the Diabelli sometime! All played with his characteristic dynamism and cleanness. Then four Chopin mazurkas, which didn't sound very Chopinlike as interpreted by Andy. Second half: the big Schubert sonata, which left me cold. But the first half was scintillating.

Thursday, April 4, 1991

I hosted Tom Campion, David Bury, and Kit Van Winkle at lunch. She has agreed to be past parents' chair of the Kinhaven annual fund. Tom gave some good ideas, and lectured us about our tardiness in aggressively pursuing our campaign. Amen! Turns out Richard Van Dusen, Katy's father, was a devoted "Dartmouth parent." I wrote him re: Kresge grant (he's a Kresge trustee), afraid he'd remember the tempestuous dinner at our house when he got so mad at Audrey Logan because of her liberalism, but he remembered it only with pleasure. I got the kindest letter back from him.

Saturday, April 6, 1991

Hanover-Bethlehem

Drove to Bethlehem with Chrysanthi and Mother. Hotel Bethlehem, as before. nice supper there with Leander and Deanna. Leander tense because the vibraphonist didn't learn his part and Leander had to spend the whole week coaching him to the detriment of practicing himself. At 11:00 we went to the huge Greek church for the Ανάσταση. Packed. Standing in the aisles. Good ψάλτες. Terrible εικονογράφιση. Poor Stathis would cringe. All messages—e.g., from Archbishop Iakovos—were read in both Greek and English. Noumenal quality of the immanent Ανάσταση ruined by the priest talking at length about how to clear the hall in orderly fashion and be sure to return afterwards. But some of the magic did break through despite everything when the church was darkened and finally the priest emerged chanting Δεύτε, λάβετε φως and we all sang Χριστός ανέστη εκ νεκρών, θανάτω θάνατον πατήσας. The congregation, if they stayed, would have a dinner at 3:00 a.m. We went home to bed.

Sunday, April 7, 1991

Bethlehem

A memorable day. I started by attending Lehigh Valley Friends Meeting. A good group; lots of young couples and children. One man had been to Hanover and spoke to me. All the ministry was religion and impersonal, real messages instead of private emotings. Even some intellectual content and metaphysical speculation. One of the ministers was the president of Moravian, whom I'd met last year. Afterwards, they went around the room, asking each person for any sort of comment, announcement, thought. They do this each week, and it helps greatly to knit the group together. We should try it at Hanover, perhaps once a month.

Daphne and Greg arrived in time for a sumptuous brunch at the hotel. Greg's firm gave him two tickets to Wimbledon as a perk, and they'll be going to London for four days. Talked about changing apartments; they're looking at one on 21st Street between 9th and 10th, in Chelsea. A shame to leave Madison Avenue, but it's too small for the two of them. Daphne got a stellar review, again, from Fred Hills, and has been promoted at Simon and Schuster, with a 10% salary raise, which is very good in this economic climate.

3:00 p.m. Leander's concert, this time in the big hall, Foy Auditorium. Lots of friends in the audience: Brittles, Yasuo and Naoko, Larry Wright, Nancy and Jerry Bidlack, the Schantzes. A good crowd especially for a Sunday afternoon with brilliant sunshine and 80+ degree heat. The first half began with a baroque warm-up for Leander and Deanna: Zanni, very fine, with a gorgeous slow movement that might be just right for Daphne's wedding. Then Leander's romantic pastiche, again for piano and violin, amazing, with its quotes from Saint-Saëns and Chopin. Sonorous, intellectually interesting because of its form. Where did Leander suddenly get this talent as a composer? Out of the blue, certainly not the result of any instruction in conservatory or afterwards. Brittles says that his work is really superior, should be published, played by others, etc. The work also has extraordinary variety. Next came a trio for piano, flute, and vibraphone, totally different, a touch of minimalism, as in last year's piece for trumpet and percussion, but just a touch. Robin Kani (Larry Wright's wife) played masterfully, and the vibraphonist, although appearing very tense, seemed to have mastered his part more or less. The second half was devoted entirely to the Kreutzer Sonata, which from the very first double-stopped chord on the violin was electrifying. In the variations, the fast one for violin, each time Deanna rose higher and higher to conclude with an impossibly high note on the E-string, the man sitting next to me gasped. And I, of course, from beginning to end was sniveling and weeping with aesthetic joy. An amazing piece played with appropriate freshness. Nice reception afterwards and then we all went off, twelve of us, to supper at a restaurant. A true παρέα. I sat at the head with Larry Wright on one side and Naoko on the other, with James McBride next to her. Brittles, besides composing songs, is writing a book on his mother. He told us more about her life, how she was totally disowned by her Jewish family for marrying a Protestant black pastor. We all indulged ourselves: roast beef, beer, mud pie even. Delightful. Yiayia said afterwards that it was the nicest day of her life.

Monday, April 8, 1991

Bethlehem-Haverford

To Haverford College with Mother and Chrysanthi to begin my service as Rufus Jones Associates Distinguished Visitor. They gave us a tour of the refurbished Founders Hall, serviceable and simple in Quaker style, but with a touch of grandeur in the Great Hall. They kept some of the old door- and window-jambes, crooked and caked with paint, to preserve some of the feel of the original building. Then lunch in the faculty dining room with John Cary. Of course, as expected, I was queried about the Dartmouth Review. The atmosphere at Haverford is so different from that at Dartmouth, so liberal, with Amnesty International materials at the center of the dining room lobby, with notices about non-traditional employment opportunities (in the non-profit service sector) on every table in the student dining hall, with sign-up sheets for work projects in local hospitals, nursing homes, etc., filled up to overflowing.

Then to Pendle Hill. Chrysanthi was greeted with whoopees and hugs by her many friends there. I went into conference immediately with Rebecca, who looked awful, having just had another bad incident with her estranged husband. Supper with Steve Cary, then listened to his Monday night lecture on "Pacifism." Like me, he cannot argue that pacifism works. More importantly, it is a position required of one irrespective of practical considerations. Nevertheless, he did remark about the practical side that the challenge to pacifists is always posed at the end of a bad series of events—e.g., Hitler about to invade Poland. What can pacifists do? The question should have been posed at the beginning of such a sequence, in this case during the Versailles Conference. Pacifist responses at each step may have prevented the military outcome.

Tuesday, April 9, 1991

I started as guest speaker in Emma Lapsansky's class on Quakerism. About 40 students, swelled by Max Carter with another dozen from Guilford on a study tour of Amish and other intentional communities. My topic: Service. It was a nice opportunity for me to think over my own involvements (and avoidance of involvements). My chief point is that Quaker service should and can be in all circumstances not just in work camps or AFSC, etc., but in one's job whatever that may be. I cited Mr. Bloom for this aspect, and Vince Buscemi for the narrowly Quaker type of service.

Lunch afterwards produced only two or three students, but an older man, a college drop-out now returned at age 34, a Black, was interesting to have. Also, Elisa Harrison came.

They placed a Macintosh in my quarters in 1 College Circle, very posh. I spent several hours improving and shortening tomorrow's lecture.

Formal dinner at Tom Kessinger's. John Davison extremely friendly and even talkative. Strange. Douglas and Dorothy Steere, Steve and Mrs. Cary, John Cary and wife, Emma Lapsansky, whose mother is about to go into a CCRC and is terrified. We talked about Elizabeth Vining's On Being Seventy, which I abridged for Kendal. I'll send Emma a copy for her mother.

Then we all gathered for a screening of Scorsese's The Last Temptation of Christ. I spoke about the controversy and the film's major structure and points. I like it better and better each time. Visually, it's beautiful. Even the language doesn't bother me any more. But it's still too long, especially the dream sequence. Good comments and questions at the end, but Tom cut it short at 11:00 p.m. The heat was oppressive, and people probably wanted to get to bed.

Wednesday, April 10, 1991

Haverford

Worked all morning on my talk, shortening it, and incorporating something from Bowman's book, which Larry Ingle told me about on Monday when I encountered him in the Quaker Collection. They've given me a Macintosh in my room in 1 College Circle, very sumptuous. Lunch with Peace Studies people, led by Harvey Glickman. Sylvia, the pianist, remembered Alec and Leander well, she told me. She now is a publisher of music composed by women, using a Macintosh to print it. I'm going to try to interest Leander. Then an hour with Dean Matthews Hamabata to find out more about the mediation program here, to help when I try to introduce it at Dartmouth. Hamabata extremely positive, says that normal adjudication never teaches anything whereas mediation does. I took extensive notes and will write a memorandum for our War/Peace Steering Committee at Dartmouth. Big formal dinner in my honor. I sat at table with Louis Green, very lively still, and Steve Cary and wife, and several others. Good talk about Last Temptation, etc. Then to Stokes for my talk: "Quaker Silence Reconsidered from a Literary Point of View." I think it went very well indeed. It's a script that came very easily to me, perhaps because it was composed directly on the computer from extensive notes already on disk. In any case I saw John Davison beaming and applauding enthusiastically afterwards. He told me later that the talk was "like a piece of music," probably because I'd stitched leitmotifs throughout. Many people hoped it will be published. I'll try through PH pamphlets. Hopped in car after the reception in the Quaker Collection, and drove to the Yale Club to sleep. It was nice to have Douglas Steere and Dorothy in the audience. When he congratulated me, I returned the compliment, saying that it all started with him, which it did.

Thursday, April 11, 1991

New York

Chrysanthi and Yiayia had come to New York on Tuesday. They spent time dining with Greg and Daphne, entertained Bubbles and Clarice and Amy for lunch, and went shopping and to the Met to see Fauves.

Pretty good for an 86-year-old. We had an easy drive home listening to The Scarlet Letter.

Friday, April 12, 1991

Elizabeth Keenan came up from New York to see me. Very much the aristocrat, as always, a little ashamed at the outpouring of confidences about her problems that she sent me via post last fall. Apologetic for disappearing from Dartmouth without saying goodbye. She wants to go to law school now, after working for the family shipping business for several years in New York. Poor thing! It's difficult to be a woman of breeding and intelligence in today's society, but it was equally difficult in yesterday's.

Saturday, April 13, 1991

Memorial service for John Dickey: sterile and contrived. No sense of the human being. Only one detail: that he liked to have chocolate ice cream for breakfast. Jim Freedman, who never even met him, spoke in platitudes. Dave McLaughlin did the best he could with his limited intelligence. The three children merely lauded Dick's House. Leonard Rieser read Frost's "Birches" but said nothing about Dickey and Frost. And of course there were hymns, organ music, a string quartet, and the glee club singing the Dartmouth Song. Trustees in gowns, etc., etc. It was putrid. We have lost the skill for rituals.

Sunday, April 14, 1991

To Kinhaven, Bodines' home, for momentous Kinhaven Board meeting. We voted to purchase the property in May to avoid paying this 1991 rent. Bill Polk has gotten a bank to agree to loan us $410,000. Lelah is still difficult, haggling over the tractor, furniture, etc., but basically glad that the sale is proceeding.

Monday, April 15, 1991

Inauguration of Steve Calvert's Elder Hostel scheme, Dartmouth's adult education program, called ILEAD. I'm going to teach Paradise Lost at Kendal in the fall. Steve announced that the board had nominated me as an Honorary Founder. Nice of him.

Tuesday, April 16, 1991

Extra meeting of the Kendal Overseers to continue with the guidelines. After much discussion we decided not to open membership to anyone, with a majority being Quakers, but stretched the Quaker requirement to include “long-term attenders” as well as members. This of course legalizes Chrysanthi. Guidelines still need to be scrutinized in Pennsylvania.

Wednesday, April 17, 1991

Paul Lewis and Carol Weingeist for lunch. He is now the Pennsylvania “boss” for Kendal at Hanover, to whom Jean reports. He came up to tour the site and be present at the open meeting tomorrow.

CAP meeting. Jim Freedman opposed tenure for Andrew Garrod saying his “scholarship” (if you could call it that) didn’t rate. We differed, as did outside reviewers. His own departmental colleagues, Faith Dunne and Mitchell, voted against him. CAP voted for him nonetheless, and Freedman said he’d abide by our decision even though he disagreed. After this, Ulli Rainer’s tenure went through flyingly, despite an irrational letter (or maybe because of it) from Werner Kleinhardt.

Friday, April 19, 1991

Pendle Hill

Overnight in Manchester last night. USAir to Philadelphia, “frequent flyers,” no charge. Another exhausting, interminable meeting of the Publications Committee re: books. Denny O’Brien and John Anderson are now both clearly opposed. Nancy Strong is willing if we can distribute better. Larry Ingle is strongly for, as were some others. Rebecca weaseling as always. Finally we agreed on a minute saying we’d concentrate for five years on reprints of Quaker classics, but be open to some original titles. This is meant to be approved by staff, who mustn’t feel that our effort means diminishment for their efforts. Anderson will obviously sabotage this process.

In the evening session I spoke on the Search Committee process and then introduced Dan Seeger, distributing a two-page bibliographical sketch of him. He spoke at some length, and well. There were nice words from Mather Lippincott about the Search Committee and my work, and appreciation from Fran Taber regarding involvement of staff. It went well. Moving program afterwards. Gordon Browne dared to speak of the need for “intellectual rigor,” bless him.

Saturday, April 20, 1991

Pendle Hill

I was meant to play Mendelssohn’s “Song Without Words” at coffee hour tonight, with Oliver. We even rehearsed it. But I feared I’d miss my flight and Oliver said that Dorothy could accompany him. So I rushed to the station after Executive Committee, rode in with Ken Carroll, who told me all about the George Fox conference in England. Caught earlier flight, 3:30, with 30 seconds to spare. Home in time for supper. Charlie Brown in Meeting spoke movingly of being with his father, whose father had fought in the Civil War, and then with his grandson, who crawled into bed with him. What a feeling! Four generations. I said I'd send him Joyce's "Ecce Puer."

Tuesday, April 23, 1991

Prepared agenda for War/Peace Studies meeting on May 1st, including résumé of my meeting with Hamabata about mediation at Haverford. Lunch with Takis Metaxas, who is quite sure he'll take the job offered at Brisbane. And he and Stella will be married. She's a dear.

Patti Kane, 1985 student, returned to consult about going to medical school. A sexpot then and now with skintight jeans and shirt, legs spread wide. Is she a tease or totally unaware? Told me her mother was a manic-depressive. Her brother, a drug addict, is reformed, thanks in part to Patti's efforts. She is unbalanced a bit, yet so brilliant. A truly philosophical mind. We had a deep discussion about . . . metaphysics. She wants to do psychiatry using literature as offering the best insights. I told her about Robert Coles.

Friday, April 26, 1991

Pendle Hill

Jim Tatum telephoned in a panic at 1:15 to say that he'd forgotten at home the tapes and slides he'd prepared for today's lecture. What to do? I volunteered on twenty minutes' notice to lecture on the end of Sirens and on Circe. And did so. Then jumped in the car with Chrysanthi to catch the 5:10 USAir to Philadelphia.

Met with Margery re: John Anderson's opposition to books. She'll do her best, but he seems entrenched, fearful of new ventures. She says he's also against Pendle Hill On the Road. Supper in Plumtree Inn in Media, where Alec took me a few times.

Saturday, April 27, 1991

Kendal

The first all-boards meeting: Kendal Corporation, Kendal at Hanover, Kendal at Oberlin. Jim Emerson of Presbyterian Homes in Florida was the keynote speaker: excellent. Learned a lot from Alan Hunt, also, about challenges to 501(c)(3) tax-exempt status. Alan also announced Lloyd's resolve to retire as CEO of Kendal-Crosslands and to concentrate on the Kendal Development Corporation prior to full retirement in a few years. Met people from Oberlin and renewed acquaintance with lots of K-C staff including Barb Parsons and Astrid Dorsey. David and Atossa French came, too, from Hanover, also Dick and Channy Brokaw. Learned that our Overseers' guidelines are still not complete. For example, we are meant to review the administrator's performance annually. Jean will love that! Supper with the Frenches at Kendal: filet mignon. Then Chrysanthi and Dorothy Rodgers went to a play-reading, Oliver and I to their apartment to play music: Brahms, Britten, Bruch, Haydn, Mendelssohn, a good session, tireless, from 7:30 until 10:00. I'm greatly energized when I play with him. Drove back to PH at 11:00, having left at 7:30 a.m. Met Mel Kaiser by accident in the kitchen. He and his wife both teach at Guilford. He confirmed the need for reprints of classic Quaker texts.

Sunday, April 28, 1991

Pendle Hill–Hanover

Good talk with Larry Ingle at breakfast. His book is half-accepted by OUP. At Meeting, moving testimonial from a woman who'd been a student "guru" at Kent State in 1971 and whose sister had been killed in the encounter there with the National Guard, after which this woman retreated to private endeavors—cultivated her own garden for almost a decade, before her spirit was healed sufficiently to begin again to become involved in public issues. We also heard that Bev Hershey, who'd been "married" to Renée in a Lesbian arrangement, had gone into a psychotic depression after their relationship foundered. She nursed Renée through a near-fatal illness and was then betrayed. Sandy Olsen explained to us that Lesbian couples often have great trouble because they are too close; they can't establish individual boundaries. So, when the arrangement falters the shock is even worse than it is with a heterosexual couple.

Nice talk with Jim Thomas, who'll be moving to Colorado in retirement. He was in the midst of reunion of the AFSC team that had been with him in Africa, including a couple who love Kazantzakis. She'd read Odyssey three times, Spiritual Exercises, Last Temptation, Greek Passion, Saint Francis. Both said how meaningful the Last Temptation had been to them in the turbulent 1960s. He now runs work camps in Washington, DC, collaborating with Peter Caldwell of Vermont. He agrees with me about AFSC's negligence in youth work. I told him what Steve Cary told me last week—that work camps are being sabotaged by gay-Lesbian issues. Another acquaintance (from Woodbrooke?), an Indian, kept saying that I must go out to India. Why not?

Flowers and blossoms extraordinary this weekend. Brilliant dogwood, cherry, wisteria, apple blossoms, magnolias, azaleas. Yesterday we took an hour between Meeting and supper to go to Longwood Gardens. Tulips tulips tulips: black, scarlet, purple, and white. A feast. . . . 3:30 flight back to Manchester.

April 29, 1991, Hanover

Elise Boulding here. Pot luck at Meeting. She's as ebullient as ever, despite two broken arms and last year's operation that replaced her entire cancerous nose.

Otmar and David Greenfield demonstrated "Annotated Texts," now called "Textra." I'm going to add sound to the computer disk-player, specifically Ritsos reading H Σονάτα synchronized with the verse on the screen. It's a technological marvel.

April 30, 1991

Cook/Bien extravaganza again in war poetry recitation in Jack Shepherd's War/Peace course. Went well. But again we didn't finish. I added the "Arts of Death" speech from Man and Superman.

Wednesday, May 1, 1991

War/Peace Steering Committee breakfast with Elise, Sandi Adams, and Diana Beaudoin, guests, to testify re: mediation project. We got the go-ahead for this, and also for adding a certification possibility to War/Peace Studies. More work for me. But I feel this as a Quaker concern and do it gladly.

Good music tonight. Allan came also for supper since Claire is in Switzerland.

Thursday, May 2, 1991

Humanities brought Odds Bodkin, professional storyteller, who did Odyssey, part 1, beginning through Cyclops inclusive, marvelously, with guitar. A master musician, narrator, and singer; a true ἀοιδός.

Saturday, May 4, 1991

At noon, fifty-odd friends gathered in the Faculty Lounge to give Walter Arndt a surprise on his 75th birthday. By pre-arrangement some of us brought poetry to read. Miriam had remembered the soirée I'd had years ago with Jay Parini and Alistair Reid, and Walter. Mostly they read from Walter's translations. I did six Harkianakis poems, and apparently they were very effective. People asked me for the written text afterwards. Encouraging. But when am I going to start on the 100 Selected Poems? Perhaps this summer? Nice to see David Arndt again; his daughter recited her own poem; and Robbie, now editor of Aramco World, which I receive thanks to the Arndts.

Sunday, May 5, 1991

Tour of Kendal. The carpet is down in the dining room. Two apartments are furnished as models. They seem disappointingly small, alas, not as spacious as Mother's in The Greens, although the bedroom is bigger. Oh well . . .

We gave a dinner party, now a rare occasion. Laasperes, Elliotts, and Jonathan and Caroline Crewe. He's now in the department, a South African, talkative, good guest.

Monday, May 6, 1991

Edward Bradley and I went to the Executive Committee to testify on behalf of the proposed new Foreign Language Abroad program at Anatolia College. Easy. It was 6:00 p.m. and everyone wanted to go home. I explained to what degree Anatolia is a college in our sense and not a high school. So the program is now "official." But will we find any students?

Tuesday, May 7, 1991

Sheila Harvey invited me to lunch to meet Geraldine North, an Australian who is setting up a peer-tutoring center at New England College. I promised to show her our center.

Supper with Sheila, again, and Sheba Freedman, glad to dine with company since Jim is in Japan.

Wednesday, May 8, 1991

Lunch with Jim Hornig, Lee Baldwin, Jack Shepherd to discuss certification in War/Peace. Lee announced his forthcoming marriage to Anne Sa'adah.

Thursday, May 9, 1991

Dickey Endowment lunch with the speaker in our War/Peace course, a man who has worked in the Pentagon. Says generally he finds military men much more pacifistic than civilians.

Mother has two paintings at the Senior Exhibit at Howe Library, arranged again by Chrysanthi. The one done in Tempe is lovely.

Friday, May 10, 1991

Met with Jean Brophy. She's under great pressure from Lloyd to fill Kendal up, poor thing! Yet we're losing people through death and withdrawal. She doesn't come to Meeting because people pounce on her about Kendal and she needs to escape.

Brenda Silver lectured on the reception of Virginia Woolf. Well done.

Saturday, May 11, 1991

Daphne and Greg arrived at 10:00 a.m. having left NYC at 5:00 a.m. Plans for the wedding continue. Now all the men must wear rented tuxedos. They rejected the apartment in Chelsea, 23rd and 10th Avenue, and are looking on the East Side.

Sunday, May 12, 1991

Daphne and Greg met again with Karen Sheldon and lunched with Yiayia while Chrysanthi and I drove to Cambridge to see A.R.T.'s King Lear. Mediocre. Even Alan Epstein as Gloucester was poor. Director's fault. Too much "business" (including dousing Lear and the Fool with water in Act III), not enough poetry, timing, pacing. Saw Jimmy Yannatos. His daughter is dancing again. Can't tell whether he's truly friendly or just pretending.

Monday, May 13, 1991

Chrysanthi met with Lynn Benjamin, caterer for the wedding. Soaked seeds. At 5:00 we took off for the farm. Supper with the Shapiros.

Tuesday, May 14, 1991

Terpni

Garden fence down. All cedar posts are rotted. Propped some up temporarily with steel posts. Planted tomatoes, beans, etc., using Remy and "walls of water" to protect against frost. For tomatoes I used the "mound and trench" system that Bob Watson likes. Started pump, very easy. But one part of the flush system in the toilet froze and cracked because I didn't realize last year that I had to drain it. So, no toilet for now. But we took delicious hot showers at the end of a long, hot day with swarms of black flies. The water is still miraculous to us both.

Thursday, May 16, 1991

Otmar programmed in Ritsos's voice to correspond with "Moonlight Sonata" excerpts in Textra.

To Lebanon high school to observe Kendal "job fair." 100 people, it seemed, filling out applications. All department heads spoke, describing available jobs but also speaking very well about Kendal's values. I joked with them, saying that one week's training at Longwood has made them all sound like birthright Quakers. AMTRAK to Philadelphia, delayed three hours because the engine lost its headlight and had to be replaced. Paul Paganucci and wife went home in disgust, but I waited.

Friday, May 17, 1991

Pendle Hill

Arrived at PH at 12:32. In time. Long breakfast conversation on the Montrealer with three Québécois. Executive Committee approved, with some modification, the ongoing publication of books, thanks mostly, I believe, to Margery, who more or less forced Denny O'Brien to put $30,000 in the budget for start-up costs. But a co-publishing arrangement is still desired, and PH will want to review everything next year. John Anderson, who'd been so opposed, said nothing; indeed, after the decision he ran up to me saying that he hoped we'd reprint Douglas Steere's "Work and Contemplation." Strange world.

Saturday, May 18, 1991

Cadbury Scholarship Committee at breakfast. We had to turn down Rebecca, whose proposal was unfocused and even a bit hysterical, poor thing. . . . I returned via NYC for a short stopover for Chinese supper, and a load of bagels and bread to take home.

Sunday, May 19, 1991

Hanover

Meeting. Lunch with Mother at The Greens. Then meeting at home with Sandi Adams, Diane Beaudoin, and Jack and Kathy Shepherd, for planning the mediation endeavor. Sandi extremely helpful. We had them all for supper afterwards.

Tuesday, May 21, 1991

Kendal Overseers with Paul Lewis visiting. He is now Jean's boss. Open meeting afterwards in Alumni Hall about insurance. Paul told me in passing that there is dissention at Longwood between staff and administration over the "development" initiatives. So, once again, "paradise lost."

At 5:00 p.m., meeting for students interest in Greek LSA. Four showed up. Three football players and a taciturn female. Failure. But Edward says that we must keep trying.

Thursday, May 23, 1991

CAP. Horror story—stories. What to do with Mark Bedan and Sally Sedgwick in Philosophy? Supported unanimously by ad-hoc committee including Penner and Berthold, but obviously mediocre, just barely tenurable. And Fogelin, who was in Italy and did not participate, wrote a separate letter damning them with faint praise. All this is complicated by Sedgwick's martyrdom at the hands of the Dartmouth Review last year. We tenured Sedgwick and voted promotion without tenure for Bedan. But in the doorway on the way out we felt that this was unfair and requested another meeting to reconsider. Also on today's agenda, Mara Sabinson in drama, opposed by her colleagues, favored by everyone else on the ad-hoc committee. I pushed her tenure despite accounts that she is an impossible person. But students adore her, and she stirs everything up intellectually and artistically, which is more than the others do.

Friday, May 24, 1991

Met with the Accreditation Committee for the English Department. I regretted discontinuance of team teaching and lack of courses that are truly "advanced." In the afternoon, Peter Cosgove lectured on Gibbon. I then met with President Freedman (and, by chance, with his new assistant, Peter Martin, who turns out to be a former student of mine who remembers being invited home with his family at graduation) about our mediation endeavor.

Saturday, May 25, 1991

To Louis and Sally Cornell's farm in Fairlee. They now keep 25 sheep. The home used to be Forrest Boley's. They built a huge addition and in effect have two houses attached. Pretext for the invitation was to greet Stephen Cornell's new wife. All the boys were there, and seemed to remember us with fondness, as we them. In this "Vermont hill farm" the hors d'oeuvres, I learned, were all from Zabar's! I'm embarrassed because I haven't asked Louis again to play music, but Dick, Allan, and I do so well, just the three of us, and a viola would require a violin. Met Edna Pierce's lovely blond daughter, now living with a sous chef of Hanover Inn, a Black, whom she met at cooking school in Boston.

Sunday, May 26, 1991

After Meeting, I delivered my Haverford lecture on Quaker Silence to a “fit audience but few.” People hoped I’d publish it. Ditto. Then to Sunapee to Frenches’ tree farm. Her father, a Norwegian immigrant, became a wealthy NYC physician, bought a huge tract of lakefront property in the early 1900s. Now they have just about 25 acres and nothing on the lake, but close, with dock rights. David is amazing for an 80-year-old. The occasion was to welcome them into the Meeting (or back into the Meeting). With us were Stettenheims and Drysdales.

Monday, May 27, 1991

We took Takis and Stella to supper at Jesse’s. She’s a dear. He’s choosing between job offers in Australia, Louisiana, and . . . Dartmouth.

Tuesday, May 28, 1991

French Department gave a reception for John Rassias to celebrate his 25th year at Dartmouth. I felt like boycotting it after our falling out last New Year’s Eve, but went anyway. Speeches by Neal Oxenhandler (who is soon to retire) and Mary Jean Green. John very moved, especially considering his long-term estrangement from the department. Afterwards, he and Mary came to the house: a gesture, I suppose, of reconciliation and of reestablishment of our special relationship. So be it. It’s terrible to lose a long-term friend.

Wednesday, May 29, 1991

Breakfast with Steve Calvert, to say goodbye. He’s taking a job at Carnegie Mellon. It was Steve who put us on three cruises (although the first recommendation came, I think, from Bob McGrath), and Steve who developed ILEAD, the new adult education initiative that I’ll be teaching in next fall. He leaves because Dartmouth really has no interest, he says, in adult education.

Reception later for Dee Johnson, who is retiring early. Too bad.

May 30, 1991

Comp. Lit. annual senior lunch. Now the advisers talk about advisees. Pleasant.

CAP again. Jim Tatum and I argued that to promote two mediocre people in a small department like Philosophy would be to guarantee the department’s mediocrity after the senior people retire. CAP then reversed its earlier decision, deciding to terminate both Sedgwick and Bedan. We know that a storm of protest will follow. With bad taste in our mouths, we went off to the Inn for the annual CAP dinner.

Friday, May 31, 1991

Had Graham Wallis and John Kroll to lunch to try to get them to breathe new life into the War/Peace Seminar. I think it may work.

Saturday, June 1, 1991

Daphne arrived on AMTRAK. We didn't go to our last A.R.T. play; gave the tickets to Charles Stewart and his girlfriend. Daphne and Greg have taken a co-op sublet on E. 79th Street and Second Avenue.

Monday, June 3, 1991

Reception at Kendal for overseers and department heads. Jean tells me that we're having a new row with the town over taxation. Then to ILEAD reception at the Coolidge. Lots of enthusiasm for this new venture. Tom Champion is in charge. Then directly to Terpni.

Tuesday, June 4, 1991

Terpni

Started the tractor and even mounted the mower, but it broke after five minutes' use. Started the Jari by pouring gasoline into the cylinder to prime it. Fixed the toilet. Swept. Watered the tomatoes.

Thursday, June 6, 1991

Cambridge

Finished grading in Humanities 2. Then faculty lunch joined by Peter Saccio, who'll be added to the course next year. Then to 4th Council to plead the case for renewal of College Course 1; they worry about its lack of coherence. Then to Cambridge. Supper with George Goodman. Then together to Mimi Berlin's house for meeting of the Boston area Capital Campaign Committee assembled by Jock Forbes—an impressive lot, including Bill Lipscomb, the Nobel Laureate in biochemistry. I gave the introduction about Kinhaven's past, present, and future. George handled details of the campaign: who solicits whom, and for how much. People seemed willing. Forbes is interesting: an aristocrat apparently without money—i.e., cash—his home and summer home are worth millions. Drives a rusted out old pick-up. Contributed $200 a year to the campaign. But his name is magic, apparently. Afterwards, George and I drove back to Amherst. His second cataract operation was successful; he can see again, with one eye (an earlier cataract operation left the other eye totally blind). Nice man.

Friday, June 7, 1991

Amherst–Londonderry–Weston

A banner day. Drove to Londonderry to act as witness for the purchase of Kinhaven by the School. John Austin signed. And Lelah, of course. All went well. We borrowed $385,000 (a $25,000 last-minute gift from the Erlangers reduced the original amount of $410,000) in order to both mortgage the Kinhaven 26 acres and re-finance the five acres plus Hale House that we bought last year. Then with Bill Polk and John to Kinhaven to devour a bottle of champagne and to share lunch with Lelah. Also, the revolving fans are installed in the concert hall—my gift. Lelah may wish to exchange her wooded acres south of the property for a smaller plot on the north side, near the soccer field. Bill and I walked this; we are wary because of our own needs for future expansion. On the drive home, I bought a milkshake to make good the one that spilled all over the cassette tapes last year in the same spot. . . . Supper at the Officers' with Sheila and Dee.

Saturday, June 8, 1991

Hanover

I sweated in the sun in my black robes for 2½ hours at the Medical School Class Day exercises and then rose to recite the Hippocratic Oath in Greek (using modern pronunciation). This was the idea of the new dean, Andy Wallace, who served previously under a Greek-American dean who always did this. I gave a short introduction about Hippocrates and the oath itself, originally a contract between a medical student and a teacher assuring the teacher that the student would pay his fees. People seemed to like this innovation.

Alec arrived at JFK, greeted by Leander, Daphne, and James McBride and his girlfriend Stephanie Payne. But his luggage was left behind in Seoul.

Sunday, June 9, 1991

Alec and Leander arrived, Alec's luggage having reached JFK by the next plane. Alec in good shape, especially compared to last year when he returned home so sick. He speaks about returning to graduate school in educational administration in September 1992, which would mean only one more year in Jakarta. Amen.

Leander is working to finish the score of his "Panoply for Brass Quintet" to submit to a competition. Score done via computer thanks to Jerry Bidlack, but Leander had to do it again because of transposing instruments. He played a tape of the piece—strong, good music, although a bit over-long to my taste. I bought an extra Mac-plus to help encourage Leander to use the computer, finally.

Tuesday, June 11, 1991

To the Norwich Inn to see the manager re: irregularities in our wedding reservation. She's been charging full rate instead of our agreed-on special price. She apologized and vowed to do better.

Wednesday, June 12, 1991

Marsha Swislocki visited. She and Walter Stephens complained to Jim Tatum, because I agreed to re-read some papers graded by them when students approached them. I did so in full naïveté, but they saw it as impugning their competence and, in Marsha's case, as fortifying the students' anti-feminist bias. I agreed that I should have consulted with her first. We parted amicably.

Sent off IBM conversion disk to Carla Heath after much work converting the files from Macintosh. Lots of help from Nancy Davies, bless her. And Volume 9, no. 2 of the journal went off to Carol last Friday. I did this issue single-handedly since Herzfeld was in Europe and so was Cohen, my student assistant. Lots of negotiation, as when Keeley objected to Ole Smith's review of his Polk book; of course he shouldn't have seen the review in the first place, and as when Ernie mistakenly assigned two people to review the same book. I rewrote it, combining both and got their permission to print this version. And the papers submitted by Gail Holst and Nancy Sultan needed so much re-working and retyping. And Mary Layoun really does not edit the book reviews adequately. Oh well . . . I've fallen woefully behind on the vetting of MSS, but at least both #s 1 & 2 of Volume 9 were submitted to Hopkins on time.

Thursday, June 13, 1991

CAP mess again. A campaign of letter writing on behalf of Sedgwick accused us of insensitivity to the plight of women in the sexist Philosophy Department not to mention the College. We split 3 to 3 on the vote to reconsider, with Jim Tatum again speaking for termination. I voted with him, as did Ray Hall. John Walsh switched his previous vote to vote the other way this time, joined by Lynn Mather (of course) and Chuck Braun. Jim Wright refused to break the tie, so the vote to reconsider failed. Then we turned to Bedan, where some new evidence encouraged us to vote for reconsideration. Then the Dean said that differentiating was impossible, so he'd now vote to break the Sedgwick tie, thus opening up her reconsideration as well. Exhausted and confused, we felt that to proceed now would be inadvisable, and set yet another meeting. Over all this hangs the threat of court action by Sedgwick. What a mess, and all because some of us had the courage to place the long-term needs of the College above the easy way out, and the humane way of granting tenure.

Friday, June 14, 1991

Hanover-Terpni

Finished my final obligations, submitting ORC copy to the Registrar for War/Peace Studies, College Courses, and University Seminars after a week's effort to contact numerous people especially about the Seminars. As for War/Peace, decided not to include certification procedure, since the 4th Council continued College Course 1 for only one more year, pending a further investigation of the entire enterprise next fall. In University Seminars I spent 154% of my budget, mostly because of the demise of the Faculty Club and increased use of the Inn. Must go begging next fall. Felt a tremendous lassitude after this and went home to listen to Leander's and Deanna's wonderful performance of the Kreutzer Sonata while lying in bed. Later, drove to the farm. Supper at Smith's; the old rituals. Shopping in the new Grand Union in North Creek.

Saturday, June 15, 1991

Terpni

Already received a Fed Ex packet: brochure for the September cruise. Why do I always say Yes to everything? Spent the day opening shutters, removing wasps' nests, setting up "office," mowing with the Jari, disassembling a broken part on the Ford mower, setting up computer and FAX, caulking gaps in the bathroom before removing the shutters, writing at long last to John Waterlow about Sir Sydney's Kazantzakis materials. Another delicious shower at day's end, and a superb spaghetti dinner made by Chrysanthi entirely from fresh vegetables picked from the garden.

Sunday, June 16, 1991

Leander and Deanna arrived from Minneapolis, Deanna together with her new violin, a late 1700s Italian make purchased from a Chicago dealer for $120,000! She sold her previous one for $40,000, however. She played it. It's "fruity"—sounds almost like an organ voice. Gorgeous.

Tuesday, June 18, 1991

Our first live view of the infamous Mr. Morris, who wants to subdivide 27 acres (the old Baker woodlot) at the end of Waddell Road into 19 lots to be built upon, he claims, exclusively by his children and grandchildren (he has ten children). Everyone here regards him as either a psychopath or a crook, or possibly both. Is he trying to get round APA regulations this way, family, in order to sell the plots later on the open market? Or is he just a self-destructive paranoiac? Originally he wanted all the plots around the "lake" (actually a swamp created by beaver dams) but APA refused this because of wetlands management. He will have to pump sewage to high ground, construct his own road, bring electric in from our pole, etc. It's insane. Now he has a lawyer, Fred Monroe, the co-leader of the Adirondack Fairness Coalition opposing the Governor's Commission. Fred is slick and devious. Kept talking about the 2000 acre provision, which is already a dead letter. Claimed that Morris is no longer under APA jurisdiction. Discussion centered on the future of Waddell Road. It would need to be rebuilt to be two lanes wide so that two fire engines could pass on it, etc. Morris said he'd like it to remain as is. The Board shunted him over to the Planning Board, which next meets on July 1st. Nice that I knew everyone on the Board except Gene Arsenault. I'd spoken to the Supervisor earlier. He handled the meeting very well. Dennis Conroy of UHEAC was taking copious notes. Don Greene, now on the "master plan" board, was listening carefully; ditto for Bob Nettle. As we left the hall and encountered Morris and entourage outside, I didn't say hello, which was a mistake. Finished with a hot fudge sundae—life's little pleasures.

Started mowing with the Ford mower but the balance spring bolt snapped in two. Disassembled the linkage and brought everything to Bud Rudick in Schroon.

Thursday, June 20, 1991

Alec left for Hanover yesterday and today he'll go to Logan Airport to pick up Lydia Lee, the violinist who's coming to Kinhaven from Jakarta International School. She's a Singapore Chinese living in Jakarta. Also to be picked up was a Honduran bassist sent to Kinhaven by Betty Clendenning. How nice.

Beveridge Webster called. "I'm still an alcoholic" was his opening. But he described how he has been faithfully attending AA and is about to go to California for a month's intensive cure at RR ("Realistic Rehabilitation"). He desperately wants to enter Kendal. Franny, his wife, has vowed to come in any case and is backed in this by the children. I began to negotiate with them for two pianos; Franny will donate her Steinway if we place it in a lounge near her apartment. Beveridge will bring along the nine-foot Baldwin loaned him for life by the Baldwin Company, and place it in the auditorium. Audrey Logan, Dick Brokaw, Jean Brophy, and I will meet next Tuesday as the Donations Committee and report back. I'm eager to have Webster admitted but fear that Jean will demur. She probably had an alcoholic father and is too rigid on this issue.

Working on JMGS backlog, the pileup of manuscripts never sent out for review, etc.

Friday, June 21, 1991

Grand supper at Gore Mountain Lodge buffet in honor of Rosine Gardner, who graduated with a B.A. from SUNY after seven years of part-time study. Her father came from France; he kept hopping around taking pictures like a Japanese tourist, never spoke to anyone. Nice to see Kelly Nettle again; her daughter's in Bryn Mawr. Met Pete Smith. Mrs. Smith is a guidance counselor in the North Creek school. Michael Gouthreau looking well, proud of his solar energy system. Certain victories against Eliot Monter & Co.: no golf course, but the Oven Mountain Development is still happening. Afterwards, drove to Hanover.

Saturday, June 22, 1991

Hanover

Daphne and Greg arrived in the morning and got their marriage license, visited Sally at the Norwich Inn and then Karen Sheldon again to settle on the form of the service. I discovered that Champion's is going out of business. So, no tuxedos from them for the wedding. Bought two sports jackets at half price. Also, there were two murders in Hanover during the week of our absence. A visiting Ethiopian man slaughtered two Ethiopian women with an axe, with premeditation. Met with CAP again (!), the fourth time, about Bedan and Sedgwick. We reversed ourselves yet again, granting promotion without tenure to both, with tenure review in two years, teaching and scholarship for Sedgwick, just scholarship for Bedan. So the process was: first decision: promotion without for Bedan, tenure for Sedgwick; second decision: termination for both; third decision, as stated. There was a terrible furor on campus over Sedgwick from all the women, but we discounted that. Jim Tatum and Ray Hall were the only ones who continued to want termination. John Walsh and I shifted our votes to promotion without tenure. It was the basic question of (a) compassion for the individuals, both of whom just qualified for tenure, barely, or (b) protection of Dartmouth's future by trying to avoid a mediocre department when the two control it as senior members.

Nice supper with Daphne, Greg, Yiayia.

Sunday, June 23, 1991

Daphne, Greg, and Chrysanthi drove to Boston for Daphne's shower hosted by Maria Martin. I went to Meeting; ministered about our mediation attempt vs. legalism, then lunched with Yiayia and Bunny Little, who frightened me by saying that Beveridge Webster had just died, but she had confused him with another musician named Beveridge.

Vigorously trying to civilize my office. Two years worth of course materials were just piled on a shelf instead of being re-filed.

Watched Itzhak Perlman and ? (the violist) on TV with a hilarious interlude with Victor Borge in an all-Mozart program. Then a program on the I. M. Pei concert hall in Dallas that Daphne and Greg had just seen when they visited Greg's father last weekend.

Tuesday, June 26, 1991

Kendal Overseers meeting for the first time at Kendal itself. Workmen are frantically trying to finish the Community Center, etc. in time for Monday when folks begin to move in. None of the furniture has arrived yet. Pauline Yost showed us the kitchen she designed. Everything strikes me as just a little too small, but the total is still most impressive. We now have a big problem again with the Town regarding taxation. They increased the land valuation from $770,000 to $5,000,000 and are taxing us almost $500,000 a year instead of the estimated $330,000. We're all meant to write to the Selectmen. Our lawyer is preparing an application for abatement, and we are resolved to enter litigation if necessary. What a shame! We also approved Webster's pianos but hope to arrange with the Baldwin Company beforehand what will happen to the nine-foot piano after Beveridge dies. I walked through the facility a bit afterwards. What a pleasure to see it really here six years after the idea hatched between Lloyd Lewis and myself.

Drove back to Terpni. Went back on Waddell Road to try to find Morris's lake. Failed. But walked through his property, which is everywhere posted (!), and marked with surveyor's tape, and has percolation holes here and there, left open, and thus very dangerous.

Wednesday, June 26, 1991

Back on telephone for three-quarters of an hour with Franny Webster. She unburdened herself to me. Fifty-two years of marriage to Beveridge apparently hasn't been all pie and ice cream. She's now resolved to look out for her own interests—i.e., to enter Kendal even if he cannot. What a mess! Kendal shouldn't be breaking up families. Yet Lilla Bradley is moving in without David because their marriage is already effectively ended although they continue to occupy the same house, so in this case Kendal is a solution. Franny says she could never speak this way to Jean Brophy, whom she found cold. But she loved Barbara Gilbert, and also felt comfortable with Naomi Hartov, our new Director of Admissions

John Austin telephoned. Kinhaven has been granted $75,000 by the Kresge Foundation. Hooray! I expect that my letters to Dick Van Dusen and Jill Conway helped. But David Bury's application was exemplary. Now we have to raise more than $300,000.

Got new part from Bud: $42.00 for a bolt. Reassembled it with Alec's help, doing a careful adjustment of the mower for the first time so that the outer shoe weighs only 25 pounds. Tried the inner shoe adjustment but couldn't because the adjusting nut is frozen to its bolt. So the inner shoe comes down with 300 pounds of pressure instead of 80, which is why I had trouble mowing last year. But we can compensate by raising the shoe just a bit off the ground with the hydraulic lift.

Back into Morris's property with some better directions this time from Dennis Conroy. Found the "lake," which is large, in the midst of a swamp like the one where I cut my balsam logs. Difficult footing complicated by lots of slash. And in the midst of all this, a stretch of sheep fence. The whole area had been cleared at one time.

Thursday, June 27, 1991

Called Rebecca Mays to find out what happened at the PH Publications Committee yesterday. Relieved to learn that my essay on Quaker Silence was accepted. There are some suggestions for revision but no need for the committee to see the text again. We planned for the new cycle of book publishing. I'll write to Paul Niebanck, Sonny Cronk, Gay Nicholson, and Bill Taber to see if they'll join the Book Review Committee.

Ordered a plastic owl and an inflated snake to help keep birds away from our blueberries, but Chrysanthi got hysterical about the snake.

Friday, June 28, 1991

Finished lubricating the mower and tractor. Managed to extract the screw portion of a broken zerk and replaced it. Mowed front field with no difficulty whatever. Mower behaved perfectly.

Last night, Shapiros here bringing guidebooks for Spain. I'm trying to arrange our travel with Travel Dynamics.

Tonight, I went to the weekly dancing for the first time. Evelyn Greene is the teacher. She's superb, very relaxed. Shapiros, Evelyn, and Don (who danced in his ungainly way a few times), Hilda, somebody called Virginia, and us. I didn't do too badly, they said. Fun. Frozen yogurt and cordials at Shapiros afterwards.

Saturday, June 29, 1991

I'm catching up on long-overdue correspondence, and six months of unread TLSs. Played through the Kreutzer Sonata with Alec the other day after replacing a damper on the piano. Hacked through it, rather. Starting to read Nancy Frankenberry's Religion and Radical Empiricism, which has caused such a stir. Leander called. He's playing the Ravel trio tonight and Deanna is doing one of the Bartok quartets. Alec is going, but Chrysanthi and I will stay home. Daphne and Greg are moving today to 308 E. 79th Street, Apt. 15F. Too bad to give up that dream apartment on Madison at 64th, but it was too small, really, for the two of them, and without a real kitchen.

Saw a doe, the tiniest fawn, all spotted, in midday right in our driveway whence they proceeded to steal apples from our tree.

Cherry tree produced but is dying. Next year I must expand the orchard: more apples, another cherry or two, some plums in the hope they'll produce.

Daphne and Greg moved to 308 E. 79th, giving up that unbelievable (but also alas too small) flat on Madison and 64th Street.

Monday, July 1, 1991

To Planning Board for Morris hearing again. Quite subdued and rational this time. Their entire strategy is to escape APA jurisdiction, so they've reduced the subdivisions to sixteen, are not building on wetlands, will have individual septic systems, etc. And the deeds will restrict ownership to family for something like 100 years. It's totally insane, of course, but Morris is a monomaniac. He introduced himself afterwards and we had a friendly chat, also with his wife. Said he fell in love with that land and wept after finally purchasing it after three years' delay. Then the customary paranoia started, re: APA, etc. I'm told that he also thinks that the town's planning board is infiltrated by communists and pinkos. I doubt he'll ever build anything; he looks too sick.

Wednesday, July 3, 1991

Apparently my strong letter to Hanover Selectmen re: Kendal taxation has raised some tempers. Kirk, the chairman, accosted Jean about it at Rotary yesterday, but I don't know further details.

Jerry Gardner for supper. He's trapped by the newspaper, which continues to lose money yet really cannot be sold. And Rosine refuses to help him, so he does the whole thing alone. Advertisers refuse to pay, etc.

Dancing again. It's fun. I'm trying to practice before the wedding.

Daphne and Greg flew today to London to see the semi-finals and finals of Wimbledon. Some life-style—his, of course, more than hers. The tickets were a gift from his boss.

July 4, 1991

Naoko and Yasuo arrived. Lots of good talk despite their linguistic handicaps in English. Went to visit Gary and Wendy McGinn at their home on Schroon Lake, ten acres, all that's left from his grandfather's farm that was cut in two by Interstate 87 and the new Route 9. Then to Independence Day parade, a vision of America that is very foreign to me in the elitist enclave of Dartmouth, Yale Club, etc. Born-again Christians extolling family and Bible, super-patriots welcoming the boys back home, volunteer firemen by the score. Pizza at the Narrows; then took down a huge wasps' nest under Alec's porch which turned out to be empty; then played chamber music: Bach and Telemann. Piano behaving nicely. I replaced several dampers two days ago.

JMGS galleys arrived. I have no help from Michael, who's in Greece, or Kate. With luck Mary Layoun will pitch in.

Wednesday, July 10, 1991

Skipping dancing this evening. Alec and I sight-read the Beethoven violin concerto. I've heard it dozens of times, of course, but its brilliance never registered before as deeply as it did today because of actually playing it.

We felled a large dead pine on the pond bank, landing it "square on a dime" by using the come-along. Only 31 years old. 15-inch diameter 16 feet up. We've sawed several 18-inch sections to use as stools and one for stabilizing fireplace wood that has to be split. There's a six-foot section that we sawed again longitudinally and Alec is making into two benches.

Friday, July 12, 1991

Supper at Don and Evelyn Greene's, next to the Hudson on River Road, North Creek. Pleasant. He was remarkably talkative (for him). They have a good, varied life even here, because they are both so creative. Afterwards, drove directly to Hanover to deposit Chrysanthi there while I attend the Kinhaven Board this weekend.

Saturday, July 13, 1991

Weston

Our first board meeting as owners of the property. Lelah thankfully absent. The Main House fully occupied by staff (including Leander and Deanna). We reacted negatively to Lelah's desire to swap six acres of our property to build a house, with six acres of her woods. We need to raise $300,000 in order to get the Kresge challenge grant of $75,000. In the staff concert, Leander, Deanna, and Wayne played the Arensky trio, second-rate Mendelssohn. I found it boring, but Deanna played well, although somewhat lifelessly compared to Coke, afterwards, in the Beethoven opus 132. She despises his style and vice versa. Overnight in the Blue Gentian. Dick Kidde died of cancer over the winter and his wife is trying to carry on alone. Very discouraged, since the entire Magic Mountain is about to close.

Sunday, July 14, 1991

Weston

Lunch with Leander and Deanna. They say that Jerry is worse than ever: morose, distant. The place is somewhat demoralized. In the board meeting he spoke strongly against the guest composer idea, saying it's disruptive and that the staff, too, are opposed. Of course Peter Schultz then echoed him. Leander says just the opposite is the case; the staff are clearly in favor. Jerry is threatened, of course. But I must admit that the orchestra sounded fine in Wagner's "The Flying Dutchman." Yet Leander says that the best students generally elect not to return because of the poor experience in orchestra. Last night, at staff concert, nice talk with Lydia Lee, the thirteen-year-old violinist who came from Jakarta International School because of Alec. A little "lady" already with marvelous English and total self-confidence, an accomplished conversationalist. Karen Van Dyck and her husband Nelson Moe came last night. He turns out to be the son of the professor of choral conducting at Oberlin; he grew up with Arthur Dann's children, etc. So he and Leander had lots to talk about, as did I and Karen. They returned today with Jacob, their baby, and I drove them to Norwich after the concert. Karen likes my Ritsos's Painterly Technique essay and wants to cite it in relation to something she's doing now with women's poetry.

Monday, July 15, 1991

Hanover

Met with Lloyd Lewis at Kendal. He's still unhappy about Jean, says she alienates and humiliates her underlings. He wants me to join him in December in her evaluation interview. Μπελάς!

Went for pizza in Lebanon with Chrysanthi and ran into Jim Freedman just back from Berlin, Prague, etc., and fully cognizant of his speech tomorrow. Also Lee Baldwin and Anne Sa'adah, looking radiant after their marriage on Saturday.

Tuesday, July 16, 1991

Hanover/Kendal

A great day! Started at Kendal at 8:00 a.m. with Admissions Committee. Then at 8:30 joint boards: Directors and Overseers. Very good discussion of the tax imbroglio. We decided to fight it, but non-aggressively and non-publicly, with no more letters, but working quietly with town officials. Also made some more adjustments to the Overseers' guidelines.

Jean and I divided up the "thank yous" for this afternoon and I rushed to the office to get a clean copy printed. Hot dog lunch on Main Street.

Chanced to meet Cary Clarke, who gave good advice regarding taxation, especially don't by-pass the tax assessor by going to the Selectmen. Work with the assessor and the Town Manager. Strive for principles rather than dollar amounts.

At 2:00 p.m. we had our ribbon-cutting ceremony under two large tents in Kendal's central courtyard. Huge crowd. I was master of ceremonies, giving thanks, then introducing, in turn, Jean, Lloyd, Jim Freedman, Alan Hunt, and Lynmar Brock. Jim spoke well, lifting material from my letters to him about how the Kendal concept is new in the whole history of Western civilization because it enables older people to reshape their lives in a meaningful way instead of simply declining and vegetating. I concluded with a mini-sermon on "Control": how, paradoxically at a time when we seem to have lost control because of physical decay, we actually have more control over the direction we want our life to take. This was well received. Then Lynmar and I cut the ribbon, with video camera recording and . . . the door stuck! Finally pulled it open. Everyone entered to explore. We went up to the third floor of Mary Dyer to see no. 301, Mother's apartment, still unfinished, and then enjoyed the splendid hors d'oeuvres prepared by Paulette Yost and the chef. Lots of conversation with excited, happy people. Best of all, both Alec and Leander came for the ceremony.

A few moments in the office gathering things for the farm, then back to Kendal for dinner in the dining room: a fine meal, delicious. Nice to see Peggy Hebert hostessing there. Then drove back to the farm. To bed at 1:00 a.m.

Wednesday, July 17, 1991

Terpni

To NYC ballet on our anniversary, with Alec. Daphne sent a lovely card, saying she hoped her marriage would be as good as ours. Fine show: a Japanese-style ballet (Balanchine), Dances at a Gathering (Robbins, to Chopin), then a wild west extravaganza (Balanchine again). Weightlessness is the miracle. Escape from contingency.

Thursday, July 18, 1991

Very hot. I swam for the first time (I've been reveling in the shower up to now). Shapiros and Adlers for supper. Milly brought a striking painting for Daphne. Irv and Jack both helped me re: the Lloyd-Jean problem, counseling an active program to help Jean before the evaluation takes place.

Friday, July 19, 1991

Jean faxed an angry letter from Kirk, the Selectman, saying that our letters irritate the Selectmen and serve only to harden their position. Also that a minority think that Kendal is still under-valued. Much trouble ahead.

Train tickets to Madrid arrived. I'm getting excited about our first trip to Spain.

Sunday, July 21, 1991

Morning: Reached 1947 in selecting and dating the Kazantzakis letters. The final decade remains.

Afternoon: Finished mowing. Και του χρόνου!

Evening: Supper with Aser and Evelyn Rothstein. They took us to a feast at the McGee House in Warrensburg, their treat, an anniversary present.

Monday, July 22, 1991

Received the following remarkable letter from Stylianos:

Φίλιτατοί μου Peter και Χρυσάνθη,

Μέ πολλή συγκίνηση έλαβα τό άγγελτήριο—προσκλητήριο τών γάμων τής Δάφνης και του Gregory, και σπεύδω νά εκράσω από τώρα όλόθερμες τίς εϋχές και τήν προσευχήν νά τούς άξιώσει ό Θεός, όχι μόνο νά ζήσουν χαρούμενοι, αλλά και να αντιγράψουν δημιουργικά όσο περισσότερα μπορέσουν στοιχεία από τόν δικό Σας εϋλογημένο γάμο.

Άν οί άποστάσεις ήσαν μικρότερες και οί ύποχρεώσεις λιγώτερες, μήν άμφιβάλλετε ότι θά παρευρισκόμουν αύτοπροσώπως σ' αύτή τήν μεγάλη ώρα τής Δάφνης, γιατί γνωρίζετε τά ιδιαίτερα αισθήματα πού μου ένέπνευσε αυτό τό παιδί, γνήσιο όμοίωμα σε παράσταση και φρόνημα πρός τό μυθικό πρότυπό της.

Έσωκλείνω, τελείως συμβολικά, έπιταγήν εκ US$500 νά τής τό προσφέρετε εκ μέρους μου για ένα μικρό δωράκι τήν ήμέρα εκείνη. Έπίσης θά αναλάβετε νά μου τούς φιλήσετε σταυρωτά και τούς δυό τήν ώρα τής στέψεως.

Εὔχομαι μέ τό καλό καί στά ἄλλα παιδιά Σας.

Μέ τό ἴδιο ταχυδρομεῖο Σᾶς στέλνω τήν τελευταία μου ποιητική συλλογή «Ἡ Ἄλλη Ἐκδοχή», καθώς κι ἓνα ἄλλο βιβλίο μου πού ἀφορᾷ τήν περιρέουσα ἀτμόσφαιρα στό θεολογικό Διάλογο.

Εὐχόμενος νά μήν ἀργήσουμε νά ξανασυναντηθούμε, Σᾶς κατασπάζομαι ὅλους, καί διατελῶ

Ἐν Σύννευ τῇ 12ῃ Ἰουλίου 1991

Μέ βαθειά ἀγάπη καί νοσταλγία

Στυλιανός

I translated the letter as follows and sent it off to Daphne.

Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of Australia
242 Cleveland Street
Redfern
Sydney, N.S.W. 2016
Australia

Dear Peter and Chrysanthi,

I was extremely moved to receive the announcement and invitation for the marriage of Daphne and Gregory. I hasten to express this instant my ardent blessings and the prayer that God may grant not only that they live together in happiness but that they creatively copy as many as possible elements as they can from your own blessed marriage.

If the distance were not so great and my obligations fewer, have no doubts that I would appear in person at this great moment of Daphne's, because you are well aware of the special feelings inspired in me by that child, who is the genuine image—in performance and in wisdom—of her mythical prototype.

I enclose, in an entirely symbolic way, a check in the amount of US$500.00 so that you may present her, on my behalf, a tiny little present on that day. In addition, please undertake to embrace both of them for me on both cheeks at the moment of their coronation.

With wishes for the same luck with your other children.

I'm sending by the same post my latest collection of poetry, "The Other Aspect," as well as a book of mine that treats the current atmosphere in our theological Dialogue with the Roman Catholic Church.

With hopes that we shall meet again soon. I embrace all of you, and remain,

With deep love and nostalgia,
Stylios

Chrysanthi is teaching me how to waltz in preparation for the wedding.

Job now: cleaning out the weeds from the pond, a few each day.

Tuesday, July 23, 1991

Lloyd Lewis telephoned to report a crisis at Kendal: (1) Jean refused to come to the quarterly retreat at Longwood and forbade Carol to go either. (2) Bev Fuller, food services manager, insulted Paulette Yost, said she wasn't supposed to be directed from Philadelphia but only by Jean, etc. Lloyd says he's going to command Jean to go to Philadelphia and, if she refuses, fire her. He'll keep me posted.

Wednesday, July 24, 1991

Cliff Vermilye, Hanover town manager, telephoned about Kendal taxes. Of course he sees them as fair, expensive only because everything is expensive. I telephoned Jean and was relieved to hear that she'd gone to Philadelphia.

Folk dancing at night. I'm all "toes."

Thursday, July 25, 1991

Lloyd called. He confronted Jean with accusation that she's not a "team player." She denied this. He confronted her about the Fuller-Yost blowup. She pleaded ignorance. He told her she must deal with it, by firing Fuller after a hearing.

Friday, July 26, 1991

Paul Lewis, Paulette, and Jean presumably confronted Fuller today. I don't know what happened. What a shame! I thought we'd have at least a «honeymoon» of 100 days. I emphasized to Lloyd how demoralizing this could be for other heads of department unless they are made to understand fully what happened. So, all the beautiful food produced for the 16th was done by a staff at odds with the "help" sent from Philadelphia.

Gave Alec a belt sander in advance for his birthday, to use at once on the rustic bench he's making. We replaced a fence post in the garden. He's rebuilding the garden gate. Ewe and faun directly in back of the house eating Chrysanthi's flowers and looking very interested in our garden. I shooed them away.

Mailed galley proofs of JMGS volume 9 #1 to Carol Hamblen.

To ballet. Supper there with Rothsteins. Stravinsky's "The Cage" was breathtaking; choreography by Jerome Robbins. Balanchine's "Scotch Symphony" also lovely, but Peter Martins' "Four Gnossiennes" (Erik Satie) was very slight and Robert LaRosse's "Waltz Trilogy" too traditional for my taste. I had a better feeling overall on July 16. Still, "The Cage" made it all worthwhile.

Sally at Norwich Inn finally sent prices for the wedding dinner. $20.00 each plus wine. We expect almost 100 guests.

Saturday, July 17, 1991

Long talk with Meg Alexiou. Mike Keeley has resigned from JMGS board and Meg and I thought about his replacement: Tziovas (1st choice), Dimiroulis, Van Dyck, Jusdanis, Ole Smith maybe.

I've vetted and re-vetted Alec's statement to submit to Harvard Graduate School of Education to study administration of independent schools. It's getting better.

We worked on the garden gate. Dinner with Mary and Maureen Fitzgerald at their home in North Creek.

Tuesday, July 30, 1991

Hanover

In Hanover so that Chrysanthi can attend Admissions Committee discussion, again on the case of Beveridge Webster. I stayed away, assuming that my presence would be counter-productive. Chrysanthi reported that the group split down the middle. Head nurse Eileen and Mayme were legalistic: no alcoholics allowed. We gave him a year and he didn't cure himself; so, no admittance. The person from Kendal at Longwood, and our new social worker, and Chrysanthi were more humanitarian and compassionate: He's trying. Let him in. See what happens in a year. Jean silent, abashed, all smiles and solicitude for Carol (she must have really been hauled over the coals last week). When asked her opinion she turned all red and sided with the legalists. She also said that I was trying to insinuate them via the promise of donated pianos. Horrible. And so un-Christian. Holier than thou; pharisaical. Christ would have seen this as an opportunity to save a soul, not as a pretext for wallowing in one's own self-righteousness. Then Dick Brokaw suggested that maybe Franny Webster is trying to get rid of her husband. So they are now both going to have to appear again at Kendal for another interview, before the social worker, who will make a recommendation.

Supper at Casual Crossings with Mother and Chrysanthi. Irene Frowenfeld is now interested in Kendal.

Bev Fuller was fired.

Wednesday, July 31, 1991

Richard Dellamora arrived from Hanover where he was once again a participant in the School of Criticism. Nice man. He's making a career now out of his homosexuality—i.e., in gay studies. Chrysanthi has stayed in Hanover to worry about the wedding, so we three men had a "bachelor party"—lots of good talk over dinner, after 1½ hours removing rocks from Alec's path, and then having a swim.

Yesterday, saw Daphne's wedding dress for the first time. I'm becoming increasingly disgusted by this pagan ritual with its ostentation and conspicuous expense. But I must keep mum.

Thursday, August 1, 1991

Indian Lake

Dellamora left. Then a surprise telephone call from Tom Brown and Warder Cadbury. Would I come to Camp Backlog for lunch? So Alec and I drove to Indian Lake, then south on Route 30 (which I remember as a dirt road full of potholes and mud, from my youth) to the campsites, where they met us in a boat. They own 150 acres completely surrounded by State land with no access except by water (about a 20 minute ride into the south lake) or by a 1¼ mile footpath from the campsite. Bought by Tom's great-grandfather around 1905 or 1910 from a lumber company. Three families own it jointly by means of stock in a non-profit corporation: the Browns, the Cadburys, and the Bortons, all intermarried of course. No electricity, no indoor toilets (their privy is called The Oval Office). But they have a generator for power tools and to pump lake water into a storage tank that then works by gravity feed. They also have a telephone; the cable comes underwater. Drinking water from a dug well. They live in tents, each with a fireplace in front containing a huge "backlog." There's a nice Adirondack-type lodge, a kitchen that is now winterized, outbuildings for storage, etc. Everything—all food, supplies, building materials—must come in by boat. About 30–40 people were there, four generations. Plus a Black cook, an old family retainer. A bell rang and everyone gathered under a canvas roof for lunch preceded by Quaker grace of course, holding hands. Warder is a good conversationalist (with Philadelphia accent), waggish. But his brother, Henry Cadbury's other son, said nary a word. Turns out that Warder was on a relief mission to the Peloponnesus in 1946, transporting cattle. The captain of their liberty ship, drunk, backed the propeller into the wharf and laid the ship up for two weeks' repairs. Dick Dewees was there, too. He married into the family. He's hoping to apply for Lloyd's position at Kendal. Infants in arms, teenagers, college students, young couples, all the way up to Tom and Nan Brown, who must be in their seventies, and seem very spry. We talked steadily from 11:00 a.m. until 4:00 p.m., and then walked out through the Forest Preserve. I'm going to ask Mark Grunblatt about the advisability of the corporate system for Terpni.

Working on my "reading" for Daphne's wedding: the end of Molly's soliloquy in Ulysses. Do I dare? Will I be able to get through it without breaking down? I'm combining it with Kierkegaard on the aesthetic, ethical, and religious basis for marriage then using Molly as an example of the religious based on gratitude rather than gratification or commitment.

Monday, August 5, 1991

Alec made a fine new gate for the garden fence. We replaced some of the cedar posts, using "new" ones from the pile I stacked thirty-odd years ago.

Wednesday, August 7, 1991

Tom Persons called to say that Deckerts' other parcel has been sold and the northern one, opposite us, 168 acres, has been reduced in price. He thought that Deckert would accept $260 per acre. Chrysanthi's in Hanover preparing for the wedding. Alec, Leander, and I tramped through this property. Lots of timber: white pine, hemlock on the south end; lovely wetlands with a large beaver lake; birds flushing continuously, deer tracks everywhere; northern end heavily lumbered and a mess. Met a man from Friends Lake, also interested. We're encouraged but still undecided.

Thursday, August 8, 1991

To Hanover. Supper at Quechee with our new in-laws: Lucia Tebbe, Greg's mother; Graham and Caryn Tebbe, his father and step-mother;

Carl, his brother; Vaughan, his sister. Went very well. Lovely, warm people, obviously very happy with Daphne. Lucia is a lawyer specializing in battered children. Carl is a carpenter, the black sheep of the family, earring and all. Graham seems to be “in finance” in some way. Caryn runs a travel agency in Dallas. Καλή αρχή.

Friday, August 9, 1991

Rehearsal tedious but Karen Sheldon and Jane Helms were very patient. The Corindia children refused to go down the aisle with the rings and the flowers.

Rehearsal dinner at Pierce’s Country Inn. Lovely. About 80 people. Toasts, fun, good cheer. Met Greg’s step-sister Kendal, a southern debutante type, also Lucia’s roommate, another lawyer specializing in appeals. Lovely woman. Met Bemelmans’ grandson again, and other friends from Harvard, including the roommate, Lori. Earlier, met Fred Hills, Daphne’s boss at S & S, and his wife and two children. Turns out to be a Columbia graduate, very unassuming and friendly. He told me that everyone loves Daphne. Later, Leander interpreted that as resulting from her Quaker upbringing even though she keeps her distance now from things Quaker.

Dick Williamson came to deliver a present and harangued me (nicely) regarding the Deckert land: Don’t think twice, buy it! So, Alec and I decided to make an offer: $38,000, or about $225 per acre.

Saturday, August 10, 1991

Daphne’s wedding. Shriners’ parade in Hanover on the same day: a circus. Photographer at Norwich Inn at 1:00 p.m., beforehand, a good idea. Even Carl Tebbe in a tuxedo. Daphne a beautiful bride of course. Service at 3:00 in Norwich Congregational Church, full, about 200 people. Nicki and Emily Corindia did go down the aisle this time. Brittles and Stephanie arrived at 3:00 just as Daphne and I were ready to march. We both controlled our emotions, more or less. Karen conducted the ceremony beautifully. Leander and Deanna’s music set the mood, substituting for Quaker silence. Lucia read from 1 Corinthians 13 on “love”; I read the end of Molly Bloom’s soliloquy, also on love, but a bit different. I prefaced it with Kierkegaard’s aesthetic–ethical–religious modes. People seemed to like this “daring” intrusion. I wanted the ceremony to be dignified but not sterile. The only part that didn’t work was the silence inviting testimonials. Margery Walker was the only one who rose. Afterwards I superintended the certificate as people signed. The “mob” went to the reception room to gorge on Chrysanthi’s trigona, dholmádhēs, and baklavás. Champagne. Cutting the wedding cake. Gifts piled up. Flowers everywhere. A short break; then to the Norwich Inn for supper. I hosted 106 hungry eaters to roast beef. Dancing, toasts, the best by Fred Hills, who spoke warmly of Daphne’s career and concluded with: “If you find someone who not only has a career but can keep house and cook, marry him!”

Sunday, August 11, 1991

Open house for brunch at 12 Ledyard Lane. Another mob. Nice to see Jay and Devon, and Ned (yesterday). I took Shapiros on a tour of Kendal. Alec, headed for Indonesia, left with Brittles. Everything at once: Yiayia hosted fourteen for supper at Kendal, including Irene Honigsberg-Frowenfeld, who is interested. Another tour. Daphne and Greg left earlier, for Switzerland and Italy.

Monday, August 12, 1991

Hanover–Riparius

Lots of things to do, still. Return the tuxedos, bring the certificate for framing, get certified check for land purchase, think about cruise lectures. Chrysanthi driving herself, and exhausted. Finally we left in the late afternoon. Lobster supper in Fair Haven.

Tuesday, August 13, 1991

Terpni

The Busecks are all at Garnet Lake Lodge in North River. David, Linda, Lori, and Paul came to see the farm; then we went to North River for supper with all of them, including Omi and Yiayia. No word yet from Persons regarding the land.

Wednesday, August 14, 1991

Finished 1954 in Kazantzakis letters; only 1955, 1956, and part of 1957 remaining. Supper with Busecks again in North River. We’re eating ripe tomatoes at lunch every day. Very hot and humid. Enjoyed swims today and yesterday.

Thursday, August 15, 1991

John Deckert accepted our offer of $38,000 for his 168 acres—i.e., $226 per acre. So we now own  $168 + 120 = 288$  acres. Closing scheduled for the end of August.

Busecks here, also Yiayia, eager to “test” the new bathroom. Bushwacked to our new wetlands with Peter, Alice, and Lori. I cooked Italian string beans for supper, to everyone’s amazement.

Friday, August 16, 1991

Busecks left. That ends the eight days of wedding irregularity. Our apples are ripe. I picked them. Chrysanthi will put up apple sauce. Also began pruning the apple tree and three plum trees. We lost the cherry tree this summer.

Sunday, August 18, 1991

Finished this reading and selection of the Kazantzakis letters. Very sad to read the last ones in 1957. He had so many projects, such κέφι, such desire to finish translating Homer’s Odyssey. And his death was so haphazard and weird and unnecessary.

Marie McCarthy for supper, then Shapiros for dessert.

August 28, 1991

Purchased 168.5 acres across from us, the former Waddell farm. In Alec’s name.

August 31, 1991

To Arleen Perryman’s wedding in Glens Falls in the morning. Interesting to compare with ours: more garish, very much more Christian, indeed Christocentric, with nice symbolism of two small candles lighted by the two mothers and then a large candle in the middle lighted by the newlyweds from the mothers’ lights.

To Hanover. Daphne already there for the weekend, lovely, calm, refreshed by Greg and her travels to the Swiss Alps, Lake Como, Lake Garda, etc. Leander all absorbed in his new Mac computer that I bought him. Supper with Yiayia and Audrey at Kendal. Beveridge Webster has been admitted, with conditions. Audrey and I conspired how to raise $6800 to buy the nine-foot Baldwin that the Baldwin Company has loaned him for three decades. Frenzy trying to catch up with mail, pay bills, etc.

Sunday, September 1, 1991

Again, frantic in office trying to come up to date with JMGS. Lunch at The Greens with Yiayia. Good she’s leaving. Place demoralized. Seven empty apartments.

Monday, September 2, 1991

Boston–New York

By bus to Logan. Met there by a French Ph.D. student coming to interview me on her subject: Greek-American literature. Unpleasant woman who wasted valuable time by complaining how little time she had with me. But I tried to be pleasant. At JFK met the cruise group: David McCullough, lecturer from Book of the Month Club and a mystery writer; Gail Godwin, the novelist; Sue Leng, tour director; Alice van Straalen, representing Book of the Month Club. Pleasant flight except . . .

Tuesday, September 3, 1991

Ireland

. . . couldn't land at Shannon on account of fog. Continued on to Dublin and barely managed to land there. Huge breakfast paid by Aer Lingus and then transportation to Galway by bus (they almost put us on the plane headed back to New York with a stop in Shannon; if again we'd been unable to land we'd be back in New York). Bad jet lag (cheated on fast feast fast feast). Slept in overheated hotel room. Lectured on Yeats at 6:00 p.m., reading lots of poems as well as explaining them. Compliments. Lovely hors d'oeuvres and drinks that constituted supper. Then to Galway by local bus. Dirty central square, no grandeur, lots of people and lots of kegs of Guinness and lots of men reeking of beer. Everyone here seems young. I was told that 50% of the population is under age 25.

Wednesday, September 4, 1991

Connemara

Bus tour, very leisurely and pleasant, to ruined friary of Ross Errilly, then long village lunch in a beautiful hotel, village of Clifton, apparently settled by Quakers. Connemara region peaceful, slow, totally rural: peat bogs, heather, fishing, sheep, cows. Ross Errilly standing without any fence or tickets in the middle of a field, with five bulls awaiting us at the gate and looking very suspicious. Lynch crypt with skulls and other assorted bones. One Lynch was a judge whose son committed murder and had to be sentenced to death by his father. No one would then execute the sentence and the father had to execute his own son by hanging him. Grotesque! Some Gaelic spoken here. The University of Galway gives degrees to Gaelic speakers. The guide, Carmel, is excellent and very careful not to talk too much.

Evening in Galway again. Looked at a shopping center incorporating part of the old city walls. Better impression of the city than last night. I'm glad I saw "the West" if only superficially, because of the romantic attachment to its ways in Irish literature, especially in "The Dead." And Nora Joyce came from Galway.

Thursday, September 5, 1991

Galway-Dublin

To Clonmacnoise Monastery in a lovely setting on the River Shannon. Another medieval "university" training monks from Poland, etc. Then to Castletown House, restored by the Guinness family but not all that grand, really. The Irish aping the English. Boarded the Illiria. Some crew members the same; one remembered Daphne. Lift back into Dublin by the assistant harbor-master, an Englishman, who kept insisting that The French Lieutenant's Daughter (sic) was by Thomas Hardy! To the experimental part of the Abbey Theatre, called the Peacock, to see three Yeats plays very well done with sensitivity and imagination in the acting, choreography, and music. They were Deidre, A Full Moon in March, and Shadowy Waters, all directed by James W. Flannery. Symbolistic with touches of Noh-drama. Not readily comprehensible. Very avant-garde even today although Deidre dates from 1906.

Friday, September 6, 1991

Dublin

To Trinity's Long Room to see the Book of Kells. I am trying to see if W. R. Stanford's archives are in Trinity. But the manuscript room was still closed. Then to St. Patrick's to see Swift's death mask, epitaph, etc. Then to Sandycove to Joyce's Martello Tower, closed when we came here the last time, twenty years ago. Surprised how small it is. They've set up a splendid Joyce museum, with good letters, bits of manuscript, and lots of photos. Climbed up to the parapet, could see "swerve of bay and sweep of shore," and Howth Head, not to mention the 40 Foot, complete with nude male swimmers.

Lunch with David McCullough and Alice van Straalen of the Book of the Month Club, her treat. Ate at Foley's on St. Stephen's Green, just beyond the Shelburne Hotel. Got to know how BOMC works. Tried the manuscript room again at Trinity. No Stanford archives. I'll need to contact Dr. Dillon at the Classics Department by post. Wandering in Grafton Street, encountered a Bewley's Café by chance. Bursting with activity, just the place for an afternoon tea. The business is over 150 years old but apparently is no longer in Quaker hands.

Lectured on Joyce, doing my best to cover the career for an audience that had read nothing. Treated Joyce as of the classical mentality, accepting dear dirty Dublin, as opposed to Yeats, who was of the romantic mentality.

Huge dinner with boring company.

Saturday, September 7, 1991

Scotland

Landed at Ayr via tender. Ayr, as in Ayrshire. To Alloway, Burns's cottage, along the Tam o' Shanter trail. My first real encounter with Burns. It was fun. Then to the exquisite Brig o' Doon overlooking meadows and gardens, a medieval bridge much like το γεφύρι της Άρτας in design and shape. Then to Kirkoswald to Souter Johnnie's Cottage. Lastly to Culzean Castle (pronounced Culeán; -z is often silent in Scottish names). Exquisite home designed by Robert Adam. Discoverd origin of expressions «straight as a ramrod» and «flash in the pan,» both from the flintlock pistol. Also (earlier) of "Keep it under your hat": Tam o' Shanters were actually money-purses, with secret leather compartments.

Suddenly realized that Robert Starer, who seems to be Gail Godwin's «man», is the composer we knew at 414 W. 121 Street when I was at Columbia. Sure enough! He has just retired. Left Juilliard long ago to teach at CUNY. He says he might be interested in the visiting composer position at Kinhaven.

Sunday, September 8, 1991

Lake District

Gail Godwin lectured last night on influences on her work: George Eliot and Jane Austen. How they characterize through money, houses, etc. This morning, David McCullough lectured amusingly on mystery writing saying at the end very perceptively that people read mystery novels because such novels assume a logical, just world.

Docked at Heysham and drove past Morecambe Bay, with its Quaker associations, also past Kendal, Coniston Water, Carmel. On to Wordsworth's "Dove Cottage" in Grasmere. I'd last been here as a hitchhiker in 1952, I believe, with Donella Gandolfi. Today was gorgeous sunshine. Very simple house that must have been extremely crowded and uncomfortable, yet Wordsworth did his best work here. We proceeded then to Rydel Mount, a grand mansion with four acres of gardens laid out beautifully by Wordsworth himself. By this time, of course, he was a "national institution." I have a grudge against the romantics. Because of their adulation of the countryside they became responsible, I believe, for our lack of attention to our cities.

Finally to Hilltop Farm in Near Sawrey, home of Beatrix Potter, author and illustrator of Peter Rabbit, etc., all the little tales we used to read to the children.

The Illiria had gone down fifteen meters since we left on account of the receding tides that also expose vast expanses of sand in Morecambe Bay, with small boats “beached” until the tide rises again.

Monday, September 9, 1991

Wales

Docked at Fishguard, Norse for “Fish-yard,” the site where “Under Milk Wood” was filmed with Richard Burton and Elizabeth Taylor, but nowhere as picturesque as Greek seaside harbors. Huge tides here, as yesterday in Morecambe Bay. Amusing guide with a BBC voice; told about a fabulous pirate who operated from here dressed all in scarlet and with a symphony orchestra on board. When he boarded a victim ship his orchestra would play. His crew all had to sign papers certifying that they would not drink, gamble, or whore, etc. After robbing the victim, he would insist on having tea with its captain. Because of his handsomeness and his scarlet dress the French called him Le joli rouge, corrupted in English to “The jolly Roger.”

Continued on to St Davids. Road sign indicating Haverford West. Guide told me that the name is Norse. Ford = fiord = inlet. Haver = wheat. So: Wheat inlet. Cf. Haversack = wheat sack. St Davids has the large twelfth-century cathedral of St. David, which was a pilgrimage site until the time of Henry VIII, because two trips to St. David’s were deemed equal to a trip to Rome, and three to St. David’s equalled one to Jerusalem. David is the patron saint of Wales, Patrick of Ireland, Andrew of Scotland, and George of England. Interesting building, with sanctuary fourteen feet higher than the West front. Wooden roof over the nave. Supposed relics of St. David. Chapel to Saint Nicholas, who gave gifts to girls needing dowries. Became Sant’ Niklaus, then Santa Klaus, Santa Claus. Guide spoke of Eurocrats (i.e., EEC officials) replacing bureaucrats.

After lunchtime, pupils from a primary school, aged 6 to 11, came aboard to sing for us. Angelic faces. Music hath charms. Their songs of belief and goodness and hope were an interesting contrast to my gloomy lecture on Thomas Hardy this morning. Before supper, Gail Godwin spoke interestingly on the process of writing beginnings, middles, and endings of her novels. After supper, Chrysanthi and I had a long chat, in Greek, with Captain Daskalakis.

Tuesday, September 10, 1991

Bath

Avonmouth, through the lock made necessary by the extreme tides, to Bristol. Under Brunel's bridge, which I hadn't seen since 1958. Center of Bristol more or less the same; couldn't see the university. We drove straight through to Bath and had a fine tour of the baths, the Pump House, the crescents, etc. Large pedestrian precinct. Went into Marks and Spencer's out of nostalgia. Lunch in the Francis Hotel, but I couldn't eat because I've been suffering from diarrhea. Afterwards, settled in a park by the river, with a statue of Edward VII (1901–1910) labeled Edward the Peacemaker. What a beautiful city Bath is! Squares, trees, parks, flowers everywhere. A model of town planning. Asked the guide if she knew where L. P. Hartley's home had been, but she'd never even heard of L. P. Hartley.

Wednesday, September 11, 1991

Tresco, Scilly Isles

I never thought I'd be here. Off the coast of Cornwall, no autos, bleak, healthlike landscape (or moonscape), wind-distorted trees. And in the center, bizarrely, are the Abby Gardens, a kind of Longwood Gardens, all outdoors, that started as one individual's passion. Lots of oriental specimens; palms; cactuses. But not much was in bloom. The temperature is moderated because of the gulf stream. Spoke to a native, wife of the chief gardener. She says they have a lovely community, with everyone caring for everyone else. The entire island is owned by one man, a kind of feudal lord to whom all pay rent. Visited the graveyard—David McCullough's graveyard obsession has infected others.

Captain's dinner party, much reduced for me because of bad stomach. Δασκαλάκης is young, handsome, a real παλικάρι. He knew Βάρναλης and Καβαδίας.

Another good talk with Robert Starer, who is quite nice. But Gail Godwin is totally anti-social. . . . In the morning I lectured on T. S. Eliot.

Thursday, September 12, 1991

Weymouth, Dorchester

Weymouth, the original seaside resort on the south coast, patronized by George III. Still impressive buildings along the quay. Many sites here used by Hardy. The guide rattled off Hardy characters and situations: this took place in such-and-such a building, which however Hardy moved to a different street, etc. Even more of this in Dorchester (= Casterbridge) itself. Nice statue of Hardy, and his study and various photos in the museum. Max Gate not open to the public, but we glimpsed it through the trees. Bad cramps afterwards.

Friday, September 13, 1991

Zeebrugge–Brussels–Paris

Travel Dynamics bussed us to Gare du Midi, Brussels. Train to Paris with lots of conversation in our first class compartment. One lady, French, an official in EEC working on consumer protection in all EC countries. She says that Greece is the worst. A French-Canadian young woman who is a professional flutist, more precisely a baroque flutist, about to perform the B-Minor Mass in Montréal. An older lady from Holland. All very cozy.

What a super-delicious ham sandwich on a baguette in the buffet of Austerlitz Station! But getting there on the Métro was horrible. 5:00 p.m., Friday afternoon; squeezed in like sardines. Only now do we appreciate the luxurious convenience of a Travel Dynamics tour, where everything is done for one so comfortably.

I'm writing this in the first class sleeping compartment of the famous Talgo-Madrid express. The whole train looks shiny and new, and goes very fast, but it's nice to realize that the AMTRAK first class sleepers are far superior. Talgo has no toilet, straight-backed uncomfortable seats, no towels or soap provided, and the porter was extremely surly. Nor was there the wine and snack that AMTRAK provides, or the free breakfast. Curious in the Talgo is the little pitcher-like potty with a warning "liquids" (i.e., urine) only. A bit hard on the ladies, but well used by me. Another defect of the Talgo is that in the morning you can't put the beds up. Also the track was very mixed: smooth for long stretches, bumpy for others. But we arrived in Toledo almost on time.

Saturday, September 14, 1991

Toledo

Wonderfully baroque train station. I still had diarrhea (mild) and relieved myself in the station toilet: no paper, no soap, and Turkish-style, for squatting. So much here is reminiscent of Greece. No taxis. We took a local bus to town. Very easy. Then with some difficulty found the Hotel Carlos V, just off the central square, Plaza de Zocodover. Chrysanthi coping well with her diffident Spanish.

I'm writing this at the outdoor café of McDonald's (!) in Plaza Zocodover after a good day of sightseeing. Started with the magnificent cathedral, so monumental and so well preserved, but we were too late to see the Treasure and Gallery because it closes for lunch at 1:00. “Diarhea” lunch of bread and apples in the hotel room. Nap. Out at 4:00 p.m. First to Casa y Museo El Greco, not the way Kazantzakis described it, because it’s now flooded with tourists. But the extraordinary portrait of St. Peter is still on the easel upstairs, with the saint’s eyes glistening with tears, presumably of remorse. The high spot, I suppose, was the startling surprise of The Burial of Count Orgaz in San Tomé, surprise because it is so big and so brilliant (obviously it’s been cleaned). An extraordinarily complicated yet integrated “symphony” by a transcendent composer with Christ at the very top governing everything below. The figures watching the burial are, I’m told, El Greco himself and Cervantes, among others. Then to a Jewish synagogue built in the 1300s (the expulsion was in 1492) with Hebrew inscriptions around the walls: a huge rectangular hall with embossed wooden ceiling miraculously intact. Another synagogue nearby confirms this as the Jewish quarter, where El Greco chose to live. San Juan de los Reyes, a Franciscan monastery, fifteenth century, is less impressive, but one must remark that the Franciscans by this time were obviously “doing well”! Then we found the Convent of Santo Domingo el Antiguo with difficulty. Decorated by El Greco with three paintings that we couldn’t see up close because a wedding was in progress, with the congregation all French and the service in French. Then back to the Cathedral, this time with ability to see the Treasure and Gallery. The Treasure is repulsive: the ostentatious wealth of the Church. But the Gallery has a dozen or more El Grecos, including the huge El Expolio, and portraits of the apostles, my favorite being St. Luke, who stands with an open Bible showing an illustration of, I think, the Virgin and Child. But this remarkable gallery also has Titians, Raphaels, a Goya, a Velasquez, Van Dykes.

Back to Zocodover. Ordered an orangeade which didn’t come in a bottle, so Chrysanthi didn’t let me drink it. Back to the hotel for supper: banana sandwich, apple, aqua minerale. Then to the Square again to watch people; the Spaniards talk and promenade, like the Greeks.

Sunday, September 15, 1991

Toledo–Madrid

More surprises in this extraordinary city. First, the view from our hotel window over thousands of rooftops, with the cathedral nearby and a glimpse of the hills beyond the city walls. Started with the Museum of Santa Cruz, just off Zocodover Square. A splendid building again with an embossed wood ceiling. This was filled, again, and with El Grecos. Oh the head of the Met must die with envy when he comes to Toledo. The huge Ascension of the virgin at the end of the room is clean and brilliant. My favorites were “The Two Saint Johns” (the Evangelist and the Baptist, young vs. old, cultivated vs. fierce) and “La Veronica,” with a gorgeous female face.

Then outside the walls to the Tavera Mausoleum. Nice guides (speaking only Spanish, of course, but we are beginning to understand a little). The church with Cardinal Tavera’s sarcophagus, then the crypt with the sarcophagi of the Dukes of Lerna. Perfect echo from the center, below the tholos. The Down Syndrome child coping with her gentle father. Then, another miracle: the Dukes’ palace adjacent, with Titian, Tintoretto, Caravaggio, and El Greco’s “Holy Family,” “Saint Francis,” and another lovely “St. Peter,” all painted very late in life. Also ancient books on parchment, psalters mostly.

Enough. Too hot to go also to the Alcazar, the one besieged for seventy days by the Republicans in the civil war. We saw the outside, of course. Taxi back to Zocodover. The driver recognized us; he’d picked us up also at Santo Domingo el Antiguo yesterday—we must be memorable! Good to get out of the Carlos V room: too hot, very noisy last night because over the square where the city’s teenagers congregate, like Πλατεία Ναυαρίνου σε Θεσσαλονίκη. How lucky they are to belong to such a culture; our youth always need artificial outlets—sports or drugs or wild parties, or the drug of television. These youths just meet, boys look at girls, girls at boys. They all talk continually, spend no money, and are satisfied. Same with oldsters: they sit on benches in Zocodover and “help time to pass,” watching the passing scene. No expense. No loneliness.

No. 6 bus to the station. We really know our way around now. Should return here some day, and be able to eat. I’ve had nothing but acqua minerale and tea and banana sandwiches the whole stay.

But today has been better. No diarrhea or discomfort at all. Washed. Air conditioned, thank God. We’re both strapped into money belts, carrying nothing because of the scare of thievery. Walked the length of the Gran Vía, combination Fifth Avenue and Times Square. Madrileños look much more sophisticated than Toledoleños; provinces vs. capital. Snack in Kentucky Fried Chicken (!): buttered corn. Then a ham and cheese sandwich and . . . acqua minerale. Let's see what happens tomorrow. . . . Walked more, to Paseo del Prado, very grand. Temperature 93° at 9:00 p.m. Palace Hotel charges $30 per person for paella. It seems that if a nation wishes to prosper it must conquer and exploit others—i.e., build an empire: thus Athens, Rome, Byzantium, France, England, Spain, Portugal, even Holland and Belgium, and of course the USA although in a slightly different way.

Monday, September 16, 1991

All the museums are closed on Monday. But we had an interesting day nonetheless. Temperature 23° C. (= 73.4° F.) in the morning, 32° C. (= 90° F.) at 5:00 p.m. Started with the Real Fábrica de Tapices. Nice tour with Spanish-speaking guide whom we managed to understand more or less. First, rug-making, with actual rugs being made on looms by mature men and women arranged in a row. One square meter takes three months. Showed Spanish knot (once around) vs. Turkish knot (wrapped around two of the cotton vertical strings). Back is jute, pressed down horizontally. We saw this process decades ago at Mrs. Locke's tower in Ουρανούπολις. Even more impressive is the tapestry making. The factory was established in the eighteenth century originally at Santa Barbara; it's now under the ninth generation of directorship by the same family. Craftsmen work from age 15 to 70. Apprenticeship is five to eight years. Apprentices alas are few; the art will die. A square meter takes four months and sells for about $900. The cartoons are often copies of paintings in the Prado, typically by Goya, who started in a tapestry works. Others are by Raphael. The factory museum had gorgeous examples of finished tapestries old and new, bright and distinct, unlike those one sees in museums. Huge tapestries are not done in sections but in one piece on huge looms.

From here it was good luck to go next to the Palacio Real because its chief attraction, at least for us, was its tapestries. (Remember: $900 per meter.) From the palace—but also from the city as a whole, with its boulevards, posh neighborhoods, numerous parks—one is reminded of Spain's immense power and wealth, at least in the past, if not now. All this is newly coming into my consciousness. One should remember the names of the conquered places: Puerto Rico, Costa Rica, Argentina, etc.

Otherwise, the palace was the usual display of ostentatious wealth in furniture, rugs (made in the Santa Barbara factory), tabletops, chandeliers, mirrors, ceilings by Tiepolo al fresco, etc. More interesting was the armory with dozens of knights fully armed on horses fully armed. Also carved shields. One very interesting showed the Spanish motto Plus Ultra with depiction of Heracles knocking down his pillars—i.e., inviting passage through the Straits of Gibraltar out into the Atlantic and thus into the new world. Compare Dante's story of Ulysses' hubris in going out into the Atlantic, and the older slogan, Non Plus Ultra. Sir Peter Medawar used this motif when he lectured at Dartmouth about the scientific revolution (and I picked it up in something I did later). The whole thing depended of course on belief in a global earth rather than a disk.

Afterwards—the ultimate daring—our first hot meal. McPollo at McDonald's with . . . acqua minerale. Delicious siesta. Out at 5:00 p.m. at 90° F. To basement supermarket in huge department store just off Sol. Total luxury: all kinds of cheeses, fresh fish, delicatessen, wines, liqueurs, meats, etc., better than anything I've ever seen in America. We bought ham, cheese, bread, apples. Then to the Egyptian Temple of Debod, moved here from the Nile Valley when the Aswan Dam would have submerged it. Dismantled stone by stone and reassembled. We arrived fifteen minutes after closing, but at least saw the exterior and the setting, with reflecting pools front and back, exquisite stone-work, pillars with Greek-like capitals, in a large park, where we sat in the shade and ate our ham and cheese sandwich and apples. Then to Plaza (Platha Mayor), a colossal square with red buildings and an arcade all around, totally enclosed, an oasis in the busy city. Then to a cafeteria for . . . acqua minerale. But I had tortillas with chocolate sauce and café con leche.

As in Greece, waiters here, no waitresses. In tuxedos. One can order very little and sit for hours.

Tuesday, September 17, 1991

Madrid

Five hours in the Prado, morning on the 2nd floor (Italian and Spanish), cafeteria (paella finally, but found it nothing special), 1st floor in the afternoon (Dutch, etc.). All in all, found the Prado disappointing, after all the hype. But of course there are individual joys to discover. Temperature when we left the hotel, 32° C. = 89.6° F. But the Prado was cool. What I want to remember (and perhaps see again some day) are:

Raphael's "Virgin of the Rose," with features reminiscent of Michelangelo; Titian's "Carlos V at Mühlenberg," the king's jaw jutting forward with confidence but maybe also with tension, grinding his teeth. Yet a truly majestic majesty, which is just what he wanted from Titian, of course. Tintoretto's "Baptism of Christ." The El Grecos, all in one room, I found less moving than those in Toledo. (Or is El Greco wearing on me?) Better than the huge canvases, I liked the small face of Christ, the study for the Expolio we saw in Toledo, and Christ Carrying the Cross, in which he really isn't carrying anything because the cross seems to have no weight and his feminine, delicate hands to be hardly grasping it. The point, I suppose, is that El Greco spiritualized the story so that one senses its symbolic rather than carnal content. The huge annunciation is colorful and dynamic but a bit garish to my taste, and inferior to the Burial of Orgaz. Then we came to Velásquez, whom I remember from the special exhibit at the Met some years ago, where many of these Prado canvases were on loan. "Las Meninas" is of course fascinating, with the King and Queen, ostensibly the subject, relegated to reflections in the mirror in the background, and the Infanta, dwarf, and dog occupying center stage, not to mention Velásquez himself, palette in hand. (By the way, we saw three or four artists copying paintings and could appreciate how a painting, however large, is simply an assemblage of individual brush strokes patiently applied). Velásquez's many portraits of Philip IV are fun because the king seems so ridiculously stupid and inane, and one senses the painter's difficulty in balancing honesty with the need to flatter. His "Vulcan's Forge," shown at the Met, is the best, however, with the wonderfully modeled smiths standing aghast at the angel among them. I found Ribera and Murillo less interesting. A surprise was a beautiful Caravaggio, "The Lute Player," on loan from the Hermitage; it shows a girl playing her lute. Last on the top floor: Goya. For us, after the tapestry factory yesterday, his scores of cartoons for tapestries were fascinating: so much better than the usual design for this purpose. Then there were the two war scenes, "The 2nd of May," showing the slaughter of Spanish in revolt against Napoleon's occupying forces, which happened in Puerta del Sol, and the companion pieces, "3rd of May," showing the execution of the leaders, one praying, another raising his arms in defiance. Brilliant records, so much more meaningful than the records of royalty and semi-royalty that occupy so much space, disproportionally, in the Prado. The “Black paintings” that were in his house toward the end of his life are also moving. And of course “La Maya Vestida” side by side with “La Maya Desnuda” are fun. In each she is almost ready to wink at the viewer.

Actually, the ground floor, played down by the guidebooks, had more delicious surprises. There is a Rembrandt self-portrait, but not as evocative as the one in the Frick. The Rembrandt “Artemisia,” however, is superb. There is a splendid portrait of the Duc de Lerna by Rubens; we saw the burial vault of the Dukes of Lerna in Toledo. But outshining everything else are the great Adam and Eve of Albrecht Dürer, not engravings but larger than life-size paintings. Both are post-adolescents, about eighteen years old, and obviously too innocent and inexperienced to know better. Both, and especially Eve, are very Germanic in racial features. These made the day worthwhile. But as bonuses: Brueghel’s “Triumph of Death” and Hieronymus Bosch’s “The Garden of Delights,” and one other similar composition: “The Hay Rack,” showing in triptych fashion Paradise on the left, worldly life in the center, and hell on the right: past, present, and (alas) future.

Tired but courageous, we walked back toward Sol, had—actually!—an acqua minerale, and went next to the Real Academia de las Tres Nobles Artes, housed in a palace. A higgledy-piggledy collection but with some nice surprises—e.g., Picasso’s “Suite Vollard,” exquisite, and his “The Frugal Meal,” just right for Peter and Chrysanthi in Spain, as its bottle obviously contained . . . acqua minerale, its dish is empty, and next to it is a package of παξιμάδι, dry rusks, precisely our fare (until today, more or less). There’s an El Greco St. Jeronimo penitent, gazing at a crucifix, and an unusual El Greco, “the Artist’s Family,” showing his “wife” (and usual model), son, and servants. Very nice. Also, two very special Goya self-portraits, one showing him standing at the easel, the other full-face. Then there’s the carnival scene: “El entierro de la sardina.” Although I didn’t pay much attention to either Ribera or Murillo in the Prado, here I liked Ribera’s Magdalene; she’s in a tattered blouse being carried up to heaven just as she is, by a host of cherubim. Murillo’s is also a Magdalene, repentant and praying. I also noticed Morales here, more than in the Prado: his Pietà. Christ is a waxen doll, totally lifeless, although blood still flows from the wound in his side. The Virgin cradles his head in her arms and has an expression of insupportable grief.

In 96° F. heat we returned to the Egyptian tomb of Debod. No information given at all, but inside was a disparate stone with a Greek inscription saying that Ptolemy Philometor had dedicated this to the temple of Isis, and mentioning Queen Cleopatra. But the temple itself has hieroglyphic inscriptions. It was below the second cataract and would have been submerged behind the Aswan dam if it hadn't been rescued by UNESCO and brought here. Must find out more about these Nubian tombs when we return.

A wash, a coke, a walk, a sweet, sandwiches for tomorrow, more money changed (everything here is very expensive), and back to the comfort of our air-conditioned room. Tomorrow: Escorial, to see the "Martyrdom of St. Maurice."

Wednesday, September 18, 1991

Madrid—El Escorial

Very slow train from Atocha Station to El Escorial through olive groves and barren land. The monastery is tucked beneath a mountain in what now is a rather nice touristic village. Nowhere as huge as one is led to believe by the guidebooks, whose hyperbole strikes me as increasingly disturbing. Nor is the art so remarkable. The first thing one sees upon entering is El Greco's Martyrdom of St. Maurice, a huge canvas in which St. Maurice himself is relegated to tertiary importance and all focus seems to be on soldiers and civilians disputing. (Later, reading about the painting, I realized my error. These "soldiers" are actually Maurice and other Christians awaiting their turn to be executed. But you'd never know it—thus Philip's displeasure.) Philip II rejected it as too secular for El Escorial. This apparently is what sent El Greco off to Toledo. He had come from Italy with the hope of being commissioned to do extensive painting at El Escorial, then under construction. Failing, he looked elsewhere, but not before having designed four or five statues of kings (Solomon, etc.) that were executed by someone else and stand now above one of the courtyards.

The other paintings were an anticlimax after St. Maurice. There are a half dozen early El Grecos: portraits of saints; St. Eugenio is particularly nice. There's a fine Titian of St. Margaret and the Dragon. But the prize goes to a real surprise: a statue in marble by Cellini, a superb crucifixion in the huge church, done for the Medicis and given by them to Philip II. The library, too, is remarkable, although not much is displayed for the tourist. One MS supposedly has St. Augustine's autograph in it; it was displayed in reproduction. The crypts beneath the great church are piled with marble sarcophagi of the Spanish kings, queens, queen mothers, princes, nephews, nieces, children who died in infancy, etc.—a huge ego trip for the Bourbons and Hapsburgs. The church is interesting in its lack of decoration; Philip liked the bare granite in the dome, etc., but the altar is huge and elaborate. There are four organs. The guide said that Good Friday services are electrifying. Everything is draped in velvet to symbolize Christ's death. At midnight the velvet is removed and the organs blare forth triumphantly and, she said, you are in heaven.

Lastly, we watched a video about Don Carlos and Sophie, the restitution of the monarchy after Franco, the shootings in parliament in 1981, etc. All in all, it's a miracle of rationality that Spain made such a successful and relatively peaceful transfer from dictatorship to constitutional monarchy. The whole trip, now concluding, has opened my eyes not only to the art of El Greco, the original purpose, but also to the existence of Spain.

I thought back to my abhorrence of Spenser's Faerie Queene and my abysmal ignorance. When Valency asked me in the orals something about Philip II, I was unable to answer. Now, thirty years later, I have Carlos V, Philip II, the Armada, etc. (and who can forget Philip IV after Velasquez?) clearly in mind, à propos as we approach the 500th anniversary of Columbus's discovery of America.

To celebrate, we had our first non-frugal supper: onion soup and a "combination": veal, mashed potatoes, omelet. But now it's time to go home. We are weary travelers . . . much enriched.

September 19, 1991

Madrid–JFK–Logan–Hanover

Our TWA flight was posted four hours late. We were able to switch to Iberia. Exciting to be able to read so much of the Spanish in the flight magazine. JFK–Logan flight delayed one hour because of a storm in Boston, but we arrived at Logan in time to catch a Vermont Transit bus home. Slow but sure! Hamburger and onion rings and milkshake at the Greyhound terminal in Boston. In our own beds at midnight, 7:00 a.m. Madrid time.

September 20, 1991

Hanover

Started immediately with a talk on the nature of comparative literature to Freshman open house. Student from Sophia, Bulgaria. Steve Scher joined with me, just back from Budapest. Says life there is still difficult and terrible, but in different ways.

September 21, 1991

Mother paid the balance of her Kendal entry fee and obtained her key yesterday. Today we brought plants and bibelots to the empty flat, #301 in Mary Dyer building. Lovely view of Vermont hills changing color.

September 22, 1991

The final Sunday dinner at The Greens. Mother very popular. Maisie Wilson joined us. Lots of regret at Mother's impending departure. But it's good she's leaving because The Greens is increasingly depressing. No new people are coming; seven apartments are empty. And all the remaining people are becoming decrepit or dying. A bad atmosphere. Contrariwise, the lady in 303 at Kendal is 60ish-looking and energetic.

Monday, September 23, 1991

Freshmen advising, mostly women. I always enjoy this; they're so eager. I "seduced" two into doing Modern Greek. And one into Humanities 1-2. Bought a Macintosh Classic for Leander; he's now at the top of the list re: hardware. I inherit his Mac Plus, so I now have 3 Macintoshes and the old Gigi terminal. In touch with Rebecca Mays re: Pendle Hill book committee. Everything is starting again.

John Waterlow, Sir Sydney's son, graciously sent me a holograph Kazantzakis letter written to Sir Sydney in French in 1940 after the "Albanian miracle." Plus a holograph synopsis of Ακρίτας. Mrs. K. never offered me the slightest scrap, the bitch!

In addition, Rae Dalven discovered 15 letters that she'll be sending me.

September 24, 1991

7:30 a.m., Kendal Overseers meeting. We are getting Beveridge Webster's nine-foot Baldwin grand for $6800 despite Jean's silent opposition. Audrey took over during my absence and arranged everything beautifully. We got a $100,000 windfall in the form of a rebate from the electric company and decided to start a Residents' Association Fund with it. Next item: we granted assistance of $550 a month to one of the residents—i.e., the entire proceeds of the $100,000 at 5½% interest. Jean still under great pressure from Lloyd and Paul Lewis to bring occupancy up to 95%. We're now at 85%, holding strong owing to new contracts that counterbalance numerous withdrawals owing to deaths, etc.

Resumed music with Dick and Allan. Haydn and some modern composers.

Friday, September 27, 1991

Leander arrived to help Mother move. We all converged upon apartment 301 at 1:00 p.m. and after the movers left we began immediately opening boxes, putting things in place, hanging pictures. Then had supper all together in the Kendal dining room. Mother happy but also a bit apprehensive. It's like going off to college, where one doesn't know anyone and has to make friends and especially worry about whom to eat with. But Peg Hebert, the hostess, tries to put people together so that no one eats alone.

Saturday, September 28, 1991

Preparing for Paradise Lost class, adult education, to start at Kendal on Tuesday. Also my appearance at Graham Wallis's engineering and morality class, where I'll do poets' reaction to science and technology.

Met with John and Samantha Emmerling. He is one of Daphne's authors: a charming, very successful advertising executive. His daughter wants to come to Dartmouth. First question, predictably: "What about the Dartmouth Review?"

Then to Mother's to hang more pictures. Supper at Kendal remarkable. Dining room full. Fifty Dartmouth grads, class of '33, hosted by Jack Manchester. Charming waitress, a Dartmouth undergraduate. Filet mignon. The dream has become reality.

Leander is practicing for an engagement with a leading singer as accompanist in Atlanta in October, with $1500 plus transportation and expenses. A nice break for him. Also very excited about his new Mac Classic, which we set up. The spelling checker of course couldn't cope with "Leander," suggesting "oleander," "lender," "leader." We guffawed.

Sunday, September 29, 1991

A lugubrious Meeting, with ministry about loss, alcohol addiction, wasting illness (Betsy Waite: multiple sclerosis). But a concomitant feeling of gratitude that the Meeting's "forum" exists for such things.

Surprise note from Sara Hope Amundsen, for a decade confined to a psychiatric institute. She noted the announcement of Daphne's wedding, and wants to send a painting. Her voice came as though from beyond the grave.

Hung more pictures for Mother. She's almost all settled; only the large bookcase remains to be mounted.

Tuesday, October 1, 1991

Started teaching Paradise Lost at Kendal as part of the ILEAD program of adult education. Mother is in the class, as is Ned Coffin, Sloan Coffin's brother, three or four from Kendal, the rest from the community, including Bill Durant. Will they last? We'll see. I gave them a "pep talk."

Friday, October 4, 1991

I presented a class on technology and poetry to Graham Wallis's graduate engineering course. Two Chinese, one Peruvian, etc. I started with Sophocles (Antigone chorus) and Book of Genesis; went up to Odes to Locomotives by Spender, etc. Now they'll write poems.

Sunday, October 6, 1991

To Kinhaven. Mountains surpassingly beautiful; autumn color. Bill Polk thinks we'll "meet" the Kresge challenge. But how? $250,000 to raise. Traveled there and back with Kip Van Winkle, a new, enthusiastic trustee. I'm head of the planning committee, and worry about Jerry's successor. This annoys Leander, because Jerry and Nancy, suspicious of me, take it out on him.

Thursday, October 10, 1991

Kendal affairs all day. Breakfast with Jean re: next agenda, her persecution by Lloyd, etc. She says that Lloyd was forced to resign by the Alan Hunt faction. Lunch at Kendal with Aris Damianos, now a fully fledged MD, to "proselytize." Evening at Meeting for Business trying to get approval for a minute I drafted asserting Kendal's independence from Hanover Monthly Meeting, to counteract Georgia Rese, who appealed to the Meeting to reverse our decision not to admit her to Kendal.

One hour doing Dartmouth business. My honors student, Geoffrey Watson, who's doing "Epiphany in Early Joyce." A very good topic.

Saturday, October 12, 1991

Marvelous production of A Midsummer Night's Dream by John Houston touring company, at the Hop. How nice to see American actors who have mastered voice projection, mime, movement, etc.

Sunday, October 13, 1991

Deep, gathered Meeting.

3:00 p.m. to 9:30. I participated in Sandi Adams's six-hour follow-up training for our cadre of mediators, doing lots of simulation in which I "impersonated" an aggrieved party. Exhausting and fascinating. Having 30+ years of marriage experience, I knew more about irrational disputes, and also their resolution, than the 18-year-olds. They are a good lot: athletes (football, rugby), salt of the earth types.

Tuesday, October 15, 1991

Breakfast with Lloyd Lewis. He's still pressuring Jean to "market" until we're 95% full. Paul Lewis and I will have to conduct Jean's evaluation sometime after the New Year.

To Montgomery House for War/Peace seminar with Rabbi Meyer, who lived in Argentina. Knee-jerk liberal full of condemnation of everything done by the USA. I found this most disagreeable. Jim Breeden, who worked with Dukakis in the 1960s, says everybody, then, knew he was a fake liberal. Interesting.

Thursday, October 17, 1991

Meeting at Kendal with Kirk, head of Selectmen, and Vermilye, Town Manager, re: taxation of Kendal. Kirk gruff and barely cordial, Vermilye more civil, but insists that the increase is owing entirely to the general increase in the tax rate. They really don't know how to evaluate us. It's meant to be on market value, but that's meaningless in our case. So they've done cost plus extra for amenities enjoyed by residents, similar to the system for condos. This means that they tax, indirectly, the Health Center and Cadbury Center, which are meant to be tax exempt. We agreed to disagree. We'll probably have to go into a grievance procedure. This year's tax is $520,000! Over $2000 per unit.

Next: Jean and I met with Georgia Rese, who is aggrieved because she's been rejected from Kendal. She rambled irrelevantly for half an hour but, after we tried to explain that Hanover Monthly Meeting is not responsible, she said that she felt more at peace with the decision. Very trying.

Then canvassed with Jack Shepherd re: meeting tomorrow with Lee Pelton, the new dean, about our mediation program, and our submission to the Fourth Council re: re-accreditation of College Course 1.

Friday, October 18, 1991

Pelton seems to like the mediation idea. Says he'll support it, but we had agreed in advance not to ask him for money . . . yet.

Met John Waterlow, as arranged, for lunch. He is Sir Sydney Waterlow's son, and in his own right an internationally known nutritionist. He'd come over from England to give a paper at a nutritionists' congress in Waterville Valley on the amount of protein proper for children in third-world countries. And he telephoned and said he'd like to come to Hanover to meet me. How nice! He brought with him a first edition of Ασκητική (1927), which he gave me, and a typescript of his father's translation of same, curiously using the first edition text, plus a letter (xeroxed) from Virginia Stephen turning down his father's proposal of marriage (!), and several letters from T. S. Eliot. His father was intimate with Henry James as well, and with Morgan Forster. John Waterlow himself is charming, humble, gracious, and an effortless conversationalist, someone who has lots to say, says it well (briefly), and listens to his interlocutor. Rare. We talked non-stop for ten hours.

Saturday, October 19, 1991

Took Waterlow with Yiayia and Chrysanthi to see Aeschylus's Agamemnon done by a British troupe. OK, but too much screaming and not enough poetry. The chorus was a single actor: no singing or dance, which made the play more like Ibsen than Greek tragedy. Yet the evil of Clytemnestra came across (even though she possessed a justification). Took John afterwards on a tour of Kendal.

Sunday, October 20, 1991

Chrysanthi and I drove John to Waterville Valley, which we'd never seen. And he treated us there to a lovely brunch. Fond farewells; invitations to visit him in London; hope to meet again. He had raked leaves for us yesterday and we, embarrassed, assiduously raked leaves in the afternoon after we'd returned. Then, for supper, we had Selen Ünsal and a new fresh-woman, Itir, from Istanbul, also a graduate of Robert College and, like Selen, extraordinarily vital, sophisticated, self-assured, with spectacularly good English and an infectious smile. Both thought Ozal a crook. Also at this party, Bissera, newly arrived from Sophia, Bulgaria. More subdued, older, a woman rather than a girl. She'd been educated in a special gymnasium on the German model, with four years of Ancient Greek and seven of Latin. Said that the communist government simply ignored this expression of elitism. Both of her parents are university professors. Also another guest, Kate Cohen, whom I see less of since Ben King has replaced her as my JMGS assistant. Bissera brought her boyfriend, a nonentity or so it seemed: silent throughout. God save her from a hasty marriage! So, we had a kind of pan-Macedonian congress. Actually, both Bissera's ancestors and Itir's had come from Thessaloniki, which could have ended up a Turkish or Bulgarian city, not to mention a Serbian one.

Monday, October 21, 1991

E. Allen Kelly called from Morehouse Publishing. They're willing to take on Pendle Hill and act as our distributor. They get 35% of the net proceeds of each book sold, with books on consignment, so we pay only if and when an item sells. It's a good opening. Now I have to convince John Anderson & Co.

Tuesday, October 22, 1991

Kendal Overseers. Tax situation no better. We'll probably go to court. Budget in very good shape so far. New food manager hired.

Visit from David Larson, who had headed the Fulbright Commission in Athens when we were at Athens College in 1975. Now he heads Goucher College's study abroad program. The Greek one is run by Katharine Butterworth!

Rushed to Kendal to teach Paradise Lost IV and V, or, rather, to listen to Ned Coffin teaching IV. Poor Bill Durant was supposed to do V but is confused about most things and couldn't. How sad to see these vibrant people in old age (and Bill isn't so old physically). Harlan Logan, with Alzheimer's, was thrashing around in the Health Center trying to strike everyone with his cane. And Quakers do not employ restraints! Betty Eberhart is hobbling behind a walker and poor Dick is "in and out," as they say, and miserable because he had to leave his Webster Avenue home.

Then rushed to President Freedman's house to announce ΦBK nominations, including Bob Norman for honorary membership. I had to keep this secret from Bob while gathering his CV. Afterwards he expressed his immense pleasure. His wife is ΦBK and now he is, too.

Wednesday, October 23, 1991

Music is so unpredictable. Tonight, with Dick, I played better than ever before (for me): Prokofiev sonata, and three Handel sonatas, and Fauré. Of course, practice helped, even the minimal amount I do.

Thursday, October 24, 1991

Leander is playing in Atlanta tonight, accompanying the famous tenor, David Gordon. A significant breakthrough for his career, paying $1500 clear plus expenses. He'll be in white tails! I flew to Philadelphia and had a good reunion with Dan Seeger before sleeping. He says that the Pendle Hill staff couldn't be nicer to him: everyone is courteous and helpful. Described the chaos at Quaker Triennial in Kenya, where he was presiding clerk. No water, no food, everything ankle deep in mud. The European Friends quickly organized "relief and rehabilitation" committees and set things right, more or less. (But could do little with the three Turkish-style latrines, without water, serving 400 people.) Afterwards, they felt heroic, whereas the Africans and South Americans were unaware that anything had been wrong. A fine commentary on cultural differences. Dan has an electric piano; we'll play four-hands tomorrow.

Friday, October 25, 1991

Pendle Hill

Leander's concert went well. He wasn't at all nervous. Impressed with the sumptuous hall. Beforehand, they rolled out three Steinway nine-foot grands and said, "Mr. Bien, which would you prefer?"

Rebecca Mays whining as usual. She works too hard, is paid too little, etc., etc. Tiring. She's sloppy and negligent more and more. But also still attractive with her intensity. Says she believes in the book project but cannot do it on her own. Warns me about John Anderson's hesitations. In the morning I introduced new board members to the Publication Committee's work. Then we convened the Book Committee with John present. Chose Quaker Caravan as the first reprint. Interested in a collection of reprints of early Quaker women. John not negative; wants Steere's work on contemplation reprinted, as do I. But he stressed the need to integrate marketing plans (when I announced the Morehouse offer) with the new attempt to revise Pendle Hill's overall publicity system. Good Publication meeting afterwards. Rather hysterical manuscript on cruelty to animals provoked good discussion. Max Carter, when cornered by Rebecca and me, agreed to serve on the Book subcommittee.

Met the new teacher replacing Jim Thomas, a Franciscan nun. She was excited when I told her about my honeymoon in Assisi and my translation of Kazantzakis's Φτωχούλης. Chris Ravndal has replaced Gwyn, and is delighted. Numerous people told me how exciting it is to have Dan at the head. Really, Margery's administration was full of trouble and it's a blessing she left. Typical greeting to me: "Where's Chrysanthi?" After supper, Dan gave "A Vision of Pendle Hill": ideas roll off him apace, some far-fetched, like a PH annex in Moscow (!), some wonderful, like PH "think-tank." Afterwards, we played four-hands: Schubert, Mozart's 40th, Beethoven's 5th, Fauré. He's about my level. A bit imperious at the piano: he unseated me at the treble when I faltered with the Schubert, and put me on bass, where I'm more comfortable. And he kept counting out loud throughout. No matter. We pushed a switch and the piano became an organ so one could play a Bach toccata. Afterwards, over tea, he told me about his foster son, a Cambodian he met initially when the boy came to do yard work in Dan's Brooklyn home. Lots and lots of problems with the boy's mother and sister (his father was killed in the civil war). But now he has almost finished college. Dan, childless, is a doting "father."

Saturday, October 26, 1991

Pendle Hill–New York

I was one of the four respondents to Dan's "Vision." A bit daunting, with so many "weighty Friends" in the audience, including Kenneth Boulding (who wants us to reprint his poems and essays). I elaborated on the PH think-tank idea and offered the Daedalus model for rethinking all basic concepts such as light, holding someone in the light, inner light, God, that of God in every person, since these are now little more than empty slogans without depth or content. Small group discussion; then Executive Board. John, Oliver, Rebecca, Judith, and Denny all want to visit Morehouse if I can arrange it.

Train to New York. My rituals. Supper in China Peace, Hunan lamb. Slept in Daphne's new apartment at 308 E. 79th. She's in Boston and Greg is in Tokyo. A large apartment in a good building; nice neighborhood. But lacks the "class" of the Madison Avenue pad. Yiayia's wedding present, the coffee table with tiles, is the only decent piece of furniture. And the walls are still almost entirely bare, although she has many pictures. The ethos is always one of "the temporary." Reluctance to settle.

Sunday, October 27, 1991

NYC

It's so nice to be in New York. Breakfast in "the Greek place" on 1st Ave. and 79th: juice, eggs, ham, home fries, and toast for $2.79! To Metropolitan Museum, eager to see Spanish tapestries and armor from the Royal Palace, as a reminder of our recent trip. The tapestries on display here are of course the very best: huge, amazing compositions with adequate captions, placards giving historical background about Ferdinand and Isabella (who united Spain, driving out the Moors and Jews); effect of gold imported from the New World; Spain's acme in the 16th century under Charles V and Philip II, and the tapestries as "proof" of grandeur and wealth. One group is from Segovia, not Madrid: Los Honores. On display: "Fortune" and "Fame," Fortune dispensing joy or pain to those who deserved each, Fame honoring Petrarch, Ovid, Homer, Alexander, Salust, Virgil, etc. I thought of my PL class at Kendal, for the poem ushers us into the Renaissance world-view so splendidly displayed in these compositions. Next, the Apocalypse series from Madrid—e.g., St. Michael slaying Satan, the seven-headed dragon, see Rev. 12–14. In the next room, Hercules shouldering the Ptolemaic heavens; and on the crupper of a horse's harness, Hercules' life on one side, Samson's on the other. Cf. Milton's effortless amalgamation of pagan and Biblical sources. Thence to the Seurat exhibit. He was a genius most of whose work was unknown to me. Died at age 31 from diphtheria. As always, the Met mounted a beautiful retrospective, showing Seurat's interesting amalgamation of conservatism and radicalism: radicalism in painting technique, conservatism concerning his models. After a traditional training, drawing plaster casts, etc. at the École des Beaux-Arts, he began extraordinary dark, brooding drawings in charcoal. The pointillism came later, almost as a way of adding some glimmer of light to the dark of his paintings. Everything is abstract and generic; he said he was emulating Greek friezes. Often there are no human figures at all in his landscapes and cityscapes, which are all lines and squares, anticipating Piet Mondrian. A splendid exhibit. Of course I bought the catalogue, plus a crossword puzzle of "Un Dimanche à la Grande Jatte" for Chrysanthi.

Thence to David Erlanger's for Kinhaven Evaluation Committee followed by Planning Committee: John Austin, David, Janet Greene, Lauren Zalaznick, Barbara Dickey, and the poor conductor from Long Island who is dying from a brain tumor but is still plucky. Jerry Bidlack came for the Planning session. Evaluations are better, although Jerry remains the weak spot. In Planning, I tried to convince the others that we need a fulltime year-round resident at Weston. But it seems too soon. The group decided to close down Main House, drain the water, etc. Individual staff members will be asked if they want to run retreats for their instruments next spring. John Austin drove me to LaGuardia for the return flight to Lebanon.

Monday, October 28, 1991

Conference with Nancy Davies and Otmar Foelsche re: marketing by Apple of my computer program "Greek Drills." Saw Jonathan Mirsky in the distance outside but didn't care to stop to speak to him. Spent most of the day with Cynthia Wigington, whom I've hired to type the catalogue of Kazantzakis's Collected Letters. She needs some training but is a quick learner.

Visited Tom Sleigh's English 5 class on PL IX. Fine class energetically discussing God's foreknowledge vs. man's free will. How nice! Lunch afterwards. Tom's new wife is about to open an "installation" at the Whitney annex on 42nd Street—big time.

Wednesday, October 30, 1991

Cynthia already doing much better. She's finished three years' worth. Only 52 to go.

My honors student Geoffrey Watson is doing an interesting study of the background to "epiphany" in pagan and Christian thought. Today we went hunting together for a Greek text of Dionysius the Areopagite's Divine Names to see if what are translated as "the good" and "the beautiful" are the same word in Greek: το καλόν. But Baker Library does not have the Greek. All we found was a sixteenth century edition in several other libraries. We've ordered it via interlibrary loan.

Music with Dick not so good as last time, but still fun, and satisfying. Fauré, Mozart. Dick stayed late, talking about Dartmouth politics, which don't interest me very much any more. Indeed, I've decided to retire in three years, a year after my last sabbatical, precisely on my 65th birthday. Stupid? We'll see. Chrysanthi fears I'll have nothing to do and will hang around the house puttering. She already says that I remind her of my father in the way I set the table for breakfast each morning. A propos, I finally bought a cappuccino maker that works: inspired by all the café con leche we had in Spain. Life's little pleasures.

Thursday, October 31, 1991

Boston–Gainesville

Drove Chrysanthi to White River to catch the Ambus to New York. She'll spend the weekend with Daphne, who is lonely owing to Greg's long assignment in Tokyo. I drove to Logan, listening to a cassette of Walt Whitman's diary of the Civil War. Dan Seeger wants to celebrate Whitman and Whittier as Quaker poets in 1992, stretching things for Whitman. Yet the Civil War diary shows Whitman acting in a very Quakerly fashion insofar as he always ministered indiscriminately to the wounded and dying on the Confederate side as well as on the Union side. Also, his extreme horror at warfare is everywhere evident. The end of the tape has a moving speech given in 1875 about Lincoln's assassination.

Flew to Charlotte. Waiting for flight to Gainesville: a dozen MGSA folks. So it began μεριάς. Συζήτηση, κουβέντα. Jim Warren greeted me in his accustomed fashion: Πετρόμπτης! Up until 1:00 a.m. at the hotel. Talk talk.

Friday, November 1, 1991

Gainesville

Stimulating sessions. Fun to meet new people and to renew acquaintance with old acquaintances. Supper with Vangelis Calotychos, his new assistant, and Στάθης Γουργουρής, a graduate student, and others, at a Japanese restaurant where they cook right in front of you. The hotel is idyllic; reminds me a little of Tahiti. Palm trees, large pool, lake with exotic birds, Spanish moss. Temperature 75°. Lots of fine papers for the journal, especially Eva Konstantellou's on the neo-orthodoxy objection to progressive Europeanocentrism, drawing on Zisimos Lorentzatos.

Saturday, November 2, 1991

At the last sessions, the Macedonian question again caused a commotion. Michael Herzfeld strove nobly to deflect journalists and later to reassure the Greek ambassador that MGSA wasn't a propaganda conduit for the Slavo-Macedonians. The ambassador spoke, competently, the official line at the banquet. Saw Jill Dubisch, the woman I met last year in Sydney, the anthropologist; she told me about Brooklyn College, now a mess owing to Black-Jewish tensions.

Sunday, November 3, 1991

Gainesville–Boston

Useful breakfast with Θεοφάνης Σταύρου re: Leander's forthcoming time in Minneapolis. He wants to publish my catalogue of Kazantzakis letters. He himself expects to receive Laourdas's archive shortly. MGSA meeting afterwards, with special session arranged by graduate students, who want representation on the MGSA Executive Committee. John Iatrides is talking about a special issue of the Journal, including the controversial article on Slavo-Macedonians. Long lunch with Jim Warren, who's had a fascinating career in Greece, Vietnam, etc. and is currently instructing foreign service personnel scheduled for Greece.

Thursday, November 7, 1991

To New York. Supper with Daphne at the Yale Club. She talked to Fred about her future at Simon and Schuster. No future. But he'll help her get placed elsewhere. His advice: become a specialist in a certain kind of book—e.g., psychology. I continued on to Pendle Hill.

Friday, November 8, 1991

Harrisburg

By car to Harrisburg with Rebecca, Judith, John Anderson, and Denny O'Brien to visit Morehouse Publishing. Leslie Merrill, operations manager, took us on a tour. Allen Kelly there; turns out that I had his son in class. We asked lots of questions and got lots of good answers. Then toured the warehouse, huge impressive operation, and then the printing plant, where we met the chairman, Stanley Kleiman, very proud re: his complicated, advanced machinery to do four-color printing. Saw this amazing machine in operation. Then lunch back in headquarters with Kelly, Kleiman, and Merrill. They suggest a two-year trial. Rebecca and Judith whined about additional workload but I think everyone is convinced that this would be a good experiment. I was pleased. Kelly and Kleiman drove me to the AMTRAK station in the latter's Cadillac, and I returned to Hanover via the Montrealer.

Sunday, November 10, 1991

I ministered about the relationship between music and silence, with Elizabeth nodding approval throughout.

Monday, November 11, 1991

Cynthia Wigington is typing the catalogue of the Kazantzakis letters for me. Doing very well indeed with the Greek. I'm working vigorously now on the next issue of JMGS.

Yesterday at a cocktail party at the Freedmans', Fogelin told me that to retire at 65 is stupid: I should take leaves of absence and teach at my own speed. I still feel impelled to retire at 65, indeed am immensely relieved owing to the decision.

Dickey Endowment Advisory Committee met concerning Leonard's successor. Strobehn will appoint the committee and control things rather undemocratically. Jim Wright tried to bring the Endowment under Arts and Sciences rather than under the Provost. Squabbles. Steve Scher recommended me as the next director. That's all I need! I spoke in favor of an independent institute not under Arts and Sciences. Jim Hornig afterwards thanked me and said he agreed. Everyone wants a new director who'll consult more than Leonard did.

Wednesday, November 13, 1991

Allan Munck is away. Dick and I are playing Fauré mostly. When pieces are in one's fingers like the Fauré (from Woodbrooke), they go so much better.

Thursday, November 14, 1991

Lunch with Miriam Richards, who teaches English 5 in our department. I observed her class yesterday. She wonders why the students are dead. Because she doesn't give them a chance; she lectures at them most of the period. Has no techniques for encouraging discussion. I tried to give her a repertoire of tricks.

Friday, November 15, 1991

Supper at Trix and Chuck's. His book was accepted by Oxford University Press, after he got a collaborator to fix up the writing—just what I told him. He is thrilled. Lee Huntington was there. Regaled us with the story of how Christopher Huntington got in the bus in Hanover to go to Logan airport and then to England, didn't know he had to change at White River Junction, and ended up in Springfield, Massachusetts, with his luggage on the bus to Boston.

Sunday, November 17, 1991

Lunch at Kendal. Mother is doing better and better. We ate with Franny and Beveridge Webster. Then to gamelan concert at the Hop. Pieces by Wayan Sadra, visiting Indonesian composer, vocals by Jodi Diamond, an American whose “thing” became gamelan after she lived in Indonesia. Can’t say that I particularly liked this music, I fear.

Monday, November 18, 1991

Lunch with Jodi Diamond, her husband Larry Polansky (a composer), and Wayan Sadra. They hope to contact Alec and would like him to program pieces by Indonesian composers. They put me on to Indonesian novelists, specifically Mochtar Lubis and Pramoedya Ananta Toer. I found Toer’s The Fugitive in Baker Library, but lots of other translations by both in the Union Catalogue. It’s a repressive state. These writers and most others are semi-underground.

Tuesday, November 19, 1991

Last ILEAD class. We actually finished PL XII. I ordered a huge cake with frosting saying “O Felix Culpa”! General jollity at the end. I’m glad it’s over, but teaching PL to adults seems to have become a sort of mission for me.

Thursday, November 21, 1991

Christian Wolff, Jim Tatum, Walter Stephens, and I met with Jim Wright and Bruce Duncan to defend Humanities 1–2, which they plan to eliminate in order to save money. We’ll see . . .

Wonderful student performance of The Tempest. Saw two of my ILEAD students there, the two who had been most resistant to Milton’s poetry. They confessed that now they want more poetry. The Tempest is still delicious. The interpretation kept 1992 in mind—the 500th anniversary of Columbus’s landing in America. The spirits were Native Americans, Ariel was dressed in buckskins, etc.

Friday, November 22, 1991

Lunch with Steve Scher. He’ll be lecturing on Mozart in Minneapolis and hopes to see Deanna.

Heard Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. lecture on American multiculturalism, bravely defending the assimilationist, melting pot side of the debate (I agree) while refusing to go to the extremes advocated by the right wing, who were there in force, since the affair was sponsored by the Hopkins Institute. He referred to his father as “a better historian than me,” and I told him afterwards how memorable his father’s course was for me at Harvard.

Saturday, November 23, 1991

Paul Jolly visited from Pendle Hill. I had expected he wanted to dun me for a contribution but no, he just wanted my opinion on various issues.

Sunday, November 24, 1991

Cambridge

To Cambridge with Chrysanthi and Mother, in time for Meeting. Afterwards, after I’d introduced us all, a woman rushed up with greetings and embraces. It was Sarah Kafatos! We also saw Ted Webster and of course Warren Thompson. Rushed off to meet Lori and Clive for lunch. He seemed more relaxed than usual and actually took part in the conversation. Then to A.R.T. for a superb production of Hamlet, so fresh, so imaginative, playing Hamlet as a “student,” Gertrude and Claudius as sex-pots, Ophelia as smitten by Hamlet. A scintillating three and a half hours. Draining, refreshing. Ate at a Greek restaurant in Manchester: lamb, enough for three days.

Tuesday, November 26, 1991

Kendal Overseers. A long, important meeting. The first without Jean (on vacation). Jay Woolford explained the mistake that produced the sound transfer between floors. Last week I wrote to Lynmar Brock my personal experiences of frustration with ventilators, etc., and Lloyd was furious and chewed me out. But Lynmar said that such letters were fully in order. Overseers censured Jean (mildly) for allowing Carol and herself to be away at the same time. I was asked to try to get Tom Corindia back on the board. Spent most of the rest of the day writing the minutes and follow-up letters.

Wednesday, November 27, 1991

Allan is back. Good music and then an hour-long conversation with him and Dick stemming chiefly from my reactions to Darwin’s Origin of Species, which I listened to on the way to Cambridge last Sunday.

Thursday, November 28, 1991

Thanksgiving. Started by sharing breakfast at Kendal with the Websters and Michael and Leone Webster. She is the acting first flute in the Boston Symphony. They explained Ozawa's reluctance to make hiring decisions. It's a long story of the inability to make up his mind, and also of lawsuits against him by several whom he has dismissed.

Turkey dinner wit Daphne, Greg, Audrey, Allan and Claire Munk. Delicious and genial.

Friday, November 29, 1991

Lazy, relaxing holiday. Saw the Marx Brothers in "Animal Crackers" on home video. That's where Groucho speaks about the elks who don't want a waterhole because they prefer elkahole. Greg was more relaxed, even talked a bit.

Monday, December 2, 1991

New University Seminar in "Spirituality" organized by Jim Breeden. I went to the opening meeting. Interesting group of faculty, including two rabbis, an Iranian, and a disillusioned Lutheran.

Tuesday, December 3, 1991

Met with Jim Wright to discuss how to continue the University Seminars after I retire. He suggests an advisory committee of the three third-century professors.

Wednesday, December 4, 1991

Lunch with Tom Corindia. We want him back on the Kendal Overseers and he wants very much to do this but Jean is worried about conflict of interest.

Thursday, December 5, 1991

Breakfast with Jean. She was hurt by the Overseers' reprimand about the administrator and assistant administrator both being on holiday together. Felt it had harmed her in Philadelphia. She stressed that Kendal is a "business" and operates on business principles only (as opposed to Quaker ones). Alas, alack!

Department dinner. Spoke with Tom Sleight's new wife, Ellen Driscoll, an artist who has an "installation" currently at the Whitney annex in the Philip Morris building on 42nd Street. I hope to go. . . . AMTRAK to Philadelphia.

Friday, December 6, 1991

Pendle Hill

Oliver is sick. I clerked not only Publications Committee but also the Executive Board. Publications Committee endorsed the Morehouse proposal. So did the Executive Board. Phew! Long talk with Rebecca, who ended by weeping. She's in the dumps, poor thing. Burnout.

Had hoped to play Mendelssohn and Shostakovich with Oliver. Instead played four-hands with Dan: Poulenc, Brahms, until 12:30 a.m. His "honeymoon" is over; he's had problems with Gay and Tom Nicholson.

Monday, December 9, 1991

Jim Freedman gave Dick Eberhart an award at Kendal and Dick read beautifully: "The Groundhog," "The Fury of Aerial Bombardment," etc. I bought his collected poems and had him sign it. He is 87 years old. Jack Manchester, sitting next to me, said that he hadn't understood a word. (We literati must remember that.)

Tuesday December 10, 1991

Overseers, all about noise. We approved new ceilings costing almost $300,000.

Wednesday, December 11, 1991

Lunch with Paul Lewis. Agenda: Setting up Jean's evaluation. I'm to draft guidelines for her self-evaluation, as a start. I summarized the pluses and minuses in my view, emphasizing that on balance we find her excellent.

Friday, December 13, 1991

Amherst-NYC

To U-Mass/Amherst to examine students studying Modern Greek. All Greek-Americans. Very moving: their desire to learn enough to speak to Yiayia, function in Greece, etc. . . . Train to NYC. Took Daphne, Greg, and Leander out to dinner in Daphne's new neighborhood. Her apartment is much improved, now that paintings are hung.

Saturday, December 14, 1991

To David Erlanger's for Kinhaven Evaluation Committee. We're still trying to get a visiting composer, but Jerry is finding excuses. David dared to speak about Jerry's eventual retirement! Slow and easy is our strategy now.

A quick look at Driscoll's installation at the Whitney annex. A camera obscura in a dark shed commemorating the dark attic in which a runaway slave spent seven years. with only a peephole (like the one in the installation) to connect her with the outside world. Then to Daphne's. She cooked dinner, I being their first true "guest" in a formal way. A success.

Sunday, December 15, 1991

Early to the Met. Seurat again and tapestries. Then Stuart Davis retrospective. A revelation. He and Thomas Benton were the premier muralists of the period. I bought a stunning poster of a New York mural, for Daphne's apartment.

Thursday, December 19, 1991

I'm interviewing for Haverford again. Today saw a young man whose family breeds and trains llamas on their Vermont farm. An idea for us?

Dinner party with Lee Pelton, the new dean, a Black married to a lovely white woman, Kristin Wilson. He was head tutor at Winthrop House and knew Greg and Daphne and me through Harvard. He's been here only four months and says he is so . . . so . . . so . . . tired. Jerry and Sally Rutter were here, too, and Tom Sleight, but his artist-wife was unfortunately in Holland.

Friday, December 20, 1991

Dinner at Jonathan and Cathy Crewe's, with Andy Rangell, who still suffers from tendonitis and can play only one hour a day, and Faith Beasley, the woman who was threatened and harassed by Dan Price, our schizophrenic graduate.

I'm working assiduously to get JMGS 10 (1) ready. Lots of interchange with Deborah Tannen, who has a fine article on the nuances of Greek conversation.

Saturday, December 21, 1991

To Vera Vance's in the afternoon. Saw Hume and his wife. Talked about Tom Vance, fondly. Then to supper at Don Anderson's in Etna. He and Felitsa Macedon are getting married. Quick work! Takis and Stella, and Felitsa's brother, and a son by previous marriage. Lots of exuberant Greek conversation.

At midnight, Leander arrived with Alec and Eyi. They'd flown in from Tokyo earlier. Eyi is a diminutive Indonesian play-school teacher, very sweet, with a lovely smile, and not much English. But we managed. They were very tired, having not slept for two nights.

Sunday, December 22, 1991

Meeting at Kendal. Louisa Alger, age 98, ministered about Christmas during the first world war when allied soldiers and German soldiers exchanged cigarettes and embraced in no-man's land before returning to their respective trenches to kill each other on the morrow. Lunch with Yiayia. Emergency meeting of Kendal Overseers about flooding because the sprinkler system malfunctioned. Alec and Eyi went to "The Revels" later. I'm showing her Dartmouth, gradually. She is adjusting beautifully. Doesn't seem even to be cold. She's a Moslem, originally from a village in East Java, in the mountains, where the temperature drops to about 40° F.

Monday, December 23, 1991

Meeting at Kendal concerning flooding and noise. All the bigwigs present including a partner of Ewing Cole, a vice president of Carlson Construction, a partner of Fleck and Lewis. They groveled, admitted mistakes, vowed to rectify them. Very edifying! Residents reasonable, cooperative, even when told they'd have to vacate for six days to get new ceilings. Only Ruth Adams is acting like a two-year-old: sulking, refusing to leave her flooded apartment. Her "things," meant to give pleasure, are now making her miserable.

Wednesday, December 25, 1991

I entered the house for lunch whereupon Chrysanthi became hysterical, beating her breast and lamenting Alec's liaison with third-world primitivism. What to say? I remember Chrysanthi's scorn of Cypriots as small and dark. Now this is applied to Eyi, surely the best of the girls Alec has brought home over the years.

Good music with Yiayia and Alec, then with Alec alone, then four-hands with Leander: Brahms' 4th, plus 5th Brandenburg. I'm getting better, strangely, as I age.

Saturday, December 28, 1991

Riparius

To Riparius with Alec and Eyi. Brilliant, sunny day, 30–35°. Everything in order. We walked full length of the forest path and up Waddell Road to the border. Good extended conversations with Alec. Listened to Andy Rangell's stunning recording of the Hammerklavier on the way home.

Sunday, December 29, 1991

To Quaker Meeting with Alec and Eyi. She said that she felt “peaceful.” Lunch at Kendal. Now the roof is leaking, pouring water into the exercise room. Visited Lafayette and Mayme in their apartment. Leander praised their rebuilt Steinway, done by Bill Ballard. Then to the Hood Museum to see the Jonathan Borofsky installation, most imaginative. Daphne called. She had lunch at the Harvard Club with Tom Doulis. She has his novel in hand, but fears that it has slim chances at S & S, alas.

Monday, December 30, 1991

Eyi took me aside and said she wanted to express her “feelings.” She expressed tearful gratitude for my care, the time I’ve been spending with her, the things I’ve shown her. She said she felt that I was like her father. (She lost her father when she was two years old, thus never really knew a father.) I asked about the “future.” She and Alec certainly have not decided to marry so far. She says she’s unsure of whether she wants to marry him. But she’d like to live in the United States; she’d like to leave Indonesia (!). She worries, justifiably, about what sort of employment she could find here. She knows that her English is deficient and needs lots of work. She claims to feel “at home” in the US. I explained as best I could, given her rudimentary English, that her experience so far in the US is hardly typical of what it would be like to live here.

Tuesday, December 31, 1991

To NYC

Yesterday we went for pizza to Lebanon with the Nodas and Audrey. Kesaya is just recovering from an operation; she decided to quit Harvard. David Noda, Lafayette, and I spent the time going over the Kendal proposed budget. David, as a banker, knows what to look for. He was most helpful. Today I typed up a memo for all the Finance Committee members detailing our discussion. We’ll see what happens on January 7th, when we meet.

Drove to Springfield to get AMTRAK to NYC to spend New Year’s Eve with Daphne and Greg. Just Chrysanthi and me. The others are driving with Leander, all the way. On the trip Chrysanthi vented her feelings. She is utterly opposed to Eyi as Alec’s possible wife, opposed to his linking himself with someone from the Third World. “He should fight with lions, his equals, not with lambs. He should marry a woman with a profession, with education, someone he can be proud of. And he shouldn’t marry a Muslim. If they do get married, he'd be better off spending his life in Indonesia than here. Think of the difficulties a small, dark, oriental child of theirs would have in the American schools. I brought him up to be an American, and now he wants to save the world." Etc., etc. I kept silent. How can one argue with such opinions? But apparently Leander has been urging him, too, to return home at the end of this year. Should I say anything? Should I tell him how much distress he is causing Chrysanthi? (She can't sleep or eat, is all tied up in knots.) As for me, I try to view the situation rationally (my problem, says Chrysanthi) and therefore cannot oppose Alec's lifestyle or choice; I'm interested in the individual human being he wishes to marry, not whether she's dark or Muslim . . . or whatever (although these differences, I realize, could cause problems). Well, we'll play out the rest of this holiday and then see.

Dinner at Daphne's. Champagne, lamb, all the trimmings. Opening of presents. Toasting. Very pleasant, but hard to engage Gregory in a serious conversation except about football.

1992

---

Hanover	January 1–June 12
Jan. 1–2, NYC
Jan. 12, Harrison (Kinhaven)
Jan. 16–18, NYC
Feb. 1, Cambridge
Feb. 22–23, NYC
Feb. 29, Cambridge
March 7–8, Philadelphia, Princeton
March 20–22, New York
April 9–13, Pendle Hill, Bethlehem
April 17–19, New York
May 5, Amherst
May 8–10, Terpni
May 15–18, Philadelphia
May 23, Cambridge
May 26, Terpni
May 30, Kinhaven
June 7, Cambridge
Terpni	June 13–September 7
June 24, Hanover (Overseers)
July 17–19, Kinhaven
July 24–25, Hanover (Overseers), Saratoga
Hanover	September 8–December 31
Sept. 10–13, New York (Kinhaven, etc.)
October 11, Kinhaven
October 15, Harvard
October 16–17, Pendle Hill
October 26, Boston, AAHA
December 3–7, Washington–Philadelphia– New York–Amherst
December 18–19, Cambridge for A.R.T. Commander Hotel
December 30, NYC for MLA

Wednesday, January 1, 1992

Yale Club

Long breakfast with Chrysanthi and Leander, all about Alec. Leander very scornful and worried about Alec's musical involvement because he doesn't understand how unprofessional he is, how untrained. He can get away with it in Indonesia but never could here at home. Chrysanthi of course is totally against Eyi as uneducated and unskilled. Both a bit annoyed with me for being so nice to her. We're going to try to talk to Alec—alone.

Telephoned Alec; he came. We remained calm, more or less. Examined Chrysanthi's very great antipathy to Eyi. Basically Chrysanthi is a snob, wants an educated white woman for Alec. We all agreed that if he married he'd be better off living permanently abroad. He waxed eloquent about his accomplishments at JIS in making the school more appreciative of the culture in which it is embedded. This is Alec's mission: bridge-building. We hoped that he would enhance this mission by entering the graduate program in educational administration of international schools at either Harvard or Columbia. He wants to defer this for one year. We fear that the one year will become two, three, four . . . and he'll be too old to apply for jobs. Leander thinks Alec has a need to protect and rescue the weak, in this case Eyi. Chrysanthi is down on Eyi because she farts openly and because she openly said she had bought tampons for her period. Cultural differences, obviously—a delicious openness, in my view, regarding natural functions.

We went back to 79th Street finally for lunch, then walked on the lovely esplanade going up the East River to Gracie Mansion. Afterwards I worked on my Tatum paper, a month overdue. Then back to 79th for a supper of leftovers, and small talk. Leander drove off to Bethlehem at 2:00 p.m., got as far as Newark Airport, remembered he'd forgotten his briefcase, drove all the way back again, furious. Poor boy. Nice phone conversation with James McBride, whom we had hoped to see with Stephanie, but who has the flu.

Thursday, January 2, 1992

Daphne came for breakfast at the Yale Club. But we couldn't engage her in serious conversation about Eyi and Alec. We met Eyi and Alec at the Metropolitan Museum. I "guided" them through Seurat, Spanish tapestries, Stuart Davis, Rembrandt, El Greco, French impressionists, abstract expressionists, Indonesian bronzes, Greek and Roman, Rodin's Burghers, Ugolino . . . all in two and a half hours. Probably not very meaningful for Eyi, who'd seen none of this before. It becomes meaningful by repetition, when one visits and re-visits "old friends." We rode the subway to Bowling Green, lunched in Wolf's delicatessen (chopped chicken liver!) and then walked down Wall Street, saw George Washington's statue, passed the Stock Exchange, and went to the floor of the Goldman Sachs building on Broad Street, to visit Greg. He was busy, heavy trading, but he gave us some time, explaining via computer graphics how they try to predict the future behavior of currency in order to enter into option deals. Greg in this setting is forceful, articulate, not the kind of wet rag he seems at home (perhaps from sheer fatigue owing to this awful awful job with its constant tension). Eyi, in passing, remarked how afraid she was of the black people she'd seen in New York. Obviously she doesn't think of herself as "black" although others would, alas. We said goodbye, hugged and kissed, and drove off in a taxi to try to buy an overcoat for me—Yiayia's present. Barney's wanted $1100 for one on sale! But we found a beautiful cashmere one at the discount place on Madison and 45th, Daffy's, for $139.00! Train to Springfield; car to Hanover listening to Bruckner's swollen 3rd symphony. No wonder the audience hissed it at its première.

Friday, January 3, 1992

Working on my "Tatum essay." Lots and lots of revision needed. Nice talk on the telephone with Kostas Kazazis. Strange how it's easier to be close and intimate on the telephone with some people than face-to-face. Phoned Renée Hirshon in England about her delinquent essay. Journal material must go to Hopkins net Thursday, latest.

No more catastrophes at Kendal.

January 6, 1992

Chrysanthi smashed our car driving down Main Street. A young driver backed out of his parking place into our front end. No injury to Chrysanthi, but the car is a mess.

Tuesday, January 7, 1992

Kendal Finance Committee. Next year's budget. Jean is angry because we consulted with David Noda, breaking confidentiality, she says. David French responded that one doesn't break confidentiality talking to one's own children. We are urging a lifeguard for the pool; Jean says there's no money.

Thursday, January 9, 1992

Finance Committee again. We agreed on a 4.0% rise in fees, but then jumped it to 4.5% to enable one additional FTE comprised of an assistant physical therapist and a lifeguard.

January 12, 1992

Kinhaven Board. Miraculously, we met the Kresge challenge. I'm heading the Planning Committee concerned with winter use. Deadlock. David Bury broke it by suggesting that we integrate planning with development. He'll submit a proposal. Drove home with Kit Van Winkle, pleasantly.

January 14, 1992

Overseers brought the 4.5% fee increase down to 4.3%.

January 16, 1992

New York

A whole day in the Rare Book Room of Butler Library examining Kazantzakis's letters to Max Schuster, and also Eleni's. Very interesting. Some complimentary mention of me, even. Schuster very impressive: eloquent, educated, well-read.

Dinner with Daphne. Then to the Metropolitan Opera to see Pavarotti and Battle in L'Elisir d'Amore. It was glorious. Battle's voice is angelic. Pavarotti is obscenely fat, but his tenor still effortlessly pure.

Friday, January 17, 1992

Morning: back at Columbia. Finished the Schuster archive. Lunch at the Harvard Club with Daphne. So different, strangely, from the Yale Club.

Saturday, January 18, 1992

Carol Weingeist's 50th birthday party. Long talk with Jim Freedman, who turns out to know Bill Clinton who, he says, is smart, honest, and extraordinarily eloquent.

Sunday, January 19, 1992

Dinner for Mother's 87th birthday with Audrey and Nodas, very pleasant.

Tuesday, January 21, 1992

To Kendal to meet John Diffey, the new CEO of the Kendal Corporation. Very pleasant. Interested in literature, even Joyce. Supper at Kendal; then everyone came to Ledyard Lane for dessert and cappuccino.

January 24, 1992

I testified before the Fourth Council regarding College Course 1, which they feel is incoherent. It is trying, but I hope I saved the course. Then ran to class and lectured on "The Dead." Returned home to find Chrysanthi in bed. She'd fallen on the ice, hitting her head. All aches and pains.

January 25, 1992

Fun lunch with Takis and Stella Metaxas, talking Greek, laughing over their stories about Don Nielsen in Athens, who is more Greek than the Greeks. Stella will do some Greek typing for me.

Then dinner party. Sheldons, Officers, and Dee Johnson. Everyone in good spirits. Officers will vote for Clinton.

Alec was accepted to Harvard Graduate School of Education. I faxed him and he replied that he will attend, rather than deferring a year. No sense of what this will mean for his relationship with Eyi. JIS tried to convince him to stay, and invited him back after he finishes his M.A. Let's hope he stays in the US. I'd love to see him headmaster one day of a Quaker school.

January 30, 1992

Such a good class this morning, the Freshman Seminar. One girl, Portia Passey, really awoke to the fascination of Ulysses. Then I saw her in my afternoon lecture to the other class, where she'd come voluntarily. So: one of life's little victories . . .

. . . balanced however by a defeat. My testimony to the Fourth Council regarding College Course 1 produced a certification for only one year. I told Leonard I was despondent and he replied, "Don't be despondent over a reversal in a faculty committee. Despondency should be saved for something more important." Good. What a nice friend!

Good music last night with Allan. I'd practiced Beethoven's 1st cello-piano sonata, 2nd movement, and what a difference that made! We lumbered through it the first time but the second time it actually began to sound like music. What an exciting pleasure!

Reading Shaw's Misalliance in preparation for A.R.T. on Saturday. I like Lord Summerhays on governance: ¶ Justice was not my business. I had to govern a province; and I took the necessary steps to maintain order in it. Men are not governed by justice, but by law and persuasion. When they refuse to be governed by law or persuasion they have to be governed by force or fraud, or both. I used both when law and persuasion failed me. Every ruler of men since the world began has done so, even when he has hated both fraud and force as heartily as I do. . . . (Shaw, Complete Plays with Prefaces, vol. IV, pp. 190–191).

Saturday, February 1, 1992

Cambridge

Miraculously, our car was ready last night after 3+ weeks in the garage. To Cambridge this morning. Lunch with Fotis and Sarah Kafatos. Chrysanthi hadn't seen Fotis since the early 1960s, I since 1983. Warm and pleasant. He is  $\frac{3}{4}$  at Harvard,  $\frac{1}{4}$  at the University of Crete. They had a guest, an Israeli Sabra who advocates two separate states and disapproves of settlement policy. Then to A.R.T. for a scintillating Misalliance with Candy Buckley stealing the show as Lina Szczepanowska. A cry for the dignity of women. Shaw turns everything topsy-turvy. The males are wimps, the females full of political, athletic, and sexual vitality.

Leslie English was here for supper last night with her daughter Nadia, now a roly-poly little girl of about 12. She (Nadia) clung to me as though she needed a father (which she does). Leslie is editor/producer of four journals in the Russian field, doing everything at home: desk-top publishing. She says she can't face returning to the homestead of Peg Barnard and Jerry English because it's too emotional: that's why she doesn't visit the Shapiros. Peg and Jerry are both buried there—their ashes, that is.

Wednesday, February 5, 1992

Nice lunch with Ned Perrin, whom I see less and less. He has cleared out his office in Sanborn and moved to Environmental Studies. His current passion is electric cars, the subject of his latest book.

Jean asked to see me. Weeping, she complained bitterly that I had suggested to Paul Lewis that it would be lovely if Jean came to Meeting. We'd like to know her as a full human being. She interpreted this as an invasion of her private life. Said she was about to return to Meeting but now would not.

Chrysanthi and I are favoring Bill Clinton in the democratic primary.

Heard Tsongas the other night. He's honest and intelligent but has no right to be running for president. Too little experience.

February 10, 1992

On stage at Kendal for open house following our announcement of increase in fees by 4.3%. Audience mild. They asked about the extensive repairs to ceilings and sprinklers. Would they be paying? Jean and board responded with circumlocutions, as usual. I stood up and told the truth.

Returned to meet with Robert Binswanger, Deerfield classmate, now teaching in our Education Department. He has been school principal in a Boston slum. Very plucky. Wants me to lecture in his course next term. I'll try my Beebe lecture again.

February 11, 1992

Several compliments from Kendal regarding my honesty yesterday. Seminar here on electromagnetic fields from power lines. Are they harmful? I was relieved to hear the verdict: they are not.

February 16, 1992

TV debate. Jerry Brown and Bob Kerrey don't listen to questions but merely repeat idées fixes. Tsongas and Clinton do better. The 5th from Iowa, Harkin, is in the Mondale, Humphrey, FDR line—i.e., the bankrupt tradition of the Democratic Party. I'm still for Clinton.

February 19, 1992

President Freedman invited a dozen senior professors to lunch to brief us on the proposals for revised curriculum, which include a requirement (!) for a "culminating experience" in the major. I annoyed Jim Wright, I'm sure, by announcing my doubts about requiring such an experience and also about the hyperbole of the terminology.

February 21, 1992

Jim Breeden's seminar on spirituality: we agreed to proceed with an investigation of the meaning of the word "spiritual" especially in relation to what happens in universities: "spiritual values" and the like. Earlier, my annual lunch with Jim Jordan, the art historian. A nice, rather remote friendship.

February 22, 1992

NYC

To NYC for MGSA executive. I begged for an extra $700 to $1000 to add either 16 or 32 pages to the journal this issue, and was given $3500 over two years, thanks mostly to Peter Allen, who complained that we had too much money in our endowment fund and should spend some of it.

Met Daphne and Greg in an expensive French restaurant and then went to a fascinating evening at the New York City Ballet, with two post-modernist ballets. The first, composed by Charles Wuorinen, was jagged and abstract, the music always “quoting” earlier composers. Μέτροιο. In between came Balanchine’s “Dauidsbündlertänze” to Schumann’s music, brilliantly choreographed with every nuance of the music represented in the dancers’ movements. Then came the other postmodern piece, by David Glass, “Glass Pieces,” choreographed by Jerome Robbins. Iteration, round and round. Brilliant equivalent in dancers striding aimlessly from one side of the stage to the other, with minor variations. The point, of course, as in the Beckett novels I’m teaching at the moment, is to convey meaninglessness, and it is done very “meaningfully.”

Sunday, February 23, 1992

NYC

To David Erlanger’s for Kinhaven Committee with David Bury et al. but without the Bidlacks. David mapped out a campaign and growth strategy. I keep stressing the need for someone in residence in Weston.

To MoMA afterwards to see the Paley show. Some lovely pieces, especially Cézanne’s “L’Estaque,” Picasso’s “Nude with Joined Hands” and of course the celebrated “Boy Leading a Horse,” a Matisse “Odalisque,” Ben Shahn’s wonderful “Silent Music,” an orchestra’s chairs and stands without any players, and John Kane’s “Industry’s Increase.” Even more interesting, though, was the show on modernism with a very fine brochure that I find very close to things I’m saying in class.

February 24, 1992

Carol Weingeist has been fired, although it’s going to be made to appear like a voluntary resignation. Lloyd and Paul tell me that she was incompetent and that staff complained bitterly about her inefficiency, etc. Her talents are in people-to-people contact, not in “administration.” Of course Jean emerges the victor in this little feud. What a shame! Carol is 50 and without immediate prospects. She built a life in Hanover—and now if she's to find work will she need to move, will she be able to sell her house easily, etc.? A mess.

Wednesday, February 26, 1992

Dinner with Bill Lederer, the columnist. But I couldn't hear his talk because it's Wednesday: music night. Paul Erlich, a violinist, has joined us. When Dick can't come we've been doing trios: the Archduke! Schubert B-flat. Mendelssohn.

February 29, 1992, Cambridge

A.R.T. Seagull, enchanting, with Mark Roylance as Treplev, but Christine Estabrook stealing the show as Arkadina. Of course Jeremy Geidt always fine, this time as Sorin. The play documents Chekhov's breakthrough into modernism, with its abandonment of the "well-made plot," its incorporation of fragmentation, symbolism, silences, inconclusiveness. It was magical from the very first moment when Masha entered moaning, enervated.

Met Φιλίτσα Macedon and her daughter Popi. Lively trip home with uninterrupted chatter, mostly gossip about the Math Department. She's nice and the daughter is a charmer.

Sunday, March 1, 1992

Gordon Browne with his wife Edith in Meeting. He spoke afterwards about the Friends World Gathering in Honduras. Did it so well, as I said in thanking him, that he not only made us feel that we ought to have been there but made us feel that we were there. Emphasized non-Anglo and non-programmed nature of most Friends now. Afterwards I took them on a tour of Kendal.

Friday, March 6, 1992

Pendle Hill

A marathon day at PH. Publications Committee, 12:00 noon until 5:15! First an interminable meeting over three manuscripts, all of which were rejected (I would have accepted one at least). Then Book Committee with Rebecca whining as usual that she works too hard and can't cope. We divided up manuscripts to read. This is really not the way to run things. Then a "post-mortem" with Rebecca. Then Executive Committee after supper. John Anderson wants to evaluate publications yet again. Then to Dan Seeger's for ice cream and talk, but couldn't stay to play four-hand piano because of need to rise at 5:30 a.m. tomorrow.

Saturday, March 7, 1992

Princeton

Caught Septa at 6:11 a.m. and arrived in Princeton by 9:00 a.m. Greeted by Mike Keeley. Spent all day with past presidents of MGSA, very nostalgic, discussing the future and fundraising. John Iatrides' position, etc. Keeley, Lily Macrakis, Van Coufoudakis, Adi Pollis (current president), Michael Herzfeld, plus Iatrides. Diamandouros missing (in Greece), also John Petropulos (no longer interested). We hope to hire a fundraising consultant. I'll contact Irish Browning and Mike will one of his PEN contacts (he's current president).

Best part of the day, a surprise, was a leisurely lunch wit Deborah Tannen, with whom I've been in contact so regularly via e-mail but haven't seen for fifteen years. She's basking in her success: months on the best-seller list, often number 1. Yesterday she lectured to twenty senators about gender differences. She's married to Michael Macovsky, who was railroaded out of Dartmouth but remembers me as supportive and a friend.

Sunday, March 8, 1992

Lunch with Mother. She heard Horowitz play Schumann's "Träumerei" (Horowitz in Moscow video) and wept, she said. She says she wants it played at her memorial service—Quaker type—by Leander. She is attending Friends Meeting regularly at Kendal.

Wednesday, March 11, 1992

Department meeting for a tenure vote on Tom Sleight and Matt Rowlinson. Sleight easy; he's such a good poet; Rowlinson had his book on Tennyson accepted yesterday by a press, and that swayed us. But he is very marginal. I kept quiet. Since I hope to retire in three years, I have no right to influence the department's future.

March 12, 1992

Annual checkup with Dr. Gerber. He says I'm amazingly healthy. Of course I have enlarged prostate, hemorrhoids, a hernia, mild arthritis. And now, as he finally discovered, a fungal infestation (yeast) on the glans penis, something that's been building for two years. Finally he's given me an anti-fungal cream that ought to help. He wasn't so good in diagnosing Chrysanthi's knee problem, however. Told stories about inadequate care, and lots of complaints, at Kendal. . . . Nice supper with Panos and Karen Rodis.

March 13, 1992

Supper with Nodas at Kendal and then to their apartment for a surprise birthday party for Lafayette. Saw Kesaya in Meeting last First Day, looking radiant. She's abandoning the Harvard Ph.D. in religion, as I predicted she would.

March 14, 1992

Supper with Rogers and Soong Elliott.

Friday, March 20, 1992

NYC

10:00 a.m., finished my grades after reading 53 term papers in English 53 plus 7 in Comp. Lit. 7, about 1000 pages of student writing. Martyrdom! An hour later, off to New York via Springfield. Telephoned Theofanis Stavrou; says he wants to publish catalogues of the Kazantzakis letters in his Yearbook.

Met Daphne and Lucia Tebbe at Il Vagabondo, E. 62nd Street. A little awkward, but I hope we "hit it off." Greg couldn't join us because of tennis exhaustion. But we returned to the 79th Street apartment for dessert and coffee, and visited with him, too. Daphne's apple pie an especial treat. Lucia very active in securing the claims of battered children in court.

Saturday, March 21, 1992

NYC

Read Wuthering Heights in the morning at the Yale Club, preparing for Humanities 2 lecture. Then to Merce Cunningham ballet. All electronic music, including a piece by John Cage: like a pneumatic drill piercing one's ear, then long silence (with dancing continuing), then another stretch of strident screech. The choreography jagged, an undoing of every traditional step. This was called "Inventions." The other numbers were "Neighbors," by Kosngi, a première, and "August Pace" by Pugliese, with similar choreographic motifs. I prefer the NYC Ballet if only because they offer a mélange of styles whereas this was all the same. Still, a very fine example of postmodernist deconstruction of meaning.

Daphne and Chrysanthi went to Connecticut to Maria Martin's shower. I met them for supper. Earlier, we'd had breakfast with Daphne at the Yale Club. She's working on three fine projects for Fred and has ever-increasing responsibilities.

Afterwards, Daphne met Lucia and Greg at the Met to see Rigoletto while Chrysanthi and I went to Ibsen's The Masterbuilder. Solness was played interestingly but eccentrically by Earle Hymn, who played the chauffeur in Driving Miss Daisy. A strong play, still, because of its marriage of naturalism and symbolism. Hilde Wangel, to “work,” really needs to be chiefly a symbol of Solness’s psyche, a replacement for the gods (in whom he no longer believes). The play seems to depict symbolically mankind’s senseless need to aspire in a universe that is indifferent to such aspiration, and the harm caused to others when we pursue our “highest ideals.” In a godless world we can construct no longer churches but only castles in the air. Yet not to aspire to do this, even though such aspiration is senseless, is harmful to others and reduces us to automata without free will. A bleak picture, to be sure.

Sunday, March 22, 1992

Leisurely morning at the Yale Club. Breakfast with the New York Times. Then to the library to continue with Wuthering Heights. At 11:00 Claire Mylonas, a senior history major at Yale, showed up to interview me on her project, a history of the Gospel riots in Athens of 1901. Of course she wants me to read her draft by next week! I have the Wuthering Heights lecture on Monday, the Onassis Center lecture to write on Ἡ Ζωή ἐν τάρφῳ, the Pendle Hill lecture on Jesus, plus income tax, besides teaching two courses.

Then Yale Club brunch with Daphne, Greg, and Lucia, very relaxed and deliciously decadent. Lucia hopes to come to Hanover next Christmas. Wants us to come to Santa Barbara—but when?

Snow on our drive back from Springfield, 40 mph all the way. Cars off in the ditch, etc. But it wasn’t a bad storm. Daphne had left a message on the machine, very worried since in New York the snow was totally blinding, and a plane had crashed at the airport. How nice that she cares—a kind of reversal of roles, child fretting about parents.

Tuesday, March 24, 1992

Haverford’s Class of ’52, preparing for its 40th reunion, sent a questionnaire that I filled out as follows:

What do you think Haverford did for you?

Haverford introduced me to Quakerism, which has been a central part of my life, in various ways, ever since. It also gave me a good technical and aesthetic grounding in classical music—something else that has remained an important part of my life. Lastly, it offered stunning examples of both very good and very bad teaching: models that I have attempted to emulate and avoid, respectively.

Career History:

While still enrolled for the Ph.D. at Columbia, I taught English literature there in the extension division and also English for Foreigners.

Upon completion of the Ph.D. I was hired as an instructor in the Department of English at Dartmouth College, where I remained. I went up the academic ladder in the normal way and now hold an endowed chair. I have been active in Comparative Literature as well as English. In addition I am co-coordinator (with Jack Shepherd, also a Haverford alumnus) of Dartmouth's offerings in Peace Studies. I founded a peer tutoring program at Dartmouth for English composition. I also founded Dartmouth's University Seminar program, modeled on Columbia's. My most recent endeavor has been to introduce a peer mediation training program, modeled somewhat on Haverford's, again in collaboration with Jack Shepherd.

In the scholarly community, my chief involvement has been with the Modern Greek Studies Association of which I am a founding member. I served as its president for two years and currently am editor of the Journal of Modern Greek Studies, the Association's journal.

Community Service:

—Various involvements with Hanover Monthly Meeting including serving (twice) as clerk, as clerk of Ministry and Counsel, and as Trustee.

—Currently serving as clerk of the Board of Overseers of Kendal at Hanover, a Quaker continuing care retirement community that opened in July 1991.

—Longtime service on the Board of Pendle Hill, including time as clerk of the General Board, member of the Executive Board, and clerk of the Publications Committee.

—Trustee of the Kinhaven Music School, including service as president.

Leisure-Time Activities:

—Weekly chamber music with friends. We have met almost every Wednesday for 30 years.

—Management of 288 acres of paradise in the Adirondacks. This includes building a log cabin, harvesting timber, mowing, haying, gardening, pruning, helping son Alec build his own log cabin, swimming, folk dancing—a life very different from the academic routine at Dartmouth.

—Museum-going.

—Theater-going. We travel five times a year to Cambridge to attend performances of the American Repertory Theater.

In the Future, What are your plans for the use of your time in the years ahead?

Current plans are to retire after three more years of teaching, at age 65. Afterwards, I hope to:

- finish at least two large writing projects currently half-finished;
- serve as visiting lecturer occasionally in other universities;
- continue as editor of the Journal of Modern Greek Studies;
- continue community service, as noted above;
- play chamber music as usual, but having practiced more;
- play a more active role in forest management on our farm.

Supper at Dee Johnson's with Vic and Marie McGee, who are leaving tomorrow for Japan. Nice to be at Dee's again; so many memories of suppers there when Noye was alive.

Cynthia Wigington finished her four-month project for me, typing the catalogue of Kazantzakis letters. Such a sweet, vivacious woman. I'll miss her.

Wednesday, March 25, 1992

Finished Wuthering Heights. It's so long since I've read a novel (except via audiotapes—e.g., Candide this past weekend on the way to Springfield and back in the snow). Now, how to lecture on W.H.? I've got to start off Humanities 2 next Monday with this strange novel.

Thursday, March 26, 1992

Good two-hour lunch with Jack Shepherd. He lost 30 pounds in Kenya but is healthy. Arrived in South Africa a few days before the elections. Had breakfast with Nelson Mandela, followed De Clerk around as he campaigned, and witnessed the remarkable vote. We planned the inauguration of the mediation program this term, plus strategies for Peace Studies.

Monday, March 30, 1992

Chrysanthi had arthroscopy surgery on her knee. Torn meniscus. They removed the shredded cartilage. Hope is that blood supply will now increase, and fiber cartilage will form. She's home, on crutches.

Friday, April 3, 1992

From the Center for Defense Information Bulletin: ¶ "Mature Use of Power": A mature great power will make measured and limited use of its power. It will eschew the theory of a global and universal duty which not only commits it to unending wars of intervention but intoxicates its thinking with the illusion that it is a crusader for righteousness. —Walter Lippmann (1965)

Saw Billie Whitelaw in solo performance of Beckett. So powerful. She did "Not I" (on video) plus excerpts from "Footfalls."

April 6, 1992

I lectured as a guest in Robert Binswanger's Education 20 class. Did my Beebe lecture again. Nice to see Robert after so many years.

April 7, 1992

Kendal tax hearing before the Board of Adjustment. Cliff Vermilye, Bob McLaughrey, a horrible woman selectman, the assessor, Dick Birnie, Paul Young absent. Our lawyer very poor; didn't even know what CCRC stands for. Selectmen kept insisting that we were no different from an apartment house. I made a speech about our contribution to society, tax-exempt status, etc., not at all appreciated by Jean, who wanted the thing to be argued on purely legal grounds. We expect to be rejected, of course. The tax is almost $500,000.

April 8, 1992

My inflammation on glans penis is finally subsiding. Gerber said it was a kind of "athlete's foot": growth of a fungus/yeast. Chrysanthi is doing well, in a wheelchair at first, then two crutches, then one crutch, then a cane.

April 9, 1992

Lunch with Nicolette Van der Lee, a graduate of Jakarta International School, now a Dartmouth sophomore. In my section of Humanities 2 I have a girl from Singapore and a lad from Manila. I feel connected with Southeast Asia vicariously through Alec, of course. . . . Drove to Pendle Hill with Chrysanthi and Mother.

April 10–11, 1992

Pendle Hill

Publications Committee. Books Committee. Cadbury Scholarship Committee. Wow! Also some four-hands with Dan.

Sunday, April 12, 1992

Pendle Hill–Bethlehem

To Bethlehem using the new Blue Route, which is wonderful. Leander and Deanna played and Leander premiered a new composition for trumpet, percussion, and piano. Saw “Mitch” and “Manny” and the Schantzes. Communal supper afterwards. Then visit to home of Leander’s friends Schorches (?); he’s a ship designer. Very interesting, hospitable people; they slept L. & D., and gave them use of a car for their stay in Bethlehem. Daphne and Greg came for the concert.

April 13, 1992

Bethlehem–Hanover

Breakfast in Hotel Bethlehem with Dick Schantz. Then drove to Hanover.

April 14, 1992

Hanover

Full day. Breakfast with Jean to set Kendal Overseers’ agenda. Ben King and Geoff Watson in the morning. Greek 13, four-hour CAP. Spirituality seminar at Breeden’s. 8:00 a.m. to 7:30 p.m. without a break.

Friday, April 17, 1992

To NYC

My lecture on Ἡ Ζωή ἐν τάφῳ for the Onassis Center. I invited Burt Pike. Daphne and Greg came. And Michael Landis plus others from the distant past. Diana Haas chaired. Vryonis out of town. Afterwards, in the question period, I got attacked because I had mentioned the “Macedonian language.” “There is no Macedonian language,” shouted a rabid Greek nationalist. “Macedonia is Greek. You shouldn’t use that word.” A man assured me that the so-called Macedonian language was really a dialect of Greek. A woman said she was from Florina and knew for a fact that only Greek was spoken in the vicinity. Finally we deflected this and turned to literary matters. Nationalism is an ugly disease, making people lose all contact with reality. Orwell’s Newspeak was triumphant this evening. Afterwards, lovely relaxed supper in a Village restaurant run by Albanians, it seemed. Nice to see Burt again.

Saturday, April 18, 1992

NYC

Theater with Daphne and Greg. A cute comedy about a mousy academic playwright who gets mixed up with the Mafia when he seeks backers.

Sunday, April 19, 1992

NYC

Brunch at the Yale Cub with Daphne and Greg. Accidentally met Vasos there and George, planning another Travel Dynamics trip. He recommended me for a Smithsonian Institute tour of UK but I declined.

Monday, April 10, 1992

Hanover

Did Jean's evaluation together with Paul Lewis. Most unsatisfactory. Jean responded to none of the criticisms—i.e., acknowledged nothing wrong. But maybe in her heart she registered something.

Tuesday, April 21, 1992

Susan Chambers staying with us for a few days. I guest-taught in Heffernan's Ulysses seminar. Chris Chen, in the back row, had his eyes closed the whole time, but was not asleep, I think. He hates Heffernan, and vice versa. Good class otherwise.

Kendal reception. John Diffey, etc.

April 23, 1992

Good meeting with John Diffey about Jean's response. He's mellow. Reminded me that this was a "first time" for both sides. Next year we should be able to develop a better evaluation and perhaps she'll be able to respond better. We also talked about an Overseers' retreat for next year.

April 24, 1992

Lunch at Norwich Inn in strange company—elderly physicians honoring Bill Chambers' memory, and Susan. There is an annual Chambers lecture. I spoke with the lecturer about Kendal, which interested her greatly.

Chris Chen wants to leave Heffernan's class and finish the term with me in an independent project. He's fascinating, but awfully neurotic. I'll give it a try.

Supper with Lincolns, Bill Scherman and wife and also the former president of Middlebury, James Armstrong, now at Kendal, a classicist. Nice.

April 25, 1992

Μεγάλο Σάββατο. We went to the service at Newport taking Bissera, the freshman from Sofia, Bulgaria, and my adult auditor in Greek 13. A strange, awesome beauty, even without ψάλτες.

April 27, 1992

Clearness committee for Deni Elliott at our house. James, her husband, and Jack Shepherd. She's agonizing over whether to accept a job offer in Montana. She'd prefer to stay at Dartmouth but can never have tenure here and is thus precarious. Endless repetition of the same points; tears; impasse. Jack and I both feel that she should leave.

April 28, 1992

Nice supper with Robert Binswanger. He hopes to stay on as a visiting professor next year.

April 30, 1992

Cook-Bien poetry reading again in the War/Peace Studies course. Again we didn't finish; ran out of time, mostly because Bill sang the whole of "Dooleysprudence"! Then Jack and I hurried to the Fourth Council meeting to plead for the course's certification and again failed. Gene Garthwaite complained that it didn't do justice to Arabs. Keith Walker complained that it didn't do justice to Africans. Someone else complained that it lacked "theory." Dick Birnie said that the exams were not rigorous enough, etc. I made a speech saying that incoherence is a virtue and that I wish we could have no exams at all. This of course drove the last nail into the coffin. Jim Hornig, our only ally, hardly spoke. Marianne Hirsch distinguished herself by being absent. Most discouraging.

Overseers' dinner at Norwich Inn for Carol Weingeist, without Jean, of course. Carol is in good spirits despite everything.

May 1, 1992

Another meeting with Deni Elliott, this time in Bernie Gert's office. More of the same. She should go.

Bill Scherman and Karen Rodis at lunch to discuss Beebe possibilities. Karen always smiles but clearly she has no interest in cooperating.

I'm using the Dartmouth Dante project's computerized variorum to work up Dante lectures. How exciting to be reading the Inferno, Purgatorio, and Paradiso again, the first time since Columbia. I'm using my Columbia notes, also.

A children's video, "Bob and Ted's Excellent Adventure," uses a flying telephone booth to transport the students into historical periods! I viewed it tonight. John Rassias wants to prosecute for copyright infringement.

May 2, 1992

Amos Bien here from Costa Rica. His "Rara Avis" is an experimental rain forest, the point being to prove that a forest owner can make just as much money by exploiting the forest itself in various ways as by cutting it down. Amos says that the scheme is working, more or less. He still hopes we'll visit.

Supper with Φιλίτσα. Her mismatch to Don Johnson is peculiar. She a total extrovert, he the total opposite.

May 5, 1992

Amherst

To U-Mass for Greek exams again. Then to Rhoda Honigberg. Bron died and we offered condolences (Chrysanthi and Mother came with me). Rhoda's two sons were there, both married and both lawyers; one of the wives is also a lawyer. It was good to have Bron at Daphne's wedding last August; he was at his best and very pleased.

May 7, 1992

Again with Bill Scherman regarding Beebe professorship plans. This time with Andrew Beebe, the grandson. I said that if money could be secured I'd stay on a final two years in the flexible retirement mode to inaugurate new projects. But do I really want to do that? Probably not.

May 8-9, 1992

Terpni

Found one panel of insulation down in our sleeping loft and repaired it. Planted peas, lettuce, etc. Started the Jari (my trick now is a teaspoonful of gas poured down the cylinder, to prime it). Supper with Shapiros, who had a fine trip to Greece last autumn.

May 10, 1992

Supper at Lee Baldwin's with his new wife Anne Sa'adah, and guests: the young expert on Cambodia, originally from Melbourne, with his Cambodian wife. We shared very much. Ben Kiernan by name.

May 11, 1992

Ben Kiernan's talk on Cambodia. He knows everything to know but is a boring lecturer, droning on and on. Lots of trees, not enough forest.

May 13, 1992

Leonard Rieser's retirement extravaganza. At 4:00 p.m. in the Hood Museum; formal speeches by Kemeny, Bill Doyle, etc. Fun to see lots of old-timers—e.g., Frank Smallwood, Fritz Hier, John Hennessey. Then a grand supper in the Boathouse with informal toasts and speeches and a spoof video done by Bill Smith. Leonard, Jr. sat at our table. He's a lawyer in Philadelphia. Very slight, like Rosemarie. I admired Leonard because at the very end (after all this had been going on since 4:00 p.m.) when he rose to give his final response to everyone, he spoke exclusively about someone else: Walter Burke, who of course was present. Reminded us of Purgatorio, how Dante quashes his own pride by giving the last words to Arnaut Daniël, and in Provençal. Leonard has been a real friend all these years, also a kind of patron.

May 14, 1992

Jack and I had breakfast with Dick Birnie to try to "reach" him re: War/Peace Studies. He was largely unreachable; kept talking about the committee's "responsibility." Jack and I have agreed to stop fighting them, and to capitulate and do what they want. . . . Flew to Philadelphia in the evening.

May 15, 1992

Pendle Hill

Publications Committee in the morning. Mary Helgesen let me use her Mac. I'm rushing to finish my lecture for Monday night.

Saturday, May 16, 1992

Pendle Hill

Work on lecture. Barbecue at Dan's for supper with two NYC friends of his, one the head of the Bayard Rustin Fund, the other an orderly in a hospital, a Filipino who cooked us the most delicious meal. Nice to reminisce about Rustin and A. J. Muste. Earlier: piano-violola with Oliver Rodgers.

Monday, May 18, 1992

Pendle Hill

Worked on the lecture steadily yesterday and today. Yesterday ministered in Meeting, on Dante. Music with Dan in the evening. Tonight's lecture, a good audience including some old friends from Kendal: Bain Davis, Mary Morrison. My subject: "Artistic Transformations of Jesus." I used slides (helped by Anne Cohen, Joy Kenseth, Kathleen Corrigan) showing very "shocking" Jesuses, including ones with erections: "the risen flesh"! Then spoke about Yeats's play "Resurrection" in which Jesus is counterpointed against Dionysus's rebirth; and of course D. H. Lawrence's "The Man Who Died," where Jesus is transformed into Osiris. Cited Dante also, the point being against literalism and arrogance, the belief that we can know the nature of Divinity. The other view is that every representation of Divinity, including what we are told in Scripture, is merely a representation, adequate for human understanding, of something that by definition defies human understanding. Of course I spoke also about the Scorsese film Imbroglia, as an example of literalism at its worst. Dan Seeger asked the first question, throwing me off my guard: If all this interpretation is so important, what then can we say about Quakerism, which excludes all artistic representation? I answered weakly that I'd already written about the nature of Quaker silence. Actually, however, the silence is, in effect, an "artistic" representation of the quality of heaven. . . . Afterwards, marking papers.

Tuesday, May 19, 1992

Pendle Hill–Hanover

At breakfast, people spoke well about the lecture, especially Irené, who said it had a beginning, middle, and end. . . . A quick stop at Staples; then flew home just in time for Elise Boulding's potluck at the Meeting. She's vigorous and stimulating, as always. I briefed her about our War/Peace troubles.

Wednesday, May 20, 1992

Kendal Overseers. Jean, urged it seems by John Diffey and Paul Lewis, responded to the Overseers about the evaluation, her voice quavering and the veins standing out in her neck. But she insisted that Carol's departure was entirely Carol's decision! And regarding her "coldness," she wondered if she'd be so labeled if she were a man. So, small gain. We have two new Overseers: John Radebaugh and Lee Huntington. Sydney Jarvis, Audrey Logan, and Erica Brinton have rotated off.

Elise's seminar at 5:00 p.m. plus supper. Afterwards we spent an hour at the Inn discussing the War/Peace problem. She recommends compromise and adjustment.

May 21, 1992

War/Peace Steering Committee. Again, the problem. Good group, very helpful. We'll think about starting a minor the year after next.

Dinner at home with the new Overseers and the Brokaws, to orient them. John Radebaugh gave me two trout flies as a present.

May 22, 1992

Saw the new movie Howards End. Beautiful, well acted, but lacks Forster's whimsy. Too heavy-handed in its social commentary.

Saturday, May 23, 1992

Cambridge

Met Meg at Sarah Kafatos's, where we were meant to have lunch. But no Sarah—some mix-up. So, better, had a lovely long lunch at a Thai restaurant. Then to A.R.T. to see Hedda Gabler—a wonderful play, but miscast: Hedda was always smiling! Here met, by pre-arrangement, Charlotte Waterlow, John Waterlow's sister. Drove home with her. She hand-delivered another Kazantzakis autograph. How nice! Like her brother, an effortless conversationalist, full of anecdotes and stories about her father (very austere), life in Greece when she was his social secretary after getting a first in history at Cambridge, the British males' fear of intellectual women. . . . Kazantzakis, when he met her, said, "Only three or four people have reached the philosophical heights that I have reached, and no woman can ever do that," whereupon she promptly lost all interest in Kazantzakis.

Sunday, May 24, 1992

Charlotte and I went to Meeting. She ministered. She told me afterward that she'd been refused membership in a Meeting in England because they said she didn't believe sufficiently in Christianity.

Monday, May 25, 1992

New crisis at Kendal. Sixty-five residents signed a petition condemning the food. Jean tore it up. The instigator demanded an apology and threw her out of his apartment.

To the farm after 5:00 p.m.

Tuesday, May 26, 1992

Planted tomatoes and beans. Got the John Deere running.

Wednesday, May 27, 1992

Breakfast at Kendal with Neil Ratliffe and the Websters. He still goes routinely to Greece. Remembers Leander fondly. He is collecting Beveridge Webster's papers for the piano archive he directs.

Honors dinner with Geoff Watson, who appeared at my office unshaven at 5:55. He's been up two nights in a row. Turned in his thesis, but it's really not finished. Sat also with Kate Cohen, who says that she regards me as more her mentor than her official mentors. Also next to Beatriz Pastor, who caught me up on Dwight Lahr's life: still suffering from partial paralysis of his leg. Leonard was the speaker, at his best, full of soft humor. Subject: Albert Einstein.

I am as bad as Geoff. I won't get this issue of JMGS in on time. Carol has given me a week's extension.

May 28, 1992

Last CAP. I've finished three years. Banquet followed. John Moore and I became real friends through this contact. Then to hear Cathy Choi's senior violin recital: Bruch—nice, but stiff.

May 29, 1992

Charitability Committee for Kendal: Lafayette, John, Chrysanthi missing. We have some good ideas for outreach.

Music: Dick, Allan, Paul. Paul can't count. It's getting annoying.

May 30, 1992

To Kinhaven. Lelah oversaw the interment of Darby's ashes on the "Knoll." David, Jr. conspicuously absent; apparently he hated his mother. Nadia Macintosh there, plus "Toodle," the sister. George Goodwin, too. But Glen Sproul was the nice surprise. We went off and talked for an hour during lunch. We'd worked well together during his presidency; he appreciated the support I'd given him.

May 31, 1992

I'm on Ministry and Council again for the Meeting. I asked them to visit with Jean and Nancy to see why they have stopped coming to Meeting.

4:00 p.m., piano recital by my Chinese student, her family much in evidence. It was excruciatingly bad. Played all the pieces I used to play. Started with Mozart, the first mistake. As Bill Summers said, "That's like going to a fancy ball in an evening dress held together by temporary stitching.”

June 1, 1992

We took Aris Damianos and his fiancée Fran out for dinner at Café La Fraise. They're getting married on the 14th but we cannot go to the wedding. He says his parents are reconciled now to his marrying a non-Greek. But they're having an Orthodox service.

June 4, 1992

Lunch with Kate Cohen, perhaps the end of a nice student-friendship. She seems very grateful.

June 5, 1992

Lunch with Jay Parini halfway between Hanover and Middlebury. I met him by chance the other day at Kendal as he was about to visit Dick and Betty Eberhart. Jay's Tolstoy novel is being turned into a film with Anthony Quinn to play Tolstoy (!). Jay did the film script and had to accept many compromises—e.g., excluding all views of poor people (“American moviegoers, paying $7.00 each, don't want to see poor people”). But he drew the line when the agent urged him to have Tolstoy engage in a sword fight.

Sunday, June 7, 1992

Cambridge

To A.R.T. for Goldoni's Servant of Two Masters, a hilarious romp. Mother came, and we met Lori for lunch, then returned to her lodgings to see if they might be suitable for Alec. They're disgusting. A pigsty. Goldoni is an amalgam of vaudeville, Καραγκιόζης, commedia dell' arte. Pure entertainment of the best kind.

June 8, 1992

Hanover

Lunch with Tom Corindia: always a chance to gossip about Kendal. I probably talked too much, failing to observe confidentiality. Told him about Jean's evaluation, step by step.

Chen continually postpones turning in his paper. Dare I fail him?

Thursday, June 11, 1992

Chen turned in a 12-page paper, interesting but skimpy. I told him I'd grade him a C+ and his dismay convinced me to raise it to B-.

Supper with Jack and Kathy Shepherd, very friendly. We've had a fine collaboration.

Last minute scramble to submit ORC copy for the University Seminars, War/Peace Studies, College Courses. I have three new University Seminars for next year.

Sent in JMGS issue last Monday, a week late. What a relief!

Friday, June 12, 1992

Farewell lunch for Leonard at the Dickey Endowment. Again we worried about the disparity between Dartmouth's protestations in favor of international students, and the reality.

Drove to the farm. Nice Italian dinner in a restaurant we've not tried before. We pride ourselves on having eaten in every restaurant between Hanover and Riparius.

Saturday, June 13, 1992

Started right away on Pendle Hill obligations. I did the printed version of my Jesus lecture two weeks ago and sent that in. Now I had to write an introduction for the reprinting of Howard Brinton's guide to Quaker practice, explaining the changes: inclusive language, etc. "That of God in everyone" instead of "every man" is OK. But isn't the suppression of "Kingdom of God" going a bit too far?

Monday, June 15, 1992

Read Helen Hole's essays for PH Book Committee. I couldn't recommend them. Then read Paul Lacey's new essay on spirituality. Ditto.

Tuesday, June 16, 1992

Read "An Account of the Life and Travels of Samuel Bownas." Again: negative recommendation. Too many trees; not enough forest.

Alec arrived, chauffeured from JFK by Leander. He was in good spirits despite the break from Eyi necessary before he left. Chris and Art came over to say hello.

Deanna auditioned for the National Symphony in Washington and won, so she'll be leaving St. Paul and setting up house with Leander in Maryland next September. Leander will keep the Moravian job for the time being. We're all very pleased.

Forgot to write here that Dan Seeger asked me to be Quaker in Residence at Pendle Hill sometime. After retirement, perhaps.

Don Blackmer telephoned. He'd been reading my write-up for the 40th Harvard reunion book and noted my interest in Kendal, which may be right for him and Joan.

Sent everything off to PH via express. Turning now to neglected correspondence. These past six months I was a first-class procrastinator with the Journal and other obligations.

Thursday, June 18, 1992

Leander broke the Jari. He's got a mild ulcer; also tendonitis in the right shoulder. Deanna's new arrangements will force him to give up his engagement to make a CD of the Elliott Carter cello sonata in St. Olaf's next September; his obligation to support Deanna in her move comes first. Alec said nothing about Eyi to us, but we heard it all from Leander. He realized that a continuing relationship with her would just be too restricting.

Friday, June 19, 1992

John Peck here from the county soil conservation agency. He, Alec, Leander, and I walked our property, which has now been surveyed for fresh use. Lots of areas where we could begin thinning and even cutting.

Took the Jari to Dave Whitty's. Miraculously he fixed it on the spot.

The garden is very sickly owing to a heavy frost while we were still in Hanover, but we're watering it and hoping.

Picked Daphne up in Lake George. Greg is in London again and she came on the bus to spend the weekend with us. She's discouraged at Simon and Schuster. No way to advance. Wants to prepare a résumé and start looking for another job. But Greg may be transferred to London for an extended period, which would be perfect timing for Daphne. We'll visit them! He should know one way or the other in two weeks. We all had a late dinner sitting outdoors with a view of the lake. Very "European."

Saturday, June 20, 1992

Nice to have all three children together for a few days. It's rare now. Daphne favored steaks for supper and we feasted and cooked on the fire outdoors, of course. Unseasonably cold. I made a fire in the living room and we all sat by it, reading and talking. Sighted a ewe and faun earlier, very close.

Sunday, June 21, 1992

Took Daphne to catch her bus in Lake George and preceded this with a lovely pizza, again outdoors with a view of the lake. Walked on the lakefront to the steamer dock. Saw ducks and ducklings, all in formation.

Monday, June 22, 1992

Mowed around the pond. Got power scythe working again after some difficulty. Leander left for Kinhaven, reluctantly, saying this will be his last summer there; he wants to spend six weeks at the farm in 1993. Afterwards, Chrysanthi, Alec, and I drove back on Waddell Road to see the Morris development. He has built a road to the beaver pond and has drilled a well. Extraordinary beaver work: huge lodge, huge dam, and two smaller dams downstream. Evidence of beaver-fallen trees all around. We even heard the famous slap of the tail on the water to warn of intruders. Then saw a blue heron resting on top of a dead tree, its nest nearby. It flew off majestically.

Tuesday, June 23, 1992

I'm caught up now on the journal, more or less, very embarrassed by my procrastination. Some MSS have languished for six months without being processed. Also caught up on correspondence, mostly. But I have six months' worth of TLSs to read. . . . To Hanover in the evening .

Wednesday, June 24, 1992

Hanover

Overseers 7:30 to 10:15 a.m. Got nowhere with Lafayette's outreach report. I had hoped we'd establish priorities. Also got nowhere with the question of supplementary electric generation for power outages, when none of the elevators runs and people are stuck on the third floor. Jean reported the food petition briefly. Overseers approved going to court over Hanover taxes. I raced to Kiewit to buy a "Powerbook"—i.e., laptop—computer for Alec; over $2000. Then back to Kendal for lunch. We waited 35 minutes to be served. Food cold, unappetizing. I began to understand the petition. David French, like me, disagrees with Jean's peremptory refusal to receive or read the petition. . . . Met Jay and Devon at the entrance and gave them a quick tour. Apparently Jay had really listened when I spoke to him about Kendal at lunch recently.

Franny Webster stopped me in the hall to say that Beveridge has gone nine full months, his entire stay at Kendal, without a drop of alcohol. She is so pleased. They are going to try to get him full status as a contractual resident when his first year is up—i.e., soon. He played a splendid recital to an overflow crowd in Hopkins Center and was at top form, according to Mother and others.

Last night at 4:00 a.m. the phone rang. Indonesia. Ines delayed. Arriving at 2:00 on flight 800, Delta. How lucky we were here. Today I called Delta. No flight 800. No arrival at 2:00 at JFK. Consternation. But when we finally discovered Ines's last name from Nancy Bidlack and finally and luckily reached Alec at the farm, this was cleared up. 800 was Garuda, as was 2:00, not Delta. Delta had been changed to American. How lucky we got the call. Otherwise Alec would wait for her 6:00 a.m. arrival on Delta tomorrow, find no one, and not know what to do next.

Thursday, June 25, 1992

Terpni

Nice supper near Pico last night: Italian. Got blitz today from Chris Chen. Education is so complicated and fascinating. He had sort of pressured me into raising his grade from C+ to B-. Now he wrote his regret at this, saying it wasn't a Taoist thing to do (correct!) and that I should have given him a D for his presumption. So, self-education has occurred. Interesting man. He told me that I have unusual modesty. Perhaps. Don Pease when we were at dinner a while ago said I have unusual gentleness. Perhaps. I hope that these are Quakerly qualities.

Alec the other day went back to the Morris's beaver dam, sat silent for an hour with his camera ready and eventually saw the beavers at work, also the heron feeding its chicks.

Today Alec picked up Ines satisfactorily. Close call.

Friday, June 26, 1992

I'm working on Paivanas's piece on rebetika, which needs extensive re-writing. I seem to be turning into a copyeditor. It's an interesting skill. . . . Mowed some more on the lower field, a crime because of all the wildflowers and berries. Also, as Chrysanthi said, I ruined the deer's meals. Mower broke; main spring came loose.

Saturday, June 27, 1992

Used the power scythe to clear next to the tree-line in the lower field. These sunny, cool, beautiful days are so peaceful. Should finish Paivanas tomorrow. On Thursday we ate at the Merrill McGee house in Warrensburg with Fran and Irv. Delicious. Special coupons: 2nd entrée free. Irv is getting continually grumpier and opinionated.

Monday, June 29, 1992

Finished copyediting Païvanas and sent it off to him in Australia. My God, half a week! Piano tuner came. The old Steinway sounds wonderful now and all the keys work, for the moment. Read Pramoedya Ananta Toer's novel The Fugitive, about the very last days of the Japanese occupation of Java. Melodramatic, without much depth of characterization, but sensitive regarding what people find themselves doing in wartime, with hardly knowing or caring—e.g., collaborating with the enemy, betraying even their loved ones.

Tuesday, June 30, 1992

A grouse chick wandered into my office beneath my feet, and then the mother appeared just outside with the rest of the brood, looking like a wild turkey

Stupidly broke the Ford mower by adjusting the lift spring too tightly; the housing sheared off under the pressure, where it had been welded. Called Bud Rodick, who says he'll pick it up and fix it.

Wednesday, July 1, 1992

Used the tractor, now without the mower, to remove rocks in the lower field. Of course they're always three times as big as they seem. One we couldn't budge after up-ending it, so we left it, a miniature Stonehenge. I am gradually civilizing that front border where there is so much slash from the clearing of the electric line.

Mary and Maureen Fitzgerald came for supper. Maureen surprised and saddened me by denigrating Jacques Grunblatt after I suggested that the new beach and pond be named for him. "We're tired of being asked to honor Jacques," she complained. He took more from the town than he gave. And others did much more than he to help restore the pond, but he was the loud-mouth," etc. Too bad. Maureen also commented, drawing from her career in the Navy, that a ship without complaints is an unhealthy ship. I must tell Jean.

Thursday, July 2, 1992

Galleys arrived for JMGS 10 (2). Another three days of my life. I hurriedly skimmed and then wrote a review of Ο λόγος της απουσίας by Παναγιώτης Μουλλάς, 40 letters from Fotos Politis to his parents and three times as much excursus on the "problematicism" of epistolography. Very nice, actually, because done partially with tongue in cheek. This review is meant to fill up some blank pages in the issue.

Supper at Copperfield Inn with Evelyn and Aser Rothstein. North Creek is surely different. Waiters in tuxedos, elegance, fine food, reasonable price. Rothsteins extremely friendly. Spent most of the three hours telling me about their trip to Indonesia: Java, Bali, Sulawesi, where they saw extraordinary death rituals.

Friday, July 3, 1992

Rosine Gardner paid a visit. Poor Jerry can't make any money with the newspaper because advertisers don't pay. Last winter he ran a cigarette ad that paid, but had to drop it because of moral indignation from Evelyn Greene and others who claim that the ad recommends suicide or murder.

Alec is absorbed with the marvels of the laptop computer I bought for him, an Apple Powerbook. It is remarkable, as is Microsoft Word 5. We played chamber music for a bit: Purcell, Vivaldi, Toselli's Serenade, Schubert, Handel. Delicious spaghetti and homemade rolls for supper.

Saturday, July 4, 1992

Up at 6:00 a.m. to burn the brush pile, because it rained yesterday and last night. Chrysanthi worried because I didn't ask for a permit. It went up like a huge torch and was down to the ground in thirty minutes. We cut various dead, unsightly trees around the pond and added these to the embers.

Conference call the other night from Jerry Bidlack, John Austin, Janet Greene, David Erlanger, and Bill Polk regarding strategies for the July Kinhaven Board. I'm glad that I'm going off it, finally. July should be my last meeting.

Sunday, July 5, 1992

Rainy morning. Wrote letters on the computer: to Izzy Ganz/Gardner/Lipschutz, Martin McKinsey, several students; wrote book review for World Literature Today on Fakinou's The Seventh Garment, quite remarkable; read TLSs, which Daphne now wants me to send to her after I'm finished. Weather cleared in the afternoon, and Alec and I went with spraypaint to mark our boundaries. OK on southern line until it disappeared beneath a beaver pond. So we walked northward beneath some magnificent ledges until, luckily, we tripped over the remains of the northern fence, and marked about  $\frac{1}{2}$  of this, ending at Waddell Road. Previous markings all but gone. The problem will be the new property, which has no southern fence at all.

Chrysanthi went to a potluck at Wevertown Town Hall. Alec and I telephoned Michael Gouthreau and met him at Mosher's for supper. As Mike says, Mosher's has one flavor of ice cream and one flavor of dinner. Whether you order ham, turkey, scallops, or veal, it all tastes the same: great. But we had a nice visit. Saw Jim Dwyer there sporting a luxurious mustache, and also Gary McGinn's small boy, on an outing with his cousins. Mike told us that the Twin Pine Diner closed so suddenly because the owners had been cheating on payment of their meal taxes, and were shut down by State inspectors.

Practicing a Mozart sonata to play with Alec.

Monday, July 6, 1992

We're marking the borders, still. Got around to the western border and luckily discovered the old fence. It's very high up on the ridge most of the way. We followed it southward; it slopes precipitously and ends in the swamp, where we of course lost the fence and couldn't find the SW corner. Some fine timber, ledges, wetlands.

Wednesday, July 8, 1992

Bud Rodick's man brought the Ford mower back, welded. But in taking it off his trailer he noted another break in a weld, so I sent it back. Nice man. One of ten children born on a Johnsbury farm. Farm sold, but they've kept the house. Eight children still in the area, two were killed. I didn't ask how.

I'm still clearing on the eastern edge of our front field, where the men clearing the power line made such a mess. I'll get it eventually so it can be mowed easily. And I'm exposing the large tree-trunks for looks.

Nice supper at Mary and Maureen Fitzgeralds'. Maureen has a splendid computer.

Friday, July 10, 1992

A day of contrasts. Headwork in office in the morning. Manual labor in the front field in the afternoon. Then suit jackets and neckties and off to the ballet in Saratoga. Met Donna and Ed for supper in the Hall of Springs. Ed and Alec had lots to talk about since Ed is a teacher, formerly also a professor in SONY School of Education in Albany, now the head of a consortium of schools for handicapped children. Donna is still an assistant superintendent of schools at BOCES but unhappy because her boss is possessive, etc. Nicky is about to go to the Manhattan School of Music to do jazz saxophone. Shandra will be a senior at Haverford majoring in physics. Haverford has worked well for her, which pleases me since I was a factor in her decision. Donna also spoke about Breck, who came to Nicky's graduation. He is going back to school, finally, doing an M.S. in geology at UNH. Has been living as a carpenter all these years, but also is living with a woman who has a good job and supports him. Shandra is involved in the Christian Fellowship at Haverford. I asked Donna if this bothered her, since she's Jewish, and was surprised to hear "Not at all."

Ballet exquisitely beautiful, as always, especially Balanchine's "Square Dance." I love it because it's the quintessence of rationality transformed into aesthetics. During the interval a voice said, "Aren't you Peter Bien?" A former student, class of '71, said I hadn't changed a bit. He was in the Parkhurst occupation and remembers me bringing textbooks to him and the others while they were in jail. He's still a bit of an activist, he says.

Sunday, July 12, 1992

A nice lazy day. Translated some letters. Read To Βήμα. (I've finished my backlog of TLSs.) Practiced Mozart. Worked in the front field pulling a stump. Showered. Wrote a long letter to Bill Edgerton, who had written me all the coincidences that link us. Then Shapiros and Evelyn and Don Greene came for supper. Don is a 46er, twelve times over. Spent yesterday bushwhacking up one of the 46 in the rain. He's an MIT dropout; left because he refused to complete his athletic requirement. Finished, or rather, as he says, "bought my degree," at Tucson, where he spent most of the time camping in the desert in 115° heat. I gave Evelyn a TLS review about depletion of water resources. Expect to see some of it in her next article in the North Creek newspaper. Irv told us that Al Gore has been chosen as Clinton's running mate, something we hadn't known. If they can only win!

Monday, July 13, 1992

Called Steve Warne, the forester. He came in the afternoon and talked for three hours. We'll next contact a consultant forester and join the Tree Farm Association. Warne sees “protectionists” as a political lobby out for self-interest. We’re OK. We’re “conservationists.”

Tuesday, July 14, 1992

Chrysanthi went off with Alec to Hanover to teach for ten days in the Rassias Greek program, leaving a turkey, etc. in the fridge and exhorting me to eat it and not go to restaurants. Leander called. His right hand is in severe pain. He may have carpal tunnel syndrome, otherwise tendonitis. I telephoned Allan Munck, Paul Gerber, Jim Strickler for guidance. All responded graciously, advising Leander to see Dr. Forst Brown at Hitchcock. Leander will have an electromyogram tomorrow to help confirm the carpal tunnel diagnosis and then proceed. He has a Beethoven trio scheduled for this Saturday and his own piece for the following Saturday. He is reluctant to cancel. But after that he can rest pretty much until October, when he has a CD recording in Minnesota.

Wednesday, July 15, 1992

I took Jerry Gardner to the ballet. We met Alec and the Hall of Springs, had a lovely supper, also saw Donna and Ed during the interval. Ballet ethereal: “Swan Lake” danced superbly by Maria Calegari and Adam Lüders in Balanchine’s choreography. Then Bach’s “A Musical Offering” choreographed by Peter Martins, premiered last year. Classic, restrained, a bit dull, none of the razzmatazz of “Swan Lake,” of course, but “pure” art. Finally, Verdi’s “Four Seasons,” which has everything: costumes, humor, athleticism, variety, all possible ways for both male and female dancers to show off. My favorite was “Fall” with Darci Kistler, who is gorgeous, Damian Woetzel, and Gen Horiuchi, who jumps like a jumping bean.

I remember seeing “Swan Lake” at the City Center in the 1950s with André Eglevsky and Maria Tallchief. Eglevsky was extraordinary, although already quite old.

Jerry was more optimistic than usual. His financial problems were so bad he can only go up now. Severe cash-flow problems, advertisers who don’t pay, competition with other local papers—everything. But he thinks it will get better. He is now sole owner, owing to his father’s stroke. His biggest problem, alas, may be his wife, Rosine, who seems not to help at all and generally to be a demoralizing force. I told him how unusual the paper is in expressing the pulse of a community, especially through the letters to the editor and the accounts of Town Board meetings.

Heard the Democratic convention in the car on the way back. Clinton is now officially the candidate. Everything upbeat, but they expect another “negative campaign” from Bush, and the effect of Peron is anyone’s guess. What a miracle if Clinton and Gore can end in the White House!

Friday, July 17, 1992

To Kinhaven

Stupidly forgot about Friday’s concert and missed Ines playing Saint-Saëns. She is spectacular by all accounts, a real prodigy. Leander says she learned the entire piece, note-perfect, in one day. She is musical as well as technical. How nice that Alec made possible this opportunity for an Indonesian with no financial means. He helped raise $6000 from the Rotary Club, etc.

Supper with Leander. He’s wearing a splint but is still able to play. Had electromyogram earlier today. No results yet. Appointment with Forst Brown at Hitchcock for Thursday.

Board meeting. I’m still convener of the Planning Committee but had to remind John Austin that I’m leaving the board. Lauren Zalaz agreed to replace me. I was told confidentially that Jerry objected to my continuing on the board because of Leander’s role as a staff person. There is some sense in this, I suppose. But it’s also ungracious.

Watched late television in the Blue Gentian re: the election. Bush is going to blame everything on Congress, it seems. But his manager said that the Republicans won’t wage a negative campaign. We’ll see . . . Mrs. Kidde is carrying on, hopelessly. No business, yet she can’t sell the place. So, she’s stuck. I was the only lodger.

Saturday, July 18, 1992

Kinhaven

Dorothy Dushkin memorial celebration. Lots of “old-timers” came: Jim Quinn, Jock Forbes, Bob and Kay Moore, for example; also Ted Schultz, Mr. Pappenheimer, etc. I did the presentation and planning, and clerked the discussion. Some good ideas came out of this. Leander played a Beethoven trio, opus 70, very “late” sounding. Staff did some Dushkin pieces after a nice talk by John Austin and also by Lelah, who was in the best of spirits. Then Copland’s “Appalachian Spring,” which I found tedious as scored for a small orchestra. The version for full orchestra has the tonal color that the piece needs. Nice talk with Leander, Larry Wright, and Put Goodwin afterwards.

Sunday, July 19, 1992

Kinhaven

Breakfast in Ludlow with Leander and Sandy. This is a Sunday ritual for them. They're good friends, intellectually and musically, but not carnally, for she's a Lesbian. Final board meeting, devoted mostly to the quandaries of short- and long-term planning. Nice talk with Bill Polk at lunch, about Kendal.

Student concert; started with the orchestra doing vivacious finale of Sibelius's 2nd symphony—terrific for the trombones. Jerry in control. More Dushkin of various qualities. But the ending, her "Canaan Bound" for orchestra and chorus was very moving. I noticed that Ines had everything memorized, also when the chamber choir did madrigals in Latin, French, and English, whereas the other students needed their scores.

Vile supper in Rutland. Listened to Kathleen Battle on the way home. Alec still awake. Was able to tell him about Leander's hopes to have Ines play for Gary Graffman at Curtis.

Monday, July 20, 1992

Terpni

Forester Jim Farrar came at 8:00 a.m. and we walked through "compartment 9" of Steve Warne's plan for us, near the northwest corner. He's fascinating to hear regarding strategies for enhancing the long-term quality of the forest. He felt that we could proceed with a cutting this year. But his fees are rather high. So we telephoned Chris Geaswar, who came in the afternoon and did the same tour with the opposite recommendation: to wait five or ten years instead of tearing up the forest and gaining mostly pulpwood—i.e., nothing. We're leaning in his direction. He can mark borders, so we may at least do that. Farrar says we should look into the 480A tax-relief plan for managed forests.

Went off in the evening with Alec to hear Bob McGrath lecture at the Adirondack Museum on the exhibit he put together there, "A Wild Sort of Beauty," tracing painterly views of the Adirondacks from Thomas Cole's romantic "Schroon Mountain" in the 1820s or 1830s to postmodernist works of recent years. Bob was excellent, showing how visions of the Adirondacks have been a metaphor for larger agendas and issues in American life. He's divorced from Susan now, and had an attractive blond in tow, his current companion. Warder Cadbury and wife were there, as suspected. Had a nice talk. He wants us to come to Camp Backlog next week.

Alec and I feasted on ice cream sticks in North Creek on the way back, in torrential rain.

Tuesday, July 21, 1992

Wakened at 4:00 a.m. last night by a telephone call from Andros: Miranda Stavrinou, who never received galley proofs. I faxed all fifteen pages to her brother in Athens College. Alec said he'd been up half the night because of the mice who build nests in his roofing insulation, alas, directly over his bed. We don't know how to counteract this. He has sawed away the rotten exterior of a huge "bole" we found in the forest yesterday to reveal some sound wood with lovely grain. Will use it for a tabletop,, maybe.

Picking peas this morning in the garden. I stood still while a hummingbird stuck its long beak quickly into a dozen peaseblossoms no more than a foot or two from me.

Called Corey Smith and invested $12,000 in Waste Management Corporation and also in a new company making medical products.

To ballet with Alec and Mary Fitzgerald, who used to usher at SPAC for a decade. What a treat to see Balanchine's brilliant "Apollo," first done in 1928 chez Diaghilev. Lindsay Fischer was a bright, blond sun-god, and the three muses were crop-haired, unisexed maidens of exquisite skill. Stravinsky's score is of course brilliant, too. Compared to this, the Ravel "Concerto in G Major" choreographed by Jerome Robbins seemed slight, a jeu—indeed the dancers seemed to be having a rollicking good time. I preferred the contemporary dances, both premiered in 1992: "Herman Scherman" by William Forsythe, with electronic music by Thom Willems: very jagged and immensely active, with dancers in black, and "Mercury," to a Haydn score, choreographed by Lynne Taylor-Corbett. Again, immensely active, but no longer black; on the contrary, bright.

Previously, in the afternoon, Alec and I were in the forest trying to deal with an immense bole that Alec had discovered, a globe of wood four feet in diameter, caused by illness. Mostly rotten, especially in the interior, but the perimeter is sound. Has beautiful grain. He wants to use it for a tabletop. We cut off a relatively small section but even that was too heavy to carry out by hand. We'll wait for some dry weather and then try to get the tractor in. Actually, it's directly on one of Bill Hyde's old logging roads.

Wednesday, July 22, 1992

Oran Young blitzed me the latest version of the Hewlett proposal. He and Jack are completely changing War/Peace Studies, trying to integrate it with the new Dartmouth curriculum. I think it's time for me to resign as co-coordinator and let others carry on.

Still struggling to clean up the JMGS galleys. Ben King sent in his set with yet more errors discovered. All authors have responded except Stavrinou. I faxed her set to her yesterday (the Hopkins copy never arrived).

As I approached my office this morning there was a whoosh and a cloud of dust. A wild turkey chick was actually in the office, and I had flushed it. Several others, outside, whooshed away with equal élan, but the mother just perched on a branch and surveyed the scene calmly before joining her brood in the adjacent woods.

Leander visited Dr. Forst Smith at Hitchcock and was told that he has a very mild condition just at its start. He needs proper exercise, rest, and care, and should be OK. He has written to Graffman about Ines. His old girlfriend, the horn player, Jeanne Martin, was in the ballet orchestra. Alec recognized her and they spoke. I seem to remember that she was psychologically imbalanced, but perhaps that is what we invent for people whom we simply do not like or wish to discard.

I translated two letters today, one to Stefanides, one in French to Victor Serge, a remarkable one in which Kazantzakis assures Serge that he (Kazantzakis) is not a Marxist. When I told Bob McGrath the other night that I was translating Kazantzakis letters, he groaned and said, "Aren't you ever going to escape that man?" Touché!

Off now to deal with the ant infestation in the ash tree just back of the cabin. Then to Wilderness Lodge for supper, guests of Jerry Gardner. The Lodge doesn't pay its bills for ads, so it keeps giving Jerry vouchers for free meals.

Thursday, July 23, 1992

To Hanover

Supper at Kendal with Mother and Beveridge and Franny Webster. He lacks the score for Ravel's "Gaspard de la nuit." I'll try to xerox it for him from Paddock tomorrow. He said he played it for Ravel himself in Paris.

We were joined by Mary Bunting-Smith, former president of Radcliffe, a sweet old lady still showing her patrician side. Afterwards, long talk with Mary Schaffner, new president of the Residents Association, former headmistress of Lincoln School, a Quaker boarding school. She said that residents feel very negative about all the construction defects and are sure that they are paying for the reparation. She was also somewhat cynical about the dream of "community." I urged her to be candid when she reports to the combined boards tomorrow.

At 10:00 p.m. met with Sterling Perrin, my new student assistant for JMGS. He seems eager and scrupulous.

Chrysanthi finished her Rassias class very successfully, she feels. Four students, all now speaking some Greek.

Friday, July 24, 1992

Breakfast with Jack Shepherd. Learned that Elizabeth Ballard died, peacefully, of a second stroke while listening to music in her kitchen. Lucky she didn't survive as a vegetable and live on for a decade, like John Dickey. She was the last surviving founder of Hanover Monthly Meeting. Jack is disgruntled regarding the search procedure for the Dickey Endowment. We both fear Gene Garthwaite's candidacy. We made plans to go back to the Fourth Council for approval of College Course 1.

Dentist. Then met Don Blackmer at Kendal to show him around. Lunch with him and Mother. He's eager to retire because, as he says, one cannot be a Soviet historian any longer. Joan, his wife, now prefers to live alone. Too bad. He's contemplating Kendal because of its proximity to his summer home in Vershire.

4:00 p.m., joint meeting of Hanover Directors and Overseers. Alan Hunt gave a good presentation on trustee response, diverse role of trustees and staff. Lloyd Lewis officially placed Kendal at Hanover under the care of the Kendal Corporation, no longer the Development Organization. So Jean will report to John Diffey now, no longer to Paul Lewis. We're one unit shy of 90% occupancy—only 13 more to go for 95%. Mary Schaffner was much milder and less candid today than with me in private yesterday, but a few things did get a discussion going on Kendal at Hanover's future, without much success. But we got some good ideas for the retreat we'll hold in 1993. Then a reception with sherry and wine (!) in the Bridge Lounge, and I presented Jean with a box of chocolates and said we all loved her! Then dinner for all 26 of us, fortunately a very good dinner. We sat with Lynmar and his wife.

Saturday, July 25, 1992

Saratoga

To Saratoga. Met Bob, Ilona, Caitlin, and Amanda Bell, plus Daphne and Greg and Alec. Picnic on SPAC grounds. Daphne and Greg full of plans for their move to London at the end of September. Bob Bell gracious and humane, as always. The ballets were Donizetti "Variations," a 1960 Balanchine piece that left me rather cold although Margaret Tracey was beautiful; then the new "Jeu de cartes" by Stravinsky with Peter Martins' choreography. Music much better than Donizetti, but the dance didn't move me. Then came the Prokofiev-Balanchine masterpiece "Prodigal Son," first done in 1929 when Balanchine was 24 years old. So moving! So restrained! Helene Alexopoulos was a seductive Siren and Peter Boal a pathetic/energetic prodigal. Scenery by Georges Rouault, from the original Diaghilev production. This and "Apollo" were the highpoints of this season, for me.

The Bells left and we had a light supper with Greg and Daphne in one of the old Saratoga hotels, outdoors, in back on a patio. Will Daphne find a job in London? That's the question.

Fun shopping in Price Chopper in Glens Falls on the way back. Alec went off to Kinhaven to hear Leander's composition for piano, trumpet, and percussion, the one we heard in Bethlehem last spring.

Sunday, July 26, 1992

Terpni

Alec said that Leander got lost in his piece, but the audience was unaware and Leander showed up for supper. Gary Graffman has responded; he'll hear Ines at Marlboro next Saturday.

I'm worrying about the ant infestation of the big ash tree in back of the house, so deep that my Stihl blade couldn't reach it all.

Monday, July 27, 1992

An owl hooted all day today. I started mowing again; did almost all of the north field until the moldboard wire broke. Delicious porterhouse steak cooked on the fire outdoors for dinner. Alec, Chrysanthi, and Leander went to the Narrows for ice cream and miniature golf; I stayed home to write letters and read the TLS.

The 'c' on my computer keyboard won't print and I'm "deprived"—couldn't blitz Leo Papademetre in Adelaide about the forthcoming MLA.

Doing one or two Kazantzakis letters daily. They really are disgustingly self-centered.

Tuesday, July 28, 1992

Alec said he couldn't understand my "Words, Wordlessness" essay. Leander said the same. I must remember that most people have no philosophical training.

Meg called; she wants me to start off the Harvard lecture series next October. I'm also booked for the Foreign Service Institute in Washington for December, thanks to Jim Warren.

Wednesday, July 29, 1992

Our doe appeared without her faun. Has she lost him? I heard various animal screams today, and panting. They say that rabbits scream when they're being killed.

Dinner at Bob and Marilyn Morse's. One of the guests was the woman who wrote the book on Jean Roberts Foster (or Foster Roberts). Marilyn read one of Forster's poems: touching and memorable on an Adirondack woman who walks out on her husband and family (à la Nora in Doll's House) because she's tired of being a slave to them. Marilyn's brother turns out to be a yodeler. So he yodeled for us. Then we all sang songs with me at the piano. No one knew any, so we ended with the Methodist hymnal.

Thursday, July 30, 1992

Dinner at Shapiros with Laura and Mike Gouthreau. Alec showed his Indonesia slides, a good indication of the richness of his life there. Obviously we are selfish in making him feel that he should exist at home, not abroad.

Friday, July 31, 1992

Yasuo and Naoko arrived. They're doing well at Stony Brook. They seemed excited when I said I might come to Japan in three or four years to teach at Keo University. After supper, lots of good music, especially a lovely Telemann. And I accompanied Naoko on a Vaughan-Williams suite that she'd never played previously with the piano. But Doppler, as usual, ground everyone to a halt.

Saturday, August 1, 1992

Alec left at 6:00 a.m. to fetch Ines at Kinhaven and take her to Marlboro to audition for Gary Graffman. Yasuo, Naoko, and I played music again, joyously, and how nice that the piano was repaired! Then I took them back to Morris's property to see the beaver lodge and dams. The herons are gone, both nests abandoned. They left to go to Kinhaven. Chrysanthi and I had pizza at the Narrows, which is always a visual as well as a culinary treat.

Yesterday, translated from French a super letter of Kazantzakis's to E. Levi. Exciting. Most of the time, however, I find this translation job exceedingly tedious.

The other day we had a woman here to give us a quote on lightning rods for Alec's cabin and the pole barn. $1300. Can we do it ourselves, perhaps?

Also, a lumberman walked the forest and said that our logs are prime for veneer and boards and that they'll decrease in value if they get bigger. What to think?

Today, also, I finished the year's mowing. Και του χρόνου! The mower behaved perfectly.

Sunday, August 2, 1992

Saw our doe with her faun this time. Next to my office. Relieved!

I finally figured out what was wrong with Adi Pollis's entry βιολογική άξονες. Άξων is masculine. So: βιολογικοί άξονες. How embarrassing if this gaffe had been published! Michael Herzfeld, good man, returned his galleys from Rethymno, very helpfully. But Mary Layoun did nothing. Will I have to ask her to resign? Sterling Perrin, my new student assistant, seems eager and capable.

Telephoned Kate Cohen regarding Daphne's job at Simon & Schuster. Kate would be perfect. But she plans to go to Italy after a year.

When we saw Laura last Thursday she said that she is always inspired simply by the thought of how much I accomplish every day. Silly woman! At night, around 10:00 p.m. I now find I can hardly stay awake any longer.

Chrysanthi went to church today, at the Riverside Institute. Outdoors, under a shed.

Wednesday, August 5, 1992

With my new, professional compass, Alec and I were able to mark off the northern border of the new land, accurately, for our line coincided perfectly with various border trees and the few ribbons that were already there. We went as far as the wetlands. Lots of timber for the future, especially pine.

Thursday, August 6, 1992

Ditto for the southern border, again accurately, for we coincided perfectly with long stretches of stone wall. Surprisingly, the land goes much further south than I'd imagined. We have quite a lot on the south side of the power line. Not so much timber on this end, but some nice stands of pine that will be fine in ten to fifteen years.

Read Ἄσμα ασμάτων, maybe for the first time, in order to check a reference made by Kazantzakis in a letter to Anghelakis. It is so beautiful, and so shamelessly sensual, as Kazantzakis says. It surely is not an allegory about a believer's love for the Church! It if were, why would the Church be so enamored, erotically, of the believer?!

Friday, August 7, 1992

My afternoon project: a four-way rotating stand for dictionaries to use in Hanover when I'm translating. Less bulky than the similar stand I made in 1960 or thereabouts for my original Kazantzakis translations. This one is secured by screws, not nails, using the splendid portable Black and Decker screwdriver and drill that we now have. Fun.

Am reading Stylianos's new book of poems Στή δοκιμή τοῦ φέγγους. Many are quite good. I've been very remiss in translating his work, despite promises. What's needed is a time in Australia just for that, with opportunity to consult him.

Chrysanthi finished her furiously difficult jigsaw puzzle, Seurat's "La Grande Jatte," after vowing repeatedly to abandon it. She's reading James's Ambassadors and finds it "very funny"!

Monday, August 10, 1992

Bill Thomas's son Matt, an electrician, came. I'll have him properly ground our system, tie in the waterpipes, and run a line through a trench to the barn, so we can have power tools eventually.

Ines auditioned for Miss Olga in Cleveland and was accepted on the spot. They accept only ten students worldwide. Alec had to delay her return flight one day; he's in Cambridge in his room, and luckily already has a telephone. We've been buzzing back and forth—Riparius—Cambridge—Cleveland—Jakarta—all for Ines. Leander, who arrived from Kinhaven, explained that she has a huge talent but was never taught discipline, how to practice, etc. That's what Gary Graffman said she needs before she should apply to Curtis.

Leander has a new booking, in a prestigious series in Minneapolis, to accompany the Bartok violin sonata in the 93–94 season. We listened to it with the score; it's "inaccessible" at first, and furiously difficult. He's doing the Elliott Carter cello sonata at St. Olaf's for a CD this October, also ferociously difficult but quite accessible because in traditional sonata form whereas the Bartok seems to have no form at all.

Leander is stewing because Deanna is so petrified at the move: giving up tenure at St. Paul Chamber Orchestra and worried that the National Symphony, which is running a $4 million deficit, will not keep her. But they meet on Wednesday to go to Maryland to find a house.

I'm feeling less and less energized by such problems. I want my peace, and projects like my four-way dictionary stand, the trench we must dig for the wire to the barn, and tree surgery on the ant-infested ash outside the cabin.

Did some research on lightning rods, which seem no longer to be recommended. Good. That saved us $1300.

Tuesday, August 11, 1992

Susie Buseck arrived with Yiayia. Susie is entering Berkeley to do a law degree combined with social work. Mother in fine shape.

Wednesday, August 12, 1992

They stayed an extra day. We went to the Narrows for pizza and then Alec and I played violin-piano duets for them. The lightning rod lady reduced the price to $1100 and came down still further to $1000 when I asked. But Alec is resisting; says I am paranoid about this.

Thursday, August 13, 1992

We started digging a 12-inch trench for the wire to the barn, working in a slight rain with pickaxe and shovel.

Marie McCarthy for dinner. Talked so constantly, I felt totally exhausted. I learned tht Bernard McCarthy died recently in Alaska. She spoke also about her run-away husband, Francis McCarthy, and about her dead son, Bruce, and about Sis's marital vicissitudes, and about grandson Bruce, who is flourishing as an industrial chemist.

Yesterday I cut a new, clean slice in the bark of the ash tree, exposing the sap wood beneath, and coated both with orange shellac, per directions for tree surgery. Must now make the filler from asphalt and hardwood sawdust.

Rebecca wrote from Pendle Hill that my pamphlet is drawing many nice comments. I received fan letters from Carol Weingeist's father, Dr. Perera, very nice, and from Andy Towl, who says he's been lending his copy to various people until they can get their own. Lovely! I hope someday to write another one about "light," using Dante, etc.

Friday, August 14, 1992

Washing this morning, I saw "our" deer grazing by pond-side, its body reflected in the water. And Marie told us last night that at the clearing on Route 8, over the bank next to the stream, are piles of deer pelts, severed deer legs and other evidence of human bravado. And Roy Milington killed seven deer last season, including does, but at least he eats the meat. And others jack deer out of season. Hunters!

Saturday, August 15, 1992

We had lightning rods installed on the pole barn and on Alec's cabin at a price of $950, which the installer said was a remarkable price. Alec is proud of his bargaining skills.

Finished digging the trench for the electric wire to the barn.

Wrote a long letter to Stylianos, in Greek, and chose some poems to translate.

Sunday, August 16, 1992

Leander and Deanna arrived from Maryland, where they succeeded in renting a house in Silver Spring. Found Deanna charming: jovial, warm, efficient. She'll be touring Alaska with the National Symphony in October, and Ignat is going to be the piano soloist. We all went to Fran and Irv's for Greek slides with Laura and Michael. I gave Michael a copy of Ulysses to read on the mountain this winter. We split our sides laughing at Irv's jokes, especially this one: A priest and two acolytes come to the counter to buy air tickets to Pittsburgh. The employee was a beautiful young woman with a low-cut dress. The first acolyte, turning all red, said "I want two pickets to Titsburgh." Retreating in confusion, he asked the second acolyte to replace him. The second said, "I want my change in nipples and dimes." He, too, retreated in confusion, whereupon the priest stepped forward and admonished the woman: "When you apply to get into heaven, St. Finger will shake his Peter at you!"

Monday, August 17, 1992

Alec and Leander discovered a beaver meadow, lodge, dam, etc. on our new land.

Met Roy Millington in the Grand Union, not recognizing him at first. He says we have a cave in our ledges.

Tuesday, August 18, 1992

Visit from David Harris, Dartmouth 1967, a member of Hanover Meeting. Wants his daughter to enter Dartmouth. He, his wife, and daughter were obnoxious at lunch, wolfing down huge amounts of food. They left, finally, after 2½ hours.

Chris and Art for dessert. I gave Chris The Scarlet Letter for Arthur to read.

Wednesday, August 19, 1992

From Kazantzakis's letter to Eleni, 22-11-1926 (or 1923?): Είμαστε καλοί άνθρωποι, πιστοί στρατιώτες του Θεού μας, γιατί γενναία πολεμούμε κ' οι δυο να σώσουμε την ψυχή μας από τη μικρολογία, από την αρρώστια, από την ψευτιά και τη νάρκη.

In the afternoon, Alec, Leander, and I started along the north border of the new property. Previously, we'd marked the border as far as the power line. We now crossed this through a morass of blackberry brambles and proceeded accurately to Vly Brook, crossed this at a narrow point thanks to a bridge built by beavers, and continued up the mountain opposite, looking for the border of the State land, which is our eastern border as well. No sign. Kept going up and up; reached the top; started down the other side, and luckily ran out of surveyor's tape. Retraced our steps, looking again for the State border, which Alec found by accident (very faint yellow paint) way way down near the beginning. So Leander ran back all the way and removed the tapes we'd placed on State land (!). We marked our border carefully and were pleased that the compass readings show it at an exact 90° angle with the State line—i.e., accurate. Returning across the brook, with time out to eat some blackberries, we got back home at 8:00 p.m. Chrysanthi of course was furious and hysterical, but she calmed down and we had a nice supper. Exhausted, to bed.

Thursday, August 20, 1992

A NiMo crew is surveying for Mr. Morris's power line, to go up the east side of Waddell Road, partially on our land. No one asked permission, of course. Alec is concerned. Art Perryman says it's our land and no one has a right to set foot on it. Property, our social right. I'm not so sure. We are ephemeral trespassers at worst, stewards at best.

Jay Parini's new novel arrived. He's phenomenal.

I pruned most of the leaves off our tomatoes. This summer has been so cold and rainy, we have not a single ripe tomato whereas last summer we had one on August 1st. Began to close up, putting away the hoses, etc. Finished tree surgery on the ash. Let's hope. Saw a similar dual-trunked ash in the woods yesterday in which one half had fallen over.

Friday, August 21, 1992

Finalized September Board meeting with Jean, and also Kinhaven Planning Committee agenda, with Lauren. Art came to walk the woods and give an opinion, yes or no. JMGS page proofs arrived, and I have five blank pages and Layoun hasn't sent me a single book review.

Picnic supper with Gary and Wendy McGinn and their children Marcus and Katey, on Schoon Lake followed by a spin in their sumptuous motorboat on this gorgeous lake. They're born-again Christians with good values and are raising alert, well-behaved children. A loving, cohesive family. We talked about our own feelings toward Terpni, how it is "home" at least for me and Alec, more than anywhere else because of the continuity it represents, the sweat we've put into it, and the awareness we have here of life's cycles.

Art came earlier and walked the woods with Alec. He advises us to proceed. Alec agrees with me on Jim Farrar as the consulting forester.

Saturday, August 22, 1992

Telephoned Stathis Gauntlett in England. He'll try to send me a review.

Jim Farrar telephoned. He'll start marking trees on August 31.

Alec and Leander are completing the path to the beaver meadow on the new property.

Matt Thomas arrived, finally, and is putting electric in the barn.

I finished reading page proofs for JMGS 10 (2).

Pruned our tomatoes way back yesterday, hoping that some of the fruit will ripen before frost.

Sunday, August 23, 1992

Up early. Met Irv, Fran, Michael, and Laura at Indian Lake, with canoe strapped to top of the car—Irv's of course: he organized all this. Drove just south of Tupper Lake, then on 421 to Horseshoe Lake and then to the canoe-access point for the Bog River. Much bog and little river! Twists and turns (I luckily was in the small, manoeuvrable one-man canoe that Laura owns, made here in Olmstedville). Beaver dam in the middle; we had to get out and pull the boats over. Fran fell in the water, cheerfully. Gradually the river opened up a bit, but then we had a headwind and adverse current. But the day was beautiful: dry, cool, sunny. Reached Hutchin's Pond and, at its head, the upper dam built by the man who used to own all this and who generated his own electricity. Starved. Beautiful picnic lunch sitting in the chasm. Other interesting canoeists, including three couples, the men all paunch, beer drinkers and macho types, the women smokers. They'd been in only one night, and proudly showed the sack of probably 200 cans of soda and beer they'd consumed. More river, then Lows Lake and a nice picnic spot for a snack. The boys swam. We saw a loon in the distance, and a faun grazing on the way back. Adirondack wilderness, mostly bog, including a "floating" bog on the lake. Very tired. At the end, back in the serpentine Bog River, not enough water in places to paddle. So we walked in the muck, pushing the canoes (with Chrysanthi queen-like in the middle seat). Leander bitten by a leech. Huge meal afterwards in Long Lake. We'd met at Indian Lake at 8:30 a.m. and we passed that spot on the return at 8:30 p.m.—12 hours. Then thankfully to bed.

Monday, August 24, 1992

Leander and Alec finished their path in the new property, to our own beaver meadow. They saw a blue heron, too.

Leander is practicing hard: the Elliott Carter sonata. It's annoying, of course, but what can he do? Probably I should get an electronic piano, with earphones.

Wednesday, August 26, 1992

Clayton Faraday arrived and will stay until Saturday He's 80 years old, just moved into Crosslands. He's "Mr. Friends Central," there as a student 70 years ago, then as a biology teacher, principal, acting headmaster and now as archivist. He's Alec's guest, a very easygoing, enjoyable guest. Much good conversation about education . . . and life.

Seeded the filled in trench in which we laid the electric cable for the barn.

Saturday, August 29, 1992

Repaired the upstairs shutters. It's such a good feeling to make things shipshape. In back of one of one of the other shutters a sleeping bat that squirmed very humanlike when I moved the shutter and then went back to sleep, its wing over its eyes.

Dinner at Marie McCarthy's with David Moro and his wife Jackie Sullivan Moro, Marie's granddaughter. David runs a special station in NYC for Russian emigrés. He was fascinated by my account of Ignat, etc. Jackie is a piano teacher and a blue-eyed Irish beauty I told her all about Bernard and Charles McCarthy, about whom she knew nothing. I'd like to take her to Kinhaven next summer. Thankfully Marie kept quiet and let all the rest of us do the talking.

Faraday left and Alec's friend Paul Hollings, a Haverford classmate, arrived. He's the administrator of a nursing home in Cambridge. Says he's related, distantly, to Virginia Woolf and Ethyl Smyth.

Sunday, August 30, 1992

Our first red tomato! A full month behind last year.

Alec still bothered by mice in his roof, trying all means of eradication but without success.

Quite an adventure this afternoon: Alec, Paul Hollings, and I left at 1:45 to try to mark the eastern border of Alec's land. We took a tape because we know that it's 2850 feet long. Starting at the corner we'd previously discovered, we followed the State land border—that was the easy part—and found its corner at 968 feet. From then onward I had to sight for Alec at 20° off north. This plus the measuring became increasingly difficult because we found ourselves on bare, precipitous ledges. But we managed. Then thunder began, but luckily far away, and rain, but luckily light and brief. At several points we had splendid views of the entire valley with Gore Mountain and other peaks in the distance, and our large beaver meadow, a veritable lake, below. As the land leveled we had new difficulties: slash from Deckert's lumbering, and blackberry brambles. But, miracle of miracles, at just about 2850 feet, only about 15 feet off, we hit the corner tree (well marked already) precisely. By now it was 5:30 and we didn't want Chrysanthi to fret again, so we stopped work (the south border remains to be marked from this corner to Vly Brook), and headed home at 30° off north. Now we had to traverse a swamp, climb up another hill, and carefully descend an avalanche of boulders, again with lovely views. We crossed Vly Book easily just below the beaver meadow and found ourselves at the end of the trail that Alec and Leander had made. Home at 6:30 p.m., exhausted and wet. Shower. Dinner. Then Art, Chris, and Arthur came, Art to look at the lumber Alec had bought for his flooring, #2 pine with a bevel for paneling. Art encouraged him to use it. Conversation until 10:30, BBC news, a bit of the Sunday Times (a rarity for us, brought by Paul Hollings), bed.

Monday, August 31, 1992

Jim Farrar came and we signed the contract and went into the woods together to watch him begin to mark trees. It's an art as well as a science. He worried about the corner we never found, the one in the beaver meadow, the SW corner. So Alec and I followed the line (20° off north), finding fence here and there in the swamp, and eventually locating the corner itself. This means that all corners are now marked, and that the only remaining sections unmarked are (1) a short length of the south line from where we stopped, westward to this newly discovered corner, (2) eastward on the south line from Vly Book to the SE corner that we found last Saturday.

I repaired two of the shutters, replacing rotted wood. Must accelerate the closing process now, alas.

Saturday, September 5, 1992

Finished all the Kazantzakis letters I'd brought this summer, seven years' worth, 1925–1931. What a huge job.

Painted the porch yesterday. Spent this afternoon closing. Last night nice supper with Mary and Maureen at the new Italian restaurant in North Creek. Maureen asked me "What do you publish in order not to perish?" I explained, at length. Everyone was there. Michael Gouthreau and wife, Jerry and Rosine and children, and us.

Daphne got a job in London with the British branch of Simon and Schuster. In the New York office she'll have a two-year leave of absence, continuing to receive their benefits, etc. She's thrilled. She hopes to receive $30,000 a year. Fred Hills must have been a significant factor in this.

Sunday, September 6, 1992

Helped Alec do his finish floor: pine boards, wide, V-grooved. He has a machine to do the nailing in the tongues, a big advance over my "primitive" methods. Alec is a perfectionist, to a fault. Slow work but the result is satisfying. Shapiros for dinner and goodbye.

Monday, September 7, 1992

Final packing, etc. Showed Alec how to drain the water system. He belligerently boasted he could do it himself, without me, but I suspect he realized this was hardly true, the first time. He (and Leander, too) is very touchy about being treated as a baby, etc. Chrysanthi lectures me regularly, saying how intimidating I am. . . . Easy to leave, relatively, because the day is so bad.

Tuesday, September 8, 1992

Hanover

What a change! So many people, cars, commotion. It's like entering the eye of a storm. We voted in the primaries. I shopped in Rich's. Then to the office. Darrel very friendly. Stathis's FAX was waiting, but with page 2 missing. Will I be able to locate him in Greece? Supper with Yiayia and Audrey, very jolly, then drinks in Audrey's apartment. I tried to tell Irv's three-part joke about ordering tickets for Tittsburgh but could remember only parts 1 and 3. Audrey says that Brenda Jordan left in duress, alas. The dining room is still noisy despite the acoustic panels we had installed.

Wednesday, September 9, 1992

I found Stathis. He sent page 2 and I typed out the whole review, sending it at the last minute to Carol. Amazing, owing to FAX and e-mail, of course.

Thursday, September 10, 1992

NYC

By car to Springfield and train to NYC. I'm re-reading Dubliners with immense pleasure and admiration. "A Little Cloud" is stunning. To City Opera: Barber of Seville. Count Almaviva (Paul Kelly) wasn't very good, alas, but Dr. Bartolo (Jan Opalach) was a splendid commedian and Rosina (Kathryn Gamberoni) was a fine soprano voice. City Opera lacks the glamor of the Met—half the seats were unoccupied, for instance—yet it was a good show. Marvelous score, written in an incredible three weeks by Rossini.

Friday, September 11, 1992

Slept in Daphne's apartment, 308 E. 79th Street. They will be giving it up in a few weeks, but Vaughan Tebbe is moving in. Marvelous visit to the new Ellis Island Museum of Immigration. The names Bien and Honigsberg are both listed in the 200,000 on the wall, although they're not specifically our family. The bravery of those coming to America, the expectations, the anguish of leaving parents behind, usually for ever, are all poignantly conveyed. So is the ordeal of passing inspection at Ellis Island. If you had glaucoma you were sent back, for instance. A woman was asked, as part of the intelligence test, "If you were to wash a flight of stairs, would you start at the top or at the the bottom?" She replied, "I didn't come to America to wash stairs!" The museum stresses the crucial contributions of immigrants to building the railroads, for example, and also the question of Americanism, but probably does not stress the anti-immigration movements although some reference was made to this, including a photo of the Ku Klux Klan. The movie at the start was particularly moving. And yet neither Chrysanthi nor I felt much emotional identification with all this, Chrysanthi because her case is so different; she did not come as an immigrant seeking her fortune, and I because (probably) my father had distanced himself so much from his origins and wished to obliterate them.

We felt doubly like tourists as we went next to admire the World Trade Center and World Financial Center, the lovely plaza between the buildings and the even lovelier atrium and restaurants and shops. Supper on the terrace of the Yale Club on a beautiful evening. Then to theater to see Guys and Dolls: fine dancing, singing, mise en scène, and a book that is clever enough. But the chief attribute is incessant energy.

Saturday, September 12, 1992

To the Greek café to meet Dan Wilkes for breakfast. But he never showed up. Then to Lauren Zalaquick's on E. 9th Street and 3rd Avenue for Kinhaven Planning Committee. She's taken over the chair from me—a relief. Jerry, Nancy, David, Lauren, Barbara. We planned insulation, building repairs, and, with luck, our first off-season program: a chamber music weekend next June.

Supper in Café Un Deux Trois on West 40th, lovely food but so noisy and crowded, people almost in one's lap. Then to Neil Simon's Lost in Yonkers, a delight because of the superb acting. Laughs, tears, social significance, psychological realism. Two child actors, superb.

Sunday, September 13, 1992

Breakfast with Dan Wilkes by re-arrangement. This time it worked. He's in a bed-sitter, all alone, with very restricted means. Sad. Two boys, however, are graduates of Cambridge, one with a first in history. Still married but of course separated although friendly with his estranged wife in England. Heard about Freddy Mann and Gene Girden.

Then to Magritte exhibit at the Met. Fascinating. There's method—much—in his madness. Chiefly: the idea that reality is just as much an artificial construct as is art. So, why not confuse and/or equate the two, which he does repeatedly by means of the most brilliantly conceived visual metaphors. He may be the quintessential postmodern painter.

To the Yale Club via 42nd. I'm re-reading Dubliners with great pleasure. Saw Jeff Hart in the distance in the second floor lounge, and avoided him by retreating to the library.

Returned to 308 E. 79th at 6:30 to find Greg and Daphne already returned from Lake Tahoe. Nice supper together. They leave for London in about two weeks and are very excited. We hope to visit, perhaps, in March 1993.

Monday, September 14, 1992

New York–Hanover

Stopped at Deerfield on the way back. Met the headmaster by chance: Mr. Kaufman. Saw the new dorm that Rosenwald built. Everything so lovely, still.

Stylianos sent me a sermon he gave in English, about the fear of God. This is very good: “. . . the fear of God is not the worry concerning possible negative actions to be taken by Him against us—this was the feeling of the very primitive man towards the blind and impersonal natural forces—but rather our spiritual anxiety not to become unworthy of His providence and protection. In other words, it is not any eventual punishment by God that is the object of our fear, but rather His undeserved love; and precisely because this love is undeserved, we are worried about losing it.” —From “The Fear of God As Integrating Factor of Education and Spiritual Progress,” given at Perth in 1992.

September 17, 1992

Αρχιζει. Twenty-five placement exams to evaluate for exemption in English 5 and English 2. Frosh picnic; none of my advisees showed up. Saw Dave Lemal with a huge beard started on an Adirondack canoe trip with Ray Hall, an act of compassion on Dave’s part for Hall in his depression following divorce.

Friday, September 18, 1992

I went to Comp. Lit., Classics, and War/Peace open houses, not to English. In Classics we are trying to interest students in the trip to Thessaloniki in Spring 1994. Two students asked about it.

Felitsa brought a Greek woman computer scientist and husband. There are also a few more in Thayer.

Saturday, September 19, 1992

Another service for Elizabeth Ballard. This time at the Meeting House. Bill came and was very friendly and talkative; said that, trained as a scientist to value the rational faculty above everything, he had to learn the value of the heart from Elizabeth. He was choking with tears as he recalled the solidarity of their family around her deathbed. I spoke about her as an oral poet transmuting the details of material existence into spiritual value, prompted somewhat by an appreciation sent me by Kristin Lord, who couldn’t be present.

Sunday, September 20, 1992

Chrysanthi went directly from New York to visit Leander and Deanna in Silver Spring. Today I picked her up at 5:00 a.m. at the AMTRAK station. Ned Perrin and wife were on the same train. She’s been very ill but is now OK. We went to Dunkin’ Donuts together. They’re building a camp on a new piece of land purchased half-way between their individual farms.

Went to Ministry and Counsel; my first meeting. I worry about Jean Brophy’s continuous absence from Meeting.

September 21, 1992

Started working with Jennifer Lynn Patterson, my honors student. She’s doing narrative technique in Joyce.

September 23, 1992

Daphne and Greg fly to England today. She telephoned, very excited and optimistic.

September 24, 1992

I talked again with Myra Johnson about my retirement. The three-year Dartmouth Flexible Retirement seems to make sense, although in the short run I do better simply retiring at 65 and collecting pension and social security. I'll speak next with a TIAA adviser.

September 25, 1992

Outreach Committee at Kendal. John Radebaugh has a really good idea: to use the Farmhouse for a pro bono "Good Neighbor Health Clinic" staffed by volunteer physicians, for people without insurance. Many impediments, but we hope to pursue the idea.

Saturday, September 26, 1992

Lecture on the Panathenaic exhibit at the Hood Museum, followed by dinner at the Inn. I met the Hood's director and told him how much I miss Jackie, so much that somehow I have an aversion now to the museum—irrational, of course. Also met the folks who actually handle the objects d'art; they spoke about their fear of breakage. What if they dropped a Greek vase?!

Sunday, September 27, 1992

Went to the Panathenaic exhibit with Chrysanthi and Mother. Minimal, but some nice pieces. Few pots invite actual inspection; many invite the opposite. To Andy Rangell's at night. He wanted to play for some friends—Stravinsky, Haydn, Schubert. He did the first two but felt best not to continue. His hands function now, obviously, but still give him trouble. But he's playing a recital in Washington in October. We were so pleased to see him functioning (more or less) again.

Tuesday, September 29, 1992

Ceremony in the Wren Room to inaugurate the Thomas Vance book fund. Georganna did a lovely bookplate. Saccio and Heffernan spoke, reading tributes from students. Vera expressed her appreciation. Walter Arndt was present, walking on two canes but still in good spirits. Then to supper at Vera's with Nick Jacobson and wife, and Maurice Rapf without his wife, who has cancer. An odd crowd, and odder food, almost inedible, although we did our best. Rapf vain and garrulous. His father was a “Mogul” in MGM and he has never gotten over it.

October 1, 1992

Chrysanthi says I’m a martyr because I spent 75 minutes with Kristin Lord over lunch. Then to Tim Wright to talk about my retirement plans. The trickiest part will be insuring the continuation of the University Seminars.

Really good music tonight with Dick and Allan. Played up to speed: Beethoven and Haydn.

October 2, 1992

Nice Italian supper at Power House to celebrate Mayme’s birthday (73rd ?). Treat and Molly Arnold, Audrey, Barbara and Roger Soderberg, us. One nicely feels something special and different with Quaker friends because we all share so much—the life of the Meeting.

October 3, 1992

Department cocktail party. Met Cynthia Huntington’s husband, who is interested in the Adirondacks. Cordial talk with Mary Kelley about McLaughlin, Sandy McCulloch, etc. She says they’re no longer on speaking terms. Then to Kendal. Beveridge Webster (or Bev Web as he calls himself) telephoned earlier to say he’d play Ravel’s Gaspard de la nuit if I came. I assured him I would. He did the Moonlight Sonata and also Beethoven’s Sonata in D major, indifferently. But the Ravel was spectacular. Unplayable, I should have thought, but he did it effortlessly and with all the French finesse that it needs. He “mentioned,” of course, that Ravel and he had worked together on the piece. Afterwards he, Franny, and Barbara Rice had coffee and cookies in Mother’s apartment. Franny tells me that he hasn’t a sup taken since entering Kendal. She hopes that we’ll put him on regular contract. I’ll speak to Naomi.

October 4, 1992

Kinhaven

My last Kinhaven board meeting. It’s been a long time. But John Austin wants me to stay on the Planning Committee as a co-opted member. Leander wants me to cease and desist because my presence compromises him. Bill Polk and I arranged for a lunch at Kendal with a prospective resident. Beautiful fall colors on the way over. The board has some strong members now: Lauren, David, John, Barbara, and some new ones. Even Jerry seems more organized and responsible.

Supper at Kendal with Felitsa and Don and the Greek couple, followed by a tour. Felitsa's energy is such a pleasure. But the "queen" is her daughter Poppy, my little favorite.

Monday, October 5, 1992

Outreach Committee again over breakfast at Kendal, this time with Barb Parsons. Lafayette is the convener; I'm the recorder. Barb will help us in strategies for building up the Reserve Fund. We all visited the Farmhouse afterwards: spacious but in very bad repair. John Radebaugh again stimulated our enthusiasm for a Good Neighbor Health Center there. But where will we put guests?

To Fleet Bank Trust Department in the afternoon, with Mother. Cindy Neily has been replaced as our consultant but Jeffrey Harris continues. He wanted to sell more Kimberly-Clark and I refused, for sentimental reasons. We'll buy $100,000 of tax-exempt municipals. The combined trust and custody accounts are 1.2 million.

Tuesday, October 6, 1992

I conducted Graham Wallis's class again: Poetry and Technology. Added Ginsberg's "Sunflower Sutra" and Robinson Jeffers, etc., thanks to suggestions from Tom Sleigh.

October 7, 1992

A Mr. Balli from Jakarta International School came to the office. We had met in Jakarta. He's on his way to see Alec; wants Alec to head the Arts Division of a new school he's establishing in Jakarta for Indonesian youth. This is the 2nd "feeler" Alec has had, and he has only been at Harvard for three weeks. The other was from a Quaker day-school in Detroit's inner city. 100 pupils, 50% black. Alec not interested, apparently.

October 8, 1992

Long lunch with Barb Parsons. Fun to gossip about all the Pendle Hill and Kendal people we both know.

Then to Jay Heinrichs, Alumni Magazine editor, to encourage him to do an article on aging or retirement. He said he remembered my earlier appeal and has been keeping two files: one on alumni in retirement, the other on emeriti professors. He wants to do two articles in the same issue. Also wants to do something on translation, in which I'd be interviewed.

October 9, 1992

Rushing to get handouts ready for my JMGS report to MGSA Executive Committee in Princeton tomorrow. Finances look good: only $650 deficit instead of $1950.

But when I went to board the Montrealer I was told that it was cancelled. Engine failure just south of the Canadian border. So I turned around and went to bed in Hanover, after faxing the handouts to Dimitri Gondicas in Princeton. I had arranged to see Mike Keeley and Tom Wilson. Too bad.

Saturday, October 10, 1992

Telephoned Mike. Long talk. He's as eager to retire as I am. Last summer in Greece he received a death threat from November 17, which confused him with his brother, the former ambassador. He finishes this year as president of PEN. Also spoke to Joan Wilson and discovered to my great pleasure that she and Tom plan to enter Kendal at Hanover in 2000.

Supper at Kendal. Bev played again—Mozart and Schubert four-hands with Franny. Terrible, because she's so totally unmusical. But then he, alone, did the monumental 5th Brahms piano sonata, sensitively and effortlessly.

Sunday, October 11, 1992

Alec came home and we had lots of long, cordial talks. He's enthusiastic about three of his four courses—not bad. He'll intern at the Belmont School, an old-fashioned grammar school, boys only, coats and ties, prayer, etc. We tried to feed him amply, at home and at Sheridan brunch.

Presidential debate: Bush, Clinton, and Peron. Clinton OK, not great, Peron sometimes brilliant in a folksy way. Bush tired and predictable.

Monday, October 12, 1992

The squash coach attended my Joyce class; he's an aficionado. Afterwards he told me how blessed I am to be concerned with art, morality, beauty, etc., via Joyce. It's important to be reminded. Am I a fool to want to retire?

To Kendal to be interviewed by Crosbie Deaton from a consulting firm retained by John Diffey. Turned out to be Haverford '51. He quizzed me on my vision and hopes and fears for Kendal at Hanover plus the Kendal Corporation over the next five years. At our December 5th retreat we'll apparently have a report of the findings.

Wednesday, October 14, 1992

Long visit with Paul Gerber regarding my enlarged prostate. Actually, the latent PSA (Prostate Specific Antigen) level in the blood is down, not up. He counseled "watchful waiting." If I decide to do something, the next step will be a sonar exam and if this shows "irregularities," a biopsy. The whole diagnostic procedure is extremely imperfect, he admits. But statistics are on my side. However, he fears that the Benign Prostate Hyperplasia (BPH) will cause me real trouble in five years or so, perhaps necessitating surgery to ease urination. "Your prostate," he says, "is aging much faster than you are."

I bought two croissants for tomorrow's breakfast and went home looking forward to music. We did Handel, Bach, Beethoven: very ambitious but not very expert. Long chatter afterwards about poor Chuck Braun's mysterious illness, politics, etc. Then a scramble later at night to get my Ritsos lecture ready for tomorrow.

Thursday, October 15, 1992

To Cambridge by bus to start Meg's lecture series with my "Ritsos's Painterly Technique in Short and Long Poems," which she remembered from Birmingham (in 1985) and asked to have repeated. Nice audience including George Pilitsis, and the woman who did the Dana project with me two summers ago, and Sarah Kafatos, and others whom I'd met at various conferences. Dinner afterwards at Dalí, a Spanish restaurant on Kirkland Street: Meg, Vangelis, Eleni, teaching in Comp. Lit. at Harvard, and Alec, who couldn't come to the lecture but joined us afterwards. He walked me to the "T" in Harvard Square. To South Station and AM-TRAK's "Night Owl." Cambridge is so heady; the place in front of Au Bon Pain in Harvard Square is filled with amazing people.

Friday, October 16, 1992

Slept poorly. Up at 5:00 a.m., tired. Used the new Metropolitan 1st class lounge at 30th Street Station—at least a clean place to sit and wash up. Arrived at Pendle Hill at 9:30 a.m. and didn't stop for a moment until 5:30 p.m. Meeting with Rebecca, Book Committee (we decided to reprint Kenneth Boulding's Nayler sonnets, quickly, since Kenneth is doing very poorly, health-wise). I'm supporting the Doug Gwyn submission; others will read it and will decide in December. We're also thinking of reprinting Elizabeth Gray Vining's The World in Tune, a collection of quotations each followed by a meditation. I'm assigned a reading, along with Bill Tabor. Then Publications Committee: accepted an essay that turned out to be by Bill Tabor. Then viola-piano with Oliver on Dan's electric keyboard. Then twenty minutes' rest—everything helps—in my room in the Steere Wing of Brinton House. Then celebration for the publication of Jessamyn West's Quaker Reader. The Publication Committee's "living theater" for the entire board. We gathered in a circle in the barn and went through our usual procedure for the Gelassenheit essay, ending up by rejecting it. I was one of the few unqualified supporters. (Dan whispered that he hoped the clerk would practice Gelassenheit! Touché!) All my revision work for nothing. But some people came up individually and said they supported acceptance. Ended the evening by playing four-hands with Dan. He divulged that they're nominating me to go back on the board next year and hinted that he wants me to replace Oliver as clerk of the Executive Committee. That will be difficult from a distance (if I'm asked) but Andy Toll did it and so did Charlie Brown. Θα δούμε, όπως λέει ο Καζαντζάκης. In Publications Committee, Rebecca forgot at home the vettings by absentees.

Saturday, October 17, 1992

Philadelphia

Morning session of the board was devoted again to publications, well organized by Rebecca. Results of surveys, etc. People want "Spiritual Journey"!! I started reading Vining while others broke into small groups to discuss specific issues. Good report so far from Morehouse; they're selling books. 200 advance orders on Quaker Reader.

SEPTA ride with Ken Carroll, as active as ever in numerous Quaker affairs. Then to the Art Museum to see the exhibit of da Vinci's anatomical drawings, on loan from Windsor Castle. He was obsessed with discovering just how the body was put together, and did so, in part, by dissecting humans and animals. The draftsmanship is superb, of course; the drawings are surrounded by copious notes and comments. A glimpse into one side of this multitalented genius. The museum also has, to my surprise, the Brancusi "Bird in Space," and three versions of Duchamp's "Nude Descending a Staircase," and some nice Picassos, Matisses, etc.

Sunday, October 18, 1992

Hanover

Ministry and Counsel considered how the Meeting should act, or react, concerning couples undergoing separation or divorce, and not only married couples but unmarried (i.e., gay) ones. We'll bring it now to Business Meeting.

In Meeting I ministered on Douglas Steere snoring in the Pendle Hill Meeting yesterday. How a Douglas Steere has triply earned the right to snore in Meeting in his 92nd year, and how we should view people not just in their spatial dimensions but always with the fourth dimension—time—added.

Supper with Sheila Harvey and Mother at Kendal. Kate Harvey has had another breakdown, it seems, gave up her courses at the University of Connecticut, gave up her job, and is living in her trailer in Mystic, Connecticut, without resources and without the willingness to go into therapy again. Bev and Franny joined us. He played the first book of Debussy preludes last Saturday and they did together the Schubert Fantasia, which Dan and I slaughtered at Pendle Hill on Friday night. Next week Haydn, Mozart, and César Franck with a visiting violinist. The process to make him a full contractual resident seems to be moving forward. Jean called him in to speak about the financial obligations. He told me he's 84½ years old.

October 19, 1992

Daniyal Mueennudeen visited. Back from Pakistan. Wants to go to law school now.

October 22, 1992

Tom Campion and John Lincoln took me to lunch. They want me to be a consultant to ILEAD and a liaison with the Dartmouth faculty. I accepted. Music with Christian F., a student in Comp. Lit. 37. Not a very good violinist, alas; can't count.

October 24, 1992

Bev Webster played with a violinist: Bach, Beethoven Op. 30 # 3, and the Franck sonata, which is nice to hear performed. Violinist so-so.

October 26, 1992

Boston

Drove to the Convention Center with Lafayette and John Radebaugh. AAHA convention. Morning session useful on boards: how to get rid of dead wood. I was told that boards typically serve as grievance committees in disputes, contrary (of course) to Jean's position. Afternoon session tedious. Super at Grendel's in Cambridge with Alec, Kesaya, David Noda, Lafayette, and John. Nice to see Lafayette enjoying his two children. Alec left early to go to play in the Cambridge Community Orchestra.

October 27, 1992

Lunch at Kendal with Bill Polk and a ninety-year-old prospective resident from Londonderry. She liked Kendal better than other places she has seen, but wants her bed made every day, not just every week.

October 28, 1992

Kendal Outreach. We're stuck and see no way to reach out into the community. Drink with David Godine. He's still in business, remarkably. Does well with children's books, especially.

October 31, 1992

Dress-up Halloween party. I wore a tux (my father's) and a paste-on mustache. Charades. Laughter.

November 4, 1992

Clinton won. Hooray!

November 7, 1992

Party for Trix Officer's 65th birthday. Chuck drunk—sort of. Nice conversation with Vic McGee.

November 8, 1992

I had bet Ned that Bush would win. Delighted to have lost that one. The bet was a meal at Panda House, where I treated him, Anne Lindbergh, and Amy Perrin.

November 12, 1992

Gerald Suntenallo of Sherston Lehman visited. He's Bob Metz's stockbroker (says that Bob calls him every day) and Carol Weingeist's, highly recommended.

November 13, 1992

Two and a half hours with Jean at Kendal. Agenda, etc. Strategy for fund raising. She said I treat her harshly. I do criticize her.

November 19, 1992

Nice to visit with Tom Corindia over lunch. I do wish we could get him back on the Kendal board, but the conflict of interest remains.

“Blues for Mr. Charlie” by James Baldwin, done by the Dartmouth Players. The black actors very committed, not just acting. Remarkably directed. Not a very successful play, really; too long. But a devastating critique of white intolerance.

November 20, 1992

With Jack Shepherd to visit Dean Pelton to try to renew his offer of support for the mediation effort.

November 23, 1992

John Diffey at Kendal. Asked me if I still had problems with Jean (in her presence). I complained about her handling of the Webster case recently, taking it out of the Admissions Committee. I wrote him a long letter afterwards. Jean cannot take criticism. She becomes defensive even before anything is said about her. Also, she rewrites history. She said the word “harsh” the other day was mine, not hers. Totally untrue. I’ve written all this to Diffey. Also Jean never admits she’s made a mistake. Never. Even Bush wasn’t so bad.

November 24, 1992

“Cooper” (Jason Cole) read his short stories. He’s the student who was so antagonistic and abusive toward me two years ago, but I vowed to respond with love and understanding, and it worked. Now he’s civilized and grateful. Supper with him afterwards with Cleopatra and Pat McKee and Ernie Hebert. Cooper loved it, smiling “under his mustache” the whole time.

November 25, 1992

Leander, Alec, and Deanna are here. We went to see the movie “Malcolm X.” I recounted my memories of seeing Malcolm in 1965 a month before he was killed. Superb movie, all 3¼ hours of it. It never lags (compare The Last Temptation).

Thursday, November 26, 1992

Pleasant Thanksgiving dinner with Alec, Leander, Deanna, and Yiayia. Audrey came for dessert. Afterwards we showed slides of Alec, Leander, and Daphne as babies. Everyone overwhelmed at how beautiful Chrysanthi was in the 1950s.

Friday, November 27, 1992

John and Mary and Helene visited. Lively. Laughter. Then Alec showed a video of Jakarta and the Balinese cremation ritual. Deanna burst into tears when the fire was lighted under the corpse. "My mother was cremated just like that in Taiwan!"

Sunday, November 29, 1992

Saw Michael and Leone Webster at Kendal. Told Michael of Jean's disposition of the Webster case. She agrees to put him on contract if he remains sober throughout his second year in residence. I'm not going to fight it, for fear that my opposition may make her withdraw this guarantee.

December 2, 1992

Last day of classes. Enough! I have a full set of English 2 papers coming tonight and a set of Comparative Literature 37 next week! Harder and harder.

Drink with Pano. He's demoralized regarding English 2. Karen is still suffering from the loss of the baby and is going for therapy. I fear for their marriage.

Thursday, December 3, 1992

To D.C

AMTRAK to Washington. Leander and Deanna met us in Union Station. Nice supper there: oysters and crabmeat. Then to Kennedy Center, which is grand. Concert in honor of the 75th anniversary of Finland's independence. Finnish national anthem plus Star Spangled Banner. Sallinen's "Shadows," Tchaikovsky violin concerto played by Vladimir Spivakov. Great tone and technique. But I don't like it as much as the Beethoven, Mendelssohn, or Brahms. Then Sibelius's 5th. Rostropovich conducting. Deanna took us backstage. Musicians find Rostropovich a very poor conductor and are delighted that he's leaving. So contrary to the hype in the program.

Drove to their house in Silver Spring. Very cosy. Glad to see paintings on the walls. Leander's "studio" full of electronic equipment. Read in the Washington Post that Angelou, whose autobiography we listened to in the car on the way to Springfield this morning, has been asked by Clinton to read a poem at the inauguration.

Friday, December 4, 1992

D.C.–Philadelphia

Drove to Rosalyn. Met Jim Warren in the Foreign Service institute. I lectured on “Greek Politics as Seen Through Poetry.” About ten diplomats ready to go to Greece on assignment. Lively questions. I even played Vamvakaris’s Ἡμouvα μάγκας μια φορά, τώρα θα γίνω το σοφό Σωκράτη. Lunch with Jim and two others. Then to Pendle Hill just in time for the book committee. We said yes to Doug Gwyn’s even though it’s not finished. Also yes to Vining reprint and a reprint of Quaker 18th century women’s journals. Four-hand piano afterward with Dan: Schubert and Debussy. Dan is down on Peter Crysdale now, wants to shift him out of Extension. I was asked to rejoin the board next year.

Saturday, December 5, 1992

Bryn Mawr–NYC

To the conference center in Bryn Mawr for a full day retreat of the Kendal Corporation: Kendal at Hanover, Kendal at Oberlin, etc. Run by Crosbie Deaton, a consultant. Some nice techniques. The object is to do “strategic planning” for the next five years. Lots of ideas for our own Kendal retreat in July. John Diffey took me aside privately and said that my complaints against Jean are echoed by others. I’m not alone, it seems. . . . To the Yale Club. Met Chrysanthi, who had come from D.C.

Sunday, December 6, 1992

NYC–Amherst

To the Matisse exhibit at MoMA. Met Andonis Decavalles and Popi. Andonis looking very old suddenly. The Matisse retrospective is immense, about forty galleries. I liked many of his early pictures, e.g. the lovely portrait of his daughter Marguerite (1906) done in more or less traditional style. He was a marvelous draftsman in traditional modes before he became more interested in color than form. Actually, his quintessential form was his last: the paper cut-outs, because now for the first time he didn’t sketch, then fill in with color, but rather cut out colored paper—i.e., the color came first. Other pictures I particularly liked were the Blue Nude 1907, the Young Sailor II, 1906, the Nude Black and Gold 1908, of course Dance I and II (1909–10), probably the coup for the museum, because next to Dance I, which is in the MoMA collection and was merely a study for the final version done for the Russian patron’s house, they now have the latter, lent by the Hermitage. It’s more orgiastic. Generally, Matisse's portraits are stunning, and very unique. Others: Interior with violin case, Nice 1918, the White Plumes (a portrait), 1919, the book illustrations for Mallarmé and for Paliphaë (linoleum cuts), and the famous Tree of Life design for the stained glass window of the chapel at Vence, done with paper cut-outs.

The exhibit was exhausting but a great opportunity, as are all these retrospectives. Throngs of people in the first galleries but they thinned out afterwards.

We then took Andonis and Popi to brunch at the Yale Club. Sad memories of Elizabeth Constantindes. Popi's sister, the pianist, is now blossoming, doing CDs, etc. after years of stagnation. Andonis is editing Rae Dalven's translations of women poets (Rae, too, died recently, but she was in her late eighties).

To Amherst, overnight at Rhoda's. She's a compulsive talker in a very loud voice, but warm and good natured. She's 67 years old, looks 45. Wept at thoughts of Bron and accounts of how important his scientific papers are for other parasitologists.

Monday, December 7, 1992

Amherst

Examined students doing Modern Greek language at U-Mass, this time with Chrysanthi present. Finished grading my English 2 papers. It gets harder and harder. But English 3 awaits me next term!

Tuesday, December 8, 1992

Hanover

Breakfast with Jack and Kathy Shepherd. They visited John Baker last Saturday. Baker says that he wants to make a "substantial" gift to War/Peace Studies at Dartmouth. We're planning strategies, chiefly how to keep Dartmouth fundraisers from swallowing up "our" money.

This afternoon I became one of the panelists on the Council for Academic Freedom and Responsibility, convened for the first time (it was set up in the early 1970s). We are meant to adjudicate a dispute between Andy Wallace, the Medical School dean, and Dennis Thron, who is accused of refusing to teach. Dennis says he was highhandedly told he had to use different teaching methods, in violation of his academic freedom. I hope that this won't be too prolonged, or painful.

Dimitri Yiannakos's and Tilda's twin baby, age 2, was operated on today for a sarcoma of the kidney. In London. Daphne saw the child over the weekend. The child outwardly is robust, full of humor and energy. It's so sad, because she is mortally ill. The surgeon was not very encouraging; indeed at first he had refused to operate. If he finds the cancer spread beyond the kidney he'll sew her up again. If by a miracle it's confined to the kidney, he'll remove the kidney. Tomorrow we should know.

They called here to inquire if there was any sense in traveling to the USA. Alan Rozycki helped me by querying the local pediatric surgeon, who said they were probably in the world's best place, London, where they are.

Wednesday, December 9, 1992

The baby's tumor wasn't in the kidney after all, but in the back. The surgeon removed 80% of it; couldn't get the rest. Bad news, obviously. But perhaps chemotherapy and/or radiation will help.

Friday, December 11, 1992

Finished reading Comp. Lit. 37 papers and grading them. Another term done! I'm counting the remaining ones like a prisoner counting days left in his sentence. One more this year, two next year, and two the year after: five!

Went with Chrysanthi to the Nodas' farm and cut a Christmas tree and set it up in the living room. It's beautiful. Presents are already gathering underneath.

Saturday, December 12, 1992

All day: recommendations. Everyone wants to go to law school. Yale accepts 175 out of 5000 applicants.

Supper at Jesse's. Surprise birthday party for Chrysanthi engineered by me in collaboration with Trix, who invited us as a ruse. When we got there, we found a huge table with the Nodas, the Soderbergs, the Arnolds, Audrey, and Sydney! Chrysanthi's first reaction was "How dare they go out without inviting me?" But of course there were two empty chairs, for us. For dessert a huge birthday cake brought by singing waitresses. Very jolly.

Sunday, December 13, 1992

I spoke in Meeting about the sadness at losing Deni Elliott, who has taken a job in Montana. Afterwards, Kristin Lord: has a scheme for teaching the Greek alphabet, which I had to tell her wasn't very compelling.

Lunch with Mother. She says not to celebrate her 88th birthday next month, but when she reaches 90 we have permission to celebrate. She looks and acts 70 at most. She's trying to help Leander. Will give $10,000 now and $20,000 after January 1st.

Monday, December 14, 1992

Finished the recommendations. Started in a concentrated way on the next issue of JMGS. Lots of work. Long talk with Mary Layoun about her future as book review editor. Her husband has been ill and depressed, and she was told she had cancer (she doesn't). That's what paralyzed her. She wants to split the job with someone else doing social science, but Meg and Michael prefer a single editor. Will have to work this out. I've written à propos to Addie and John.

Jack Shepherd and I have sent the letter off to John Baker, hoping he'll give War/Peace a "substantial gift." But Jack is looking for a job elsewhere. If he leaves, the whole burden to rescue the program will fall on me, just when I'm trying to free myself from this and other attachments.

Supper with Σπύρος και Τούλα και Πόπη (της Φιλίτσας). Lovely to talk Greek for three hours. Κέφι!

December 15, 1992

I got an Apple laptop Powerbook 145 paid for by Dartmouth College! Will use it at the farm, take it to England, etc. But the first place will be at MLA on December 30.

December 18, 1992

Otmar Foelsch is helping me master Annotext in order to display it properly at the MLA. It's quite amazing, especialloy when Ritsos's voice begins to accompany the Moonlight Sonata text.

To Cambridge with detour in Manchester to Staples to buy a chair for Alec. Nice lunch at a Main Street restaurant, the kind frequented by old ladies. Owned by Greeks, of course.

Check-in at the Hotel Commander and encountered Helmut Schumann in the elevator . . . with a woman! Very embarrassing.

To "Black Swan" at the A.R.T, adapted from a Bulgakov novel. Not much as a play, but vigoroujsly acted. A bitter satire on the pretentions of Stanislavsky of the Moscow Art Theater.

To Alec's room afterward. Quite civilized. Met some of the house-mates, one from China, another from Poland. All are Harvard grad students.

Saturday, December 19, 1992

Breakfast at the Commander with Helmut. He assured us that he was not the lover of the lady in question. They are merely doing business. He is attempting to purchase a clinic that's doing holistic medicine, and she is the business manager. He is using his money to try to convince doctors to use alternative strategies.

To Logan Airport to pick up Daphne and Greg, who arrived from London looking rested. Lots of good conversation on the way back to Hanover.

Sunday, December 20, 1992

Dinner at the Campions' with Daphne, Greg, and Leonard Kent and his wife. He was in my Milton course. Then to St. Thomas's to hear Willem Lange's Christmas Carol, very well done, and very moving. Alec arrived later. The house is filling up.

Tuesday, December 22, 1992

Another session of the Thron inquiry. Bernie Gert drives me to distraction; he talks so much, so loudly, so stridently. How can we function as a body with him usurping time like that?

Alice called about tents and toilets for Lori's wedding at the farm. Chrysanthi doesn't want to help, but I sent information from the Yellow Pages. Lunch with Walter Stephens, planning Humanities 1 already. Leander arrived.

Wednesday, December 23, 1992

All the Sheldons: our entire family and theirs—Katy, John, and the two younger ones. So nice to mix adults and children like this. Karen hadn't seen Daphne and Greg since their wedding. Lucia Tebbe arrived from Santa Monica. The party is now complete.

Thursday, December 24, 1992

Christmas Eve dinner at Kendal. Celebrated Chrysanthi's birthday with presents and a cake. Lori and Clive here, too.

Friday, December 25, 1992

I made breakfast for everyone: home fries, fried ham, shirred eggs. Then presents, four hours of it. So many, because of course so many people. Everyone pleased. Alec gave me a Word 4 Manual. Leander gave me The Best of Benny Hill and a video with Victor Borge. Daphne brought English marmalade, Cadbury chocolates, paté, digestive biscuits. I got her CDs of Beethoven quartets and piano sonatas, and gave Life in the Tomb to Greg and The Last Temptation to Lucia. Feast at 5:00 p.m. Muncks and Schumanns afterward.

Saturday, December 26, 1992

Supper at Sweet Tomatos, then Jack Nicholson movies about the marines.

Sunday, December 27, 1992

Alec and Leander came to Meeting. Daphne refused. Nice to see David and Kesaya Noda, Cynthia Wigginton, and others. Lunch at Kendal. Then Lori and Clive left. I gave Lucia a tour. She is just like one of the family. She left.

Monday, December 28, 1992

Greg left. The party disperses.

Tuesday, December 29, 1992

Leander and Alec left, Leander for Seattle for Deanna's sister's wedding on New Year's Eve. 500 Chinese! Daphne goes tomorrow to NYC.

Wednesday, December 30, 1992

NYC

MLA. Breakfast meeting with other representatives of Allied Organizations with Phyllis Franklin re: timing of MLAs, not enough room for everyone. Then to the Yale Club. Reading Μάτσης, «Η μητέρα του σκύλου» for David Godine. MLA/MGSA session 1:45 to 5:30. Met Leo Papademetre, here from Adelaide. Martin McKinsey, too. Karen Van Dyck, Dorothy Gregory, a poet named Samaras, Vangelis Calotychos, Helen Koliass, Kacandes, Hadzi Chronoglou. Computer demonstration went well, much aided by Otmar, who explained the technical parts. John Rassias attended, too. Nice supper with Leo and Martin. Leo wants me to come to Adelaide again. Fine! After I retire.

Thursday, December 31, 1992

Hanover

I had Chrysanthi fib to Genevieve saying I was still in New York so I could skip her party. For the first time, neither Rassiases nor Biens had any children with them on New Year's Eve. Mary came and had supper with us. John is still in New York. No snails.

1993

---

Hanover	January 1–June 14
January 2, Cambridge for A.R.T. “Heartbreak House”
January 15, Pendle Hill
February 5–6, Cambridge/Boston. Mrs. Bragg’s, 205 Mt. Auburn, (617) 547-1804
February 11–13, Washington: CIA
February 20, Cambridge, A.R.T.
February 27, NYC: MGSA
March 5, Pendle Hill
March 8, Boston–London, chez Daphne & Greg, 4 Sprimont Place, SW3
March 11–12, Oxford
March 15, Birmingham
March 28, London–Boston
April 17–19, Bethlehem
April 23–25, PH, NYC
May 7, Amherst
May 8–9, Riparius
May 12, Philadelphia
May 17–20, Princeton
May 21, Pendle Hill
May 22–23, Cambridge
May 26, Riparius
May 30, Cambridge
June 10, Cambridge
Terpni	June 14–September 7
June 15, Philadelphia
June 22–24, Hanover (Kendal)
July 7–8, Hanover (Kendal)
July 15 & 22, Sarotoga
July 23–25, Hanover, Squam Lake (Kendal Board Retreat)
Aug. 6–7, Hanover, Tunbridge
August 20, Kendal at Longwood

Hanover

September 7–December 31

Sept. 18, NYC for MGSA

Oct. 21–23, Pendle Hill

Oct. 28–Nov. 1, Berkeley, Calif., Berkeley Marina Marriott

Nov. 6, Kendal at Longwood

Nov. 23–27, Potomac, MD (Leander's)

Dec. 3–12, Pendle Hill, Princeton, Washington

Friday, January 1, 1993

Supper with the Nodas and Audrey, to keep up the tradition, so to speak.

Saturday, January 2, 1993

Cambridge

A.R.T. Shaw's Heartbreak House. Not a superb production, but adequate. Jeremy Geidt fine as Captain Shotover. Supporting cast weak. But how nice to see these plays! When I taught my WWI course I wasn't even aware of Heartbreak House as relevant. Alec and Yiayia were with us. Alec said he's changing his mind about applying for an administrative position. What next?

Leander arrived home shortly before we did. Sick with flu. But enthusiastic about Deanna's sister's wedding. Deanna's mother's side of the family he found extremely cultivated and sophisticated. They came from all over the US and from Taiwan. It looks like the Deanna-Leander wedding will be next. Leander has to ask her father first . . . in the old-fashioned way.

Reading Stephen Hawking's A Brief History of Time.

January 6, 1993

Dee Johnson died after lying three weeks in a coma. Just like Noye. That lovely family is cursed. The two girls are orphaned now.

January 9, 1993

Memorial for John Kemeny. Michael Dorris spoke movingly about Kemeny's support for Native Americans. Kemeny's son was very confessional about his revolt against the father and gradual reconciliation. Ruth Adams read from Kemeny's draft autobiography: how he wanted to change the world somehow, and felt he did. All very moving and appropriate. Great contrast with the service for John Dickey, which was so sterile.

January 11, 1993

Service at St. Denis's for Dee. The priest spoke well, as did Trix. Ann and Debbie are bearing up bravely. We'll miss her.

January 12, 1993

Kendal Overseers meeting. We set the fee increase at 4.5% and salary increases at 3%. Heard an electrical consultant explain the technology of a plan to install sensors to regulate electricity and heat and to save us money. Budget is tight because our bonds pay 8% but we collect only 3% to 4% from invested funds. Plus health care rooms are empty. We hope to balance the budget barely, rather than to achieve the $400,000 surplus projected in the feasibility study.

Supper with John Diffey, Jean, and Chrysanthi, planning the July retreat. I think that Jean and I are feeling better about each other now. Diffey said he's continuing to try to mentor her and noted the friction between her and other administrators at Longwood. But she is a good manager. This budget was well done. Accreditation has been postponed a year, however. Too great a burden on the staff.

Last Monday I sent off the disk for JMGS volume 11, no. 1. A great relief. But the lead article, on Macedonia, will create a storm of protest, I fear.

January 13, 1993

Yiayia, urged by us, is "divesting" a bit: $10,000 to each of the children plus $10,000 to each of us, which we plan to pass on to Leander. Alec is pursuing an opening in Friends Select in Philadelphia. Let's hope. Bill Clinton is sending his daughter to Sidwell Friends School in DC. What a tribute to Quaker education!

January 17, 1993

Yiayia's birthday: 88! We went to supper at Jesse's. Then to Bev and Franny Websters' for cake and coffee, with some other Kendalites, including Audrey. Beveridge asked me to play a duet with him. I tried to squeeze out of this, but he kept asking. We did a Mozart sonata, and actually I did reasonably well, keeping the time throughout and playing most of the notes. Franny commended me on the triplets afterwards.

January 18, 1993

Greatly enjoying the pre-inaugural “theater.” Clinton seems wonderfully human, compassionate, gregarious. The symbolism is compelling. I can’t believe this is happening. Such a renewal! To have a young man and a liberal in office, and a true populist. Amazing!

January 20, 1993

Inauguration day. The speech was OK only. But he had a poet read first! And he got out of the limo and walked down Pennsylvania Avenue part way. And at the ball in the evening he played the saxophone.

January 21, 1993

Clinton received 2000 people in the White House. Such an outpouring of affection and respect for him.

Jack Shepherd and I appeared yet again before the Fourth Council to try to win approval for College Course 1. Again opposition and nitpicking. Dick Birnie’s liberalism. But also some support. They voted after we left. Jack and I had a drink afterwards and unwound a bit. I’m getting sick of all this. And of teaching in general, although I enjoyed lecturing on The Last Temptation yesterday and then immediately afterwards on Philoctetes.

January 26, 1993

Tea with Lee Huntington in her house in Norwich. She’s very shy, very artistic. She felt terrible, she said, because she failed to contribute to Kendal’s Reserve Fund, and I had said how important 100% participation is. We’re trying to keep her on the Overseers.

January 29, 1993

Meghan Dunleavy is my new editorial assistant for JMGS. Very eager. She keeps touching me, innocently, I think.

Open house for the Modern Greek Foreign Language program. We showed a tourist video. Motley group of students showed up, precisely the ones we don’t want. Chrysanthi and I are hoping the program will fail.

January 30, 1993

Service for Maureen Pierce at St. Anthony’s in White River Junction. She died at age 50 of scleroderma, miserably. Such a nice woman. Full church. Her daughter spoke beautifully and then sang “Abiding Grace” is a mellow contralto. So moving! The church was full of Dartmouth administrators and professors who, like me, had grown to love her constant good humor. Jim Wright spoke well, and for all of us. My thoughts were this: that when Maureen telephoned, it was always to announce another chore. Yet, coming from her, this never seemed an imposition. There was always banter and a sense of common purpose. In a way she reminded me of Ernest Noxon. Dick Sheldon rode back with me, and I remarked that in thirty odd years in Hanover this was the first time I ever participated in the life of our neighbors in White River Junction or other surrounding areas.

February 2, 1993

Took Peter Gilbert, Jim Freedman's associate, to lunch at Kendal followed by a tour. After supper, went with Dave and Shirley Montgomery to the Coalition for Homeless Volunteers to pick up the overflow for Headrest, take them to a church, and sleep there with them, then return them to Headrest for breakfast. One of the volunteers was Finney Hamm, aged 88, who used to feed Dr. Hamm, blind like my father, at Hanover Terrace at the same table where Mother fed Pappou. Extensive report and statistics about wife-bashing locally. Terrible. The human being must be biologically violent.

February 4, 1993

Jean has started a task force at Kendal to develop a five-year plan. Nice to be integrated with residents: Walter Frank of the New York Stock Exchange, a retired professor from Harvard Business School, a retired economics professor, a retired school principal.

February 5, 1993

Cambridge

Overnight at Mrs. Briggs's on Mount Auburn Street—bed and breakfast. Met Alec for supper. He's been offered a job at North Jakarta International School and is very interested. He got mostly A's at Harvard last semester.

February 6, 1993

Cambridge

Morning with Meg, Michael, and Eva Constantellou sorting out MGSA material, particularly Mary Layoun's failure to produce as the book review editor. Eva says she'll take over. Now I have to convince the executive committee to accept a single reviewer instead of one for humanities and one for social science, which is what they want.

Afternoon: to the Northeast Section of the National Association of Railroad Passengers. Fascinating. A different world. Mostly men. Different body types: hefty and burly. How articulate they are! The project manager for NY-Boston electrification was superb. Carl Fowler, the MC, ditto. The worst was a Harvard professor (!) who advocated buses in low density areas and got heckled mercilessly. The engineer of the Boston connection between North and South Stations was also excellent, and fascinating. The Montrealer is selling more seats but I was told that AM-TRAK management basically doesn't like it. Everyone is apprehensive about Clinton's economic recommendations to be released on February 17. Will there be provision for rail?

Met Alec and Chrysanthi at South Station and ate again, with a woman friend of Alec's, a former teacher at Jakarta International School (JIS).

February 9, 1993

War and Peace Steering Committee breakfast to try to decide what to do about the Fourth Council's rejection of College Course 1. I narrated the sad events, not hiding my feelings about Dick Birnie. We suspect political and/or financial motivations. The whole process has been Kafkaesque. I offered my resignation, as did Jack, but we were given a vote of confidence and asked to continue. Various strategies were discussed. Jack and I will meet again next week.

Wednesday, February 10, 1993

To Washington

Music with Dick and Allan. Then to White River Junction. Chrysanthi and I both in a single compartment, but it worked fine. Very cozy.

Thursday, February 11, 1993

Washington

Lunch at Union Station with Dennis Carroll, now married and a father. He has written another huge novel that he threatens to send me. Still working at the General Accounting Office. His father, Admiral Eugene Carroll, will retire in a year or two from the Center for Defense Information, which needs new blood, especially a new director to replace La Rocque.

Afterward to the Space Museum. Fascinating. Then to the National Gallery. The El Grecos are lovely: "Laocoön," "Madonna with Saints Martina and Agnes," "St. Jerome," "St. Martin and the Beggar" (twice).

I also loved Constable's "Salisbury Cathedral," of course, and Turner's amazing "Keelmen Heaving in Coals by Moonlight." Then to the Natural History Museum, where we looked especially for a display on beavers. Metro to Ballston in Virginia for overnight at a Holiday Inn.

Friday, February 12, 1993

CIA

Joan Schwartz of the American Council of Education met us at 7:30 for breakfast. Then to the CIA, next door. All morning we listened to tapes of oral exams and decided (a) if the grading was equitable, (b) if the exam itself was well done, (c) what the CIA levels mean in terms of Dartmouth's levels. Then lunch with the teacher, who uses our first book. All afternoon doing a similar job for the written exam, which was ferociously difficult. The CIA trains its agents for 44 weeks, 8 hours a day. At public expense, of course. Lots of security, especially regarding my laptop computer (which I used beautifully on AMTRAK coming down). To go to the toilet I had to be escorted. Finished at 4:45. Metro to Forest Glen, where Leander picked us up. Out in Bethesda at a seafood restaurant, long chance to discuss Leander's very real problems, professionally. Getting a doctorate in composition doesn't make sense, it seems. He hopes to take some part-time courses at Peabody in electronic media, which is really what interests him now. Says he's got to join the wave of the future. Hopes to attract private pupils, but only adults. Will continue at Moravian, alas. . . . Deanna is more optimistic about the National Symphony. They'll be touring Russia next September. Leander demonstrated all the miracles of "Finale" with enthusiasm. At the restaurant, by coincidence, we ran into Deanna's aunt, a very sophisticated Chinese lady, and her husband, a Scarsdale gynecologist.

Saturday, February 13, 1993

Silver Spring

Leisurely morning correcting English 3 papers with my Powerbook. Then to Phillips Gallery. Saw the Georgia O'Keeffe-Alfred Stieglitz exhibit. She was remarkable. Much of their work was done at Lake George. AMTRAK home to New Hampshire.

Monday, February 15, 1993

Breakfast with Jack Shepherd. He wants to move War/Peace into Environmental Studies, partly to protect himself. At the same time, he is applying for jobs elsewhere. I fear for War/Peace Studies.

In the afternoon, heard Isabel Allende lecture. Very "naughty," a sort of blue-stocking; aristocratic, of course. She captivated her audience. I had supper with her afterwards and with Jim and Sheba Freedman. Very kind of them to include me. She is thinking of Quaker schools for her "delinquent" child. At 9:00 p.m. watched Clinton preview his economic package very persuasively.

February 16, 1993

Nice lunch with Michael Webster, Beveridge's son. We talked about Leander. Michael's life has been somewhat similar. He gave up a secure job to marry a woman with an orchestral position, earning a salary while he earns nothing regularly. All depends, obviously on the attitude of the woman.

Thursday, February 18, 1993

War/Peace seminar with Joel Sax, a Quaker peace-activist who has been in Serbia and Bosnia. He gave a very different story from what we hear. Also interesting on Skopje and the Macedonian question. I told him about Karakasidou and our forthcoming article. He said that many Serbian soldiers are mortified by the atrocities they are forced to commit. Some have killed themselves in remorse.

Saturday, February 20, 1993

Lunch at Meg's with Ole Smith and some of Meg's students. Then to A.R.T. to see Ronald Ribman's Dream of the Red Spider, and interesting treatment of dictatorships. Not great, but worth seeing, I suppose.

Forgot to note Michael Webster's concert on the 16th, with Sally Pinkas and a soprano. A delicious evening, Pinkas is superb. So is Michael. They did Brahms' opus 120 no. 1 and a Schubert sonata, plus "Der Hirt auf dem Felsen" with Michael's clarinet obbligato. Lovely.

Sunday, February 21, 1993

Joel Sax for breakfast. Turns out that his wife is a Greek-American and studied from our books.

Conference call among MGSA publications committee concerning ratification of Eva K. as our new book review editor. We planned all this beautifully previously.

Friday, February 26, 1993

Leslie English visited with her daughter, Nadia. Leslie is bitter because her father's house, now Shapiro's, was never offered to her, even though she didn't have the resources to buy it. Peg Barnard bought it plus 200 acres for $2500! Sold it for $10,000.

Saturday, February 27, 1993

To NYC for MGSA executive to confirm Eva as book review editor. All went very well. No opposition. But they begged me not to start a "responses" column now, for fear concerning the Macedonian article. Gondicas invited me to Princeton for three weeks with full support and no duties! The Kimon Friar letters are there. Mary Keeley is desperately ill apparently. Too bad for Mike, just as he was beginning his retirement.

Alec is in town for a school convention. We met at the Yale Club, had a drink, then went together to visit John Magagna, then had a delicatessen supper. Basically Alec made no progress this weekend. And he lost the Williston job, coming in second. They want someone with experience. Magagna very cordial and reassuring about the new Jakarta school.

Wednesday, March 3, 1993

Got JMGS galleys in the mail. What a job! So many changes! I worked five days straight on them.

Friday, March 5, 1993

Philadelphia

To Pendle Hill for the Publications Committee. Dan Seeger wants me back on the Executive Committee next year. I assured him that I was enjoying my sabbatical. Drove back to Philadelphia with Steve Stalonas and Kenneth Sutton. Kenneth is gay, and "married." Having trouble because his partner lost his job.

Forgot to record, à propos of marriage: clearness committee last week for Susanna and Jim, who live in the Meeting House. Bob White, Tom Waring, Chrysanthi, and I. The problem is that Susanna doesn't want to be married in any way, legal or religious, and Jim does. We tried to be very "liberal" about all this.

Saturday, March 6, 1993

Dinner with Ned Perrin and Anne Lindbergh. She, poor thing, is still in danger owing to a brain tumor. Ned said it took him sixty years to find happiness. Their daughter Amy, who loves Anne, found a man in New Zealand, and they are delighted. Daughter Elizabeth came home for the first time in a decade and actually asked to embrace Ned, a rare event.

Those children were ruined by their mother, alas. Dartmouth Symphony afterwards. A new conductor, the orchestra transformed, and full of students now, many oriental of course.

Sunday, March 7, 1993

Ministry and Counsel. Rhea McKay put us through a fine exercise. My partner was Peter Stettenheim, in thinking how the Meeting could be enriched.

Lunch with Yiayia, just back from Arizona, plus Audrey. Harlan is in a bad way, having fallen and broken his hip.

Leander called. He visited Neil Ratliffe, who told him he has AIDS. Also that Washington has hundreds of unemployed pianists!

Spoke the other day with Charlie Hamlen in New York. It's a wonder that he doesn't have AIDS. He is now concentrating his management on musicians with AIDS.

Alec called. He accepted the Jakarta offer. He's very happy. He interviewed at Moorestown Friends but they, too, want someone with experience. So, he'll get his experience in Jakarta.

All packed and ready to go to England tomorrow.

Monday, March 8, 1993

In the morning, hurriedly prepared journal articles to send out to readers. Then a nice final class for English 2-3 in which I asked students to reflect on the experience of the course and the methods used. Their testimony was most encouraging. Then final Humanities 1 class, the plenum, for which I stayed only a half hour but hated to leave because the students' involvement with the material seemed so genuine and deep. In the plenums we ask each student, and teacher, to select one favorite passage, read it, and explain why it was chosen. I did Odyssey 16.203ff. where Odysseus and Telemachus recognize each other and their wailings are compared to the cries of ospreys when their young are stolen from the nest. Limo for Logan Airport at 2:30. Uneventful flight to Heathrow. We did the feast-fast-feast-fast-feast routine, cheating just a little.

Tuesday, March 9, 1993

London

Arrived at 7:00 a.m. Underground to Sloan Square, so attractive, and thence to Daphne's house at 4 Sprimont Place sw3. That, too, so attractive. Daphne welcomed us and hastened to work. We went to St. Stephen's Gate, Palace of Westminster, after a hurried look at the Abbey, to join the Woodbrooke on-the-road course on “Knowing Parliament.” David Gray and Margaret leading it. We learned about Kathy. Tour of Westminster Hall, where Charles I was tried and condemned, and where Winston Churchill et al. lay in state. Then a fine video explaining parliamentary procedures and traditions. Then we were able to get into the Commons. I peed in the members’ toilet, perhaps used by Churchill. First, lots of questions to the Secretary of Defense about nuclear armaments, etc. At 5:15 John Major entered amid cheers from the Tories. His 15-minute question time was pandemonium, with healthy roars, guffaws, and screamed charges and counter charges between Major and chiefly, John Smith, Labor’s leader. Very contentious. A circus. Theater. Then we visited John Body, the only Quaker in Commons, who explained that this is not where work gets done (obviously!). It gets done in committees, where members are civil to each other and often cooperative across party lines, precisely because they don’t have to create and sustain an image for the public. He said, furthermore, that “the right honourable gentleman” is not just hollow words. MPs attack each other’s opinions, but not each other’s integrity, or “honourability.” He was also interesting in his view that politicians must never “waffle” in public. They must take a definite stand, and support it until it is either discarded or adopted. Finally we heard Matthew Hamlyn, clerk of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. He read English at university and said that most clerks are arts grads, having done English or classics or history. Ditto for civil service and diplomatic corps. Apparently nineteenth-century tradition follows. It’s his job to make sure that everything works smoothly, that effective witnesses are invited, that members are briefed, etc.

All in all, a fascinating afternoon. We returned to Sloan Square, bought some bread, cheese, fruit tarts, and returned to find Daphne and Greg already home. Nice reunion over dinner. Greg likes his position here better than that in NYC, chiefly because London is now “where the action is,” owing to the uncertainties over the Maastricht Treaty. Daphne alas has no esteem for her boss and says that Simon & Schuster London is a shambles. It doesn’t do good books and those it does do it fails to promote adequately. What a shame!

Orlando is playing in the cinemas here. I should see it, considering that I taught the novel without having read it since the 1950s.

Wednesday, March 10, 1993

London

A full tour of the Palace of Westminster (Houses of Parliament). The enshrinement of history: rebuilt at the heyday of the empire under Queen Victoria. I was most stirred by paintings, plaques, etc. referring to the civil war and restoration, i.e., the Stuart period, pilgrim fathers embarking for the new world. Afterwards, we went to two standing committees, the first discussing an act attempting to preserve (illegible), the second the question of allowing sales and employment on Sundays. The rituals of debate are so important; the respect shown via “the honourable member,” the bowed head to the chairman, etc. And how well the members speak! Also, the convention is to address each other in the third person, not the second person. Another useful convention allows interruption: “Will the honourable member give way?” And they usually do. This would be wonderful at Dartmouth, to mitigate verbosity.

In the afternoon we met with a Quaker peer, Lord Taylor of Gryfe, formerly Tom Taylor, elevated to a life peerage by Harold Wilson to represent labor and Scottish views in the Lords. He was a C.O. in WWII. I asked him if this ever impeded his career. “Not at all,” he replied. Remember that Fenner Brockway, too, was in parliament, and he went to prison as a C.O. in WWI. He spoke about the role of the Lords, which is to scrutinize legislation, fix legal technicalities (all justices of the High Court are Lords). Also, Lords can immobilize a government in its final year, before mandatory elections, because it can tie up legislation for one year. We then went into the Lords, where there was a debate on agricultural products and merchandising. A few Lords asleep, but most attentive. Lord Taylor had told us that most of the active members are life peers, not hereditary peers. This system puts people of all sorts of careers—actors, authors, military people, etc.—into parliament, which is very nice. Lords also are freer than MPs because they don’t have to worry about reelection. In many ways, this system is superior to ours, with a democratically elected upper house.

Then to Friends House to hear a standing committee clerk, who was rather boring. Then bought posters at Friends Bookstore, for Kendal meeting and our own Meeting.

Leisurely dinner with Greg and Daphne. We each recounted our day’s activities. Greg told how trading in the morning was affected by fear that Yeltsin’s power could be eroded by the Russian parliament, then by news that the vote in Moscow had been in his favor. In the afternoon, trading was influenced by the rumor that the Japanese equivalent of Alan Greenspan was about to be fired. So the yen fell, then rose again as the rumor proved unfounded. Billions of dollars were traded, as usual. Daphne was involved with worry over libel actions against Simon & Schuster because of two books that Daphne is overseeing, one on "Fergie," the other on Mick Jagger. She has a low opinion of her colleagues, says that her days range from "mediocre to awful." Today was mediocre—i.e., not so bad. We laughed, because she's considered a woman of "steel," but also of tact. Late at night: read over my lecture for tomorrow. I hope that no one asks an embarrassing question since I'm very stale on this subject.

Thursday, March 11, 1993

Very nice presentation about the European Parliament, at the British headquarters of the European Commission. Talk by the EC press officer, then an excellent video. Afterwards I learned that there is a Quaker House at Strasbourg that serves a very fine purpose as neutral ground. How exciting to be part of this unification of Europe! I'm jealous of people like Stelios Orphanoudakis, who is involved in all this.

Walked to Westminster from St. James' Park, where the EC offices are. Attended a Select Committee on foreign affairs taking evidence from witnesses on the military role of the UN in Bosnia, etc. Then a Select Committee on privatization of the railways, where a labour amendment to protect the RR was defeated by 15 to 14. The highlight for me was seeing and hearing labour MP GLENDA JACKSON (!) speaking in her beautiful voice for the RR. That was thrilling. We ended by being led through ornate corridors into the Speaker's private residence, part of the palace, for a reception hosted by Betty Boothroyd, the speaker. She's unusual in being a woman, of course, but also in being from the opposition party. Obviously Tory MPs voted for her, not just Labourites. I asked her about the poor blokes who pop up expectedly trying to get recognized and never do. She said that if they slip her a piece of paper she'll try her best to recognize them. But she knows in advance who is likely to have something to say on a specific issue.

In leaving, I told David Gray that I wish I knew as much about my own Congress as I now do about Parliament.

Lunch. Circle line to Paddington. Mad rush to buy tickets. Made the 2:20 to Oxford with 30 seconds to spare. Nice reunion with Peter Mack-ridge in Wellington Square. I lectured on “Reemergence of the Greek Novel in the 19th and 20th Centuries” to a fairly large audience (for such things). A nice surprise was that Paschalis Kitromelides, on sabbatical here, was present, as was Zeta Farinou, whom we remembered from Thessaloniki. After the reception, Peter, Zeta, Jackie Mackridge and I went to St. Cross College for a sumptuous meal, begun and ended with a Latin grace. Very formal, with seating arrangements, etc., preceded by sherry at which I met the master, an American graduate of Williams College who, by accident, got into Turkish studies as a post-grad at Oxford, went to Turkey, returned to Oxford, married an English woman, and never left. He said that being American never really interfered with his career here, and that people are generally very cosmopolitan and tolerant.

Friday, March 12, 1993

I'm writing this while sitting in the chapel of Magdalen listening to the organist practice. We walked into town with Peter, cashed my honorarium of £60, and proceeded to St. Antony's to meet Paschalis (and Jackie) for coffee. Paschalis wants to be active in all ways with JMGS, as a reviewer, etc. He's a “dissident” regarding Greece's Macedonian policy and told us that it's very difficult to speak out in the current climate.

We walked clear across town to Magdalen, to lunch with Oliver Taplin. We had a pleasant, although hurried, meal in College. Oliver will be coming to Cornell next year and I hope to invite him to Dartmouth. He's working on comedy.

All in all, a lovely visit in Oxford. We returned to recount all of it to Daphne and Greg and to hear about their doings and eat fried trout.

Saturday, March 13, 1993

A full day. Started marking papers and writing my report on the Quaker Parliamentary Tour (requested by David Gray for “The Friend”). In late morning we all left, walked to Cheney Row to see Carlyle's house, and also discovered Smollett's and Leigh Hunt's, and learned later that Turner lived here, too (and Seferis resided in Sloan Avenue around the corner from Sprimont). Then over a bridge to Battersee Park, all the way to the Tate Gallery, with a delicious stop in a pub for a lemonade. The Tate is not my favorite museum but of course the Turners are plentiful. Actually, it's more fun to see one Turner at a time; then it seems utterly eccentric in a marvelous way. Seeing sixty of them side by side negates this pleasure. My favorite is “Snowstorm, Hannibal Crossing the Alps” (1812). The other highlight in the Tate is the room filled with Blake drawings: the series of engravings on Job, exquisitely detailed; the watercolors illustrating Dante, my favorite being the spectacular “Newton,” a male nude, seated, bending over with a pair of compasses, drawing a circle on the ground. Also “The Body of Abel found by Adam and Eve.” Also “Winter,” illustrating Cowper’s verses from “The Task.” Enjoyed seeing the series of Matisse dancers recently in the MoMA show in New York. And Jacob Epstein’s monumental sculpture in alabaster, “Jacob Wrestling the Angel,” and the room full of Henry Moores, especially the “Family Group” (1949).

Taxi to Fortnum and Mason, symbol and reality of a posh department store. The clerks in cutaways. Bought paté and orange marmalade. As Antony Bryer wrote in The Times, a Birmingham accent in Fortnum and Mason is out of place! Then to Lillywhites’ sporting goods store in Piccadilly to buy trout flies for John Radebaugh. Then slowly to Chuen-Chenku’s Chinese Restaurant in Wardour Street, which I remembered from the 1970s and is still there. Then on foot via Covent Garden to the Aldwych to see Maggie Smith as Lady Bracknell in The Importance of Being Ernest. Not quite fast enough; it needs to rattle away like a machine gun. But quite effective, with marvelous sets. Lady Bracknell done as a horrible snob and social climber by Smith. Gwendolyn a viper who’ll end up just like her mother. Many of the jokes and jibes are dated, but not all, e.g., those about education—still, alas, too true. Home and gratefully to bed at 10:30 with aching feet.

Sunday, March 14, 1993

With Greg and Daphne to Kew Gardens. Not at its best outdoors, although narcissus, daffodils, and some rhododendrons were in bloom. Next month will be spectacular. Longwood Gardens are just as nice, actually. I remembered the gigantic palm house from our previous visit, probably in the 1950s. Nice lunch in Kew.

Monday, March 15, 1993

To Birmingham

Visited Dimitris Alexiou in Oakfield House, where a lovely woman, Julie, looks after him. He is as crazy as ever, and as brilliant, writing rhymed verse, knowing every bus route and number, playing piano, etc. We talked about buses, and Daphne, and Christos, and Pavlos. He swims, lifts weights, goes to Greece each year (and speaks Greek), goes around on buses each day for a few hours. He has a private room with a telly, and the House has a lovely garden out back. What a splendid solution! It was very moving to see him after so many years.

Then to Woodbrooke. A whooping hello from Linda Lyman, who is Friend in Residence. Nice reunion with Chris and Christina Lawson. Chris is head tutor. We talked about my possible return. Tony Brown is about to retire. Muriel Poulter is a captive of "depressive illness." David Gray would welcome me as his replacement in Spring 1994, but I'm already committed. Stuart Morton still there. Plans to build an entirely new library and shift dining to the present Common Room, etc., if money can be raised.

Then to the university. Good audience for my talk on Reemergence. Tziovas, Goutsis, Katerina Davis, some students I knew from before. Helpful questions and comments. Supper in a Chinese restaurant near New Street. B'ham much changed, with pedestrian corridors in the center. Used my Powerbook on the train both ways for annotating English 3 papers.

After the talk, to Staff House to see Bryer and Liz. He's in a cast for a broken leg, the result of reaching for a book on a high shelf! He'd welcome me back to Brum as Honorary Fellow. Reminiscid: we'd invented "Bumgas" together at the Staff House bar. Tried to find Paul Morby earlier at the TV unit and was told that he'd retired several years ago. Telephoned him. At first he didn't remember me, but then did and was very cordial. Dympna is working with homeless children in Romania. He's doing TV things for schools and developing his opera museum.

Tuesday, March 16, 1993

All day correcting English 3 papers. Then to Kings to lecture at 5:30. Roddy very cordial. Met David Ricks again. Large audience, including Rowena Loverance and her mother, and Daphne, and a girl from Dartmouth, and a man who'd roomed with Stelios Orphanoudakis at Athens College! I think I presented Reemergence better this time, shortening it. But comments, especially from Roddy, show that it's already dated. I'm glad this was the last "performance." Supper afterward with Rowena, etc. plus a stunning undergraduate girl.

Wednesday, March 17, 1993

Humanities 1 exams arrived by Federal Express. I graded them and faxed in the grades. Will finish with the other course tomorrow. Then to Routledge's in New Fetter Lane to pick up Gail Holst's new book for David Ricks to review. Walked to Haymarket. Dinner with Daphne and Greg. Then Harold Pinter's "No Man's Land" with Pinter himself playing the alcoholic has-been writer. Vintage Pinter: gorgeous language going nowhere. Non sequiturs. Cross purposes. People caught in isolation, autism, fragmentation. Wonderful use of silences. A kind of macabre poetry of dissolution.

Thursday, March 18, 1993

Finished English 3 papers and faxed in the grades. Τετέλεστα! To the British Museum. Lunch in staff cafeteria with Rowena Loverance, who is flourishing in her job. She showed us new acquisitions in the medieval room: beautiful icons, plus rooms being prepared for exhibition, with curators experimenting with different colors on the walls. So much planning goes into what we take for granted when we see the finished exhibit. Then on our own: Elgin Marbles, which now have very helpful placards. The great destruction came in Morosini's explosion, alas. Such extraordinary attention to detail in the frieze of the procession! Also saw the sculpted drum from the Temple of Artemis at Ephesus that I have a photo of on my bedroom wall. Museum full of schoolchildren, especially in the Egyptian rooms, all making drawings. Saw the Rosetta Stone. Then to the Penn Club to work on my lecture for Saturday. Then to National Gallery, a new Sainsbury wing; went directly to my favorite, the unfinished Michelangelo Madonna. The skin tones are extraordinary. All the texture of the natural skin is there. Other highlights: Van Eyck's marriage portrait, Leonardo's Virgin of the Rocks with the cartoon also, Rembrandt's Woman Bathing in Stream and Belshazzar's Feast, Velazquez's Toilet of Venus, which inspired Goya's Majas, which we saw in the Prado. Then a milkshake in McDonald's in the Strand. Then met Roddy at Charing Cross and went out to Elthorne (associated with Chaucer). Fran very warm. Two lovely young boys who hugged him deliciously. Full dinner with easy, nice conversation. He's a good friend. His history of the 19th and 20th century Greek literature will be published by Oxford next year.

Friday, March 19, 1993

Practiced reading Greek poems for tomorrow, and presenting the computer drills. Then started translating Kazantzakis letters from 1932, a long one in French to E. Levi and an even longer one in Greek to Prevelakis. Then at 4:00 with Chrysanthi via bus to Daphne's office. Hyde Park resplendent in daffodils and crocuses. S & S is in an Arab neighborhood, Bank of Kuwait on the corner, cafés, sweet shops, all newspapers in Arabic. We walked to Grosvenor Square and through Mayfair, past Claridges and Boodles to Soho. Dined in an Indian restaurant and then saw Peter Shaffer's new play Gift of the Gorgon, magnificently acted by Judi Dench and Michael Pennington. A moving show: mix of Shakespeare and Greek tragedy, layered, with huge set speeches, epiphanies with gods and running theme of retribution vs. pacifism, the story of a self-centered and self-consuming playwright who destroys his own career and then himself: Perseus unable to destroy the Gorgon. Shaffer has a formula for presenting intellectual elements passionately—a theater of ideas married to a theater of cruelty, majesty, and noble declamation. We've seen three shows so far: the Wilde, Pinter, and Shaffer, each entirely different, each excellent in its own way. But this is clearly the most compelling.

Saturday, March 20, 1993

To King's for the annual Greek day, sponsored by SCOMGIU. I addressed the opening plenary session using my Foreign Service talk on poetry and politics, but reciting the poems in Greek, which was great fun. Then I demonstrated our two computer programs, Greek drills and Annotext, using the Powerbook. Chrysanthi then did a Rassias method demonstration which, as always, was a great hit. I heard Philip Carabott speak on the Macedonian question in Greek and had no problem whatsoever understanding. Lunch with David Ricks (who knows Henry Gifford), Peter Mackridge, David Holton, and the Cambridge MG librarian on a boat moored in the Thames behind Somerset House. Steak and kidney pie plus a bitter (the latter kindly paid for by David Ricks). In the afternoon, Mark Mazower gave a fine presentation on archival material and George Varontsakis spoke in Greek on Aspects of Greek Nationalism. So I was able to listen to 2½ hours in Greek. What a pleasure! And also to take part in the discussion in Greek. Jane Cowan, who'd been on a panel with me in Providence, as she reminded me (I'd forgotten, of course), ended the day with a talk on Music and Politics, playing samples from Savvopoulos, rebetica, etc. Lots of fun. And I made good contacts for JMGS. All this ended with a sumptuous supper in the Great Hall.

Sunday, March 21, 1993

To Westminster Meeting. Fine ministry, mostly about women, and all integrated with the need to meet challenges and the fear involved in doing so. Ministry so much better than in Hanover Meeting, which is so self-indulgent. Westminster Friends are involved, feeding the homeless, in education, with Friends and the arts, etc. An active group. Glad to see that they take our Pendle Hill pamphlets, and the librarian said how much she appreciates Pendle Hill books.

French fries and a hamburger in McDonald's, then to the Royal Academy to see the Rouault show—the early years, 1903–1920. One tends to see only his later work. But the early work is extraordinarily moving, the product of a genius. His clowns depict the way humans hide their sadness in loneliness behind masks and costumes. His horrendous “filles” (= prostitutes) depict “the fallen Eve” in all its realistic pathos. But there are also wonderfully tender scenes, e.g., Maternité (vieux faubourg), 1912, and the two versions of Christ mocked. His self-portrait as a clown, an immensely sad clown, is heartbreaking. The ceramics he did have lovely colors, and his 1903 bathers are the equal of Cezanne's. What a treat to have all these images brought together from museums as far away as Tokyo, and from numerous private collections!

Returned to Sprimont, picked up Daphne and Greg and we all went to see the Sally Potter movie of Orlando at 5:00 p.m., a sumptuous pageant, extremely moving, clear in its feminist message, not so clear perhaps in its theme of continuity (the house) versus change. The scene with Swift, Pope, and Addison (who is never identified) was particularly delicious. Why hasn't someone done a film of Mrs Dalloway or To the Lighthouse?

Finished the evening with Benny Hill!

Monday, March 22, 1993

Finished Quakers and Railways by E. H. Milligan, purchased at Meeting last Sunday. I was unaware of Friends' important contribution to the growth of railways in Britain. A Friend invented the rail ticket, Bradshaw (of Bradshaw's Handbook) was a Friend. Friends were CEOs of Midland Railway for most of its nineteenth-century life; Friends were prominent in other railways, etc. Was the same true in America?

Tuesday, March 23, 1993

Terrible time in the morning trying to decipher one of Kazantzakis's letters to Anghelakis and to translate it. Three hours spent on one letter. In the afternoon went to Friends House to buy pamphlets for our Meeting and the Kendal Meeting. Started looking for books on Quakers' testimonies regarding employer-employee relationships. The librarian told me that Rowntree would be more helpful than Cadbury, and I discovered B. Seebom Rowntree's The Human Factor in Business: Further Experiments in Industrial Democracy, 3rd edition, 1938. In addition there is an excellent series of Proceedings from periodical meetings of Quaker industrialists at Woodbrooke to discuss precisely such matters. Spent two hours taking notes and will return tomorrow with my Powerbook.

In the evening, went to see Noël Coward's Hay Fever. I'd always thought Coward a second-rate author, and this confirmed my opinion. It's what the Greeks call a "farce," a well made play based on exaggeration. A little like the old plays of humours, I suppose. About pretentious artist-types who are all solipsists, and what happens when they inadvertently invite four guests to their country house. Lots of laughs, but it doesn't add up to much, really, and technically is a nullity. But the satire is, I suppose, somewhat memorable. I can see why he was so popular. He made the British feel good because they were giving approbation to something that criticized their faults. Yet the criticism is sufficiently shallow and "clever" that none of it ever really hurts.

Wednesday, March 24, 1993

Letters in the morning, then back to Friends House library, this time with my computer, to take notes on Seebom Rowntree's account of Quakerly business practices. What a beautiful account! Would that all businesses, or even half, could have had such principles and such direction! Of course many of the policies pioneered by these Quakers in the 1910s and 1920s are now commonplace, but not all. I hope to argue for some changes at Kendal à propos, particularly regarding procedures for disciplining or dismissing staff. Of course Jean will object because she's an autocrat at heart. But, as Kazantzakis keeps saying, "We'll see . . ."

Thursday, March 25, 1993

Letters in the morning, then to Daphne's office with Chrysanthi. Lunch in a pub. Cottage pie, which gave me diarrhea later. Daphne very nervous because she thinks she's about to lose the first book she thought she had bought. The author keeps demanding more and more, and S & S is unwilling to stretch the contract. We walked across Hyde Park to the Serpentine. How beautiful! Then to Harrods, a showplace, to see the famous food halls and buy a present for our hosts. I've never seen so many varieties of cheeses. But the whole phenomenon struck me as very decadent, considering all the poverty in the world, and indeed at Harrods' doorstep.

Later, Daphne home triumphant. Her author agreed to the terms proposed. And, on the same day, she purchased her second book. The first is about the royal family, the second is about teenage psychology. Greg explained how Goldman Sachs today sold billions in options to the central bank in Taipei. Taiwan agreed to buy fighter planes from France in six months, paying in francs. But their own resources are in dollars. Because they fear the dollar will weaken against the franc, they've bought options to protect themselves should the dollar's value go down.

Friday, March 26, 1993

Translating until 4:30. Then with Chrysanthi to the National Gallery's East Wing to see the modern painters we'd missed last time. A feast of Cézannes, Seurats, Van Goghs, Monets, Manets, some Picassos (the little girl with the dove, from the Blue Period, is sweet), and Degas's fine Spartan Youths. Met Daphne and Greg. Italian dinner. Then a splendid production of Cyrano de Bergerac, acted with Shakespearian quality by Robert Lindsay, with Stella Gonet as Roxana; directed by Elijah Moshinsky. Splendid fableau, mise en scène, scenery, but especially that wonderful voice production that comes with training in Britain. The A.R.T. seems amateur by comparison. Cyrano is a sort of Zorba mixed with Nietzsche and Don Quixote. The play has everything: humor, pathos, sentiment, wit, action, contemplation.

Saturday, March 27, 1993

Walked all around lovely Chelsea with Greg and Daphne. Each street is a new surprise. Tea nearby: scones heaped with "clotted" cream; lemon cake; Assam tea in a private pot. Then another long walk, ending in Dillon's Bookstore. Message from Leander upon return. He has proposed to Deanna and has given her her ring. Drove to Franconia to do it (they've been in Hanover a few days). Wedding in March 1994 probably. Let's hope it works!

Sunday, March 28, 1993

Home

Arrived Boston 2:00 p.m. London weather. Drizzle, fog, miserable. Pilot landed with zero visibility. Remarkable. Then five hours to reach Hanover on bus fully loaded with students. Dinner at Panda House. Sleep at the equivalent of 3:00 a.m.

April 6, 1993

Hanover

Chrysanthi had a barium enema to try to see what's wrong with her stomach, etc.

Buried in accumulated mail during the past ten days. Thank god I'm not teaching this term. Journal page proofs, arrangements for Constantinides Translation Prize, Kendal Overseers, more trouble re: the Websters and Jean; planning for Kendal retreat. Nothing done on Kazantzakis letters. I need to be in London for that, it seems.

I'm invited to be in residence in Princeton for a month. Will go for four days in May.

I'm invited to apply for headship of the Onassis Center at NYU. I said OK but I'm not seeking the job. I'd love to change it into a center for post-doctoral research and for subsidizing publications.

April 8, 1993

I had a sigmoidoscopy: examining the large colon for cancer. Results: all clear, everything normal. Very disagreeable procedure, involving the need to have repeated enemas in preparation. Last night I was in a cold sweat, hadn't felt that way since my gall bladder attack.

April 9, 1993

Tried to speed up Bev Webster's contract, but Jean is adamant. Almys went to see her and she said it wasn't because of alcoholism but something else that she could not divulge. And she reneged on her promise to me to regularize him next October. I spoke with Michael and with John Diffey. Hard to know what to do next.

April 11, 1993, Western Easter

Chrysanthi went to Aquinas House, desiring ritual and music. I went to Meeting, which was totally silent until Susan Stark rose and my heart sank. But she was mercifully brief. Nothing on Easter. I wanted to speak but hesitated. I've not ministered for months. Then a nice lunch at Kendal with Mother and Nodas, including Kesaya.

If I'm ever to write a novel, Kendal would be a perfect subject. A new Magic Mountain. The material is inexhaustible—e.g., Lesbian Jean and her temper, screaming at residents; the whole problem with Bev Web: alcoholism, wife-beating (?); Kellogg, the Alzheimer ex-diplomat, charming the nurses with incoherent French and wandering off to “Bermuda,” “Morocco” (he died the other day); Harlan Logan, the other Alzheimers, defecating on a chair in the dining room, falling, Audrey's anger over the refusal to use restraints; the whole saga of the Eberharts, and Richard Eaton the leech; various Overseers; the food petition; emergencies: flooding of apartments; Ruth Adams, who won't eat in the dining room because she requires a smoke and a whisky; John Gilbert wasting away with heart disease, then operated on, with minimal chance of recovery, and rejuvenated remarkably.

Saturday, April 17, 1993

Bethlehem, Pennsylvania

To Bethlehem via AMTRAK from Springfield to NYC and then bus. Listened to Pride and Prejudice in the car. Worked on JMGS using the laptop on the train. Chinese dinner with Leander and Deanna, now engaged, of course. Discussion of when to hold the wedding. Depends mostly on Alec, because he'll be in Indonesia. Leander is very discouraged about the concert for tomorrow. He hasn't practiced enough. Wanted to go to Ανάσταση service at midnight (it's Greek Easter) but Chrysanthi was too tired.

Sunday, April 18, 1993

Hotel Bethlehem

To Moravian service. Beautiful music (Dick and Monica Schanz of course). Readings from various gospels on questions of faith: how disciples believed or did not believe that Jesus “was still among them.” Doubting Thomas rebuked. Readings interspersed with gorgeous anthems. Sermon on the same subject: how failure (Peter, Thomas) can open up a window of opportunity to grow—for us, too. Long talk with Monica afterwards up in the organ loft, about Leander's predicament.

Alec arrived. To the recital at 3:00. Corelli, Mozart's E-flat major K. 481, J. E. Brown's Sonatina, Brahms's D minor op. 108; varied and moving. Of course Leander afterwards thought he played terribly, struggling just to get the notes right; didn't enjoy a moment of it. But the audience enjoyed. Old faces: Howard Mitchell ("Mitch") and wife; he's still at Bethlehem steel, which is still in business although losing money every year. Jean Storch, Leander's host. Robin Wright and daughter (who'll be flower girl at the wedding), Brenda, the obese piano student, a Chinese piano student; some familiar colleagues. A nice annual ritual.

Then to "Manny's"—the Greek garage operator—for lamb on a spit plus all the μεζεδάκια. His daughter is reading The Last Temptation. He told us his life story. Failed at school, sent out at age 15 to learn a trade in Athens. Came here. Prospered. Children all in college.

We adjourned to the hotel for coffee. Leander very discouraged about his future in Washington, which is overloaded with pianists. Orchestra contacts are no good because so many players, already, have pianist spouses who want help. He doesn't practice, then hates his playing and feels less like practicing. A vicious circle. Burn-out. Wants to stop performing. Hopes to take on private students to make money. I told him he'd be miserable doing this alone, without performance. Basically he's paralyzed. He's done nothing to further his career since we last saw him. The Moravian job, which he clings to, is exploitative and unsatisfying and immensely inconvenient because of the commute. So, it's hard to know what will happen next. I'm going to try to see Charlie Hamlen and to ask his advice.

Monday, April 19, 1993

Bethlehem–Hanover

Long, leisurely breakfast with Dick and Monica Schanz and Leander and Chrysanthi. Lots of laughter. Dick is going to retire from Moravian but will stay in the church. Leander drove us to Penn Station. AMTRAK to Springfield; car home, to piles of mail, of course.

Tuesday, April 20, 1993

Hanover

Cook/Bien poetry extravaganza in the War/Peace course. Spoke to the dean, Jim Wright, about the 4th Council and College Course 1. He helped me by describing a possible new scheme for multidisciplinary courses with a new committee for certification and oversight, just right for us (if they'll have us).

Ada Cohen lectured on rape in Ancient Greek art. I had trouble staying awake. Then to hear Tom Powers on his book on Heisenberg and the German atom bomb project. Fascinating. Tom feels that Heisenberg deliberately slowed the German efforts. In effect after 1942 they did nothing.

Interview with Jim Wright regarding College Course 1 opened a new possibility. The COI is thinking to establish an entirely new committee to oversee multidisciplinary courses. With luck we could come under the committee and escape the 4th Council.

Thursday, April 22, 1993

To Philadelphia

I've spent this entire month working on the journal. Have done nothing with the Kazantzakis letters since leaving London, alas. Also I see Frazier Miller weekly; he's studying Beckett's poetry and keeping a reading journal. Samantha Stoddard is developing into a splendid editorial assistant for JMGS. Meghan Donleavy is good, too, very conscientious.

Breakfast meeting with Pam Gile and Sherri Buckman at Kendal. Subgroup to consider employee relations. I gave them my summary of the Rowntree book.

To Manchester. US Air plane diverted to Boston. But they found us another aircraft flown in empty with a very tired crew. Arrived at Pendle Hill very tired at 11 p.m.

Friday, April 23, 1993

Pendle Hill–New York City

Breakfast with Peter Crysdale and then Nancy Frommelt, who is teaching Kazantzakis's Saint Francis this term. She says that Matthew Fox's theology will go with The Last Temptation for my religion and literature course next year. Silent meeting. I'm still very dry. Someone told me about Woolman, who felt he had ministered out of vanity and who then kept silent for six months. Good meeting with Rebecca, who affirmed that she feels at ease working with me. John Anderson is still causing trouble with books: "Peter railroaded it!" But Morehouse sales figures are encouraging, and Allen Kelly is very upbeat about the collaboration. An hour in my room to read more Cadbury applications; then meetings from 12 noon until 7:30 p.m. without a break. Publications 12 to 4: Jack Monger bitterly opposed John Punshon's realignment piece but we hope to salvage it. The favorite this time was Carol McCormack's on wicca = witches! Then Cadbury Fellowship Committee. We gave the award to a British woman who will study the role of American Quakers in the Spanish civil war. Then Book Committee over supper. I convinced them to do the poetry submission by subscription only, to guarantee the expenses. Surprisingly, the group was lukewarm about a reprint of Douglas Steere's writings but we're going to read some and decide. Doug Gwyn's book got a very good review from Sonny Cronk. We expect it in finished state a year from now. Reevaluation of book publishing and Morehouse next January with John Anderson and Denny. Judith Randall is leaving the bookstore to do hospice work. Tom Brown resigned owing to age, his wife's health, etc. Too bad. Rebecca is going to ask folks if they feel at ease with me continuing as clerk. I concurred, assuring her that the clerkship is not an ego trip for me.

SEPTA delayed, but I still made the 9:24 to New York.

Saturday, April 24 1993

Yale Club, NYC

Breakfast with Charlie Hamlen. He explained Classical Action, his company that will raise money, via donated concerts, to care for AIDS patients. They'll do soirées in large private homes, and a German festival is giving a whole day as a benefit in Leonard Bernstein's memory, etc. What surprised me was Charlie's confession that he felt unfulfilled in his previous position. His management had grown so huge, so successful, so international, that he, as director, was no longer in real touch with the artists, but was mostly in the office pushing papers. He decided he had to quit, and did so even before Classical Action was thought of and established. In other words, he was willing to take the chance. When we spoke about Leander, he advised the same. He should quit the job at Bethlehem and accept being unemployed for a time. Charlie thinks he should move to some collateral occupation involved with music. But to cling to Moravian, an excuse for not actively pursuing other possibilities, and also to think that private students will satisfy him, are mistakes. Charlie promised to talk to Leander and also to contact acquaintances, e.g., the director of the Kennedy Center. The important thing is that Charlie himself has passed through a period of self-doubt and near paralysis, similar to Leander's; thus he can empathize. I asked him about Paula Xanthopoulou. Her management business failed. She is now devoting herself, in various ways, full time, to Lesbian concerns.

Charlie was on his way to visit another friend dying of AIDS, aged 40-ish, a Greek. His mother came here, from Athens, to watch him die.

Then to the Met to see “The Greek Miracle” exhibit. Yes, “miracle” is the right word for these exquisite sculptures. What detail, naturalistic and yet at the same time the figures are abstracted beyond the particular to become icons of the universal. My favorites are the grave stele of a little girl kissing her pet dove, her little arms puffy, and an amazing stele of a young man whose hand-knuckles are almost alive. It was interesting to see the Kritios Boy here at the same time that, in the photography exhibition, there is a photo of it and some other pieces shortly after they were discovered buried in debris on the Acropolis.

Havemeyer Collection disappointing because the best pieces are already in the Met and thus I see them regularly—e.g., El Greco’s View of Toledo. Photography exhibit a fascinating view into history—e.g., the photo of Lincoln taken in 1860: such a homely, ungainly man. Finally, a very quick tour through the Daumier prints. Encountered a former student in a deli where I was having lunch.

In the evening, Mamet’s play Oleanna with Treat Williams and Mary McCoun. 8th Street and 2nd Avenue, just off St. Mark’s Place, which I hadn’t experienced before on a Saturday night. It’s a separate, exotic world! The play, about a university professor whose tenure decision is reversed because he is accused, mostly unjustly, by a female student of sexual elitism, and even attempted rape, was very “close to home” in its exposure of the professor’s desire for security, his use of inflated language, his insensitivity to the power he holds over students via grading and, more insidiously, his messages that students are “stupid.” But, although based on some slight provocation, the female student’s accusations are egregiously distorted, a projection of her own anger and self-hatred. At the end, the professor is helpless, for the tenure committee accepts all the charges and suspends him. A black drama indeed, brilliantly acted. And with Mamet’s characteristic expertise in dialogue, especially unfinished sentences, non sequiturs, repetitions.

Sunday, April 25, 1993

Worked on Samatas’s essay using the Powerbook. Then to MoMA to see Max Ernst exhibit, the most memorable canvas, for me, being the 1926 “Virgin Spanking the Christ Child Before Three Witnesses: André Breton, Paul Éluard, and the Painter.” The 12-year-old’s red bottom is at the center, with a determined Virgin raising her hand for yet another blow. Her halo is intact, but the child’s has fallen off and is lying on the floor. It was nice to see photos not only of Ernst but of Breton, Éluard, Man Ray, and Tzara.

Burt Pike met me for Yale Club brunch. He is disillusioned with the profession and thinks about retirement, as I do, but I'm way ahead of him, it seems, in having a post-retirement plan. He has no outside interests or involvements, he openly confessed. Thus retirement frightens him. He ought to become interested in a CCRC. It's nice in any case that we enjoy seeing each other, since he is my only Haverford friendship, seeing that Peter Gardner acts so indifferent. Oh yes, there's also Tom Wilson, whom I'll probably see next month in Princeton. But Burt and I share professional interests and experience, which makes friendship easier.

Uneventful trip home; flight to Manchester. But when I drove into the garage, intent on leaving enough room for the bicycle on the left, I went too far to the right and ripped the side-view mirror off. Oh my! But, as Chrysanthi so wisely says, Μη χειρότερα!

Once home I learned that poor Audrey Logan is in despair because Harlan fell again. They've put him to sleep now on the floor so he cannot fall out of bed.

The IRA bomb in London's financial district was near Greg's office, but since the explosion was on Saturday no one was working, thank goodness, except cleaning ladies. Huge damage, however. The dean of St. Paul's said that if Hitler could not quell our spirits, surely the IRA won't succeed.

Wednesday, April 28, 1993

Long breakfast, 7:30 to 10:00, with Lloyd Lewis, very cordial. He was frank about his dislike of Alan Hunt, whom he sees as self-serving, avoiding all sorts of conflicts of interest. Hunt tried to sabotage Paul Lewis, too, and probably pushed Lloyd out of the directorship, more or less. Lloyd is 65, will go on half-time now, and continue to develop new communities. He is pleased with his ability so far to disengage, allowing John Diffey to run his own show. Lloyd also lamented Carol Weingeist's fate and stated that Jean never gave Carol a chance, but drove her into the ground, creating such tension that Carol became paralyzed. He is still trying to find a position for her.

We laughed about Nancy Bekavac, who is an "FOB" (Friend of Bill's). She was in Yale Law School with Bill and Hillary Clinton. She's doing well. I told Lloyd about Leander and he, contrary to Charlie, stressed that Leander should not resign his job at Bethlehem. Employers always hesitate to hire unemployed people. It's much better to find another job while still holding a previous one. Then one can quit. He mentioned that Richard Bewley is currently unemployed, as is Dick Dewees. How sad!

Alec's headmaster at Jakarta has offered to upgrade him from Middle School Principal to Assistant Headmaster in charge of K through 8.

I've been invited to go to China.

Long lunch with Robert Binswanger. Morgan is now in the Department of Education, grade 12, at age 26. Regarding the War/Peace mess, he said that the dean will expect me to be a pushover since I'm mild and inoffensive. Thus I should fight, scream, really object. Then they'll cave in. Bob has lots of experience in such things. This afternoon the 4th Council met on College Course 2 and gave Jack a hard time again. I fear for the verdict.

Thursday, April 29, 1993

An unpleasant morning. I'm part of a panel of "judges" hearing the dispute between the Medical School and Dennis Thron, whom they want to fire because he refuses to teach in the pharmacology course. He says that his refusal is justified because his academic freedom was impaired owing to arbitrary decisions for the course, made by the chairman without properly consulting Thron. What a sad situation! I pleaded with them to forget the past and allow an outside arbitrator to help them find a rapprochement that may still be possible. But Dennis especially kept harping on the past. Tomorrow we meet "in camera" to make our recommendation to President Freedman.

Friday, April 29, 1993

As usual, I was the most lenient. Bernie Gert was the most stringent, really nasty. Ed Berger and Gert Assmus were in the middle, and the chair, Hoyt Alverson leaned a bit toward Gert. They all felt that Thron was guilty as charged—i.e., of unjustifiably refusing to teach even though they recognized the provocations involved. The only thing I could do for Thron was to sway the others, actually without too much difficulty, to reject Dean Wallace's recommendation of termination and to substitute for it mandatory flexible retirement beginning next year (Thron is 62). Gert then insisted on adding another clause: that if Thron refused any teaching assignment, termination should be the consequence. So, he can retire at 65 with some dignity unless he continues his intransigence, which is noble, but also self-destructive and perhaps even a bit pathological. Poor man!

In the evening, Rhea McKay and I conducted a Ministry and Counsel survey at Kendal with about 25 participants, asking what they desired of the Meeting. It didn't work too well because enough of them hardly knew what a Meeting is.

Mother wanted to attend but she had severe dizziness and vomiting the night before—a virus. The Kendal care was exemplary. Within minutes she was in the Health Center. She's feeling very good about the move to Kendal at the moment.

Saturday, May 1, 1993

Rosine Gardner is here from North Creek for a Rassias workshop. Poor Jerry is still struggling. Rosine says that the newspaper nets only about $5000 a year. No gossip about Mr. Morris.

Went to Kendal for lunch, saw the Websters, and Franny told me the unbelievable news. Bev is to be granted a regular contract. He signs it on Monday. This was decided by the administrative group that Jean convened. Of course Jean did not have the courtesy to tell me. Bitch! But our strategy worked. Probably sending the Almays did the trick. Also my restraint, keeping mum and orchestrating things behind the scenes. Must write to John Diffey.

Jean is mortified by Audrey Logan's campaign throughout Kendal against an inflexible non-restraint policy. She wants me to convince Audrey to meet with Jean and me. Apparently Audrey cannot stand her. So far I've not been able to find Audrey.

Sunday, May 3, 1993

Ministry and Counsel, then Meeting. I ministered—the first time in so very long—on Charlie Hamlen's Classic Action and the extraordinary cooperation he has received, as proof that human beings can indeed cooperate, whereas the news seems to indicate that all they can do is kill each other.

Worked on Samatas's essay for JMGS all afternoon. I've spent a week of my life fixing his abominable English.

Supper with the "gang." Mary Soderberg's birthday. Lafayette, Mayme, Mary, Roger, Treat, Molly, Chrysanthi, Audrey. At the Shaker restaurant at Lake Mascoma. Afterwards I extended Jean's invitation to Audrey. It was refused. Audrey won't see her. Says she's inflexible, as is Audrey, too, of course.

Michael Webster telephoned to say thanks for his parents.

Monday, May 4, 1993

Kendal Task Force. I presented my Quaker Business Practices à la Rown-tree, and of course they rejected them. Not peremptorily, but "watch and wait." "If dissatisfaction is shown by an employee questionnaire, then perhaps we can move in that direction. But why create expectations among the employees unnecessarily?" Ugh!

Jean is planning her annual review; wants me involved again. Will it do any good? I had to tell her about Audrey.

Umberto Eco lectured on "the search for an ideal language." Amusing. Mostly, people thought it must be Hebrew—what Adam spoke (!!). The Tower of Babel ended the paradise of a simple language. But, when all is said and done, Babel is good. Adam must have been multilingual and multicultural. I thought of Serbia today. Supper with Eco later, and other professors including Tatum, who has been at a march in Washington over the weekend. Eco loud and exuberant and "multicultural/multilingual."

Tuesday, May 4, 1993

Walter Stephens gave a brilliant and provocative lecture on witches in Humanities Forum. I wanted to get a copy for Carol McCormack, who wrote on the Wicca movement for Pendle Hill and had none of the depth of Walter's analysis. But he demurred; wants to see it published first. Awful!

Visited Tom Luxon's class on Burke and the French Revolution. Interesting analysis of the material, but absence of teaching techniques, as usual.

To Lui Lui to celebrate Walter Arndt's birthday with Corinne and her children and Dick Sheldon and Dave Lemal. Corinne is flourishing after her disastrous first marriage to an alcoholic.

Wednesday, May 5, 1993

Mary Kelley's inaugural lecture on women intellectuals in the 18th and 19th century—how they read, kept commonplace books, etc. I thought of my practice of encouraging students to do this. Frazier Miller is keeping a beautiful diary right now on Beckett.

Thursday, May 6, 1993

Lunch at the Norwich Inn for the annual William Chambers lecture. Susan was there of course, but also Wim and the two girls. What a strange family! Dr. Sox presented a private reprinting of Bill's two Haverford lectures. I've ordered copies for Haverford library and for the Meeting House. Sat across from Dr. and Mrs. Waters; he treated Daphne years ago.

Friday, May 7, 1993

Amherst

To Amherst to examine students taking Greek. They varied this time: A to D. But it's still a nice process, and an easy way to make $300. Elizabeth Mazzocco wants our cooperation in an interactive video project recording Greek pronunciation.

Saturday, May 8, 1993

"Terpni"

Beautiful day. Waddell Road has been "raped" by the Electric Company, thanks to Mr. Morris. Beyond our entrance there's now a 25-foot swath filled with fallen trunks. At least they piled some chips for us. Their truck got stuck in the lower field and chopped it up horribly. Chrysanthi and I worked hard to redistribute the sods that were ripped away. But I'll need topsoil and a harrow or bulldozer to get it all even again. Couldn't start the Jari; that's a disappointment. But the water turned on fine. The house looks fine. I dared not walk into the forest to see what left of it after this winter's lumbering.

Sunday, May 9, 1993

"Terpni"

Serviced the John Deere and started it without trouble. Worked on Pscharopoulos's article last night on my marvelous Powerbook. Lovely dinner in an Italian restaurant near Rutland: Luigi's. A Mother's Day special. Learned that Mother's Day was started by Julia Ward Howe as a pacifist expression for mothers' sorrow in warfare.

Monday, May 10, 1993

Hanover

Elise Boulding for supper, with Audrey Logan. Elise gave me the collection of Kenneth's unpublished sonnets. He was writing one a day, right up to his death. About life's simple pleasures and experiences. Very moving. She hopes that Pendle Hill can publish them.

Tuesday, May 11, 1993

7:15 a.m. breakfast with the Dean, Karen Wetterhahn, and the associate dean of Thayer School, Carol Muller, who want to set up a university seminar on women in science. Discovered that Wetterhahn grew up in the Adirondacks. She actually knew where North Creek is.

Big luncheon banquet for ILEAD. Dr. Koop spoke about medical crises. Very discouraging. He has little faith in Clinton's efforts. But Tom Almy told me, later, that Koop is just embittered because Clinton isn't asking for his advice. Tom Campion in his element as toastmaster. Nardi Campion showed me her ILEAD recommendations: 1st choice Paradise Lost taught by Peter Bien!

Meghan Dunleavy re: JMGS and Frazier Miller re: Beckett in the afternoon.

Wednesday, May 12, 1993

Philadelphia

8:00 a.m., War/Peace Steering Committee meeting with Elise. More discussion of how to salvage the program. I wish that Elise had been here to speak to the 4th Council instead of me. Every avenue is problematical.

Adjourned at 9:30 a.m. and caught the 10:30 a.m. flight to Philadelphia via Boston, traveling with Walter Frank, founder of Walter Frank Investments and former president of the New York Stock Exchange, now 85 years old. An extrovert, conversationalist, jokester; delightful companion. We were together from 10:00 a.m. until 11:00 p.m. and thoroughly enjoyed it. At airports he of course brought us to the first class lounges for drinks, etc. At Philadelphia we were picked up by a Kendal driver. Out to the Development Corporation for a meeting of the long range task force on mission and goals. We agreed that the Corporation should diversify, not restrict itself necessarily to Type A CCRCs.

Thursday, May 13, 1993

Taught Jim Heffernan's Ulysses seminar on Oxen of the Sun. The two hours flew by. Supper at Kendal to celebrate Bev Web's 85th birthday. Sat with Tom Almy, Mary Bunting, Franny Webster, Mrs. Chapman. Learned that Carleton Chapman had been Andreas Papandreou's personal physician. Oh, and the lady I sat next to at the ILEAD lunch on Tuesday was Senator Fulbright's mother-in-law.

Settled the next agenda with Jean and also some procedure for her evaluation. She has still not said a word to me about Bev Web. Barbara Gilbert told me that Jean's brother is gay and that there was probably sexual abuse by the father, an alcoholic. John Diffey and I spoke briefly yesterday. He says that some of the staff are driven to tears by Jean, but that Dan and Brent have learned how to deal with her.

Friday, May 14, 1993

Got my Powerbook finally operative, with lots of help from Kiewit. I can now send and receive faxes with it, and sign on to blitz mail, bitnet, etc. Amazing!

Lunch with Luxon about his class. He's very genial and open.

Final meeting with Alverson, Ed Berger, and Gert Amunson about the Thron verdict. Bernie Gert was absent, thank God. In his absence we all agreed to make the verdict less severe and vindictive, recognizing the administration's fault in all this. We've asked merely that Thron be put on mandatory flexible retirement. He's 62. He'll retire at 65. That's a humane way to deal with the situation.

I sent in my registration to go to China in September.

Pleasant supper at Jesse's with Chuck and Trix Officer. High school students were next to us in tuxes and evening gowns for their prom. One girl was deliberately provocative in her low-cut gown. The girls whispered to each other behind their menus and disappeared to the bathroom for long periods. The boys were boorish behind their elegance.

U.S. News and World Report telephoned regarding Kendal. They want to photograph Mother and me, when I return from Princeton.

Saturday, May 15, 1993

With Sycha and Bill Spengemann to Ruth Adams's flat at Kendal for drinks. We invited her to supper but she refused. She never eats in the Kendal dining room. We tried! She was cordial. Lovely apartment. Full of anecdotes, of course, deriving from her time as president of Wellesley, and then her time here under Kemeny helping to settle women in. Nice supper with Mother and the Spengemanns. He's incensed because the college is trying to eliminate our London foreign study program. Then Bev Web's concert: Bach sonata in D minor, Schumann Papillons, Debussy Reflets dans l'eau and Isle joyeuse, Chopin's Berceuse op. 57 and Fantaisie op. 49. Bev in top form. The Debussy Reflets was scintillating, the Schumann too. The Chopin tender, brilliant, sonorous. Only the Bach was a little muddy. I was tremendously moved, as was everyone else, although his audiences are shrinking.

Monday, May 17, 1993

Princeton

Relaxing ride via AMTRAK with Chrysanthi. The train reminds me of the old Orient Express through Yugoslavia: stop, go, creep, stop, go, creep. But we arrived. Chrysanthi continued on to Washington to visit Leander and Deanna. I proceeded to Princeton, where I've been treated as a V.I.P. Installed in the Hellenic Studies guest room two blocks from the library, introduced immediately by Dimitri Gondicas to the curator of rare books—i.e., custodian of the Friar collection—then to fancy lunch at Prescott with Mike Keeley and Dimitri. George Kennan came in. We gossiped about the Onassis Center and the like. Mary Keeley is doing much better now; she was at death's door a month ago.

Spent all afternoon examining the Friar archive. Very rich. Not just letters but all of Kazantzakis's glosses on the Odyssey in response to Friar's queries. Also Eleni's letters as Kazantzakis was dying and after he died. Also, full correspondence of both Eleni and Kimon showing the break-up of their relationship owing to money squabbles chiefly. Horrible! I'm having the letters photocopied.

Then a grand supper at a restaurant with the Modern Greek contingent, Neni and Stathis, and Karakasidou, who wrote the Macedonian article, and others whom I hadn't known before, and Mike and Mary, of course. To bed, finally, at midnight.

Tuesday, May 18, 1993

Princeton

Breakfast with Sandra Cronk and her mother in their comfortable home. Sonny's institute for spirituality is flourishing; she's also teaching people again how to "elder" responsibly. Worked on the Friar archives some more. The extent is much greater than I had imagined. Lunch with Judith Herrin, very cordial, fond memories of B'ham days, going in her car and running out of gas! She's very happy here, but her husband Anthony is in England and involved in efforts for constitutional revision (working with Glenda Jackson among others) and can't come here. Long interview afterwards with Gonda (= Honda) Van Steen, a grad student who wants to work on Greek theater. I was able to help her with leads. Then Dimitri Gondicas presented me with six essays for the journal, the result of a symposium held here, among them Danny Danforth's on the Macedonian issue and something by Mouzelis and Tsoucalas. Big guns. More archives. Supper alone in a Chinese restaurant. Watched an excruciatingly funny movie on TV about an American boor who inherits the British throne and has to be “civilized”! Leander telephoned, all exited. They’ve found a house they want to buy. $250,000 with a 7¼% thirty-year mortgage. Who would have thought?! Chrysanthi saw the exterior and the neighborhood, and approved. He wanted my advice on the mortgage. What could I say? I just hope that his forthcoming marriage lasts and that he finds a way to make money.

Wednesday, May 18, 1993

Arranging to have topsoil delivered to repair damage at the farm. We’ll need to use the harrow and then I’ll seed the area. Morning at the archives again. Interesting responses from people to whom Friar sent the published Odyssey: Edmund Wilson’s printed card: E. Wilson does not . . . (list of items, e.g., read other people’s books, with a check mark next to that one). William Carlos Williams, M.D.: I’ve had a stroke, can’t read it. Dick Eberhart, polite but uncooperative. But kudos from L. Durrell, Bowra, etc. And what a saga to complete the publication, with Friar in Chile. If I do the article for the Princeton Library Journal I’ll need to return here next autumn.

Lunch at Prospect with Stathis Gourgouris, who also is very happy here: flourishing. Then an hour with an undergraduate, Ioannis Mentzan, whose father is Greek and mother Japanese and who grew up in Japan. We wants to go to grad school in comparative literature to do Greek and Japanese. I told him about Harvard, Ohio State, NYU, Birmingham, London, Melbourne, Sydney, Paris. More archives; then to the Keeleys’ for an end-of-term party with lot of lovely food and drink. All the “young” were present, plus others: a granddaughter of Tolstoy and a half-Greek half-Russian scientist, and a Yugoslav professor of Byzantine art, and Karakasidou again and Judith and Gonda. Good talk and fellowship. Mary Keeley says the doctor will allow her five or six weeks in Greece. Mike has given his archives to Princeton. He wants me to give my translation manuscripts and typescripts and early versions of Demotic Greek, etc. Also to come back here for extended periods of teaching sometime.

Returned to my quarters and accessed telephone messages. Shocked to learn from Issy Ganz that Peter Gardner died. The service was today; obviously I learned too late to go. No clue as to what happened. Also, Dick Brokaw telephoned to say that he and Channy are very disturbed about the materials I sent out for Jean's evaluation. Trouble ahead. My Powerbook now sends faxes and I've made use of this. It also can access blitz mail at Dartmouth.

Thursday, May 20, 1993

Princeton

Finished with the archive, for now. Dimitri wants my collection of Kazantzakis letters deposited here, along with everything else. Visited with Bob Brown, my editor at Princeton University Press, who shocked me by saying that the Press is changing direction; it will publish moneymaking books instead of scholarly monographs. The typical monograph now sells only 500 copies. My Selected Letters and volume 2 of Kazantzakis: Politics of the Spirit are endangered, although he hopes that subsidy from the Seeger fund will make them pass. He advised me to hurry with the Letters. Alas, alack! How am I do to the Letters plus the journal and teaching?! He says we're heading for books on demand. Booksellers will produce a book for a client from electronic copy.

Supper with Joan and Tom Wilson. They plan to move into Kendal at Hanover around 2000. Joan teaches recorder and plays gamba. We'll have baroque chamber music, with me playing her harpsichord. They went back to Egypt recently, where Tom's father worked. There's still a University of Chicago Center, started by his father. We talked about his father's death. Tom scattered the ashes in their yard; he didn't want any tombstone. I said that life should be like theater or live music: it occurs, and then disappears without residue. As Kazantzakis says, we come from a dark abyss and return to a dark abyss. Why not simply accept this, even celebrate it?

Friday, May 21, 1993

Pendle Hill

Denny O'Brien did the financial summary for the Morehouse collaboration. Not bad. He figures we're $1800 in the red, chiefly because of large sales (!) to Quaker bookstores, sales that we would have made at a higher profit without Morehouse. But several thousand books were sold elsewhere, which means "outreach." Sonny Cronk's book did particularly well. This means that if we continue we'll need to think about books that will sell to the wider religious audience, not just to Quakers. Allan Kelly of Morehouse apparently is very pleased with the scheme.

Dan Seeger, whom I saw briefly, said that he experienced his first “disastrous” term, with student dissatisfaction sparked (he’s sure) by staff. I got no details, except the hint that “feminism” is involved. No surprise. Oliver Rodgers is stepping down as clerk of the board and will be replaced by Mary Wood. Dan is very apprehensive. The board is old and weak. Hal Cope and George Peck are “failing,” as Dan puts it, and he doesn’t respect Vince Buscemi. He wanted me for clerk, or Nancy Strong, but we were both rotated off the General Board by the by-laws. I go back on the General Board in October. Mary Wood could stay for eight years!

The Publication Committee surprised itself by actually accepting three manuscripts, a record. I gave Ken Boulding’s sonnets to Rebecca. They are extraordinary.

I enthused to Patty O’Hara about the Parliament on the Road. She tells me that the board will consider advancing her on-the-road job to 40% of her time because it’s going so well. Hooray!

Nice visit with Kenneth Sutton on the SEPTA back to 30th Street. Met Chrysanthi in her compartment on the Montrealer. Leisurely supper in the dining car, hearing all about Leander’s and Deanna’s plans for the March wedding, going slowly, and for buying a house, going faster. $250,000. Imagine! And Leander earns $12,000 a year. They’ll be dining with Neil Ratliff on Sunday. He has AIDS and is declining. Charlie Hamlen telephoned Leander but I don’t know what came of it.

Saturday, May 22, 1993

Cambridge

Arrived at 5:00 a.m. Mail. Telephone messages. Brokaws object to the evaluation plans for Jean. I spoke to Dick, trying to mollify him. Drove to Cambridge. Chrysanthi and Alec went off to lunch. I went to Eliot House to lunch with Zeta Farinou. She’s in C11, F. O. Matthiessen’s old room. Eerie. His library is preserved there, plus framed photos, book reviews by him, etc. I vividly remember when he jumped out of the Boston hotel window when I was an undergraduate. Two hours of conversation in Greek with Zeta. She’s working on biography as novel, or vice versa, a subject not yet exploited in Greece, and is including Kazantzakis. They’re all under pressure now to publish à la Americaine; that’s why I’m getting articles for the journal.

Oh, at Pendle Hill, Lisa Lewis, Lloyd’s wife, just returned from an elder hostel in Greece. She said that “everybody” there knew of me; apparently she encountered people whose articles I have been publishing.

Then to the A.R.T. for the world premiere of Philip Glass’s Orphée based on Cocteau’s film. Actually I liked the music. The first act was somewhat static. But the 2nd act was almost magical in the way it metamorphosed the myth of descent to Hades and return into a modern idiom.

I then helped Alec install his software for fax and modem and to send, successfully, his first fax. He’s elated. We dined at a Japanese restaurant in the old Sears Building in Porter Square. He had had breakfast with Robert Binswanger, who told him that Bob McGlynn says I was the brightest student he taught at Deerfield in his 40-year career there. (He never taught me, of course; Dick Hatch did.) Alec is disgusted with NiMo’s “rape” of Waddell Road; wants reparations. Strange how we differ in such things. I’m more passive and accepting. He’s off tomorrow to Washington to visit Leander and Deanna and to see the new house they hope to buy.

Walked to Au Bon Pain with Chrysanthi and had a lovely coffee. Cambridge on a spring Saturday night is a carnival. Like Πλατεία Ναυαρίνου in Thessaloniki, or Greenwich Village.

Worked on a journal article until I nodded.

Sunday, May 23, 1993

Overnight at Cambridge Friends Center, now transformed. The guest rooms are much smaller, but still very convenient. Breakfast with Dia Philippides and Meg Alexiou. Dia is married now to Wim Bakker, but he still lives in Amsterdam. She’s vivacious, as always.

Monday, May 24, 1993

The photographer from U.S. News and World Report came to Kendal. He spent 1½ hours taking four rolls of Mother and me talking to each other outside the front entrance. This is supposed to appear in the June 7th issue. He kept calling me “Tom” the whole time—we’ll see what caption appears. Rushed back to Dartmouth to talk about censorship to Joe Medlicott’s ILEAD class. Beckett’s Murphy at 5:00. Then to Jesse’s to sup with John Diffey, Jean, Chrysanthi and Barbara Gilbert, to continue planning the July retreat.

Tuesday, May 25, 1993

Good Overseers' meeting. Brokaw complained about the consensual mode of evaluation for Jean, saying that evaluation should be determined solely by the CEO, whereupon the CEO reiterated that he desired the consensual mode. Voilà! Met with Lafayette afterward about the scheme for low-income housing, which he is pushing. Another huge project . . . perhaps. Then to dentist for cleaning. Then to lunch with John Rassias to talk about China. He discouraged me from going, saying that they are exploiting us. If they want exchange so badly, they should pay our way. He is quite bitter about his own experience there, it seems. I am torn. Chrysanthi is very opposed, too. Met at 5:15 with the new IDS representative, Donald Small, yet another financial counselor. I now have Corey Smith at Prudential, Hank Elitzer at PayneWebber, Jerry Santanello at Sherston, and Jeffrey Harris at Fleet Bank! . . . Then by car to Riparius.

Wednesday, May 26

Terpni

Planted tomatoes and string beans. Started the Jari (Alec had fixed it). Then back to Hanover to play von Weber trio with Dick and Allan. It's getting better. We're learning our parts.

Thursday, May 27

Working on the journal, as always. I told Prof. Stavrou that I cannot produce the Kazantzakis checklist this year—again. I'm reduced to correcting other people's work rather than producing my own. Yet the journal is now "taking off," I believe. Maybe it's worthwhile. Mike Keeley said I was sacrificing myself.

CAP dinner. Nice talk with John Walsh and Ray Nash. Poor Ray is now ostracized by his three daughters, who side with their mother in the divorce. John and I reminisced about Oxford. Lots of talk about Jeff Hart.

Friday, May 28, 1993

My birthday. Chrysanthi gave me a pair of shorts with 34-inch waist, my size now, after 40 years of 32-inch. Cards from the children and Mother. Department banquet for Barbara Cunningham's retirement, black tie. Nice talk with Ned (Ann's condition is improving, but Amy's romance in New Zealand is over and she's back home), with Lynda Boose about her visit to Vietnam, Susan Brown about Andy Rangell. Even Jim Cox was friendly, probably half drunk. Jim Heffernan recited some clever doggerel modeled on Paradise Lost. The refrain, of course: the xerox machine.

Saturday, May 29, 1993

All day working on the journal. Supper with Karen and Dick Sheldon and Bob Watson. Karen's birthday is 29 May, so we opened a bottle of champagne and toasted both her and me. A relaxed evening with delicious swordfish.

Sunday, May 30, 1993

Cambridge

To the A.R.T. with Mother. Lunch with Alec. He described his visit to Washington and the house that Leander and Deanna are hoping to buy. Listened to Leander's CD of Elliott Carter's cello sonata on the way down. It's monumental, and both musicians play superbly. Spoke to Leander later and he said that he visited with Charlie Hamlen, who is going to mention Leander to various people in Washington. They also supped with Neil Ratliff, who was in good form, all in a Greek restaurant where Neil is in his element. Our play at the A.R.T. was "Cakewalk" by Peter Feibleman, an autobiographical/biographical "memoir" about Lillian Hellman and their tempestuous love affair. Superbly acted by Elaine Stritch as "Lilly" and John Slattery as "Cuff" (i.e., Feibleman). The narrative mode was well used, setting up vignettes of power and sentiment. The decline of Hellman—blindness, stroke, senile irascibility—was very touching. Supper at that funny Indian-Greek restaurant on Main Street in Concord. We were the only customers. Home by 9:30. Sent Alec a fax so he could test out his new capability on the Powerbook; then he sent one to me. It worked.

Wednesday, June 2, 1993

What a day! So varied! Started by driving to the hospital for PSA blood test, routine for benign (one hopes) prostate hypertrophy. Then in the office finishing computer conversations for JMGS's IBM disk, discussing Maria Yiannakos's cancer at length with Dr. Eric Larsen, the pediatric oncologist here, in order to fax information to Dimitris, whether it makes sense to bring her here for treatment or a second opinion. Larsen very pessimistic; probably she'll die, alas. Then signed license affidavits for Kendal, to go to the State of New Hampshire. Then was interviewed by The Manchester Guardian regarding Kimon Friar, who died last week. Then tried to copyedit more JMGS reviews submitted in atrocious English. Then to a Comparative Literature lunch, a nice interval with Diana Taylor, Steve Scher, etc. Then with Nancy Davies in the office as she helped me remove unnecessary software from my hard drive. Then with her to Humanities Computing to do the IBM conversions. Then more copyediting. Telephone from NYC. I'm late with Diana Haas's recommendation. E-mail from Greece: what is the verdict on X's submission? E-mail from Peter Mackridge praising Karakasidou's article on Macedonia—how nice! Fax from Athens: Charalambis's charts again. Telephone to Lisa Ritter (Laaspere), who is redrawing the charts for me. Telephone to Better Business Bureau in Chicago and the Human Services Department of the State of Illinois to register a complaint against Federal Pharmaceutical for mail fraud. Bill Spengemann telling me my white dinner jacket is the most beautiful he's ever seen (it's Deerfield vintage, of course). Stopped at Serry's and bought a proper tuxedo shirt. At home, making Demotic Greek cassettes. Talked at length with Audrey Logan re: Barbara Bartlett, whom I'm supposed to recommend somehow to Pendle Hill. Talked at length with Felitsa Macedon, in Greek, about all her troubles re: housing, location, etc.

Monday, June 7, 1993

The U.S. News and World Report issue on retirement did not print the photo of Mother and me. The part on Kendal was awful, emphasizing how expensive it is and little else, although they did quote me as saying that life there is "creative"!

Jack Shepherd is going to Cambridge (England). So now our War/Peace courses have no teacher.

Sent an obituary for Friar to Athens.

Tuesday, June 8, 1993

Lunch with Steve Scher. He never goes to graduation because of May Day in Hungary when he was forced to parade.

June 10, 1993

Cambridge

Arrived last night. Slept in Cambridge Meeting House's new guest room. Such a let-down after the old one. Lined up at 7:45 a.m. to attend the morning ceremony. At least we got seats this time in the Yard, and it wasn't raining. I was even under a tree and shaded. The ceremony, for me, lacked the excitement of Daphne's graduation. Protestors with balloons saying "Lift the Ban" objected, politely, to Colin Powell's presence. Afterwards, to the Ed School for an interminably long ceremony ending finally at 2:30, and we still had not had lunch. Katia, Alec's Russian friend, joined us with her child; that was nice, and we picnicked finally. I went to the Business School to deliver one of Daphne's papers to Professor Hackman and to request a recommendation sent to her quickly for use at L.S.E. but he wasn't there; he's on sabbatical. I spoke into his answering machine, explaining everything.

Upon our return, we greeted Mr. and Mrs. Ünsal and Selen. They had arrived from Istanbul at 2:00 a.m. the night before. Easy, relaxed exchange with them. Such a lovely couple!

Friday, June 11, 1993

Finished proofing my article for Jim Tatum's book. Then took the Ünsals to Quechee to lunch and to see glass blowing, then to see the Ray School (what a delicious sight!), then the hospital, then Kendal, which they found very inspiring.

Music with Dick. We played the von Weber, just flute and piano. It's hard for me when up to tempo. Also did Schubert songs. Alec arrived, having twisted his ankle, and went to the emergency room for X-rays. Leander has tonsillitis and conjunctivitis; he had to cancel a concert and teaching at Kinhaven's pre-season program.

Saturday, June 12, 1993

Fax from Daphne. Hackman faxed her saying how wonderful that fathers are so devoted to their daughters. (He'd do the same for his.) He got the materials and fed-ex'd the recommendation. Hooray! Did something right for a change. . . . Finished Anita Brookner's Fraud and wrote a 500-word review.

Afternoon "at home." Visits from Irene Georgakoudi, David Engstrom, John Van Aalst, Jen Patterson, Ben King, Frazier Miller, Selen Ünsal, all with families. Very nice. Then supper at Kendal with Audrey and Mother and Alec.

Sunday, June 13, 1993

Dartmouth commencement. Saw Mickey Heyman, who's retiring as chair of the board. He told me that his eldest son died of AIDS. Poor people! He is retiring from Berkeley to go to Washington, to the Department of the Interior, to develop a policy for use of federal lands. He hopes that we can visit more, now that he's relieved of the chairmanship.

Lovely, leisurely supper at Molly's Balloon with the Ünsals and Selen's boyfriend, Charles, who seems so dull compared to her. Chrysanthi agrees: it's strange the partners that people pick. All in all, having the Ünsals was delightful and very educational. It's despicable the way the average Greek, or the Greek press, treats Turkey, condemning the people and the entire civilization for the excesses of the government. We are of course invited to Istanbul to be their guests.

Monday, June 14, 1993

To Terpni

Finally able to leave around 2:30 p.m. Arrived in time for supper with Alec, who also arrived. He's obsessed with the "rape" of the road, as is Chrysanthi. I'm finding their concern rather tiresome. But Morris is clearly a "psycho." Alec drove back on our road earlier and encountered a man in a parked pick-up. Talking to him, he discovered that he works for Morris and had been instructed to record the license numbers of vehicles headed for the Morris property.

Tuesday, June 15, 1993

Longwood

Up at 6:30 a.m. Drove to Albany airport, only 1½ hours away. Lunch in Longwood Inn with Crosbie Deaton, facilitator for our Kendal retreat in July. He had some good ideas for diversifying the format. I "briefed" him re: our impasse in outreach, and my desire to distribute my Rowntree notes + Greenleaf's pamphlet "Institution as Servant," which discusses hierarchical vs. egalitarian forms of governance. Then to Crosslands for the Task Force's final recommendations and review of the mission statement, which needs changes. Nice to see Walter Frank again. He returned to New York in a chauffeur-driven Cadillac, of course. Nice man, wealthy and powerful but at the same time humble. I also like John Dify more and more. . . . Electrical defect in the USAir plane. We boarded, then disembarked and waited 1½ hours. Nice conversation with an engineer who'd built a small hydroelectric plant in Quechee and favors nuclear power, sensibly. Furious rain and lightning at Albany. Returned home slowly. No electricity. Pole down in Wevertown.

June 16, 1993

Terpni

Still no electricity at 10:00 a.m., making the outage 14 hours so far. Used the pump to wash and used the outhouse as in old times. Total outage 17 hours, thanks to Mr. Morris. I'm catching up on correspondence. Danial Mueenuddin wrote with glee to announce that he's been accepted to Yale Law School, Oliver Metzger to complain that he'd been rejected from all law schools except Texas, the only one that didn't require faculty testimonials. I'm reading Daniel Carson's "Taps for a Dead White Male," one half of a novel he proposes to make 1000 pages long. It's very adolescent, pandering to sex and violence. Poor Daniel. He does have talent, but . . . How am I going to say this to him diplomatically? Gave up on reading Peter Wilson's novel; it's just too much.

Thursday, June 17, 1993

Art and Chris came over. Art bought three new horses after one of his died. He's riding and training them instead of painting.

The tomatoes look sickly, but I gave them more fertilizer. Cut down large pine branches overshadowing the garden to give it more sunlight.

Catching up on correspondence delayed for six months in some cases. Daphne faxed her statement for LSE and I vetted it for her and returned it by fax within three hours—to London. Not bad. It will be terrible now if she's not admitted, given that she has already quit her job.

Friday, June 18, 1993

Ordered ballet tickets. It's a Balanchine festival this summer. Mary and Maureen Fitzgerald here for supper—steak on the outdoor grill. They haven't given up on Clinton, bless them. Maureen didn't know what the European Parliament is, or what's happening in Macedonia. I explained (the journal educates me). Nanos Valaoritis telephoned from Paris re: the changes I made in his almost illiterate book review. Happily, he wasn't angry. I wrote to Daniel Carson; he'll be unhappy, of course. But I didn't say that the novel is adolescent. I wrote a long letter to Outi in Sweden. Leander still refuses to answer her letters, so she gets her news from me. She has a little girl, but who knows if there is still a husband! She met Jack Wright, my PH advisee, at the Quaker Meeting in Stockholm. Small world. I still feel for her.

Saturday, June 19, 1993

Spent most of the day preparing a report on outreach for next Thursday's task force, using the excellent materials distributed at Crosslands last Tuesday, plus, of course, the minutes of our Outreach Committee. We've floundered for months and months. Talked to Alec about Kendal governance. He found the Rowntree material inspiring and he agrees that democratizing the work force is the way to go. I showed him the Kendal staff survey, which shows so much dissatisfaction.

Alec and Chrysanthi spread the new mulch paper around the blueberries and covered it with wood chips. Looks very neat. We must now surround the blueberry plants with pine needles to give the soil the proper PH. Spent time writing to Better Business Bureau in Chicago complaining about Federal Pharmacal's negligence in filling my order, not so much for the lost $26.00 as out of curiosity to see if anything happens. Also to the Attorney General of Illinois and to the postmaster where they have bulk mail privileges, accusing them of mail fraud.

Michael Gouthreau came and he and Alec sawed up a load of firewood as a present for Jerry Gardner. Rosine gave each a penny as pour-boire (!) after they stacked the wood, with the children standing and watching instead of helping. Oh well . . .

Sunday, June 20, 1993

It's raining. I'm in my office with the Powerbook (what a difference!) finishing correspondence and looking at some material on management that Alec had at Harvard. Must get back soon to the Harkianakis translations, and practice von Weber. And go round the edges of the fields picking up debris to prepare for mowing.

Leander arrived at 8:00 p.m. full of enthusiasm for the adult workshop just concluded at Kinhaven. He hopes to propose a piano workshop for next June. He was very disturbed when he heard that I'd been invited to "think-tank" there in July, because of his delicate relationship with Jerry. I offered to withdraw. He also regaled us with wedding plans, which are proceeding. The officiant will be the minister of the local United Churches of Christ congregation, not Karen Sheldon. He wants some Quaker elements and also Greek Orthodox ones. I'll try to help with information. He talked non-stop for four hours, as usual, including an hour (almost) trying to figure out how to deliver Alec's truck to Washington so that Leander can use it for moving. Also said that both he and his children have vowed to discourage their children from going into music as a career.

Monday, June 21, 1993

Dimitris Yiannakos telephoned at 8:00 a.m. from Greece. They are desperate, because Maria is going to die, it seems, from the rhabdomyosarcoma. Dimitris heard of a rhabdomyosarcoma society in America, with its president based at the University of Virginia, and asked me to find a precise name and address if possible. I discovered the name quickly and that the physician is now in Houston. I spoke with him later; he was discouraging. Only 40% survive, and these are the ones who respond to the initial treatment. Alas!

Sunday, June 27, 1993

Daphne sent me a cute Father's Day card showing father and daughter sneaking out of the house for a hot fudge sundae while mother looks on and frowns. So we went tonight to the Narrows for pizza and hot fudge sundaes, and as a bonus saw the brightest rainbow I've ever seen: the full arc rising out of the lake and descending into the mountains, with a faint second rainbow next to it with the spectrum in reverse direction. Extraordinary!

Spent the last two days answering letters mostly. This afternoon Alec and I trimmed back the north field, to ready it for mowing. Alec got Bruce McGinn to come up with a bulldozer and a load of topsoil to fix the damage in the front field done by NiMo, and to remove stones near the tree line and to smooth out behind Alec's cabin, for all of which NiMo is paying. I seeded these areas last Friday. We also got Fred Hitchcock's crew to clean up the mess left at our entrance. Alec is now corduroying the little cut-off made by the loggers behind the chicken house.

Tuesday, June 29, 1993

All caught up with letters. Worked all day on the journal. Laura visited in the afternoon. Chrysanthi went with Chris Perryman to Granville to pick strawberries and returned with 25 pounds. Z. Skorko tuned and repaired the piano yesterday, and today I actually practiced. Naoko and Yasuo are coming this weekend and we'll have chamber music. Irv Shapiro lent me a fine book on the effect of music on human beings: Music and the Mind by Anthony Storr. I'll buy a copy for Leander.

Wednesday, June 30, 1993

Mr. and Mrs. Austin visited. They said that Morris sent them a Christmas card showing all ten children and asked to buy their land, offering a price. We have a maniac as a neighbor. Will he gobble us up, too? Will he populate the road with six-acre subdivisions? I'm beginning to see why people feel the impulse to commit murder.

Trimmed the lilac bush. Watered the seeded areas in the field; the new grass is growing nicely. Sent out vetting forms for the newly arrived journal articles. I'm actually quite caught up now. Went with Shapiros to the Meadowmount faculty recital: Brahms' violin sonata op. 11 no. 4, Mendelssohn's piano trio op. 66 in C minor. All performed with gusto, of course. The Brahms is the same one that Deanna and Leander did at Bethlehem. Actually, Leander plays more clearly than David Garvey, the Meadowmount pianist, who is older. The violinist superb: Debra Moree. A propos of Leander, Alec remarked that not a single one of the performers had a Ph.D.; all had the masters as their terminal degree.

Thursday, July 1, 1993

I've been practicing piano—von Weber—in the morning, while fresh. I suppose I'd better start Kazantzakis today. I'm more eager about mowing the north field.

Friday, July 2, 1993

Yasuo and Naoko Takahashi arrived with a Japanese friend, Noriko, just graduated from Stony Brook. Very lively, and insisted on speaking Greek! (She'd been to Greece and fell in love with it.) We had lovely music, especially the Beethoven op. 18, no. 1 quartet, with me playing the cello part on the piano. And it sounded beautiful. Played until 11:00 p.m.

Saturday, July 3, 1993

Invited Irv and Fran and Laura and Michael to hear music. Did Shostakovich, Bach, and the Beethoven op. 18 no. 1, first movement, all credibly, without getting stuck. But apparently I counted out loud so audibly that everyone heard. No matter.

Fixed a place in the barn to place the old Turkish refrigerator when the new Sears one arrives next Friday.

Wrote a long letter to Grant Thompson. John Tallmadge wrote last week the surprising news that Grant is gay and that his marriage is in great difficulty. He's probably going to lose his job at the Wilderness Foundation. Poor guy. Hope to see him at Thanksgiving when we're in D.C.

Sunday, July 4, 1993

Started translating the Kazantzakis letters finally, resuming when I'd left off in mid-sentence in London last March. It's very tedious. I'd rather mow.

Thursday, July 8, 1993

Hanover

Jean's evaluation went very well. It was humane and constructive. John Diffey makes a tremendous difference. Afterwards: Task Force. I again complained about "reasonable cost" in the mission statement. Lunch and supper with Mother, who is in fine shape.

Friday, July 9, 1993

Sears delivered the new refrigerator. Very exciting. The old one (the Turkish one) is now in the barn as an auxiliary.

Visited Perrymans after supper. Long talk with Heinz about degeneration of moral values in families and the work force in Glens Falls. It's appalling. Art's sister Diana looks spiffy on horseback. Then to Vince Tortora's to see Don Kurka, who is visiting. He's retired from Tennessee, lives in Florida, and is doing visitorships in various institutes and universities around the world. His landscapes are in great demand. Tom Akstens, who bought Don's houses, came also. He's a 1960s product, English lit Ph.D., who never got a job; went into the "music business," then desired to return to literature, and luckily got a part-time job in Sienna College. His specialty is the theater of Artaud. Also fly-fishing. Nice man. We all gabbed until 11:30 p.m. and returned exhausted. Tried my fax; found that it had been "fried" by the lightning surge that struck the house on Thursday when we were in Hanover.

Saturday, July 10, 1993

To Barton Mines for a tour. The guide was Peter Barton himself, a very handsome, self-assured, articulate "aristocrat" about 40 years old. Perfect social graces. He explained how his great-great(-great) grandfather emigrated from England to Philadelphia. He was a jeweler and occasionally people brought him garnets they'd found in the North Creek area to grind. He married, and his father-in-law manufactured sandpaper and was looking for a better abrasive. Barton, grinding the garnet, experienced how hard it was. He investigated in the North Creek area and ended up by buying 50,000 acres at 10 cents an acre—the whole Gore Mountain. When the mine started, a man would hold a diamond-tipped rod while another hit it with a sledge hammer until they'd make a hole in the rock sufficiently deep for a charge of dynamite. He took us to the huge pit that is now abandoned. It lasted about 100 years. Garnets everywhere on the ground, still. We collected some as bibelots. Then he took us up on the lip of the excavation, where the family has converted its former home to an inn with ski-touring trails. We could see out across the mountains all the way to Killington in Vermont. Finally we went to a reclamation site where, little by little, with difficulty, they're inducing grass and trees to grow on the tailings: the refuse that the mine deposited for 100 years. Interesting how these environmental niceties are now "motherhood," accepted by Barton as obviously the correct thing to do.

Returned and started to mow, but soon the knife bar broke, near the ball. Metal fatigue. Thus I have a broken mower and a broken fax machine at the moment. Raked mown hay and moved it into the garden, which now looks very civilized. Grilled steak on the outdoor fire for supper.

Monday, July 12, 1993

To Bud Rodick for a new knife section for the mower—only \$65.00. The mechanic who helped me turned out to be Pete Hyde, Bill Hyde's son, very friendly. Asked about Alec, etc. People have long memories around here. It seems I need to break things on the mower in order to learn its intricacies. The blade was not traveling freely; that's probably why it broke. It needs  $\frac{1}{64}$ " clearance laterally and  $\frac{1}{32}$ " vertically. I did my best to provide this, and everything seems to work better.

Tuesday, July 13, 1993

Gary, Wendy, Marcus, and Katie McGinn came for picnic supper with another boy, a family friend. Wendy, especially, is very articulate and impassioned about "Christ." She apparently was a bit of an alcoholic. Gary's father died at age 52 of drink, and she came from an alcoholic family, too. She was saved from all this by Christ; more specifically, by the bible, where she now finds all wisdom and guidance, e.g. in the Book of Proverbs. They send the children to a fundamentalist school, ditto for the visiting boy. No, he's educated at home, as were Marcus and Katie until recently. Gary worries (as he should) about the breakdown of family values, and they all try to restore those values with Christ's help. Why not? Especially when they're aware of abuses—Baker, for example, and other hypocrites making millions from the faithful.

Wednesday, July 14, 1993

Rosine Gardner came at 8:00 p.m. I retreated upstairs and read the TLS!

Thursday, July 15, 1993

Finished vetting the Bohandy submission on Plath and Anghelaki-Rooke for JMGS in the morning. Then went with Irv and Fran to Saratoga to see Balanchine's "Jewels." The costumes are spectacular: first emerald, then ruby, then diamond. The Fauré "Emeralds" very static but elegant. In one of the numbers the dancers never did more than walk. Balanchine was very daring. The Stravinsky "Rubies" was the best because of the score, also the more modern-style dancing, especially by Damian Woetzel. The Tchaikovsky "Diamonds," with the girls in tutus, was more traditional, with Darci Kistler and Lindsey Fischer, very accomplished. Not the best program we've ever seen at Saratoga, but a tribute to Balanchine's versatility. . . . Went with Irv, Fran, Chrysanthi, and Evelyn Greene. Picnic first, supper at Stan's afterward.

Friday, July 16, 1993

Tom Wood arrived in mid-afternoon and talked non-stop until bedtime, pleasantly. He's an eccentric, full of gossip; seems to live in terms of others, the scores of teachers, headmasters, trustees, etc., etc. that he has known. He is now retired finally at the age of 62! But he is active on the Haverford Board and in Haverford's campaign. Very grateful to Haverford. Very cynical about Quakers. Revealed that Quaker schools used to have quotas against Jews, and that when Friends General Board refused to allow entry of black students, Anna Harvey Jones walked out, a move that made the board reconsider. He continues to be very partial toward Alec, of course, which is nice. We treated him to "stringers" (three parts our wines, one part crème de menthe) afterwards. At 8:30 Fred Hitchcock came with both daughters and wife. Daughter Heather wants to consider Dartmouth and do pre-med and become a pediatrician. Couldn't get her to say a word all night, perhaps because her parents were present. Poor thing, she probably will never be accepted by Dartmouth.

Saturday, July 17, 1993

Tom left after lunch. We mowed and collected hay, sprucing up for the wedding. Supper at the Narrows with pizza and (of course) hot fudge sundae to celebrate our 38th anniversary. Neither Chrysanthi nor I is very romantic about such things. But it was nice to get Mother's gift of $3800.

Sunday, July 18, 1993

Finished mowing the field in back of the pond and around the pond, and collected the hay in Alec's truck in the morning, with a couple of loads donated to Art Perryman's new horses. Read galley proof for the journal in the afternoon, and trimmed off dead branches of the cherry tree by the fireplace. . . . All caught up on the TLS. Daphne telephoned from Deanna's house in Maryland. She's going to spend a few days there; wants to get to know Deanna better. Then to NYC, then to us.

Monday, July 19, 1993

Alec is in Wooster appearing before a Massachusetts certification board to be certified to teach in public schools, after twelve years and two MA's! Chrysanthi and I creosoted a section of log in his cabin that had been invaded by ants. She and he still think that his alopecia resulted from creosote. I'm doing Galani-Montafis's part 2 for the journal now, trying to convert her "English." What a chore!

Tuesday, July 20, 1993

Out with Aser and Evelyn Rothstein for a fancy dinner at Renée's, the place where Pappou and Yiayia had the Buseck children in 1968 when Peter and Alice were caught in the Russian invasion of Prague. Aser is retired from Children's Hospital in Toronto but is still active in a biotech company there that is run by his son. He explained with his accustomed lucidity the current project. Many new therapies are actually bodily hormones that can now be synthesized and thus given in large doses as cures. But the body's regulatory mechanism reduces these doses, bringing the level down to the normal one for that hormone and thus invalidating the cure. What Aser's company is doing is adding a molecule to the original hormone (a protein) in a way that allows it to function in a creative way in the body yet "fools" the regulatory system. They've been successful in the test tube and will now begin experiments with animals. It will be a most important advance if they're successful. . . . The cystic fibrosis research is also progressing. The gene can now be located in foetuses, which can then be aborted. Evelyn's grandson, a cellist, was in the Mary Watt workshop at Kinhaven and was thrilled when Leander took over the piano part in their trio (from his Moravian student, who couldn't manage).

Wednesday, July 21, 1993

More social life. Earlier: finished Montafis (thank God) and also finished clearing the brush away from the little triangle of birch trees next to Alec's corduroyed patch of road. Then Milly and Jack Adler came with the Shapiros. Jack has metastasized prostate cancer and warned me that PSA 65 is very high and I shouldn't trust an internist but should see a urologist. He looks very aged. But he's doing marvelous sculpture in stone and wood and clay, graceful and imaginative. Also, Sharon, after bouts of unemployment plus another failed relationship, just got a three-year contract as art teacher at $35,000 a year. This, plus sculpting, gives Jack a raison d'être now, after his long service helping people as a social worker. Milly vivacious, as always, and very productive as an artist. Our annual ritual of dining together is meaningful to both parties. Chris and Art joined us later, and Art regaled us with "troopers' memories" and also a description of his relationship with a man in Wevertown who has Lou Gehrig's disease. But he isn't sketching or sculpting very much. Horses come first, it seems.

The NiMo crew arrived at 6:00 a.m. and worked steadily until 4:00 p.m. The corridor beneath the telephone poles is now cleared of wood and looks lovely. I'm thinking of sowing it with wildflower seeds.

Thursday, July 22, 1993

Had a modular telephone jack installed downstairs, which means that our "antique" wall telephone, a rotary, can now be replaced by a modern push-button "tone" instrument, fax, whatever. Another move toward modernity. Chrysanthi hung the old phone on the wall as an object d'art.

To Saratoga to meet Alec at the Hall of Springs and then attend another session of the Balanchine celebration.

I learned a new word the other day: shill. I had described Alan Hunt to Tom Wood and his response was: "He's a shill!" The dictionary says: "an accomplice of a hawker, gambler, or swindler who begins to buy as a come-on to the crowd." I mentioned this last night and of course Irv knew it. "Haven't you ever read Damon Runyon?" he proclaimed.

The ballet was scintillating. We were all so moved. Again Balanchine's genius is absolutely astonishing: how one person could imagine "Stars and Stripes," "Agon" (with Stravinsky) and "Viennese Waltzes"!

Dinner at the Hall of Springs previously. Alec in jacket and tie, having returned from his certification exam in Massachusetts (he passed). I reported how pleased I was with the change the NiMo crew had effected beneath the power line. We now have a meadow instead of a wasteland.

Drove directly to Hanover, arriving at 2:00 a.m. Stopped twice by policemen, once for not coming to a full stop at a blinking red light (no ticket), then for going 40 mph in a Woodstock zone of 25 mph, resulting in a ticket and fine of $89.00.

Friday, July 23

Hanover-Holderness

Bought a new fax to replace the one "fried" by lightning. Long lunch with Marty Sherwin and Jack Shepherd. Marty wants to lay down both War/Peace courses next year in order to plan well for the future and come up with something new. I'll convene the Steering Committee early in the fall and let him present his ideas. Wrote at length to John Baker about all our troubles.

Drove to Holderness, to the Minary Center on Squam Lake. So beautiful! Good session with all present introducing themselves. Then a sumptuous supper. Then the initial session of our Kendal board retreat concentrating chiefly on charitableness, whether the corporation can "tax" residents for charitable purposes or whether all funds must be contributed.

Saturday, July 24, 1993

Minary Center

Started with a half-hour Meeting for Worship. Barbara Gilbert wanted to speak, she told me afterwards, but didn't. She wanted to repeat her father's quoting of a Chinese proverb when he finished his fifteen years as head of the YMCA in Ceylon: "If you think of one year, plant rice. If you think of five years, plant a tree. If you think of forever, educate a person." That's our real business at Kendal.

Morning session, facilitated by Crosby Deaton, on the twin topics of Quaker values as applied (a) to staff, (b) to residents. The most controversial was my suggestion of peer adjudication in cases of dismissal or discipline, even when we compromised by making the proposed “Grievance Panel” merely advisory to either the Overseers or the administrator. The group could not come to closure on this, although some seemed open to it, including David French (very much) and Margery Walker (moderately).

The afternoon was less controversial, as we enumerated criteria for deciding on charitable activity. At one point the meaning of “charitable” was questioned, and I responded by reminding folks that St. Paul’s “charity” in I Corinthians is a mistranslation for “love.” Love is the free giving of oneself without expectation of recompense. It is “grace.” Regarding the criteria, the one that did divide the group was Brent Edgerton’s suggestion that we should not restrict ourselves to the elderly but should be especially eager to help the education of children. Amen, but some objected.

3:00 to 6:00 was “R & R.” Chrysanthi, John Radebaugh, and I took a canoe down the lake and saw a loon and chick (all fuzzy brown) very close up.

The evening session was a sort of recapitulation. What have we learned? How should this be applied? What should be done first, etc.? Among what we have learned the most memorable was: We’ve learned that all of us, working together, can be more creative than any single group working alone.

Sunday, July 25, 1993

Ministry Center

After a huge breakfast, we settled into writing the epistle. Crosby went through all the previous agenda and folks decided whether each item was a recommendation (meaning agreement, a sense of the meeting), a suggestion (meaning lack of agreement), or a reinforcement of an already existing policy or program. I acted as recording clerk, typing away on my Powerbook. Then they recessed for a half hour while I prepared the epistle as best I could, managing most of it. The final exhortation, thank goodness, had been written in advance by Lynmar Brock. The epistle was read and approved, after which we settled immediately into worship. I ministered about Christianity’s monism versus the dualism that separates flesh and spirit, business and religion, and expressed my satisfaction at our proceedings, which had acted monistically on the supposition that the spirit can be enhanced through proper business principles and actions.

Afterwards, people were very gracious about the conclusion of the epistle, and even sang “For he’s a jolly good fellow to me,” led by Lynmar with John Radebaugh on the harmonica. At lunch we did the same for the cooks, and I and others thanked Crosby for a superb job. At 2:00 p.m., sated with fellowship and good feelings, we all departed.

Picked up Mother, raced to West Lebanon to get a new answering machine, departed westward, eating at “Leander’s diner” in Rutland. Home at 10:30 p.m.

Tuesday, July 27, 1993

Alice and Lori arrived and stayed for supper. Alice and Alec practiced the Bartok duet they’ll play.

Wednesday, July 28, 1993

Finished JMGS galleys finally, with several proofs arriving at the last minute via fax. What a relief! Right this minute the caterer is setting up the tent for Lori’s wedding. Daphne arrives tonight, as do the rest of the Busecks. Alec, alas, is preparing to leave immediately after the wedding.

Chrysanthi and I are unhappy about the new à la carte meal plan at Kendal. It should have been brought to the Overseers. I’ve written to Jean to put it on the September agenda.

Various Busecks are here, settled at Son Rise on Schroon Lake. We went over for supper at 7:00 and were finally served at 8:30. But then it was pleasant. Shapiros came, too. The best conversation was between Irv and Tim Alsberg, who’s been in Japan for years and regaled us with an account of his visit to China. Also spoke with Sharon, Lori’s friend from the Peace Corps in Sierra Leone.

Picked up Daphne from the bus before going to Son Rise. She’s been in NYC, taking to Fred Hills, who is very discouraged with the infighting at Simon and Schuster. Daphne found Manhattan attractive and exhilarating. She’s obviously had great trouble adjusting to British culture. She says that they never say what they mean, they’re incapable of making decisions, etc.

Thursday, July 29, 1993

Long talk with Daphne and Alec over a three-hour breakfast. Fax from Dimitri regarding Maria. They’re consulting a Cypriot doctor who works in Jerusalem. Wanted us to help draft a tactful letter to Dr. Pritchard in London. This doctor says that Maria has under 10% chance of survival, but they want to try the treatment he recommends. In the afternoon I jacked up the henhouse and put skids under it and pulled it up to Alec's cabin. Everything went well until one side banged into a tree and broke apart some of the cross-bracing on the skids. But we fixed that and managed to get it into place finally behind Alec's house, finishing work at 7:30 p.m. Then had a birthday dinner for Alec: stuffed peppers with yogurt, and the "traditional" wild blueberry pie. Then to Son Rise to the Buseck clan. Long talk with Roy, Amy's husband, about his French clients. They bought 717 Madison Avenue, where Daphne lived, for $64,000 in 1953—a bank foreclosure. It's now worth $10,000,000. They keep these investments because of fear that, as aristocrats, they'll be forced out of France at some point. So all the profits from this and other properties stay deposited in dollar accounts in the U.S. Clive arrived yesterday by private plane and his aged parents arrived today. So did David and Linda Buseck, and others whom I don't know. . . . Returned at 11:30 and stayed up until 12:30 doing blitz mail and faxes.

Friday, July 30, 1993

Another long breakfast, 7:30 to 10:30, with Daphne. Last night didn't have to urinate even once, which often happens after a day of very hard work (same happens to Irv). Weather report for the wedding is not encouraging: showers today and tomorrow, and thunderstorms.

Buseck clan arrived for a rehearsal. People swarming all over irked me. Talent show in the evening, with Alec and Alice playing Bartok, Linda clowning.

Saturday, July 30, 1993

The wedding

Thirty-five cars on the north field. Eighty people on the south field seated in front of a "chuppah." Lori and Peter came from the Guest House, Clive from my office. It was a beautiful service, with a wonderful Jesuit deacon officiating. He emphasized the public nature of marriage and the joining of traditions. He explained the symbolism of the chuppah (household), the rings (circle = perfection, gold = imperishability), the breaking of the glass (the end of everything old in their lives). David Buseck played the flute; that was so simple and so effective. As I told the officiant afterwards, the service was dignified without being at all stuffy. And how nice that the deacon had known Clive since their childhood together in the boy scouts. Afterwards, a sumptuous catered banquet under the tent by our pond, served by waiters in tuxedos. Champagne, a full, beautiful meal; tablecloths, silver—the works! Very different for Terpni. Roy and Amy sat at our table. Nice to talk to them. Long talk afterwards with Henry Stern, former Commissioner of Parks under Mayor Koch. He says that Clinton is a fraud, although he voted for him. They all left at about 6:00 p.m. finally. We went to the Narrows for pizza and hot fudge sundaes, Alec's "last supper."

Sunday, August 1, 1993

Alec left in the morning, sadly, driving to Washington to leave his truck there for Leander. Chrysanthi wept, but recovered quickly afterwards. We got her started on a jigsaw puzzle.

Monday, August 2, 1993

Greg finished the mowing. Και του χρόνου! Danny Danforth telephoned about Zachariadis's rebuttal of Karakasidou on Macedonia. He is opposed to printing it, but Iatrides is in favor and I am in the middle. Busecks all here for supper. My routines have collapsed. Haven't practiced the piano for a week at least. But I did do some translating of letters today, at least. Greg explained his work to Peter Buseck. At one point in London he closed a deal for one billion dollars in twenty seconds! The minimum that Goldman handles is ten million.

Tuesday, August 3, 1993

Raquette Lake

Our annual canoe trip, beautifully scouted, planned, and executed by Irv. Greg, Daphne, Laura Gouthreau, Susie Buseck, Chrysanthi, and I. We put in at Raquette Lake Village, paddled in the lake and into the river, ate a picnic lunch on top of a huge rock, continued on to the carry, seeing a blue heron in flight just above us, negotiated the carry with Irv's carriage wheels (the carry is where the Morgans, Durants, etc. built the world's shortest railroad, to take them across and thence into Blue Mountain Lake), and reached the spot where we had left my car, which was then used to fetch the other two cars at the village. Beautifully arranged. About six miles of paddling. But I didn't feel tired, just a bit "exposed" to wind and weather. Chrysanthi sat queen-like in the middle but also paddled a bit. Ditto for Fran, who enjoyed her inactivity.

After showers we met the Busecks again and all went to the Narrows, including Henry Stern and his son. Peter and Alice seem much more reconciled to Clive. Peter enthused about Clive's friends and his skill in electronics.

The tent was removed. We are slowly getting back to normal.

Wednesday, August 4, 1993

Irv gave me a Times Book Review piece by Donald Hall (August 1, 1993, p. 3). Donald is mortally ill, apparently, and in thinking about his impending death he writes: "It is not grief that one feels for oneself but dread of the grief of others. . . . Mostly I feel . . . black sadness that my daily routine must conclude: no more glancing through the Boston Globe early in the morning while drinking black coffee; no more bodily love; no more working at the desk all day—the long engagement with language, which I adore as a sculptor loves wood or clay, as a musician melody and tempo . . ."

I felt that he spoke for me, especially in the words about language. And this morning, translating Kazantzakis's letter to Prevelakis of 6 November 1956 (400 Γράμματα, σελ. 713, I encountered something similar, but specifically about translating, in this case Homer's Odyssey: Τι χαρά να δουλεύεις τη γλώσσα μας προσπαθώντας να φτάσεις ν' αποδώσεις ένα τέτοιο πρότυπο!

This morning I practiced the piano again, the first time in weeks, it seems. Good sign of returning normalcy. At breakfast we gave Daphne and Greg their anniversary present: two paintings by Art Perryman, one of loons, the other of a mother bear and cubs, rustically framed—a reminder of Terpni. They were pleased. Right now they're repainting our two Adirondack chairs, last painted by Pappous. This afternoon Greg intends to practice his new skill taught by Chrysanthi: bread-making. Tonight we and Yiayia sup with the Shapiros. Then Greg and Chrysanthi will work on the jigsaw puzzle late into the night.

Thursday, August 5, 1993

Took Daphne and Greg to the bus. They're going to the races in Saratoga and then to SPAC. They return to London tomorrow. In late afternoon drove to Hanover with Yiayia and Chrysanthi. Yiayia's radio doesn't work; must attend to that. And her hearing is getting worse. Can't hear the telephone; must get an amplifier.

Friday, August 6, 1993

Outreach Committee. We go over and over the same material, it seems. Lafayette is still obsessed (“concerned”) with subsidized housing. I’d rather concentrate on Adult Day Care and/or on a coffeehouse for HIV positives, what Grant Thompson has done in Washington.

Saturday, August 7, 1993

Hanover–Tunbridge

Bought a new radio for Yiayia and a telephone amplifier. It’s nice to be able to care for her in these ways, electronically. Cleaned up the office . . . slightly. Then to Tunbridge to Martha De Cesare’s wedding. Saw Martin and Martha Meisel there. The house—Don Stewart’s “folly”—is at the top of a hill: 3.7 miles of steep dirt road. Rain obscured the magnificent view. Martha radiant and gorgeous. Ceremony very minimal: justice of the peace. Poems by Tennyson, Donne, T. S. Eliot. Lori’s was better, last week. Bagpipes droned away. Don S. and two other woodwinds played “incidental music.” Ellen looked worried. A former student of mine who’d done the acting program at A.R.T. said that A.R.T. is breaking up as a repertory group; no one wants to cooperate any more. It’s very evident. He also agreed with my assessment of Stephanie Roth as capable of playing only one role: Stephanie Roth! We were glad to leave before the dinner. Ate wonderful Ziti Luigi at Luigi’s on Route 4 and returned to the farm with relief.

Sunday, August 8, 1993

Terpni

Daphne telephoned from London. She has received her letter of acceptance to LSE. How nice! I wrote to Ambassador Barry about Alec. Also started revising last year’s translations of some Harkianakis poems.

Thom Gunn is a truly spectacular poet, a real superstar. His new book was reviewed superlatively in the Boston Review.

August 19, 1993

To Alec at North Jakarta International School:

Dear Alec,

Did Daphne get through to you? She was having trouble with the telephone earlier today. Apparently all seats are booked for flights your way during Christmastime, and she needs to discuss with you what to do. If you haven’t already spoken, could you try to reach her at home (44 71 584-1654)?

Leander is here and relaxing nicely. Deanna stayed two days, actually slept at night, and generally seemed more flexible about country living. She said in departing that she wished it had been longer.

I seeded the corridor beneath the new power line, using “bank mix” (mostly winter rye, to get something in there quickly) on the section north of our driveway and “conservation mix” (a better mixture, twice as expensive, mostly fescue, which is great for erosion control) on the section south of the driveway. I’ve purchased the wildflower seeds but they cannot be planted if there is danger of frost in the next eight weeks, so that means next spring. Immediately after the planting, it rained for two days, providentially.

Leander and I set the chicken house up on cement blocks and secured the loose siding boards. The floor is pretty well shot, but the rest of it isn’t in bad condition, and the whole is definitely salvageable. I also patched the roof; it will be fine until next season. . . . We also harrowed the bare spots around your cabin and planted conversation mix; ditto for the spot on the new road behind the pole barn. . . . The garden is now under control, with the blueberry section all weeded and mulched. Little by little, we’re closing up, alas.

Very nice evening with Mary and Maureen last night. And Leander and Mom just returned from three hours with the Gouthreaus. Donna was here yesterday, plus an old buddy of Carl Sibley’s whom I knew thirty years ago. Morris went to the Planning Commission last night to beg to be allowed a residence permit. I don’t know what happened. A moving van went up the road the other day, so I presume that the whole family is now in residence.

We’ll be here until Labor Day, as you know.

Love,
Dad

I put the tractor up on blocks, very easily. It’s sad to be closing up already, again. Leander leaves tomorrow. Tonight he and Deanna argued over the telephone. She accused him of abandoning her, it seems, in order to spend three days with us. She’s very selfish, and he seems to be the submissive member of the pair. I predicted to Chrysanthi that the marriage won't last more than five years. Θα δούμε . . . , as Kazantzakis says. But Leander has been more active in pursuing career opportunities in the DC area, with no result, of course. At least he doesn't seem depressed, as he was earlier in the year.

Telephoned Alec in Jakarta and the first thing he said was "I love my job." How nice! Daphne and Greg hope to visit him at Christmas.

August 20, 1993

Philadelphia

By plane to Philadelphia and then to Kendal. Long lunch with John Diffey discussing future priorities, Jean (whom he hopes to subject to a management training program to teach her consensual techniques, and what to do with the Epistle that staff in particular are complaining about—e.g., two religions. John doesn't sympathize. Rather than separate religious and business, as Brent and Debbie want, we should find more ways to combine them. Generally, John and I follow the same drummer, which is wonderful. Then: a long Mission Group meeting of the Task Force, commenting on the draft of the Strategic Plan. It seems that in the future our local board may become the legal board, in which case we'd really need to open it up to non-Quakers to get the necessary expertise.

August 23, 1993

It took me a long time to feel comfortable with Matthew Fox's The Coming of the Cosmic Christ, which at first seems so touchy-feely. But eventually I found him full of beautiful insights. For example, he defines worship superbly: "The essential role of worship is to link together microcosm and macrocosm once again in the context of thanksgiving or praise for our amazing (and therefore reverential) existence in the universe. Worship is the microcosm (humanity) giving thanks for the macrocosm (the universe and all its creative wonders)" (p. 213). He also appreciates Silence as a way of getting in touch with what there was before words. And he is scathing on the trivialization of worship that occurred in Protestant churches and in Catholic ones after Vatican II, where mystery is removed. I found as well that he articulates the problems John Diffey and I find in Jean Brophy. Ironically, she, a woman, exemplifies the hierarchical paternalism that Fox finds so destructive of cosmic consciousness—i.e., of a sense of the whole, beyond rationality. D. H. Lawrence, of course, said all this earlier, and I may be able to use Fox in my course on religion and literature. Interestingly, Wuthering Heights could be interpreted as a cry of anguish occasioned by the replacement of mystery by Protestant rationalism, etc.

Trouble yesterday with the Jari. Couldn't remove the oil drain plug. Called Dave Whitty this morning and he told me to use the extension in the socket set because this has the same square shape as the plug. I was using a monkey wrench and stripping the metal off the plug. Long telephone talk yesterday with Alec, who already had lunch with ten Indonesian graduates of Harvard, went to a disco with other teachers, etc. So far he finds the job exhilarating. Also a long talk with James McBride (Brittles), who telephoned to get Leander's telephone number. His first musical is about to go on tour. His second was produced in Tokyo. He kept assuring me that Leander is really an exceptional musician, both as pianist and composer, and he's sure that he'll find his niche once again. Let's hope.

August 25, 1993

I sent this to Leander today:

Dear Leander,

As you are about to move into your huge, awesome house, I encountered this letter written by Kazantzakis to his translator and friend B. Knös. It speaks for itself. As the Greeks say, «καλορίζικο» (“good rooting”).

Here's what Kazantzakis had to say in his letter, dated January 8, 1954:

My dear friend,

My wife sends you warm greetings; she is busy all day long with the new house. The carpenters are working, my office is being made ready, in April we hope to move in. It's a shame that you're not with us to celebrate. Seeing the little house being constructed, sometimes I think of the words of a Muslim ascetic of the tenth century: “Why don't you, too, build a house?” he was asked. “Because,” he replied, “an oracle told me that I will live only seven hundred years. So, is it worth the trouble to build a house for such a short period?”

As for me, an oracle told me that I'll live 83 years; yet I have the naïveté and impudence to build a house!

August 26, 1993

Something in Kazantzakis's letter to Knös of 9 September 1952 seems to apply directly to me, and I copy it here: Είμαι βέβαιος θα δουλέψατε καλά στο νησάκι της Βαλτικής κι θα ξαναβρήκατε στο σπίτι Σου τώρα τον άγιο ρυθμό της σιωπηλής κι αφιλόκαρδης εργασίας.

August 27, 1993

Jolly three-hour supper at the Copperfield with Mary and Maureen. Laughter! Laughter! Despite our consensus that the world gets continually worse.

I sent the following letter to Burt Pike:

Dear Burt,

I finally got to read "Harry Levin: An Appreciation," which has been stacked in my "miscellaneous pile" for several months. (Sometimes I feel like a goat; I spend my life eating paper, one pile after the next.) In any case, I appreciated it more than I had expected, not because I was ever close to Harry Levin personally or professionally but because I found in your appreciation of his raison d'être as a critic a very helpful articulation of my own position all these years.

But does one dare to stand up in public and declare oneself akin to Arnold, Saintsbury, Sainte-Beuve, or F. R. Leavis, without appearing comical? Can one talk any more about shoring up our fragments and handing on the intellectual heritage, as Levin does, invoking T. S. Eliot, of course, without being accused of patriarchy or worse? Can one even assert that language refers to the empirical world and is not just a system of self-reflexive signs? In sum, is it still possible to be a humanistic critic?

I hope so, although I also know, and to some degree honor, the opposing arguments. That is why I particularly like what you call Levin's "skeptical pluralism," which approaches the task of reading "from a moral base but on the experimental rather than the authoritarian model," refusing to "embrace one partisan viewpoint to the exclusion of all others." As I think about my own position over the years, it seems to conform to this skeptical pluralism: always standing on a moral base but never excluding even those who deny that a moral base is possible. Perhaps I've read too much Thomas Mann to be able to go through life without being constantly ironic. So I was not surprised when, near the end of the appreciation, you call Levin an “ironic seeker.” That is very nice indeed.

As you can see, your article meant much more to me than I had ever expected. Many thanks!

Sunday, August 29, 1993

Spent almost the entire day vetting the Kendal Employees Handbook, and sending suggestions to Pam Gile and Jean. Let’s see if they follow any.

Some young man from Warrensburg came asking if they could take wood piled in the clearing on Waddell Road, belonging to Alec. Birch. I said Yes. And in return, as a favor, they took down a large pine that had already engulfed the telephone line and would have reached the electric lines next year.

I’ve been pulling up raspberry bushes round the garden fence. Must do a new fence next year.

Stylianos won his case against the Patriarch of Jerusalem. The Synod decided in Stylianos’s favor and condemned the other one. I sent Stylianos a new batch of poems a few weeks ago. Have yet to hear from him.

Leander moved into his new house yesterday. The neighbors already want their children to take violin (not piano) lessons.

August 30, 1993

Letter to Tom Luxon:

Dear Tom,

I finally read your interesting chapter on Bunyan vs. Burrough regarding “other men’s words.” It was in one of many piles that I “consume” little by little. (I sometimes feel like a goat, eating paper all day long—but at least the result in this case will not be little black droppings but this letter: more paper!)

Having examined the Quaker attitude toward “words, the Word, and wordlessness,” I was extremely interested to learn from your chapter that the problem was not confined to Quakers and that it was shared by Bunyan, although his solution was different. I very much admired the way, slowly and deftly, you directed your argument so that a theological discussion led eventually to a literary discovery that allegory was the solution. (Too bad that all these divines, and lots of fundamentalist Christians today, didn't/don't consider Scripture, too, to be allegory!) Of course, early Quakers, like Bunyan, although they did include Scripture in the category of inauthentic words unless it was read or heard "in the Spirit" (as you well describe), often used its "other men's words" when convenient—they had their cake and ate a bit of it, too. But then, and today also, of course, they were/are all too human, and precisely what the Spirit is, and how it manifests itself through words or through silence, remains the big question. Yet in theory, at least, Quakers are clear that, in your language, what matters "is something non-linguistic, even unutterable, a kind of pre-linguistic 'groan' neither uttered nor heard . . . [filling] the gap between words and intention, between what one speaks and what is in one's heart." (That is so well said!) What happens in practice (and I have experienced this both in others and in myself) is what you describe as Bunyan hearing the Word "breaking in upon him, assaulting him." What does not happen in liberal Quakerism any more (but did happen in the past, I'm sure) is the experience of Christ as, again in your fine description, the "'hole' in Scriptural words which permits one to pass through 'other men's words' to being in the Word itself, in the allegory which has been redefined as reality." Too bad. That lack leaves a big "gap" in Quakerism, but not a creative, pregnant sort of gap—not a whole, just a hole.

As you see, I've found all this very stimulating. Thanks for letting me see it. I hope that the book, by now, is firmly on its way to being published.

Sincerely,

Three ducks were in the pond this morning.

August 31, 1993

This morning four ducks were in the pond, swimming in formation. Leaves are beginning to turn and fall.

Last evening we paid our courtesy call to the Morrises, carrying a loaf of bread and tomatoes. It's 1½ miles from our house on a miserable road. The house, all cedar on the outside, with a huge garage, a deck facing the (weed-choked) beaver pond, is ¼ finished, it seems. Mrs. Joan Morris greeted us pleasantly and introduced three of the children, the three going to school (despite, it seems, Morris's declaration to keep them at home because they'd be persecuted by children of Planning Board members). He was there but never appeared. On the way to the property we saw no fewer than three chains that could be secured to block the road at various points. The Segalob property he bought is already posted "No trespassing." What a fiasco! But the wife and children seem very nice.

Later, Chrysanthi went to folk dancing and Don Greene gave her copies of the psychotic letters Morris wrote to Bill Thomas, the judge, and all Planning Board members after they voted against him owing to sprinklers. He compares himself to Gandhi and Martin Luther King, opposing unjust laws. Poor devil! His paranoia reminds one of the psychotic student Steve Scher and I had.

Letter from Tziovas. He wants to hold an international symposium in Birmingham in 1995 or 1996 in my honor. On Greek modernism. I'm touched. But the Macedonian mess is getting worse for JMGS. Received yesterday a fifty-page rebuttal of Karakasidou that I really do not want to print.

My memoir of Kimon Friar came out in the first issue of Odyssey Magazine in Athens. I'm glad. Kimon deserves remembrance, and who else will do it?

September 1, 1993

Two deer grazing morning and evening by the pond. Full moon tonight creating a fairyland of design in the illuminated clouds. Chrysanthi very excited by this, and also by To the Lighthouse, which she just finished. I finished another year of Kazantzakis letters: 1951. I'm going backwards. When 1950 is done I'll have completed the huge loose-leaf list that I brought to the farm for this purpose.

Pulled up raspberry canes by the garden fence. Need new fence next year.

September 2, 1993

Marvelous passage in Kazantzakis's letter to Prevelakis of 28 February 1950, very appropriate for me. He was thinking of his birthday:

Τι ευτυχία να 'σαι καλά, να 'χεις ήσυχη κι αγαθή τη ψυχή σου και να 'χεις ένα σκοπό που η πραγμάτωσή του να κρέμεται μονάχα από σένα, και κάθε μέρα να κάνεις ένα βήμα ομπρός και ν' ανηφορίζεις! 65 τώρα χρόνια πάω κι έρχομαι και σεργιανίζω στο σκοτεινό μουντρούμι, με τα δυο παραθυράκια που το λένε άνθρωπος, και κοιτάζω από τα παραθυράκια τον κόσμο και δεν τον αποχορταίνω. Δεν ξέρω πόσο καιρό θα βαστάξει αυτή η ευτυχία κι η δύναμη κι η γονιμότητα, μα κάνω σα να 'ταν να βαστάξει αιώνια· γιατί ξέρω τι θα πει αιωνιότητα. Είναι ποιότητα, δεν είναι ποσότητα—αυτό 'ναι το μεγάλο, πολύ απλό μυστικό.

Visited Perrymans in the evening. They now have six horses. Art showed how he trains the Arab mare that's never been ridden. Very tender. He talks to it, kisses it, strokes it, becomes its friend. But all this is an excuse to keep from doing painting and sculpting. I once again tried to encourage him to put art first.

In this town, everyone seems to hate everyone else. I'm glad we don't live here. You need to be in a clique. We, as seasonal, cross various cliques. When we hear people maligning others, we keep mum, don't say that we're friends with these devils.

September 3, 1993

Shapiros for supper with Don and Evelyn Greene. Spent almost the whole time talking about Morris. Don knows the whole story all too well, thinks he's a first-class skunk, a liar, manipulator, etc., although he may be activated by mental illness, paranoia and the like rather than by totally self-conscious connivance and evil. There's more of Kafka here probably than of Shakespeare's Iago.

Saturday, September 4, 1993

Finished all the letters I'd brought to do this summer: 1950 to 1957. Closed up my office, alas.

September 5, 1993

Closing. But spent most of the day building a little cabinet to place next to the sink in the bathroom. Also practiced von Weber a whole hour. I really cannot play it fully up to tempo.

Read Robert Greenleaf's pamphlet "Old Age, the Ultimate Test of the Spirit." Excellent for me and for everyone. The test is two-fold: (1) to look back and know that one has served, (2) to continue to serve in old age no matter how limited by health. But in old age he stopped serving in the usual ways. He says: "I came to accept [that] I can best serve by being." And by meditating: "Somehow the quiet and peace of anyone's meditation communicates and enriches the culture." He says that in old age we should learn to transcend the past and not to worry about the future. “There is only now”—“to achieve living in the present moment.” The other major theme is preparation for old age: and not to keep doing what one did before but rather to do things that are appropriate for old age, and to start doing them “while one still has the energy.” Amen.

Sunday, September 19, 1993

Hanover

Very rich Meeting this morning, enkindled by Rhea McKay speaking about thankfulness. Then lunch with Yiayia at Kendal and with Lori and Clive, who spent the weekend with Yiayia. Beginning to enjoy Clive. He’s taken my Minolta fax machine to try to fix it.

These (almost) two weeks in Hanover have been very social: Trix, Chuck, Sheila for supper; lunch with Ned and Dick, etc. Haven’t looked at any Kazantzakis letters. But played von Weber with Dick and Allan last Wednesday and it sounded rather good.

Yesterday in NYC for MGSA Executive to get help with the mess arising from Tasoula Karakasidou’s article on Macedonia. They feel I should print the Zahariadis response but in a much shortened form. I was fortunate afterwards to get a ticket to Twyla Tharp’s dance troupe at the City Center. She’s extraordinary. So vital and creative, and articulate in speech as well as movement (she answered questions from the audience). Marvelous new ballet that we had a preview of (excerpted from Demeter and Persephone, with running commentary by Tharp).

Started reading Kierkegaard again on aesthetic, ethical, religious. It’s so deep and enduring, a much better description of the human psyche than provided by Freud.

September 24, 1993

Poor Panos Rodis poured out his misery to me yesterday. He and Karen are separated; he’s left the amazing house he built with his two hands and she is occupying it with the Russian student who is her lover, the student who threatened to kill a previous girlfriend and was suspended from Dartmouth for a year. And they have two rifles in the house. Pano has the two girls five days a week, living in one room, sleeping in a triple-decker bunk bed. He is teaching four courses. How will he survive? He sleeps five hours maximum. Karen takes the girls on weekends. He thinks she’s severely ill mentally and will crack up in a month. He contemplates divorce, not saving the marriage. Says he got married because Karen was pregnant. The whole thing is horrible. He slowed and gave up his education so that she could have the Dartmouth job, and now he's out on the street.

Dinner with John and Mary Rassias, second time in a week, and they're coming to Kendal with us on Sunday. The friendship seems to be healed. At least he's trying, but is it genuine or because of the testimonial I was asked to write for him for a teaching prize of $25,000?!

Saturday, October 9, 1993

Finished Matthew Fox's Creative Spirituality with great admiration. Such a bright, articulate voice arising out of (what Fox calls) the moribund "official" church. His "panentheism" is Kazantzakian. His wisdom extends beyond the narrowly theological. An example appropriate for me right now is: ". . . the key to middle-class life is work and education. Indeed, we could define the middle class's role as (1) educating itself for work; (2) working; and (3) recovering from work" (p. 139).

A propos, last Tuesday, October 5, I discussed with Dean of Faculty James Wright my enrolling in the Flexible Retirement Option (FRO), and I sent in a letter afterwards to initiate the process. My FRO would begin July 1, 1994 and I'd officially retire on June 30, 1997 at age 67. So, after this year, and a full 1994-95, I hope to begin "recovering from work" in earnest.

Since September 24:

September 29. War/Peace Steering Committee meeting, the first with Marty Sherwin, the new director of the Dickey Endowment. Ray Hall will rescue College Course 2 by cross-listing it with his sociology seminar. But we decided to lay down College Course 1 despite pleas from Alan Rozycki. We hope to design a new course with the help of visitors this spring, and a symposium on Peace Studies. Who is going to organize all this? Peter!

September 30. Met a charming and stimulating colleague, Randy Testa, who wrote a book about Amish nonviolence. We have so much in common.

October 2. Supper at Kendal with Mother and the Emlens, Kate's parents. Then to Bev Web's concert, with trepidation. But he played marvelously: two Chopin nocturnes and then the huge Fantasia in B-flat. What a treat! But poor Bev is becoming senile, wandering around not knowing where he is, and not remembering what he said a moment ago.

Yet he played all this Chopin from memory. Also (with music) Mendelssohn's Theme and Eight Variations (four-hands) with Franny, who is a terrible pianist but a wonderful human being.

Sunday, October 3. Ministry and Counsel. I'm participating a little more in Meeting now, all this (and more) as part of my "recovery from work." Also, have been practicing piano almost every morning for ½ hour.

October 6. Dimitris Yiannakos's little daughter, stricken with rhabdomyosarcoma, was operated on this morning in Thessaloniki, in a kind of desperation move, but successfully. Dimitris telephoned with the happy news: the entire tumor was resected without injury to internal organs. Partly responsible was the opinion of a specialist in Virginia that I arranged for, so I feel that I contributed somewhat. If she now lives it will truly be a miracle.

October 8. Breakfast with Jean planning the next meeting of the Overseers. Carol Weingeist, whom I mentioned, is still a very sore subject. Jean protests that she had nothing to do with Carol's dismissal, also that she was forbidden to say anything beforehand about her poor performance, etc. True? Regarding outreach, I spoke last week to Alan Rozycki, who would like to make the Farm House a center for Physicians for Social Responsibility and similar groups. He will present his case to the committee next week. The Task Force for a Five-Year Plan met in the afternoon with our document in its final stage (although very badly written). I filled it with red corrections.

Today, Saturday, October 9, I spent at home without leaving the house except to step outside for five minutes to take photos with my new Olympus camera of the two maple trees on Ledyard Lane that are like Moses's burning bush. Viewed with Chrysanthi a BBC dramatization of To the Lighthouse, so deep and moving. Finished Matthew Fox, as I said at the start of this retrospective entry.

Sunday, October 10, 1993

Another stirring Meeting, sparked by Tom Waring's agonizing recital of "living in the darkness" owing to Shirley's son's suicide and now her leukemia. Others spoke well in a complementary way. I ministered from Matthew Fox regarding the via negativa: that pain and loss are also a way toward God, complementing the creativity of the via positiva. We routinely ask to hold people in the light; perhaps we should also “hold people in the darkness”! Long business meeting afterwards.

Surprise telephone call from Shelagh and Geoffrey Ballard, and they came to our evening party with Tom and Nardi Campion and John and Karen Vournakis. Poor Tom is beginning to be forgetful, but Nardi is all there. What a pleasure to see the Ballards! Twenty-seven years, and both couples felt that we simply resumed the old conversation and relationship as though nothing had intervened. But much has intervened, for Geoff (who reminded me that he is the great nephew of Seebohm Rowntree—I’ll send him my summary of Rowntree’s book)—developed a large company in Vancouver, and has produced a marvelous new process to produce electricity from hydrogen and use it to drive a bus, resulting in zero pollution. We’ll hear more about this tomorrow.

Monday, October 11, 1993

The Ballards came over before breakfast and showed us the video picturing their demonstration bus driving through Vancouver. Also showed us the 2½ minutes they got on CNN. He is moving into Plan 2 now: a lighter bus with longer range. General Motors has been playing very dirty, attempting to sabotage his efforts to interest Los Angeles in his buses. I told him he should write a book about all this, perhaps co-authored, like Chuck Officer’s. I’d try to interest Fred Hills. Must show all this to Ned, also. Geoff will send a copy of the video when they get back home. We both noted that we’re both still married to the same woman. Rare occurrence!

Took them on a tour of Kendal after eating breakfast there.

Then to lunch with Robert Binswanger. He wrote a response to the Review Committee’s report recommending abolition of the Education Department and gave it to me yesterday for comments. It was so very badly written that I sat in front of my Powerbook at various free moments yesterday and redid the entire thing, finishing at 2:00 a.m. this morning. We discussed it at lunch and he’ll use my version, with some slight adjustments. It’s a pleasure to help friends in this way. Strange that such a capable man cannot write.

Karen Rodis blitzed me. She’d noticed that I’d “cut” her on the street the other day and wanted to protest that the blame for the dissolution of the marriage lay with Panos: “If you only knew how he mistreated me!”

I blitzed back that it's difficult for friends not to take sides in these affairs, but that she and I should sit down and talk. Let's see if she responds.

Leander telephoned gleefully to report that the Steinway he bought from Nigel Coxe ($13,000 plus $650 shipping) is now safely in his basement. Deanna is still not working because the symphony still won't break the opera's picket line. But they offered to forgo three days' wages if the opera orchestra would let them use the Kennedy Center next week and perform.

Tuesday, October 12, 1993

From Abraham Heschel, Quest for God (New York: Crossroads, 1982), p. 44: "Twofold is the meaning of silence. One, the abstinence from speech, the absence of sound. Two, inner silence, the absence of self-concern, stillness. One may articulate words in his voice and yet be inwardly silent. One may abstain from uttering any sound and yet be overbearing."

October 13, 1993

Pano's woes again. But he and Karen are talking together at least. Laurence Davies and Nancy are another couple who have separated. Nancy says they won't ever go back together. It seems mostly the women who desire the separation now at least in these two cases, with the men being the ones who are deserted. I promised Pano to be on the lookout for an honest lawyer.

Nice music: Frank Bridge, von Weber, and Dick's favorite: Martinu.

October 14, 1993

I brought Alan Rozycki to Kendal Outreach to propose using the Farm House for Physicians for Social Responsibility and such groups—just one room, as an office. We got nowhere. Jean insists that charitableness must be for senior citizens and that, in any case, it's up to the residents, not us, to decide. It now goes to the Overseers. We're spinning our wheels re: charitable outreach; have met for two years and have decided nothing.

Friday, October 15, 1993

Lovely breakfast with Eva Gurstner, first violinist of the Lark Quartet, and Leander's old "flame"—they did a concert tour together in Germany. The Lark concert was stirring. Mozart B-flat vigorously done. Then a moving piece by Alfred Schnittke, a Russian born in 1934 now living in Hamburg, sort of neo-Shostakovichian plus Bartok. So sad and poignant. And such good music to watch as well as to hear. Schubert's "Death and the Maiden" concluded. A treat.

Saturday, October 16, 1993

Bev Web played the same two Chopin nocturnes (in C-sharp and D-flat) that he did last time, forgetting, I suppose. Then the G-minor Ballade and the Valse Brilliant in E-flat. All lovely, although he seemed hardly able to stand on his two feet. I go each time fearing it will be the last.

Sunday, October 17, 1993

Another good Meeting. Pot luck with some Dartmouth students. A man came over and said he comes to Meeting primarily to hear me minister. (I was silent today.) With Chrysanthi to see Scorsese's film of Edith Wharton's The Age of Innocence, beautifully subtle. Spoke this weekend with all three children. The job of middle school principal is open at Sidwell Friends. Too bad that Alec doesn't have just a few more years of experience. Oliver Rodgers telephoned. We'll play violin & piano next Friday at Pendle Hill.

October 18, 1993

Kendal Finance Committee. Again it looks like a 5% hike may be needed, alas. No relief in sight, even after the first series of bonds are called.

October 19, 1993

Kendal Overseers. Proposal to admit non-Quakers to the board, maximum of 25%. Margery Walker spoke eloquently against. No sense of the Meeting even after we went into silence. In the silence I ministered, saying we should always decide according to our original vision and not according to expediency. No decision, especially since Mayme and Lafayette and John Radebaugh were absent.

Nice lunch again with Randy-Michael Testa, a true "fellow spirit."

Yesterday walked around Occum Pond for an hour with Marty Sherwin discussing Peace Studies. We'll try to bring Michael Klare as a consultant.

October 20, 1993

With Marty again and Dan Siegel discussing the mediation group. Dan will take it on, under the Tucker Foundation. He's paranoid; that worries me.

October 21, 1993

To Manchester airport to fly, but the plane couldn't land owing to fog. Night in Day's Inn. Missed four-hand piano with Dan.

October 22, 1993

Pendle Hill

6:30 a.m. flight to Philadelphia. Books subcommittee at 10:00. We're breaking even in the Morehouse experiment, which means there's a chance it will be reapproved in January. Allen Kelly of Morehouse wants it to continue. Lots of good books waiting to be published (including Kenneth Boulding's sonnets written during his terminal illness).

Publications Committee. Four manuscripts. Thank goodness we rejected the one on wicca by Carol MacCormack. Don Sheehan told me of the battered wicca women his wife had treated, and of one who had "betrayed" the movement and had crosses cut into her hands and feet. Also, sexual violation of children, ritual sacrifices (of animals . . . so far). Ugh! Rebecca afterwards told me how relieved she was—that if we had accepted it she would have been ill editing it. We also rejected one on science and religion by Jack Monger. Touchy. But we accepted Carol Murphy's rather weak diary on "seasoning" plus a defense of total abstinence as the Quaker position on alcohol. This will be useful at Kendal.

Four-hand piano in the evening with Dan. Gossip. John Anderson is leaving (good!) without Sally—they've broken up. Bill Taber is leaving (bad). Patty O'Hara is leaving (bad). Paul Jolly's wife is having an affair with Bob McCoy and asked for separate living accommodations (bad bad). Spring term was distressing, with some women, egged on by Elizabeth Leonard, accusing Chris Ravendal and John Anderson of sexism or even sexual harassment. But Dan is militant. I suggested Chris as the next dean, perhaps pro tem. Played music and talked until midnight, although I arose at 5:00 a.m. this morning. Played the lovely Schubert Fantasia. But the Bach organ fugues and preludes are the most satisfying. I am trying to interest Dan in Leander's four-hand workshop, but he wants me to go also. . . . Also learned that Donald Swann has cancer and is in hospital, probably dying. There's a book about him (or by him) called Swann's Way. His girlfriend, Alison, is now at the Barbour Institute, Birmingham.

October 23, 1993

Pendle Hill

At Meeting for Worship, someone spoke about a Vietnamese refugee, and Peter Crysdale spoke about turbulence. I was moved to speak about gratitude: that we are so favored, so privileged, compared to the Vietnamese, Bosnians, people devastated by earthquakes, civil war, and the like that our great feeling, especially in worship, should be of thankfulness; and, given our good fortune, what a shame if we use our energies to create turbulence and divisiveness instead of placing things in perspective owing to our overwhelming sense of gratitude. Afterwards, Mary Hegelson came up to me and “elderred” (“juniorred”) me: I was judgmental, she said (perhaps she also wanted to say patriarchal). People favored by nature, politics, etc. still have troubles and the right to voice their concerns. I was criticizing the PH staff and that was unacceptable! Oh well . . .

On the bright side: squeezed in a little piano & viola yesterday with Oliver and we’ll play again on November 6 at Kendal. Also: a lovely vignette: As we were settling into silence before Business Meeting, Douglas Steere came in and sat down next to a little girl about 8 or 9. Not quite knowing what was going on, he leaned over to talk to her and the little girl instructed Douglas Steere (!) to be silent, placing her finger on her lips and settling into a meditative posture with her lovely eyes closed. Lastly, there was a ceremonial opening of the new Firbank, unrecognizable now with a crafts studio above ground, a new library, etc. Dan spoke beautifully, starting with the fact that the land under Firbank had been granted to the first owner by William Penn in 1682.

October 24, 1993

Hanover

In Meeting I told the anecdote about Douglas and the little girl, since all the ministry this morning was about the gifts that children bring us.

Visited John Rassias, who fell and broke his shoulder, running to catch a plane. He is restless, depressed, can’t eat or sleep because his furious schedule of speaking has been interrupted. But this may be good for him He needs to “recover” from work, as Matthew Fox says.

October 26, 1993

Nice lunch with Alan Gaylord, one of my few friends in the department. I’ve gotten for him, thanks to Grant Thompson, Quaker minutes re: same-sex marriage, for use in his church, which is agonizing over the issue.

Thursday, October 28, 1993

To San Francisco

Routine flight to San Francisco. Worked all the way on my Powerbook, using 2½ batteries. Doing Bakalaki's JMGS essay, mostly. Lovely hotel: Marina Marriott in Berkeley. Marvelous sunset over the bay, with the Golden Gate Bridge in the distance. I chaired a session at 4:00 p.m. Went well. On poetry, with Nanos Valaoritis himself in the audience. Nice to see lots of old friends, especially Tom Doulis. Also John Petropulos, and Jim Warren.

Friday, October 29, 1993

Berkeley

The Macedonia session went reasonably well. One person, a local Greek-American doctor, rose and screamed Ανθέλληνες! But Speros Vryonis made a speech about calm and moderation that carried the day. I'm in constant "negotiation" with Tasoula over her response to Zahariadis; she keeps changing her mind and is getting tiresome. I met Zahariadis, who was very civil. Danny Danforth keeps pressuring me and clearly exemplifies all the evils of which he accuses everyone else—namely pursuing scholarship with a political agenda, although his agenda is the liberal one. I feel for this and published Karakasidou, to my deep regret.

Translation luncheon in which I spoke about the dearth of submissions for the Elizabeth Constantinides prize. I'm rooming with Leo Papademetre, who is very pleasant. Lots of gossip about Melbourne (Stathis doesn't talk to John!) and Sydney (Alf is head of department, but totally withdrawn).

In the evening, to Berkeley campus for keynote speech by Vryonis. Terrible. Whining and self-pitying, complaining about all anti-Greek sentiments: Black Athena, the attack on the Greek Miracle exhibit, etc. Too bad, because he can do so much better. Thence to a restaurant in Oakland, invited by Zeese Papanikolas, to honor his mother upon publication of a novel about Greek-American life. One of the guests was Senator Petris, who drove some of us home. Very affable. They say he's a consistent liberal and humanitarian, one of the few to oppose the Junta. His house burned in the Oakland fire a few years ago.

Hour-long phone conversation today with Jamie Newton, now a professor of psychology at San Francisco State, and sort of trapped there. I'll try to get him to Pendle Hill as a visiting instructor or leader of an extension course. He seems to specialize in hypnosis. He wasn't at all bitter about the treatment he received at Dartmouth when he gave the valedictory against the Vietnam War in 1969.

Saturday, October 30, 1993

Some fine papers, especially on minorities. I'm trying to "capture" them for the journal. For supper we all went—I with Valerie Cairys, nice to see her again—to a huge, lavish Greek-Orthodox church in Oakland to join them in their ὄχι-day banquet. The Pantokrator very strange: dark, almost negroid, ugly. Also the saints on the iconostasis: dark and ugly. The tholos is covered in copper. Money! Money! Ostentatious display, yet in good taste. 500 people for dinner. Eleni Tsakopoulou ran up to me and embraced me, then led me to her father, who was preoccupied, but he introduced me to Mary McDonald, the Packard heiress who funded the Thesaurus Linguae Graecae. She was the principal speaker. Terrible. All the clichés about ancient Greece. Everyone bored stiff. The only good speaker was Senator Petris, who was honored with an award and charmed the audience but got carried away regarding Black Athena, thinking the author black. All the MGSA folks were disgusted, since the banquet had nothing to do with modern Greece or with us. Oh, I forgot to note that last night, before Vryonis, the ambassador spoke, and angered Tasoula, Michael, Danny, etc. by claiming that Greece is the most homogeneous nation in Europe. MGSA has to find a way to exclude ambassadors just as we excluded archbishops.

Sunday, October 31, 1993

Berkeley

Final lunch with Tom Doulis. Afterwards, hour-long conversation (argument?) with the Papandreou government's under-minister, who worried that we concentrated on the darkness without acknowledging the light. Perhaps. I tried to tell him that the dichotomy is false. Darkness can equal light. That is, when a culture is able to see its faults, that ability is part of its virtue. Thucydides is a perfect example. Was the under-minister convinced? Probably not. Long walk afterwards with Leo around the Marina in a park established by reclaiming a dump. Then Steve Wheeler picked me up, we drove to Oakland, got Susie Buseck, and went to a Thai restaurant for supper. Steve is impressive. He edits an ecological newsletter campaigning not so much for electric cars as for no cars, a different concept of housing that would enable people to shop, etc., without driving. He's enrolled in Berkeley's Town Planning School concurrently. A consistent activist for peace and other causes. And it was nice to be with Susie on her own, not under her parents' shadow. She, too, is heading toward a service career combining law and social work.

Monday, November 1, 1993

San Francisco–Hanover

Met Lafayette and Mayme by accident at San Francisco airport and we traveled home together, with lots of conversation in the waiting room. Warm reunion with Chrysanthi at Lebanon Airport.

Thursday, November 4, 1993

Met with Tom MacFarland at the University Press. He rejected my idea to "revise" Demotic Greek I by adding a few chapters; he wants a full revision. John and I really cannot do this. Sales are decreasing. If they remain below 1000 per year UPNE will not reprint the book and it will die in a year or two. But it will have had a life of almost 25 years, which is remarkable.

Randy Testa spoke on the Amish at the War/Peace seminar/dinner I arranged. So moving! They are like children, not totally innocent, it seems, but restricted in their knowledge and aspirations. It's extraordinary that their numbers keep increasing, not by conversion but by fertility: they have families of ten children. One of Randy's formulations remained in my mind: "To be a witness means to live in such a way that would not make sense if God did not exist." Randy gave me a parable that he has on his door:

¶ Then Jesus took his disciples up the mountain and taught them, saying: "Blessed are the poor. Blessed are the hungry. Blessed are those who mourn. Blessed are the oppressed."

Then Peter said, "Do we have to write this down?"

And Andrew said, "Are we supposed to know this?"

And Nathanael said, "I don't have papyrus with me."

And Philip said, "Will we have a test on this?"

And Bartholomew said, "Do we have to turn this in?"

And John said, "The other disciples didn't have to learn this."

And Matthew said, "Can I be excused?"

And Judas said, "What does this have to do with the real world?"

Then one of the Pharisees who was present asked to see Jesus's lesson plan and inquired: "Where is your anticipatory set? Where are your objectives in the cognitive domain?"

And Jesus wept.

Saturday, November 6, 1993

Longwood

Drove to Manchester last night with Jean Brophy. More problems at Kendal with regulatory requirements, insurance, etc. There is no end to it. All-day retreat today at Kendal at Longwood for the five-year planning group. Nice to see Lloyd again, and Crosbie Deaton, and Barbara Parsons. The plan is ambitious, encouraging the Corporation to branch out beyond type-A CCRCs. . . . At lunch I saw Astrid Dorsey and asked about Coleman. She told me the most extraordinary and distressing news. He is in a psychiatric clinic suffering from depression. He has been disbarred. The reason: last summer it was discovered that for eight years he had been illegally diverting for his own use some money he had been managing for a client. Why? Worries about retirement, Astrid said. I hadn't known that, earlier, his law partnership had been dissolved, and that one child had died in a skiing accident and another had died somehow. Poor Astrid! Poor Coleman! Such desperation in the midst of relative plenty. . . . The retreat ended at 3:00 and Oliver Rodgers and I retired immediately to his apartment and played viola-piano for two hours: Vivaldi, Bruch, Mendelssohn. How nice!

Sunday, November 7, 1993

Hanover

To the Meeting at 8:30 a.m. to meet with Jim Greenleaf, who is disturbed because of someone's ministry that he considers illegitimate. Lisa Solbert-Sheldon joined me. We both concluded that the problem is basically Jim's: he should be more tolerant and flexible. No Meeting is perfect. There will always be disruptive ministry. I confessed my reaction of despair every time Susan Stark rises. . . . After Meeting, Ministry and Counsel retreat until 4:00 p.m., very cozy and friendly. Anne Baird and Rhea McKay are co-clerks now. Then supper at Kendal with Beveridge and Franny Webster, Mother, Harold Greenwald, and Mrs. Bunting, the former president of Radcliffe. What a pleasure to be with such people. I told Bev about Andy Rangell. Spoke to him today. His hands are not better; he can hardly play.

Monday, November 8, 1993

Leo Papademetre arrived, hoping to work on Annotext for both of us. Nice lunch with Steve Scher. We're planning to go to New York in February to see Britten's Death in Venice again. . . . Leander has applied for an opening as coach of chamber music at Georgetown. I've asked Deb Tanner if she can help. Also Charlie Hamlen.

Tuesday, November 9, 1993

Supper in Norwich: surprise party for Ellen DeCesare's birthday. The two daughters were there. Martha told me all the dirt about A.R.T., that Brustein is a tyrant, the morale is zero, everyone stabs everyone else in the back. The one institute student who was promoted into the company was Ron Daniel's homosexual lover, etc., etc. All the good actors leave. The ones who can't find work elsewhere stay. Alas, alack! No wonder the season was poor last year. Ellen almost didn't come, but finally Don Stewart convinced her. Tears of surprise. Don was actually pleasant. Martha and Caroline are both charmers.

Wednesday, November 10, 1993

Played Schubert songs with Dick. Leo is having trouble with Annotext because we used the Kadmus Greek font, which is cumbersome. I'm working on Darren Middleton's article for JMGS on Kazantzakis and relational/process theology. . . . Speros Vryonis resigned from the JMGS editorial board because of Karakasidou's article. Zahariadis told Tasoula at Berkeley that if he'd heard her second paper he wouldn't have written the way he did.

Thursday, November 11, 1993

Final meeting of the Kendal at Hanover Five-Year Plan group. I got mad at Jean because she tried to keep me from reporting on changes desired by the Overseers, saying that she had already incorporated all of them. I kept insisting that "at reasonable cost" must be removed from the Mission Statement. This question will go to the Overseers. . . . Fascinating War/Peace Seminar supper at the Inn with the Russian ambassador and various other Russian officials, on the subject of the chance for democracy in Russia. The conclusion seems to be that the Russians will choose stability at any price, not democracy at any price. It was nice to sit at the same table with the ambassador and to chat like old friends. All this was arranged by Marty Sherwin, the new director of the Dickey Endowment. . . . Then to Center Theater with Mother and Chrysanthi and Leo to see a splendid student production of Measure for Measure, one of my favorite plays. What language! "He has a garden circummured with stone." Paul Gaffney played the Duke with dignity, but students did all the other roles almost "professionally," except perhaps for the comic ones: Lucio and Elbow, which were OK but not great. . . . Saw Lee Huntington in the audience with one of her charming granddaughters, the one from Haiti, I think. But Rev. Chris Huntington was grumbling that the students' elocution was poor. Alas, it's his hearing, which he refuses to admit.

Friday, November 12, 1993

Leo left, having done nothing because of the Kadmos font. Supper with Rassiases and Kritzmans. Larry K. told me that Rabbi Siegel is hated by all the Jewish students because he is so "legalistic." And I have him directing the mediation program, which he'll destroy, of course. Larry shares my dim view of the chair of the Fourth Council, whose name I keep blocking. John, his arm still in a sling, is more merry because able to travel. He's going to Chicago tomorrow in a private, corporate jet.

Saturday, November 13, 1993

We were supposed to go to the Dartmouth Symphony tonight with Ned Perrin and Anne Lindbergh after dining together but Ned telephoned early to say that Anne was in the hospital and would be undergoing surgery on Monday. A while later he stopped at the house to give us the four tickets. Hardly able to speak, he told me that her cancer is everywhere. She's having a colostomy because the intestines are blocked. But the prognosis is grim. He has hopes for experimental cures at Sloan Kettering. Only five years of marriage and happiness, and she is going to die, most likely. Horrible. Such a sweet, modest, gifted woman. And poor Ned, after two bad marriages, and estranged daughters, finally established a relationship that not only made him happy at last but also brought back the daughters, especially Amy but even Elizabeth to some degree.

Sunday, November 14, 1993

More bad news. Dimitris Yiannakos telephoned Daphne to say that little Maria's cancer is everywhere and her life is in jeopardy, despite the "miracle" operation performed a few weeks ago.

I ministered in Meeting: the parable given me by Randy Testa, about Jesus as teacher before a “class” of self-servers. After Business Meeting, drove Bob Daubenspeck to Kendal to show him the painting studio. I’m trying to get him to do an ILEAD course there. Bev and Franny asked me to make a videotape of the last copy they have of Bev’s complete Debussy. Supper at the Norwich Inn with the Quaker “birthday” crowd.

Thursday, November 18, 1993

George telephoned, weeping. Little Maria died a few hours ago, her entire body suffused with cancer. Chrysanthi telephoned Dimitris. The funeral is tomorrow.

Outreach Committee: still no sense of how to proceed. The Rozycki proposal won’t work. Maybe we can use Kendal to transport Hanover Senior Center folks once a month but even that seems doubtful. I gave everyone copies of Steve Wheeler’s Urban Ecologist for housing ideas.

Lunch with Mother at the Inn. Then to the Fleet Bank trust Department to discuss our finances. I won’t let them sell more Kimberly-Clark. We’ll buy another tax-exempt bond for $25,000.

Friday, November 19, 1993

Leo is here again. He met with John Rassias, whom he hopes to bring to Australia. He’s a good friend, a very easy companion. Drink with Pano afterwards. He has given up on the marriage. Karen still hasn’t given me a time to meet with her, although she says she wants to.

Saturday, November 20, 1993

Jolly supper at Soong and Rogers Elliott’s, with Chuck and Kathy Braun. Rogers demolished most of my arguments in favor of the Education Department. Chuck, after his strange illness, is functioning again. He just published a paper on “Why Water Is Blue,” and explained to us why. Learned from Rogers that Don McNemar is resigning from Andover. I’ve alerted Dan Seeger. Could we snatch him for Pendle Hill?

Sunday, November 21, 1993

I’m working on “Kazantzakis’s Religious Vision” for the Prometheus Society in Washington on December 10th. How nice to be writing again, instead of editing someone else’s writing! Good Meeting this morning. Jean Brophy and Nancy Frost are going to adopt a baby.

Supper party, very successful, with Tom and Nancy Corindia, Marty Favor (new in the English Department), Allison Clarkson and her husband, Oliver Goodenough. He is teaching at Vermont Law School. She is having babies, but is still involved, at a distance, producing shows off-Broadway in New York. A self-assured aristocrat. Told me about her uncle's great camp, a French chateau erected in Johnsbury, eventually given to the Police Athletic League and then burned, the land returned to "forever wild." Her place is 500 acres. Very friendly. A brother is in Malaysia; she thinks he would like to meet Alec.

Monday, November 22, 1993

To Kendal to be in a photo showing the president of Granite State Electric giving Jean a rebate check for $118,000. Interesting to meet the three top executives of this utility company. I asked why they pay people to use less electricity and got a very easy answer: they have increased demand and can meet it only (a) by building a new generating plant, (b) by gaining current from users who economize and by using this to meet the excess demand. Method (b) is much cheaper for them than is method (a). Easy! I told them about wastage of electricity at Dartmouth—lights turned on when not needed—and suggested training children in grade schools. They have already developed curricula à propos.

I blitzed the student actress who did Isabella noting my enthusiasm and saying that "defects" in the performance noted in one of the reviews were really defects in Shakespeare's characterization of Isabel. The actress responded with effusive gratitude. It's interesting how little gestures can sometimes be bigger than expected.

Tuesday, November 23, 1993

Kendal Overseers. Jean explained the bad news about Mr. Reno and the New Hampshire Department of Insurances. But since Jean has apologized to Mrs. Reno, Reno has now agreed to meet with her. She presents him as an ogre, but David French told me afterwards that Reno is admirable, and very liberal, a Democrat, World Federalist, etc. There are always two sides!

Stopped at Rand Funeral home for the "viewing" of Mrs. Rideout, dead at 89 and looking like a wax doll in the coffin. Exchanged commonplaces with her daughter and son-in-law.

AMTRAK to Washington with Chrysanthi and Mother in two adjoining bedrooms. Very comfortable.

Wednesday, November 24, 1993

North Potomac

Leander met us at Union Station. Showed Mother the Capitol building from the front of the station, did a little shopping, ate downstairs, and took the Metro to Maryland. Saw Leander's and Deanna's new house. Very roomy and functional, although certainly not at all interesting architecturally. Leander extremely "domestic," worrying about raking leaves, planting bulbs, etc. But it's the worst type of suburbia. Steve Wheeler and folks at "Urban Ecology" would shudder. Nothing is accessible except by car. Leander's piano, a small Steinway purchased from Nigel Coxe, is lovely, especially in high registers, but the bass is mushy. Ours at home is still the best. I practiced Schubert's Fantasia in F minor, treble part. Deanna showed pictures of Russia. We went for supper at the Mandarin restaurant they chose for the Rehearsal Dinner, and booked it for roughly 50 people for March 25th. Then visited the two hotels they'd reserved: Ramada, very basic, and Holiday Inn, fancy, atrium, swimming pool, etc. We booked rooms for ourselves, Yiayia, Daphne and Greg, and Leander and Alec. Deanna's relatives have already booked ten rooms.

Thursday, November 25, 1993, Thanksgiving

North Potomac

Practiced Schubert again, at length. The turkey is in the oven. Leander and Deanna took us to see the church where they'll be married, and the reception "mansion," all very nice. The important thing is that they seem very happy together. We had our turkey with all the trimmings. Surprisingly Han Lee, Deanna's father, telephoned and asked to speak to me. He was pleasant. We exchanged platitudes. He was happy to hear that I like Chinese food. Alec called, then Daphne. Alec is going to have a Thanksgiving meal with some Americans tonight. Daphne just finished entertaining a group with turkey, etc. at home and wants to go to bed. . . . Leander and I tried the Schubert "Fantasie" together. Then we watched a video movie of Mice and Men.

This impressed me from John Hick's Evil and the God of Love, 2nd edition, pp. 262–263:

¶ "The ideal relationship of a human person with God would consist in a vivid awareness of Him, at once joyous and awesome, and a consequent wholehearted worship of the infinite Goodness and Love by obedient service to His purposes within the creaturely realm. To know the creative center of reality as active personal agape would be to accept gladly one's own status as a creature, utterly insignificant and yet loved and valued in God's free grace, within a universe that wholly depends upon His activity. Such knowledge of God would make impossible the natural egoism in which we each treat ourselves as the centre of our own world, whilst the awareness of God's universal care and watchful love would render needless that protective self-concern by which we seek to safeguard our own interests in imagined competition with our neighbors. For if God were known as equally the Father of all men and the Lord of all history, there would be no need to fight against others for a share of His love. Accordingly a human being who lived in a wholly right relationship to God would not be defensive, fearful, or grasping. He would be saved from self-regarding anxieties by the knowledge that his own personal welfare forms part of the all-comprehensive good of God's Kingdom and of the divine sovereignty. A sufficiently vivid awareness of our Creator and heavenly Father as the ultimate both of love and of power would thus exclude that anxious self-concern which expresses itself in greed, suspicion, cruelty, and the urge to gain power over others." Amen! (He adds that the only person who surely had a perfectly right relationship with God was Jesus Christ.)

Leander gave me a spectacular lesson on the Schubert Fantasia. I can see why his students value him so highly. How nice it would be if Dan Seeger and I could attend the four-hand workshop in June!

Friday, November 26, 1993

Practiced Schubert well. What a shame that I'm not a better pianist. But I can still get sufficient pleasure from playing.

To Grant Thompson's for brunch. Sharen, his wife; Ben, just graduated from college and raising funds for Greenpeace; Carrie, a sophomore at Haverford. Grant charming, as always. With the "gay" earring in his left ear (ditto Ben). He's starting a new job in January as director of an organization that hopes to improve public libraries. The trouble is that he has to raise his own salary plus all other expenses from foundations and businesses. But libraries appeal both to conservatives and liberals, so perhaps he'll succeed. He'll commute to NYC, by bus, since the fare is only $20.00, for the first year, after which he hopes to move the office to D.C. But his heart, it seem, is in "gay and Lesbian concerns." Florida Avenue Meeting has services at 9:00, 10:00, and 11:00. The 9:00 a.m. is for those who want to avoid "popcorn" ministry; the 10:00 is especially for gays and Lesbians; the 11:00 for everyone else. Grant goes at 10:00 and says it's the most vibrant. Recently, an AIDS sufferer in the hospital whom he visited said, "Grant, I need spiritual help," and Grant was challenged to provide something although Quakerism has no readymade rituals for this. I told him about Charlie Hamlen and will send details. He told me that the board chair of the new libraries initiative is the woman who runs the Blue Mountain Center for the Arts. Small world department. We had another huge meal and talked in a lively way about mutual concerns, including mediation and peace studies, and of course John Tallmadge and Jack Shepherd. . . . Afterwards, Leander drove us past the Kennedy Center, Lincoln Memorial, Jefferson Memorial, Washington Monument, and White House so that Mother could see them again. Tried to go into the main Reading Room of the Library of Congress, but it's closed for restoration. Leander and I went to the Rotunda of the Capitol, filled with tourists. Old memories revived. . . . Then a comfortable return on AMTRAK, planning our transportation for the March wedding.

Saturday, November 27, 1993

Hanover

Up at 4:45 a.m. to get off the train. Breakfast at the Polkadot. Worked mostly on "Kazantzakis's Religious Vision" for Washington. Supper at Kendal with Mother and Charlie and Mrs. Dudley. Then another Bev Webster concert. Remarkable. All Chopin. He started with the thirty-minute-long great Sonata Opus 35 in B-flat minor, with the funeral march. Then the third Ballade, then two etudes, op. 10 nos. 3 & 4, then the Barcarole and then another etude. All played with ease and ultimate musicianship. What an amazing specialization! As Chrysanthi said afterwards, he's done nothing else since he was four years old.

Sunday, November 28, 1993

Tom Waring ministered in Meeting about beauty in the midst of decay, and I thought of Bev Webster. . . . Jean told me the other day that she had to write a letter of admonition to Walter Frank regarding his "sexual harassment" of Sherri Buckman. I was stunned. Walter, past president of the New York Stock Exchange, is over 80 and married (Sherri is maybe 40 and married). Apparently this is the third time Jean has spoken to him. After previous admonitions he promised to desist but then renewed after an interim. He writes notes to her saying he loves her; he found out her home telephone and address and bothers her there. She of course is “not interested.” What pained Walter the most this time was that copies of the letter were sent to me and also to John Diffey. By the way, Walter had just donated $25,000 to the Reserve Fund. I wrote him thanking him for the donation and saying that the incidents with Sherri reminded me, primarily, of Jim Strickler’s comment that the major “disease” of older people is loneliness. I hope this does the trick. We developed a nice, bantering friendship, and I hope it won’t be spoiled.

Wednesday, December 1, 1993

Michael Klare came from Amherst to consult with Marty Sherwin, Michael Mastanduno, and me about the future of Peace Studies. Very helpful and cordial. But the crucial hurdle to overcome is to find two faculty members eager to do a Peace Studies course. . . . A student came to the office lamenting the discontinuation of this course and wanting to do a minor in Peace Studies. Alas, I had nothing to offer him.

Friday, December 3, 1993

Pendle Hill

Publications Committee approved the pamphlet I thought impossible and rejected the one I had approved. I jokingly concluded that I have a hypertrophied right brain and an atrophied left brain, at least compared to others on the committee. One submission was by John Yungblut, aged 80+, giving advice to youth. People rejected it, saying it was “authoritarian” and judgmental. So no one has the right to any opinions any longer, it seems. I made a plea against this.

Lovely talk afterward with Rebecca; we are nicely at ease with each other. I fear for the Morehouse renewal that was up in January. Will Denny O’Brien sabotage it? . . . Working on David Mason’s translation of Chouliaras’s poems, which I’m vetting for Princeton University Press. Lots and lots of problems, alas. At 10:00 p.m. played Schubert Fantasia with Dan. He’ll be able to attend Leander’s four-hand workshop. We also did Bach organ music (delicious) and then Schumann’s Bilder aus Osten, with Dan in treble. These we can do at the workshop as well as the Fantasia or in place of it, since it may be too hard. Long talk with Dan afterward. I recommended Chris Ravndal again for dean, but Dan said that he absolutely had to appoint a woman. He also said that Elizabeth Leonard is poisoning the place. He’d like to abolish the entire resident program for a year in order to get rid of her and certain other feminist troublemakers who are authoritarianly against authoritarianism.

Saturday, December 4, 1993

Pendle Hill–Princeton

Fine Meeting. George Peck ministered vigorously on the fallacy of “good wars” and the need for a pacifist rejection of all wars. Oliver Rodgers drove us to Kendal. Played Mendelssohn (better), Bruch, Block, Vivaldi, and a modern whose name I don’t remember. He wants me to prepare the César Franck violin-piano sonata, which he can do on the viola. . . . By train and taxi to Princeton. Mrs. Hurley’s bed and breakfast. Gorgeous house built in the 1870s, full of Victorian antiques. Ms. Hurley is a compulsive talker but vivacious and interesting at age 80. Talks to her cat and they eat supper out of the same dish.

Sunday, December 5, 1993

Princeton

Worked on my lecture in the morning. Lunch at the Faculty Club with Mike and Mary Keeley, John Iatrides, Adi Pollis, Chrysanthi, Dimitri Gondicas, Lily Macrakis. Mike will teach his last class on Tuesday. He says he is going to join “TA” (Teachers Anonymous) as a safeguard should he ever be tempted to teach again. Enough is enough! Amen. We adjourned to the Hellenic Studies offices to form a committee of past MGSA presidents (again!) to worry about finances. The association is being taken over, Mike feels, by “youngsters” hardly out of graduate school, with no sense of the importance of balancing budgets. But I doubt that much will be done about it. . . . Fancy supper at a restaurant with Mike and Mary and Tasoula and Dimitri and his consort and several others. Served by a beautiful oriental girl, a Thai perhaps.

Monday, Dec. 6, 1993

Back to the Friar archives. I’m still in 1954 as Kimon is preparing to undertake the Odyssey translation. Andonis Decavalles joined me, to look at Friar’s references to him—very complimentary. Actually, Friar and Andonis were very close in 1954. Andonis helped Kimon with his Greek; Kimon helped Andonis get a scholarship to Northwestern. Andonis is a good informant about various people mentioned in the letters. . . . Lunch at Prospect with Mike, Don Skemer of the archives, Andonis, Stathis Gourgouris, Judith Herrin. Wine and good cheer. Mike teaches his last class tomorrow. He told me about Salman Rushdie’s five minutes with Clinton, arranged with great effort by PEN, but Clinton had to waffle, saying he respects Muslims, too. Tasoula invited us for supper, but she had a slight auto accident and injured her nose.

Tuesday, December 7, 1993

Princeton

To Sonny Cronk's for breakfast. Very cordial and deep conversation with her and her mother, Margaret, especially when we got to my description of Kazantzakis's dipolar theism, for Margaret has been nursing a "pattern" theory (Like D. H. Lawrence's, I told her) that is very compatible. I extended a feeler for Sonny to return to Pendle Hill but she clearly will not. Says that PH equals anti-intellectualism, fear of academic rigor, and overemphasis on community, all working against what she is trying to accomplish. I gave her Randy Testa's book on the Amish. She wants me to send her "Kazantzakis's Religious Vision." At 4:30 I gave my talk on "The Emergence of the Greek Novel Compared to England." Good group, very attentive, and lots of good questions afterwards, most of which I could answer. Robert Fagles was there and came up afterwards. Very cordial. I finally met Greg Ruf, Tasoula's husband, a nice young anthropologist, specializing in China. Supper afterwards with students: Dimitris Kargiotis, Ioannis Mentzar (the Japanese-Greek), and also Mary Keeley.

Wednesday, December 8, 1993

Princeton

A quick hour in the computer center revising "Kazantzakis's Religious Vision." Then 1½ hours with Mentzar on his translation of Karyotakis, which I had vetted earlier. He's very imaginative, and is working in his 2nd and 3rd languages, Japanese being his first. Lunch with Bob Brown. I suggested that he combine his Χουλιάρας and Εγγονόπουλος submissions with Καρωτάκης, now being translated by Rachel Hadas, since Houliaras's poetry derives most clearly from, precisely, Engonopoulos and Karyotakis. Dimitri Gondicas invited me to return to Princeton to teach for a term when I'm free. . . . In Friar archive, confirmation of Dimaras's antipathy toward Kazantzakis: He refused to say anything about the literary quality of Zorba and The Greek Passion in his article on Greek Literature for the Atlantic Monthly, June 1955. . . . Off to supper with two pairs of Wilsons, Tom and Joan, and John and Woody. John is working on a large series dealing with church and state in various nations; Woody directs teacher training for Princeton students; Tom & Joan are still planning to come to Kendal in 2000. She plays piano. A four-hand partner!

Thursday, December 9, 1993

Princeton–D.C.

To D.C. via AMTRAK. Picked up at Bethesda station and delivered to the Potomac house of George Psacharopoulos, economist at the World Bank. Very hospitable. He did the cooking. Wife a pediatrician. Sweet daughter named Daphne, graduate of McGill, and her boyfriend, Douglas, non-Greek, plus two other couples. I learned a little about the World Bank, also about Razamias who, George confirmed, “doesn’t deliver.” They questioned me at length about Kazantzakis. Nice to be so obviously an “expert.” Douglas and Daphne drove us to Leander’s at 10:30 p.m.

Dimitri Gondicas wants me to come to Princeton to teach in my retirement. I’ll probably return in March to look some more at the Friar archive.

Friday, December 10, 1993

D.C.

By Metro early to the State Department’s foreign service training center. Gave my “Greek Politics through Poetry” lecture. Some good questions. Two of the students are going off soon to Thessaloniki, the woman as consul, the man (a Dartmouth grad) as vice-consul. If we go within three years we can visit them. But poor Jim Warren is losing his job because an ambassador is replacing him, alas. He took me to a Cambodian restaurant in Roselyn, then drove me to the Holocaust Museum. This is excruciating. One feels like weeping from start to finish. But occasionally there are “pleasant” exhibits—for example, the Bishop of Zakynthos, Chrysostomos, when the Germans demanded a list of the Jews on the island, the Bishop wrote his own name in large letters on a piece of paper and gave it to them, saying “Here are the Jews of Zakynthos!” He then alerted the Jews to flee to the mountains, and they were saved. The museum traces before, during, and after the holocaust, showing the rise of Hitler very vividly with Newsreels, his voice, Goebbels’ voice, etc. Especially chilling was the speech in which Hitler proclaimed that the party = the Führer and the Führer = the party. Also vivid through photos was the systematic humiliation of Jews in the early days, before the deportations to be death camps began. There is a moving hall of remembrance at the center of the building. I wrote in the guest book: “Why is it that mankind, alone of the animals, is a mass killer? We are told not to be ‘bestial,’ but it would be more appropriate for the beats to be told not to be ‘human.’” . . . Home to Leander’s on the Metro. Supper, then off to St. George’s Church in Bethesda for the Prometheus Society lecture on “Kazantzakis’s Religious Vision.” This went very well. Full house. Numerous questions afterward. I couldn’t get away. Books to autograph. I felt like a celebrity. Perhaps I’ll encourage Darren Middleton in the hope of producing a book containing various contributions on Kazantzakis’s religiosity. . . . Up until 1:00 a.m. talking with Leander and Deanna.

Saturday, December 11, 1993

Potomac

Practiced Schumann’s “Bilder aus Osten.” To Jewish deli to meet Deanna, who’d been rehearsing for an advent service in the Rockville Presbyterian Church. Shopping with Leander to price champagne for the wedding. To the Kennedy Center in the evening for a National Symphony concert conducted by André Previn, whom Deanna says is overly nervous and disagreeable. Yet the concert was spectacularly good and Previn seemed to be ideal in giving cues and truly signaling expression. Brahms’ Variations on a Theme by Haydn, the theme of which Deanna and Leander want to use for the processional in their wedding; Haydn Symphony no. 102; Deanna played first violin for these two. Then Elgar’s Enigma Variations, a spectacular showpiece for the orchestra. Yet Deanna said that André Previn, the guest conductor, first met them last Tuesday, and two days later they performed the program. That is what professionalism means. Actually, he rehearsed the Haydn most of all. The big romantic pieces can be a bit sloppy, but Haydn and Mozart need to be exact in every respect. Before the concert, I met Maria and her husband, who treated us to drinks. Afterwards, I met Masha and husband, just returned from Minsk on a mission for the World Bank, which is lending the Russians $500 million to help revive their oil-producing capacity, which has fallen to under 50%. They’re voting today for or against the new constitution, which gives almost dictatorial powers to the president. I remember what the ambassador told us last week: that the Russians will choose stability over democracy.

Sunday, December 12, 1993

Potomac–Hanover

Bagels and lox for breakfast. Practiced “Bilder aus Osten.” Then we all went to the Rockville United Presbyterian Church, where Leander and Deanna are going to be married. Chrysanthi started weeping with emotion at the sound of the organ and couldn't sing the hymns. She was moved in a way she couldn't explain. Leander nudged me and we both suppressed giggles as the organist improvised jazzy arpeggios as part of a piece supposedly by Haydn. He is a jazz musician named Levy! The Bach chorale was sung by a basso totally, irredeemably, off key. But generally the service was relaxed and unpretentious, with interesting modes of participation by the congregation in prayers and liturgy. The pastor, Mansfield Kaseman ("Casey") did not give a sermon on this Advent Sunday, which was devoted to the children and included a sort of playlet performance by parishioners. Lots of people knew Deanna and greeted her with pleasure, owing to her participation in the string quartet that's going to play next Sunday. Church address is 355 Linthieum Street, Rockville, MD 20851, 301 424-6733. After lunch, Leander played the Schumann with me, four-hands; surprisingly, it's harder, musically, than the Schubert Fantasia. Then he and Deanna ran through the Grieg Sonata in C minor that they're going to do at Crosslands on Thursday. 300% romantic played with zest. It will warm the blood of the Crosslands audience. . . . To Union Station by Metro. A cup of Kenya coffee downstairs, and then a total surprise: a Black gospel choir singing outside the gates, with an audience including many blacks dancing, singing, and exulting. Such "soul"! If only this could be combined with the good sense and good will (but bad music) we heard this morning at the Presbyterian church. AMTRAK home. I'm working on Ken Boulding's sonnets, trying to select those for inclusion in our Pendle Hill publication and those to be omitted; also trying to arrange them in a more logical order. All-told they are a remarkable witness, although individual sonnets are sometimes quite wooden.

Tuesday, December 14, 1993

Amherst

To the University of Massachusetts for Greek exams. They paid me $450 this time. Nice outing for Chrysanthi and me twice a year. Elizabeth Mazzocco, deathly ill over the past months, appeared briefly, looking like a cadaver. But she says she's out of danger.

Wednesday, December 15, 1993

Interviewed Waverly Watson for Haverford. She's waitressing at Kendal and finds that meaningful because of the sense of community she feels there and because of the experience of loss, when people she's been serving die. That's good experience for a 17-year-old. . . . Meghan Dunleavy invited me to tea. She's back from India where she worked in a storefront or mobile-medical facility tending the poor. She hopes to return as directress of one of its stations. Such a sweet woman, devoted to service, and scarred by the disintegration of her parents' marriage. But maybe sorrow and hardship are desirable. I read recently that Bayard Rustin was motivated to live a life of pacifism and service because of the indignities he'd undergone as a homosexual. Ditto for Michael Harrington. And I'm reading James Merrill's "Memoir," chiefly to see what he says about Kimon and Mina (a lot!), but here, too, the homosexuality seems to have been central, also the sadness of his parents' divorce. He does seem, however, even at this stage, a shallow, spoiled brat: how different from the personality that wrote the poems. Proust is always right: Vinteuil!

December 16, 1993

Outreach Committee. Still stalled, although maybe we'll use the Kendal bus to transport others. Maybe! Channy Brokaw talks too much. Lafayette is too retiring. . . . Long talk with Daphne. It's her birthday. Work at LSE is going well. And she's taking lessons in Japanese, even learning the characters. She may be able to write a thesis involving Japanese business practice and how they deal with cultural differences when they set up a factory in Europe or America. Good for her! Taking advantage of circumstance. . . . Mardy High came to discuss the Alumni College I've agreed to lead. Now I must find two colleagues. I'll try to give poor Pano a job as discussion leader. . . . Alec was denied certification as principal in Massachusetts and is furious. He asked me to turn to Robert Binswanger for advice what to do next. Robert says: Get Harvard to throw its weight around. Complain to the dean, directly.

Friday, December 17, 1993

Christmas parties have begun. I worked all day on the book reviews for the journal: 12 of them. Eva has done her job well, but still lots of editing is needed. At 5:30, to Marty Sherwin's party. How did he ever get to know so many people in such a short time! Then to our neighbors, the Walks. Nice to meet others who live on Ledyard, Hovey, Currier, etc. Lots of new people including a young couple, childless, who bought Mrs. Moyer's house for $1,000,000 and are remodeling it, and live off their investments. He sold a business and retired at age 35. Disgusting! Walk, who now sells real estate, was a colonel in the army in Okinawa.

Saturday, December 18, 1993

Daphne and Greg fly to Indonesia today. More parties. Vivian Kogan's, at 5:30. Their new house, designed by her husband, Bernard Benn, is the most beautiful, imaginative house I've ever seen. Such cleanness, such good use of space! Then to Kendal for supper with Mother and Audrey followed by Bev Web in good form: Schumann, Beethoven's Appassionata, Chopin's "Ballad in G minor," and "La Fille aux cheveux de lin." Lovely and amazing! I saw Waverly Watson in the dining hall, and Tim told me that she's the best of the lot. He uses her to train others, and when someone is good they all say "She's like Waverly"! I'll write a follow-up letter to Haverford.

Sunday, December 19, 1993

I ministered at Meeting on dipolar theology and process theology, making apologies for daring to use the word "theology." This stimulated some good follow-up in other ministries. . . . Spoke to Ned, who of course is devastated by Anne Lindbergh's death: "The worst thing that ever happened to me," he said. But he's glad that he didn't die first, because then she'd be suffering the loss that now is his. Later, saw Amy in the Co-op. She said that Anne's tumor was so large that she looked pregnant. And it must have ruptured, for she had severe internal bleeding. The case was hopeless, all at once. At least she died quickly, lulled by morphine into relative comfort. 53 years old!

Wednesday, December 22, 1993

Met with Diana Taylor, who'll join me in Alumni College. She'll do two versions of Antigone. I'll do Heart of Darkness. We agreed to ask Laurence Davies to be the third teacher. I telephoned him in England and he said Yes. . . . Another party: at Karen and John Vournakis's. Her painted photographs of Greece are superb.

Thursday, December 23, 1993

Finished IBM conversion of the Greek for the journal way ahead of schedule. Hopkins wants to switch to Macintosh, but we still haven't found a suitable Greek font. I'll have to work out a conversion system all over again. Michael Macrakis and the “Greek Font Society” may help. . . . Leander and Deanna arrived at midnight.

Friday, December 24, 1993

A jolly Christmas Eve dinner with the Nodas (including Kesaya and David—Kesaya transformed with make-up, looking like a Japanese doll; and she has a boyfriend!), Audrey, Leander, Deanna. Lots of laughs and reminiscing. Earlier, lunch with Michael Webster and his wife Leone Buyse and Bev and Franny. Leander sat next to Bev and seemed to be having a good conversation.

Saturday, December 25, 1993

Caught up on letters, finally. Supper with Rassias.

Sunday, December 26, 1993

Cambridge

Met Dia for lunch. She gave me a good lead re: MG fonts. A.R.T. performance of Henry IV, Part 1 was enchanting, with Bill Camp as a very fine Prince Hall (wonderful control of facial features and body movement), Alvin Epstein a regal yet tormented king, and Jeremy Geidt (of course!) as a jolly, impish Falstaff. Peto was weak but all the rest were fine, as was the gimmick of having the factions dressed in US Civil War uniforms and Eastcheap doubled with contemporary punk plus Los Angeles riots. Henry IV, Part 2 in the evening was inferior, mostly because the play itself is inferior, although the reconciliation scene between Hal and his father was strong, Alvin Epstein doing one of his best interpretations. But Shallow, Silence, Mouldy, Wart, etc. could have been much livelier. The show was stolen, however, by Mistress Quickly, played by a man: Remo Airaldi. What a pleasure to see both plays together! I wish Henry V had followed tomorrow, and Richard II had preceded.

We slept at Cobble Hill, a ca. 1870s home beautifully restored as a B & B, with jolly hosts. Late night snack at Dunkin’ Donuts; never has a donut been so good!

Monday, December 27, 1993

But Leander’s bacon and egg sandwich at Dunkin’ Donuts kept him on the toilet all night, alas. Our hosts at Cobble Hill gave us a royal breakfast: quiche (2 kinds) plus special breads. Mother doing well, but eager to get home. So we stopped only briefly to see Tom and Nancy Doulis, visiting their son Yanni, who is a student at Harvard’s architecture school. Dion was there, too; he's in NYU film school. Also Nancy, whom I hadn't seen since the early 1970s. Tom is a good friend. One day I hope to see the novel he is writing about Anatolian immigrants. . . . Lunch at Kendal with Yiayia. Saw Walter Frank, who thanked me with some embarrassment for my letter about his philandering, and said that Jean really overdoes such things (I agree). More frozen pipes, but discovered in time before the sprinklers let loose. . . . Worked more on the journal. . . . John Iatrides informed me that Οικονομικός Ταχυδρόμος published the news that JMGS suppressed not one but two scholarly rebuttals of Karakasidou. Some traitor is informing them. Shall we respond? Maybe silence is the best response.

Tuesday, December 28, 1993

Leander is gathering up lots of his belongings, finally, to remove to his house. We're encouraging him: "Please, take – take – take." What will we do with all these things, books especially, when we sell this house and move into two rooms at Kendal? . . . Finished James Merrill's memoir in which he reveals so much about Kimon Friar and himself, including that Kimon was his first lover, while Merrill was a student at Amherst and Kimon a teacher there. I hope to cite Merrill in my piece on Kimon.

Wednesday, December 29, 1993

Naomi telephoned, speaking for Jean, about the proposal to use the Kendal bus to help the Hanover Senior Center. Chrysanthi and I got extremely angry because of what seemed the sabotaging of all of Chrysanthi's work.

Thursday, December 30, 1993

Cleaned up the disagreement with Jean, more or less. . . . Ned Perrin came for supper. We consoled him. I toasted 1994 as "restorative." He talked openly and freely about Anne and her family, including C.A.L. (Charles A. Lindbergh). We had a long supper at Jesse's, filet mignon, and then returned to see Geoff Ballard's video about the electric bus. Ned hopes to have Daphne visit him again for pancakes. He's devastated, poor man, but life must go on.

Received a Christmas card from James Morris III, Wevertown, showing all ten children at a wedding of one of them, looking inoffensive, of course. Ugh!

Friday, December 31, 1993

Surprise telephone call from Χρήστος Αλεξίου from Athens simply to wish us χρόνια πολλά. Παύλος has some disease that requires surgery. Christos is working with the European Union to establish an institution for autistics in Greece. He says he is πνιγμένος στη δουλειά και σε δυσκολίες—τα ίδια πάντα. . . . Also received a call from Professor Jeff Rusten, who will help find a suitable Greek font for JMGS. . . . Finished King Lear and re-read the lecture I gave in David Kelsey's and my class thirty years ago.

1994

---

Hanover	January 1–June 6
Feb. 6, Stowe, Vermont, Trapp Family Lodge
Feb. 11–13, NYC, Metropolitan Opera
Feb. 27, Cambridge, A.R.T. Cherry Orchard
March 3–4, Pendle Hill
March 24–27, Washington, Leander's wedding, Holiday Inn Crowne Plaza, Rockville, MD
April 21–24, Kendal, Pendle Hill, Haverford, New York
April 30–May 1, Boston, Anthony's Townhouse, 1085 Beacon Street, Brookline, 617 566-3972
May 5, Amherst
May 15, Terpni
May 18–22, Pendle Hill
May 28–29, Terpni
Terpni	June 7–Sept. 7
June 10–14, Kinhaven
June 22–30, London, 4 Sprimont Place
June 23–25, Oxford, Exeter College
June 26–29, with Daphne and Greg
July 21–24, Hanover, Burlington
Aug. 14–19, Hanover, Alumni College
Hanover	September 8–December 10
Sept. 13–14, Cape May Point, NJ, Pendle Hill retreat
Sept. 15, Pendle Hill
Sept 16, New York City
Sept. 23–24, Pendle Hill
Oct. 8–9, New York
Oct. 19, Washington
Oct. 20, Pendle Hill
Nov. 14–15, New York, Onassis Center
Nov. 23–25, Potomac, MD, Leander's
Dec. 2–4, Pendle Hill
Dec. 7, Amherst
Tokyo, Kyoto, Hiroshima	December 11–December 26
Los Angeles, San Diego	December 26–December 31

Sunday, January 2, 1994

I ministered in Meeting on David Engstrom's chagrin, his despair at never being able to cure the hopelessness of his eighth-grade students in Mississippi. Afterwards I was surrounded by Friends with recipes for David, all of which I shall convey to him.

Kenneth Boulding's sonnets are sometimes wonderful. I particularly like the ones on non-poetic subjects, e.g., "To My Desk Top":

My desk top is an appalling clutter
 Of things unread, unanswered, every one
 Reminding me of things I haven't done,
 Of thought unthought and words I didn't utter.
 And all I ever seem to do is putter;
 I deal with some things, then what seems a ton
 Of mail comes in—I'm tempted then to run,
 My mind feels like an overflowing gutter.
 I can't decide whether I need more time
 Or do I need a more determined will.
 But change in will's an order hard to fill,
 And nothing stops the clock's relentless chime.
 But whether I can find the will—oh well!
 That is a story only time can tell.

Tuesday, January 4, 1994

Began my Religion and Literature course with what seems a good group, including two recent arrivals from Russia and one from Czechoslovakia. Yesterday began English 59 with about 40 students: the last time.

Tuesday, January 11, 1994

Overseers' meeting. Contrary to expectation, we decided not to recommend administration's 4.5% fee increase. We suggest 4.0%. I never thought we'd actually resist Jean & Co., but we did. Lee Huntington was the one who shifted the sentiment at precisely the right time. Now we'll see what the Directors do. I faxed John Diffey, Lynmar Brock, and Bill Yost telling them, please, to take our recommendation with the utmost seriousness. Of our group, Dick and Channy Brokaw were opposed (as usual) but everyone else wanted 4.0%.

Dimitris Tziovas wrote that he'll convene a symposium on July 4th and 5th in Birmingham to honor my contributions to Modern Greek Studies. I hope I don't have to be dead as a prerequisite for this tribute.

January 13, 1994

Karen Endicott of the Alumni Magazine interviewed me. She'll do a "profile." She quizzed me mostly on "Why the novel matters?"

Lunch with Karen Rodis, who finally felt comfortable discussing her family situation with me. She told of being battered by Panos and of originally marrying him because he'd made her pregnant, and of the awful family situation that he'd grown up in that seems to have made him "patriarchal," etc. They're still friends, but she's determined to break the relationship. She discounted the rumor that she's having an affair with a Russian student, saying "Which one? Three Russians have been living in my house and one of them is gay!" The thought of another relationship made her grimace. What a shame! And what a real, deep story about Greek ethnic family life, to counteract the clichés.

Friday, January 14, 1994

First meeting of the Steering Committee for Kendal's self-study, leading, we hope, to accreditation.

Sunday, January 16, 1994

To A.R.T. in Cambridge to see Joe Orton's What the Butler Knew, considered obscene and offensive when it first appeared, but now very acceptable and very funny. A sort of raw, ungentle Oscar Wilde plus G. B. Shaw (sexual and political satire) plus a delicious parody of the well-made play.

Irene Kacandes is staying at our house, being considered for a job in the German Department. She and we had dinner with Steve Scher and Ulrike. Poor Steve. Ulrike talks non-stop and he listens.

Wednesday, January 19, 1994

Doing better with Martinu's sonata. We practiced the opening measures of the last movement over and over until we got them right. Very satisfying.

Thursday, January 20, 1994

Dinner at Robert and Penny Binswanger's. Everyone there connected with Deerfield. A vivacious Dartmouth sophomore, graduate of Deerfield, the first Deerfield girl I'd met. Wide intelligent eyes, perfect conversationalist, lovely laugh. Afterwards, Bins told me that her father had just finished a two-year jail sentence together with his boy Milken, the junk-bond crook! Strange . . .

I wrote a long letter to the Dean for Bins, pleading for the Education Department, which is threatened with abolition.

Friday, January 21, 1994

English Department meeting to select our appointee from among three candidates. I wanted the one who would be useful in Comparative Literature, but she came in second. . . . Supper with our Quaker friends to celebrate Chrysanthi's birthday a little belatedly.

Saturday, January 22, 1994

I was supposed to go to Pendle Hill today but am home. Rebecca called yesterday and said that everything is ice there and I shouldn't travel. So I faxed her all my critiques and have gained a day to read and write letters and practice the piano. Corindias called; wanted us to spend the Feb. 4-5 weekend with them at the Trapp Family Lodge. But it would cost $550 and we're going to New York to the opera the following weekend, so we regretfully said No. Perhaps in the spring when the prices are lower.

Daphne telephoned. Her teacher at LSE told her that her essay was the best in the class and wondered whether she'd consider staying on for a Ph.D. I'm encouraging her. She could do a dissertation based on research done in Japan the next two years.

Spent most of the day re-reading The Sound and the Fury, finishing it in bed late at night. It's an exhilarating experience. What a grand, huge conception, and yet how simply it all ends in section 4, with Dilsey and the omniscient narration, so calm after all the spasmodic prose of the previous three parts. Dilsey has "the courage to be" and accepts non-being (Benjy and lots more).

Sunday, January 23, 1994

David and Shirley Montgomery, Mayme, and Audrey for breakfast before Meeting. Meeting entirely silent (nice) except for Tom Waring's ministry. Shirley Waring appeared, very thankful for the Meeting's support in her illness. I promised Nancy Corindia that we would drive up to the Trapp Lodge on one of their days there to share lunch.

Finished James Merrill's The (Diblos) Notebook in the afternoon. Its characters Orestes (= Orson) and Dora are clearly Kimon Friar and his wife. Diblos is clearly Poros. Not a very compelling novel (especially after Faulkner), but the use of Kimon interests me. Kimon could become the subject of a fine biography or biographical novel. Written by . . . ?

Off to Kendal to hear a poetry reading by Donald Hall and Jane Kenyon. Residents are very angry because apartments are being flooded again by defective sprinklers, and the roof leaks in numerous places, and they fear that they will have to pay. (Yet I think we Overseers saved them a bit of money by reducing the fee increase from 4½ to 4%.) John Radebaugh telephoned asking for ample time on the February agenda to speak about real problems in the health center. Alas, alack, my beloved community is already “fallen”!

January 25, 1994

Met with Marty Sherwin and Gene Lyons. A breakthrough: Gene is willing to coordinate Introduction to Peace Studies in spring term 1995. I've got to convince one more faculty member to join him. We said to start with Walter Sinnott-Armstrong.

January 27, 1994

Visited Sinnott-Armstrong. He didn't say No. He's willing to act as coordinator “from time to time,” but not steadily.

Emergency supper with John Diffey at Kendal, and John and Barbara Gilbert. The failure of accreditation by the health inspectors for the second time, plus the structural defects, bursting sprinklers, leaks, etc. have everyone in a tizzy. John has been visiting individuals whose apartments have been soaked. People are wary of paying for the retrofitting, etc.

January 28, 1994

Very nice class in English 53. The “show and tell” was with eager and imaginative students. Yesterday's Religion and Literature, discussing Faulkner and Kierkegaard, was less successful.

Drink with Pano Rodis, who is reconciled now to divorce but worried about obtaining joint custody of the two girls. He hopes to return to school for a doctorate, but how under these circumstances?

Saturday, January 29, 1994

Supper at Kendal and then a memorial concert for Harold Greenwald, including the Chopin sonata no. 2, op 35 with the somber funeral march. I faxed John Diffey:

Dear John,

Good to see you here, as always. I hope that the trip back was easy and uneventful.

I wanted you to know “the other side of the story,” as follows: On Saturday night, after supper, practically the entire community gathered in the auditorium for a memorial concert played by Beveridge Webster for Harold Greenwald, who died last Monday of bone-marrow cancer. Chris Huntington spoke about him beautifully at the start, and then Beveridge played Schumann, Schubert, Debussy, and finished with Chopin’s Sonata no. 2, which of course has the famous Funeral March at the end. By pre-arrangement, there was no applause at the conclusion. The point should be obvious (as it was to all of us who were present)—namely, that despite all the problems at Kendal at Hanover, the truly important thing is that a group of people are there who do form a community, as though they were all long-time residents of a cohesive village, who do appreciate each other, who do mourn the passing of those among them who have been particularly lovable, and who value these spiritual gifts over and above—or at least equal to—the material surroundings, leaks and all.

Since you left I’ve had a long talk with Jean, who has contacted each of the overseers individually. She resolves to be directly involved, now, in the health care situation, instead of listening to the reports of subordinates. This of course indicates a lessening of trust, which is a shame, but what can we do under the circumstances? I believe that it’s crucially important for the Corporation to be extremely active in our support during the next four weeks. You really should—must—send someone appropriate from your nursing staff to put our house in order (and Jean tells me that this is contemplated).

Sunday, January 30, 1994

Jean and Nancy brought their adopted baby, Lydia, five weeks old, to Meeting. A black child from Dallas. Jean met the mother, who has two others already and wants this one to have the kind of opportunities in life that the mother knows she cannot provide. Sad. Jean asked me how to say “Mother” in Greek, for since the parents are both female they need to teach the child two different ways to say Mother. . . . John Radebaugh is very concerned about the Kendal crisis. He feels that Kendal is too weak to set things right without outside help. Wants an emergency meeting of the Overseers. Nancy Webber Sutton is coming on Wednesday. We'll hope to meet with her.

Saw Harry Schultz yesterday, looking very old. He told me that his daughter Elizabeth died of AIDS. She's the one who set herself on fire on the golf course, and married a black man, and whose children had to be raised by Harry and Mary. Now she's in peace.

February 1, 1994

I sent this to Jean Brophy à propos of the Kendal crisis:

¶ I've been thinking about trust. Quite understandably, you are concerned that if you can no longer accept what Debbie tells you uncritically but must henceforth investigate the health-care situation directly, the price is a deficiency in trust, which is regrettable but, in this crisis situation, necessary.

That's one way to look at it. Not the only way, however. This first way assumes that human beings ought to be, and can be, perfect in performance of their duties: admirably efficient, honest, creative, and energetic. We all know that this is not always the case; yet we assume the best, hoping that this optimistic assumption will inspire people to do well, and therefore we want to trust. The twofold problem with this approach is (a) that it overestimates human capacity and (b) that it creates and either/or situation of "trust"/"lack of trust."

Another way to look at this situation is, I think, better. It treats moral questions not in an either/or fashion but, rather, along a sliding scale in which every virtue is a mean between extremes of excess and deficiency. Thus the virtue "bravery" is the mean between "rashness" (excess) and "cowardice" (deficiency). Similarly, trust (when looked at in this way) is the mean between credulity (excess) and mistrust (deficiency).

This way does not assume that human beings can be perfect in performance of their duties or even ought to be. On the contrary, it assumes that although we may try our best (and ought to try our best) we each of us need to be checked and aided by someone else. Note that the United States Constitution, a document that is not generally pessimistic about human nature, nevertheless wisely provides for separation of powers (executive, legislative, judiciary), each power checking and modifying the other, precisely in order to minimize the inevitable deficiencies in each.

In the case closer to hand, what needs to be understood is that if you no longer accept uncritically the reports of someone under you in the hierarchical structure, you have not abandoned trust. Instead, you have moved along a sliding scale away from credulity toward a more balanced attitude between credulity and mistrust. What needs to be understood, furthermore, is that this shift moves the focus of trust away from the individual in order to settle it on the collaborative effort of many individuals, which is precisely where it belongs—for there, realistically, is where our trust and hope ought to be, namely in the faith that optimum performance of duties will happen when individual weakness is minimized through collaboration based on the assumption that individuals are not perfect and therefore need to be scrutinized and aided by others, for the great good of everyone.

In sum, I believe that if you look at trust not in an “either/or” manner, where trust is opposed to lack of trust, but rather in the manner described above, where trust is the mean between credulity and mistrust, the present difficulty at Kendal will be more easily handled.

Saw Eva Gürstner of the Lark Quartet just before they played in Sanborn Library the 4th movement of the 3rd Rasumovsky—my favorite. She inquired about Leander and I had to say that he still had nothing in Washington and no prospects. Then, when I got home, Chrysanthi said “Leander just called. He has a job!” Thanks to Nigel Coxe, Leander was interviewed and auditioned at the Levine Music School, the best in D.C., and today was offered a teaching position there. He’ll start at just one day a week and retain the Moravian job until he gets a better feel for Levine. But the Levine job is expandable. It will put him in touch with D.C. musical life, offer performance possibilities, etc. Terrific! Also, he accompanied a trombonist at Peabody last week, and afterward various faculty members asked the trombonist about his pianist, who was so good. So there’s a likelihood of more opening up there, too. To cap it off, Leander said that he and Deanna had a very satisfying meeting today with the minister who'll marry them. They really respect him as he does them. How nice! I immediately faxed the good news to Daphne and Alec.

Tea with Arndts and Sheldons. Walter fell and now has his foot in a cast. He is hobbling around and looks very old, but has just finished Heine translations and also a whole collection of women Russian poets. I'll try to arrange a poetry evening for him and others.

February 4, 1994

Lunch with Gene Lyons, planning the War/Peace symposium. Bill McNeill will come as the main speaker. Gene is delighted that Diana Taylor might help with the Peace Studies course.

Sunday, February 6, 1994

Stowe

Drove to Stowe to the Trapp Family Lodge to lunch with Tom and Nancy Corindia. The lodge is disappointing architecturally, but the place as a whole is nicely unpretentious. We walked in the cold, took a sleigh ride behind two beautiful horses, warmed our insides with hot chocolate, enjoyed lots of good conversation.

February 10, 1994

What a day! 9:00 a.m. accreditation committee at Kendal. Learned that accreditation must be postponed. So we spent 1½ hours deciding that we wouldn't meet again. Lunch with Alumni College colleagues, planning for the summer. 1:00 p.m., x-hour in English 53 on A Handful of Dust. 2:00 to 4:00, Comparative Literature 70 on Matthew Fox. At the end of the period one of the students sighed, "I'm drained." 4:00 p.m. CAP. I sat in for Christian Wolff on Bill Summers' promotion. We agreed with the ad hoc committee to deny promotion because he is so bad with certain students. 5:30, emergency Overseers' meeting at Kendal because of (a) leaks, etc., (b) health center crisis. John Diffey and Nancy Webber Sutton were up from Philadelphia. We heard the whole story. Residents are up in arms because they feel they'll have to pay for all the repairs. Diffey will meet with them tomorrow. Home at 8:30 finally. I'd left at 8:00 a.m. Watched a video of Visconti's Death in Venice. Slow but still evocative for me in parts.

February 11, 1994

Off to NYC

February 12, 1994

NYC, Yale Club

February 13, 1994

Train & car back to New Hampshire

Back home. Found telephone message from Daphne, worried about our Friday travel in the snow. I faxed her:

Dear Daphne,

We just got home and found your message on the machine but didn't want to telephone for fear of waking you up. The trip home today was uneventful because the predicted storm never came. But our journey to New York on Friday was prolonged and extremely lucky. We went with Steve and Ulli Scher in their car; they wanted to drive all the way. But around Greenfield we hit a vigorous snowstorm. Luckily, they agreed to leave the car in Springfield, where we took AMTRAK. The train arrived in New Haven an hour late, with people standing in the aisles everywhere. At New Haven, after about another hour's delay, they announced that they didn't have any engine but expected one to arrive from Washington (!) at some point. We of course had tickets to the Met for 8:00 p.m. and were beginning to despair. Luckily, by going out and asking a conductor on the platform, we were told that there was a Metro North commuter train leaving for New York in about four minutes. So we scrambled over to another platform and caught this train, only to hear over the loudspeaker that delays should be expected. In the event, however, this train made it to Grand Central Station (conveniently for us, across from the Yale Club) pretty much on time: at 6:00 p.m. We left Hanover at 9:00 a.m., so the trip took nine hours. We wolfed a meal at the Yale Club, got a taxi by some miracle, and arrived at the Met with fifteen minutes to spare. The opera, Benjamin Britten's Death in Venice, was gorgeous: it's the third time I've seen it and I'd like to go again tomorrow. It's a masterpiece.

On Saturday, I corrected papers and then went to a lovely exhibit of Virginia Woolf manuscripts and letters at the New York Public Library while mother and the Schers went to Bloomingdales, etc. We had a leisurely Japanese (of course!) meal, and then went to a delightful comedy called The Sisters Rosensweig, by Wendy Wasserstein, about a Jewish woman from Brooklyn who transplants herself permanently to London and becomes CEO of the Hong Kong-Asiatic Bank there. A bit of fluff, adding up to nothing, but a nice way to pass the time. This morning we were planning to go to the Metropolitan Museum and then have brunch there with one of my former students, but we canceled this because of dire weather reports in order to catch an earlier train back to Springfield.

What about Greg? I heard that he got caught, too, in the storm. Is he home now?

February 16, 1994

Chris Lawson telephoned inviting me to be Quaker in Residence at Woodbrooke for summer term 1995 and to teach a course there. Chrysanthi said Yes unhesitatingly, which surprised me. So we'll go off to England, Θεού θέλοντος, in March 1995 and stay until July.

February 19, 1994

Veda Crewe and Stuart Joseph, who applied to get married under the care of the Meeting, met with Chrysanthi and me, and Bruce Koloseike and Bob Daubenspeck, for clearness. Veda—fat, articulate, a “survivor”—works in the Lehman Wing of the Met. Stuart, twice divorced, without a job, just finishing college at age 49, seemed somewhat (!) problematic to us, but it's Veda's one and only chance (and maybe his last chance), so we said Yes.

February 20, 1994

Went to Rollins Chapel to hear Alex Ogle and others play “our” Martinu trio at breakneck speed. I could never manage it so fast. But what we produce at home basically sounds like Martinu, despite everything.

February 22, 1994

A good Overseers Meeting with John Diffey present. He is still greatly concerned about Jean and showed me a letter to her in which he threatens to fire her if she doesn't change. He is requiring her to be counseled on a regular basis.

February 24, 1994

Outreach. I spoke again, forcefully, about the legitimacy of taxing the residents for outreach. We are hoping now to help somewhat with meals on wheels in Lyme. Lafayette and John Radebaugh are getting commercial drivers' licenses to be able to drive the Kendal bus for Chrysanthi's Hanover Senior Center excursions.

Ned Perrin took us out to supper. Poor man! Since Anne's death he has been burying his sorrow in work, but not in writing. He says he cannot write . . . yet. So he wants to teach at full level again, every term. I'm hoping that he may come on as a discussion leader in my Alumni College. I offered Testa the same.

February 26, 1994

Listened to the Metropolitan Opera broadcast of Death in Venice. The music is beginning to haunt me. It is so beautiful, so sad.

February 27, 1994

Cambridge

To Cambridge. Lunch with Mike Antonakes,, who is flourishing in retirement. Then to A.R.T. for a magnificent Cherry Orchard—pure magic with Claire Bloom as Mrs. Ranevskaya, Jeremy Geidt very fine as Gayev, Alvin Epstein as a teetering Firs, Jack Willis vigorous as Lopakhin, and Reno Airaldi a comic hit as Boris. Everyone was uplifted by Claire Bloom's presence, it seems, and of course by Ron Daniels' direction. Even Royal Miller, mediocre in previous plays, did an excellent Pyotr. Claire Bloom, of course, was superb as the improvident aristocrat in decline. Daniels played it with lots of humor, not at all as a dirge. And Lopakhin was done correctly, I think—i.e., not as a complete boor and/or villain, but as the new, vigorous, emerging class destined to replace the effete aristocrats, who are now totally anachronistic.

February 28, 1994

Gerber sent me to Dr. Rous, a urologist. He felt the prostate and concluded that I need to do nothing at this point, especially since the latest PSA is the lowest ever. Amen! But I should have an ultrasound test of the kidneys and make sure that urine is not backing up into them.

March 1, 1994

Graham Wallis's Presidential Lecture. I didn't understand the engineering part but was delighted when he read a long poem in rhyming couplets submitted to the Hanford nuclear power plant in England after his inspection of it.

March 2, 1994

A treat. Martha Graham ballet performed here. I found Appalachian Spring (Copland) rather stiff and dated and pretentious in its insistence on being "American." But "Demeter and Persephone," choreographed by Twyla Tharp, was scintillating. Of course I'd seen excerpts in New York at the Tharp ballet itself, but now the whole thing, with costumes and delicious music by a klezmer band, was on view. Very moving and joyous. The last ballet, "Maple Leaf Rag," done by Graham at the end of her career, with costumes by Calvin Klein (!), was slight, but fun.

March 4, 1994

To Pendle Hill. Met Melissa Zeiger and her "consort," Jonathan Crewe, on the train last night. We'll be deciding her tenure next week, and it looks bad. At Publications Committee we accepted Dan's piece on silence, thank goodness. Rebecca is still up tight about Carol MacCormack and asked me to be a go-between. I'm back on the Executive Board; lots to catch up on. Played four-hands with Dan afterwards. He's dismayed at the new recommendation for Dean but will go along. He wanted Liz Kamphausen, which really would have looked bad, almost incestuous.

Saturday, March 5, 1994

Dan drove me to the Media post office to fed-ex JMGS to Carol, minus authors' vetting of galleys since Hopkins once again sent the galleys overseas by surface mail. Played Schumann again with Dan after lunch, much improved. This is such a pleasure. Sat in the first class lounge at 30th Street for three hours reading applications to Steve Scher's NEH seminar. How lucky we all are to be at Dartmouth! These applicants are exiled in Kansas and Mississippi: no libraries, no great cities, no sabbaticals, no research funds, third-rate students. The National Endowment for the Humanities is their solace.

Sunday, March 6, 1994

Ministry and Counsel at 8:30 a.m. I presented our Oversight Committee's report on Leda and Stuart and was not enthusiastic. The group now wants to see Leda and Stuart here again, before approving their very cumbersome request. I've agreed to write up the State of Society report. It's good to be more active again in Meeting affairs.

Lunch at Kendal. Rose Miller complained about the health center being disorganized, understaffed. Walter Frank exulted in being married 63 years and having entered the Stock Exchange 57 years ago as a clerk (he rose to become president).

Monday, March 7, 1994

Last class of English 53, a panel with students summarizing. I was very pleased. They actually sounded like a BBC program of experts. Then to the Kade Center with Steve Scher and Paul Moravec, the composer, who is off tomorrow to Bellagio.

Tuesday, March 8, 1994

Last Comparative Literature 70 class, not as good as English 53 yesterday, but some of the students did speak well and did seem to indicate that the course had been meaningful to them and "relaxed," although still demanding. Before this: all morning with the department in tenure deliberations. Thankfully, Don Pease and Pat McKee invited us to supper afterwards to unwind. Chauncey Loomis, Jim and Nancy Heffernan. Lots of drink, fun, and good cheer. Don is just back from Tel Aviv, where people are vibrant, he says.

Wednesday, March 9, 1994

A terrible day. We voted termination for Melissa. It had to be, but the vote was surprisingly negative, 13 against, 4 in favor. We also split surprisingly on Matt Rowlinson, which means that he may be denied by the C.A.P. Ernie Hebert and Tom Luxon passed easily.

Thursday, March 10, 1994

Another terrible day. Started with a two-hour conference at the Inn with Sandy Folzer, the consultant that John Diffey has working with Jean to help change her management style. Had to go through all my complaints about Jean but I also stressed her assets. Then rushed home for a conference call from Pendle Hill and Kendal at Longwood: Dan, Barb Parsons, Rebecca and me regarding Mary Morrison's request for royalties for her pamphlet, seeing that Kendal ordered 20,000 copies! We refused, rightly. But I offered a compromise that was accepted: an honorarium of $500, to be paid for out of Kendal's payment to Pendle Hill. Then saw Crewe in the bookstore and asked about Melissa. "She's in shock," he replied. He's furious, convinced that Don Pease & Co. poisoned the meeting. They'll both be looking for new jobs with meager prospects in this market. Horrible! The sweetest person in the department, Melissa, but she just did not produce. Bright spot: conference with a student writing a D. H. Lawrence pastiche using the Demeter-Persephone myth. I think I really helped her by giving her Sikelianos's poem "Pan." Then home to hear from Jean that the Valley News learned that medical examiners censured us, and that they want to write an exposé article. Should we try to pull strings with the editor-in-chief or owner? I thought not. Luckily John Diffey agreed. The examiners are back right now and tomorrow should give a verbal verdict. If they lift the ban, we're fine, and that could go into the article. If they don't, we're cooked!

I hired Jay Bruce to be my presidential scholar next year. Fingers crossed.

Friday, March 11, 1994

Another bad day. Jean called early and asked if I couldn't come to Kendal at noon for a briefing before the reporter from the Valley News came. A group sat round trying to anticipate his questions and to practice answering. Then the Medicare surveyors called us in for their report. They removed three of the four A-level deficiencies but retained the most serious one, "Quality of Care," listing a dozen specific abuses and lacks. Alas! We have one choice: we can appeal. If the appeal is granted, we have thirty days to set things right. Then the reporter came and we had to tell him this and answer other questions. Dr. McCullough valiantly tried to convince him that patients were getting good care; the trouble is mostly in inadequate documentation. The article appears tomorrow and we all have our fingers crossed. I went home at 4:00 p.m. and telephoned all the Overseers.

Saturday, March 12, 1994

Barbara Gilbert asked me to come over. Dr. McCullough, an old friend, had unburdened himself to her and wanted me to know, too. He is saddened by the firing of Martha. He complains that he is never consulted. He recounted how Debbie was abusive toward him. I telephoned him. We agreed that we shouldn't stir the pot until the Medicare mess is over. But we'll arrange for him to meet with Diffey. . . . Then supper with the Gilberts and Mother, followed by yet another fine Bev Web concert: Schumann's Romanze opus 28, Brahms and Schubert intermezzi, Chopin's Sonata op. 58 in B minor, Ravel's Ondine, Fauré's Nocturne no. 1, and Debussy's Isle Joyeuse. Bev at this best. Utterly remarkable.

Sunday, March 13, 1994

I had to act as recording clerk at Business Meeting when we considered the draft of the State of Society that I had prepared. Picky-picky. An hour of “picking,” very tedious. The whole meeting went from 11:30 until 2:15. Also, now they don’t like the poster I brought back from London, because it uses the word “Christian” (!) and “he.” Ugh! Then to Kendal to meet with Walter Frank re: governance again. Some are threatening lawsuits but he thinks that this can be averted. . . . Supper at Nardi and Tom Campion’s with Ned Perrin. Nardi recently interviewed Hillary Clinton at the White House and was very impressed.

Monday, March 14, 1994

Started with breakfast with Jean and Barbara Gilbert. Jean is obviously all tied up in knots, emotionally. She is convinced that John Diffey is going to fire her. She is going to start looking for another job. But if she gets fired and doesn’t have a job she’ll lose the baby she recently adopted. Despair. She said that the consultant’s report to her was mostly negative—strange, because my testimony was 50–50. Jean doesn’t want to be where she’s not wanted, she exclaimed. I asked her about Debbie and, finally, was told the truth: she’s no good, and may be “passive aggressive.” Dan and Brent are fine. Pam is so-so, but she tries. Tim after a bad start is fine now. We were sworn to silence. Jean wants time to find another place. . . . Lunch with Steve Scher finalizing his NEH student list and gossiping. Final exam for English 53. Then to a special Kendal Board meeting to hear about the catastrophe. Very useful. Jean outlined strategies, including getting expert help from outside. Then we went into executive session (I had pre-arranged this at breakfast, so that Jean herself volunteered to leave). Much support for her, but not much for Debbie. Desire to speak with Dr. McCullough.

Tuesday, March 15, 1994

Both of my classes were quite successful this term, it seems. Meghan Dunleavy told me that a group of students from English 53 meets regularly in a downtown café to talk about the books. Doug Cameron from Comp. Lit. 70 told me it was the best course he’d had at Dartmouth and that most of the others in the class agreed. Strange. I’d accelerated my retirement because I thought that I’d “lost the touch” and was teaching worse and worse. But now, having decided to retire, I seem to be teaching better. Much more relaxed, obviously. And I keep thinking each time I do a specific book, "This is probably the last time." But grading papers and exams is still excruciating.

To the hospital for an ultrasound of kidneys, bladder, and prostate. Everything normal, more-or-less. Then to Kendal for an open meeting with residents. Jean, Debbie, and I. They asked what they could do. I said, "Weigh the good with the bad and appreciate the good. Don't fret. Have faith that we'll set things right. Don't denigrate Kendal to outsiders. In sum: keep up your morale." Barbara and I will go to the next Directors' meeting in Philadelphia. I spoke with John Diffey and told him of Jean's discouragement. He then repeated this to her in a way that made her feel I had broken confidence, which I certainly didn't think I had. Long, difficult talk with Jean. Maybe I convinced her. She may be hearing what she wants to hear, not what is said.

Spoke to Melissa Zeiger, who is despondent because of the tenure decision. She said that Lou told her practically nothing about the reasons. I said how much everyone liked her. "I don't want to be liked, I want to be admired as a professional person." Compare my student years ago: "I don't want to be admired, I want to be liked."

Wednesday, March 16, 1994

Grading papers all day. My eyes ache. But Dick and Allan came at 7:30 and we played Martinu and Damase for 1½ hours and then chatted over a beer.

Saturday, March 19, 1994

Daphne has been here for two days. Lots of good talk about her course at LSE, which is relevant to the mess at Kendal. She has changed her thesis topic; will do how the media influence public reaction to the Harding skating scandal. She's excited about Tokyo and has been practicing her Japanese on us. Actually, Greg may move the entire office to Hong Kong after a year. . . . We went to supper with Yiayia at Kendal and then heard Bev play the Waldstein and the Appassionata! Lovely. . . . Back home to finish papers and grades.

Monday, March 21, 1994

One student still delinquent. I told him 9:00 a.m. was the final deadline. No paper at 9:00. I waited until 10:00. Then gave him a D and turned in the grades. At 11:00 the paper appeared, but really only half a paper, and not relevant to the course. So the D stands. A shame: Misha is a Russian, very bright, a good poet so I'm told, but all tied up in knots, paralyzed. In the afternoon John Diffey came to my office with Bob Metz and Barbara Gilbert to plan for tomorrow. John wants to say—in the “public” context of the Overseers’ meeting—to Jean and Debbie that they are really under scrutiny. We agreed. He decided to sleep on it and see if he still feels the same tomorrow.

Tuesday, March 22, 1994

At Kendal from 8:00 a.m. until 2:30 p.m. John decided to proceed, but he forewarned Jean and Debbie. Jean looks terrible: stricken! Our Overseers meeting went from 8:30 until noon but Diffey, Barbara Gilbert, and I left at 11:30 to meet separately with Dr. McCullough (who had been in the meeting previously, and spoke very frankly about his frustrations). We're trying to avoid being punitive and scapegoating, yet we must really hold Debbie and Jean accountable. John says that every gain achieved when nurses come from Philadelphia is then lost as soon as they leave. They're actually considering forfeiting the appeal rather than chancing another failure. Tomorrow a consultant arrives. We'll see. The discouraging thing is that everyone has a different version of events such as the firing of one of the waitresses, and, especially, of Martha. I keep harping on my concern for better personnel procedures, but there is great resistance.

Wednesday, March 23, 1994

Spent most of the day working on Darren Middleton's prospectus for the book on Kazantzakis and theology that we hope to do together. Badly written, as usual. We are trying to get an Orthodox theologian to collaborate. Stylianos says No. So do two others I have asked.

10:00 p.m., off on AMTRAK to Washington, with Yiayia and Daphne. Nancy Corindia plus four children and an au pair girl are traveling on the same train. . . . I prepared the first class of Greek 13, which meets on Monday the 28th, the day of our return. In effect, no vacation. How different last year was, with our lovely ten days in London between terms.

Thursday, March 24, 1994

Rockville, Maryland

It took us sixteen hours to reach the hotel. Lunch with Corindias in the basement of Union Station. So many people! So many races, colors, sizes, shapes! Found Leander and Alec at the hotel. Alec looking fine. Leander relatively relaxed. Got a rental car. Greg arrived. Mr. Lee and wife arrived. We all drove to Lopa Court. Met Deanna's sister Janice, very outgoing. She's like her mother, apparently, whereas Deanna is more like her shy father. Mr. Lee is approachable, more or less; the step-mother seemed more ill at ease. Talked with Mr. Lee about Boeing, the new 777 etc. Janice works for Microsoft in sales. She's warm, upbeat, plans to move to Taiwan. No one mentioned her failed marriage, of course. Dinner of crab cakes and pork (catered). Then their friends from Silver Spring arrived, by pre-arrangement with Chrysanthi, with a birthday cake and we celebrated Leander's 38th. Very jolly. To bed at midnight, exhausted.

Friday, March 25, 1994

Slept like a baby straight through, not rising even once to urinate despite multiple glasses of wine last night. Breakfast with Alice Buseck, who said nothing to me, and Lori and Susie, and Paul, who basically said nothing. They departed, and Chrysanthi and I had 1½ hours with Alec alone, listening to his adventures as principal. He is already been approached to take over the headmastership should the current head leave. He is ambivalent about this, since it would mean loss of contact with the children themselves. Upstairs to work more on Redmont's essay on Quaker alcoholic moderation (as opposed to abstinence) that I hope to push through the PH Publication Committee. It needs extensive copyediting, alas. Nice talk with Leander, who mentioned Deanna's cleft palate for the first time, saying that when her mother saw this she determined to give this child, presumably never marriageable, an independent skill. Thus the violin. Lunch at a diner with Lucia, Daphne, Greg, Chrysanthi, Alec, and Leander. Leander revealed that one of Deanna's uncles in Taiwan, a doctor who owns a hospital, sent them a wedding gift of a check for $12,000. So Leander volunteered to pay for the drinks at the Rehearsal Dinner tonight. I'm paying for the food: $1000: 50 people @ $20 each. Off to the church for rehearsal. Rev. Kaseman has a lovely voice and manner. The music will be beautiful: Sandy Dennis and Nigel Coxe playing Schumann four-hands from Bilder aus Osten; a Kinhaven flute quartet, including Nancy Bidlack, playing Mozart, and the church organist playing Fats Waller for the recessional and Bach for the processional (maybe jazzed up—we'll see). We placed the certificate Bob Daubenspeck did on the easel set up for it—very lovely. Larry and Robin Wright's daughter Elizabeth is charming as the flower girl: a darling. James McBride was late (of course), appearing after the rehearsal ended. But Alec as best man and Greg as usher went through their paces nicely. The readings are by Larry Wright (Gibran) and by a gorgeous Minnesota beauty, Deanna's friend (1st Corinthians). The language is very simple and appropriate. It should be a moving ceremony. Already we were crying.

Nice long talk with Nigel Coxe. He heard Ignat play the Diabelli Variations and Schubert in recital and says that he's developed into a truly major artist. Also he said that Bev Webster is one of America's great musicians, as pianist, as teacher, and also as editor: he published an edition of Debussy's music setting right all the errors in earlier editions.

Back to the hotel and then to the Mandarin Inn for the Rehearsal Dinner. Very sumptuous: eleven courses, with dishes I'd never seen before, including lobster and the pièce de resistance, a huge, whole fish done with magical expertise. I sat between Peter Buseck and Larry Wright. Next to us: ten Chinese relatives of Deanna's including an uncle who had just flown in from Tokyo and an aunt just arrived from Taiwan. All doctors, industrialists, etc. Plus some assorted cousins, very Americanized. Spoke briefly with Jerry Bidlack, who is retiring from Lehigh next year. Nancy very subdued and distant. O well . . . Also met James McBride's mother: white, the bearer of twelve children. Alec toasted Leander and Deanna movingly, his voice breaking. Janice likewise. Leander made a little speech, thanking various people. All in all, a success. Relaxed and sumptuous, without being ostentatious.

Saturday, March 26, 1994

Long breakfast again, this time with Helene Rassias. John, she, and Mary arrived late last night from Chicago, John looking very tired. Also with Lucia's nice friend, Diane, from Santa Barbara. Alec appeared in his tuxedo to our cheers. Roy and Amy appeared, and Clarice. Back to the room to get dressed, then to drive to the church by 11:15 for photos. Deanna resplendent in her gown and train, very statuesque. Daphne beautiful, as always. Exhausting photo sessions, Elizabeth Wright, the flower-girl, stealing the show. Just before 1:00 p.m. Charlie Hamlen blew in. Stephanie McBride was late because of the children. Saw her afterwards. She is extraordinarily beautiful and radiant. Yasuo and Naoko arrived just in time. The service was a great success. Rev. Casement's homily jovial, friendly, personal. He went out of his way to emphasize the Quaker origin and meaning of various silent meditations and of the marriage certificate, displayed on its easel for all to see. The Schumann "Bilder aus Osten" was lovely (although, strangely, I was more moved hearing it at the rehearsal yesterday). Robin Wright's flute for the Mozart was superb. Leander and Deanna seemed relaxed and able to enjoy each other even "before the altar." One truly different part of the service was this: after L. & D's "I will," Rev. Casement asked the families to stand and to affirm "I will" after he asked if we would support the couple in their wedded life. Then he asked the entire congregation to stand and affirm "We will" after the same question. All this, plus direct remarks in his homily, affirmed the public nature of Leander and Deanna's union.

Folks signed the certificate, the family first. The Chinese did theirs both in our alphabet and in their characters. Then we all went to the "Mansion" for the reception. Lots of champagne plus lovely hors d'oeuvres in this palatial building. Long talk with Charlie Hamlen, whose AIDS project is going well. Nice to see Mr. and Mrs. Shin again, and Frances Walker, who came all the way from Oberlin and hadn't seen Leander since 1979. And Todd Engstrom, the bird-expert, who'd visited us on our farm years ago, and Rich Parker from Farm and Wilderness, now an internist in Boston, and Leander's friend from Oberlin, Edward, and his wife, and . . . and . . . Of course, lovely to visit with Lucia again and her friend Diane, and all our relatives, especially the Buseck children: David most of all. And Clarice, whom I hardly spoke to, Alice and Peter Buseck (ditto), then Helene and John who blew in from Chicago with piles of luggage, and Mary from Hanover. Helene ebullient, as always, John fatigued, Mary "philosophical." And Amy and Roy (just said hello to them, barely). Most of our time we spent, naturally, with Daphne, Greg, and Alec. Alec hoarse but managing. Visited a bit with the Shantzes; he's retiring this year, she next year. . . . Finally time to cut the cake. Alec toasted the couple. Leander said how much he and Deanna appreciate their parents. . . . Goodbyes. Oh, Neil Ratliff never showed. He has AIDS. We fear he may have had a relapse. Nor did Jim King show. . . . At the very end, a flurry of activity. It seems that Chrysanthi's purse was stolen, with Alec's camera inside. But the catering staff, witnessing the theft and recognizing the culprit as a "regular" at wedding receptions, rushed after him, overpowered him, and called the police. Next we knew, Chrysanthi and Alec departed in a police car to file an affidavit at the station. Leander, Deanna, and I waited an hour, very tired indeed. They returned, purse in hand. . . . Back to the hotel. Rest. Later, a nice couple of hours in the bar with assorted relatives and friends. To bed at midnight. At 12:30 a.m. Leander and Deanna knocked on the door to say goodnight again. They depart tomorrow for a few days in the Carolinas.

Sunday, March 27, 1994

Long breakfast with Alec, Helene, David Buseck, Yiayia, etc. John Raskias had a sharp pain in his flank last night and they took him to the hospital, but nothing seemed to be wrong, and he felt better. Alec, Greg, and I returned my rental car, the tuxedos (but I had worn my own, very proudly, since it dates from the Deerfield Senior Prom in 1948 and still fits), the Lincoln Town Car used to transport the bride yesterday; then to the bar again for a drink and more conversation. Daphne is excited about her thesis on media coverage of Tania Harding's skating crime; she and Greg are energized about the forthcoming sojourn in Tokyo. They walked us to the Twinbrook Metro station and we said our good-byes. Daphne and Greg are flying to London this afternoon; Alec returns to Jakarta via Seoul next Thursday. Read the NY Times in the first class lounge in Union Station, bought some silk ties, then Cornelius came, and Nicky in his sweet voice told us about his electric train set. Boarded AMTRAK to find our friend, Mr. Evans, the porter, ready to receive us. It's nice to be known.

The conclusion after these full, meaningful three days is that we have a cohesive, appreciative, healthy family and so do the Busecks, and so, apparently, does Deanna. Her extended family—truly extended!—seems very cohesive indeed. The service was in good taste, serious, yet not somber—mindful of a divine dimension yet not sanctimonious. By all accounts, Leander has extraordinarily loyal friends. We appreciate all this increasingly as we learn about the disintegration of other families and the general woe characterizing so many domestic situations.

Later, a long talk with Tom Corindia over cognac in the dining car, about the Kendal-Hitchcock relationship. The contract must be renewed in June. Kendal is a financial disaster for Hitchcock; yet, Tom says, the Clinic wants to maintain the relationship.

Monday, March 28, 1994

Hanover

Arrived at 6:00 a.m. Breakfast at the Polka Dot with the Corindias. Home to piles of mail. Then to teach at 12:30. First meeting of Greek 13. Started right off with «Ειρήνη» του Πίτσου.

Tuesday, March 29, 1994

Comparative Literature Steering Committee to discuss the ACLA report written by Marianne Hirsch and Steve Nicholson among others. Stressed the need for new approaches—the usual: feminist, multi-cultural, etc. I rather liked it; at least it was honest, describing what actually happens. Only Steve Scher was negative—indeed, contemptuous.

Wednesday, March 30, 1994

I'm going to serve on the ad hoc committee for Sally Pinkas's tenure, with Steve Scher and Christian Wolff. Went today to read her dossier. Superlatives except for some few very negative students. Our English Department tenure cases are so weak by comparison. Listened to cassettes. Her Appassionata is very vigorous, as is her Third Bartok concerto played with the Harvard-Radcliffe orchestra under Jimmy Yannatos.

Friday, April 1, 1994

Conference call: Pendle Hill's Executive Board needed to confirm Janet Shepherd as acting dean after the dean-elect backed out at the last minute. I wasn't very enthusiastic, but agreed.

Sunday, April 3, 1994

Easter. But you'd never know it at Meeting. Business Meeting dissected my version of the State of Society. I recorded all the opinions on the Powerbook, a long, tedious process of group composition. And they rejected the poster I brought home from London last year because it includes the word "Christian"!

Monday, April 4, 1994

Chrysanthi received a subpoena from the court in Rockville requiring her to appear to testify regarding the theft of her purse and threatening her with arrest for contempt of court if she does not appear. She's in a tizzy. All the memories of the Gestapo have returned even though this is totally different. We went to John Boswell, who said that witnesses should appear—otherwise the judicial process is subverted—but that they can't arrest Chrysanthi across state lines, only if she crosses sometime into Maryland. Then I contacted the State's Attorney in Maryland, who was very understanding. She said: (1) If Chrysanthi does come, the court will cover all expenses, (2) she hopes to do plea bargaining to get a plea of guilty, in which case there will be no trial, (3) if there must be a trial she can postpone it until such time that I can accompany Chrysanthi. Now we're waiting to see if the plea bargaining will be successful.

I'm arranging with Marty Sherwin for Bill McNeill's visit. McNeill is a real celebrity and everyone is very excited.

Tuesday, April 5, 1994

Lunch with Graham Wallis about Peace Studies. Like the others, he is willing to lecture, etc., but not to coordinate the entire course. . . . To the art gallery to see Ben Moss's show before his inaugural lecture this afternoon. Abstract drawings and paintings with quite some power. The lecture was rambling; I left after 90 minutes of it. Turns out he was a pacifist. . . . Strangely, Chrysanthi wanted to see the movie "Schindler's List," so we went. But she covered her eyes with her hand most of the time and asked me when it was OK to look. Horrible story. She says it revived all her hatred of the Germans.

Wednesday, April 6, 1994

Leila Kanter of the Pendle Hill board is here with her daughter and husband. The daughter is looking at colleges. I set her up with classes and an overnight in the dorm and spent teatime with them answering questions. The mother is Indian, father NYC Jewish. Daughter is dark Indian type, sweet.

Friday, April 8, 1994

Supper at the Officers' to see Ann Johnson. She's now, of course, a mature young woman. Lots of good talk about Noye and Dee, Debra's failed marriage, and Stella and Jim Clancy (Jim died a year or so ago).

Saturday, April 9, 1994

To Kendal to meet with Mary Keeley and Beasy Brownell (age 90, former chair of Vassar trustees) and Barbara Gilbert re: questions for tomorrow's forum with the Overseers. Beasy told me not to use the words "dream" or "vision" or "opportunity." "People don't want rhetoric or evasion. They want action." I retyped all the questions on the computer and then typed in the answers. The questions fall into two categories:

(1) What is this Board of Overseers? (2) What changes in governance are contemplated?

Having finished my introduction to Kenneth Boulding's sonnets for Pendle Hill, I'm now reading Edwin Sill Fussell's The Catholic Side of Henry James for a book review. Next: Doug Gwyn's manuscript.

Sunday, April 10, 1994

Meeting for Worship, then Meeting for Business. I voiced my misgivings regarding the marriage of Veda Crewe under the care of the Meeting, even though our Oversight Committee had approved it. Friends agreed. Then we went through the State of Society again but, thankfully, with only minor changes. I entered them here and there on the Powerbook and finished. Then they rejected the poster I'd brought back from Euston Road because it includes the word "Christian."

To Kendal for the forum. Gathering Room full. I distributed questions to all the Overseers and we went through them efficiently, leaving time for comments and questions from the floor. People were generally courteous and rational. But some spoke heatedly, suggesting that we secede from the Kendal Corporation, etc. Afterwards, many came up to speak privately. All in all, the points that concern them seem to be (1) 20% limit for residents on the proposed new board is too restrictive, (2) the new governance isn't happening quickly enough, (3) for some, the watering down of the Quaker element is distressing—they came because this was a Quaker venture (others, however, say they've lost all faith in Quakers).

Monday, April 11, 1994

Letter from Nancy Mitchell describing in gory detail the mistreatment of her mother at Kendal. Alas, alack! Phone call from Walter Frank saying in effect that the Residents Council is ineffective—we've got to get the right people on the Overseers, not Mary Keeley. I suppose he means himself and Bob Reno (who was very discourteous to me yesterday). Visit from John Radebaugh, worrying about Debbie, etc. The other morning he telephoned, disguising his voice. Chrysanthi answered and heard, "This is the office of the president of Dartmouth College. We hear that Professor Bien is not performing his duties owing to excessive time spent at Kendal."

Tuesday, April 12, 1994

Long talk with John Diffey. I think he is ready to commit the Corporation to paying the building expenses. He also seems ready to fire Debbie. Good! Jean has received her report from the consultant and must now submit a plan of correction. I was on the telephone with her for  $\frac{3}{4}$  of an hour. I objected strenuously to “censoring” of the minutes of our last meeting and she agreed to let them go through without the Corporation’s blue pencil. Then she described why she called the police to exclude David Coffee from Kendal, because he returned after being fired, and visited with girlfriends on the nursing staff over the weekend, and on Monday we found a whole set of patients’ records in disorder. Sabotage! And the inspectors are arriving next week.

¶ “[E]thnic homogeneity appears as a characteristic of barbarian communities, not of civilized society.” —W. H. McNeill, “Winds of Change” in Sea-Changes, ed. N. X. Rizopoulos (New York: Council on Foreign Relations 1990), p. 186. Macedonia!

¶ “We have the advantage over other organisms of being capable of a vastly expanded range of mistakes, simply because we interpose words, numbers and other symbols between ourselves and the outer world. This makes human behavior far more changeable than anything genetic mutation and organic evolution can match.” —McNeill, op. cit., p. 201.

April 13, 1994

Lunch with Pano Rodis, who is reconstituting his life after the separation from Karen.

5:00 p.m., special Kendal Overseers’ meeting to hear the consultant, David Jackson, M.D., Ph.D., who specializes in “healing” nursing facilities. He has submitted new systems to us, new ways to check performance. The major problem is lack of leadership. Next: use of temporary nurses. Until these two are cured, we will continue to be in trouble. Supper afterwards with Margery Walker gossiping about Pendle Hill mostly. Then rushed home for music with Dick and Allan: Martinu, Haydn, Bach.

April 14, 1994

I’m on an ac hoc tenure and promotion committee for Sally Pinkas, the pianist, together with Christ Wolff, Steve Scher, Melinda O’Neill, and Jon Alexander. What a pleasure to have a candidate so exceptionally qualified both as a performer and a teacher. It was easy.

April 15, 1994

Lunch with Randy Testa. Nice how easily we talk. Two hours non-stop, deep and meaningful. I've asked him to do an ILEAD course on the Amish.

April 16 1994

To Kendal at 8:30 a.m. to have Lou Flaccus "block" Bob McKinley and me as Orlando and Jacques in As You Like It and to work with me on Jacques' "All the world's a stage" speech. I've managed to memorize it, finally. I'm working now on vocal expression. . . . Supper with Claire and Allan Munck.

April 17, 1994

Supper with Ben and Gene Moss, now back from Australia, where Nikos and Lucia Alonesti entertained them (twice, royally, with overabundant food). Ben's paintings do not excite me, alas. He's a non-stop talker, a little tiring.

Monday, April 18, 1994

To Kendal at 5:00 p.m. to meet with what we are now calling the "Junta," led by disagreeable Bob Reno. Walter Frank, Bob Bergen, Bob Anthony, Mr. Colton, Jim Armstrong, etc., the big and powerful. Barbara Gilbert joined me. Thank goodness John Diffey was there, too, for he bore most of the attack. Reno was merciless re: delays and evasions concerning who pays for building repairs, and the nature of the management fee. The new governance proposals were also attacked: plus ça change plus c'est la même chose, according to them (with some justification). All this was included in a letter addressed to the Corporation. Reno said that he wanted not pretty language but by-laws by next week (!) and he'd write them himself if we were too busy. Armstrong argued for seceding from the Kendal Corporation, being on our own (but afterwards, privately, he came up to me and said this was mostly an extreme tactic). Supper afterwards at home with Diffey, Barbara, John Radebaugh, and Chrysanthi. Relaxed, thank goodness. I've drafted a summary of what I want to say to the Directors on Thursday. It's angry, alas.

April 19, 1994

Kendal Overseers. Debbie has been fired, in effect, though it was presented as a resignation. We heard good news about the building: that Ewing Cole, the architects, accept responsibility for design defects and will pay for setting them right.

Lunch with Timothy Rub and Kathy Hart of the Hood Museum and Gene Lyons regarding a photographic exhibit on refugees for next fall; they're hoping that Peace Studies can co-sponsor it. But does Peace Studies exist?!

Thursday, April 21, 1994

Longwood

6:30 a.m. flight to Boston, then to Philadelphia. It was snowing when we took off. Kendal at Longwood was dressed in spring flowers, pear and apple blossoms, forsythia, magnolias, all brilliant; tulips, too. Lunch with Oliver Rodgers, who told me (a) that Dan Seeger is alienating everyone at Pendle Hill because he cannot delegate or trust, (b) that Kendal's troubles must be in part owing to Paul Lewis, whom Oliver described as totally incompetent. Lloyd put him in as the administrator of Crosslands and it was a disaster. Poor Lloyd! He's autocratic and paranoid. But Coleman Dorsey is doing better, Astrid told me. Out of the psychological hospital, on drugs that keep him functioning, working with a social work agency. There's a chance that he'll be only suspended from legal practice rather than disbarred. I played music with Oliver afterwards. Then Kendal Fund Board met at 4:00, Kendal Corporation Board at 4:30 to 6:00. Supper with Bill Yost, etc., Kendal at Hanover Directors from 7:30 to 9:15. Barbara and I kept pushing for the Corporation to accept responsibility for building defects. John Diffey kept hesitating until the cost is known and where the money is going to come from. Finally we got them to agree on principle to their responsibility and we discovered some money: $250,000 outright, and much more possibly (as a loan from Kendal at Hanover reserves). I delivered my speech; afterwards, John Diffey said he was relieved because it was more charitable than the written version. Good! . . . Back to Pendle Hill by 10:15 p.m. to play four-hands with Dan until midnight. We are trying to choose repertory for Leander's workshop. Bizet is first choice, then Debussy. We're getting sick of Schumann. I wanted Poulenc but Dan felt it was too hard.

Friday, April 22, 1994

Pendle Hill

I've been vetting Doug Gwyn's manuscript on covenant vs. charter. Fascinating stuff, but he's not a good writer: mixed metaphors, jargon, etc. But we'll publish it. Spoke with Rebecca. She's touchy and inefficient, as usual. Publication Committee went well. We accepted Yungblut's revision, thank goodness. Cadbury Committee also went well. One good candidate, so the choice was easy. Supper with Wallace Collett. His wife is moving from Cincinnati to Bryn Mawr as a tenured professor of archeology and he'll shift homes, too. He told me that he started as a poor farm boy, taught, lost his job in the depression, started a business in catering and food service, eventually bought other businesses nationwide, got on the New York Stock Exchange, became a millionaire. But the business, sold to incompetents, is now bankrupt and his pension is not being paid. Afterwards: dessert and coffee in the Barn to honor Elizabeth Gray Vining, whose book we have just reprinted, and Mary Morrison, whose Pendle Hill pamphlet on aging has been such a success—20,000 copies ordered by Kendal. I got autographed copies from both. We also honored Carol Murphy, who died recently. She left her library to Pendle Hill, which, after choosing what it wanted, left the rest for all of us to plunder at will. I found some Kierkegaard and Tillich. John Anderson gave a good presentation at the evening meeting. He is leaving, so this is his swan song. He is boring in manner but not in spirit. More piano four-hands with Dan afterwards.

Saturday, April 23, 1994

Pendle Hill

Breakfast meeting with Shirley Dodson and Bob Gray of the committee to examine the residential program. Shirley is a live wire. We agreed on central strategies. Later, Denny O'Brien told me that the teachers are already defensive and scared, thinking that I am hopelessly academic. So, says Denny, "be tender." The morning program for the Board consisted of students extolling Pendle Hill. Vince Buscemi whispered to me afterwards, "If they'd picked other students we would have heard the exact opposite!" John Anderson's real swan song came next: Academic "rigor" is too often rigor mortis. Pendle Hill wants holistic education, and so on and so forth.

Board meeting after lunch. Robin Harper wants to climb a tree with students to express spirituality! We wisely said No.

Drove to Haverford for the Corporation meeting. Saw Tom Wood,

